which the herd-type remains preserved.

The outbreak of entire reform movements as correctives of the body.

What does asceticism mean?

Buddhism and monasticism as the production of healthy bodies (countering the destructive and debilitating affects).

Morality as a language of metaphors about an unknown region of corporeal states. – Here the talk (is) still entirely of will and purpose and of nothing else at all.

2. The adaptation of the body to a climate brings about the manifestation of moralities.

That which is the perishing of the type and immorality.
thus altering the body apparently without chemical means — — in truth, morality is (about) changing the chemical composition of the body.

Monstrous detour. In what way might it be possible to proceed more directly?

152 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

"Concept of health and ideal of health dependent on the goal of human beings" — ? but the goal itself is an expression of a particular composition of the body and its conditions.

The body and morality.

4 [218]

And he did not know how to overcome his virtue.

The lion within him tore apart the child within him: and finally the lion devoured itself.

This hero was cruel and wild — — —

Behold, I teach you the love for superhumans.

— — — he took it upon himself and shattered under the burden.

4 [219]

Passions = states of our organs and their aftereffect on the brain — along with seeking release.

4 [220]

He was called a sage, but he was nothing of the kind.

4 [221]

In earlier times, the position of religion in relation to nature was reversed: religion reflected the popular understanding of nature.

Now the popular understanding is the materialistic one.

Therefore whatever there is of religion must now speak the same way to the people: materialistically.

4 [222]

squarely built, with a strong neck using the lion to kill the lion tamer

4 [223])"

You should not want to have many virtues — you are not rich enough for that. One virtue is already a lot of virtue: in order for it to live, you must already be perishing.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 — FEBRUARY 1883 153

4 [224]?!

I live so that I know: I want to know so that superhumans may live.

We experiment for them!

4 [225]

The thoroughly creative character of everything that happens — — —

The freedom of the will is much more convincingly demonstrated than cause and effect (in truth cause effect is only a popular conclusion)

4 [226]

We are too tolerant of bad air: and you yourself are bad air for other people.

Three or 2.

Whoever does not make us fertile?!

4 [227]

A quest for whatever it is about the truth that hurts me, and sacrificing everything, a monstrous tension

nothing in my head but a personal morality: and to establish my right to it is the meaning of all my historical questions about morality. (For it is terribly difficult to establish this right for ourselves!) 4 [228]2!4

I love humans who bring?" about the downfall of their virtue.

behold, I show you the bridge to the superhumans!

(I love those) who squander their souls, who do not thank and never give back because they are always giving gifts.'°

154 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [229]?'7

Those who justify the people of the future and redeem the people of the past.

And those who are compassionate should create out of this their duty and doom, and those who are loyal should let loyalty become their duty and their doom — and you cannot have enough ingenuity?' for your virtue.

Let your life be an experiment — let your failures and successes be proof: but take care that people know how you have experimented and what you have proven.

they said: let us make ourselves dead to the world, they sought their salvation beyond the stars — they have not heard a word about superhumans.

They maligned their health, — — —

There is so much about your good people that disgusts me, and truly not what is evil about them."

I wish they had a madness that would mean their downfall, as the pale criminal's madness meant his,
I wish their madness were called compassion or loyalty or justice.

But they have their virtue in order to live a long time, — — back then there was doubt, the search for justice, compassion for friends — —

4 [230]?

And his scholar should be a penitent of the mind.
And his speech displeased everyone except for one person.
Interaction.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 — FEBRUARY 1883 155

Scholars

A call to stand alone and to talk your way out of things!

4 [231]

The right to my own values — where did I get this? From the rights of all old values and from the limits of these values.

4 [232]

The point of marriage: a child that represents a type superior

to the parents.

NB. they must despise you as you move above and beyond them — they do not understand what it is to be above ourselves.

You yearn for love — but, no, you must learn to endure contempt.

You set your hearts on money and you yourselves are losing your hearts. Railroad and state are to the advantage of many and are their doom.

For those who do not belong to the many.

You are losing your caution, your lynx eyes and your bear claws.

4 [233]

Value terminology is a banner planted where a new blissfulness was invented — a new feeling.

4 [234]?!

Sometimes I want from you: that you be profoundly clever and that you be profoundly proud: then your pride will always

accompany your cleverness. You will walk the paths of foolish-

ness: yet I call even upon your foolishness, that it may always

take pride as its escort. But if you want to be foolish

- - -

156 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Do I recommend to you loving thy neighbor? I much prefer to recommend fearing thy neighbor and loving those far away.
I discovered a new land in humans

where the soul overflows

you show me a brush and a j(a)r full of paint and say: we have refuted the picture.

Society is decaying. the dreaming future

You are fleeing yourselves: and always you move out of the frying pan of self-contempt into the fire??? of loving thy neighbor.

Cats and wolves should also be my role models: they are more self-possessed.

(Shoo-flies) for the little annoyances of daily life.

4 [235]

A god who proves his existence poorly is as good as a god who does not prove his existence at all.

This is a god who proves his existence either not at all or poorly.

When 100 stand together, all of them lose their minds and acquire different ones.

Oh these impoverished friendships! Whatever they do for their friends, I promise to do for my enemies – and I do not want to have become poorer.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 157

4 [236]

And just as a child uses his little foot to push a glass shard in front of him, so life propels us foolishly forward.

4 371°"

Yes, laden with heavy burdens, I hurried into my desert: but there I found for the first time my heaviest burden of all.
to be the smith and anvil of our own virtue, the judge and touchstone of our own worth.

There are many heavy burdens and when I was young I did a lot of searching for the heaviest one.

Yes, I fled into the desert – and there in the most isolated desert, I found for the first time my heaviest burden of all.

This heaviest burden – this became what was most precious to me, like a god I taught that my heaviest burden should be revered.

sighed deeply and spoke no more.

4 [238]?

And when someone does you a great injustice, then see to it only that you also do that person a small injustice in return, it's humane that way.

4 [239]

And you believe that justice will already be limping along after you?

4 [240]?

There is more reason in your body than in your reason. And even that which you call wisdom, – who knows why your body needs just this wisdom?

4 [241]

I realized that shepherds and breeders of herds created these codes: in this way they gave a foundation to the life and continuation of their herds.

158 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [242]?

Yes, I bore all of this burden! I knelt down and loaded all of this burden upon myself, like a camel I bowed my head and hurried away into the desert.

Where are the truths that cause suffering? I exclaimed.

The first one was the dragon and he spoke: "The worth of all things is worthless," "Contradiction is at the heart of all values"

At that point I recognized the origin of good and evil: and that humankind lacks the goal.

To give myself the right to name things with new names and values, was the heaviest burden.

I envied all plants – I envied even all ghosts.

To shatter the tablets of values with superior values my own tablets I set beside the others – how much courage and fear it took!

4 [243]

you are the despisers of the body

4 [244]

I looked into the eyes of these greatest ones and crawled into their souls. Alas!!! – Depiction of geniuses and saints.

Concerning the question whether {they}??? have existed already! – If they did, then the earth knew nothing of it.

4 [245]?

The preachers of the slow death are venerated the most.

4 [246]

(Chap(ter)) What became Zarathustra's heaviest burden?
To disengage himself from the ancient morality.

4 [247]

Chap(ter). Do you want a reward? What you want as a reward is for me the measure of your virtue.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 159

4 [248]

I gave a new color to (the) earth – I spread the veil of a new hope across the earth.

4 [249]?

Blood founds churches: what does blood have to do with truth! And if you want my approval, then prove it to me with reasons and not with blood.

4 [250]

(Chap(ter)) Puny people. Go forth into solitude, you cannot endure a small shower of raindrops.

4 [251]

and suddenly it opens its eyes, the eyes of a child and of a blossom. What happened? The hand of a creative one touched it. The sun of a creative one revealed the god that was concealed.

4 [252]

I brought those lost in flight back down to earth and to their huts: at the heights I taught them depth.

4 [253]°7°

Tell me, where have they gone, these dear sages? Do their eyes not grow heavy? – Here and there a few such sages are still around you: they preach good and evil in soft voices. Blessed are these sleepy ones.

4 [254]

Have there already been superhumans? Value of our culture.

4 [255]

they spin on the edge of earthliness and their keen eyes grow blind in this twilight.

160 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [256]

To invent a thousand new ways to live – no longer just for herds!

4 [257]"'

She is betraying lock, stock and barrel??? – that's what's so vile! We must learn to ennoble what is vile.

4 [258]

yearning and questioning and only shedding tears etc. – Against religious people.

it is no longer honest. It is not sufficient for faith!
Therefore: after this position," renunciation!

4 [259]

I want to hear your dominant thought and not only that you have escaped a kind of insanity.

Are you the sort of people who are allowed to escape from a kind of insanity? Or did you toss aside your last value when you threw away your servitude . . .

Free, from what? – why should this even matter to Zarathustra

when you squint at the question: free for what?

I want to hear your dominant thought, so that it may exonerate you in my presence! – or I will have my thoughts strike

your ears like scourges.

4 [260]?34

A sun, with the serpent of knowledge coiled in rings around it.

4 [261]

"that which is earthly' – you must learn to perceive it differently.

Lay aside the false measures of value that were taken from an unknown world

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 161

Humans stand tall – – per(haps) superior beings will suddenly be achieved!

4 [262]

(Chap(ter)) The alleged love of God and "everything to our advantage"

4 [263]

The good it wants to preserve itself by means of the ancient

4 [264]

They dearly wish to escape: yet they cannot find any way to other stars, so they believe that there are subterranean ways

– of a completely different kind and as it were secret ways.

– Rare conditions were felt to be superterrestrial. Delight
and convulsions combined.

To me your love is not abundant enough to be a love of the universe!

Our feelings – this is the entire human past up until you and me: the values that have been created.

Our more lofty feelings – we would have to eradicate them if we don't give them a new goal!

If it weren't for this dreary cloud in the sky, you wouldn't have dreary knowledge either!

4 [265]

My direction for art: don't continue writing poetry in the margins! the future of humanity instead! There must be many pictures out there that can model ways to Jive!

4 [266]??? Against hinterworlders.

162 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Your life an experiment and monument to your experiment.

Artists helped to ensure that life was not improved. In most cases artists themselves the victims of their works.

penitents of the mind?*° the one who creates

4 [267]

Some sacrifice is involved in giving up this hinterworld. Manliness!

What is earthly is not enough for us – therefore what is heavenly – flawed conclusion.

Nature denies you this intrusion!

In the beginning a wrinkled tuber, and a noxious??” root drenched with many poisons – every feeling.

4 [268]

someone who creates is someone who creates new values.

But not the artist!

4 [269] the gathering of individuals (festival)

4 [270]

Gods, I have a bow! What a bow – a good bow against gods themselves!

4 [271]??®

The great test: are you ready to justify life Or your own death?

At the lowest level still enduring it.

Illness led many to take this second way.

Renunciation.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 163

The great halfway point. – The decision about wanting to live or die.

4 [272]

State and church, and everything that is founded on lies, serve the preachers of death.

4 [273]

you think the solution to your riddle must be in the dark! But consider the destiny of a worm. The solution lies in your goal and in your hope: it's your will!

No God has ever intervened! But you have subjugated yourselves too much to convention, even to nature.

But the knowing one??? sees how every love and sun has bowed down to ugly weeds.

4 [274]

Many an ostrich has buried its head in the thinnest layer of sand.

4 [275]?

Whenever you stepped from a lower virtue up to a higher one — — —

I want to be the first to give you your dignity: you ought to be penitents of the mind!

Ruins should not be destroyed: grass and roses and tiny herbs and whatever residue of life decorates these ruins, all of this destroys even what is dead.

This I has been most convincingly demonstrated, this I that contradicts itself.

Truly the world is well concealed from h(umans). The belly of existence? *! will never speak to h(umans)!

164 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

For what reason did I tell you this? In this way the /iar has become the signpost of the superhumans.

Separation

4 [276]

The decision. There must be countless sacrifices. An experiment.

4 [277]

Even the sweetest woman tastes bitter.

4 [278]

If the good?" of the many is our good, then we should not call it virtue when we do good for the many. On loving thy neighbor.

4 [279]

So punch your way out of this false stargazing nonsense!

The belly of existence will never speak to you.

4 [280]243 3 Transform(ations) Sleep and Virtue 1001 goal the despisers of the body. Hinterworld. our own virtue. On the Pale Criminal the tree on the mountain Reading and Writing. Preachers of Death. The New Idol. Z(arathustra's) Solitude 1. Friend. Soldiers. Loving thy Neighbor.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 — FEBRUARY 1883

Chastity.

Path of Those Who Create. Women.

Viper's Bite.

Marriage.

Death.

on holy selfishness.

165

[5 = ZI 2a. Mp XV 3a.

November 1882–February 1883]

s u!

1 Will to live? I have always found only will to power in its place.?

2. The constant zeal for a cause, even the highest, our own, betrays a lack of spiritual refinement, as do all things that rest on unconditional faith: for the emblem of this is always – a cool gaze.

3. I consider all people harmful who are no longer capable of opposing that which they love: this is how they corrupt the best things and persons.

4. There are persons who would like to force everyone into a yes or no with respect to their entire character: Rousseau was one of them: the megalomania they suffer from originates in their insane mistrust of themselves.

5. We must overcome even the youth in ourselves in order to become children again.?

6. It is with our intentions that we rationalize our in-comprehensible drives to ourselves: as, e.g., murderers do when they justify to their reason their actual compulsion to murder, namely, by deciding to commit a robbery or to take revenge.

5 NOVEMBER 1882 –FEBRUARY 1883 167

7. The pleasure that all morality has conveyed up to now and still conveys – in other words the pleasure that morality has accumulated up to now – lies in the right it gives everyone to praise and blame, without extensive evaluation. And who could bear life without praising and blaming!

8. This is the crux for moral pessimists: if they were serious about wanting to help their brothers toward redemption, then they would have to decide to make their brothers' existence miserable, in other words (to) be their unhappiness; out of compassion they would have to – become evil!

If it were true that life does not deserve to be affirmed, then moral people would be abusing their neighbors precisely by using self-denial and helpfulness – for their most personal gain.

9. I want to know whether you are a creative or a productive person in any particular way: as a creative person you belong among free people, as a productive person you are their slave and their tool.

10. As much as possible and this as quickly as possible: this is what is demanded by the great intellectual and emotional malady that is sometimes called “the present,” sometimes “education,” in truth it is nothing but a symptom of consumption.’

11. Women and geniuses don’t work. Up until now women have been humankind’s greatest extravagance. In those moments where we do our best, we don’t work. Work is only a means to these moments.

12. We are most unfair not toward that which displeases us, but rather toward that which does not concern us at all.®

13. No sooner do we take even one step beyond average human goodness than our actions arouse suspicion. For virtue rests “in the mean.””

168 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

14. You say “we like this” and think you are praising me. Oh you fools! How much I like it when you do this!®

15. Of everything that has been written I love only what people write with their blood. This is why I love books. Affects are nothing to be ashamed of, they are too irrational for that.

16. The affects are a relief for those who are frequently burdened by their rationality; namely, as a kind of irrationality.

17. This century loves to ascribe to its most intellectual men a taste for immature, mentally deficient and modest little girls of the people, Faust’s taste for Gretchen – this speaks against the taste of the century and of its most intellectual men.

18. As if that weren’t bad enough! The time for marriage comes much earlier than the time for love: the latter regarded as the measure of maturity, in men and women.

19. When a woman attacks a man, it is only to defend herself against a woman. When a man becomes friends with a woman, she thinks he's doing it because he can't get any further with her.!°

20. It is impossible to suffer without having someone pay for it; every single complaint contains revenge."

21. My brothers and sisters, do not act so delicately toward me! We are all comely sturdy male and female donkeys and truly no trembling rosebuds for whom a mere dew drop seems too much!!?

22. Life is hard to bear: but why else would we have our defiance in (the) morning and our surrender in the afternoon?!

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 169

23. I am astounded: I often don't get hungry until after a meal.!4

24. Truly, not the least of a theory's charms is the fact that it is refutable.!

25. These constitutional monarchs were thought to be virtuous: since then they can no longer "commit injustice" – but in return they were stripped of their power.!°

26. Those fortunate enough to remain obscure should also take advantage of the freedoms that darkness affords and, especially, "whisper well."

27. To actually attribute the unpleasant consequences of our own folly to folly and not to our lack of character – this requires more character than most people have.'®

28. Scientific people share the fate of rope-makers: they weave their strand longer and longer, but in the process they themselves move – backwards."

29. For me, the worst thing is not to fall into his hands: but into his thoughts."

30. To experience a lot: a lot of the past included; to experience a lot of our own and others' experiences as an integrated

whole: this shapes the most superior humans; I call them
"totalities."?!

Good people are brakes: they obstruct, they preserve."

4 25

(33.) "Honorable men"? are offensive to my taste.

170 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

(34.) To become illustrious in 300 years – that is my thirst for glory."

(35.) Do I love music? I don't know: too often I also find myself hating it. And yet music does love me, and no sooner does someone leave me than music jumps into my lap and wants to be loved.?"

(36.) They do not love me: is this a reason not to bless them?78

37. "Behold! The world has just now become perfect": that's what every woman thinks when she obeys out of total devotion."

It is true that the earth became warmer when the forests were thinned out and cleared – —*°

Justice would be done if petty thieves, petty backbiters and detractors were hanged.?!

40. We shouldn't use one word to categorize contemptible people together with terrible people.??

41. Affects that are evil and great shake us to the core and overthrow everything that is rotten and small within us: you must first experiment with the possibility of not being great.

42. Our delicate feelings keep us deluded and make us depressed,

let's say this openly: "I like it this way – I don't care why!"

43. In regard to most truths, women have the feeling that someone wants to look under their skin.??

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 171

44. In addition to our ability to judge we also have our opinion

of our ability to judge.

45. You lack the courage to burn yourself up and to become ashes: and so you will never become new and never become young again!?*

46. Marriage is designed for average people who are not capable

of either extraordinary love or extraordinary friendship, in other words, for most people: but also (for) those very rare individuals who are capable of both love and friendship.'

47. You lovers of knowledge! So what have you done up until now out of love of knowledge? Have you ever stolen and murdered in order to know how it feels to be a thief and a murderer?*°

48. Lies have also been told about the value of knowledge: those who know have always cited it in their defense – they always found themselves extremely marginalized and almost criminalized.*"

49. To become as close to a friend as possible without surrendering to the friend entirely! We (should) honor even the enemy in our friends.*®

50. The more abstract the truth you want to teach, the more you have to seduce even the senses into embracing it.

51. The subtlety of compassion consists in discerning whether the sufferer really wants compassion.

52. "Obedience" and "law" – these ring out from all moral feelings. But, in the end, "choice" and "freedom" could still become the death knell of morality.

172 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

53. A child as the monument to the passion of two persons; a twosome's will to oneness.??

54. We must endure our thirst and let it become acute: otherwise-wise we will never discover our wellspring, which can never be another's!

55. You must raise even your devil to greatness: that way you rid yourself of petty deviltry.*°

56. The great epochs of our life are to be found wherever we find the courage to rebaptize our evil as good.*!

57. Even truthfulness is just one of the means to knowledge, a ladder – but not the ladder."

58. The will to overcome an affect is, in the final analysis, only the will of another affect.*

59. Those who themselves possess the will to suffer are differently disposed to cruelty: they no longer take it to be in itself damaging and bad."

60. Persons who were employed in an enterprise that has failed should be doubly compensated.

61. Heroism – this is the mentality of people who pursue goals that, logically speaking, they have no chance of achieving. H(eroism) is self-destruction in good faith.*°

62. The enormous expectations that women bring to sexual love ruin for them all additional perspectives."

63. Those who no longer find greatness in God no longer find greatness at all – they must deny it or create it.*®

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 173

64. Unconditional love also contains – the desire to be mistreated: in that case love defies itself, and out of devotion there grows at last even the wish for self-destruction: "Perish in the depths of this ocean!" ®

65. Lust and self-mutilation are neighboring drives. Even among those who know there are self-mutilators: they do not want to be creative at all.*°

66. There are temperaments" that can find no way of living with themselves except by striving for their own downfall."

67. The closer you come to being completely coldhearted in regard to everything that was previously valued, the closer you also come to a new warmheartedness."

68. Every good is the transformation of an evil: every god has a devil for a father.*4

69. "What must I do to become blessed?" I don't know, but I say to you: be blessed® and then do whatever you want."

70. Something becomes dear to us: and no sooner have we come to love it with all our hearts than that tyrant within us calls out: "give me that very thing as a sacrifice" – and we give it."

71. I urge you to battle, not to work, I urge you to victory, not to peace. May your work be a battle, your peace a victory.

72. I awoke you from sleep: for I saw that a nightmare was oppressing you. And now you are out of sorts and tell me:

"what should we do now? Night is still all around us!" – you ungrateful ones! You should go back to sleep and dream better"?

174 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

73. Every church is the stone on the grave of a God-made-human: the last thing it wants is for him to be resurrected.
°°

Everything about women is a riddle, everything about women has one solution: it is called pregnancy.°!

But even the serpent itself was one of God's prejudices.

75. What's the point! Apparently you don't understand anything other than barking and biting – so at least be my dog – said Zarathustra.

I also know what is beyond evil and good – said Zarathustra."

77. Today I love myself as I love my God: who could forgive me a sin today? I know only sins against my God; yet who knows my God?®

78. Do you want to have an easy life? Then always stay with the herd and lose yourself in the herd. –°°

79. In war, personal revenge is silent."

81. Don't look at the sun! The moon is still too bright for your nocturnal eyes!"

82. You say: "this is dark." And in truth: I placed a cloud in front of your sun. But don't you see how the edges of the cloud are already shining and becoming bright?"°

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 175

84. There they stand over there, the puny people, like grass and weeds and undergrowth – blameless in their pitifulness. And now I creep through them and crush as few as I can – but at the same time disgust eats away at my heart."

85. What sustained me, you ask? Always pregnancy and nothing else. And every time a work was born, my life hung by a thin thread."

86. Disgust at filth can become so great that it discourages us from cleansing ourselves.'*

87. As one who creates, you live above and beyond yourself – you cease being your contemporary."

88. Alas, you wanted to have it better than good! This is your folly."

89. We can only be silent when we have bows and arrows:

otherwise we babble and bicker.'" "

go. I assume that you are compassionate: to be without compassion means to be sick in mind and body. But we must have a strong mind before we are allowed to be compassionate. For your compassion is damaging to you and to all."8

91. I love compassion that is hidden under a hard shell: I love compassion that makes people bite so hard they break off their teeth."

92. A false saying goes as follows: "those who cannot redeem themselves, how could they redeem others?" But if I have the key to your shackles, why would your lock and mine have to be the same?8?

176 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

93. Once war begins, you will become holy, even if you are brigands and cruel.®!

94. ("A uniform" is what they call it, what they wear: uniformity is what they mean by it.)®?

heart than the tyrant within me says: "I want that very thing y y y 8 as a sacrifice." This cruelty is in my guts. You see: I am evil.

96. You say, a good cause is that which justifies even war? I say: war is that which justifies every cause!*4

97. Reason is an exception even in me, said Zarathustra: chaos and necessity and whirling of the stars – this is the rule even in the wisest of worlds.®

98. We should make our death into a festival, even if only out of malice toward life: toward this woman who wants to leave us – us!86

99. We both have something for each other: how wonderful it is to disagree in this – you have the passion, I the reasons!®"

I am great enough not to be ashamed of them.

101. "There is no one alive who would be worthy of praising me. And whom may Zarathustra not praise?"®?

I milked the milk out of the udder of my misery."°

103. I have exposed myself and am not ashamed to stand here this naked. Shame is the name of the ghoul who became a companion of humans when they were seized with the desire to transcend animals. ("Speech to the Animals")!"

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 177

Zarathustra care???

105. I came to help you, and you complain that I don't want to weep with you."

106. All god-humans created their own gods: and there is no greater enmity on earth than that between gods."

107. Acknowledge your own will, and say to us all, "this is the only thing I want to be": set above yourself your own law of punishment: we want to be the ones who carry it out!

108. If you are too weak to make laws for yourselves: then a tyrant should lay his yoke on you and say: "obey, grind your teeth and obey" – and everything good and evil should drown in obedience to him.

109. Give back and pay back; pay back richly, good and bad – be modest in accepting, let your accepting be a mark of distinction.'

uo. Be careful with cats: they never give, they do not even pay back – they only reply and purr in the process.'

1. Tell me, you birds, who travel widely and see many who are concealed: who among humans has the most extensive soul? the most extensive souls are like small countries?"

112. You are still perfectly innocent in your admiration: you do not believe that you can ever be admired."

113. I am speaking and a child is playing: who can be more serious than the both of us???

178 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

114. You have overcome yourself: but why are you showing yourself to me merely as someone who has been overcome? I want to see the victor: throw roses into the abyss and speak: "A gesture of thanks to the monster because it did not know how to devour me!"

115. There you sit on the beach, freezing and hungry: it is not enough to have saved your !° life!

116. Who would believe it of me, spoke Zarathustra, that I belong to a race of berserkers, and to a race of libertines, of religious fanatics, of those obsessed with revenge? But war has justified me.!!

117. Happiness for men lies in "I will this," happiness for women in "I must."!°?

118. Even the best man is fundamentally evil below: even the best woman is fundamentally bad below.!"

119. I have to be an angel if all I want is to live: but you live under other conditions.!"%

120. Those who say to their god: I want to put all my evil too at your service – are the most pious people.!"

121. You say I should be your teacher! See to it that I am your wings and not your stumbling block.!"®

What do I care about the purring of those who, like cats, are incapable of love?

123. Many a deed is done in order to forget another deed: some actions work like opium. I am here so that another is forgotten.!"8

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 179

124. I am doing what I love best and for that very reason I am loath to describe it with fancy words: I don't want (to) dare to believe that it is a sublime compulsion, a law that I obey: I love what I love best too much to want to show myself as being compelled to do it.

126. In my view, you have become too life-impooverished: now you want to make austerity into virtue itself.

127. Golden era, when arrogance was considered to be the wellspring of evil!!!°

128. You should preserve chaos within you: all those yet to come must have material out of which they can form themselves.!!!

129. Don't let yourselves be deceived! The most active peoples feel the greatest fatigue, their discontent is weakness – they no longer have the substance required for waiting and for laziness.!!?

130. Just for today, destiny, give me the unluckiest roll of your dice. Today I turn everything into gold."

131. No one comes to see me anymore. And I myself: I went to see everyone, but I came to see no one!!4

132. Thinking of life should be the focus of recuperation: otherwise thinking only of the work we have to do!!!

133. We must be as good at being cruel as we are at being compassionate: let us guard against becoming poorer than nature!!!

180 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

134. "I could spare nothing when I created superhumans. All of your evil and falsehood, your lies and your ignorance, are still in their semen."!!"

135. Let humans be the impetus for something that is no longer human! You want species-preservation? I say: species-overcoming!!!8

136. Do I really want to create lamb-souls and visionary vir-gins? Lions are what I want and monsters of force and love.!!!?

137. The point must be reached!?!° where humanity's greatest festivals are procreation and death!!!"!

138. We must prepare not just the earth for superhumans but also the animals and plants.!!?°

139. The best things amount to nothing until an actor has "performed" them.!!?°

140. "You must be inoculated with the madness" – said Zarathustra.

141. I still have all these wild dogs at my place, but in my cellar. I do not want to ever hear them bark.!!?5

142. Thinking of life should be the focus of recuperation: otherwise we should think only of the work we have to do.!!?°

143. Honor actors for my sake and don't ever look for the best ones on stage!!?7

145. You are waging war? You fear your neighbor? So remove the border markers: then you will have no more neighbors.

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 181

But you want war: and that's why you set up the border markers

in the first place.!!"?°

146. "This is how I want to live, illuminated by the virtues of a world that has yet to exist."!?!°

147. Every thing has two faces, one of passing away and one of becoming.'?!°

148. This good discerning exacting sense found in knowledge, which you in no way want to make into a virtue, is the flowering of many virtues: but the "thou shalt" from which it sprang is no longer visible, its roots lie beneath the earth.!??

149. Love is the fruit of obedience: but often generations lie between the fruit and the root: and freedom is the fruit of love!

150. The freer and more grounded individuals are, the more demanding their love becomes: in the end they yearn for superhumans because nothing else quenches their love.

151. Don't reveal yourself! And if you must, then in rage and not in shame!!*4

152. Did I come to teach you how to defend yourselves against burglars and cutthroats? I speak to those who are tired of their virtues and who will allow themselves to be robbed or killed to experience it just once.!35

153. And have you nothing more to say to human beings? his disciples asked. "No," said Zarathustra, "the cup is empty." And when he had said this, he went on his way, alone. Yet those who saw him go, wept.!%°

182 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

154. Beware of insulting hermits: they never forgive. A hermit is like a deep well: it is easy to toss a stone into it: yet how would you propose to retrieve it once it reached the bottom???

155. Be humane toward those who create! It is their nature to know little of loving thy neighbor.!?®

wronged: and with profound people all experiences last a long time. 139 time.

157. Each action by a superior human being breaks your moral law a hundred times.!4°

158. I can still stand on the narrowest stoop of life: but who would I be if I showed you this skill? Do you wish to see a tightrope walker?!4!

159. Ah, what a lap of luxury you live in! You have a law – and a nasty look for anyone who even thinks about opposing it. For our part we are free: what do you know of the agony that results from taking responsibility for oneself –!*?

 160. I teach you redemption from eternal flux: the flux also flows back into itself again and again, and you always step into the same flux again and again, as the same people.!*?
 161. I taught myself this: humans gave themselves all of morality: although they now believe that they merely received it. Well then! We, too, can still give ourselves a good and an evil!!⁴⁴
 162. What is it that humans find most difficult to do? To love those who despise us: to abandon our cause when it is celebrating its triumph: to renounce reverence for the sake of truth; to be ill and turn away anyone who wishes to comfort
 5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883
 183 us; to wade into cold and dirty water; to make friends with doves; to extend a hand to a ghost who terrifies us: – all of this, said Zarathustra, I have done, and I carry it with me: and all of this I give away today at a bargain price – for the smile of a child.!!%
 Didn't I know of the speechless eyes of all the injured?
 164. Even as animals we should be perfect – said Zarathustra.!"
 166. I love free minds when their hearts are free as well. My head is like the stomach of the heart – but we should have a good stomach. What the heart accepts, the head must digest.!!*®
 167. It is not enough to have a talent: we must also be allowed to have it!!⁴?
 168. Compassion a hellish feeling: compassion is itself the cross to which those who love human beings are nailed.!!°°
 169. Keep your souls fresh and cool and raw! May you remain far from the lukewarm air of those people full of feeling, from the stale humid air of sentimental people!!>!
 170. "Shrouded in heavy sadness: my life hangs on small coincidences." The hermit.)
 171. When we suffer a lot, we might finally become humble enough to be vain – said the hermit: he opened his mouth reluctantly, he usually preferred to grit his teeth.!?

172. “I do not give alms – I am not poor enough for that” – said Zarathustra.!!®

184 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

173. I am a support and a balustrade along a mighty river: grab onto me whoever can! – I am not a crutch.!?

174. “Humans should be the midpoint between plants and ghosts.”

175. Blood is a poor witness for truth: blood poisons a doctrine so that it becomes a kind of hatred.!?7

177. Murderous desire, hatred, mistrust are now phenomena that accompany bodily illness: this is how much moral judgments have been incorporated in us. – In barbaric times, cowardice and compassion might appear to be symptoms of illness. Perhaps virtues can also be symptoms; – – –!”

178. This is how humans are: a new force, a first movement:
a self-revolving wheel; if they were strong enough, they would make the stars revolve around themselves.!!®

179. With shoulders squared, space stands braced against the void. Where there is space, there is being.’

180. You told me what a sound is and what an ear is: but what does this have to do with artists of sounds? Have you explained music by saying this – or refuted it instead?!°?

181. There are no moral drives,! but all drives are colored by our value judgments.

183. When horror consorts with what is harmful, evil emerges;

when disgust consorts with it, bad emerges.!!®

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 185

184. Zarathustra: “As long as your morality hung over me, I breathed like someone suffocating. And so I strangled this serpent. I wanted to live, that’s why it had to die.!!66

185. What is a human being? A pile of passions that reach out into the world through the senses and the mind: a tangle of wild serpents seldom growing tired of the struggle: then they gaze out into the world to find their prey.!!°

186. It is impossible to live without assigning value: but it is possible to live without assigning value to what you value.

187. Now the lead weight of their guilt lies upon them: they are so ponderous, so stiff: if only they could shake their heads, it would roll off. But who will move these heads?!©*

188. I want to force you to think like a human being: a necessity for those human beings who can conceptualize human beings. The necessity of having gods would not be true for you.'

189. The force of praise and blame is monstrous: but where is the goal that could devour this force?

190. And what was too foul to feed to your dogs – this is precisely what you threw to your God. Perhaps he died from your diet?

191. Your souls lack the frankincense of shame: but even a good peach has its fuzz.!"°

192. When storm clouds gather, you should lay your resolutions to rest.

193. We should question gods only in cases where gods alone can answer.

186 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

194. Before destiny strikes us, we should lead it around like a child and – not spare the rod: yet once we meet it, then we should seek to love it.

195. It seemed godless to our ancestors and insatiably greedy that we should grub around for treasure in the bowels of the earth.!"!

197. The greatest sacrilege is the sacrilege against humans after there are no more gods: and of devaluing what is human in favor of the entrails of unknowable things.!"

198. Become necessary! Become lucid! Become beautiful! Become well!!74

Some love a bird in flight and others see only dawns and oceans.

200. to become active on behalf of great matters and otherwise to be slow and – – –

201. Do I love the past? I destroyed it in order to live. Do I love my contemporaries? I look away from them in order to be able to live.

202. Incapable of believing in something for long!: knowledge!' loses its value the moment it is acquired. Therefore create!

Creating above and beyond ourselves! This is the drive of pro-creation, this is the drive of deeds and of works. – Just as all

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 187

willing presupposes a purpose, so do human beings presuppose beings who (are) not there, but who supply the purpose of their existence. This is the freedom of all willing! In purpose lies love, reverence, seeing completely, longing.

Praise of the forest. Blessed be this tree where I thought of you Becoming accustomed to gratitude.

you should not kill before the animal is not dozing.!"

Sentenced to be executioners, you scholars!

204. I was afraid when I was among humans: something demanded that I join them and nothing gave me rest. Then I went into solitude and created superhumans. And as I created them, I arranged for them the great veil of becoming and let the noon shine all around them.

For the sake of this moment, I endure the recurrence.

206. What is it that imparted sense, worth, meaning to things? The creative heart that desired and created out of desire. It created pleasure and pain. It wanted to satiate itself even with pain. We must take upon ourselves, and affirm, all suffering that has ever been felt by humans and animals, and we must have a goal whereby suffering preserves reason.

207. There is no redemption for those who suffer on account of their existence except that of no longer suffering on account of their existence. How do they attain this? Through sudden death or through enduring love.'

188 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

208. Every action continues to create us, it weaves our cloak of many colors. Every action is free, but a cloak is necessary. Our experience – this is our cloak.

209. Desire is happiness: satiation as happiness is merely the last moment of desire. To be entirely a wish is happiness and to be a new wish again and again.!"?

210. I converse with you, my wisdom, just the two of us: / will, I desire, I love – and this is why I praise life. If I didn't create, but I only knew, I would hate life.

211. Not doing, letting go, not creating, not destroying – this is my evil. The one who knows also as the one who does not desire.

212. Emptiness, oneness, motionlessness, fullness, satisfaction, not-willing – this would be my evil: in short: sleep without dreams.!®°

Love for the corporeal and for the world is the consequence of knowing as willing. As creating, all knowing is not-knowing. Seeing through things would be death, disgust, evil. There is no other form of knowing than that of first creation. To be a subject – 181

214. The greatest danger is faith in knowing and faith in being known,?' i.e., faith that creating has ended. This is the great fatigue. "It is nothing."!®

215. All knowing, as creating, never ends. To each person there would have to correspond an explanation of the world that would belong to that person completely: to that person as a first movement. We never want to admit this to ourselves and we look to the herd.

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 189

216. Injustice has not been done until we do something to help someone: justice and injustice do not have to do with helping and hurting, but rather with advantage and harm.!84

217. You will be called destroyers of morality: but you are merely the inventors of yourselves.

218. These are my enemies: they want to overthrow things and not to develop themselves. They say: "all of this is worthless" – and do not want to create any value themselves.

«C »

219. I am "the awakened one": and you – no sooner are you born than you have already begun to die.!®°

220. What can all people do? – Praise and blame. This is the virtue of humans, this is the madness of humans.!86

221. Injustice is always being committed – says justice –
and not only when you hurt yourselves but also when you help, love,
and serve each other. Nothing is remedied by praise and love,
they are harmful because they do not remedy anything.'®?
222. What do you know of the love that a lunatic has for reason, like the love someone burning with fever has for ice!!
®8

223. In science, in knowing, drives have become holy: “the thirst for pleasures, the thirst for becoming, the thirst
for power.” The humans who know have far surpassed themselves in holiness.!®

224. I was in school: I lived for knowledge. There my soul purified itself, all desires became holy. It is the preschool: the solitude of the one who knows. You should deal with humans the way you deal with objects. your love should be above all individual objects and individual humans.

190 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

225. The will to suffer: once in a while you must live in the world, you who create. You must a/most perish – and afterwards bless your labyrinth and your stray paths. Otherwise you cannot create, but only die off. You must have your triumphs and your downfalls. You must have your evils and once in a while take them up again. You eternally returning ones, you yourselves must make of yourselves a return.

226. Creating is redemption from suffering. But suffering is necessary for those who create. Suffering is self-transformation,

in every birth there is a death. We must be not only the children,

but also the ones who give birth: as those who create.!°

227. We must want to pass away in order to be able to emerge again – from one day to the next. Metamorphosis through a hundred souls – let this be your life, your destiny:

And then finally: to want this entire sequence once again!

228. Look at him to see if he has a clear eye and a mouth free

of contempt. Look at him to see if he walks like a dancer.!!?

229. Often you have to abandon everything, your woman, your land, your usefulness: you must tell the sun in your life to stand still.!!??

230. Your life of pleasures is a kind of self-mortification: and both are illnesses and degradations.'

231. We should serve those whose spirit, self-overcoming, and invention of new projects will be expanded through your service: – in this way, as a servant, you will have been most useful to yourself.

232. Don't be angry at those who think in the way that perishing people tend to think: they are grasping at their straws

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 IQI

of life and know little of life other than grasping and that it makes little sense to do so: perishing people aren't worth much

– this is the kernel of their "wisdom"!4

233. You have not yet decided to live, but rather you are afraid and tremble like children at the water they are supposed to dive into. And meanwhile your time slips away, and you search for teachers who tell you: "be afraid and tremble at the ocean called life" – and you call this teaching good and die early.

234. The value of life lies in value judgments: value judgments are something created, not something taken, not something learned, not something experienced. What has been created must be destroyed to make room for the newly created: a value judgment's ability to live includes its capacity to be destroyed.

The creator must always be a destroyer. Yet valuation itself cannot destroy itself: for this is life."

234. "Life is suffering?" – If you are right: well then, it is your life that is suffering! – so make sure that you stop; make sure that life, which is nothing but suffering, stops. Your morality is: "thou shalt kill thyself?" "thou shalt steal away."!°

235. And even those who turned their backs on life and found joy and peace in the process – – – they found it by creating an image of such a life, as ones who create! – – – as ones who create, you brought your suffering to an end! And in this way loved your life!

236. You imagine that you are free from the maxims of those who know: but you are incapable of doing anything without grasping for our valuations, you helpless people! Much less ever creating! This delusion of being free is part of the happiness of deprivation! A consolation for prisoners! A good deed on behalf of those born blind!

192 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

237. Animals don't know anything about themselves, they don't even know anything about the world.!??

238. I am too full:!"® in this way I forget myself, and all things are in me, and there is nothing more than all things. Where am I headed?

239. The tightly interwoven sensations that always return ("holding a time together in a relative sense") are regarded by us as raw materials and realities: in the first instance, our bodies.

But "all the properties of these things consist of our sensations and representations."!??

241. What is to come is just as much a condition of what is as of what has been. "What should be and what must be is the basis for what is."?°

242. Am I supposed to have created the whole universe? Was it the movement of my I that brought this about, just as it brought about the movement of a body? Am I merely a droplet of this force?

243. I comprehend only a being that is simultaneously one and many, that changes and stays the same, that knows, feels, wills

– this being is my primordial fact.

244. Once when I wanted to find pleasure in truth, | invented lying and illusion – proximity and distance, what is past

 and what is to come, that which is perspectival. Then I projected obscurity and deception into myself and made myself into something that deceived myself.?°!
 5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 193
 not be loved. Humans are too imperfect a thing: love for humans
 would kill me.?°
 246. I did not repudiate these humans that I loved: but rather the very thing that made me love them, that's what I repudiated.?03
 247. Look into the world as if time were missing: and all that is crooked will become straight for you.?°* yourself and to say to yourself: you should not be seeing blue!?!%
 249. Some want to throw dice and others want to count and calculate, and those over there want to see dancing: they call it science and it makes them sweat. But they are children who want to have their game – and truly, it is a kind of beautiful
 childishness, and some laughter would not hurt the game."
 250. All signs of the superhuman appear as illness or madness
 in humans.?°"
 251. We must already be an ocean in order to absorb a filthy stream without getting filthy.?°8 252. When I considered purpose, I also considered chance and folly.?°° 253. You are too crude for me: it is impossible for minor experiences to be your downfall.?!° 254. Your eye doesn't go blind at the point where it can no longer recognize things, but just at the point where your honesty ceases, that's where your eye sees nothing more."!!
 194 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 255. What apes are to us, a laughing stock or a painful embarrassment: so shall humans be to superhumans.?!?
 256. How would someone have to speak to you so that you would understand! You must first get sick before you have ears to hear.?!13

257. As soon as the will takes the stage, feeling experiences a sense of liberation. For feeling suffers – and as soon as the will takes the stage, feeling is suspended and does not suffer.

This is called freedom of the will.?!*

258. How heavy the world became for me then – like a creature that has lived in the sea and was now forced to crawl up on land: now how is it supposed to drag its own body along!?
>

259. You should not live in places where you are forced to have puny feelings. There is no worse way to waste your life than in puny settings.

260. If you are too soft and squeamish to kill flies and mosquitoes, then go into solitude and fresh air where there are no flies and mosquitoes: and be solitude and fresh air yourselves!?!”
Your poor body – ignorance of the laws of nature.

261. Illness is a clumsy experiment at achieving good health:

our minds must come to the aid of nature.?!8
we are all stupid. Even stupidity goes by a nicer name: it calls itself necessity. Let us definitely come to the aid of necessity!?!?

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 195

263. What is it about the fact that as many people as possible live as long as possible? Is their happiness a justification of all existence? And not actually a despicable thing??”° become the devil’s advocate, you must also be God’s advocate with the devil.??!

265. Speech to the cliff I love that you do not speak. Your silence is dignified. (Perceiving everything in nature morally:

all value lies in that)???
Speech to a king.

266. The world stands there, finished – a golden bowl of goodness. But the creative spirit also still wants to create what is finished: so it invented time – and now the world spun apart and spins in great rings back into itself again, like the emergence of good through evil, like a mother giving birth to purposes out of chance.???

267. There are enough of these people who do not know anything better on earth than to lie with a woman. What do they know of happiness!??*

Invisible ties bind most tightly.

268. Whenever I honor a feeling, the feeling becomes infused with honor.

269. What use is your virtue if you have yet to experience the moment when you come to deeply despise what is human within you out of love for superhumans? And despise your virtue along with it?

196 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

270. In the history of humankind, the moments of great contempt?" are the events: as the source of the great desire for superhumans. Don't let yourselves be fooled – hasn't there always been a desire to journey into the beyond or into nothingness or to become one with God? All these colorful phrases served to express how tired humans were of themselves – not of their suffering, but rather of their usual ways of feeling.

271. To await the hour of the great contempt: this is the commendation. The other hours exist merely for the sake of cultivating the Zast humans.

272. Thoughts are merely signs, as words are merely signs for thoughts.

273. Atone time the I was hidden in the herd: now the herd is still hidden in the I.??°

5 [2]?27

I teach you two things; you should overcome humans, and you should know when you have overcome them: I teach you war and victory. (Chap(ter))

5 B)"

It is cool, the meadow lies in shadow, the sun has departed.
Is it not absurd to live?

Wouldn't we have to have more reason in order to make something reasonable out of life?

My brothers, forgive the soul of Zarathustra for the fact that it is evening.

star

Am I really rejecting your virtues? I am rejecting the virtuous among you.

5 NOVEMBER I – FEBRUARY 1883 197

5 [5]?

I am explaining even your virtues by what is to come.

5 [6]

As soon as feeling grows and swells within the herd, feeling comes closer to the herd.

First "for all" became sacred, then "for someone else" finally

"for my God." s [712

I love souls that squander: they do not give back and do not even want thanks – because they keep giving gifts.

5 [8]

I teach you about the superhumans: where is my brother who teaches them??? the great contempt?

5 [9]

They overturn icons??? and say: there is nothing exalted and worthy of worship – because they themselves can create neither icon nor God.

Have mercy on them! Just listen to the contempt of their rage against icons – the great contempt for themselves!

5 [10]?35 (chap(ter)) "the brotherhood of justifiers."

s ms

It is terrible to die of thirst in the middle of the ocean:
must

you then salt your wisdom so much that it doesn't taste like pure water?

5 [2]?

Humankind is walking around pregnant, how quaint its labor pains.

198 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

5 3"

Our contempt for humans drove us beyond the stars and allowed us to search around for a god.

5 1a)?"

The scholar should be a penitent of the mind

5 [15]?

They said "let us make ourselves dead to the world," they sought their salvation beyond the stars, they did not find news?! of the superhumans.

5 [16]?*?

Let your life be an experiment with a hundred permutations:
let your failures and successes be proof: and take care that your experiments and what you have proven become known.

5 17)*

I love those who justify the people of the future and redeem the people of the past: even as they perish because of the people

of the present.

I love those who make virtue into their duty and their doom.

I love those who do not spare a drop of spirit and who are entirely the spirit of their virtue:

I love those who squander their souls, who do not want thanks and do not give back because they are always giving gifts.⁷⁴⁴

I love those who take upon themselves the injustice suffered by those who cannot bear it?*

I love those who live to know and who want to know so that the superhumans may live.

I love those who do not want to become dead to the world and who do not seek their salvation beyond the stars: those who have understood the news of the superhumans.

I love those whose souls are deep even when wounded and who can perish as a result of one minor experience.⁷⁴⁵

5 NOVEMBER 1882– FEBRUARY 1883 199

I love those who are so full that they forget themselves,
and

all things are in them: but they will perish.

I love those whose minds are free just as their hearts are free: and let their heads be merely the entrails of their hearts.

I love those who are so compassionate that they make hard-heartedness into their virtue and their god."

I love those who strew golden words before their deeds and still always deliver more than they promise.

I love those who are ashamed when the dice always fall their way and who ask themselves: am I then a cheater?

I love those who forgive their opponents not only their failures but also their victories."

I love those who chastise their god because they love their god.

I love those who do not expect rewards from their virtue, but rather punishment and downfall.

I love those who see the suffering god hidden in their neighbors and who are ashamed of the animal that was visible in their neighbors.?"

5 [18]?

You should not want to have too many virtues. One virtue is already a lot of virtue: and we must be rich enough even for just a single virtue. You should perish so that it may live.

5 [19]?!

I entreat you, my brothers, remain true to the earth and don't believe those who speak to you of hopes beyond this earth: they are poisoners and despisers of life: whether they know it or not, they are the ones who are dying off and have poisoned themselves.

At one time, sacrilege against God was the greatest sacrilege: but God died, and then even the people committing sacrilege died with him. Sacrilege against the earth is now the most terrible thing, and reverence for the entrails of unexplorable things more than for the meaning of the earth.

200 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

5 [20]?

Let your life be an experiment with a hundred permutations: let your successes and failures be proof; and take care that your experiments and what you have proven become known.

5 [21]25%

There are libertines of the mind: there are penitents of the mind. 5 [22]255

The eye doesn't go blind at the point where it can no longer distinguish things, but rather at the point where your honesty ceases, that is where the eye sees nothing more.

5 [23]°

Some want to throw dice and others want to count and calculate, and those over there want to see dancing: they call it

science and it makes them sweat

But they are children who want to have their game – and truly, it is beautiful infantile nonsense, and a bit of laughter would make the faces of the players more lovable.

5 [24]

When you consider purpose, you must also consider chance and folly. 5 [25°

Objections, mistrust, adultery are signs of a healthy spirit.

Everything unconditional reveals?' a sick person.

5 [26]2°

Once, when I wanted to find pleasure in truth, that's when I invented lying and illusion, proximity and distance, what is past and what is to come; then I internalized deceit and twilight.

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 201

5 27)?

I was in the desert, I lived merely as one who knows. The soul of one who knows purified itself, and all desires and the thirst for power became sacred to that person. As one who knows I ascended far above and beyond myself in sanctity and virtue.

5 [28]?%2

Human existence is uncanny and still without meaning: a clown? can bring about its doom.

For what purpose does this person live? For what purpose does that person die? No one can know, because there is no for-what-purpose in these matters.

Formerly, when death approached, people used to lift up a hand and say, "a gift from above."

This giver did not exist at all, a roof tile was the gift: in death, ignorance was as far as reason went.

I want to teach humans the meaning of their existence: which is the superhumans.

5 [29]?°®

Let yourself be schooled by love for things and justice for things. 5 [30]?%

You shroud your souls: nakedness would be scandalous for your souls. Oh when will you learn why gods are naked! They have nothing to be ashamed of. They are more powerful naked!

The body is something evil, beauty is the work of the devil;

emaciated, ghastly, starving, black, dirty, that's how the body should look Sacrilege against the body is for me a sacrilege against the earth and against the meaning of the earth. Pity those unhappy
people for whom the body seems evil and beauty diabolical!
202 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
5 [31]
Your body and your embodied self stand behind your thoughts and feelings: the terra incognita.?°° What is the purpose of you having these thoughts and these feelings? Your embodied self wants to do something with them.
5 [132]?
The asceticism of the mind (addressed to the most intellectual)
the friend (the ideal company) solitude
the body philosophizes the one who creates danger in the sermon on suffering Against the devaluation of life in knowledge, the drives are justified the goal of humankind has been missing up until now justification of the entire past the one who communicates as fragment the one who loves as fragment the one who knows as fragment not to value contemporary culture too highly!
for once, the passions as good health
chastity teaching peace and inner effort. Against "effort."
the criminal.
retribution
moral outrage and forgiveness.
the one who praises women means of self-overcoming the scientific ones
death
the recurrence herd and | slowly accumulating fame
critique of morality and its meaning
5 NOVEMBER 1882 -- FEBRUARY 1883 203

judgment in pleasure contradiction in your ideals
we must also want our counterpart, the Pharisee.
the hidden human the last human speech to a king.
superhumans
invention of festivals penitents of the mind – as purifiers of their affects great decision between death and life?°® actors and those who create.
the new art form as 1000 ways to live (independence first! a thought that compels those who follow it freely) life an experiment by those who know to ennoble what is common, nearest, earthly! (cuisine diet) solitude and life – sleep and waking (life as will to suffer (– to create –) the supreme knowledge: the new evaluator.
slowly accumulating fame
critique of morality and its meaning: we want to lift ourselves above praise and blame!
madness as prefiguring.
retribution – you want compensation?
without a homeland.
to turn humility into pride.
new wars.

whether there have already been superhumans

5 [33]

It is not enough to make amends for something: we must also remake ourselves, be good to ourselves again, e.g., by means of some small superfluous mischief or good deed.
Before we can forgive, we must first experience being wronged.

And with more profound individuals all experiences last a long time.?"

204 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

It is easier to forgive our enemies than our friends.
I should forgive? But I don't blame you for the same reasons you blame yourself: how could I then forgive?
Not that you lied to me, but rather that I no longer believed
you, this is what has shaken me.

We take the bitterness that we feel toward people and use it to justify our moral outrage – and admire ourselves in the process; and we justify forgiveness through the fading of our

hatred – and admire ourselves once again.?”!

He wronged me, this is bad. But that he now wants to go so far as to beg my pardon, this is worse, this drives me crazy.?’?

Beware of insulting a hermit! He never forgives! A hermit is like a deep well – it is easy to toss a stone into it. But how do you propose to retrieve it once it has reached the bottom??”?

5 [34]

All goals have been destroyed: value judgments are turning against themselves, those who follow their heart are called good but also those who are merely alert to their duty unassuming, forgiving people are called good, but also brave unbending austere people.

those who make no demands on themselves are called good, but also heroes of self-overcoming unconditional friends of truth are called good, but also pious people, the glorifiers of things

those who obey themselves are called good, but also pious people noble, genteel people are called good, but also those who do not despise and condescend good-natured people who avoid battle are called good, but also those who lust for battle and victory those who always want to be first are called good, but also those who never want to take advantage of anyone.

5 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 205

5 Bs]?”

I do not understand why we find it necessary to slander others. If we want to hurt people, we only need to say something true about them.

We always know too much about everyone.

We praise only what appeals to our taste i.e., we praise only our own taste.

the most inspired passion to make a virtue out of antipathy for someone

In the flam(es) of jea(lousy) we turn the poisonous stinger against ourselves, like a scorpion – yet without (its) success

When I notice that people are lying to me, I don't complain that they are lying to me, but rather that they are lying at all.

[6 = M III 3b. Winter 1882-1883]

6 [a] Asceticism: to cultivate only reason to admit to oneself the small joys that knowledge brings – to keep all others away.

cruelty in admitting to ourselves the dirty emergence of all supreme things attempt to look away from human beings and to fix them as points in becoming – not to model everything on them.
on behalf of little certain hard truths – military discipline simplicity mocking the blissful effect of “truths,” likewise mocking the beautiful form. Religion morality and art concerning the surface of things metaphysics as related to the belief in spirits and ghosts: also to poor interpretation the perspective of happiness as harmful to science where does the value of metaphysics come from?
From errors and passions.

Not to allow ourselves to become dependent upon the most uncertain things to admit to ourselves the weakness of our reasoning: dreams.

6 WINTER 1882-1883 207

a strong feeling proves nothing about the truth of what is believed.

Attempt to look at things in such a way that substance and freedom of the will are errors: even the I regarded as having become. The world as error.

Mistrust of the metaphysical world because of the difficulty of the problems.

All tranquility ceases with the belief in eternal basic truths, we no longer care about anything beyond our future because by then other things will become necessary.

Era of comparison: a choice from among the various ethics. Downfall of lowly ethics.

Cult of error: it made humans so sensitive, deep, inventive. The world as error is so rich in meaning and full of wonder.

we are, from beginning to end, illogical and unjust beings – there is no life without this.
all initial approaches to the value of life false.
Final purposelessness. Squandering.

universally successful renunciation: always to know better, the only consolation to float above evaluations.

Result: I don't need to believe in anything

Things are unknowable.

I don't need to suffer on account of my injustice.

despair purged through skepticism

I acquired the right to create the right to call things good the right not to make connections to the past finally: within all the activity of the drives I discovered living morality, driving force. I had only imagined that I was beyond good and evil.

208 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Freethinking was itself a moral act

1) as honesty 2) as bravery 3) as justice 4) as love

I held myself apart as one who posits values

I did nothing other than criticize the practice of morality up until now. The establishment of moral judgments is itself a piece of this practice.

the determination of purposes as a condition of existence, as a condition for one? existence merging into another.

herd – individual.

6 [2]4

1. Asceticism – attempt to live without morality.

2. Result: we ourselves have practiced morality, continued to practice it – the life within us required it of us.

Everything that 3. The one who creates and the happens does not one who posits values. Herd correspond to the and individual.

judgment of value. 4. Attempt at a standpoint beyond good and evil.

6 [3]

Asceticism: attempt to liberate ourselves from morality

Change, indeed, opposition of moral judgments (no eternal norm)

there have never ever been any moral actions: if they are characterized as free and as unegoistic.

what we take to be evil (injustice) is a condition for existing.

6 WINTER 1882-1883 209

in critiquing our best actions, we find it absolutely necessary to use elements that belong to evil.

all moral systems have been refuted: and in any case their value is dependent upon the truth of their last assertions: these assertions are uncertain.

A multitude of opposing moral systems are contained in our valuations themselves.

(our judgments underlying the feelings are contradictory.)

In the end there is no longer any goal: morality is no longer the way to heaven: no longer even the way to heaven on earth (agony of pangs of conscience) Morality no longer stands or falls with states and peoples.

Terrifying look back at the agony of humankind. They were close to renouncing? life because of their moral dissatisfaction.

6 [4]

1) Ascetic attempt to liberate ourselves from morality: why?

initially, as practical consequence: a soldier's poverty, nearness of death. Freethinker.

2) But now we recognize freethinking itself as morality. In what way.

All feelings are morally tinged. What we did was a therapy, a means to /ife. Morality appeared as a condition of existence.

3) the new freer view of morality as a condition of existence in life and progress in life.

Herd – evolution of the I. No retribution etc.

4) Attempt at a beyond good and evil.

[7 = M III 4b. Spring-Summer 1883]

7 W

Concerning the introduction.

Absolute honesty – missing up to now in moralists. Every character weakness will announce itself in the course of the investigation.

Thereafter historical meaning.

Bravely resisting our own inclination to make value judgments.

Ancient goal: the breeding of superior humans, using the masses as a means of doing so.

Concerning the Plan.

Every objective obligation is lacking. Universal agreement a principle hostile to life.

There are commands from individuals: an unconscious form of slavery honesty requires that whatever we do for the sake of utility is also designated as such.

Motives for honesty etc. are found in the impulses of the powerful: the emancipation from morality also spreads within the same sphere.

To turn irresponsibility into something positive: we want to make our image of human beings prevail. Because we can! – is the point! Anyone who feels oppressed belongs in the inferior order. There must be “slaves.”

7 SPRING –SUMMER 1883 211

Up to now we overlooked the creative aspect of individuality: we noticed only criminals etc. we overlooked arch-criminals Homer Michelangelo.

Greatest possible diversity of individuals! Let the struggle begin!

We want to move toward an ethics: and since we do not believe that we can find our way to it from egoism, we flee toward authority, toward tradition.

ethical taste is a thing without basis – but it emerged at one time as compulsion, as a result of other drives which demanded a particular judgment and valuation.

Where we no longer know how to trace our feelings back to their origins due to the complexity of their emergence, we posit them as something different: this is how aesthetic ethical moral metaphysical drives are to be understood.

We perceive a name and think that it corresponds to something new.

NB. The moralistic) way of thinking accords with our behavior but does not guide it!

When there is no drive to obey, then a “thou shalt” has no meaning.

Given the way we are – we then become resistant to a “thou shalt.” Our morality has to mean “I will this.”

7 l]

In fact, the egoism of the individual reaches as far as it can and as far as its strength permits –: it is nonsense to fear the consequences of the egoist(ic) principle?” No one is constrained by principles!

7B1

It would be very superficial to write without asking how long everything that is being written today will endure!

212 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 1]

The confidence with which we act is completely unrelated to the goodness of our motives for acting in this or that way!

765

from Socrates onward, virtue without shame (in competition) and, as a subject of cleverness, virtue has no need of shame! A kind of self-abasement of virtue –

7 [6]

Critique of “good people,” indeed of the best people! Skepticism very justified!

My entire approach doesn’t involve morality– what was formerly consciousness of sin, I also direct these things against the intellect, virtue, happiness, human strength.

On the basis of essentially extramoral considerations, I came to consider morality from a distance.

To discern the conditions under which future humans will live – because such discernment and anticipation have the force of a motive: the future, as something that we will, acts upon our now.

The immorality of our age at its best (e.g., the lack of reverence in regard to nature)

7 [7]

Speeches to My Friends.

I have always made an effort to prove to myself the innocence of becoming:* and probably I wanted to attain in this way the feeling of complete “irresponsibility” – to make myself independent of praise and blame, of all todays and traditions: in order to pursue goals that concern the future of humankind.

The first solution for me was the aesthetic justification of existence.

However: “justifying” should not itself be necessary!

Morality belongs to the realm of appearance.

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 213

The second solution for me was the objective lack of value of all concepts of guilt and the insight into the subjective, necessarily unjust and illogical nature of all life.

The third solution for me was the denial of all purposes and the insight into the unknowability of causalities.

redemption through illusion: the principium individu-ationis,' along with all morality, a redemptive vision for the individual.

Morality a means of remaining within individuation and of not being sucked back into primordial suffering.

art as the "genuinely metaphysical activity of human beings."

6

that "at the foundation of things, in spite of all the changing appearances, life is indestructibly powerful and pleasur-able" p. 54.' as tragedy's consolation.

Art saves him (from denying the will): and through art life saves him for itself.

A protest against pessimism: from the standpoint of the Greeks. The Greek, "deeply sensitive and singularly capable of the most tender and the most severe suffering"

Music as by far the most vital art form.

The task of music in an age analyzed to death, an age that is tired of thinking:

p. 82 Science, led ever again to its limits, must be transformed into art – that which leads it is the illusion that it could correct existence.®

Socrates relieved of his fear of death through knowledge and reasons.

the determination of science, to make existence appear intelligible and thereby justified: and when the reasons prove insufficient, myth too must be made to serve – it is fundamentally intended for this!

Were that sum of force not applied toward knowledge, but rather toward the practical aims of a people and of human beings, the desire for life would be so weakened that an ethic

214 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

arising out of compassion could emerge (The Indic peoples too weak and passive even in their compassion) tragic knowledge needs art "which stares into the inscrutable"?

Art represented as dependent upon the development of knowledge: it bursts forth wherever knowledge devours itself.

We should seek pleasure not in appearances, but behind them.

p- 92 Quintessence.

p. 102. the self-destruction of knowledge and the insight into its ultimate limits was what excited me about Kant and Schopenhauer. From this dissatisfaction I came to believe in art."

I thought that a new age had arrived for art. I experienced the outcome of philosophy as a tragic event: how to endure it!

W (agner) seemed to me a means of alienating the G(ermans) from Christianity his old and tired work, Parsifal, doesn't refute this either, even less his blindly inflamed admirers with their skinned knees and brains.

Belief in the rebirth of the Greek world p. 117.)

"another being and a higher pleasure, for which the battling hero is prepared not through his victories, but through his downfall" p. 120."

"Only a horizon rearranged by myth culminates in an entire cultural movement toward unity" p. 132.4

p. 136 antichristian – in this sense,"

" "

p. 142 " German hope

10

7 [8]

The entire 18th century held Gothic architecture in the deepest contempt Lecky I 199.7

This century had its own taste. The Milan Cathedral as object of derision.

Our century must have recovered many of those feelings from which those churches emerged –

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 215

The misidentification of Homer cf. in — — — Winckelmann's critical evaluation of Laocoén.'®

7 [9]

Compassion. Initially reproduction of another's pain. Now a reaction to it must follow either a powerful purging from the senses, fleeing from it (as at the sight of a disgusting wound or positive pushing aside and elimination of what hurts us, in other words, an intervention in the sphere of the sufferers, interpreted by them as help, etc.
We are outraged by each act of suffering, when it is senseless,
"undeserved" (our custom of blaming and punishing functions here as a wounded drive: the image of the sufferer" is an assault on the foundations of this drive) We react to this outrage with
"help" etc.

Thereafter: — we shiver, we ourselves feel the danger, insecurity sudden misfortune "it's unbelievable!" — our sense of harmony and logic is outraged.
where we feel that we can help, our feeling of power awakens, hence the zeal for duty, the excitement, the heroism while rescuing victims; the pleasure at the opportunity to be brave etc.
Love, tenderness are not necessary in such situations!

7 [20]

Hartmann" p. 776. the sovereignty of the individual, according
to him, merges with the egoistic attention to prudence that puts limits on choice! This is typical!

7 (i

Our neighbors as our progeny having given them the traits to which our drives react. The whole image, a progeny that is useful to us: that is beneficial to us, harmful etc. is swept away — for the purpose of assimilation or flight.

216 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

What then is "loving thy neighbor"?

Our neighbors are in themselves unknowable, except by inference in relation to us, and this according to the subtlety or crudity of our observations: our overhastiness in deciding

(it's a matter of fear or longing) etc.

We battle what seems harmful to us in our enemies: whatever hinders our growth, our survival, what poisons our air: hence we battle our drives of mistrust, of tension – i.e., one kind of drive pushes aside another.

7 [12]

The Jews corrupted by the Egyptian captivity.

7 [3]

Architecture: to bring what is distant nearer (St. Peter's Basilica) another principle: the greatest possible striving for the distant.

7 [14]

We hate those people most who seduce us back into feelings that we have conquered with the greatest effort: those who betray us to our enemies after our triumph: this is how it is for those like us who are seduced into revenge even after we have forgiven someone.

7[t]

our conscience adapts (itself) to the environment in which we live; inasmuch as drives like fear, skepticism, reticence, stealth etc. are generated by the feeling that our valuations are not in agreement: these drives gradually immediately discharge themselves at the time of our impulses and transform our conscience into an evil conscience.”!

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 217

7 [16]

Wagner received many favors from his contemporaries: but he was of the opinion that fundamental injustice toward benefactors was part of a “grand style”: he was always living as an actor and under delusions of cultural sophistication, as actors typically do. I myself have been perhaps his most generous benefactor. It is possible that in this case the image will outlive the man on which it is modeled: this has to do with the fact that there is still plenty of room in my image for a host of real Wagners: and above all for those much more richly gifted and more single-minded in purpose.

7 [17]

Those who live among Germans should count themselves lucky if they find a single individual who keeps a distance from that idealistic self-delusion and color-blindness that the Germans adore and revere almost as virtue itself. (The French with their Montaigne La Rochefoucauld Pascal Chamfort Stendhal are a much purer intellectual nation) This was my joy when I got to know Rée:"" he spoke of morality only to the extent that he knew it and without conjuring up something based on his moral drives. To be sure: he didn't know much about it and even this was based only on hearsay: and in the end he thought that morality itself was hearsay.

7 8]

Since Kant, all talk of art, beauty, knowledge, wisdom has been mangled and muddled by the concept of "disinterest." What strikes me as beautiful (from the viewpoint of history): that which becomes visible about the most-admired people of an era, as an expression of what most deserves admiration.

7 9]

It was Helvétius's accomplishment, a matter of fortitude, to take pleasure (interest?) seriously (just as Socrates did with utility):

218 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

just like Epicurus (as opposed to taking pleasure in the paradoxical, like Mandeville): and to say plaisir, as Stendhal wished, was perhaps already too damaging to Helvétius (given the moral taste out of which he himself grew)

7 [20]

Just as optics limps along behind sight, so, too, moral theory?

behind morality.

Individual observations are by far the most valuable thing. A mor(al) theory of fundamental error is most often the origin of great philosophical systems: something must be proved which agrees with the praxis of the philosopher (e.g. Spinoza) (Schopenhauer the exception – noblesse*® therein)
7 (aa)

My demand: to produce beings who stand sublimely above the entire species "human being": and who sacrifice themselves and "their neighbors" for this goal.

Morality up to now has had its boundaries dictated by the species: all moralities up to now were useful for establishing first and foremost the unconditional stability of the species:

when this has been achieved, the goal can be set higher.

The one movement is unconditional: the leveling of humankind, giant ant hills etc. (Dühring to be characterized as extraordinarily impoverished and typically narrow, despite his lofty words)

The other movement: my movement: is conversely the intensification of all oppositions and divisions, elimination of equality, the creation of the superpowerful.?7

The former generates last humans. My movement, superhumans. The goal is not at all to conceive of the latter as the masters of the former: but rather: the two species should exist alongside one another – as segregated as possible; the one, like the Epicurean gods, having no concern for the other.

7 SPRING--SUMMER 1883 219

Principles: there have never been any moral actions. And every morality is impossible: just like every moral action. But the history of what has been accepted up to now as moral action: and the true meaning of the acceptance. And the history of the emergence of this acceptance.

They all proceed from the belief that morality itself is there, at least as a conscious measure (as with Kant), that we know what good and evil are.

The essential unknowability.

Something is necessarily achieved: but already knowledge of it is impossible, therefore even foreknowledge of it!

The most important standpoint: to attain the innocence of becoming, in that purpose is excluded. Necessity, causality

 – all gone! And always to brand as mendacity any mention of “purpose” wherever a necessary result appears! History can never prove “purpose”: for, one thing is clear, that what peoples
 and individuals have wanted has always been essentially different from what has been achieved – in short, that everything that has been achieved is absolutely incongruent with what has been wanted (e.g., chewing as “intention” and “action”) History of “intentions” is something other than history of “facts”: – in morality. It is the crudest form of prejudice to see nothing more than what is congruent with its intended purpose. This attention to purpose is a sign of a low level of intellect – everything essential, the action itself and the result are overlooked!
 #b]?
 While wandering through the many subtler and cruder moralities, I found certain traits in a consistent pattern, always recurring with each other and connected to each other: so that finally two basic types were revealed to me: there is master-morality and slave-morality. I would add that, in times of higher culture, attempts at mediating between both moralities come to light, even more frequently their intermingling, indeed
 occasionally a bitter coexistence – even in the same person, within a single soul.

220 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

First question: where did moral value judgments emerge? In general, among aristocrats, among a ruling kind that becomes conscious of how it differs from the ruled.
 In general, making moral value judgments means that a superior kind of human being becomes conscious of its superi-
 ority to a lower kind.
 The need to form a superior kind of human being initially existed in relation to the subjugated, then in relation to virtue.

In the first case, the exceptional, unique, noble, distinguishing qualities are emphasized, in the second case, the difficulty in attaining and maintaining a noble type, in short, in working toward virtue.

Second question. What follows in general from the fact that the rulers are the ones who determine the concept "good"? There are in fact a number of traits that return in drastically differing moralities: the reason for this lies in the fact that the traits of the powerful are contained in these moralities.

An immoral person is in general a contemptible person (ot an "evil" person).

This extends as far as the ultimate consequence: those who, like me, devalue moral value judgments by comparing them to each other, want to distinguish themselves as superior human beings from those who can bear to live according to conventional value judgments.

The sublime loftier states are the ones that are called "good":??

Contempt for those who are cowardly, anxious

Contempt for those who think of strict utility, for petty people

Contempt for the mistrustful, who want to have oaths

Contempt for the poor, for beggars, self-denigrators, slave- and dog-like people, who let themselves be mistreated.

By contrast, all honor to feelings of fullness and of overflowing: rich enough to help the unfortunate,

7 SPRING --SUMMER 1883 221

All honor to those who have control over themselves, who understand when to speak and when to be silent, who understand when to command and when to obey

All honor to wisdom that knows how to keep long-term utility in mind and that can stand by its long-term decisions

All honor to those who don't want to be liked, because they like themselves: the proud.

Reverence for elders

for ancestors

reverence for women? is modern:?! respect for the e/derly is somewhat lacking.

þúveoða "defense" as a part of revenge.??

capacity for long-term gratitude and revenge.

Restitution as a delusion of justice. — anyone indifferent to a grave personal offense is contemptible . . . but: "the best man is the one who can bear the most insults" Menander.?? but not inclined to bear a grudge! — complete distinction between judging actions directed at equals and actions directed at beings of lesser rank.
 the friend
 The enemy is not regarded as contemptible: hence evil actions have a different value than the enemy's actions.
 Inasmuch as enmity is necessary, the point of it must be kept in mind, thus in a certain sense cultivated.
 (like deception among the Spartans)
 'hardness of feeling, cruelty, etc.
 Enemies are needed as lightning rods for affects like jealousy, contentiousness — in order to be a good friend.
 the powerful ones judge: anyone who harms me is harmful by nature. They are the supreme determiners of value.
 What would the commonalities in morality have to look like when the weak, the subjugated and the oppressed moralize? When those who are victimized, oppressed, suffering, unfree, unsure of themselves, exhausted, moralize: what will be the commonalities in their moral distinctions? Probably a suspicion will be expressed; perhaps a condemnation of humans along with their situation.
 222 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 A denigrating view of the virtues of the more powerful: subtle skepticism and mistrust of everything "good" will be honored there and also a decrease in the happiness of the powerful and a diminishment of life.
 Foregrounding of the qualities by means of which those who suffer can make their lives easier: renown of compassion, but for different reasons than those given when the powerful celebrate it (utility is the reason) Renown of humility and refinement of this viewpoint through universal subjugation to the laws of existence: prediction for "unfreedom of the will"³⁴— human beings dependent through and through.
 There is a kind of revenge in the foregrounding of competing virtues: thus abstinence, capricious mortification,

solitude,
intellectual poverty are praised: and the future is associated with apathy.

In Europe this entire moral pivot is Jewish.

Granted, this kind of mentality gradually achieves dominance and people who have it become the rulers: thus the result is a monstrous moral mendacity (or shamelessness).

(the plebeian quality in the Greek moralists Socrates) .

This happened among the European clergy. In English utilitarianism, in Kant, Schopenhauer.

(value of the French: their tact in regard to shame)

Now a second twist is possible: that of shamelessness: the universal pleasure in the human beast, in the fact that there are illusions

Among the ruled, evil becomes "bad."

Imagining a grand revenge (Tertullian)?%?°

7 [23]

That which is logical, time, space would have to be produced by us: nonsense! When the mind obeys its own laws, this is because they are actually true, true in themselves! That we believe in this truth, absolutely, is the consequence of the abnormal people dying out: an error with respect to these truths avenges itself."

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 223

7 [24]

Since Rée proceeds from the principle that good is solely what people do not do for their own sake: then when he wants to give society the right to make use of the maxim "the end justifies the means," he has, in a most laughable fashion, provided the rope for his own hanging.® This is because, with all its punishment of criminals, society seeks its own preservation and advantage – there is no doubt about this. Consequently, there is nothing good, nothing holy about society's end: consequently, its end cannot justify its evil means.

Anyone who remains fixated on "good" and "evil" cannot punish: the same is true of anyone who believes in "deserved" and "undeserved": against all of this, absolute causality must be established. – Only when power is seized by a superior kind of human being to oppress a lesser kind, to keep it reined in, in any case to oppose it on all fronts: do I understand everything having to do with "punishing." It is oppression – using the word justice is Phariseism. I wouldn't know from where to derive the notion that the stronger, the superior are allowed to use their power against the lesser: much less why they should nor be allowed to. In any place where that which is superior is not that which is more powerful, something is lacking precisely in that which is superior: it is only a fragment and a mere shadow.

7 bs]?

Pain and pleasure are only accompanying phenomena. Hunger does not have as its goal satisfying the appetite: but rather, the process, the distinguishing feature of that which we call hunger, is in no way a drive or a state of feeling: it is a chemical state in which the affinity for other things is perhaps greater.

224 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

How impoverished is our insight into everything that is real if we are bound by pleasure and displeasure as the only language for it!

"Drive" is only a translation from the language of nonfeeling into the language of feeling:

"Will": this is what is communicated to our feelings as a result of that process – in other words already an effect, and not the beginning and cause.

Our speech is a mishmash of two spheres.

"End and means" – is only taken from the language of feeling.

Thus every single function goes its own way. but how little of it we notice! – And still we think that we can explain our actions with “ends,” with striving for bliss!

7 126]°

Not “happiness follows virtue” – but rather the more powerful people initially determine their state of happiness as virtue.

Evil actions are the province of the powerful and the virtuous: bad base actions are the province of the subjugated. The most powerful people have to be the most evil, inasmuch as they force their ideals on all people in opposition to all those people’s ideals and reshape these ideals in their image – the ones who create.

Evil means here: hard-hearted painful imposed

7 7]

Humans like Napoleon must continually return and reinforce faith in the self-glorification of the individual: yet he himself was corrupted by the means he had to employ and lost the noblesse of character. In establishing himself among a different kind of human being, he could have used other means, and so it would not have been necessary that a Caesar would have had to become a bad person.

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 225

7 [28]

To help the common masses achieve a ruling position is clearly the only means of ennobling their kind: but hope-fully not in their struggle for domination, but rather once they have begun to rule. Instead, the struggle unleashes their most profound baseness.

Hence the Jews ruling for a while is the only means of ennobling them.

7 [29]

“We act according to ‘ends’” (according to representations that accompany expected pleasurable feelings) – or so we say. In truth, something completely different, unconscious and unknowable, is happening: with the phrase "ends and means," we fix our gaze on the tiniest part of what happens – and we initially interpret even that as ends and means.

We speak as if feelings were causes and could be causes in the realm of nonfeeling people.

The images and reflexes of a process are understood and interpreted by us as the process itself.

This is our greatest error, to think that the reality of a process is proved through pleasure and pain, to think that here everything is most real.

Feelings as accompanying phenomena can certainly teach us the sequence of processes of which they are images: but not the causality of this sequence.

2»

7 [30]

Those who are useful to others, why should they be better than when they are useful to themselves? But only when the utility they provide others is superior in an absolute sense to the utility they provide themselves. If others are worth less, then the useful act rightly when they are useful to themselves, even at the expense of others.

All this chatter about "utility" already presupposes that what is useful to people has been defined: in other words, useful for what! i.e., the people's purposes are already taken for granted.

226 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Survival, making people happy, etc., if these are purposes: but then there are also circumstances under which their opposites are the higher purposes, e.g., as with a pessimistic view of life and suffering.

Thus, a belief is already presupposed – when praising those who are not self-interested: that the ego does not deserve to take precedence over the ego of another? Yet this is contradicted by the higher appraisal of those who are not self-interested:

indeed, they are certainly assumed to be a rarer type. For what reason, then, should the rarer superior people lose sight of themselves? – They certainly shouldn't, it is stupid, but they do it: and others profit by it and are grateful to them for it: they praise them. – Thus do egoistic people praise those who are unegoistic, because they are stupid enough to put their advantage ahead of their own advantage: because they act as egoistic people would not – but to their benefit.

7 [31]

According to Spinoza: “insofar as humans make use of reason, they consider useful only that which leads to knowing?

®

7 [32]

The supreme ruler and the slave (the former elevated into a god, the latter sinking by the same measure)

7 [33]*

That in all “sense-impressions” we are not only passive but rather very active, choosing, connecting, completing, interpreting – it has to do with sustenance, as with a cell: with assimilation and adjustment of what is disparate.

7 [34]

the limited means of knowledge “he is calmed, subdued, renouncing, patient, collected” the more proximate means of knowledge: study of the Vedas, sacrifice, alms, penitence, fasting – a means of achieving knowledge.
7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 227

7 [35]

Spinoza took revenge on Jewish law through his ethics: “individuals can do what they want”:*° similar to Paul.

7 B”

In repudiating all eudaimonism, Kant sought the most extreme expression of moral pride. absolute obedience: the ideal of a subjugated and oppressed person who assigns all value wherever the obedient have the best training – and no “pleasure,” no matter what!

7 [37]

“Illusions are necessary, not only for happiness, but also for the preservation and enhancement of humans: in particular, no action at all is possible without illusion. Even each step forward in knowledge is not possible except through illusion:

consequently, the source of the illusion must be maintained if we want to know, behave correctly and grow” – that’s what I once thought.

If there were an absolute morality, it would demand that the truth be followed unconditionally. consequently, that J and human beings would perish as a result. – This my interest in destroying morality. In order to be able to live and to become superior– in order to satisfy the will to power, every absolute command ment would have to be abolished. For the most powerful human beings, even lying is an acceptable means when creating:

this is exactly how nature works.

7 [38]

The morality of prudence developed in oppressed natures: to the point that the crime that remains concealed is regarded as virtuous and has beneficial consequences for the perpetrator.

228 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

The extreme pursuit of pleasure as a goal of morality is already characteristic of oppressed and suffering natures. With the powerful, things are appraised according to the pleasures of the moment: here /ofty feelings become intellectual.

Eudaimonism hedonism utilitarianism as signs of unfreedom, just like every prudential morality.”

Heroism as sign of freedom. “Hints of a heroic philosophy.”*°

Heroism includes, then, even a heartfelt involvement in the trivial, the idyllic.

7 [39]

We don't have to look for morals (even less, morality!) in those who write about morals, the vast majority of moral theorists are oppressed suffering impotent vengeful – they are drawn to a little happiness: sick people who think that convalescence is everything, 7 [40]

A very noble way of thinking shines forth in La Rochefoucauld, characteristic of the society of that time: he himself is a disappointed idealist who under the inspiration of Christianity seeks out nasty names for the impulses of his time.
7 [41]

The moral complexity of the soul throughout Christianity and the time of chivalry is suited to the character of Louis XIV and his era: the Greeks (Homer) seem too simple and straightforward, even with respect to their souls.
7 [42]

With freedom of trade, groups of similar people can band together and establish associations in common. Overcoming of nations.

Predators and the primeval forest show that evil can be quite healthy and helps to build magnificent bodies. If predatory species of animals were plagued by inner struggles, they would long ago have atrophied and degenerated.

7 SPRING –SUMMER 1883 229

Dogs (who whine and whimper so much) are degenerate predators, just like cats. Huge numbers of good-hearted oppressed people show that good-heartedness is accompanied by a decline in vitality: fearful feelings predominate! and control the organism.

Therefore we do not have to foreground the kind of evil that shows up as overly refined and stimulating, as a result of physical degeneration (cruelty-induced-lust etc.) and the moral mindlessness that comes with moral insanity)?!

To observe goodness, how it shows up as a sign of degeneration – as religious lunacy e.g., as philanthropy etc.: wherever there is a decline in healthy egoism and a pursuit of apathy or asceticism. The "saint" as ideal of the atrophied body, even the entire Brahmin-philosophy a sign of degeneration.

a) the superior kind: — — —

b) the inferior kind: — — —

c) the degenerates: their "good" their "evil."

7 [43]

"No one wants her as a gift: so she needs to sell herself!"

— I said

7 [44]

I consider Greek morality to be the supreme morality up to now; what this consideration shows me is that its bodily expression made (it) the supreme morality up to now.

Yet by that I mean the actual people's morality — not the one espoused by the philosophers: the decline of morals begins with Socrates: there are exclusively one-sided elements in the different systems that in earlier times were parts of a whole — it is the disintegrated older ideal. In addition there is the predominantly plebeian character, there are people without power, marginalized, oppressed etc.

230 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

In more recent times the Italian Renaissance brought human beings to their highest level: "the Florentine? — for similar reasons. Isolated conditions are also evident there alongside perfect and whole human beings, like fragments: e.g., "the tyrant" is such a fragment: the art aficionado.

Perhaps the Provencal had already achieved such an apogee in Europe — very rich, multifaceted, and yet selfpossessed human beings, who were not ashamed of their drives.

7 [45]

Luther's kind of enmity betrays his peasant heritage and baseness, his lack of nobility.

Napoleon corrupted in the struggle for power, like Bismarck.

I am hoping for puny "tyrants" in the coming century.'

7 [46]

From offstage Stendhal cites as a proverb: "Telle trouve a se

vendre, qui nett pas trouvé a se donner.""*

7 ar)" "Morality as sign language."

7 [48]

We cannot conceive the beginning of moral judging (in other words, morals –) modestly enough, a beginning which came late, perhaps millennia later than morality: that is why I took pleasure in watching R(ée) attempt to construct the entire, wonderful gothic edifice of morals upon a few clever assertions, a few errors, a few forgettable assertions! I myself had other foundations: but we both had in common the tendency to think that the foundations had to be as bad as possible.*

7 [49]

Everything works so shoddily and unscientifically these days – see the first page of Lecky!'

7 SPRING –SUMMER 1883 231

7 [so]

Competent in war and competent in giving birth: this is immediately and supremely decisive.

7 [s]

Noblesse demands repaying like with like, even in revenge: the concern of those who still place limits even on their own affects – it is just the same with gratitude. But what business does the state have with this noblesse!

7 [52]

The most free action is one where our truest strongest most subtly integrated nature springs forth and in such a way that our intellect simultaneously shows its controlling hand. – There-fore the most arbitrary and yet most reasonable action!

7 [53]

the argument against revenge grounded in unfree will would also be an argument against gratitude: the fact that the doer is unfree has nothing to do with our repayment of good deeds.

7 [54]

Reward and punishment corrupt our ability to see the natural consequences of every action.

7 [55]

How can the state take responsibility for revenge! First, it is coldhearted and does not act through affects: which someone taking revenge does. Next, it is not a person, much less a noble person: therefore it also cannot demonstrate its noblesse and self-discipline in the process of keeping things in proportion (as in "like for like"). Third, it robs revenge of precisely that which leads to the restoration of injured honor: the voluntary forsaking of life, danger for the sake of honor. It would therefore offer satisfaction only to the ignobly thinking injured party, while, on the contrary, robbing those who are noble of the opportunity to restore their honor. – Finally: it presupposes the shamelessness of the injured parties: who must speak publicly of their injuries! The "complaint" is, after all, a demand made by the state! But the noble person suffers in silence. – Thus only base natures are able to see the state as a tool of retribution. Hence the bitter struggle against the state on behalf of the vendetta. – Pasquale Paoli was forced for this reason to portray the surrender to the whole as something nobler – as a sacrifice! – and to demand the renunciation of vendettas as a superior kind of self-overcoming: for this reason he denounced anyone who takes revenge. The state affords protection to those who are weaker, who are incapable of defending themselves against evildoers: punishments are therefore initially security measures, also insofar as they deter. The state does not want us to defend ourselves – it does not fear revenge, but rather sovereign mentality! Therefore: subjugation to state justice is a self-sacrifice, of no benefit to more noble people. Given this, the state itself must have functioned as something that was felt to be superior:

in short, faith in the sanctity (venerability) of the state must be older than subjection under the exercise of state justice: older and stronger! The nobility maintains for a long time its high status in regard to children and slaves: thus its sovereignty. –

The impulses of heroism, not the standpoint of prudence, were crucial to the emergence of the state: the faith that there is something superior to the sovereignty of the individual. Here respect for the extended family and for the elders of a particular extended family plays a part: the younger generation makes offerings to it. The veneration of the dead and the transmitted wisdom of ancestors: people of today make offerings to it. –

Here homage to someone who is intellectually superior and victorious plays a part: the delight at encountering our own idol in the flesh: here oaths of fealty emerge. – It is not coercion, and not prudence, that hold the early forms of the state together: but rather the outpouring of more noble impulses.

7 SPRING –SUMMER 1883 233

Force would be impossible to impose, and prudence is perhaps still insufficiently developed in the individual. – A common danger probably provides the impetus for coming together:

and

the feeling of new collective power is something compelling and is a source of more noble decisions.

7 [56è

At one point there was a theory of the state as a calculable utility: now we have the practice of it! – The time of kings has passed® because the people are no longer worthy of them:

they do not want to see in their king the archetype of their ideals, but a means to their utility. – This is the whole truth!

7 [57]

Human beings would certainly like to have something like supreme purpose, ultimate goal, absolute duty, (absolute) ought: the demand for these is the cause of the many moralities. But what is the cause of these demands? Probably many factors, e.g., – once it has taken control of the intellect, every single human drive probably demands to be recognized as the ultimate lord and goal-setter of all human matters. The most disparate drives have erected their monuments in moralities. 7 [58]!

There are moralities which are meant to /egitimate their creators in the eyes of other people: other moralities are meant to pacify and satisfy the creators; with other moralities they want to nail themselves on the cross; with others they want to take revenge on other people; with others they want to conceal themselves; with others they want to glorify themselves, whether in their own eyes or in the eyes of other people; with others they want to elevate and improve themselves, with others they want to exercise power and creativity on humankind; with others they want to obey, with others to rule and humiliate. With others they want to forget or be forgotten. Enough, moralities are nothing but a sign language of the affects.

234 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 [59]
not the intention of an action, but rather precisely what is unintended about it, determines its value or disvalue.

7 [60]
Moralities as sign language of the affects: the affects themselves, however, a sign language of the functions of everything organic.

7 [61]
Quite apart from the value of such assertions: such as “there is a categorical imperative!” it can still be asked: what does such an assertion say about the person who is asserting it.

7 [62]

It is just now dawning on people that music is a sign language of the affects: and eventually we will learn clearly to recognize musicians' systems of drives by analyzing their music. They certainly wouldn't think that they were revealing themselves in this way. This is the innocence of these self-confessions, as opposed to that of all written works. But there is also this innocence in the great philosophers: they are not aware that they are speaking of themselves – they think it has to do "with the truth" – but really it has to do with them. Or rather: the most powerful drive within them forces itself to the surface, with the greatest shamelessness and innocence of a fundamental drive – it wants to be master and, wherever possible, the purpose of all things, of everything that happens! The philosopher is only a kind of occasion, and enabling means, whereby the drive speaks for the first time. There are many more languages than we think: and people reveal themselves much more often than they would like. What doesn't speak! – yet there are still so few of those who hear people babbling forth their confessions, as it were, into empty rooms: people are squanderers with their "truths," as 7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 235 the sun is with its light. – Isn't it a shame that empty rooms have no ears? There are viewpoints that make people feel: "this alone is true and right and truly human; anyone who thinks differently is wrong" – these are called religious and ethical viewpoints. It is clear that a sovereign drive is speaking here which is stronger than the person. Here, each time the drive believes itself to be in possession of the truth and of the highest concept

"human."

There are probably many p(eople) in whom one drive has not become sovereign: they have no convictions. This is there-fore the first characteristic: Every philosopher's closed system proves that in this philosopher one drive is the ruler, that a fixed order of rank exists. This then calls itself: "truth." – The feeling here is: with this truth, I have reached what it means to be "human": the other is of a kind inferior to me, at least as the kind of person who knows. With primitive and naive people, convictions even rule in regard to their customs, indeed in regard to their tastes: it is the best possible thing. With cultured peoples, tolerance rules in regard to such matters: but in that case there is an even more strict adherence to their highest standard of good and evil: whereby we want to have not only the most subtle taste but also the sole legitimate taste. This is the universally dominant form of barbarism, not yet knowing that morality is a matter of taste. Incidentally, in this area we find the most /ying and de-ceiving: moralistic and religious literature is the most mendacious. The ruling drive, whatever it may be, employs deceit and lies against the other drives in order to maintain its superiority. Alongside religious wars there persists a moral war: i.e., one drive wants to subjugate humankind; and the more that religions die off, the more bloody and visible this struggle will become. We have just begun!

236 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
7 [63]

Apperception is first and foremost only activity "voluntary" movements!)

7 [64]

My theory: in every action of a person, the entire development of psychic life is experienced™ even sense perceptions are actions: in order that something can be perceived, an active force must already be functioning, a force that registers the stimulus, allows it to work and adapts to a stimulus like that and modifies it.
It is a fact that something absolutely new is continually being generated. "Cause and effect" is merely the popular generalization of "means and end" i.e., of another popular logical function to which nothing in reality corresponds. There are no final appearances, except to a being that has already created a beginning and an end.

There is also always something new being generated in the development of the mind. Feelings® and representations are absolutely not derivable from each other. Thought and feeling!®

7 [65]

The "voluntary" movement of the lowest organisms is — — —

7 [66]

First: how can people be made capable of ruling themselves?
second: how — — —

7 [67]

Digesting everything that the past has produced is certainly not what is most desirable: that's why I wish that Dante would offend our tastes and appetites in some fundamental way.

7 [68]

To regard Hamlet as the pinnacle of the human intellect — that's what I call not judging intellect and pinnacles harshly enough. This is above all a failed work: its creator would probably laughingly admit this if] said it to his face.

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 237

7 [69]

Why has a judicial reward not developed alongside judicial punishment? Why has the state not also taken responsibility for the individuals' gratitude toward others?

"Justice," according to Ihering, securing the conditions of life within society by means of compulsion.°®

An act is not evil in itself, but only insofar as etc."

e.g., a troublemaker can be killed without penance martyring and torturing on behalf of the state stealing among Egyptians

Collective conscience and collective responsibility.

It is not the guilt that is punished.

Crime as misfortune.

To distinguish between bad (contemptible) and evil.

Morality among the powerful and the subjugated.

Tremendous complexity of the emergence of current moral value determination: but unity as feeling.

Anyone who refuses to punish on account of freedom of the will is also not entitled to praise, to thank, to be angry: the fundamental belief of all affects while interacting is – – – 7 [70]

Desire for revenge® is awareness of being injured, first as a matter of fact, second with respect to our belief in our power (rationality, formidableness etc.) Both require a counterresponse, thus:

1) defense,

2) substitution, and 3) generating a feeling of power: leaving aside completely the belief in the perpetrator's guilt. The desire for revenge has nothing to do with belief in the freedom of the will.

7 [71] Organic – moral. Freedom of the will.

Evil as the preliminary stage of a good.

238 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 [72]

"What is good for me is good in itself" is only the judgment of someone powerful who is accustomed to assigning value.

7 [73]

Perhaps it has never been seen as a problem that moralizing happens at all. Is it necessary that human beings will always moralize?® Or couldn't morality die out, just as astrological and alchemical speculation has died out or is dying out?

Necessary for what? For life? But it is possible to live without judging morally, as plants and animals show. Or necessary for a happy life? The abovementioned animals show that in any case it is possible to live more happily than human beings – even without morality. Therefore morality cannot be necessary either to life as such or to becoming happier: without going

so far as to make morality responsible for the fact that human beings suffer more than animals: – suffering more in this way
could certainly have other causes and morality could perhaps be a means of warding off a great deal more suffering. But it is certainly the case that if becoming happier and becoming more free of suffering were the goal we had to set for ourselves:
a gradual bestialization would be rational: which would in any case also have to include refraining from moral judgments.
So,
if humans want not just to live and not just to live more happily:
what do they want? Now, morality says: we should act this or that way – why “should”? Therefore morality must know this:
this why, this goal, which is neither life as such nor becoming a happier person. – But it doesn’t know this! it contradicts itself!
It gives orders, but it is incapable of justifying itself. – Giving
orders is the essence of what it does!
So what purpose does morality serve? Away with every “thou shalt”!

7 SPRING -SUMMER 1883 239

7 [74]

The feeling of “being bad” is completely different at that level where guilt is not actually connected to intention:

Oedi-

pus (more disgrace and unhappiness)

Actually, there is no “badness” in noble morality: yet “evil” still has something about it that inspires reverence or compassion.

7 [75]

Actions e.g., stealing are accompanied by completely different categories of feeling and judgment once they are seen as allowed.

It is possible to show, through the comparison of peoples, that this is perceived as good in one place and bad in another: but the opposition itself of "good" and "bad" is present everywhere:

it is just that actions are classified otherwise. – And yet there are also differences in the universal judgment good and bad!

7 [76]

Animals follow their drives and affects: we are animals. Do we do anything else? Perhaps it is merely an illusion when we follow morality? In truth, do we follow our drives, and is morality merely a sign language of our drives? What is "duty"

"justice" the "good," the "law" – which drive-life corresponds to these abstract signs? –

When morality says: "you should become better" – why

"better"? – Neither life nor the prospect of a happier life can demonstrate this. Hence the indemonstrable imperative the commandment without purpose – this is supposed to be morality?

Yet "better" – is in no way conceivable without purpose.

7 [77]

What is the source of actions? That is my question. For what purpose? to what end? is something secondary. Either from pleasure (overflowing feeling of force, which must exhaust itself) or from displeasure (restraining the feeling of power, which must free itself or ensure compensate for itself) The question:

240 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

how should we act? is posed: as if something could not be accomplished until an action has taken place: but what is most proximate is the action itself as success, as what is accomplished, apart from the consequences of the action.

Therefore, people do not act for the sake of happiness or utility or in order to avoid displeasure: but rather a certain amount of force is released, seizes something on which it can vent itself.

That which is called "goal," "purpose," is in truth the means for this involuntary explosive process

And one and the same amount of feeling-of-force can be discharged in a thousand ways: this is "freedom of the will" – the feeling that a hundred different actions serve just as well in relation to the necessary explosion. The feeling of a certain choice of actions in regard to this release of tension.

My solution: the degree of feeling of force makes the mind fertile; it displays many goals, chooses one goal for itself which, when pursued, is tension-relieving for the feeling: thus, there is a double discharge: once in anticipating a tension-relieving goal, then in the action itself.

"if I did that, I would despise myself, and then I would be unhappy." This would therefore mean: not to do a deed because of the consequences for my feelings."

Helvétius thinks that when the possibility of an action arises in us, we basically ask "what will be the consequences of this action for my feelings?"7!

Stendhal sur l'amour v. p. 252.7?

Yet the first fact is that this possibility appears to noble people:

they see something about which simple souls have no idea.

An overflowing charged feeling of force is there: the goal set for the action provides an anticipation of tension relief and thereby pushes even more toward discharge; the resulting action provides the actual tension relief.

So it is! The goal that is set brings the desire for discharge to its peak.

7 SPRING –SUMMER 1883 241

Therefore: happiness, "le plaisir"? as a goal of action, is only a means of increasing the tension: it must not be confused with the happiness that lies in the action itself. The final happiness is very determined; the happiness in the action could be expressed through a hundred such precisely determined images of happiness.

Therefore: the "in order that" is an illusion: "I am doing this in order to harvest the happiness from it." This is not the way it is. The person who acts forgets the actual driving force and sees only the "motive."

"The happiness in reaching a goal" is itself an offspring of the tension of forces. an analogical anticipation and self-escalation.

Eudaimonism is therefore a result of imprecise observation. We do not act for the sake of enjoyment: yet that is the illusion of the person who acts.

7 [78]

Dühring Coursus p. 147, "the mechanical state of the body is a partial condition of cosmological mechanics""4

7 [79]

"I must not punish him – for he can't help it" – this "I must not" means: I would act irrationally, as if I wanted to punish a tree that had fallen and killed someone.

7 [80]

Fearful people, with vivid imaginations, who would be ready to subjugate themselves and to reconcile very easily – become increasingly obsessed with thoughts of endangerment that spring out of fear and imagined fear and for this reason easily take disproportionate, deadly revenge – revenge for suffering that they had mostly only dreaded.

7 81]?

Organic beings have 1) the force to bond chemically 2) particular explosions that regulate these chemical processes.

When

242 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

both of these conditions coincidentally happen in conjunction with each other and simultaneously, so that the temporal joining and (the) force of these explosions work to regulate the bonding and dissolution processes, then there emerges an organic being. This is therefore the result of these two older kinds of beings.

such regular exploding and such growth processes.

7 [82]

Accusers do not want to admit to themselves how useful the pain was to them. Their drive for revenge is revealed in this way: with words they wish to hurt and to exert their power over whatever wounded them.

7 [83]

How much more we live with a sense of well-being is revealed by the fact that pain is felt so much more strongly than a single pleasure.

7 [84]''°

Truth and courage only in those who are free (truth a kind of courage)

The evildoer as an unhappy person: form of humanity.

Servitude makes someone bad.

we don't react to most injuries, rather we submit. (Missing in Dühring!)

7 [85] noble – good

Characteristics of persons – later applied to actions.

7 (86)''

1) Struggle of the parts for space for nourishment whether with or without stimuli''

2) direct struggle with destruction or assimilation of the weaker''?

7 SPRING –SUMMER 1883 243

3) the stronger produce more offspring than the weaker?'

the advantage always belongs to those who have a greater tendency to more easily regenerate themselves and to consume less.

greater capacity for self-nourishment and less consumption for their own needs – applying this morally! – favorable preconditions for growth and, with it, autocratic rule.®!

When nourishment is lacking, the first to die out and starve will be those who consume the most nourishment.®?

Advantage to those who, under stimulation, use up their own resources the least rapidly, even more so where assimilation of nourishment and regeneration thereby become stronger, indeed are made stronger by the stimulus to the point of overcompensation.®?

Morally: the value of pain, of injury

Ability to resist pressure gives advantage

7 [87]

In themselves, courage, shame, anger have nothing to do with concepts physiological facts, the name of which and the psychological conception of which, are mere symbols

What does language express about the names of the affects?

ira®4

What does it mean: to change a person through morality?

therefore physiologically through chronic fear or extreme agitation exhaustion

To study the effect of illnesses on the affects.

7 [88]

my task: to position the good drives so that they get hungry and have to activate themselves.

244 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 [89]

Concerning the existence of highly perfected mechanisms of adaptation Roux p. 43 Emergence of animals out of the water

7 [90]

The characteristics that are typical in a family first become fully visible in the man; the least visible in easily stimulated, excitable adolescents. Tranquility must have set in first and the number of external stimuli reduced: or on the other hand the excitability must have significantly subsided. – That is why peoples past their prime are so eloquent concerning their typical characteristics and make them more clearly known than they did in the bloom of their youth.

7 [or]

Struggle leads to the survival of the best.

7 [92]

Rivalry among citizens, it's always the most industrious who achieve an enduring influence: thus the state continues to exist.°8

Relative autonomy of the parts even in the highest organisms Roux p 65.

7 [93]

Concerning the inequality 3? that really exists Roux. 69.

7 [94]

In the same way that, physiologically, cell borders cell, so, too, drive borders drive. The most comprehensive image of our being is a socialization of drives, with continuing rivalries and individual alliances among them. The intellect object of the competition.

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 245

7 [95]

When a quality of the cell is chemically constituted such that assimilation outweighs decomposition, therefore overcompensation for what is consumed, growth appears: this important feature thus establishes dominance over the other q(ualities).

We don't know of any organism, any cell, that would not have this force in one stage of its life: life would not be able to propagate without this force.

The struggle for nourishment and space takes place in the cell as soon as there is an inequality of constituent parts."°

Processes which increase their capacity for life, namely for assimilation, through additional stimuli: where therefore the stimulus has a trophic, nourishment-increasing effect – fundamental condition for plants, the nourishment of which is entirely dependent on sunlight and warmth (even electric light produces rapid unfolding and fructification.?!)

Thus, influence of stimuli on more rapid assimilation – in morality: increase in power at the place where a plethora of the most subtle injuries occurs and, with that, an increase in the need for appropriation. (Even more so with exotic foreign ideas – Greeks.)

The more easily reactive substance accommodates more stimulus??

7 [96]

Justice – the will to perpetuate a particular power relationship. Satisfaction with this is the prerequisite. Everything worthy of honor is added in order to allow justice to appear as something eternal.

7 [97]

Practical consequence. Transformation of character. Breeding instead of moralizing.

246 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

to work with direct influence on the organism instead of the indirect influence of ethical breeding. Then another kind of corporality is already creating for itself another soul and ethos. So reverse it!

in Socrates, a plebeian mistrust of the affects: they are ugly, wild – therefore to be repressed – that's why Epicurus is ahead of the Stoics in terms of nobility. Yet they are more understandable on a popular level.

In much the same way, the Christian saint is a plebeian ideal.

7 [98]

Processes emerge where a stimulus becomes necessary, becomes a stimulus to life: otherwise deterioration and decline set in.

These are the supreme processes ??

All of this occurs without the struggle among individuals."

Selection in the struggle among individuals will choose those characteristics for lasting preservation that prove to be useful for the whole individual"

Therefore: many kinds of morality must emerge – the struggle among their supporters and their triumph result in lasting preservation for the kind of morality that is useful and indispensable for the few of the most powerful.

Innumerable attempts at moral value judgments must have already been made, depending on the development of separate strong basic feelings:

Absolute requirement that the best morality must be associated with the most powerful individuals. who are they?

All states and communities are inferior compared to the individual, but are necessary forms?® of the individual's higher education.

7 199]

The "real meaning" behind" accusations is that people always intensify their pain: so that they do not let it go too quickly – thus drawing upon even superior forces, the sculptors of themselves!

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 247

7 [100]

To have a subtle knowledge of what hurts us and of how easily others hurt us, and as it were to influence their thoughts in advance so that they do not act in ways that are painful to us: this is the main thing for many amiable people: they bring joy and allow the joy in others to pour forth – because they are so frightened of pain. This is called "sensitivity" – Those with a reclusive hardened nature have no need to put themselves in other people's shoes and often hurt them; they do not assume such a great susceptibility to pain.

7 io]

the self enhancing aristocratic principle is always inventing superior types among superior people. Powerful people gain ever more power over themselves, exude ever greater force: we see that nobility has many levels – and something in the individual person is growing on its own.

7 [102]

Power as imagined by those who have had to fear it.

7 [o]

The pleasure we take in people who are similar to us, as our duplicates, is only possible if we take pleasure in ourselves. Yet the more this is the case, the more our taste is offended by what is foreign: hatred and disgust for what is foreign are as great as our pleasure in ourselves.

This hatred and disgust result in our destroying and remaining cold to everything that is foreign.

But if we take no pleasure in ourselves, this can be used as a bridge to universal human compassion and becoming closer

1) we demand the presence of others so that we forget about ourselves: conviviality in many people 2) we assume that others

248 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

also take no pleasure in themselves: and once we perceive this, they no longer provoke envy "we are equal" 3) as we come to tolerate each other, despite feeling displeased with ourselves, we get used to tolerating even "those similar to ourselves." We no longer feel contempt; hatred and disgust dissipate: becoming closer. In this way the doctrine of universal sin and depravity brought people together. Even the truly powerful are imagined differently: "basically they are poor miserable people."

7104] people who are walking legislation

7 [os]

the judgment "good" appears within us as taste: as tyrannical and certain as a taste for sour pickles or as when I can't stand to be in the presence of someone spitting.

7 [106]

do not lose the affect of distance!

7 [107]

Conquering – is the natural consequence of excess power:

it is the same as creating and procreating, in other words the incorporation of one's own image into foreign material. That is why superior humans must create i.e., impose their superiority on others, whether as teachers or even as artists. For artists want to communicate themselves or, more specifically, their taste: artists for their own sake is a contradiction. It is the same with philosophers: they want to make their taste dominate the world – that is why they teach and write. Wherever excess power exists, it wants to conquer: this drive is often called Jove, the love for those with whom the conquering instinct would like to have its way. – Vain people want to please, they want to exist according to the taste of others: in this they show their lack of creative force – they are “empty.” Dissemblers hypocrites, even clever, cautious people fear the taste of others: a lack of surplus force is the prerequisite here. Whereas imprudent reckless defiant unconcerned straightforward hasty incautious qualities are more easily found in the presence of a quantity of force, which increases the tension too much and quickly explodes into action – in opposition to utility. This also explains why attention to prudence is not respected by the powerful: being prudent can easily be an indication of lack of force. On the other hand, in some circumstances imprudent actions are noble:

7 SPRING –SUMMER 1883 249

and this is perhaps why unselfishness is praised: unselfish people i.e., those who do not act out of prudence and caution but like those who spill over – what do they care about the direction?

Calculating people are despised: but those who calculate for the entire community are all the more admired. For we assume that people are not superfluously “prudent”?! thinking is regarded as difficult, – – –

Thus emerges the praise of wisdom: as the praise of someone who thinks, calculates, deliberates often well and easily, and not out of prudence for the sake of utility, but rather out of love for the community, out of love for perpetuating its thoughts and institutions. This is something rare!

7 [108]

Fear of power as productive violence. Here is the realm of religion. On the other hand, becoming one with the most power-ful thing that exists appears to be the supreme human striving.

This is the origin e.g., of Brahmanism: generated within the imagination of the ruling caste as a fantasized expansion of the need for power, probably because this need has no release in wars.

The union with the godhead can be desire for supreme sensual satisfaction (feminine hysteria in many saints) or desire for supreme tranquility and stillness and spirituality (Spinoza) or desire for power etc. Or even as the consequence of the most desperate fearfulness: the only salvation and escape is to flee into God. The most refined form of this union may well be "overcoming grace" in the mystics.

250 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 [109]

Conscious intention in a harmful action is not considered "evil" in itself, but rather insofar as it allows foreigners, enemies to appear more dangerous. "They have evil intentions toward me," or "they have evil intentions."

As long as enemies are felt to be present, features of the ignominious contemptible are still lacking in evil actions. Only when evildoers show themselves to be simultaneously harmful and pitiable, does an action become morally suspect. Thus, morality begins with contempt.

7 ko]

Those who lie often and knowingly and live under conditions where it is dangerous and difficult to lie, are, for that very reason, sensitive to the truth, even to an extraordinary degree: whereas idealists and do-gooders constantly live in a fog concerning themselves and their desires and basically can never speak the truth: – their “taste” is not subtle enough for this.

7 m

Those who, as poets, want to pay with pure gold must pay with their experiences: for this reason, though, poets refuse to tolerate having their closest friends as interpreters – their closest friends figure things out by giving them feedback.

Yet

these closest friends should be amazed at where those poets emerge on the paths of their suffering – they should learn
to look ahead and above and not backwards, below. –

7 [112]

Granted, that punishments should inflict pain in proportion to the severity of the crime, then they would also have to be determined in proportion to every criminal’s sensitivity to pain, i.e., there should never be a predetermined punishment

for any offense!

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 251

7 (133)

“Good people” emerge only when there is a feeling of opposition: these are people who are simultaneously harmful to them

and yet contemptible. Lawgivers make an effort to endow many actions with this character, so that they appear contempt-ible, associated with disgrace: so that an action and its accompanying disgrace occupy a single feeling. – In general, it is our custom”? to regard all criminals in the same way. It is otherwise

where lawbreakers are admired or win excessive favor through great heroism and disdain for danger. E.g., heretics and all sectarians often win admiration as opposed to the contempt that initially greets them. It is evident: there is power involved.

7 [114]

Public-spiritedness'® is older than selfishness, in any case
it has been stronger for a longer time. The differences in mentality were in fact not great: and so the value of actions was not judged at all according to mentalities, but rather according to consequences. The species believed in itself and its mentality as a fact of nature: people readily expected to find their own mentality in all their neighbors –actions were simply not weighed any further, “they were all self-evident.”

7 (115)

People say one thing and do something completely different: even moralists do this. So what’s the point of moralizing? Be honest for once! The main point is, that we have to do it. Every “what’s the point” is nothing but shadow-boxing and embellishment.

7 [116] “representative virtue”

7 (117)

Nature wants nothing but always achieves something: we want something and always achieve something else. Our “intentions” are only “coincidences.” –

252 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 [18]

When human beings do everything for the sake of their happiness and yet devote very little thought to what makes them happy: the result is that, for them, reflection brings great displeasure.

7 [119]

Great men!”! like Caesar Napoleon are a living species! Every other form of ruling is imitation.

7 [120]

39) Our actions reshape us: in every action certain forces are exercised, others are not exercised, thereby eventually falling into neglect: an affect always affirms itself at the expense of other affects, from which it drains some force. The actions

that we perform most often eventually become like a thick shell around us: they readily make use of the force, it would be difficult for other intentions to prevail. – Not doing something on a regular basis reshapes a person in the same way: eventually we can tell whether others have overcome themselves a few times every day or have always let themselves go. – This is the initial consequence of every action, it continues to sculpt us – our bodies as well, of course.

40) Now opinions about these actions, generated by us concerning ourselves, are also a part of each action. Our opinion about ourselves is just as much a consequence of each action – it adds to the total assessment we have made of ourselves, whether weak, strong etc. praiseworthy blameworthy, whether we should avoid the judgments of others, whether we can show ourselves in any light. Perhaps self-deception becomes a habit: the consequence of this, intentionally flawed appraisal and squinting of the eye, seeing falsely, must of course ultimately reveal itself again in our actions. Deceit used against us, lack of trust in us, fear of us, contempt for us – all of the affects belonging to impotent natures progressively alter the body as well. The awareness of a lack of self-control, un-noble!"?

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 253

expressions creep in – and even if someone were living on a desert island.

7 21]

38) Completely leaving aside all other people, the value of a human being undergoes constant change, becoming better or worse:

1) because every action builds on a person's system of affects

2) because the appraisal associated with each action builds on it and becomes in turn the cause of subsequent actions.

That which is base, un-noble grows – or dissipates etc.
Baseness corresponds to a completely corporeal substrate, and certainly not just in facial features!

7 [122]

NB. Absurdity of all praise and blame

7 [23]

the pride of the weak is so fragile because they fear that no
one believes in their energy and force.

7 [124]

It seems like only yesterday Kant proposed in all seriousness that we should only perform actions etc.!

7 [125]

As for me, I have grown accustomed to observing a primitive kind of sign language in all moral judgments, through which certain physiological facts about the body would like to make their presence known: to those who have ears to hear it.°3 But who has had ears to hear it until now!!%4

Now in fact that there were no ears to hear it, or wrong ears, and false interpretations (existed), and that for millennia, consciousness continued such vain attempts and interpreted itself – this proves it.

this proves it.

254 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

And so I believe that the understanding of morality does have a future and that hopes for improving the human body might come with this better understanding.

7 [126]

37) Anyone who has developed some idea of the body – how many systems are working simultaneously there, how many things are done for each other and against each other, how much subtle accommodation, etc. is there: will conclude that all consciousness is meager and limited by comparison: that no mind is even remotely capable of reaching what was supposed to have been accomplished here by the mind and perhaps, too, that the wisest ethicist and lawgiver would have to feel clumsy and amateurish in the middle of this mechanism of warring duties and rights. How little we are aware of!

How

much this limited awareness leads to error and confusion!

Consciousness is but a tool: and considering the amount and significance of what is accomplished without consciousness, neither the most essential nor the most worthy of admiration.

On the contrary: there is perhaps no organ so poorly developed, no other that is deficient in so many ways, no other that malfunctions so much: it is after all the organ that emerged last and is therefore still a child – let us forgive it its childish tantrums! These include, among much else, morality as the compendium of all previous value judgments concerning human actions and mentalities.

Therefore we must reverse the order of rank: everything conscious is only of secondary importance: that it is nearer and dearer to us would not be a reason, at least not a moral reason, for appraising it differently. That we take what is nearer to us to be more important is nothing but age-old prejudice. – So learn to see things differently! in major evaluations! That which is mental is to be preserved as sign language of the body!

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 255

7 27]

Morality an attempt by the affects to become conscious of each other.

7 [128]

34) The recognition of authority increases in proportion to the decrease in creative powers

7 [129]

35) False oppositions. All stages still exist alongside one another

(or many) – but the higher stage does not want to recognize the lower stage as way and means – it should be its opposite!

This is the affect of distance. Anyone who does not possess or show it provokes the greatest confusion e.g., Epicurus.

7 [130]

36) The same thing e.g., self-control in some people leads someone else to think “you have to watch yourself around them, they only consider, coldly, what is to their advantage and ulterior advantage"! – and someone else might think "you can let yourself go in their presence and show yourself as you are – they will not go to extremes" plurality of all characteristics, depending on the degree of prudence, or considerations of beauty-nobility.

7 [131]

The Future of the Science of Morality

In bidding farewell to moral problems for a while, in order to avoid the danger that I myself will no longer find the time to come back to this subject, I want to provide a few hints

to those etc.

7 [132]

so whether the superior species might not be better and more quickly achieved by means other than the terrible game of wars between peoples and revolutions? –

256 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

whether not through nutrition selective breeding elimination of certain experimental groups

7 [33]

Our body is something far superior more refined more complicated more perfect more moral than all of the human organizations and communities known to us: the small size of tools and servants at its disposal is not a fair argument against it! In matters of beauty its achievement stands supreme: and our works of art are shadows on the wall compared to this not merely illusionary but also /iving beauty!

7 [134]

The expansion within a state of pleasure (in Mainländer,!"
p. 64).

It wants to "show its state and expose itself to others – if
it

were possible, to the entire world" hugging, hopping, dancing,

jumping, laughing, screaming, cheering, singing, speaking –
I see an overflowing force that wants to expend itself

In displeasure, approximately this way: "the gleam in the eyes is extinguished, the countenance becomes white, the limbs motionless or contracted. The skin of the forehead

wrinkles, the eyes close, the mouth grows silent, the hands make fists, the persons cower, collapse into themselves."!°"

The temperature changes: the extremities become cold: hotter in pleasure and in anger.

7 [135]

Key questions: can temperaments be changed?

33) The qualities of the will are "comparable to scorings into which the will flows at the slightest stimulus: they have expanded themselves into channels" "But infants already show great depths under mere scorings: character (its form of temperaments)"!%

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883

Qualities of the Will.

7 [136]

envy greed cruelty miserliness infidelity pride defiance imperiousness immodesty baseness rigidity cowardice injustice obduracy trickery brashness sensuousness vileness vanity "moods" states of the will "movements that are felt"

257 magnanimity generosity mercy prodigality fidelity humility pusillanimity mildness modesty noble-mindedness flexibility temerity

justice

openness honesty bashfulness moderation desire for honor saintliness.!0?

sense of life (equanimity) – its modifications:

joy courage hope love hate despair fear sorrow.

Double movements

110

Wrath, rage (first the will flows back, concentrates itself (hate), and then suddenly flows to the periphery, in order to destroy)

258 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 137)"

30) The starting point of praise and blame: weak people praise and blame because this and that are praised and blamed: strong individuals present themselves as the standard. The same applies to the moralists and their own feeling of power – depending on whether they feel themselves to be lawgivers or teachers of laws that have been given.

In the utilitarianism debate!!? both sides are in agreement –?

Bentham feels himself to be a lawgiver, Rée a ruled subject.

7 [138]

“The condition of our muscles determines in large measure our kinesthetic feeling of health and strength, fatigue, illness and weakness – with every movement of our body we know enough to estimate with incredible exactness (as with the act of seeing) the degree of contraction that we have to force our muscles to achieve. We also know the different positions that our muscles assume, even when they are at rest: we acutely feel a fatigued limb and especially a lame limb.”!!°

7 [139]

Cold objects appear to weigh more than warm ones of the same weight (according to Weber)!”⁴

When 2 sensations follow each other at close enough intervals at the same place, they tend to melt into each other: the same thing happens when sensations occur in very close proximity on the skin.!”⁵ 7 [140]!”⁶

Love: the most powerful outpouring, the will would like to break out of its sphere, to become the entire world.

Love as based in the quality of will imperiousness

as based in the heart

as based in quality desire for fame (as pleasurable feeling of intellectual superiority)

as based in fidelity (as friendship)

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 259

7 a]

Erroneous simplifications: e.g., seeing something as a means while overlooking 100 things.

7 [142]

NB. a moral feeling something very complex. It has to do with the fact that saying “good” has such a different effect than saying “useful,” because 50 additional ingredients are mixed in.

7 [143]

The unconditioned is only logically derived from the conditioned, like nothingness is from being. – As “unconditioning” –

7 [144]

27) All of the wonder we have invested in nature up to now we must also learn to feel when observing the body: it is pathetic to let ourselves be tyrannized by “big” and “little” like this!

What the forest, the hills, would have to say to us – and the distant heavenly bodies “which call us to solitude”!!” (Emerson) – “these delights are good for us, they make us sober.”!!8

7 [145]!

28) The meaning of our gardens and palaces (and similarly, too, the meaning of all desire for wealth) is, to remove disorder and coarseness from our sight and to build a homeland for the aristocracy of the soul.

Of course most people believe that their natures become superior once such beautiful serene objects have had an effect on them: that explains the mania for Italy and travel, etc. all reading and going to the theater. They want to be shaped – this is the meaning of their labors on behalf of culture!

But the strong powerful want to do the shaping and want to have nothing foreign in their presence anymore!

29) This is why people go into the great outdoors, not to find themselves, but rather to lose themselves in it and forget themselves. “To be outside oneself” as the wish of all those who are weak and dissatisfied with themselves.

260 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 [146]

Advantage enjoyed by cold natures: they pursue their interests as a colder thing.

7 [147]

To accept nothing when we have nothing to give back and the shame and pleasure we experience in the presence of everything good – is noble. “Allowing oneself to be loved” is common.

7 1148]

The mother’s compassion for her child is almost like the compassion we feel for ourselves: artists feel the same thing for their work and their fates. There’s nothing noble about it: there is also compassion for ourselves – it is something completely different from suffering itself!

7 [149]

With “ends and means” we are speaking a sign language: but in this way we indicate only what is peripheral about actions

(their relationship to the accompanying phenomena pleasure and pain)

7 [iso]

24) Contempt for the body is a consequence of dissatisfaction with it; and the overvaluation of the mind and of moral laws is the state of those who habitually want to become something superior and who believe they can become greater by strolling around among “eternal values.” All this demand for the everlasting!° is the consequence of dissatisfaction – such is the will to culture, as a demand of “people dissatisfied with themselves.”

7 first]

25) The body’s beauty – this has been understood too superficially by artists: this superficial beauty would have to be followed by a beauty in the whole inner workings of the organism

ism

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 261

– in this way the greatest sculptors provide inspiration for creating beautiful human beings: this is the point of art – it provokes dissatisfaction in those who feel shamed by it and inspires creativity in those who have sufficient force. The result of a draactivity in those who have sufficient force. The result of a dra-

activity in those who have sufficient force. The result of a dramatic performance is. "that's just how I want to be, like this hero"

– stimulation of the creative force, turned back on ourselves!

Epicurus is to the Stoa as the beautiful is to the sublime: but we would have to be Stoics at the very least in order to be capable of seeing this beauty in the first place! in order to be able to be envious of it!

7 i)!"

26) Our age with its striving to remedy accidental difficulties, to prevent them and to combat unpleasant possibilities in advance, is an age of the poor. Our "rich" – they are the poorest of all!

The real purpose of all wealth is to forget!

7 [153]

Teichmiiller p. 204 the I compares its imaginary representative content and finds the awareness of something that happened before (or of a content given in memory)

Thus, in all perceptions of time the I is active. "To atempo-rally bring together and compare the acts {of} memory sensation and anticipation – this is the activity of the I."!??

7 [154]

Against Kant. Of course I feel connected, even to the beautiful that appeals to me, through an interest in it. But this interest does not appear in its naked state. The expression of happiness perfection stillness, even that aspect of the artwork that is silent, that lets itself be judged – everything speaks to our drives. – In the final analysis I perceive as "beautiful" only that which corresponds to an ideal ("the happy person") of my own drives e.g., wealth, celebrity, piety, an outpouring of power, for different peoples, capitulation can become the feeling "beautiful."

262 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 i]

20) Great enough to gild what has been despised: intelligent enough to understand the body as something superior – this is the future of morality!

In our intentions and will we must fervently seek the sublimity that we so worship in nature – we should be the redeemers of nature and not its deifiers! "Deification of nature" – this is the result of poverty, shame, anguish, stupidity!

Our actions should be misunderstood, as Epicurus is misunderstood! It is characteristic of all prophets that they were understood soon – it diminishes them! We must first have human beings whose significance becomes evident after centuries – our "fame" has thus far been something wretched! – I do not want to be understood for a long time.

On the other hand, we must endure misunderstanding things and seeing more than what is there: oh you who do nothing more than understand "great humans"! Your force should be such that you see superior beings that are a hundred miles above them! And this is what I call idealization: to see a sunrise where – a candle is lit!

Death would shine most brilliantly if it /ed us further into the other world, if we took pleasure in everything that is becoming and for that reason even in our passing away!

7 [156]

21) Noble feeling is what forbids us from being merely people who enjoy existence: it rebels against hedonism – we want to accomplish something in opposition to it! But the masses believe in their hearts that life must be lived for nothing – this is their vulgarity.

7 [157]

Judging humans from the standpoint of animals! Are we not their parasites?

7 SPRING –SUMMER 1883 263

7 [158]

22) The parasitical as essential element of the vulgar mentality.
the feeling of receiving nothing without giving something in return or of thereby receiving something in return is the noble mentality. Nothing for nothing! No "favors"! But also no sufferings, no — — —
7 [159]

23) "For the wise person, nature transforms itself into a tremendous promise" Emerson.!?? Now, you yourself are nature and you promise, along with it, something tremendous and you are probably careful not to reveal your own secret too quickly!
7 [160]

18) The gods as the cause of evil (sin and suffering) I 232!?*
So how did badness come into being where there are "good people"?
Because of fading insight — and this is often the work of the gods.!""
7 [161]

19) Aidos'?" is the impulse and inhibition against injuring gods, human beings and eternal laws: therefore the instinct of reverence as habitual among good people. A kind of disgust at injuring what is worthy of being revered.!?"
The Greek aversion to excess, in the joyful i(nstinct of) hubris, (against) any transgression of their boundaries, is quite noble — and highborn! The injury of aidos is something terrible to behold for someone accustomed to aidos.'*8
#600 = ÜPo!" satiety, to be intoxicated with happiness
Hubris and rage are mutually exclusive (Eudem. Ethicsb), for hubris presupposes a joyful condition, rage a painful one.!*°
Those who were free, moderate invented competition as an ever more sophisticated refinement of the need for the exercise of power: through competition hubris was averted: which emerges when the lust for power is not satisfi(ed) for a long time.
264 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Envy – pain over present or past happiness of friends: an entirely Greek concept!!*!

If rage is “sweeter than honey”!?? – sweeter than rage – – –
7 [162]

The devil becomes envious of anyone who suffers terribly and banishes this person into heaven.

7 [163]

14) When slaves do philosophy

What are slavish natures? The ones that do not know what is good and just, Socrates says. According to Theognis, betraying a friend is a sign of slavish mentality.

Their dependence makes it impossible for them to be truthful 1, 266133

7 [164]

Quite remarkable. Plato, Timaeus p. 86 etc. (I 281) mental illnesses brought on by faulty disposition of the body: the task of the educators and the states is to provide healing in such cases. If healing cannot be achieved in time, then the educators and the states, and not the sick, are to be held responsible 4 – – – 7 [165]

“Pathological tendency to loot temples”! Greek.

7 [166]

How little imagination we have for the suffering we inflict on others!

7 (167°

16) Present-day slavery: a barbarism! Where are those for whom they work? – We cannot expect that both complementary castes will always exist at the same time.

Utility and fun are slave-theories of life: the “blessing of work” is a self-glorification. – Incapacity for otium.’*’

7 _SPRING--SUMMER 1883 265

7 [168]

[15) Way of thinking common to old people. according to Aristotle-tle, mistrust, lack of strength of feeling,!?® fearfulness, inquiring about the utility of everything and not the moral worth.

The true joy of old age consists in being revered says Pericles.

(Simonides thought it was pleasure in profit.)!??

7 [169] The Origin" of Morality.

The moralists themselves are among the facts of morality.

When noble people employ morality When slaves and women retribution When the aged When sick and degenerate people When inactive people

Development and downfall of a morality, conditions

Mor(al) instinct.

organic function of good and evil

Conscience

7 [70]

Struggle between different moralities a means of cultivating them. Stagnant moralities (Chinese)

7 71]

12) Compassion: traced back by me to involuntary imitation of signs that are observed.

7 [172]

13) The actions that constitute the well-being of the community, of the organism, did not emerge for the sake of this purpose:

all moral customs have a prehistory – every kind of action originally had another purpose and meaning. – Just as seeing was not the goal in the emergence of the eye, and just as eyes

have in turn been used for the expression of feelings: "*"

266 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7173]

Means of self-expression, of self-disclosure – originally however the intention of self-disclosure was absent, rather all communication is actually a wanting to acquire something, a grasping and wanting to appropriate (mechanical). To incorporate

the other – later to incorporate the will of the other, to appropriate

it, this has to do with conquering the other. Self-disclosure is thus originally extending our power over the other: an ancient sign language underlies this drive – the sign is the (often painful)

imposition of one will upon another will to make ourselves understood by blows (ants)

NB. Even the injuries done to others are a sign language of the stronger

Thus, understanding is originally a sensation of pain and the recognition of a foreign power. Yet quick, easy understanding becomes very advisable (in order to receive as few blows as possible) the quickest mutual understanding is the least painful way of relating to each other: that is why it is so sought after ( negative sympathy – originally the creator's? of the herd.!?

7 [174]

8) A moral way of looking at actions – the organic functions of individuals for whom the individual is not the purpose but rather a superior principle (the superior principle can be a community): or even more so: attempt at conversion into organic functions. Wherever living things come together, there continually arises a mutual influence and a gathering together in the attempt to see whether an organism can be formed. Similarly human to human).

Yet even bad actions should be examined as having functional characteristics! their usefulness in this non-individual sense!

The organism exists by means of struggle

10) NB. The accompanying phenomena have been transformed in many respects: some things are now associated with displeasure, formerly with pleasure. Even great moments of cleverness may in earlier times have given the impression of inspiration:

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 267

an entirely different appraisal of cleverness, as demonic.

11) The pleasure in doing damage, malice, defamation, estrangement because of passion. Murderous intent. Under what circumstances natural? When pathological? Atavism?

7 [175]

9) So are laws made against wicked people? Against innovators and not against wicked and bad people!

The "bad person" is first generated as a contrast to the good person.

So even moral conscience is something relatively late, bad conscience at the same time as good conscience (continuous delight in its impulses!) therefore active!

7 [176]

Striving for happiness is foolishly interpreted by people as striving for enjoyment; and the crippling capacity to enjoy things is considered to be an argument against egoism. Hartmann p 591.4

7 [177]

Complexity of today's mor(al) feeling. In today's feeling: "ethical" is present: the drive of reverence, helpfulness, nobility, devotion, courage, piety, the drive for advantage purposefulness, for the common good

7 b]

4) On moral instinct. Most prevalent in very ancient unchanged peoples.

We do not inherit our ancestors' knowledge as animals do: as a result of great changes in lifestyle Roux 37 4° – but something of the kind is present in all nonmigratory peoples, precisely the moral instincts are the result of many similar experiences among less migratory peoples. If a great migration ensues, then the instincts are soon lost. There are a number of time-tested behavioral rules (initially attitudes and gestures, like those of defense, reverence etc.) that are instinctively chosen.

268 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 [179]

Epicurean theory. Pain ensues when a desire, a wish is inhibitedited in its satisfaction. Pleasure, the clearing away of the obstaclecle – negative. To seek pleasure – would be nonsense, would be to seek something negative! Not to suffer would be the goal instead! Where there is pleasure, an earlier displeasure can be presupposed.'46

7 [180]

6) Where the means of power are not great enough, intimidation appears, terrorism: thus any punishment for the sake of deterrence is a sign that the positively outflowing virtue of the powerful is not great enough: a sign of skepticism regarding its own power.

7) A power must stand solidly on its own two feet and have its center of gravity. Counterpart to that: Schmidt, II 269.1 To this there corresponds a kind of morality. –

7 [181]

5) Inactivity: Just to take a breath is the highest thing there is!

Otium in the best case – not creating!

7 [182]

NB. Egoism is not a moral principle, is not “Thou shalt”! for it is the only “You must.”®

7 [183]

The problem of the competition!” among different moralities: the Hellenic concept in competition with the Athenian. The community and the superpower. II p. 273.'°°

1) Competition among moralities

The masculinity of the nation is disappearing p. 274:'7! how that is manifested in the culture. Epicurus.

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 269

7 [184]

Beauty imparts the intuiting soul with the impetus that makes it capable of conceiving noble thoughts. Plato.!?

7 [185]

II 353 it is disgraceful, according to Socrates, when a good deed cannot be repaid. Thus there is no “innocent acceptance” in Greek friendship. To base our friendships on bestowing good deeds! Pericles – Athens. important!

2) Power-morality.

7 [186]

There is a continuous chain of injuries in response to injuries, even on a small scale: in war, we can no longer know who the evildoer is. Blood feud is merely the strongest expression of all such interactions among equals.'*

3 Retaliation

7 [187]

It is not unjust to rejoice at the suffering of enemies –
Socrates II p 357.5

7 [188]

Diogenes: attaining virtue requires either staunch friends or

fierce enemies.°°

7 [189] Hatred moral, envy not!"

Happiness in the harm done to enemies p 362.'

7 [190]

Struggle among tissues must lead to a balance among the parts, or else the whole perishes.

Tissues which are too vital, no matter how beneficial, bring destruction upon the whole. Tumors, e.g., are a kind of tissue

270 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

endowed with abnormal vitality: they expand to other tissues at the cost of nourishment and space and destroy the whole.

One tissue can achieve dominance, merely through the abnormal

weakening of another tissue!"

The lack of balance between tissues quickly leads to the death of individual tissues and to the elimination of them
and

of their disadvantageous qualities from the ranks of the living:

only the conditions of balance remain: in this way a harmon-ic

unity of the entire organism would be engendered by the self-elimination of the deviant tissue.

Struggle among tissues becomes a regulating principle: principle of functional self-design of the most suitable proportions.'

7 [rox]!

Among the most powerful factors governing the development of a state are not only the struggle with neighboring peoples and the development of defensive capabilities: but also the competition among members of a social class and the competition among the social classes themselves.

7 [192]

Falling silent in the presence of the beautiful is a profound

expectation, a wanting-to-hear the most delicate, distant sounds

– we act like someone who is all ears and eyes: beauty has something to say to us, that's why we fall silent and think none of our usual thoughts. The silence, that introspection, patience is thus a preparation, nothing more! This is the case with all contemplation: –

But the serenity involved, the sense of well-being, the freedom from tension? Evidently a very steady stream of force emanates from us during the process: we adjust as it were to the high colonnades through which we stroll, and we impart the kinds of movements to our soul, that through peace and gracefulness, are imitations of what we see. Just as a noble gathering inspires us to noble gestures.

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 271

7 [193]

First, assimilation into the work, later assimilation into its creator who spoke only in signs!

7 [194]

"Up to now all good characteristics of an organism have been derived solely from selection among individuals in the struggle for existence!"!%

7 [195]

Resisting the foreign, not allowing its allure to become formative – but rather setting a thick skin, hostile feelings against it: is for most people a necessity for survival. Yet the saintliest of saints live among criminals as if in their element.

– the open-mindedness! of morality therefore finds its limits wherever someone perceives the allure of the foreign to be only harmful, not stimulating.

Those who are rich in saintliness are at home among the most evil people: and all nay-saying is the province of impoverished people.

7 [196]

just as the active quantitative and qualitative variety of nutrients determines the entire development of cells so, too, does the human being choose from among the events and stimuli, thus working actively among all the random intrusions – thereby repelling many of them. Roux p. 149."

7 [197]

The parasite forces the host to encase it in a cocoon and a larger surrounding container p. 151.'°°

7 [198]

Drives are superior organs, according to my understanding: actions perceptions and states of feeling growing more entwined in each other, organizing themselves, nurturing themselves – – –

272 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 [199]

Evil people as rudimentary Schneider p 29.1"

7 [200]

Vanity and the drive for distinction have opposite origins. Just as words were considered to be congruent with things, so too what we said about people was considered to be congruent with them: we did not doubt a person's ability to know absolutely (be known absolutely)' of a person. That's why an opinion about someone was absolutely decisive: and why vanity is now only an atavism: originally this drive was not yet so debased (vain people today are skeptical about themselves) / n earlier times, the thought did not even exist that people could have a value for themselves, a concealed value. To be concerned about the good opinion of others – was identical with "being good." – Vain people subordinate themselves and want to please; those who strive for distinction want people to see them ranking themselves higher, they want to be admired.

7 [201]!°? Morality for Moralists.

Up to now, moralists can be distinguished from each other according to their prevailing biases, in this way: some are fixated on how people act toward each other; others on how people should act toward each other. But what both these kinds have in common is evident as soon as we allow them to explain the little word how? "What motives determine actions?

That is what we ask": this is what some people say. "What motives should determine human actions? This is what we ask" so say other people. That motives determine actions wherever there is action, this is their common presupposition: this is their common error; they have all done a poor job of examining the foreground of the entire moral landscape, indeed overlooked it – the fact that there is action, and that there has to be action, and that so-called motives do not provide the explanation for this.

7 SPRING --SUMMER 1883 273

7 [202]

Actual morality is infinitely more subtle, more complicated, more thoughtful than theoretical morality; the latter still stands awkward and embarrassed at the starting point.

7 [203]

All conservative powers have in themselves a kind of Jesuitism:

they believe the truth is there, seeking it is forbidden.

"Justice"

e.g., should be there!!!""

7 [204]

Utility an exalted principle! Indeed, not to be underestimated! But it concerns itself with means ("subordinate purposes") – the valuation and the code of values must already be there!"

7 [205]

Due to hunger, preferring poisoned bread to not eating at all!

7 [206]

Will as striving for pleasure: presupposes that willing itself desires its own end. Hartmann.!'?

7 [207]

That which an action achieves is what catches the eye: the motive should lie in the representation of the result of the action

(e.g., an emotional state that is achieved)

7 [208]

"What people want, without reflection, and nothing further, is pleasure: "happiness a multifaceted, depleting and lasting pleasure." (Hartmann).''?

274 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 [209]

With Epicurus everything depends on finding the proper balance of pleasure and displeasure: therefore pQdvnotc!"4

is the chief virtue, the basis: morality of prudence.

The significance of sensual pleasure is to free us from desires and needs which disturb the dtagaéia!"> of the soul.

Bliss as ultimate purpose of the individual life. Aristotle and everyone else!!7°

So it is the predominance of the concept of purpose that has corrupted all moralists up to now. "Life must really have a 'for what?""!

That even the rational conscious life is a part of the development of life without purpose – ego.

7 [210]

The actual assessment of life depends on generally prevailing moods: when they came to South Asia, the Aryans perceived all actions as suffering and all feelings likewise: profound serenity in the shadow of the highest balsam. It is a mistaken decision about where to settle, refined to the highest degree and made into a decision about the value of life. (Even the emergence of the state a matter of fatigue!)

7 lu]

Superior organs develop on the basis of drives and these organs struggle with one another for nutrition, stimuli

— — —

The hand of the pianist, the pathway to it, and an area of the brain, together make up an organ (which must close itself off to be able to contract strongly enough). Separate parts of the body telegraphically connected – i.e., drive.

Schopenhauer added the unconscious purpose to this!

7 [212]

What is essential about all actions is purposeless or indifferent

with respect to a multitude of purposes.

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 275

7 [213]

Renunciation of earthly bliss in favor of the thousand times greater heavenly bliss is good business. Christianity and its cleverness!

good in Hartmann p 26.77

Reward and punishment with Christ.

It is folly not to accept Christianity.

7 [214]

We should do good in secret so that it is not rewarded here Luke 14 (12-14) – otherwise the heavenly reward might slip away from us.!'®

7 [215]

The more hopeless and wild the conditions on earth, the more fervent the belief in heavenly reward: since a person cannot count on earthly happiness. The more superstitious the people, the more fervent the belief in hell.!"?

7 [216]

Punishment meaningless in the case of unfree will? But then we could not promise anything, could not take on obligations etc., could do nothing. Since we can confidently expect a lot of ourselves,!®° i.e., advantages are given to us. We are disadvantaged when we cannot do what we have promised: or else we are belatedly compensated for the advantages that were given to us earlier. (Punishment here as the delayed compensation of advantages that were granted to us, a revocation of social security etc., displaced into a state of enmity. Society is deceived in its assessment of punishment: it takes as much as it can from the power of the evildoer as remuneration, e.g., forced labor etc.)

7 [217]

Today I said "oh, this is a good person!" At the same time I had a feeling as if I were holding in my hand a beautiful ripe plump apple with soft skin: a feeling of tenderness, as if I were

276 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

drawn to this person: a feeling of security, as if I were allowed to rest here under a tree: a feeling of reverence, as if an object were present that could only be grasped with the cleanest hands: a feeling of satiation, as if I were liberated from dissatisfaction at a single stroke. Thus, a state corresponding to the moral judgment "good" arose in me when I thought of a certain person. It is the same as when I call a rock "hard."

7 [218]

When bliss is impossible (Hegesias), then the absence of suffering becomes the goal of life: without purpose, the goal of life was not understandable!®!

7 [219]

Common striving of all ancient philosophers for freedom of thought and for casting off all the chains of slavery. It is the atavistic nobility of idle people who have nothing more to do and let themselves decay!®?

7 [220]

Taking the avoidance of the causes of pain to its logical conclusion – this is the practice. Here we preserve the completely empty life and the thinking about this emptiness. Here the question arises: so there is no redemption from life?!®?

7 [221]

This belief in purpose leads to pessimism.

Conversely: the purpose is not to feel happy; people are led back from the false paths of life; the more we suffer, the true purpose is achieved "There is an unmistakable touch of intentionality in all of this." Schopenhauer! *4 Hartmann p. 42 "Morality a palliative against choosing a radical cure" p. 43 "the evil deeds done to us actually a blessing."

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 277

7 [222]

In cynicism the worthlessness of life is recognized, but has not yet been turned against life.

No: many minor triumphs and a big mouth are satisfying here!!⁸⁶

7 [223]

Teichmüller: feelings of pleasure or displeasure are signs of the position that the I takes as a whole, over and against individual activity: all of this is will, insofar as we consider the I as the single point of reference: the two opposing basic forms: desire and loathing. If we consider another point of reference, then the activity itself, as such, remains unconscious, yet its accompanying what becomes conscious every time, and so this what becomes a sign of that which we want to designate.

We call the accompanying ideational point of reference an evil or a good, corresponding to loathing or desire, and designate it by means of the content of accompanying sensations or intuitions. All images of our intuition and all our activities stand in particular regular relations to one another e.g., the intuition-image of the rose and the sensation of its fragrance.

In

this way, even a child designates one thing a means, another thing an accomplishment.'®'

7 [22.4]'88

First absurdity: all life is willing of a purpose

egoism is the will to our own happiness

Second absurdity: it is moral to serve a foreign will and self-denial.

thus the purpose of life does not lie in happiness: first insight!

the purpose of the ethical life should lie in the will of another.

But what then is this will of another other than a will to satisfaction?

278 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

My opinion: intentions wishes purposes are secondary –

“striving for happiness,” in general, doesn’t actually exist at all, but even striving for the happiness of others and not striv-

ing

for our own happiness ("renunciation") is not at all possible in the first place, whereas a partial striving for personal happiness is possible.

All actions yield a lot, even for others!

The individual will pursues the purpose: happiness – impossible to find it!

Thus, the individual will must adopt another will as its purpose, it is the means to another person's purpose –

But, Mr. von Hartmann! As soon as it promotes a will at all, whether our neighbor's or of the world-process – then it is certainly working to prolong misery: and indeed after it has already comprehended that all will is essentially miserable!

Hence its promotion is either madness or evil.

Yet there is a second absurdity presupposed here, that an unego-istic action is possible.

The first absurdity: all action is a willing of satisfaction

the second absurdity: there is an unegoistic action an action as not-willing of our own self, but willing of a foreign self!

7 [225]

The setting of goals is itself a pleasure – a quantum of intellectual-force is expended in means-end thinking!

7 [226]

Willing, a pressing feeling, quite pleasant! It is the accompanying phenomenon for all outpouring of force.

much the same for a// wishing in itself (entirely apart from fulfillment)

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 279

7 [227]

Let us not fail to recognize the profound lack of noblesse of feeling in Christ, his Jewishness, the tidy profits and the irritation at the stupidity of missing out on them! The Europeans have read so many nobler feelings into this! '®°

7 228]

We select the facts,^o we interpret them – unconsciously.
The wishes that stick with us – Running counter to our purposes and all conscious willing, there exists a greater kind of reason, in all our actions, much more harmony and subtlety than we consciously imagine ourselves to possess.

7 [229]

We still have not freed ourselves from the logical mania of antiquity, they prized nothing more than the dialectic – likewise “intentions” “purposes.”

7 [230]

Most people are completely incapable of experiencing anything: they haven't lived in solitude enough – an event is immediately washed away by something new. Deep pain is rare and a mark of distinction. In everyday life there is more prudence than in Stoicism. – Avoiding pain.

7 (231]

all our purposes, seen from a certain distance, become exceptional as tests and throws of the dice – there is experimenting going on.

We must preserve whatever is arbitrary illogical about our best purposes!

We would never act if we imagined all the consequences.

280 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 [232]

Weakness-of-will as consequence of disorganization and as sign of decline.

7 233]

Kant says: I endorse these sentences of Count Verri (1781 sull'indole del piacere e del dolore)'''* with complete confidence il solo principio motore dell'uomo è il dolore. Il dolore precede ogni piacere

il piacere non é un essere positivo.'''*

7 [234]

“To feel our life, to take pleasure in it – to feel ourselves continually driven to abandon our present circumstances, pain which for that reason must be as frequent as it is chronic.”!°4

7 235]

"The rational will may only lessen pain and repress needs."

—!°

7 [236]

Cardanus concluded, we must seek out as much suffering as possible in order to create a greater sum of pleasure through its elimination. !%°

7 [237]

"Shortly before the pupal stage, all actions of the larvae are directed at the preservation of the final insect, rather than at its own preservation, they do not correspond to the needs of the larval stage, but rather to those of the completely developed creature" etc. Schneider I p. 58!77

7 [238]'8

The highest principle"? of Jesuitism also that of socialism:

Ruling humankind for the purpose of satisfying it

Satisfying humankind by maintaining illusion, faith

In response my countermovement: —

7 SPRING —SUMMER 1883 281

Ruling humankind for the purpose of overcoming it.

Overcoming through teachings that bring about the downfall of humankind, except for those who survive them?"

Fundamental error up to now: "all human actions are consciously purposeful."

"the purpose of the human being is the preservation of the species and only incidentally the preservation of the person" — current theory.

This is the case, too, with people who are very individualistic—we take care of our future needs!

7 [239]

Original form of all protective movements, upon unpleasant contact drawing itself together, drawing all parts into itself. What is the psychological equivalent? In summary: pain makes us concentrate.

The drive to conceal something is shame, a protective drive: also wanting to conceal ourselves, when hummingbirds e.g., become red in the process (is an effect of fear!)

Human beings are guided by their instincts: purposes are chosen only to serve the instincts. Yet instincts are ancient habit-ual actions, ways of expending their available force.

The result achieved by an instinct should not be called "purpose"!

To give our drives completely free rein: yet often they come in conflict with one another. Actual life is a wrestling match of instincts, a growth of some, a waning of others.

"Use of stored up nervous energy."

"Which idea leads to action? That which awakens the strongest drive. Which is that? That which promises the greatest comforts, the most pleasant idea. This is not a rule which allows exceptions, but is rather a Jaw, and the dependence of the human will rests on it" Schneider p. 75

! But the drive itself first called forth this idea! – I say.

Thus: drives decide the expenditure of accumulated force, not that action is undertaken in the first place. The how? is the province of the drives.

282 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Thus: when we become aware of a drive, it promises pleasure. Promised pleasure as the cause of action? – Not of action in the first place, but only of the specific direction of the agent!

So, too, Stendhal.

Thus: wherever ideas lead to action, there the person must follow the idea that promises the most pleasure: the strongest drive decides the choice.

Accordingly, morality must be changed 1) first, the accumulation of force must be considered 2) second, the expenditure of force, the how?

The first principle, overlooked up to now.?"!

7 [240]

First fact: society kills, tortures, robs??? freedom, robs property-commits violence through restrictions on education; through schools; lies, deceives, harasses (as police) – therefore all of this cannot be regarded as bad in itself. – Society desires its preservation and advancement – this is not a sacred purpose: it fights for this against other societies. – Thus all of this happens for the sake of utility. But mad! Precisely these actions should be accorded special veneration and respect:

 as
 “justice,” ethics, preservation and cultivation of the good.
 That here the needs of the many are prioritized over those
 of the few, this would only make sense if we assume that the individual cannot have more value than all of society! Yet
 the intention here, from the start, is to prevent such individuals from emerging at all: the image of human beings that is used as the measuring stick for the preservation of the common good is already available. The assumption of society must be that it represents the supreme type “human,” and from this
 it derives its right to fight against all that is hostile to it as what is hostile in itse/f – Without this faith in itself, society
 is “immoral” in every sense. Yet until it has faith, it does not determine what should be moral. – it makes sense this way!
 7 SPRING–SUMMER 1883 283
 7 [241] (End Justifies the Means.)
 There are actions that we will never allow ourselves to engage in, not even as means to the noblest?TM end e.g., betraying a friend.
 Better to perish and trust that there will be more favorable circumstances for achieving our noblest end. – But what sort of noblest end is involved in preserving a community, a state!
 The action of one person who sacrifices the state in order not to betray his ideals can be the noblest accomplishment of all, whereby the entire existence of this state becomes a matter for posterity!
 7 [242]
 Presupposition made by the state up to now: “the human being should not develop further, the mold is there!” The Catholic Church (the oldest of all forms of the state in Europe) now best represents the ancient state!

7 [243]

Trade requires a patriciate: therefore a counterweight.

7 [244]

The point of punishment is the elimination of parasitic humans.

Birds that keep parasites away from a buffalo, live off it – thankful that they signal to him the arrival of an enemy. –

Meaning of the police. Espinas p. 159.74

7 [245]

Incessantly busy listening and paying attention to one another and thereby the feeling of security – p 162.7

7 [246]

Affection the consequence of a fervent need?

284 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 [247]

Tracing punishments in their kind and essence back to war or to sacrificial cults (human sacrifice)

In one case, the fundamental thought behind punishment is return to precommunal conditions, in another case, mockery of the gods. Post I, 201207

A punishment meted out to unfree people becomes demeaning for that reason e.g., lashes as punishment). The punishment meted out to free people has long been regarded as ennobling for that reason. Post I 214.7%

7 [248]

“– the only direct value judgment we presuppose is that of sensualistic well-being, and we believe everything else to be indirectly realizable through a connection to this direct willing. Observance of laws, morality, religion is supposed to be induced by reference to well-being in this world or the next”

Baumann p. 32.70?

Universal belief in the value of sensualistic well-being: every action should be a path or a detour to this.

7 [249]

Legal prohibitions only make sense when there is no need to achieve something in this way that is prohibited: in other words, if there is another way – i.e., very specific promises and concessions are a part of all prohibitions.

7 [250] The center of gravity

210 shifts in word, in use, in respect –

7 [251]

“the good of all with exclusion of the individual” Hartmann p 6057"! pathetic hypocrisy!

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 285

7 [252]

That the difference between a scoundrel and an honorable man does not consist only in a few differently convoluted brain movements –

7 [253]

Strength of character. To take in very many stimuli and to let them have a deep effect, to allow oneself to be distracted almost to the point of being lost, to suffer very much and – nevertheless to persevere in our general direction.

Typical strong character types are cold, shallow and devoid of sympathy: they also do not take possession of other people.

Plastic force.

7 [254]

Our choice is greatest wherever our practice and our spontaneous energy is greatest: it is the readiest docility and agility in the one who obeys (free will perceived most strongly, wherever we are the least creatively restricted) Baumann p. 18.1

7 [255]

A book of sayings and quotations

a book of anecdotes. A book of facts. Jokes.

7 [256]

Egoism is not a principle, but rather the one fact.

7 [257]

From the standpoint of purpose, as much is squandered in every action as from the heat of the sun radiating into the universe.

286 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

7 [258]

The individual as fruit of the communal entity, not always as means.

7 59]

Every condition may be considered as if it had been purpose, or as means or as a misstep in an experiment.

7 [260]

Satisfaction of a drive is not to be sought in the result of an activity, but rather in the performance of it.

Happiness would be the equilibrium of the triggering activities of all drives.

7 [261]

Experimentation as true character of our lives and of every morality: something voluntary ??? must be involved!

7 [262]

Origin of Christianity among collectives of the poor. Baumann

p. 227!4 divine aid and mutual support.

7 [263]?

The idea of an action's joyful beneficial result brings joy, exhilaration, blood flows more freely. In this way the purpose of an activity has an additional exhilarating, pleasurable force during the action.

Thus: the activity of the drive is tied to pleasure. The goal of the activity is imagined and causes pleasure in the same way that increasing the activity does (the goal is the activity of another drive). But the drive itself does not will a result of what it does. Our drive to understand certainly takes pleasure in determining the purpose – this is its activity; just as it does in devising the means – logical pleasure in all actions.

7 SPRING-SUMMER 1883 287

In every action many drives are active.

At the very least

1) the one that finds satisfaction in doing

2) the one that finds satisfaction in setting end and means

3) the one that finds satisfaction in anticipating success.

The drive finds satisfaction i.e., it is active when it takes control of stimuli and transforms them. In order to take control of them, it must struggle: i.e., it must hold back another drive, subdue it. In truth, it always exists as an active drive:

but nourishing it engenders /arger amounts of force, so that even its output of force must be different. Yet the drive itself is nothing other than a particular way of being active: a personification.

7 [264]
 Effect of reward and punishment p. 31 Baumann.?!¢

7 [265]
 A stimulus is in itself neither pleasure nor displeasure, but it can certainly be accompanied by pleasure or displeasure
 there cannot be a middle ground that would be neither pleasure nor displeasure! – what is “not pleasure” is just not pleasure!

7 [266] Will as the form-giver?

7 [267]
 Satisfaction: the word presupposes discord and awakens prejudice.

7 [268]2!”

1. Innocence of becoming: without purpose.
2. Action, drive, pleasure, free will.

in the meantime the economy of our drives far outstrips our insight.
 the essentially erroneous self-observation within all agents has turned into morality.

288 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

“Individual as result.” Collective conscience.

6. Punishment, revenge, the responsibility. (End justifies means)

Morality as sign language of the body.

8. Taking possession of history under the guidance of stimuli and drives – there is no “objective history.”
9. Evil a precursor of the good: that which is creative and those who create: the new value judgment and its history.
 The organic function of evil. (Humankind as mass of force which increases and must expend itself)
10. “Living for others” and the “unegoistic”

Hartmann, p. 593

7 [269]
 Much less intention in our deeds than we pretend (vanity in assuming purpose!). Emerson, p. 99.7!

7 [270]
 The future of humanity not that delicate a concept. Against this p. 599.71?

7 [271]

With an "in order to" an action is deprived of its value.

7 [272]

"Good" "bad" corresponds to the states of those who judge.'""°

7 [273] The individual as multiplicity.

7 [274]

Point of departure: the denial of moral significance – Birth of Tragedy.

[8 = Mp XVII ra. Summer 1883]

8 [i]

The Tonga-islanders cut off their little fingers as a sacrifice.!

In the Orient a woman covers her face when surprised while bathing – in this way decency is maintained!

Shame prohibits women in China from showing their feet, among the Hottentots they merely need to cover the backs of their necks."

White is the color of mourning in China.'

The ancient civilized peoples of the Americas were not familiar with milk.'

The Chinese eat very many dishes in very small portions.

No. 29.

People do not want to take on the flaws of animals e.g., the cowardice of the stag (in Borneo) – women and children are permitted to eat them.'

Even bats frogs worms larvae caterpillars are eaten. Rats that have been fattened up a delicacy of the Chinese. "Eating tiger hearts makes you headstrong" (Java) Dog livers make you clever.

The Siamese, e.g., eat incredible amounts of rice.°

8 [2]

– just as the bald eagle sits proudly and serenely above the falls of the Niagara and frequently dives into its churning mist'

290 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

– just as the albatross abandons itself to the ocean for weeks at a time: the king of the birds

– just as the condor of the Andes at soundless heights (it can glide through the air for over an hour without beating its wings)?

Serenity of the one who flies?

8 [3]

What a difference we observe in walking swimming and flying! And still it is one and the same motion: it is merely that the carrying capacity of the earth differs from that of water which in turn differs from that of air! Thus we should also learn to fly as thinkers – and not suppose that when we do this we are becoming fantasizers!!°

8 [4]"

The authority of Sir Andrew Aguecheek in Shakespeare: "I am a great eater of beef, and I believe that does harm to my wit"?

8 (s)!3-14

Punishments among the Germanic tribes: to have a millstone dropped on someone's head (mythical), quartering by horses, trampling by horses; to be boiled in oil or wine (14th and 15th century); similarly in the Middle Ages being buried alive, walled in, starved. The rack (purely Germanic), flaying alive (cutting strips out of skin). To abandon someone smeared with honey to the flies and the hot sun. To hack off the right leg and the left arm. Nose, ears, lips, tongue, teeth, eyes, private parts.!!>

8 [6]!6

Matrilineage: children do not belong in the father's family, but in that of their mother's brother. The father belongs to another family: father and son in a hostile relationship. The father marries into a foreign family and in it he is solely a breeder, and little more than a slave. – Patrimony is nothing self-evident but rather a late-attained legal institution. The moral bond between father and child is lacking! The father is not considered related to his children by blood. The umbilical cord is the family bond.

8 SUMMER 1883 291

In associations of blood relatives there is neither individual crime, nor individual property, nor marriage. Only the extended family has rights and privileges. Women are communal property like children. Yes there are situations where there are no personal relationships, instead only groups are related. – Group marriages.

Legal subjects are now so-called “natural persons,” the individuals:

they are the bearers of rights and obligations.

An old Chinese man said, he heard that when kingdoms are about to perish they have many laws.

Marriage with a bad conscience: before they marry, women must undergo a time of concubinage, they must be deflowered. They must give themselves to members of the tribe before belonging to one man.

Last vestige the jus primae noctis” of chieftains or even priests (as with the Buddhists in Cambodia)

Concubines enjoy high standing in some parts of Africa, in India and in Java, they have remained true to the gods of the people. –

In this place, a husband supports, along with his wife, all of her sisters, in that place all brothers have a single wife.

Among animals the young females[®] are unadorned, beauty is the province of males – those who desire and fight become beautiful.

in our culture,!? women make “conquests”

The superior beauty of women among humans proves that here women are the ones who fight and feel desire; they easily understand how to conquer men. Among animals masculine intelligence is enhanced by the sex drive. –

In Athens the men were more beautiful than the women – according to Cicero: yet this is probably a consequence of the great dedication to beauty, under the influence of pederasty.

With the emergence of individual marriage a new obligation emerges, by which brothers and sisters, father-in-law and daughter-in-law, mother-in-law and son-in-law, brother-in-law and sister-in-law, may not speak, eat with one another, indeed,

9

292 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

may not even see one another. – In earlier times the mother and daughter were often married off together. – Hostility and coldness are among the obligations wherever individual obligations emerge. Animosity immediately appears whenever love does. Human love in general has yet to exist without intense hatred.

For a long time, marital fidelity had the appearance of being immoral.

Women as property, which the stronger man can take away from the weaker at any time. A test of strength decides the matter. Only the chieftains and priests have the beautiful women.

Young people must be satisfied with insignificant old women.

–

Abduction the customary means of acquiring a woman. the engagement ring as a remnant of the chains in which the abducted woman was dragged away Originally absolute “coldness and indifference” between spouses. The woman has been bought or abducted. In addition, the secret reproach of conscience concerning marriage as something unnatural and immoral: spouses live essentially apart, not sharing table and bed. Separation of the sexes the basic idea behind Chinese marriage. The house (has) two parts:

the husband lives in the outer part, the wife in the inner part.

The door should be carefully secured. Each must die alone. It is the separatio quoad thorum et mensam”? carried to completion.

Higher associations of lineal collectives: Many small communities with no contact at all with each other, of ten separated by large forests, owing fealty and levies to a chief who does not interfere in the internal administration of the small communities

(as today in India and Sumatra). This kind of community is as closed as possible from within: the Greek 26Ac,”!

Oldest division of classes according to age: piety.

The Tupinambazis fattened up their prisoners of war secured with long ropes and provided them with sex slaves, until they were fat enough to be eaten.

8 SUMMER 1883 293

8 [7]?

Joking and high-handed treatment of other people used to have a dreadful meaning for us: namely of prisoners of war. Of the insane: even old Don Quixote! Laughter is originally the expression of cruelty.

8 [8]?

One person originally: priest sorcerer doctor judge chief-tain. Rain peace good weather good harvests fat calves – but also birth defects plague misfortune in war or the hunt, bad weather.

Contempt for old age because of weakness in war and hunting. Killing of twins, at least of one of them. Twins are seen as proof of adultery (e.g., among the Caribs) Even the Germanic tribes had this way of thinking. – This multiplicity regarded as bestial, similar to rats and bitch-dogs.

Here and there it is still considered shameful to bear daughters.

Ancient Germanic custom: the baby lies on the ground until the father declares whether he will allow it to live or not. If he does not pick it up, it is left to die – just as among Fiji-Islanders

The chieftains are liable for the conduct of women and children, for damages done by slaves and animals. For blood debts" incurred by one of his own; he must pay their debts. Dowries. A completely different conscience emerges in such people.

Even now still the case in princes and statesmen.

For a long time, responsibility separated from conscience!

8 [9]

'Type of primitive family collective: a group of relatives descended from the same ancestral mother, living with women, children and property completely in common, so that there is no marriage between individuals, no individual patrimony or parenthood; all members equally closely related, all property, movable and immovable, as communal, all work communal; all production consumed communally, all debts communal debts of the

 294 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS collective, all blood relatives active in every blood feud and obligated by the blood guilt of a blood relative. Foreigners taken in through adoption.
 Kin-groups and tribes take precedence over lineage. Housekinships fundamentally different from this as associations
 of descendants from the same ancestral father. Hardly a primitive construct: corporate group of men and women, children and slaves, united under the patriarchal authority of a chieftain or house father. With its own gods, justice-system government, inalienable land. Not bound to the existence of individual members, preservation of the house-community first duty: and pressure to divorce an infertile woman: celibacy as punishable:
 when the husband was impotent, the wife had the duty to conceive a child with one of his male relatives."
 Any place where the organization depends on blood ties, there are blood feuds: the collective life of the association comes to be expressed as force that is incomprehensible and transcends the individual, object of religious reverence.
 Basic tendency: the balance is restored between two families;
 individual guilt is irrelevant, it is war between families. As
 the state apparatus develops, the line blurs between blood feuds and acts of revenge against the perpetrator." Presupposition for blood feuds is initially that it is a family matter: to begin with, the territorial overlordship or the state does not get involved.® But it already presupposes the superior organization: it is a duel between equals, belonging to a single whole. Enmity toward the family of someone with blood guilt is fundamentally different from enmity toward anything nor belonging to the superior communal organization. Absent is the contempt, the belief in the inferior race of the enemy:

in
the blood feud there is honor and equal status.
Outlawing: a member is expelled from the social collective;
he is now completely without rights. Life and property can be taken (from him) by anyone. The evildoer can be killed by anyone without retribution. Basic feeling: deepest contempt,
8 SUMMER 1883 295
unworthiness e.g., still in Islamic law in cases of heresy or blasphemy against the Prophet: while in cases of murder and corporeal injury it acknowledges only blood feud and compensation within the social collective. It is ostracism: hearth
and home are destroyed, women and children and whoever lives in the house are killed, e.g., in the Peruvian empire of the Incas
whenever a sun virgin transgressed with a man her entire family and relatives had to pay for it with their lives, the house of her parents was razed to the ground etc. The same in China when a son kills his father.??
Therefore: offenses that put the existence of the community at risk provoke outlawing: the rotten offshoot is eradicated.
What is regarded as such an irrevocable and fundamentally contemptible act varies according to what is regarded as a condition of the community's existence – and therefore can be very different in different communities."
In practice all kinds of mitigation emerge, e.g., the offender is allowed time to withdraw by fleeing. Exile and confiscation
of property are its furthest branches. In particular, punish-
ments involving denunciation have their origin here.*!
Social collectives: associations for protection and defense
in which the members guarantee each other's lives and property, in which disturbers (of the) peace are expelled from the peace, in which children, women, goods and guilt are held in common – most ancient form.
Formation of the state: a kingdom severed from the basis of blood relations, a public state justice-system, individual property, individual arrest for crime and debts – most recent form. –

The more surely an organic entity, e.g., a community herd comes to self-awareness, the stronger its hatred of what is foreign.

Sympathy for those who belong and hatred of what is foreign grow in tandem.

In regard to the continuity of communal life and the quantity of thoughts which it calls forth: how limited is the extent of the role played by purposes and images related to the essence of the individual self! Social drives far outweigh individual ones.

296 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Animals perform self-destructive acts that benefit the group.??

To use the current language of morality (but corresponding to fundamentally different feelings), animal societies are based upon love, constancy of affection, education of the young, work, frugality, courage, obedience by the weak, solicitude by the strong, sacrifice by all? No society can survive without such qualities, and these drives are inherited by the society that survives: at a certain level of strength they would make society dull: but internal antagonistic forces arise in proportion to increasing external security. And once a condition of external peace is achieved, then society disintegrates into individuals.

Tension develops that had previously existed between communities.

Only then does compassion come into existence – as feelings between individuals who perceive themselves as such.

(The

altruistic acts of those unified primitive societies presuppose an

I-feeling, but a collective-I, and differ fundamentally from communal-passion.) Maybe one family first felt something like compassion and respect for another family within a larger collective, thus not for individuals. Here is the origin of compassion. My opinion:

blood feuds are the oldest form of this respect for another family: as opposed to the absolute feeling of enmity.

8 [10]

Even "savages" are indescribably advanced humans, when measured in the longest span of time.

8 [x]*4

Human beings originally altruistic, more than any animal

– hence their slow development (children) and sophisticated training, hence also the extraordinary ultimate kind of egoism. – Predators have much more individuality.

8 [12]

Atavism: joyful feeling, for once being able to obey unconditionally.

8 SUMMER 1883 297

"Thou shalt allow thyself to be exploited, robbed, lied to" the fundamental feeling of the Catholic priest-state, especially perfected in Jesuitism. sacrificio dell'intelletto" ancient and original – yet not perceived as sacrifice, but rather as the opposite, as agony

–

8 [13]

Yes, the philosophy of right! This is a science which, like all moral sciences, is not even in diapers yet! E.g., the oldest meaning of punishment has yet to be recognized, not even by jurists who imagine themselves to be freethinking – it is completely unknown: and as long as jurisprudence fails to establish itself on new ground, namely in history and comparative studies of peoples, it will remain trapped in dreary battles between thoroughly false abstractions that fancy themselves these days to be

"philosophy of right" and that are completely derived from contemporary h(umans). Yet contemporary h(umans) are such a convoluted web, even in regard to their leg(al) valuations, that this philosophy allows for the most varied interpretations.

8 [14]

My first solution: Dionysian wisdom.

Dionysian: temporary identification with the principle of life (including the sensuality of martyrs).

Delight in the destruction of the noblest people and at the sight of how they gradually come to grief

as delight in what is to come, the future, which triumphs over what is there, still so good"

8 [is]?

The Greeks as Connoisseurs of Human Nature.

The simplifying, the aversion to what is complicated, and to minor details

The logicizing, the presupposing of something logically comprehensible even with respect to character

298 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

The idealizing ("beautiful and young"), the aversion to the atypical, the unconscious lying (taking sides against oneself, a certain generosity, is lacking)

The political necessity of making ourselves commonly understood: the lack of hidden individuals II 398, of restrained feelings (those called disreputable because of aversion to action

II 401).38

The competition. Feelings, with which every philosopher wanted to beat down his opponents – through the practical proof that he was the happiest. "Virtue is happiness" – from Socrates onwards, all psychological observation has refuted?

this; they defend themselves (the "feeling for facts" only developed as reaction in agon with the mythical sensibility, not as an original force).

(Perhaps they were simpler? – But the enormous abundance of different individuals.)

The nobility (yewatos meaning roughly "naive!"): instinctive action and judgment are good form; self-gnawing and self-decomposition is ignoble.

Their will to the "universally human," even initially to the universally Greek – their sense of being the opposite of barbarians

Evil people encounter part reverence, part compassion; they themselves are not yet consumed by worms – the whole destructive churning self-contempt is lacking.

The “useless” waste of energy (in any kind of agon) as ideal to which the state aspires (as opposed to the Romans); they have little understanding for impetus arising out of pressing circumstances, while the Indians (Brahmans), through lack of initiative, feel “all action is suffering.”

Stoicism would not have been possible at all in a morally enlightened world. – Every word of B. Gracián? or La Rochefoucauld or Pascal has the whole of Greek taste against it. they complain and leave it at that (the pessimism of Homer P « . » . « . O » Sophocles Epicurus – “evasion” perceived as “divine”).

8 SUMMER 1883 299

thus: they suffer to the greatest degree, but they react to it with such intense self-satisfaction in creating and also in speaking of things that are beneficial.

they are the people most susceptible to pain, but their formative power in using the pain is extraordinary: this also involves moderation in avenging pain, in wallowing in pain: a need for a victorious attitude, as cure. Consequently they are inclined to be dishonest about suffering: and in this way “their sensibility” became less visible in proportion to the increasing visibility of the conquering affects, brilliant intellectuality and courage. Obsession with slander required the concealment of passions.

Thucydides as the greatest example of sidestepping the national aversion to anatomical treatment.

During the period of greatest productivity in forms, reflection is still missing from opposites (like Dionysian-Apollonian):

the facts are there.

The fine arts develop much later. To which can be added philosophy from Socrates onwards: – a drive to return from multiplicity back to a few types.

goal of the philosophers lively portrait of the most superior humans.

Among the philosophers absolute lack of a history of moral value judgments.

Antipathy to allowing another type to gain legitimacy.

(let's consider Plato: he denies greatness in everything else!

Homer, the fine arts, prose, Pericles – and in order to tolerate Socrates, he reconstructs him!)

General impression: a certain superficiality in the psychological

(as opposed to Shakespeare and Dante and Goethe, as opposed to all of the French from Montaigne to Balzac, as opposed to Gracián (Christian skepticism) Italians J(acob) B(urckhardt) even the Indic peoples are more profound in their analysis of the suffering human being).

But perhaps they were indeed simpler human beings? This idea fits with "the youth of humankind" etc.

300 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Precisely here is the danger of a major error and mistaken conclusion. Suppose that the fine arts of the Greeks had perished and we had been limited to the judgments of the philosophers: what a mistaken conclusion!

And likewise: all of their aesthetic judgments are far below the level of their creations.

So a discrepancy might be possible: that the Greeks' knowledge of human nature lagged way behind the actual wealth of types and individuals: that they might have been only faintly aware of their "humanity."

It is probably the case that never have so many different individuals gathered in such a small space and allowed themselves to perfect their peculiarities through competition. Yet if we examine the national peculiarities of their intellect: then it seems probable that their knowledge of human nature remained hampered. All their great powers worked to hamper this. This is my thesis.

Plato's unconstrained approach to Socrates (like his bust in Naples)

The unconstrained approach for coming to grips with Socrates (just like Xenophon)

in types, the decline of the individual (Homer Orpheus etc.) Antipathy toward exactness. Poetry far superior to history:
 the latter treats human beings in general, the former their particularities. For that reason, poetry better suited for gaining knowledge of human beings. "The essential things repeat themselves, there is nothing new, there is no development" – this is authentically Greek. Absent is all reflection about different futures. What do anachronisms matter! hundreds of characteristics fly at great persons and they stick.
 Conclusion. The whole Hellenic essence is deeper than supposed. Little can be done with testimonies. Historical facts, actions are more important, e.g., for their ethics, than all their words. We have yet to decipher the Hellenic essence: it is still essentially alien.

8 SUMMER 1883

301

we would offend their taste
 our knowledge of human nature shameless our technology tBgic*! opposed to nature our science petty-hucksterish untruthful, because so much about us is imperceptible II 399. universal suffering of modern people: "self-diminution" p.
 399.

Drives of their intellect and their senses Drives and feelings from the political sphere the best developed instinct of their entire morality
 Introduction

- 1) The simplifying (they are so comprehensible), delight in overlooking secondary features, energy to make one feature the focus.
 - 2) The logicizing: a kind of enchantment (dialectic as something divine. Antigone's verse).
 - 3) The idealizing ("beautiful and young") the feeling that we satisfy in the great outdoors they satisfy among people.
 - 4) The feeling of nobility they* trusted themselves to determine correct self-worth
- II 397. Unfair to the humble. Nemesis: to think oneself worthy of great things of which others are not worthy.

5) The atmosphere of political clarity, the necessity of making themselves commonly understood.

6) The agonal feeling that wants to triumph before an audience and that must be understandable by this audience. (Which is why such different individuals excessively profess to be “universally human.”

Judgment of the awakening “factual sense” as itself a consequence of the agon. Praise of Thucydides.

302 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

In the mouth of a Greek it was paradoxical to claim to see the epitome of perfection in the sphere, they don't like curva-ture and roundedness.

The feelings they have for nature are much more closely related to a religious sensibility than ours are. In our case, the main thing is always that we are liberated from humans – we seek feelings that we do not have among humans.

I discovered what it means to be Greek: they believed in the eternal recurrence! This is the mystery-faith!

(passage in Cratylus)

Plato believes the dead in Hades are true philosophers, liberated from the body.

yv@d1 oavtón,® but not humans to read for subtext*4 nodove TAdtov, SniodEv te TAGtwv pécon te Xiparea.4

Purposes.

Their weakness points to their strength.

They are actors. For their intellect, willing and being converge.

8 [16] Superior humans, their self-redemption and self-preservation.

8 [17]

the appreciation of truth among the powerful (among the oppressed as revenge, vindication – Spinoza).

Self-overcoming of morality.

8 [18]

the preservation of the species reminted as moral principle!

8 SUMMER 1883 303

8 [x]*°

To completely emancipate absolute necessity from purposes: otherwise we may not even experiment and sacrifice ourselves and let ourselves go! It is the innocence of becoming*” and nothing else that gives us the greatest courage and the greatest freedom!

8 [20]

I write for myself: and what's the point of writing in this age

that has been written to death? little: for, apart from scholars,

no one knows how to read anymore, and even scholars – – –

8 [21]

Our age has implanted new eyes in order to see suffering everywhere: and with a monstrous hypnotic fixed gaze which has had its equal just once before in history and which forces

the gaze of beholders in the same direction – – –

When I was young, I was essentially one of the world-deniers and pessimists; which is understandable and forgivable in an age that seems tailor-made for driving youth to despair. The more a young man suffers on account of his own becoming, the more he wants to fit into the whole, complete and finished;

he wants security above all, stability: yet this age has been thought to death by the thoughts of all ages, it is mistrustful, with a mistrust that has never yet existed among humans, and for that reason this age is often tired of thinking, often tired of mistrusting, often senile and "tentative" in its yes and in its no:

for this age presumes (a) yes in every case, where – – –

Here, then, the decisive protest of an individual like Scho-penhauer against the whole of existence as a redemption: it simplifies

304 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

8 [22]

Every human being we meet stimulates certain drives in us (fear trust etc.) Uninterrupted movement of our drive-life through the outside world (nature): entirely apart from the uninterrupted registering and absorption of electrical atmospheric effects.

8 [23]*® good people"

Since every drive is unintelligent, "utility" is not a consideration for it at all. Every drive, by being active, sacrifices force

and other drives: it is eventually constrained; otherwise it would ruin everything, through dissipation. Thus: that which is "unegoistic" sacrificial imprudent is nothing special – it is common to all drives – they do not think about the benefit of the whole ego (because they don't think!) they act "contrary to our benefit," against the ego and often for the ego – innocent in both!

8 [24]°°

In philosophy we seek an image of the world that makes us feel freest; i.e., in which our most powerful drive feels free in its activity. This will be the case even with me!

8 [25]""

The nonsense of all metaphysics as a derivation of the conditioned from the unconditioned.

The nature of thinking includes conceiving, inventing the unconditioned as an addition to the conditioned: just as thinking conceives, invents the "I" as an addition to the multiplicity of its processes: it measures the world with benchmarks posited solely by itself: in connection with its basic fictions like

"unconditioned," "means and ends," things, "substances," with logical laws, with numbers and shapes.

There would be nothing called knowledge if thinking had not first re-created the world into "things," self-identicals.

8 SUMMER 1883 305

It is due to thinking that there is untruth.

Thinking is underivable, so too are perceptions: but that is far from proving them to be original or "existing in themselves"!

rather, this only establishes that we cannot get beyond them, because we have nothing but thinking and perceiving.

8 [26]? The Innocence of Becoming."

A Guide to Liberation from Morality.4

By Friedrich Nietzsche.

Introduction.

I. The Fundamental Errors of Morality.

II. Morality as Sign Language.'

III. The Overcoming of Morality and its Replacement.

8 [276

Anyone who advances rationality thereby also infuses new energy into forces that oppose it, into mysticism and folly of every sort.

In every movement to distinguish

1) where it is partly fatigue from a preceding movement (satiation from it, malice of the weakness toward it, illness

2) where it is partly a newly awakened, long dormant, accumulated force, joyful, arrogant, violent: good health.

[9 = N VI 2. May-June 1883]

9 [x]

Your spring pours forth too mightily; it empties the cup at the same time it wants to fill it."

Peels and clamshells and whatever other playful things fall from the table of life?

Your good deeds should fall like dew on the grass, then, when the night is most secretive.*

I expect and want goodness especially from you, who I think is capable of any evil?

You should call advantage and need what advantage and need are and keep the name of virtue holy.

What makes your actions good is not their reason or purpose, but rather whether your soul trembles and shines when you do them.'

How could any act of mercy be performed if it did not mean: taking injustice upon ourselves?

If your shoulders are broad enough for the task, then don't hesitate, add the injustices of others to your own: and your mercy will be praised.

Knowing: this means: understanding all things as being to our best advantage!

"I will this," "thou shalt," "he must" – that's how they understand I you and he."

Experience approaches me imperiously: but no sooner has it been experienced than it is already on its knees.®

9 MAY-JUNE 1883 307

Do you feel the thirst and the hot breath of the sun? It wants to be nursed by the ocean. Do you see the ocean's lust rise with a thousand breasts? It wants to be kissed and nursed by the thirst of the sun?

9 [2]

To believe in Schopenhauer's will – this requires a very strong will to believe! 9 [31° Midnight's brilliance was all around me, solitude looked at me with drunken tired eyes.

 – my voice screamed out of me –
 Deathly silence slept and snored'' in its sleep.
 There lay sleeplessness and midnight with drunken eyes.
 There lay solitude and deathly silence at its side: both slept and snored. 9 [4]? God stopgap.
 Onward to immortality
 9 [5]
 On the shame of the gift-giver.
 About justice (proletarians). On intoxication. The newer convents etc.
 Historical education – “I speak freely.”
 Honesty of the pitiable. Genius's!
 “Punishments” as enmity toward the enemies of our ideals.
 Temporary “marriage” –
 9 [6] slamming the door
 308 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 how ridiculous it would be if you wanted to convert to my cause!'
 You come to me, and I don't want you: but as I must give, so you must take!
 “Party liner”!° – I want to turn this into an insult.
 I want to be a white steer and pull the plow: wherever I lie, there should be serenity and the earth should smell of earth.
 Wildly the eagle beats its wings: but its surge!” founders on my will.
 They no longer experience anything: their skin is barely scratched. Events sit on their skin like mosquitoes. – Thus h(umans) remain heavy and the same, like a stone in the sun.
 Church: simulated light, sweetened seriousness of the incense, being seduced into false fears, I can't stand the soul who – kneels to its God above.
 I looked into life as into an eye.
 Monk in the moon, you wet-cheeked one! Pll never call you the “man” in the moon! Lecherously you creep from window to window around all dark corners! you most jealous tomcat of all, jealous of all lovers, you grin through each window into the room within.

971"

They want to use their virtues to claw out the eyes of their enemies.

They engage in vice because they cannot create.

They — —

9 [8] The dances of Zarathustra.

9 [9]

I wanted to be the philosopher of unpleasant truths — for six years!

9 MAY-JUNE 1883 309

9 [10]!

For too long I belonged to solitude: thus I have unlearned silence.

I have become nothing but mouth and the roar of a stream from high cliffs: I want to send my words cascading into the valleys.

I hate all nightwatchmen and guardians of the graves and anyone else who blows a dismal horn.

I long for something and I watch — and now you come, my eagle: did you see no one, — — —

I laugh at your free will and even at your unfree will: there is no will. A delusion is born out of pain and contemplation — that's what we call "will."

9 [11]?°

I look down into the ocean: it lies placidly and out of it an image looks treacherously back at me.

In its arms the ocean holds a priceless image with white breasts: it steals languidly and treacherously across the sand, so that — — — in this way, ocean and an image of the future lure me

Languidly and treacherously the ocean moved away from its white breasts.

The sand has covered half the image and the jealousy of the wave the other half.

9 [12]

Determinism is to be eliminated in this way:

I want to submit myself to the judgment of certain h(umans): it should be my education, spur me on and discourage me — all as a means of getting an ideal to prevail and making it dominant.

Organic = moral, is the solution to the problem of morality. Initially, individuals are honored insofar as they evoke a type: e.g., "the priest," "the hero" etc. – only later, insofar as they are "a person alone."

310 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

There are moralities which make a virtue out of becoming not an individual, but rather a type! finally, becoming one
in feeling with a revered type of the people.

9 [1a]?!

The ring's thirst to reach itse/fagain – I thirst for it.??

9 [14]?

Your minds were not yet a source of worry and heartache:
your bread of life is not yet soured by thoughts.

As a hunter Zarathustra set forth, to hunt ugly truths.

The hand moved forward and the clock of my life) took a breath: then it spoke: now the hour has come to preach redemption from redeemers.

9 [15]

How I sought to understand everything that is human, at one point even wretched and mediocre people

Now and then even the wretched become honest: then it is advisable to listen to their voices and to climb into their swamp.

And at one point I, too, sat down among the reeds and heard the frogs of wretchedness make their confessions.

You people claim to be of sturdier stuff? I say to you, you are only better at deluding yourselves.

He came to us, he lived among us – we ourselves were his underworld.

Believe me, Zarathustra) died and is no more. A star burned out in barren space: but its light – – *

9 [16]

Destroy for me these godly grinning masks! was I made to play the fool by a godly grin and did (I) forget the entrails

with which the masks were stuffed?

Rip up for me the skins on which a god's soul seemed to play!

9 MAY-JUNE 1883 311

Serpent entrails and serpent filth ooze from the hidden body of the lizard: the coiled-up ringed putrid-smelling thing

a horrid ringed worm has crept into the mask of a god.

holy laughter

9.117)

You see only my sparks: but you do not see the anvil that I am.

And I prefer to sleep on ox hides than on the bed of your complacency and love, — — —

You are tools and watches to me: thus I want to wind you up with my ridicule and you shall purr with contentment as I do it.

I do not want to turn you into stone with serpent locks of fear: I protect myself from you with my shield "Beauty." My image of the most beautiful shall strike you dumb.

I do battle with the dragon of the future: and you puny people, you shall do battle with earthworms.

9 [18]

You are adept and have clever fingers: but you have no idea how to make a fist!

Not until your clever fingers creep back into a fist will I want to believe in your power."

His eye flashes golden: a golden bark"® floats there upon dark waters:"?

In his eyes (he) crouches low and leaps high again in dance and you, who carry him — — —

To me you are arid grass and steppe: but I want to make wildfires of you and heralds with tongues of flame.°*°

When this moon rose, I thought that it wanted to give birth to a sun: it lay there on the horizon so wide and heavy with young.

But to me the moon is a liar, this barren one, with its pregnancy, and it is neither woman nor man.?!

312 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

9 [r]

a strange cock, pecked at by hens"

he rose like a moon, but stayed lying languidly on the horizon.?

Anyone who knows horses also knows what it means to be in the saddle.*

9 zo)"

Did I cause you the greatest pain when I did what I liked to do the most?

I did penance for my injustice: my admiration was even more unjust than my contempt.3°

With vigils I did penance for the admirer's 1000 lies and for his eye's desire to be blind.

With 1000 acts of evil I took revenge on all prettification and nonsensical fantasy.

I despise you oblivious liars far more than I despise those who know they lie.

Because you lie about the way things are, no thirst will emerge within you for the way things ought to be.

9 [21]?7

they were choking on their nothingness: I gave them their nothingness to feed on.

They were rotting away at the sight of themselves: I held up my mirror to their ugliness

Just as they perished from their own nothingness and were unable to bear the sight of themselves, they experienced their highest moment.

And I would need gloves of glass in order to poison you.

9 [22]

La vie est une tragédie pour ceux qui sentent, et une comédie pour ceux, qui pensent.*® Horace Walpole.

9 MAY-JUNE 1883 313

9 [23]?

You don't want to hear that someone is strolling around above your heads. And so you place wood and earth and refuse above your heads: that's how you muffle the speech of my steps. You put all human error and obtuseness between yourselves and me: you call this a dead floor in your houses.

But in spite of this I stroll around above your thoughts, and they themselves should stroll around on top of my mistakes.

You shame yourselves with broad stairways for those who would rise like gods: and as the arches break above you and play off against each other — — — you put your longing into the mouth of the faraway moon:

your longing stretched beyond the words and above as well!

Whatever contradicted them they called God: their kind of heroism, to destroy what is human within them in this way:

but the time is past for human beings to nail themselves to the cross.

All those who create seek new languages: they have grown tired of their thin used-up tongues: the mind has been walking on these soles for far too long.

As long as beauty is not one of your needs, what do I care about your obsession with the beautiful!

Not satisfaction, but rather beauty, should be the end of desire

The way you are, you are only to be tolerated as ruins: and that which destroys you, lightning and downpours and weeds:

your unhappiness and adversity justify your existence.
You must learn to build with mountains: merely removing mountains" means little.

Your sayings – "puny truths" near the swamps: and some cold frog is sitting in there.

9 al"

May my eagle always be a danger to small white sheep and be known as a raptor!

314 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Are you familiar with the terror of people falling asleep?
They are shaken to the depths of their being, for the dream
is beginning – and often their terror shakes them awake.

Your virtue should serve and honor only that for which you despise yourselves the most. This alone should be the service

and the benefit provided by your virtue!

What are your father- and motherlands to me? I love only my children's land, through my children I wish to make up for

the fact that I am my father's child.

I wanted to catch a fish and threw a net into the sea – but I drew forth a god's head instead: the sea gave me, the hungry

one, a stone.

nature is a divine puppet show.

ashes and embers blow upon me wildfire

dry grass

crackling

9 [25]

Many things must come together for a moral action

1) a strong spontaneity

2) the most extreme tension of the willing I it is the highest form of organic functions.

9 261% 43

I also demand grace' even from those inclined to greatness.

9 [27]

the Dionysian as the aspect of antiquity that is most ac-cessible for me.

9 [28] Genius and bungling

9 [29]* Corsica and Italy.

9 MAY-JUNE 1883 315

Democracy as decline of the state.

Taking away the Jews' money and giving them another direction.

the Dionysian as access to the Greeks.

an enormous mass of lofty feelings, for which thoughts are still lacking and goals to raise humans above themselves, as with the Greeks, not disembodied phantasms.

9 [30]®

Your Great Flood still oppresses the earth

I come from there like a strong wind and that's why I advise those who despise me: when facing the wind, be careful not to – spit.

The monster of the body has scarcely raised itself out of the darkest slime

I call this festival the cleansing and sanctification of the earth to be your only contemporary!

You want to sap the strength of sickness and, for me, in the process you are sapping the strength of the sick, you witch doctors and saviors!

Whenever those who could command attempt to persuade and hide their kingly hands beneath their robes: I call this courtesy.

My savage wisdom got pregnant atop lonely mountains: it brought forth its young on bare stone. Now it runs foolishly through the harsh desert and seeks soft grass for its youngest, my old savage wisdom.

9 [5146

I believed myself to be the richest one of all: now I have made a gift of myself.

I do not even touch their souls' skin anymore!

316 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Ever more solitary and exiled: ever more ardent in love and wanting to go among the people.

The 7 solitudes.

All typical sufferings of the reformers; and their consolations.

1) Consolation: I will lay my hand on the next millennium.

2) I live as if I were living in another age: my eminence gives me contact with solitary and misunderstood people in all age(s)

3) I do not hate I defend myself with beauty.

9 [32]

With many small doses it is possible to turn a brave man into a coward: but also a coward into a brave man.

Cosmic dependence

Pass by these enemies quietly and with a sleeping sword: those who attack them sully themselves.

Like the buffalo I live near the sea and even nearer to the forest.

9 [33]

Drives should be denied as long as possible – principle of moral-physiological) research.

Whatever makes us value a human being now has always done so. H(uman beings) came to be honored first and only then actions“

9 (34)?

How would I endure it if I didn't love superhumans more than you?

For what purpose did I give you the 100-faceted mirror?

I also overcame love for you with love for superhumans.

And as I endure you, you must endure yourselves, out of love for s(uperhumans).

9 MAY-JUNE 1883 317

For me, you are the stone in which the most sublime of all statues sleeps

And as my hammer swings at you, you should swing at yourselves for my sake: the call of the hammer should awaken the sleeping statue.

People who wanted to conceal themselves, and were shamed by the clear sky, created for themselves these sweet-smelling caves.

I do not want to become enamored again of these places until grass and red poppies flourish on ruined walls.

9 [35]? Dirges at the volcano's edge Nature's stillness – thunder.

Golden casket.

9 [36]

§ Redemption from redeemers is what Zarathustra teaches.

P

§ generous to the earth? no, just.

§ “I acquit: for I also would have acted in the very same q y

way” – a ghastly historic formulation! it means “I am tolerant of myself – consequently!”

“Thou shalt? I will this”

9 [37]

Every time I put on a good pair of glasses, I am amazed at how ugly h(umans) are and how anyone could stand to be around them.

9 [38]

The meaning of causality becomes ever weaker when looking backwards (e.g., myths) Consequently conceptions about what is inner must be especially lacking in reason.

The oldest assumptions must be the dumbest

318 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

9 [39]

"Will" is a concept for unifying all of our passions.

Passions are feelings for identifying particular bodily states that are not attributable to the body.

"Common feelings"

Moral feelings are passions transformed by value judgments.

The influence of judgment on feeling (even with pleasure and pain)

Pleasure and pain are value judgments

9 [40]

How superficial and impoverished is everything that is inner:

e.g., purpose (image of chewing and actual chewing)

e.g., a concept of horse in comparison to a horse,

e.g., the feeling of warmth in comparison to what happens

e.g., the I in comparison to the "self"

e.g. seeing in comparison to the mechanics of seeing,

e.g. the feeling of a heartbeat in comparison to its mechanics

9 [41]

There are only bodily states: mental states are consequences and symbolism.

To separate outer and inner world, as metaphysicians do, is already a sensory judgment.

Eye ear are also "outer world."

Feelings and the outer world are given to us: and even the feelings localized in this world.

I call all sense impressions "stimuli."

" . »

"Illusion" only makes sense for the eye.

To show "the metaphysics of metaphysics"!

We are in the process of figuring out the being of things: consequently we must already have an opinion as to what being is. This can be an error! e.g., I.

9 MAY-JUNE 1883 319

9 [42]

The silliness of morality in its assessment of value according to difficulty.

The "inner world" is much thinner and shorter than the mechanical world. Overestimation!

Unegoistic acts as self-deception and shortsightedness. "Shortcut"

Purification of the inner world.

At some point religious aesthetic and moral attitudes must have been one and the same.

Designation and valuation of our bodily states – how to do it?

9 [43]

I had to abolish morality in order to have my moral will prevail.

Supposing morality is valid, then I must not overwhelm my neighbors with the power of my judging. So I also must not terrorize (unnerve) them

Yes, they are innocent

Struggle for power! To make my ideal prevail in a manner derived from my ideal!

Human actions can in no way be explained by reference to human motives.

Individuals continue to have an effect inside their impulses.

The superior intellect bound to a weak nervous character – is to be eliminated.

Contempt for the accumulation and influence of power runs counter to the principle of the organic.

320 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

9 [44]

2. Measures of value (the scientific measure lacking up to now)

Herds and individuals.

Fear or hope accompany a feeling of pain or pleasure – as with all passions.

Anger (and all affects) initially a bodily state: which is interpreted. Later the interpretation freely generates the state.

3 9 [45]°

not necessary and not even superfluous

they shoot off their mouths; we are supposed to think that this is out of the abundance of their hearts.°4

A star went under and disappeared – but its light is still
 on its way, and when will it cease being on its way?
 Are you a star? Then you, too, must wander and be homeless.
 § The murder-of-God-penitents and their festival'
 You have yet to be taught Aunger for your knowledge.
 Dancers have their ears in their toes.
 It is also sweet to resist ourselves and to comb back the hair
 of bushy feelings.
 § to wean h(uman beings) from feelings of "punishment" and "guilt"
 9 MAY-JUNE 1883 321
 9 [46]
 Everything organic must be overcome. Little and often!
 How could I want to live if I did not look ahead – beyond
 you!
 Fear the one who has withdrawn! The tiger prepares to spring!"
 Reverence is itself a passion: just like verbal abuse.
 Through
 P J g reverence the "passions" were turned into virtues.
 I can only rarely recall an unconditional "should": thus no authority! Kant's "moral sense" is nothing! This is the vanity that wants one "should" to be the "should" for all the world!
 > «
 9 [47]
 Corporations – apart from the state.
 Our thoughts come as stimuli from somewhere. (Nothing to do with "pleasant" and "unpleasant.")
 In the weak, I appraise the good and bad alike.
 Stronger people as nobler people.
 For the education of individuals.
 Workers should for once live like the bourgeois now live:
 but above them the higher caste, distinguishing themselves through lack of needs! thus poorer and simpler, yet in possession of power'?
 Right to design your own entirely individual approach to punishment.
 322 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 If you do not want to advocate the individuum in what most belongs to you, but rather to contradict it, then the contradic-

tion is part of the individual "responsibility" –

9 [48]

The most influential people are the most hidden.

Culture is just a thin apple skin over a glowing chaos.

People nor equal: thus speaks justice.

Not utility but gravitas determines value: a noble person is the result of much labor.

Individuum est aliquid novum:®! actions are not shared in common with anyone.

The® will a delusion.

The truth hurts because it destroys a belief: not in itself.

Inventors of new states of the soul are the true inventors: people seek to mimic these states"

Dühring: no one would wish for such a bitter soul. That is why his philosophy is not attractive.

Feeling of power. – Happiness is not the goal: but rather a monstrous force in humans and in humankind wants to expend itself, wants to create, it is an ongoing chain of explosions that in no way have happiness as the goal.

So you want to be paid?

"like a sweet smell" – but she had to die.

9 MAY-JUNE 1883 323

9 [a]

Purification from revenge is my morality. §

"When has such a flame ever burned? (as Zarathustra)

I hate anyone who limps along in front of us.

Those who walk forward with their heads turned backward –

The ocean that delights in spreading its peacock train upon soft sand.

[50] § the proletarian ("Dühring")

§ Intoxication. Its common form in convulsive atonement.

Warn about Dionysus!

9 [51]

Within different people we find the same number of passions: yet these are given different names, evaluated differently and in the process adjudicated differently. Good and evil are distinguished by the differing orders of rank of passions as they relate to one another and by the dominance of goals.

9 [s]®

You think everything is the wild play of giants? Yet a single word, arriving on the wings of doves, directs the will of these wild ones: The still source 9 [53] It is night –now all gushing fountains speak more loudly – and you, too, my soul are a gushing fountain.

It is night – and all songs of those who love just now awaken.

And you, too, my soul, are the song of someone who loves.⁶⁷

324 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

9 [54]

Incense of someone being burned at the stake.

9 [55]

The very best knowledge[®] is barely sufficient for faith.

9 [56][®]

–the dream

–proletarians

–intoxication. Its most common form in convulsions of conscience

–redemption from redeemers

– I acquit: for I also would have done the same thing.”

–generous to the earth? no, just!

–Do you want to be paid?

–Annihilation and resurrection of morality.

9 [57]

Daniel Darc, bréviaire du Parisien (Ollendorf éditeur)[°]

Brehm Moldenhauer

9 [58]

Collection of sublime states and objects.

9 [59]

No. 343 M(ixed) O(pinions) and M(axims)

[10 = N VI 3. June-July 1883]

10 [1]!

by striving upward against my burden, I rejuvenated myself:
and just when I became more hardened within myself, I learned grace, too.

inventive in small stratagems and lusting for buyers, they waited: with emaciated souls and meager in hope.

10 [2]?

My stream threw itself wildly in wrong directions and into impassable canyons: but how should it ever come about that a stream failed to reach the ocean?

I found a lake, a hermit and a self-satisfied person: but my stream threw itself into this lake (and) swept it along into the ocean.

 10 [3]?
 like Caesar. immovable.
 You don't know me
 I gave you the heaviest burden – so that the weaklings would perish from it – for breeding.
 No compassion!
 I want to form and transform myself and you how would I bear it otherwise!*
 when my I? dreamed you
 326 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 10 [4]°
 Pity the humans and superhumans who do not have a pinnacle that is even above compassion!
 The smallest gap stands between me and you: but who has ever built bridges across the smallest gaps!
 Conversation with the hound of hell.' (volcano)
 On ashes I stride up the mountain of ashes at dusk: my shadow grows long and longer.
 A boat floats far away in the violet-blue sea: the sailor who sees me striding along crosses himself
 Now Zarathustra is journeying to hell – he says, shudder-ing: I had always figured it would end this way!
 You are completely wrong, fisherman! The devil is not taking me: instead, Zarathustra is now taking the devil as his own.® 10 [5]?
 your knees worship, but your heart knows nothing of it.
 to bring redemption
 There lies the island of tombs, there, too, the tombs of my youth: I want to carry an evergreen wreath of life there.
 I thought of my youth today I walked up my street of tombs
 I sat on ruins between red poppies and grass – on my own ruins.
 traveling to the island of the departed on sleeping seas
 You still live, old patient heart of iron: and in you, too, what is unredeemed, unspoken from my youth, still lives.
 10 [6]!°
 Jesus – like a sweet smell.
 The preservation of the species is guaranteed: but what does it involve!
 10 JUNE-JULY 1883 327
 Redeemers
 Philosophers. Those who know. Scientists. Genius

Free spirits.

Romantics.

Artists.

Conquerors "strong willed" mocked Statesmen

Saints:

Fidelity Truthfulness Compassion. Justice.

Bravery Obedience.

And if you aren't a bird, be careful not to camp above an abyss.

I can no longer descend to you: my eye itself blurs and becomes blind to the upward path that I traveled.

10 [7]

The art of the tarantula is black and blackening: yet I call tarantulas the teachers of the "worst world"

10 [8]!?

I had renounced life: I had become nightwatchman and guardian of the graves in death's mountain fortress.

Up there I guarded his coffins in musty vaults: they stood full of such victory emblems: life that had been overcome stared at me from glass coffins.

I myself am like the wind that shatters the gates to the chambers of the dead. I myself am like the coffin filled with colorful malicious words and angeli(c) grimaces, I myself am the laughter of life in the midnight chamber of the dead!°

328 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

10 [9]!4

one person rejoices that justice still includes taking revenge:

and another person rejoices that revenge still means that justice is being done. (Dühring and the Corsican')

If there were gods: how could I stand not being a god! But there are no gods. 10 [ro]!°

Long ago, this happened to me: I dreamed my most burdensome dream, and while dreaming I composed my darkest riddle.

But, behold, my life itself interpreted this dream. Behold, my today redeemed my yesterday and the meaning imprisoned within.

And so, too, this happened recently: thunder boomed three times through the night in my direction, the vaults howled three times.

Alpa, I called, Alpa, Alpa. W(ho) (is) c(arrying) (his) a(shes) t(o) (the) m(ountain)? Which of those lives that have been overcome approaches me, the nightwa(tchman) and guardian of graves?

When I dreamed you, I dr(eamed) my most burdensome dream.
This is why I want to be your horror – your fainting and your awakening.

10 [11]'7 Praise of Cool Reason the one who creates praises poverty of the intellect and skepticism sweet smell midsummer

18

The courage to demand the extraord(inary) is rarer than the courage to achieve it.

10 JUNE-JULY 1883 329

Strength and duration of resolve and frugality (insight into earthly imperf(ection)

10 [12]!?

Sweet and stale like the smell of aging virgins? you scholars.

You redeemers, what do you know of human beings!

And why don't you want to make yourselves into bait – alongside me?

But no voice responded.

Alas, you do not know how much I, a solitary man, am comfortable with human voices which a wind or a bird carried to me. I have even gotten drunk on ugly voices.

Alpa! I screamed, so let your voice be heard already. Alpa!
my fear and longing screamed forth from me.

10 [13]

How easy it is for us to take on the burden of an apol(ogy), as long as there is no responsibility.

But I am responsible.

10 [14]?!

You compassionate ones, when you throw yourselves from the heights at the people below, what price do you put on broken limbs!

10 [15]??

But there was silence, terrible silence redoubled. Alas, you are not familiar with it, the redoubled silence, the one that ties

our hearts in knots!

Alpa! I screamed. Alpa! Alpa! The fear of redoubled silence screamed forth from me.

330 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

10 [16]?3

Stooped over, working in dim gloomy shafts, this is the prisoners' hardest lot.

10 [17]

Where did he go? Who knows?

But it is certain that he met his downfall.

A star burned out in barren space."4

The intransitory – this is only a symbol, and poets lie too much."

They also know too little and are bad learners: so they must already be lying.

And what is most dear to them is the kingdom in the clouds: they enthrone their colorful brats up there and call them gods,

And when they lie in a garden under trees or give speeches by themselves in front of the flowers by a precipice, then they think that their tend(er) feel(ings) are knowledge.

They all believe that nature is in love with them and are always listening in to its accolades.

10 [18]?°

Dare to believe in yourselves no matter what! How else should anyone believe in you otherwise! Those who do not believe in themselves are always lying!

Willing liberates! – thus do I teach you freedom (of) t(he) will

10 [19]

This laughter shattered me, and ripped apart my guts, and slit open my heart.

Strong will? An enduring will is what I need, a hard-hearted eternal resoluteness.

10 JUNE-JULY 1883 331

10 [20]8

All creation is transformation – and wherever creative hands are working there are many deaths and downfalls.

And only this is dying and disintegration: without pity sculptors hammer away at the marble.

That they may free the sleeping image from the stone, this is why they must be without pity: – this is why we must all suffer and die and turn to dust.

But we ourselves are the sculptors, serving the sculptor's eye: we ourselves often tremble at the creative savagery of our hands.

10 [21]"?

Who among you poets has not adulterated his wines? Many a poisonous mishmash lies hidden in your cellars.

Do you want to see the rainbow and the bridge of the superhumans? Right now is the time.
The storm cloud is still rumbling, but already the sun shines
again.

10 [22]?° Prophecy.

Someday I will have my summer: and it will be like a summer in the high mountains.

A summer near the snow, near eagles, near death.

10 [23]?

This is the most unforgiveable thing about you: you have the power and you don't want to rule.

You see, don't you, the one they all need the most. This is the one who can command. Will – – –

332 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

10 [24]

You have hungry minds: so take this truth quickly from me as a snack: the intransitory – this is only a symbol.

10 [25]

superhumans completely beyond all previous virtue, hard-hearted due to their compassion, – those who create, who unsparingly hammer their marble. For Zarathustra's last speech.

10 [26]

To play the great game – to wager the existence of humankind on the poss(ibility) of achieving something higher than the preservation of the species.

F(or the) Kast) spee(ch)

10 [27]

I will reach you late – just as the Greek artists are reaching

you only now.

Aesch(ylus)

10 [28]?

Conversation with the hound of fire

Mockery of his pathos against the revolution

10 [29]

Mockery of revolutions and Vesuviuses. Something from the surface

10 [30]}°4

You are not yet driven by any strong wind or will

You are still too stiff for me and your neck is too stiff"

Alas, that you would walk across the sea, already full and rounded like a sail, trembling in the storminess of your will!

Only then shall I call you beautiful and properly prepared!

10 JUNE-JULY 1883 333

10 [31]?°

These are heated times right now, the air is on fire – now everyone is walking around naked, good and evil people! this world without clothes is a festival for those who know.

States burst apart

Earthquakes

everything becomes visible

Taine?"

What makes the earth quake: the silent words of the saints Storm of malice.

Rejoicing that everything is becoming visible and bursting.
I feel so wonderful!

End of all customs and secret dealings.

Twilight of the gods –*8

There is nothing eternal!

10 [32]?

Deep knowledge flows cold, its deepest wellsprings are ice-cold: that's why it is refreshing to hot hands and to anyone eager for action.

10 [33]*°

I love the turbulence of a bad reputation, like a ship, the wake that the ship creates. I tread more lightly, when the way around my keel – – –

10 [34]*!

But just as I was awakened by you and came to myself, so you, too, should be awakened by yourselves – and come to me! Redeemers? I call you the ones who bind and tame!
to approach the wellspring with humble hands

334 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

ro [35]?

Truly, I say to you: wherever there are tombs, there have also always been resurrections!

Speak your word" and founder on it. What do you matter!

10 [36]

I am well-disposed to all that is pure:

I say to you, mediators and equivocators, to you half-and-halfers: you are not pure how could I be well disposed to you conciliators!

10 [37]%

There haven't been any superhumans yet. I saw them both naked, the greatest and the puniest humans: and I found both of them still – all too human!

10 [38]°

You play and you want your play to be watched – I call all of you actors.

Whether you call yourselves poets or dancers or public servants and the voice of the people –

Whether you teach or paint or compose or play “Black on White”: – you want to make a name for yourselves.

Mother Vanity

The opposite of those who would like to erase their names and stick their heads in the sand – so that their task will not see them and will pass them by.

10 [39]

and only when I am a burden to myself, do you weigh heavily on me.

10 [40]*

1 Laughing at the ethical world-order. “paid for”

2 Dance song

10 JUNE-JULY 1883

3 Dream.

4 Hound of fire

5 Mediators.

6 Praise of cool reason

7 Penitents of the mind.

8 Many societies (to the conquerors = founders)

9 Poets geniuses actors

10 Scholars

11 to stroll among fragments! 12 Philosophers

13 Socialists for equality

14 Those who speak freely *

15 Pessimists

10 [41]? On the Hucksters the Curious Frugal (Mystics) on the Vanity of the Pure

On the Sculptors of Idols. On Necromancers Free-speech advocates. Reconcilers. Mediators

There haven't been any superhumans yet.

10 [42]?°

Pleasure of the mistral wind of the plowshare of the heights of life of the change in seasons (ring) Organic of the stream of the dawn of the clear sky electricity.

Pleasure as mother of pain.

336 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

10 [43]

Main doctrine: nature is like a human being: errs etc.

Anthropomorphizing of nature.

10 [44]

Therefore, I conclude, a belief in time is good for our health.

(pessimists last of all)

There are three solitudes: that of the one who creates, that of the one who waits and that of shame.

I know the word and the sign of the superhumans: but I do not show it, I do not show it to myself.

What did you do? ("Festival of Life") – – "This is how things are, coming from the mind of Zarathustra"

The doctrine first called good by the rabble, in the end called good by the most superior humans.

We want to live like Z(arathustra), ashamed in the face of a great truth.

10 [45]"

Act I. The temptations. He does not consider himself ripe.

(Chosen people)

Solitude on account of being ashamed of himself

Act II. Zarathustra attending the "great noon" incognito

Is recognized

Act III. Catastrophe: everyone abandons him after his speech.

He dies from the pain. Act IV. Funeral rites "We killed him" countering the arguments

10 JUNE-JULY 1883 337

10 [46]

Concerning 1). He refuses. Finally the children's choirs bring him to tears.

A fool!

2 kings lead the donkey.

Concerning 2) When the procession does not know where to turn, the messengers arrive from the plague city. Decision.

As

in the forest. Fire in the marketplace symbol{ic) purification.

Destruction of the dig city the end

I want to lead the pious astray.

10 [47]

Zarathustra sitting in the ruins of a church Act 4

the gentlest person must become the most hard-hearted person – and perish in the process?

Gentle to humans, hard-hearted for the sake of superhumans Collision.

apparent weakness.

he prophesies to them: the doctrine of return is the sign.

He forgets himself and teaches return as derived from the superhumans: the superhumans withstand the doctrine and use it to punish.

As he returns from his vision, he dies from it

[11 = N VI 4. June-July 1883]

u [1] sleepless agony, bleeding u [2]! On Scholars. On the Land of Education. On the Rabble.

The Funeral Rites.

u [3]

Which of the two of us is the bigger fool?

Zarathustra answered: the one of us who thinks that of the other.

What is the most fertile mother of tragedies?

Wounded vanity."

Which of the two of us is the happiest?

(The one) whose unhappiness has gone wrong in the best way.

This is my abyss and my danger, that I plummet into these heights – and certainly not into your depths!

11 JUNE-JULY 1883 339

u [4]

Let's see whether or not the lioness is learning to roar gently!

Alas, if only I knew how to lure you back to me with shepherds' flutes! Alas, if only the lioness would learn to roar gently!

u [5]

Frustration at the fact that necessity is iron and that the retroactive will is denied to us:

Rage at the fact that time flows away into the future and does not allow itself to be forced into the mill of the past!

That something suffers, refreshes us –: this is our most ancient
folly.

u [6]

W(agner) turns to those who are made mistrustful by arguments but are convinced by sublime gestures.

u [7]

I never take people completely seriously. My enemies don't have to make a lot of amends to me because it's too easy for me

to start laughing at them. But I could easily kill on impulse.

1 [8]?

There is something fundamentally flawed in human beings
– they must be overcome. Attempt it!

11 [9]°

Dühring. He is satisfied when he has added a few angry and arrogant words: that's what he calls "witty"

u [10]® II Zarathustra includes: the Penitent of the Mind
The Murderer of God.' weary people The Beehives

340 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

u [x]

When the house is burning, even dinner is forgotten – said the hound of fire.

Yes, and the hound finishes it later amidst the ashes.®

u [12]

This is true virtue, which does not know about itself – this is how you taught me the doctrine.

ever since then, I have found true modesty on heaths and hedges and everywhere:

everywhere it grows like huckleberries, where nothing else grows that is good.

u [13]? a The Funeral Rites

b On the Hound of Fire

c the stillest hour

u [14]

With every action a lot is accomplished that we don't think about.

rr [15]!°

Your will is still too proud and timid. If you want to have good –

They will build beehives like Towers of Babel.

u [16]!

And may everything shatter that can be shattered by our truths! There are still many worlds to build!

u [17]? On the Rabble On Tarantulas the pro(phet) The Funeral Rites

ll JUNE-JULY 1883 341

u [18] Ill Humor of the Gift-Giver On Good and Evil. Conversation with the King On Great Events The Stillest Hour

u [19]

Victory over the spirit of gravity

11 [20]

an architectural style for this soul

u [21]

strange saints are coming along, one by one, even a fool.

[12 = Z I 3. Summer 1883]

"Wicked Wisdom." Maxims and Mottos by Friedrich Nietzsche.

Barbs. Maxims and Mottos by Friedrich Nietzsche.

2. Convictions are more dangerous enemies of truth than are lies.

3. Many people are stubborn in regard to a path once they have entered upon it, few in regard to the goal.*
4. The serpent must first become a dragon so that someone can become a hero against it.'
5. Not to speak of ourselves at all is a very refined form of – hypocrisy.°
- 1 SUMMER 1883 343
6. Truth is least likely to find advocates, not when it is dangerous to speak the truth – but when it is boring to do so."
7. We are so glad to be out amid nature because it has no opinion about us.®
8. The irrationality of a thing is no argument against its existence, but rather a condition for it?
9. The iron necessity of which people speak is usually neither iron, nor necessary.!
10. When we have a lot to put into it, a day has a hundred pockers.!!
11. Anyone who hears poorly always hears something more.!??
12. We are in the most danger of being run over when we have just gotten out of the way of some vehicle."
13. Waiting makes people immoral.'*
15. The advantage of a bad memory is that we can enjoy the same good things for the first time many times.!!°
17. A marriage proves its worth by being able to put up with an occasional deviation.'?
bored.!??

344 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

20. Some men have sighed over the abduction of their wives, many more because nobody wanted to abduct them."°
21. It is doubtful whether a much-traveled person will have found any parts of the world uglier than those in the human face.?!?
22. We persuade courageous people to undertake some action by representing it as more dangerous than it is.??
23. The best means of coming to the assistance of people who are embarrassed is to praise them with conviction."
24. We can speak very much to the point and yet in such a way that everyone in the world shouts the opposite: when, that is, we are not speaking to everyone in the world."
25. The visionaries deny the truth to themselves, the liars only to others."

what mattered to the tree; but what mattered to it was the 26 seed.

27. Anyone who has seen someone's ideal is that person's unrelenting judge and guilty conscience as it were.""

28. The followers of a great man like to blind themselves in order to be better able to sing his praises better: poor songbirds! ?8

29. What is genius? Wanting both a lofty goal and the means for attaining it.??

30. What is bad gains prestige through imitation, what is good

loses it, especially in art.*°

12 SUMMER 1883 345

31. We must know how to dim our lights in order to get rid
of mosquitoes and admirers.?!

32. That you are trying to identify the exceptions ranks you far below someone else, especially when that person is trying

to identify the rule.*?

33. Every master has only one pupil: a pupil who will be unfaithful to just that master. For that pupil is also destined for mastery.??

34. It says nothing against the ripeness of a spirit"? that it has a few worms.'

35. In solitude, solitary people consume themselves, amid multitudes, they are consumed by many. Now choose.?°

36. Differently from a journeyman does a master love the master.>"

37. We won't get the crowd to cry hosannas until we ride into town on an ass.'®

38. Our supporters never forgive us if we take sides against ourselves.??

39. Women are the idleness of the creator on every seventh day.

40. We must take care not to become prematurely sharp, because

then we become prematurely – dull.

41. Anyone we leave standing for a long time in the anteroom of our favor begins to ferment and becomes sour.4?

346 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

44. A good maxim is too hard even for the teeth of time."

45. A good book enriches even the spirits*® of its opponents.'" "

48. What has to be given to you in pieces need not be fragmentary for that reason."°

49. Good ideas that follow too quickly after one another block each other's "view."?!

50. Self-sacrifice is present in every action, in the best as well as in the worst.>"

51. Whether we have a serpent's tooth is something that we do not know until someone has put their heel upon us.

52. Those who find even one grain of humiliation in a sack of advantages that have been given to them will still make the worst of a good thing.*4

53. We know a little too much about everyone.*°

56

ss. Still better to wash with dirty water than to remain unclean.*"

12 SUMMER 1883 347

57. We should remove the scaffolding once the house has been built.5?

59. The most dangerous supporter is the one whose defection would annihilate the entire party – hence the best supporter.°!

61. People press toward the light, not in order to see better, but in order to shine more brightly.

62. Before we "go looking for the right person," we must have found the lantern.°*

64. The style that has been found is a pain in the ear to any friend of the style that has been sought.

65. When virtue has slept, it will arise refreshed."

68

67. Scoundrels are not to be sought among law-breakers but rather among those who do not "break" anything."

69. Antithesis is the narrow gate through which error prefers to creep toward truth."!

70. With one talent more, we stand less secure than with one fewer.'?

348 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

72. "Should a band not tear loose – you must try biting into
27475 it.

73. The higher we soar, the smaller we appear to those who cannot fly."

74. How good bad music and bad arguments sound when we march off after an enemy!'7

75. Part of the masters' mastery is warning their pupils about themselves."

76. Why don't people see things? They themselves are standing in their own way: they cover up things.'

77. Those who want to kill their enemies should consider whether this act will immortalize their enemies for them.

78. In most cases, the best cure for love is still that age-old

radical medicine: requited love.®!

79. Some people have the greatest right to act in such and such a manner. But once they start defending that right, we no longer believe in it.®?

80. For people in need of solace no means of receiving it is more comforting than the assertion that for their situation there is no solace.®3

81. Lively natures lie for only an instant: afterwards they lie to themselves and are convinced and upright.*4

82. To rush into the midst of the enemy can be a sign of fear

and cowardice.®°

12 SUMMER 1883 349

83. Fearful people don't know what it means to be alone: enemies

are always standing behind their chairs.*°

84. We no longer want to turn the causes into sinners and
the consequences into executioners.®"

85. We ought to do away with beggars: for we feel annoyed giving to them and annoyed when we don't.®®

86. Scholars: this is what the soldiers of the mind are called today, as are – unfortunately – also those who darn the socks of the mind. ®?

87. It is the heart that inspires: and it is the mind that heartens us and keeps us cool when we are in danger. Oh language"?

88. We lie with our tongues but we still tell the truth with our mouths and maws.?!

89. Humans are the animals with red cheeks: humans are the animals that have often had to feel ashamed of themselves.??

go. Talking a lot about ourselves is also a means of concealing ourselves."

91. You believe, so you claim, in the necessity of religion? Be honest! You believe only in the necessity of police.?*

92. Women? are more sensual than men, but they know less about their sensuality.?°

93. Morality is human posturing in the face of nature.""

we are praising our taste: doesn't this go against all good taste??®

350 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

95. There are no h(umans) at all: for there was no first h(uman)

– this is how animals make inferences."?

96. God, too, has his hell, said the devil: this is his love for humans.!0°

97. Those who attain their ideal are thereby already – transcending it.!0!

98. Many a peacock hides its tail from all eyes and calls this

– its pride.!"

99. Occasionally the truth will finally triumph, there is no doubt: some kind of error was fighting on its behalf.!®

100. The one who knows feels like God – become animal.!% tor. I listened for an echo and I heard only – praise.!"

Many people become great only after death – by means of the echo.

102. Poor artists! You wanted to reeducate this rabble and they want only – to be amazed!!®

104. "Our neighbor doesn't live in our neighborhood, but rather in theirs" this is how all peoples think.!°8

105. Substantial obligations do not inspire gratitude, but rather vengefulness.!"

106. Those who go too far eventually lie down, exhausted, to sleep even if they are in the snow: like skeptics.!!°

12 SUMMER 1883 351

107. Pangs of conscience teach us how to bite.!!!

108. There is much more intrusiveness in praise than in blame.!!?

110. The one who knows lives among humans not as if among animals, but rather – as among animals.'!4

 ur. We forgive our opponents most completely – only their failures.'!°
 112. Out of the eyes of all who judge gazes the execution-er.!®
 113. The consequences of our actions grab us by the scruff of the neck,'!" quite indifferent to the fact that we have "bet-tered" ourselves in the meantime.
 114. "But how could you do such a thing? It was stupid!" – "Tt hasn't been easy for me either."!'8
 115. Alas! You have seen his ideal! From now on you will see in him merely the caricature of his ideal.!!°
 116. Humans would take themselves for gods if it were not for the lower half of their bodies.!""°
 117. Compassion for humankind – that would be tyranny against every individual.'?!
 118. Seeing beyond ourselves is necessary in order to – see well.!!??
 119. "All people are not equal!" – Thus speaks justice.!!??
 352 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 120. Whoever does not see superior qualities in people sees their base qualities! from much too close a distance.
 121. Once talent grows dim in people, their moral qualities become more visible: and it's not always stars that thereby become visible.
 122. When fatigued, we are even attacked by concepts that we have long since overcome.
 123. That forgetting exists has never yet been demonstrated: but only that many things do not occur to us when we want them to.!
 124. The belief in cause and effect is anchored in the strongest of the instincts, that of revenge.!""°
 125. If people make us feel comfortable we judge their morality more positively.!!7?
 126. In striving not to know themselves even ordinary minds are still very subtle.!!?®
 127. Seeing and still not believing – is the primary virtue of those who know; visual appearance is their greatest temptation.!""?

128. What is "church"? – A fundamentally mendacious kind of state.!30

129. Carrying our gold around unminted is uncomfortable; this is what thinkers do who have no formulas.

130. Whoever intends to treat people honestly is stingy even when it comes to courtesy.'?!
12 SUMMER 1883 353

131. "The hero is cheerful" – this has not yet occurred to writers of tragedies.!??

132. The utile! is only a means; its end is always some kind of dulce!34 – now be honest, my dear Sirs Dulciarier!!?

133. Our bad qualities allow us to be rewarded whenever they have allowed themselves to be overcome by virtue.!*6

134. "Now I am just" – "now I am avenged": this sounds similar and not merely similar.!97

135. We never have: because we never are. We are continuously winning or losing.

136. Better evil deeds than puny thoughts!!98

138. We can die of thirst in the middle of the ocean and just as easily in the midst of truths that are too salty.!*°

139. For the sake of health, digestion requires a kind of slothfulness. Digestion of an experience, too.!4!

140. It is often more blessed to steal than to receive.!??

142. Not that you lied to me, but that I no longer believe you, this is what has shaken me.!44

143. All people think themselves "experts" on good and evil, and are mistaken.!*

354 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

144. Those who praise mostly portray themselves as giving something back: in truth they want to be given a gift.!?°

145. Women stop being childlike by constantly passing themselves off as educators when they are with children.

146. We reserve our most profound love for our children or our works.!"

147. Whoever does not make us fertile will certainly leave us indifferent.!8

148. "We do good deeds for our neighbors but do not create for them": this is the thinking of all those who create.!*

149. Anger does not reveal what is in a person, but rather just anger.!°°

150. When the age has turned against us, we have either not yet transcended it enough – or we lag behind it.

151. "Where is there still an ocean in which it would be possible to drown?" – this cry runs through our times."

152. There are many cruel people who are just too cowardly to be cruel.

153. We must overcome even our youth in order to become children again.'?

154. "Only those who are hot can know the delights of cold-heartedness": thus spoke a free spirit.!??

155. We are most unfair, not toward that which displeases us, but rather toward that which does not concern us at all.!°?

12 SUMMER 1883 355

156. It is certainly not the least of a theory's charms that it – is refutable.!

157. "Good and evil are God's prejudices" – said the serpent.

158. We should question gods only in cases where gods alone can answer.

159. Many people do not find their hearts until they – lose their heads.

161. Many things become transparent to us: but this doesn't mean by a long shot that we can – get through them.

162. Learning to command is more difficult than learning to obey.

163. Not our actions, but rather our opinions and the opinions of others about our actions – make us into good or evil people.!5®

164. That the truth is simple is what error claims. error veri-tate simplicior"?

than the crime.!®

the punishment sullies even more

168. In itself, truth is no power: if it does not join sides with power, then it will certainly perish.!°*

356 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

169. This is what shows who the masters are, that they neither err nor hesitate.!®

170. What has disturbed h(umans) so much? Not things, not opinions about things – but rather opinions about things that do not exist at all!

172. There is a hard-heartedness that would like to be understood as strength.

173. When people have just been honored highly and have eaten well, then they are at their most benevolent.

174. We notice more closely whether other people perceive our weaknesses than whether we ourselves notice the weaknesses of others.

176. Improving style – this means improving the ideas – and nothing more!!⁶⁸

177. The weakest side of a classic book is that it is predominantly written in the mother tongue of its originator!

178. We first begin to place special value on possessing a certain virtue when we have noticed its absence in our opponent.

179. All minor happiness should be used as a sick person uses a bed: for convalescence – and otherwise not at all!⁷⁰

180. Taking pleasure in malicious petty thoughts saves human beings from many great evil acts!⁷¹

12 SUMMER 1883 357

182. If we do not raise our devil to greatness, petty devilry makes us – petty.!'?

183. We should be a resting place for our friends, but it should be a hard bed, an army cot.

184. When something goes wrong, assistants should be paid double for their help.!"*

185. Be modest in accepting things! Let your accepting be a mark of distinction!"

186. Anyone who keeps giving easily becomes shameless in the process.

187. When has any great person ever looked as fat and well-behaved as a good person!!"⁶

188. "I forgive you for what you did to me: but how could I ever forgive the fact that you did it to yourself!"
a lover.

– thus spoke

189. You say "I like this" and think you are praising me.
But J

don't like you –!!⁷⁷

190. "The love of oneself is characteristic of pregnancy."
192. In the presence of demigods even heroes become a laughing stock.!"

193. "How many more decades will it take before he starts to shine?" This question helps to measure a person's distance and superiority.!"°

358 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

194. The enormous expectations that women bring to love ruin their vision for all other – distances.'?!

195. "We are only pregnant with our own child": thus speaks the selfishness of all those who create.!"8?

196. He still is perfectly innocent in his admiration: i.e., it still has not occurred to him that he himself could be admired one day.'??

197. Many an existence has no meaning, beyond forcing another existence to be forgotten. And in the same way there are actions that work like opium.!"*4

I never arrived!"!®°

199. Whoever wants to justify existence must also be capable of being God's advocate!* with the devil.!"8"

200. Those incapable of love or friendship will most certainly find their just deserts – in marriage.'?®

12 [2]

Stupidity often goes by a nicer name and calls itself necessity.!"??

r [3]

There is much foolishness and clumsy groping in what you call nature: yet your mind is definitely a part of this "nature."

12 [4]

Everything that feels, suffers, and is in prisons: but willing comes as liberator and bringer of joy – therefore / am teaching you "freedom of the will." 120

12 SUMMER 1883 359

12 [5]

Just at the point where your honesty ceases, your eye sees nothing more: oh, I know your will to blindness!!*!

12 [6]'92

If you want to make crooked all that is straight: then think that time is gone and that transitoriness is a lie'?

Thinking this is the worst form of madness: your bones will think they are awlirl and your stomach that it is vomiting.
12 [7]

They want to play dice with the tiniest of dice or to see things dancing that are hard to see: the dwarves of existence,
the delightful elementary particles: but they call it science and it makes them sweat.

But to me they are children who want to have their game:
and if there were some laughter in their game, I would want
to endorse their "joyful science."

2 (8)!95

Knotted taut feelings that you no longer regard as knots:
and that which often returns, in whose eternal recurrence
you

believe: this is your "reality," your best superstition.
It wasn't until I invented pleasure in the truth that I also invented deception and illusion: for the sake of such pleasure I projected proximity and distance into things.

12 [9]!%°

All valuations have been created: every valuation destroyed.
But valuation itself, how could this be destroyed! This is life

itself, no matter what you say – to value things!

To value is to taste.

There is no arguing about taste? Oh, you fools, all life is tasting, and taste and disagreements about taste and tasting!

360 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

12 [10]

You fancy yourselves to be free: but you pirouette at the end of our wires. Values and opinions live above and within you:

we

who evaluate have made you what you are, you clockworks!

12 [11]!97

And if you want to be free, then you must not only throw off your burdensome chains: the hour must come when you flee from those you love the most.

You must be able to abandon your woman, your land, your profits, your most precious beliefs: and for a time the sun
of your life shall set for you.

12 [12]'98

And those who invent themselves will be regarded as lost for a long time.

12 [13]!

Sleep without dreams – for me, that would be the greatest evil. And I call all ultimate knowledge my greatest danger.

12 [14]200

Knowing: for me, this is desire and thirst and calculation and struggle of values. Yet, as creating, all knowing must also be an unknowing.

To see through things, through the ephemeral net and the ultimate veil – this would be the great weariness and the end

of all who create.

But believe me, my friends: there is nothing that is in-transitory: it is only a symbol!

12 [15]201

To be a wish in every way and to soar like an eagle toward faraway coasts: this is what I call happiness.

12 SUMMER 1883 361

12 [16]*°?

There are two ways to deliver yourselves from suffering:
sudden death and enduring love.

12 [17]

Once I had created superhumans, I wrapped them in the great veil of becoming and let the sun stand over them at noon.

12 [18]?%

Become lucid! Become well! Become necessary!

12 [19]

The drive toward procreation, toward a purpose, toward a future, toward something superior – this is the freedom in all willing. Only in creating is there freedom.

12 [20]*°4

You sages, be careful that you do not founder on shame! For fuzz is also part of a good peach.?%

12 [21]?

To our ancestors it seemed godless to grub around for treasures in the bowels of the earth: now there are new insatiable

people!

12 [22]?°"

When you felt horror while doing something harmful, then you said: this is "evil": but when you felt disgust, then "that which is bad" emerged.

12 [23]

Virtue as the final result of much expended work and effort; yet later on appearing for the first time in individuals.

"Talent" is the same – a well-trained mechanism.

362 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

12 [24]

To judge: this is to affirm a feeling – i.e., to recognize a feeling again (which presupposes comparison and memory).

12 [25]

To clean up the inner world! There are still false entities there! For me, feeling and thinking are sufficient. "Will-ing," as a third something, is a fantasy. In general, all drives, demands, aversions etc. are not "unities," but rather seemingly "simple states." Hunger: this is an unpleasant feeling and knowing how to end it. It can even have developed unknowingly out of a series of movements by the organism which are instrumental in eliminating the hunger: the stimulus of this mechanism is felt at the same time as the hunger.

12 [26]

The image prior to an action is not a concept of it, but rather an ideal – – – –

12 [27]

How the organs develop diversely out of a single organ, e.g., the nervous system and brain out of the skin: in the same way,

all feeling and representing and thinking must also have originally been one thing: therefore sense impressions a /ate unique phenomenon. This unity must be present in the inorganic: for the organic begins already with separation. The effect of inorganic entities on each other should be studied (it is always an effect at a distance," thus some "knowing" is necessary prior to any effect: what is distant must be perceived. The sense of touch and the sense of muscle movement must have their analogues:)

12 [28]

The movements of the foot during walking and slipping – are they really the results of conscious purposeful placements like this and like this? But even all conscious exercise is not what we think it is. Most of the movements during practice are experiments, and the intellect affirms the successful ones, it does not produce them. This affirmation is very superficial, because the intellect's image of the process is very vague.

12 SUMMER 1883 363

–

The innumerable subtleties cannot be explained in this way: they would have to have been practiced, tried out and affirmed by an infinitely more subtle intellect and observed by entirely different sense organs than we possess. – Hence intellect does not explain those adaptations; nor does "exercise."

12 [29]

All morality is really just a refinement of the measures that all organic entities take in order to adapt and while still nourishing themselves and gaining power. The relationship of one human being to another can be mechanistically expressed as an alteration of the arc of the motion"" of its being.

Even the most subtle alterations in consciousness must first be mechanistically possible before they can occur. In this way, even expressions of the will are dependent on mechanistic preconditions.

12 [30]

ut let us pause at the feeling of will! at are we conscious

But let us p t the feeling of will! What of as "will"? Here we recognize that will is merely a hypothesis.

It could be true – or maybe not.

There is no "will" beyond that of which we are conscious.

l.e., we have poetically asserted the will as an addition to certain appearances of consciousness: like "matter" as an addition to other things.

r [31]

Everything organic differs from the inorganic (in that) it collects experiences: and is never identical to itself in its processes. – In order to understand the essence of the organic, we must not regard its smallest form as its most primitive form:

instead, every smallest cell is now heir to the entire organic past.

364 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

12 [32]210

The quantity of compensatory systems in the body p. 195.

12 [33]

Consciousness localized on the surface of both hemispheres.

– Every "experience" that we have is a mechanical and chemical fact that cannot stand still but rather "lives": yet we know nothing about it!

12 [34]

Wherever we have life, we presuppose "mind": but the mind that is known to us is completely incapable of doing anything.

How impoverished is every image of consciousness! It is probably itself only the effect of a change that now draws after itself a further change (action). Every action that we "will" is in every way imagined by us merely as the illusion of an appearance.

–

All consciousness merely a secondary manifestation" of the intellect (?) What we are conscious of cannot provide the cause for anything.

Just compare digestion and what we perceive of it!

12 [35]

Will is only known to us as something conscious. Yet those sudden explosions are made obscure and unclear when we supply them with such an "inner world."

12 [36]

Cherubini influenced by Gluck and Haydn, Spontini by Gluck, Beethoven, as dramatist, by Cherubini: Gluck by Lully and Rameau. Wagner by Euryanthe!? (whereas he pretends that it's Gluck).

r [37]

Our intellect can definitely not grasp the multiplicity of clever interplay, much less produce it, e.g., the process of digestion. It is the interplay of very many intellects!

Everywhere

12 SUMMER 1883 365

that I find life, I find this interplay already happening!

And

there is even a ruling intellect is there among the many intellects.

– Yet as soon as we think of organic actions as performed with the help of many intellects: they become completely incomprehensible to us. Instead, we must think of the intellect itself as an ultimate consequence of those organic actions.

12 [38]

The nature of heredity is completely obscure to us. Why is an action “easier” the second time around? And “who” feels this greater ease? And does this feeling have something to do with the fact that the action is done the same way the second time around? In that case, the feeling of different possible actions would certainly have to be imagined prior to the deed!

12 [39]

The powerful organic principle impresses me so much, especially the ease with which it incorporates inorganic material.

I don't know how this functionality is to be explained simply by increase. I would rather believe in the existence of eternally organic entities. –

12 [40]

Listen to me for a bit, oh Zarathustra – said a pupil one day – there is something whirling around in my head; or, I would almost like to think, my head is whirling around something in such a way that it is spinning.

What then is this, our neighbor? Some facet of us, changes in us, that we have become aware of: our neighbor is an image.

But what are we ourselves? Are we ourselves not also merely image? A facet of us, changes in us, of which we have become aware?

Our self that we know: is even this not merely an image, something outside of us, something outside, something outer?

366 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

We are always coming into contact merely with the image and not with ourselves.

Are we not just as foreign to ourselves and just as close as a neighbor?

Truly, we have an image of people – we created it out of ourselves. And now we apply it to ourselves – to understand ourselves! Oh yes, to understand!

The state of our self-understanding is bad, so absurdly bad! Our strongest feelings: insofar as they are feelings, are something outside us, something outer, image-like: they are similes.

And what we have called inner world elsewhere: alas, it is for the most part impoverished and deceptive and hollow and poetic!

12 [41]

I'm tired of the happiness of human virtue and reason: of their great human beings, their redeemers, liberators, poets, sages, their just good compassionate serene conciliatory enthusiastic people.

n [42]?

Scientific people

Asceticism of the mind – addressed to the most intellectual. "Penitents"

Herd and I. Responsibility.

the Pharisee.

Inventor of festivals.

to ennoble what is nearest

Critique of morality: in order to make us independent of praise and blame

Compensation in the beyond? You want to be paid?

Homeless.

Purification from revenge, my morality.

The most influential people lived in the greatest concealment.

1 SUMMER 1883 367

Culture – that thin little apple skin!

People not equal!?!4

the noble person a result of much work Inventors of new states of the soul the true inventors. They are imitated.?!°

Power wants to expend itself: not happiness.

"like a sweet smell"

the weak are the danger

the higher caste, mightier yet poorer.

To bring about the triumph of our ideal – struggle for power in a manner that follows from the ideal.

Individuals live on within their impulses. Fame.

The need to purify the inner world and to learn!

The murder-of-God penitents and their festival.

To wean human beings from feelings of "guilt" and "punishment"!

12 [43]?!

I don't want to be mixed up and confused with others

There are those who preach my doctrine of life: but at the same time they are preachers of equality: I don't want to be mixed up and confused with them

People are not equal: thus speaks justice. I will tell you such things another time.?!"

Yet life, when it proclaimed its law to me in total secrecy, added: "and people should not be equal either!"

Humans should keep becoming ever more unequal – for the sake of the superhumans! – that's the way my love itself wants it!

Whatever the father kept quiet, the son speaks of openly.

And often the son is merely the father's madness revealed.

A careworn conceit, a suppressed envy: this bursts forth in the son as flame and madness of revenge.

This is what justice means to me – so says this madness – that I take revenge and curse all those who are not my equals.

368 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

And "will to equality" – this should become the name for virtue: may my screaming about virtue rise up against everything that has power!

He preaches life in order to hurt those who themselves turn away from life: for they are mightier than he and purer of heart.

But he himself sits in his cave turned away from life: and spinning webs and eating flies like a spider is not what I call

life.

His wellspring of revenge always flows too strongly: and he always empties the cup at the same time he wants to fill it.?!3

This courtliness should also be present in speech: he who could command conceals his kingly hands beneath his robe, he persuades through his beauty, instead of commanding."" "Everything about the world displeases me: this is how he thinks – but most of all how I displease everyone." That is why he speaks of the future.?"°

Finally:

He offends my taste: this is the argument I use to fight against him.

There is no fighting about taste? Oh you fools, all of life is fighting about what is tasty and what is taste and this must be the case.??!

And I myself, my foolish friends! – what then am I if not something to fight over: a taste!???

This advocate of life sits in the belly of a whale: the whale that he preaches against keeps him swallowed up.???

I want to bring his secrets to light: then I will laugh my laughter of the heights into his envious countenance.*°

Not with serpent locks of fear do I want to defend myself against what you teach, you preachers of equality: I protect myself from you using only beauty as my shield!??

What I love about the wind is its invisibility: and only in this way would I like to become visible, as a flame on the mast

12 SUMMER 1883 369

becomes visible: – full of astonishment, solitary voyagers see the good sign??°

He would like to be regarded as a god: but for that to happen he would have to conceal his face and shroud himself in the veil of Isis.

But I say to you: those who make an enemy of their age have yet to transcend it fully enough.

The tyrant's will cries out of him, demanding equality: his word "equality" is a tyrant's lie and seduction

That humans be redeemed from revenge – this, truly, is the rainbow of the superhumans and a bridge to the highest hope.???

12 [44]

"We have the task of teaching bears to dance: but must we ourselves be dancing bears to do it?"

So you want to tell me, you teachers: "we want to be educators: but we ourselves are not educated."

The last thing I want to do is to injure your vanity, you teachers! I have already seen too much tragedy grow out of injured vanity.

12 [45] Contest of the affects.

12 [46]

History of value judgments concerning food.

What is the value of having done (eaten) such and such – and not something else?

12 [47]? Scholars. Poets.

Great events. Prophets.

370 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

On redemption. Human prudence. stillest hour.

12 [48]

It has nothing whatsoever to do with the right of the stronger, but rather the stronger and the weaker are all equal in that they extend their power as far as they c(an)

12 [49] Superior h(umans) like Napoleon Affects in them Mutual appraisal

Compassion and a sense of community

[13 = Z I 4. Summer 1883]

13 [1]! Zarathustra's Holy Laughter.

The hand moved forward, the clock of my life took a breath: never have I heard such stillness surround me: so much so that it startled me.

Then life spoke to me without language: the hour has come for you to preach redemption from redeemers.?

Your minds were not yet a source of worry and heartache: your bread of life was sour, but not yet completely soured by thoughts.'

As a hunter Zarathustra set forth, hunting ugly truths: he would often return home from the forest in a dark mood.*

Oh human, this is what your knowing is: to spin and construe all things to your best advantage. To me, you all are spinners and construers, you who know!

Experience came imperiously, but my will spoke to it: then it was already on its knees, pleading.

372 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Don' you feel the thirst and the hot breath of the sun? It wants to be nursed by the ocean and drink its depths up to itself in the heights.

And now the ocean's lust rises with a thousand breasts. It wants to be kissed and nursed by the sun's thirst: it wants

 to become air and height and the path of the light. And for this reason, like the sun, the ones who know love life: they want
 to carry the profoundest things back up to their heights.°
 Don't dancers have their ears in their toes?'
 Are you a star? Then you also must want to wander, you inconstant one, and to be without a home.®
 My ocean floor is still: who would have guessed that it conceals playful monsters!
 My depths are unshakeable: yet they shine with swimming riddles and with laughter.
 See how the woman struggles against herself and how she runs the comb against the defiance and will of her golden hair!
 They shoot off their mouths: and now we are supposed to think that it is out of the abundance of their hearts.
 I don't take you too seriously, you contemporaries: to me, you are thin and transparent: torn veils, through which eternity gazes. And how could I ever want to live among you if I couldn't look upon what is behind you and ahead of you!
 I did not find you necessary: you don't even seem superfluous to me. Truly, there is little about you that is capable
 of overflowing.!!°
 A star went under and disappeared: but its light is still on
 its way. And tell me, will you: when will it cease to be on its way?!
 13 SUMMER 1883 373
 Is the ocean not the greatest peacock of all? It rolls out
 its silver train upon soft sand, its topmost plumes of silver and of silk: when will it ever grow weary of itself? Life is in love with itself in the very same way.!?
 Midnight looked at me with drunken eyes: solitude cow-ered next to her and the gasping stillness of death, the worst of my girlfriends.'?
 And the thirst of the ring, eternally the same, is also my thirst for myself: to reach itself again, every ring twists

and coils itself."
 You make me laugh, you who limp along! But beware of those who have the will and are in a hurry: that you don't feel
 the weight of their heels!
 Do you want to be a stumbling block to all those who stride ahead? Then go to meet them and keep your head turned backward!
 Fear those who have withdrawn! Fear the tiger who prepares himself to spring!!®
 Up to now your spring poured forth too mightily: it always immediately emptied the cup in the very act of wanting to fill it.!7
 Stillness. Modesty at the heights.
 I wish to adorn myself with the garbage that falls from the table of life: and with peels and clam shells and thistles I want to be more beautifully adorned than you!'® Your good deeds should fall like dew upon the grass, then, when the night is most secretive."
 374 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 I think I am capable of any evil: that's why I demand, especially of myself, that which is good!?"
 Whether you sing your own praises as poets or as dancers:
 whether you call yourselves the voice of the people and the servants of the public good.
 Whether you teach or paint or compose or play the game
 "Black on White"?!
 To me, you are children, all devoted to one principle and one obsession: which says "thou shalt – make a name for thyself."
 Yet there are others, less common, who have a name: but they would like to be rid of it and erase it from all tablets.
 They hide their heads in the brush and in caves or they baptize themselves with false names: so that their terrible queen?"
 fails to recognize them and hurries by them in her wrath.
 Who is the terrible queen by whom they do (not) wish to be found???
 I call it mercy and merciful disposition, to take another's injustice on our shoulders and to gasp under a double burden.*
 What makes your actions good is not their reason or purpose: but rather that your soul trembles and shines and overflows when you do them."

"the scholar">®

Now there you stand, so gaunt in your ribs that you are astonished at yourself.

And thus do you speak: did a god secretly steal away with something of mine while I slept? Truly, he did steal away with enough to make a mere woman" out of it.

Wondrous is the poverty of my ribs!®

See him, how he swells and overflows with compassion for everything that is called human: his mind is already completely drunk with compassion; soon he will be doing incredibly foolish things.

13 SUMMER 1883 375

I come from there like a strong wind; and to those who despise me I give advice like this: when facing the wind, be careful not to

– spit?

You wanted to sap the strength of sickness and, in my view, you have sapped the strength of the sick, you witch doctors and saviors!°9

Where I live is too high and too steep for you: I built my nest in the tree "Future,"*! I have become my only contemporary. Whenever those who could command, persuade and hide their kingly hands beneath their robes: I call this courtesy."

My savage wisdom got pregnant atop lonely mountains: it brought forth its young, the youngest of all, on bare stones.

Now it runs foolishly through the harsh desert and seeks and seeks for soft grass – my old savage wisdom.

On the soft meadow grass of your hearts, my friends! – on your love it would like to take to bed what is most dear to it!

But what is happening to me??

What everyone knows is being forgotten by everyone; and if it weren't for the night, who would still know what light is!

Truly I say to you: Intransitoriness is only a symbol. (The thirst of the ring*

We despise everything that can be explained. A bit of stupidity let itself be surprised and stood there naked before the person explaining it.

Have you ever really seen people who did things to their own advantage?

A god who loved us would have had to do a few foolish things for our sake! What do I care about your praise of your god's "wisdom"!

376 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Your happiness is still young: be patient with it!

Bad air surrounds you: this is caused by thoughts that are floating around right now."

Not long ago I saw an image in the sea, the image of a goddess: languidly and treacherously the wave crept around her white breasts.

The sand has covered half of her and the jealousy of the wave the other half.>°

For too long I belonged to solitude: thus I have unlearned silence.

I have become nothing but mouth and the roar of a stream from high cliffs: I want to send my words cascading into the valleys.?"

I cannot abide any of you, you nightwatchmen and tomb-watchers and anyone who does nothing but blow a dismal horn.?®

I laugh at your free will and even at your unfree will: to me, everything you call will is a delusion, there is no will.

This delusion that you call will gave birth to itself in pains and thoughts. And because there is no will, there is also no absolute obligation.'

I probably drew this conclusion: yet now it's drawing me!"!

Humility has the thickest pelt.

Even what we have left undone weaves the fabric of the entire future: even nothingness itself is the master weaver of all weavers.??

13 SUMMER 1883 377

Many grow weary of themselves: and only then does their happiness begin.

If you want to drive well, then hitch a little donkey in front of the stallions of your will!

I have been wounded by my happiness: all those who suffer ought to be my doctors!
Those who do not believe themselves are always lying.*4
When your hatred and your envy finally grow lazy and stretch their limbs: your sense of justice awakens and rubs
its sleepy eyes.
"those who know"

With their virtues wasted away to nothing and their fragile souls, they have been sitting for far too long in the shadows:

therefore – they starved to death from their expectations.
"the great one"

As I turned away from myself, only then did I jump over my own shadow: and truly, my friends, into the middle of my sun!

Am I not modest? I live at the foot of my heights and I have never seen my peaks: my humility cannot be convinced of anything. Every intellect comes to – me: I love it because it

wishes to be my intellect.

I was robbed of whatever I loved completely: now my love overflows in torrents, down to the evening and the morning; out of taciturn hills and thunderstorms of pain, my soul roars

into the valleys.*°

378 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

("those who know")

You have been haggling with your own minds, you have poisoned your blood with haggling: only by bleeding to death can you find an antidote for your poison!

"Genius" Has a superhuman ever lived?

A horrid ringed worm has crept into the mask of a god: for all too long I was made to play the fool by godlike skins:
serpent-coils were the entrails with which they were stuffed!

And I believed I saw a god's soul at play: serpent-filth and foul odor concealed the disguise from me. A salamander's trick was sneaking around inside the mask of a god!?

To sanctify laughter and to stretch it like a multicolored tent across the world – that's why I have come: to create a new sky with stars and new wonders of the night, and I was able to reach you by creating blacker nights for you.

I yearn and I look into the distance: on you, my eagle, I lay

my hand, now tell me what was the most distant thing that eagle eyes saw!

"It is showing itself" you tell me? No, my brothers, it is withdrawing, and it will withdraw more and more!*

(Contemporaries)

And anyone who knows how to remove mountains will also remove the valleys and the lowlands.*°

My drink should make you sneeze, and my sparkling wines should tickle your noses and fill you with lust.>!

The wave roared through, and the child is crying because the wave swept his toy into the abyss: but the very same wave has poured a hundred other toys out into the soft sand for him. So don't cry over me, my brothers, about my passing through."

13 SUMMER 1883 379

There should be no fighting about taste? Oh you fools, all of life is fighting about what is tasty and what is taste, and this ought to be the case"?

I smell the smell of your dust, your souls have not been aired out for so long.

I do not direct my teaching at your ears: but rather at your hands. Do as I do: only doers learn: and only as a doer will I also be your teacher. Better to be a poor imitation of me than to sit on your hands and worship!°4

Truly, I have as little love for hot, moist minds as I do for chilled ones: yet if they ever come together, then something emerges that I love – a brisk blast of wind.

I thought I had landed on an island: but it was a monster that was sleeping.

I have yet to see a downfall that was not a procreation and a conception.

That a bolt of lightning would strike your feed, and your maws would have to feed on fire! –"

I have not yet walked through fire for the sake of my teachings: but my teachings walked forth out of my fire.

It was a human being who hung on the cross for two millennia: and a ghastly god had his cruel way with him and called it love.

"Everything about the world displeased me: yet most of all I was displeased that everything displeased me."

I have already bid many a farewell: but I did not slam the door – and that's why your dull ears never heard a thing.

380 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

How ridiculous I find everyone who wants to convert anyone!°

You come to me whether I want you or not: yet just as I must give to you, so you must take from me – you must take me!"

I want to be a white steer and go before the plowshare snorting and bellowing: and just as my serenity lies down in the sun, so should my happiness smell like the earth.*8

Wildly my eagle beats its wings against my will: but its surge founders on this cliff."

What does "experience" still mean to them? Events sit on p them like mosquitoes, their skin is still being pierced, but q sp their hearts are no longer aware of it.

I don't like this pale, fat moon: in truth, I have never thought him to be the "man" in the moon. He is only a monk to me, with wet cheeks, a lecher: lecherously he creeps around all dark corners and peers into halfclosed windows – he, the most jealous of all tomcats who wander the rooftops at night!

He is jealous of all lovers, the pale fat monk in the moon!

It is night: once again above the rooftops

The moon's plump face in promenade.

The most jealous of all tomcats, he Looks jealously down upon all lovers

This pale fat "man in the moon."

Lecherously he creeps around all dark corners,

Leaning, braced against half-closed windows,

Like a lecherous fat monk he treads

Impudently at night on forbidden paths.

13 SUMMER 1883 381

Oh beyond this simulated light, this sweetened sickly air!

Here where the soul is never allowed to fly to its heights, but rather is supposed to merely kneel – to the heights above.

Oh life! I look into you as into an eye.

What I can see of you is this, that you look at me: what I can figure out about you is this, that you have figured me out!

It is winter, today I want to dance. I have enough warmth

for this snow; I want to climb the mountain, there my warmth can wrestle with the cold winds.

Am I not the meteorological divide? Don't all winds come to me and want to know my will? I will lay my hand on everything that is to come.

You think everything is the wild play of giants and the clumsiness of giants' fists? Yet a single word arriving on the feet of a dove guides the will of these wild ones – a word of value:

and such words come from the most profound stillness.°?

It is night: now all gushing fountains speak more loudly: and my soul, too, is a gushing fountain.

It is night, now all the songs of those who love have just awakened: and my soul, too, is the song of someone who loves.

My life is fire and burning: and the incense of my life being sacrificed lives longer than the sacrifice. Its fragrance flies far across the ocean: it shakes the solitary voyager to the core.

Here is autumn and harvest and plenty and afternoon and distant seas: but right now I must be a bird and fly onward above you toward noon: knowing your autumn, I prophesy for you your winter and your icy poverty.

382 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Be honest: I have figured out what is the best thing for you to believe. Now I want all of your knowledge to serve this best belief!

My speech flows too slowly. I shall spring into your carriage, you storm, and I want to whip even you with my wickedness: we want to journey over the vast seas like a cry and like a cheer.

Perfection throws a shadow ahead of itself: I call this shadow beauty – the lightest and stillest of all things came to me as shadow of the superhumans.

My words should root around like the snout of a boar in the soil of your souls: I want to be called a plowshare.°*

What is happening to me? My fountains have run dry and my ocean has receded: does my foundation want to crumble and engulf me in its own depths?

— Onward to immortality! Via Appia.®

And there, where your understanding has sprung a leak, you quickly stick the poorest of all plugs: his name is “God.”

I want to vanish in a dark thunderstorm: and in my final moment I want to be human at the same time as I am lightning.

My sweetest word is now becoming like sourdough to you:
revenge is bringing you to fermentation for me, and when for mysakeyouare completely activated and risen with your malice and your revenge, only then will I find you tasty.°7

I want to bring your secrets to light: which is why I laugh my laughter of the heights into your countenance.

13 SUMMER 1883 383

Your countenance is dark to me, you people eager for action:
the shadow of your hands plays around your countenance, the meaning of your eyes is hidden from me.

A thought, asleep in granite, awaits the one who will awaken
it.

In the belly of the whale I become the advocate of life.

I have seen all of you naked: and how do I now separate those of you who are good from those of you who are evil!

My blissfulness arrives like the winds of a storm: and,
without wanting to, it flings against hard walls those clumsy people who do not know enough to flee from it.

He is sinking, and his demons pull him down: and the more he sinks, the more intensely shines the light of his eyes

and the desire to be with his god.

Contemporaries

You crash up against me, for I am striking you with my oar — and still you must carry even my boat” into immortality.”!

It is life that cuts even into life: it increases its own wisdom

through the agony it causes itself.

A child will hold the mirror for me, the mirror upon which the world is inscribed.”

He solves his riddles, but he does not liberate them: they do not fly up transformed into heavenly children.

My thoughts are colors: my colors are songs.

My knees were trembling for the very first time as I found my way and walked onward: and anyone who saw this, told me: you have unlearned the way, now you are unlearning even how to walk.

384 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Now I have unlearned even how to will: accustomed to climbing, I am raised up and pulled aloft by the ether on golden threads.

Did I ever fall asleep on my fame? Every kind of fame has been like a bed of thorns to me."

All beauty lures me away beyond you humans: all beauty lures me away from all gods: so I cast my anchor upon the open sea and said: "let the island of the superhumans be here

one day!"

And when your beauty itself no longer preaches penitence, what will your words achieve!

The neck of an ox – and the eyes of an angel, these are what I want you to have!

I have become blind.

My blindness and the tapping and probing of a blind man may yet tell you of the power of the sun that I saw.

That, long ago, knowledge once learned to smile serenely and without being jealous of beauty

You stood liberated from all intellect, a sanctuary and joyful place for the intellect. Yet now I want it this way: not only should my virtue occupy your city – it should possess it;

you shall become possessed by my virtue.

I impatiently endured the winter: now even the malice of April is playing with my impatience, and often I foam over at its halting gloom and its – derisive snowflakes.

13 SUMMER 1883 385

For the first time I once again brought together the just people, the heroes, the poets, the sages, those who know, the prophets, the leaders: I erected my vault above the peoples: pillars on which a firmament rests – strong enough to bear a firmament. (Superhumans should speak in this way!)

Justice appeared before me: then I destroyed my idols and felt ashamed. I submitted to a penance and forced my eye to look upon where it did not like to look: and to bring love there."

the highest form of passion, the streaming passion grown still [(Conclusion) – and all those who must someday suffer felt themselves, as sacrificial lambs, to be already anointed and to be consecrated by tears. You call it my "happiness" –

His power streams forth out of the fullness of simplicity.

"Alas, must I then become a god?" – he spoke.

like a waterfall that pauses while cascading –

we want to saturate nature with what is human and liberate it from godly mumbo jumbo. We want to take from nature what we need in order to dream something above and beyond humans. Something shall yet emerge more splendid than storms and mountains and sea – but as son of man!"

You come from there, heavy and creaking, like wagons carrying stones downhill: yet your dignity is precisely that which reveals your downhill path – the depths are drawing you to them!

with a well-worn sharpened tongue

386 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

I wanted to catch a fish and threw my net into the sea – but there I drew forth the head of an ancient god: thus did
the sea give me, the hungry one, a stone."

What are your father- and motherlands to me! I love only my children's land, yet undiscovered, for whose sake I tell my sail to run over the sea and search: in this way I want,

through my children, to make up for the fact that I am my father's child."

Your virtue should benefit only that for which you despise yourselves and whatever is beneficial to yourselves. Otherwise

let contempt for whatever is beneficial occupy your virtue's gaze."

My eagle is a ripping robber and raptor: may it be called a danger to all little white sheep!®

Are you familiar with the terror of falling asleep? Sleepers are shaken to the depths of their being because the floor falls away and the dream begins – and they often awaken again from this terror.®!

Your sayings and puny truths flourished near the swamps, didn't they? Yet I still hear a cold frog croaking within them.®?

You must learn to build anew with mountains: it means little that you can remove mountains, you who know! And whoever removes mountains, removes lowlands as well.®3
How would you be tolerated if your cold need and powerlessness had not been shattered by lightning and covered with colorful weeds! As ruins and victims of your misfortunes, you

ought to have a right to exist!

13 SUMMER 1883 387

For you, beauty shouldn't be a hunger, but a taste; for you, your need should be called beauty: or I don't want you.
Your desire ought not to be silenced and sink into satiety, but rather into beauty —: the shadow of gods to come ought to make you silent.

What is it, anyway, that is sought by all those who create?
They are all seeking new languages: they always grew tired
of

the old tongues: their minds have no desire to keep walking on these completely worn-down, thinning soles.

Your gazing at distant oceans, your desire to set foot on
the cliffs and their summits — it is only a language for your long-

ing. Your gazing and your desire are only seeking humans and that which is more than human!

Whatever contradicted them and inflicted pain, they called God: such was the way of these heroes. And they didn't know any other way of loving their God than to nail a human being to the cross.®*

And therefore let us be enemies, my friends! Just as the arches in the vault above you break into pieces and play off against one another:

as light and shadow, in their enmity, are secure and beautiful like gods above you: in this way, your thoughts, and those of your friends, ought to be secure and beautiful like gods

in their enmity.

You don't want to hear that someone is strolling around above your heads. And so you put wood and earth and refuse between him and your heads — that's how you muffle the speech of his steps.®

388 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

You put all human error and weakness between yourselves
and me: you call this a dead floor in your houses.

But in spite of this, I stroll around with my thoughts above your heads: and even if I wanted to stroll around on my own errors and dead floors, I would still be above you and your heads! *°

And now the ice and innocence of my peaks are also still aglow.*"

You who desecrate, do you still not understand what desecration does? The toppled ornamented column lay in the slime of your contempt: – and it is precisely out of your contempt that the column's life, and living beauties, suddenly awakened again.

It arose with more godly features and seductively suffering, you desecrators of the ornamented column! – and still it thanked you for its deification!®®

Dionysus on a tiger: the skull of a goat: a panther. Ariadne dreaming: "abandoned by the hero, I dream about the super-hero." Keep quiet about Dionysus!

Every action requires interpretation: it beckons to all solvers of riddles. I gave new words and methods to the interpreters:

so that they can make better forecasts of human weather.°?

I am a seer: but my seeing is followed inexorably by my conscience: thus I am also the interpreter of my visions.

Black ponds from which the sweet gloom of a toad sings forth: this is what you are to me, you priests. Who among you could stand to show himself naked!

You do well to lay out your corpse in black, and I hear the evil-spiced dullness of death chambers resounding from your speeches.

13 SUMMER 1883 389

How I hate the lying convulsions of your humility! In your kneeling I see the habits of slaves, you lickspittles of your God!

Yesterday, when the moon rose, I thought that it wanted to give birth to a sun: it lay there on the horizon so wide and heavy with young.

But it was a liar with its pregnancy: and I no longer believe either in the man in the moon or, truly, even in the woman in the moon. – I am giving you this parable, you enthusiasts and moon-children.

Barren and yellowed it rose, and it got smaller and smaller, looking paler and more deceptive as it climbed. Truly, its bad conscience shone forth from within, the old lecher.

It lusts for this earth and yet this lust makes it ashamed, it would much rather imbue its glances with holiness and abnegation.

And even if you, too, lie broad and heavy with young on the horizon: truly, for me you will not give birth to a sun!

(Romantics)

Lusting for the earth: yet your bad conscience bites you in your lust: that's why you choose melancholy."

To me, you are arid grass and steppe: but I want to make wildfires of you and heralds with tongues of fire?!

Life, I look within you as into an eye!

Gold flashes from his eyes: a golden bark floats there upon dark waters. Please look, for me: this gold dances leaps and crouches! ??

You are adept and have clever fingers. But you have no idea how to make a fist.

Not until your clever fingers have crept back into a fist
will

I want to believe in your power."

The worm-like thing I struggle against I first created for myself in the form of a dragon: it was still so young and tiny

and in this way I am fighting the fight with your future.

390 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

But if you wanted to fight and win, I would first have to turn the dragons of today into earthworms for you!?*

You are tools and watches to me and nothing more: thus I want to wind you up with my ridicule, and you will purr with contentment as I do it!"

And I still prefer to sleep on ox hides than on the bed of your complacency and love."

You see only my sparks, but you do not see the anvil that I am, you do not guess how cruel my hammer is.""

I do not want to turn you into stones and silence with serpent locks of fear: I protect myself from you, using only "beauty" as my shield.

Do you hear the sound and the laughter of this shield? It is the holy laughter of beauty: through it you are meant to be struck dumb for my sake?'

I know how to ride you: and anyone who knows horses well also knows just what it means to be in the saddle."

I still am like a cock in a strange barnyard, pecked at by hens.!°°

I want to be known as a fire and as a danger to all dried-
out

souls: glowing ashes ought to fly up from me.

Again I am solitary and exiled. I have been exiled into my solitude by my friends and by those who love me. For this is how I want to speak to my enemies.

I want to speak to those who hate me: perhaps I can persuade them more effectively than I can persuade my friends. And thus today is the day I lust for my enemies, the way I once lusted for all truth. Truth is what I once called everything that caused me pain and the greatest pain possible.

13 SUMMER 1883 391

I want to pour out all the evils of my soul against my friends: perhaps I would in this way seduce my enemies into that which guides me.

By your love? Alas, now it comes back to me, the ghastly knowledge – who was it who drove me into the wilderness and made me into someone wild?

All for naught! For naught! Yes, you yourselves drove out the wild one: it is the will of friends that made me into a cave bear.

Alas, who was it who made me solitary and wild and into a cave bear of the wilderness?

Alas, who exiled me among loveless stones and storms Did not cry out No!!" three thunderclaps and three lightning bolts striking at midnight?

And when I look into my picture book, a dog and a child should be looking over my shoulder.

Grace is part of the magnanimousness of those inclined to greatness.

Like buffalo, I sense you near the sand, even nearer to the underbrush, yet nearest to the swamp.!"?

With many small doses it is possible to cure a brave man and make him into a coward.!"%

You should pass by these enemies quietly and with a sleeping sword. Be careful not to attack them! for those who attack them sully themselves.

I, the earth-born one, am experiencing the ailments of the sun as my own eclipsing and as a great flood of my own soul.

392 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

I believed myself to be the richest one of all, and I still believe it: but no one takes from me. Thus do I suffer from the madness of the giver.!"

I do not touch their soul: and soon I will not even reach their skin anymore. The last smallest gap is the most difficult to bridge. Did I not cause you the most pain when I did what was most precious to me?!

My love and my burning hunger for them grows with my exile, and even the insanity of my love makes me more distant from them and less understandable.

But I am in exile: they have turned their eyes from me. And I do not even touch the skin of their soul anymore.

Alas, and now my hunger for them grows, ever since I have been known as the exiled one: and this insanity of love makes me even more strange and terrible.!"

My love of speaking. Against silent people.

With chests puffed out, and like those who are holding their breath: thus are you, you sublime ones! silent.

Beauty is what I call the revelation of what is good for the senses: of my good! for my – senses! And what intellect used to be now becomes only quasi-intellect for me!!%®

Now my hope has become too well fed: at this point, it has ceased to hope (I am no longer one of the ones who hope).

I flew too far into the future, I was overcome with horror.

When I finally looked around, behold, time was my only contemporary there. And so, I was longing for you, my contemporaries.

And even those who want to prepare poison for themselves must put on gloves of glass.!"

13 SUMMER 1883 393

I gave them their nothingness to feed on; then they choked on their nothingness.!!°

I held up a mirror to their ugliness: then they could not bear the sight of themselves: they came to grief on the evil eye of their own eyes.!!!

I did penance for all of this injustice, my admiration was even more unjust than my contempt.!!?

No matter how blind you already are: greater still is the will to blindness that I found in your eyes.

Alas, I know the blue evening distance of your deception:

truly, I prefer the lies of those who know they are lying to your

lies. 3

And you would be even less able to put up with my modesty than with my pride, if it ever wanted to speak.

My narrow path runs between two dangers: a pinnacle called "arrogance" is my danger, an abyss called "compassion" is my danger.

"How I will want to draw a breath and stretch my limbs when I will have borne my burden to the highest pinnacle!" – the hero often thought this on his way up. But when he was at the top, and had thrown down his burden, then he did not do this – then he overcame even his weariness: and here a godlike shiver ran through his body.

The electricity of my cloud was all too great and too long-lasting: between lightning and thunder, it finally hurled showers of hail and ice into the depths: it violently puffed out its chest and violently blew its storm clear across the mountaintains – thus came its relief.

394 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Truly, my happiness and my freedom arrive like a storm: But you think the evil one himself is racing over your heads!

Having laid his arm over his head: in this way the hero rests, in this way he also overcomes his resting.

Today I want to free my slaves and to be their servant and their sport: the drink of freedom should go to their heads and their hearts.

You now lie in the foreground for me, you contemporaries: if you don't want to become ruins for me, how could I bear to have you in my picture! And, for me, the best thing about you is your weeds!

The figs fall from the tree: they are sweet and good. And as they fall, their red skin rips. I am a north wind to ripe figs!"⁴

Are you afraid of the fervor of your tones, you harpers and poets? All your harping-jingle-jangle is ghost-breath and keen-

ing to me: you finger your scrawny strings with scrawny hands, but when would you ever have swept away a heart? – if it hadn't been swept away by pity at your poverty!!⁵

See that you do not smear or wash away the woman's likeness on my behalf, you fashionable people!

How high up do I live? Never yet – whenever I climbed – did I count the flights of stairs up to where I live: – yet

I know

this much about my pinnacle: the roof over my head begins in that place where all stairways end.!!®

—those who must be hauled up by their hair into heaven!!!

You throw dust around yourselves like sacks of grain, you scholars, and without meaning to! Still, who would have guessed that your dust comes from grain and from the golden bliss of summer fields?

13 SUMMER 1883 395

To the hero, the beautiful is the most difficult of all things:

for the hero, more than anyone else, the beautiful is unwinnable and unreachable.

A little more, a little less: just this is a lot here, just that is the most here.

We must speak to slack and sleeping senses with thunder-claps and heavenly fireworks: but the beacons of beauty speak softly, they tiptoe only into the souls of those who are most wide awake.

You claim to be made of finer cloth, you visionaries? But I say to you, you are only better at dressing and disguises,!!

® you know how to hide poor cloth beneath a cloak!!!”

Now and then even wretched people become honest: it happens rarely enough! — then it is advisable to listen to their voices and to climb into their swamp.

And once I, too, sat down among the reeds and in this way I heard the frogs of wretchedness make their confessions.!?”

And so proud of a handful of justice, you commit sacrilege against all things and drown the world with the waters of your injustice.

They stand on the street for hours, watching people passing by: and others of their ilk sit idly in their parlors, watching thoughts that pass them by. I laugh at these contemplative people.

396 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Tell them no, and spit at the same time: then they will quickly throw themselves to the ground and lick up your

spit-

tle. But among modest people every priest grows insolent:
his humiliation takes revenge on all who have been humiliated.

Nothing thirsts more for revenge than the humility of a priest.

With languid muscles, and beautiful, as befits a benevolent person: and truly: what is beauty, if not benevolence manifest-

ing itself?

When excessive power becomes benevolent and its benevolence descends into the visible: such descents are what I call beauty.

The sun never rose above the turbid sea of your soul: and you know even less of the sun's bliss as it sets.

My compassion became a murderer: and when I loved humans
the most, I nailed humans to the cross.

I am poorer now than any human being: the cup was emptied. My riches are gone: now truly, I myself have become human again.

I redeemed them from their redeemers. – Yet how could superhumans bear to understand humans! That's why humans must be persuaded to create them and to perish for their sake:

so that the superhumans can Jive?

The danger for superhumans is compassion. Let us avoid giving them compassion! – But my bliss now lies in my downfall. (From the final speech)

They want to use their virtues to claw out the eyes of their enemies. They rise up because they want to put others down.!"!

13 SUMMER 1883 397

I want to see only the gentleness in violent people as their selfovercoming, and I laugh at the weaklings who think themselves "good" because their claws are dull.

When have great people ever been their own followers and devotees? They definitely stepped away from siding with themselves when they stepped onto the side of greatness!

I truly want to be a power, but not some uncouth driver and beater:!!? instead, wherever a wind sweeps, I wish to sweep along within it: and even if I am otherwise invisible, I still want to become visible like a flame on the masts of solitary voyagers and explorers.!!?

You should grow like a column into the heights, ever more delicate and slender, but harder within yourself and with bated breath: thus does the column strive ever higher.

"This is how I would like to die! And to die once more! And 1" to live in order to die this way!" And yet, the moment she died, she was smiling: for she loved Zarathustra.
A storm rumbled from out of the sky, as yet unseen.
Then thunder rolled: and afterward came a stillness – this stillness wound itself around us as if with terrible coils,
and held us fast: the world stood still.!24
Then the woman proclaims the coming of the eagle and the serpent. The sign. Everyone fleeing. The plague.
She pulled Zarathustra's arm to her breast.
And, once again, the abyss drew a breath: it groaned and roared, its fire shooting upward.

398 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Here is the cave of the tarantula: do you want to see it?
Then buzz like a fly. Its web hangs here: touch it so that it trembles.
I want to teach you to dance ecstatic dances: for, to me,
you are the most melancholy of people. I want to cure your melancholy through madness.
He placed a naked image of a god there: in this way, the southernmost of all people still longs for a (second) south.
To me, you are a tarantula: and the triangle, the tarantula's identifying mark, sits black upon your back. Bite these shallow people for me, with your poisonous bite, so that for my sake their souls receive depth and melancholy and black scabs
for the first time.
To the teachers of pessimism.
B p]!?
Act 1. Zarathustra among animals. The cave.
The child with the mirror. (It is time!)
The different petitions, intensifying. In the end, the children seduce him with song.
Act 2. The city, outbreak of the plague. Zarathustra's appearance, healing of the woman. Springtime.
Act 3. Noon and eternity.

Act 4. The voyagers.

Scene at the volcano, Zarathustra dying among children.

Funeral rites.

Omens.

for 3.) Zarathustra saw and heard nothing, he was lost in rapture.

Then, step by step back into the most terrible knowledge.

The outrage of the disciples, departure of the most beloved

13 SUMMER 1883 399

ones, Zarathustra tries to stop them. The serpent feels for him with its tongue. He recants, excess of compassion, the eagle flees. Now the scene with the woman, in whom the plague resurfaces. He kills out of compassion. He embraces the corpse.

Then the ship and the appearance at the volcano. "Zarathustra is going to hell? Or does he now want to redeem the underworld?" – Thus the rumor spreads, he is also the evil one. Last scene at the volcano. Total bliss. Forgetting. Vision of the woman (or of the child with the mirror) The disciples peer into the deep grave. (Or Zarathustra among children at the temple ruins.)

The greatest of all funeral rites as the conclusion. Golden casket thrown into the volcano.

13 [3]}6

Put a saint on a ship: the ocean itself will flee before the saint and roar in fear. This is how the most peaceful of all humans brings on the storm: and anyone who was wind and wave will run away from me on quick feet.

Yes, I am a forest and a night of cypresses: but anyone who does not shy away from my darkness will also discover hanging beds of roses under my cypresses.

I want to give you clear sight and a dread of the real: in this way you should learn to float along after me into distant futures.

And do not be angry with me if I whip this puny god a little: he fell asleep on me here at the fountain, the dawdler; maybe he tried too hard to catch butterflies?

"I may have broken my wedding vows: but first my wedding vows broke me" said the woman.!7

400 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

"Now I have become a lake with white roses: the winds of the heights play with me and laugh like children. What haven't I forgotten! Who hasn't forgotten me! And often I still forget even my forgetfulness." Zarathustra among children. The distant cliff throws my word back at me and in this way mocks my forgetting – yes, I have forgotten it already, whatever I cried into the distance. Alas, what haven't I forgotten!

"He has already been in the underworld?" –

"Certainly he has been there: clearly he has been among us! Humans, humans alone are the underworld!"

"Zarathustra is dead? You don't know what you are saying! Don't we see him striding along! Truly, he still wishes to redeem the underworld and to bring it to light." – "He is going to hell, the devil will take him!" "Take my word for it, the devil will not take him – how would he manage that!, but he will take the devil for his own!" – The voyagers. The End.!8

"I have thrown my intellect into a pit of snow."

And if the stars don't want to fall from the sky for you, then throw your stars into the sky: let that be the extent of your evil.!2°

"I speak: for I have seen. Now I must be nothing but mouth: for recently I have been nothing but eye and innocence of the mirror" Thus speaks the artist.

"You know it, don't you, Pana my child, my little star, my golden ear – you know it, don't you, that you are dear to me as well?"

Love for me persuaded you, I see that: but I still do not understand the will of your love, Pana! –

13 SUMMER 1883 401

But as he saw his serpent's tongue touch him, then his face transformed itself ever so slowly: the gateway of knowledge reluctantly sprang open for him: like a lightning bolt the knowledge flew into the depths of his eyes and again like a lightning bolt: another moment, and he would have known – – When the woman saw this transformation, she screamed as if in the throes of distress. "Die, Zarathustra" – With his left hand he forced back the eagle, which was beating against him with the fury of its wings: it screamed, like someone advising him to flee; it would have loved to carry him away from there. At his right hand on the rock-slab table

Those who want to be merely spectators of life should be careful not to sit there, where the sun beats down on the stairs:

unless they want to become blind.

"And what should I do with your knife, Pana? Should I cut the golden grapes from the vine? Behold, what abundance surrounds me!"

And even at night he will not perish for your sake, but rather blood red, like a midnight sun, he will remain on the horizon.

People who wanted to conceal themselves, and had no choice but to be shamed by the clear sky, created for themselves these sweet-smelling caves.!!??

And only when grass and red poppies flourish on the walls, and the sky peeps through shattered ceilings, only then will I want to turn my heart toward these places of your god.'?!

How would I have endured it if I didn't love superhumans more than you!!*?

402 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

For what purpose did I give you the hundred-faceted mirror in the first place? And the eternal gazes?!

I overcame even love for you with love for the superhumans.

And as I endure you, you must endure yourselves, out of love for the superhumans.!!34

To me, you are the stone in which the most sublime of all statues sleeps: there is no other such stone.

And as my hammer swings at you, you should swing at yourselves for my sake! The call of the hammer should awaken the sleeping statue!!*

And should I want to mount my wildest steed, my spear will get me up there the best: it is the most ready servant of my feet.

The best mask we wear is our own face.!!36

Streets of tombs: leading wherever it is most beautiful, most clear and most bright. Not to dismal places.

And when I hold a mirror to my own beauty, my soul shudders with divine desires: and veneration is still part of my vanity.

And kings should still lead the ass of my wisdom.

And as I lay sleeping, a sheep was cropping the ivy crown on my head!

In striving upward against my burden I rejuvenated myself: and just when I became more hardened within myself, I also learned what grace is.!?7

13 SUMMER 1883 403

Inventive in small stratagems and lusting for those whose intelligence walks on lame feet: thus do they stand and wait before their wares, these hucksters!!38

Pity all those who love who do not also have a pinnacle that is even above love and compassion.!?%

On ashes, I stride up the mountain of ashes, at dusk: my shadow grows long and longer.

A boat floats in the depths of the violet-shrouded sea: its sailor stares up at me, his hand shading his eyes.

Now Zarathustra is journeying to hell – this is what the ferryman says shuddering and taps his cross.

Don't touch the cross on my account, you were wrong! The devil is not yet taking me, ferryman! maybe I am taking the devil

as my own!!*®

At the very least his hound of hell should answer to me I want an answer from the abyss of his jaws.

He should groan and roar his fire and ashes up at me: that's how I like monsters to answer me.!!*

Few understand the art of staying noble even while being reverent: and I much prefer to see shameless people and their innocence than the contorted eyes of your devotion and obeisance!

Now only the smallest gap still stands between me and you: but alas! Who has ever built a bridge across the smallest gaps?!42

Your knees pray for something and your hands are hosannas: but your heart knows nothing of it.!!*3

I once threw myself with giving hands into the heights: but as I was falling, I was caught upon three lances – in this way, as a sacrifice, I made my way from the heights to the earth.

404 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

I placed my foot on the lower jaw of the wolf: that's how I ripped his jaws open.

laughing, the kings of the North die –

a ribbon woven from the beard-stubble of a virgin and from the sound of feline footsteps –

Who will hold the basin up to my countenance, so that the viper's poison drips into it?

 I do not want wisdom to become a hospital and a poorhouse for mediocre poets.
 As if there were only one stile into the future: like sheep, they crowd around their stile:
 "the one who knows made into the one who creates"!

And what do you care if my torrent throws itself into false ways and impassable chasms: for how should a torrent not find its way to the ocean?
 Indeed, I have found a lake within myself: this lake is a hermit and is self-satisfied: my torrent of love threw itself into this lake: and now the torrent of my love is sweeping the lake along with it into the ocean!

"We have no opinion at all unless we are given one: and we are being given one.
 We have no strength at all unless we are thought to be strong:
 and everyone thinks us strong" –pitiful people, contemporaries.

I tolerate you and I carry you, up to now I have always found you to be lightweights. And even when I gasp under my own burden, loaded down with myself, what difference does it make that you beetles and sea slugs take your seats on my bundle!
 13 SUMMER 1883 405
 against "morality"

And when, instead of the pure "I will this," I heard the call
 "thou shalt" coming from clumsy maws, that's when my danger began: I hated my pure "I will this" coming from clumsy maws –
 I have annihilated your good and evil, I have torn these nooses
 to pieces: only in this way did I learn to love my goodness.
 The art of all tarantulas is black and blackening: yet I call tarantulas the necromancers of the mind, who are called the teachers of "the worst possible world."!44
 If there were gods, how could I stand not being a god? But there are no gods.!®
 His soul rejoices in secret over the fact that revenge is still being taken in every form of justice: and my soul rejoices over the fact that in every form of revenge a spark jumps from

the

anvil of justice.!?®

You are in love with great words the same way you are in love with colorful brats: and your foot knows how to hold festivals on carpets of lies, you milksops! (idealists)

You compassionate ones, when you throw yourselves down from the heights to the people below, what price did you put on broken limbs?!4"

But it was silent: terribly and doubly silent. Alas, you do not know it, the double stillness that ties up hearts until they shatter.!48

Alpa! I screamed. Fear and longing screamed forth from me: I wanted to hear a voice again

A voice coming from a human being, as it is carried away by a wind or a bird.

406 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Strong will? This is a lot, yet not enough: I need an enduring strong will, an eternal resoluteness born in hardness of heart.!?

How this laughter broke my windows! How it ripped apart my guts and slit open my heart!!°°

This is the most unforgivable thing about you: you have the power and you don't want to rule.

You see, don't you, the one they all need the most. This is the one who can command.

None of them want to bear the burden of those who don't take orders, but they accomplish the most difficult things if you order them to do so.'?!'

A will that demands monstrous things is rare: you will have an easier time finding a will that does them.

There is no longer a strong wind and will driving you: you are standing too stiffly for my taste, and your backs are too straight.

Alas that, already rounded and full of air like a sail, you went over the sea, and you were trembling at the storminess and breath of a will!

Now all air is heated, the breath of the earth is fire. Now you all go naked, you good and evil people! In this way, those who know will have their festival.

Yes, this is the world without clothes. What caused the earth to move? Was it not the stillest words of a saint? Every deep knowledge flows cold, the deepest wellsprings are ice cold: and that's why it is refreshing to all hot hands and heated doers.

13 SUMMER 1883 407

I love the turbulence of a bad reputation: just as the ship loves to hear the resistance of the wave through which its keel breaks. My own path seems easier when resistance foams around me.!*

But just as I was awakened by you and came to myself, so I tell you to awaken and to be awakened by yourselves.

And why did you not want, you too – my brothers – “to come to me?”!>4

Approach the wellspring with humble hands: this is how it will fill your hands most easily.

Redeemers? You were the binders and tamers:!*> you should be given that.!!°°

Today I am sick of people, today animals will be dear to me. And today I have buckets of love” to waste on them.

Oh, if only I could be a sower and a gardener among animals! I would certainly find an earthly realm there in which more eminent things would grow than the creatures I have grown so sick of.

Speak your word no matter what! Founder on it! What is it with you and your modesty! My modesty is unspeakable.'>®

You wanted to show that your grandfather was right and that truth has always been on the side of grandfathers.

For a grandfather belongs more to the people than any grandchild does.

You are looking back, even if you are going forward: and people can't help running into you a lot.!?

408 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

You really like to think you are building the city of the future: but, in addition to that, you are erecting the tombs and honors of past worlds.

13 [4]!°°

“Kill him, if you have to power to do so” – Zarathustra called out in a terrifying way once again; and his gaze pierced the thoughts of the king.

I recognize Zarathustra, said the king with a smile: who else

but Zarathustra would know how to abase himself in such a prideful fashion? But that which you rescinded was a death sentence.

– and (he) read slowly from the death sentence, with his voice half-lowered as if he were all by himself: he who deserves to die – Zarathustra, seducer of the people.

– deep in thought, he moved back a few steps, into the window bay; he didn't say a word and did not even look at Zarathustra. Finally, he turned toward the window.

You said it, King: the idol that goes before the people, the idol that turns them into idol-makers: the idol should become king to the people!

The time for kings has passed: the people are no longer worthy of having kings.

Destroy, you should destroy, oh King, the people who don't follow idols: these are humankind's worst enemies!

Trample the worm, that those who create!°! –

And if the kings themselves are of that ilk, then, oh King, destroy the kings, as you are able!

My judges and advocates of justice have reached an agreement to destroy a harmful human being; they are asking me whether I want justice to run its course or to let mercy prevail over justice.

What is more difficult for a king to choose, mercy or justice?

Justice, answered the king; for he was a man of mild disposition.

Then choose justice, and leave mercy to violent people as their means of overpowering themselves!

13 SUMMER 1883 409

Yet, as he looked out toward the window, he saw something, and then his face turned a different color.

Zarathustra, he said in the polite tone of a king, forgive me for not answering you immediately. You gave me a piece of advice: and, truthfully, I would love to listen to it! – But it comes too late! – With these words, he tore up the parchment and threw the pieces on the ground. Silently they took leave of one another.

Yet what the king had seen from his window, was the people: the people were waiting for Zarathustra.

13 [5]

All of you are not fighting for justice, you righteous people, but rather so that your image(s) of humans triumph.
And so that all your images of humans founder upon my image of superhumans: behold, this is Zarathustra's will to justice.

B [6]!%2

To the Teachers of Equality.

You don't want to hear that someone is strolling around above your heads. And so you put wood and earth and refuse between him and your heads.

That's how you muffle the speech of my steps.

You put all human error and weakness between yourselves
and me: you call this a dead floor in your houses.

But in spite of this I stroll around with my thoughts above your heads: and even if I wanted to stroll around on my own errors and dead floors, I would still be above you and your heads!

For people are not equal – thus speaks justice. And what I want, you are not permitted to want.!%

They want to use their virtues to claw out the eyes of their enemies: they rise up because they want to put others down.!%

64

"Now I am in the right" "now I am avenged" – this sounds similar and often doesn't just sound similar!!®

410 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

His bad qualities allow him to be rewarded whenever they have allowed themselves to be overcome by virtue!°®

In every one of his laments there is revenge.

I want to bring all of your secrets to light: that's why I laugh

my laughter of the heights into your countenances.

My sweetest word should become like sourdough to you:

for my sake, revenge should bring you to fermentation.

And not until you have overflowed the pot and floated away in your malice, will I want to taste you and find you tasty.!%

13 [7]! The Idol-Makers.

When your hatred and your envy finally grow lazy and stretch their limbs: only then does your sense of justice awaken

and rub its sleepy eyes.!®

My drink should make you sneeze: my sparkling wine should tickle your noses and fill you with lust!"°

To sanctify laughter and to stretch it like a multicolored

tent across the world – and whenever I had to create blacker nights for you, then I also brought you new stars and new wonders of the night.!7! My words should root around like the snout of a boar in the soil of your souls: I want to be called a plowshare.!7?

No matter how blind you already are: greater still is the will

to blindness that I found in your eyes."

Alas, I know the blue distances of your deception: and I prefer the lies of those who know they are lying to your lies.!74

Just there at the point where your honesty ceases, your eye sees nothing more."

The best mask we wear is our own face.!7°

What is the problem with them making sculptures of the gods naked? – In this way, the southernmost of all people still longs for new souths.!77

13 SUMMER 1883 411

13 (8)!78 The Penitents of the Mind.

Are you a star? Then you also must want to wander and to be without a home, you inconstant one!!7?

Now there he stands, so gaunt in his ribs that he is astonished at himself.!8°

And thus does he speak: "Did a god secretly steal away with something of mine while I slept?

Truly, he did steal away with enough to make a mere woman out of it. Wondrous is the poverty of my ribs."

Justice appeared before me: then I destroyed my idols and felt ashamed.

I submitted to penance: I forced my eye to look upon where it did not like to look – and to bring love there.!8!

And those wishing to prepare poison for themselves must put on gloves of glass.!8?

My admiration was even more unjust than my contempt.

The figs fall from the trees: they are sweet and good. And as they fall, their red skin rips. I am a north wind to ripe figs.!84

And full of pride at a handful of justice, you committed sacrilege against all things and drowned the world with the waters of your injustice.!8°

And whatever intellect once meant to me is only quasi-intellect to me.'8°

We can die of thirst longing for water in the middle of the ocean, and just as easily in the midst of truths that are all too

salty.!87

Those who go too far end up lying down to sleep even in the snow – out of fatigue.!#®

Pangs of conscience teach us how to bite.

Eventually the truth will really triumph, some kind of error was fighting on its behalf.!?°

Humans are the animals with red cheeks: humans are the animals that have too often had to feel ashamed of themselves.!”!

There are libertines of the mind: there are also penitents of the mind.!”

183

189

412 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

13 [9]! The Shortest Summer.

Up to now my spring poured forth too mightily: it always immediately emptied the cup in the very act of wanting to fill

ir.194

This is all April still and May and June: and the way I am, near snow, near eagles, near death I will have a summer, short, hot, gloomy, and overflowing with bliss.!?5

Alas at the halting gloom of my spring! Alas at the wickedness of my snowflakes in June!

It is night: now all gushing fountains speak more loudly. And my soul, too, is a gushing fountain.

It is night: and now all the songs of those who love have just awakened. And my soul, too, is the song of someone who loves."

If I were dark and of the night, how I would want to thirst for light and to drink the light!

I would bless you, you little twinkling stars and lightning bugs, and swallow you whole.

But now I am entirely engirded by the light and I squander it around me: alas, I do not know the pleasure of taking.

And often I have said to myself "Is it still more blessed to steal than to receive?" – thus I spoke from a great distance.

13 [o]!

Wherever I saw life, I found will to power: and there too, in the will of someone who serves, I found will to power.

We subjugate ourselves to something greater in order to gain mastery over something lesser: this pleasure convinces us to subjugate ourselves.

Whatever is not, cannot will! Yet whatever has existence – how could this still – “will to exist!”

You believe that you know things and all things: that’s why you posit value and tablets of goods. This is the superstition of all who make valuations

To me, you are only a river on which a boat floats along: yet in the boat sit value judgments in disguise, the solemn ones.

13 SUMMER 1883 413

Honest science begins in this way: it asks: what is? and not:

what is it worth?

Whatever is needed for human beings to remain in existence: these are our limits.!?®

Even your ideal is by no means your limit: your power extends further than the longing of your eye.

The sun went down long ago, the meadow is damp, coolness is coming from the woods: something unknown surrounds me and looks down pensively at me. What, you still live! Why do you still live?

Whatever moves us from within, this astonishes us, as something incomprehensible: now we invent sounds and words for it – and now we think, too, that it might have become comprehensible. This superstition is in everything that makes sounds:

the insanity of the ear.

Will to truth? Oh, my wisest brothers, this is a will to making the world conceivable.”

Even the world should now be visible in its smallest dimensions: then you think you can grasp it: this is the folly of the eye.

Let us speak of it: even if it is bad; to be silent about it is terrible!

I saw other oceans, their blue seemed unbelievable to me, it seemed to me like makeup on rough skin: the blood flowed down gray and ghastly. But here is the ocean’s blood – blue. Nothing is more costly than a false illusion about good and evil!

"A good human being is impossible: life itself contains nothing but ill-will, delusion and injustice. And this would be the ultimate will to goodness, to deny all life!"

With your good and evil you have estranged yourselves from life, made your will weary; and your assigning value was itself the sign of a will in decline, longing for death.

414 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

13 [r]200 The Way through Many Souls.

I come from there like a strong wind: and this advice I give to my enemies: when facing the wind, be careful – not to spit!%0!

I made my way through a hundred souls, I took my leave often, I know the heartbreaking final hours.??

Yet this is how my destiny wants it. Or to be honest with you: this kind of destiny is what – my will wants!

All who want to invent themselves must be regarded as lost for a long time.7%

When were great people ever their own followers and devotees? they stepped away from siding with themselves when they stepped to the side – of greatness!%?

I want to vanish in a dark thunderstorm: and in my final moment

I want to be human at the same time as I am lightning.?"

I probably drew this conclusion: now it's drawing me!

The wave roared through, and the child is crying because the wave swept his toy into the abyss. But the very same wave has poured a hundred other toys out into the soft sand for him. So don't cry over me, about my passing through!?"

And endless too, like the thirst of the ring, is my thirst for myself: every ring coils and twists in order to reach itself again.?"

Experience came imperiously: but my will spoke: then it was already on its knees pleading.?"®

I have already bid many a farewell, but I did not slam the door: that's why dull ears never heard a thing."

3 [r]210 On those who speak freely.

That a bolt of lightning would strike your feed and your maws would have to feed on fire for a time!?!?

You wanted to catch a fish and threw your net into the sea. But there you drew forth the head of an ancient god.?!?

Thus did the sea give you hungry ones a stone: you left it alone there.

13 SUMMER 1883 4IS

There the goddess lies forever: languidly and treacherously the wave creeps around her white breasts.

The sand has covered half of her and the reverence of the wave the other half."

Your sayings and petty truths grew well near the swamps, didn't they? Yet I still hear a frog croaking out of there!?!*

You are adept and have clever fingers, but you have no idea how to make a fist.

Not until your clever fingers have crept back into a fist,
will

I want to believe in your power.?"

You are but tools and watches to me and no more! Thus I shall wind you up with my ridicule and you will purr with contentment for me as I do it!?!°

"It has always been this way! And it will always be this way!"

And I would still prefer to sleep on ox hides than on the beds of your complacency."!"

We know a little too much about everyone. ?!?

13 [13]?

Against Mediators.

I am well disposed to all pure things: how could I be well disposed to you conciliators!?!°

All you mediators and equivocators, you half-and-halfers, you high-strung conciliators – you are not pure!

How much like gods the vaults and arches here break into pieces, as they wrestle: how they play off against each other with light and shadow, those who play like gods:

Therefore let us be enemies in a secure and beautiful way, my friends! Like gods – we want to play off against each other.??!

You obscurers, you ask what will become of you if you tell the truth –

but the truth should shatter the world, so that the world may be built!???

We should train our hearts by forcing them to do things.

416 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Those who give their hearts free rein, soon lose sight of their heads.

It is noble to be ashamed of our best things because we alone have them.

"I am annoyed: for you are wrong" – this is how a lover thinks.

I love life: I despise human beings. But it is for the sake of life that I wish to annihilate them.

13 [14]? Associates and Associations.

I don't take you too seriously, you contemporaries: to me, you are thin and transparent!??*

Torn veils through which the future gazes: half-open doors, at which gravediggers wait!

And how would I ever want to live among you if I couldn't look upon what is ahead of you!

I did not find you necessary, you don't even seem superfluous to me: there is little about you – capable of overflowing.

You crash up against me, for I am striking you with my oar – and still you must carry my boat into immortality."

And many a woman has said to me: "I may have broken my wedding vows but first my wedding vows broke me."??°

And if I am to love you completely, then you have to be my child or a work of mine.??7

Whoever does not make us fertile will certainly leave us indifferent.?*®

We can do good deeds for our neighbors, but we cannot create for them.?"?

Your will is still too proud and shy! should you wish to drive well, then hitch a little donkey in front of the stallions of your will!?30

They will build beehives like Towers of Babel?!

13 SUMMER 1883 417

13 [15]??? New Ways of Life.

What are your father- and motherlands to me? I love only my children's land, yet undiscovered, for whose sake I tell my sail to run over the sea and search.

Through my children I want to make up for the fact that I am my father's child: and thus to redeem the past.

To be a wish in every way and a bird on the way to faraway coasts: this is happiness for me.??

Whether the truth benefits or harms you or me – what do I care! Let us create people for whom the truth is beneficial!

B (16)?34

On Actors.

Is the ocean not the greatest peacock of all? Even in front
 of the ugliest of all buffalo it rolls out its train, it will never grow weary of its topmost plume of silver and silk.??
 The buffalo looks on obstinately, in his soul near the sand, even nearer to the thicket, yet nearest of all to the swamp:
 what are beauty and ocean and peacock finery to him!?*°
 To you actors, I give this parable. Truly, your spirit is itself
 the greatest peacock of all and an ocean of vanity.
 Your spirit wants spectators: even if they should be buffalo!
 You play: and you want spectators at your games – I call all of you actors.?*"

Whether you sing your own praises as poets or as dancers:
 whether you call yourselves the voice of the people and the servants of the public good:
 Whether you teach or paint or compose or play the game
 "Black on White," such a pathetic game:
 One principle and obsession speaks from all of your doings:
 I want to make a name for myself! – that's how it speaks.?7° Faith brings bliss – that's what you all say – especially faith in ourselves.?

I listened for an echo, but I heard only praise.?4°
 418 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

I wanted to build them and build them up – butthe rabble just wants to be astonished!
 Talking a lot about ourselves is also a means of concealing ourselves."4!
 13 [17]?

On Tarantulas.

_ Here is the cave of the tarantula: do you want to see it?
 Then buzz like a fly.
 Its web is hanging here: touch it so that it trembles.
 To me you are a tarantula: and your triangle and identifying mark sits black upon your back.
 Bite these shallow people for me with your most poisonous bite, so that their soul receives depth and melancholy and black scabs for the first time.
 I flew too far into the future, I was overcome with horror.
 And when I looked around, behold, time was my only contemporary there. In that place I was longing for you, my contemporaries!
 The art of all tarantulas is black and blackening: this is what

I call the necromancers of the mind, who are the teachers of the "worst possible world."

Do you want to make crooked all that is straight? Then think that time is gone and that transitoriness is a lie.? Thinking this is the worst form of madness, and tarantula venom. Your bones will think they are awl and your stomach that it is vomiting.

243

B [18]?

On Poets.

The intransitory – this is only a symbol; and poets lie too much.

They also know too little and are bad learners: that's why they have to lie so beautifully.

And clouds are their favorite things: they put their most colorful little brats up there and call them gods.

13 SUMMER 1883 419

And when they lie in the grass under the trees, and little impulses caress them: then they always claim that nature itself is in love with them.

And let it come to tell them secrets and to flatter them:

yes

the poets swell up and strut around on account of such intimacy beyond that given to all mortals.

He sinks and his demons pull him down: but the more he sinks, the more his eyes fill with glowing light and with lust for his gods.

I know how to ride you and how to saddle you anew. And anyone who knows horses also knows well what it means to be in the saddle.*°

You harpers and poets, what have you known up to now about the fervor of tones!

All your harping-jingle-jangle is ghost-breath and keening to me: with scrawny hands you rip into scrawny strings!??

And if the stars don't want to fall from the sky for you, then throw your own stars at the sky and let that be the extent of your evil!°48

We praise only what appeals to our taste; i.e., when we praise, we always praise our own taste: which really violates all standards of good taste!°4°

They thought they were being bold, whenever they said: "all knowledge is nothing."

"Boredom and lusts" – from this they wrote the story of the one who knows.

eager for things that old wives?" tell

"Praise be to the know-nothings and spiritually impoverished!"

you are making your listeners feel longing and pangs of conscience for whatever is no longer in them: yet I tell you:

you must make them thirsty for whatever "has yet to be"! Those who create, love themselves in the process: therefore they also must hate themselves most profoundly – they run riot in this hatred.

"Praise be to the spiritually impoverished, especially when they are young and female!"?*

420 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Who among you poets would not have diluted his wines with deception? Many a poisonous concoction was mixed in your cellars.??

13 [19]°°° Among Cripples.

And still I prefer to live among cripples than to live among these supposedly whole people."*4

The achievement of perfection casts its shadow ahead: I call this shadow beauty.

The lightest and stillest of all things came to me as shadow of the superhumans.?°°

God, too, has his hell – said the devil: it is his love for humans.?° B [20]?>"

On the shame of the gift-giver.

On the clamor for equality, against desecrators

On intoxication (spasms of penitence) priests.

On speaking freely ("historical education")

On the honesty of the pitiful.

On geniuses.

On marriage by the hour. Adulteress

On new associations and monasteries.

On punishment as the enemy of enemies.

So you want to be paid?

Annihilation of morality. The dream. Cosmic dependence.°®

Anthropomorphizing nature. Redemption from redeemers."""

First you have to learn to hunger for knowledge.

The murder-of-God penitents and their festival.

Purification from revenge. On the indiscretion of priests.

Hunt for ugly truths.

Greatest funeral rite – onward to immortality?

13 SUMMER 1883 421

The renunciation of the metaphysical as what virtue demands – as self sacrifice.
 The blessed isles. "To the south."
 On modesty.
 Value of the pessimist.
 Madness of someone who gives.
 Scholars.
 Contemporaries.
 Laughter of the heights. Happiness of the sower.
 Stillness of the saint.
 The seductions (child with mirror)
 Beauty.
 Compassion.
 Idealists. to seduce the pious (Die, Zarathustra!)
 the funeral pyre (big city) 13 [21]?
 The typical sufferings of the reformer and even his consolations. – The seven solitudes.
 He lives as if above the ages: his pinnacle gives him contact with the solitary and unappreciated people of all eras.
 His beauty is his last defense.
 He lays his hand upon the next millennium.
 His love grows as does the impossibility of doing good with it.
 13 [22]? Three additional parts:
 2. The Laughter of the Heights.
 (Happiness of the Sower.)
 3. Zarathustra searches for those he has lost.
 (or the 7 Solitudes)
 422 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 13 [23]
 The characteristics of superhumans gradually becoming more visible.
 The laughter of the heights – the caves of S.A.
 Concerning the last scene the appearance at Stromboli."⁴
 The woman's speech. "How well you heal, savior!"
 Always ten years in between. Solitude.
 At the beginning of the last book a child appears with a mirror in Zarathustra's cave, as the first sign of his triumph.[°]
 13 [24]2[°]
 Praise of reason and its coolness.
 In his role as one who creates, to praise the fact that our wisdom is revealed as folly, our wealth as poverty.

Thirst! If my thirst were quenched, what would be the point of creating! Justification of suffering.

High summer in the mountains.
sweet smell, melancholy, regarding a sudden death, evening in the woods where elves walk.

the great human being "has fallen"

Hymn to the organic: Zarathustra feels himself related in his will to everything living, deepest understanding of nature

and of what is moral.

Zarathustra says "I am the pleasure" of the mistral wind of electricity of the heights of the change of seasons (ring) of the clear sky of the dawn of the torrent of organic life

the sun's thirst for (the) ocean

plowshare (as persuasion)

13 SUMMER 1883 423

Way of life: to nurture ourselves such that we create ourselves in our own image.

Sensual hateful people like to eat plants.

13 [25]?

First: laughter of the heights. Dream. Postlude.

Laughing at redeemers and compassionate people mediators reconcilers ethical world order ("paid") Idealists "idol-makers"

Revolutionaries – Deniers. Conversation with the hound of fire. Poets Geniuses. On peacocks. Scholars Educated people

Those who speak freely Equality-socialists

Pessimists tarantulas "necromancers of the mind."

Metaphysicians Those who know – "torrent"

("I am the coffin full of malicious deeds and masks of life")

Society

against "long life on earth" – "high summer" – "clear sky"

Priests and churches Sublime people (for beauty) Hucksters

Frugal people (nature mystics) Vanity of cleanly people

Curious people

Romantics (moon). To heal "sorrowful people" by means of frenzied dances, to throw off shame and later to find that the bridges leading to dissimulation are broken.

424 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

13 [26]

There have never yet been any superhumans!

13 [7]? Actors. Tarantulas. Hound of fire. The dream. Those who speak freely. Penitents of the mind "Paid" Summer in the mountains. new society. Way of life. Through many souls wandering among fragments cool reason Organic – moral. Mediators.

To one of the illustrious dead.

13 [28]? The Funeral Rite. On the Contemplative Ones. On Actors. Redemption from the Redeemers. The Dream. On Famous Sages. Heroes and Beauty. On Tarantulas. High Summer. Conversation with the Hound of Fire.

13 SUMMER 1883

13 [29]?° Hound of Fire. On Tarantulas. Penitents of the Mind. Among Cripples. On Those Who Speak Freely. On Preachers of Equality. New Ways of Life. Associates and Associations. 13 [30]?*1 The Child with the Mirror. The Night Song. The Dance Song. The Prophet. The Funeral Rite. On Gods. On Famous Sages. On Those Who Are Sublime. On Contemporaries. On Scholars. On Contemplatives. On Good and Evil. The stillest Hour. On Priests. On Poets. On the Compassionate. On the Rabble. On Virtuous People. On Great Events On Human Prudence 13 [31]? On Tarantulas. Conversation with the King. Among Cripples.

426 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

13 [32]? On Poets. On Contemplatives. The Funeral Rite. On Human Prudence. On the Land of Culture. On Scholars. On Those Who Are Sublime. The Dance Song. The Prophet. On Good and Evil. Among Cripples. Conversation with the King. The stillest Hour.

13 [33]

Upon the Blessed Isles On the Rabble.

On Tarantulas.

On Famous Sages.

the night song.

the dance song

the grave song.

On Self-Overcoming. Sublime People.

(On the) Land of Culture. immaculate perception. Scholars. Poets.

great events.

Prophet

Redemption.

H(uman) Prudence. St(illest) Hour.

13 SUMMER 1883 427

13 [34]?

On Contemplatives.

On Scholars.

On Those Who Are Sublime. On the Land of Culture.

On Poets.

On Human Prudence.

The Prophet.

On Redemption.

The Stillest Hour.

13 [35]7°

On Immaculate Perception. On Scholars.

On Poets.

The Prophet.

On Great Events.

On Human Prudence.

On Redemption.

13 [36]?"" The Child with the Mirror. On Those Who Are Sublime. On Contemplatives. On Priests. On Famous Sages. The Dance Song. The Funeral Rite. The Stillest Hour.

[14 = M III 2b. Summer 1883]

14 [1]! Philosophy of the Future. On the Innocence of Becoming. Body and Mind. Moral and Organic. A Millennium of Experiments. Art. The Free and the Unfree. Education and Nourishment. Men and Women. Freely-Chosen Death. The New Order of Rank.

The Greeks as Connoisseurs of Humanity.

Music and Philosophy. etc. etc. nothing but lectures and speeches.

14 [2]

On evil: i.e., inferior beings want to gain an advantage over superior beings by exploiting a single trait of those who are superior (e.g., their trust).

Evil is: exploiting the virtue of other beings who belong to a superior species (parasitism).

A first-rate organizing power e.g., Napoleon, must be related to the species that is to be organized (i.e., it matters little whether

14 SUMMER 1883 429

he has "noble" feelings: it suffices that he appreciates completely and fully the strongest and most characteristic features of the many.)

Exploiting the backward characteristics of someone else who is generally more noble— parasites. (women)

Humankind has a relationship of calculated utility with nature as a whole: but what is it that upsets us when individuals exploit others for their own benefit? – The assumption is that they are not worthy enough. But assuming that they are considered worthy enough (e.g., as princes), then they are to be tolerated and they provide a kind of happiness (“devotion to God”)
We guard ourselves against exploitation by beings lower than ourselves.
Thus I defend myself against the contemporary state, education, etc.
Evil is first of all a judgment about other beings: if we call something about ourselves evil, then it is a metaphor – we do not want to see a drive that we have classified as /ower playing the ruler, – such a drive does not in any way have to be negated, but it should maintain its subordinate position and nothing more!

14 [3]

Superior human beings should be heads of state: all other forms are attempts to provide a substitute for the self-evident authority of superior human beings. (The ancient law does not become sacred until it Jacks the power to make laws.)
All lower drives must be present and have fresh force if the highest ones want to exist and to exist in abundance: but control over the whole must be in firm hands! otherwise the danger is too great! – In regard to this danger, there was the desire to kill off the lower qualities completely (but with self-deception:

Christians retained their affects, but employed them differently, just as Cynics kept running their abusive mouths)

430 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

or the desire to make them “gently” prudent and thereby to have them no longer want to sanction the highest impetus,’ e.g., Epicureans.

14 [4]

Humankind still has so much more ahead of it— how could we possibly derive the ideal from the past any longer!
Perhaps, by still deriving it from the present, which is perhaps a nadir.

14 [5]

The abuse of power by the Roman emperors disrupted moral concepts in Europe: the morality of the powerless achieved victory: — consequence, a monstrous counterfeiting.

The true source of lofty feelings is in the soul of the powerful. Self-evident joy in themselves and their deeds is the origin

of all value judgments — faith in themselves.

[15 = N VI 5. Summer–Autumn 1883]

15 [1]!

Now clear skies of eternity seize my senses, the dew drop Summoning the opponent. Value of human beings 1) abundance, multiplicity 2) total power 3) communicative force

15 [2]

I hate people who don't know how to forgive.

15 [3]

If only one moment of the world were to return, — said the lightning — then all moments would have to return absolute necessity seen as shield covered with imagery!
(chap(ter)) astronomical image of the world (chap(ter)) beyond the midpoint of life — life has been sacrificed.

15 [4]

Zarathustra's conclusion is that humans must form themselves back into animals in order not to feel the thought.
Or into superhumans (breeding through choice of place lineage diet etc.) Break with the past (unhistorical mode of thought necessary for this

432 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

to form a kind of "people" not to be rid of error! as condition of life!?

NB. To stage tragedies in life and to enjoy them!

15 [5]

Dissolution of "free will" and responsibility into a prediction and a degree of probability based on our knowledge of ourselves.

My horror at "guilty" people is a horror at having deceived myself in my predictions.

15 [6]

Zarathustra does not want to dose any of the past of human-kind, he wants to throw everything into the mold. Transformation of force.

15 [7]

Zarathustra III. A) sudden clarity about himself. Why care about giving gifts! Why care about making people happy! About friends! About love! It is pride that makes him speak the truth! His great contempt is coming.

1 (chap(ter)) he looks for his animals and can no longer find them. Despair of the solitary one. Can no longer go back!

2 (chap(ter)) Temptation of suicide

3 (chap(ter)) Regret. Forgetting the past. Commanding as an experiment and roll of the dice.

In the /ast speech even the death song must be fulfilled – e.g., the good hour to join with the ones who create, the ones who harvest, the ones who celebrate: this happens as part of the exclamation: what have you done?

4 (chap(ter)) thunderstorm rainbow lioness – doves

At the end: do you will this?

“Not Z – but I would like to create the one who says: Yes.”

15 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1883 433

At the end, the animals arrive from the sky (pride and cleverness return)

(chap(ter)) IV plan for the festival, derived from the entire system of world observations

Conclude every chapter in (Zarathustra) 3: “Zarathustra, do you will this once again?”

15 [8]? Moldenhauer Scott Monastery-Abbot Haller Old Span.’

Pindar Coleridge. Zinzendorf v(on) d(er) Goltz® Meister

E(c)khart and mystics Swedenborg

15[9]

Zarathustra 3 as volcanic eruption.

Zarathustra 4 “I am the one to whom oaths are sworn.”

Human beings are something fluid and malleable – we can make them into whatever we want.

To stand fast for 30 years.

Zarathustra 4. you should be like the sun – and what does the sun zot do!

15 [10]

The Lawgiver Type.

his development and his sorrows.

What is the point of giving laws?

the general type of the l(awgiver), who is the herald for many lawgivers.

Chief doctrine: at every step, to achieve perfection and a feeling of well-being – don't jump!

434 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

First, giving laws. After the prospect of superhumans, the doctrine of recurrence in horrific fashion: now bearable!

15 [11]

cause and effect are lacking in mental processes (mirror)

15 [12]

To enjoy every penetrating sunbeam and every delight as metaphor and omen – not in itself} because we should create a being who will strike everyone blind.

15 [13] (chap(ter)) Arrange festivals Festival of cosmic designations Festival of the earth Festival of friendship gr(eat) noon. Graves, worm!

Oh, how I would want to curse him if he resembled – any other person!

But not even the relief of cursing!

Mockery of "trust in life"!

15 [14]

Zarathustra 4 Doctrine of shared joy.

Zarathustra 3. Beginning. My premature happiness created clouds and shadows for me

15 [15]

I want apostles but not quiet corners and communities.

15 [16]

Roar wind, roar! Take every comfort from me!

15 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1883 435

15 [17]

tortured by my happiness – otherwise it is immediately gone again!

I throw the fishing rod over my head, far out into the sea of the future

Zarathustra 3. against the complacency of sages – against "joyful science"

The downfall of the blessed isles awakens him! Happiness in his failure. Greatest suffering with the insight that whatever was gained in life up to now has been lost: massive failure!

—

Finally, he decides to teach his doctrine hundreds of times!
15 [18]

You have set your mind against what is human? But for humanity's sake, no!

Now I am clairvoyant, my diamond sword cuts every darkness to pieces. For too long I was obsessed with clairvoyance.'

An infinite process can be conceived in no other way at all than as periodical

3. Why didn't you drive them apart? They had found each other, well, it was time to look for others.

Good days must walk on good feet.°

15 [19]

Laws as backbone – working on them and developing them further

Zarathustra gives the model of how to behave with regard to the law, in that he suspends the law of laws, morality,
in favor? of superior laws achievability greater than before (individual access to interpretation)

NB. it must be achievable (and) a superior ideal and its law must grow out of this achievement!

436 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

15 [20]

As soon as you believe that alongside absolute causality
there might also exist a god or a purpose – then the thought of necessity is unbearable.

15 [21]

Zarathustra 3. The evil demon who comes from goodness is a consequence of every teleology. Zarathustra 3. – Hym(n) modesty – Hym(n) solitude Failure and its consolation.
in conclusion.

Zarathustra himself has become a sage who delights in his own foolishness and a pau per who delights in his own wealth.

the fool and the happy pauper – possessing the tremendous bliss of those who ho pe and long and prophesy Zarathustra 3. I have been concealing the worst objection to life: it is, in the long run, boring

the new saint sanctifying nature

the new artist.

The redemption of evil people Zarathustra 3.

To rule? ghastly! I do not want to impose my type. My happiness is multiplicity!

Problem!!°

To invoke agon!!! those very people who would like to hide themselves away, quiet, pious people, – bid for dominance!

Solitude only a means of education!

against all those who merely enjoy things!

Even solitude falls under this perspective!

Self-overcoming and all virtue make no sense at all other than as a means of enhancing the ruling force.

15 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1883 437

15 [22]

Zarathustra 3 on the seduction of imperious people, noble people – deepest contempt for the comfortable for those obsessed with tranquility

15 [23]

My friend, you are like a cork, made for the light and for the surfaces of all seas – we called you fortunate

15 [24]

Zarathustra 3 Yes, if you could do that! Z(arathustra) –

Zarathustra 3. he praises the vastness of the soul – he has been licking all good and evil things.

15 [25]

I love myself with a bad and fickle love – and occasionally I think I probably deserve a better love than the one I am giving myself.

15 [26]

Your false love of the past is a theft from the future (divine ancestry"? of values)

15 [27]

Zarathustra 3. even if you want only your ideal, you must force all the world to accept it.

you debase your action when it is done only for the sake of a purpose

We must force the masses to be reasonable and even whip them into doing things to their own advantage

Zarathustra – I unlearned how to be empathetic with myself.

forgetting the self. Emerson p. 237.1%

438 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Zarathustra 3

those who give gifts, those who create, those who teach – these are preludes to those who rule.

Which unhappiness is too much for me? We only ever experience our own happiness.

Zarathustra 3. against authority. When voices stopped speaking, you made a law out of this.

Zarathustra 4. A force that is conceivable to you must be finite and determinate – but intransitory.

15 [28]

We should not bless our enemies: but the time will come when we have no more friends, and then we will still bless the fact that we didn't curse them!

15 [29]

Every thought, like flowing lava, builds a fortress around itself and crushes itself with "laws."

15 [30]

It's not that my ocean is receding, it's that my land is growing, my new ardor is lifting it upward.

Blessed are those who outgrow their own success.

With this thought, I tow the future behind me.

Forming a new star from the debris of old ones.

15 [31]

Not to do good for people – to perfect existence itself, to see myself as perfected

3. The greatest pain: Zarathustra's useless squandering as eternally repeated.

Solution: try once again!

When I suffered more than any human being, I did not bear their sins and weaknesses, but rather all their perfections.

15 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1883 439

15 [32]

(chap(ter)) On the sages' happiness at their foolishness (not knowing the ultimate results –)

(chap(ter)) On the wealth of poor people (eternal longing)

15 [33]

Egoism and individualism

Egoism falsely labeled according to design, calculation, and altruism labeled as uncalculating, but cold calculation on the part of the statesman as well!

15 [34]

he who blasts me with invisible lightning bolts.

You wanted to give a gift with your overflowing: but as you must be someone who creates, you must give even yourself away.

And truly, you yourself are the best part of your overflow-

ing

There lies a man who knows how (to) take what is rightfully his – of those who could give him what is rightfully his, who would be there!

How could I love humans for humans' sake!

15 [35]

3. Zarathustra I bring you my sins as a sacrifice and throw the sacrifice on top of you (shaken)

to the thought – God – hammer

If you stand high enough, then you must bring them up, bring them up to you!"

Executing the gods.

(chap(ter)) Praise of primordially determined nature

15 [36]"°

Where there is danger, I am there and I am rooted in the earth.!6

Training under the fire of cannons shooting at a distant target.

440 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

"An arms salesman impatient at possibly being detained by someone."

As field commanders, we should let neither the victors nor the vanquished rest to grow calm when the great danger comes.

"I want to do it or die"!®

"Without wrath, there is no conquest" Aristotle.'?

beautiful and horrible to look at Zarathustra 4 conclusion.

Behind the armies, a reasonable regime of terror.

"errors arising out of a good-natured disposition are most egregious in dangerous matters" Clausewitz° courage that comes from a sense of honor and self-esteem not to be confused with organic courage: a compulsion whereby we sacrifice much of our ability.

"Cunning better than force.

"This earth is too small for great ambition!"??

"love of glory the true measure" of a prince" Friedrich."

»21

15 [37]

"I am giving away all that I have – now I have nothing left but the great hope" Zarathustra 4

Zarathustra 4. Do I really need them? But they need me!

15 [38]"

customs that keep the blood boiling and harden us to the sight of suffering, necessary for education.

drive to annihilate, unrelentingly hard-hearted

15 [39]°°

To respect the crowd's faith and spoon-feed them with it – remaining skeptical ourselves, we must control even faith.
Caution and mistrust in matters of personal safety does not rule out disdain for death.

"when life is at stake, we should not trust even our own mothers"?

This is my secret coat of armor.

15 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1883 441

"In war, deception is everything"?® the foxes' hide.

"opinion is half of reality" Nap(oleon).??

Wherever a great good is involved, we should preserve our reputation

Nobility cunning boldness bravery determination foresight perseverance deep contemplation

Intentionality of delusion, to be the favorite of the gods
in order to influence the masses

To come to the aid of the gods!

"Human beings are too enlightened, nothing great can be accomplished anymore" Nap(oleon)° Predetermination of all events. "All great things hang by a hair" Nap(oleon)!

their temperament jolts them out of the passivity of fatal-
ism

"to horse, sabre in hand, to become destiny themselves." 3?

15 [40]

With "in order to," we have created a compulsion and annihilated freedom. Concerning redemption from purposes.

15 [41]

Perfect people do as little deliberate good as they do de-liberate harm.

15 [42]

ideal of the physician

Having sacrificed our lives. Like a fighter in the ring who gives his all and is not at all certain of victory

Epicurean happiness as that of a convalescent

15 [43]

I want to have my events, even if I do violence to them.

They want to be loved, these weaklings!

Not that you overturned idols, but rather that you overturned the idolater within yourself –

442 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

And if I must be guilty, then I still want all my virtues to kneel before my guilt

There is a happiness lying in the lap of things such that all

my happiness casts shadows around its lights.

15 [44]

Conclusion 3. Feeling of dissipation and resignation

"you are too early"

Zarathustra 4. general outbreak of a mor(al) sense, volcanic – Zarathustra is needed

15 [45]

Zarathustra is stewing in his own juices.??

His resolution perceived to be the greatest decision about
the fate of humankind.

"to bring the universe into harmony into reconciliation and into knowledge" in this, the human soul is the greatest work
of art.

Greatest awareness of the importance!

the universe does not seek its own redemption, but it finds
it.

15 [46]

Zarathustra 3. Forward, lame-footed one, smuggler – or Pl jump etc.

that's how it screamed at me.

Life itself created this most burdensome thought for life,
it

wants to leap over its highest barrier and away!"

The fool.

The king. fall into despair when they are great people

The woman.

15 [47]"

like a child, the people can only have faith: what they should have faith in – the solid realism of this observation also in Rée in regard

to morality.

15 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1883 443

15 [48]

Zarathustra 4 the new order of rank of human beings bad people (strong people etc. (weak people

the many-faceted people, with the will to suffer and to get lost and to experiment, straying off course, returning – not fearing the most monstrous path to free up the sky.

Light-hearted depths, where even a star becomes a speck.
 3 Problem: My will to do good (even for myself!) forces me into complete silence.
 But my will for superhumans tells me to speak and even to sacrifice friends.
 Zarathustra 4. What we take to be bad, exploiting the weak, deceiving noble people into doing things they must be ashamed of. Great curse on friends!
 I was lying in the sunshine: then came the blackest cloud. It floated like a funnel above me, leaning on the sun. It was the sun itself, – – –
 This thought leaps over me and away!
 Zarathustra 3. After several chapters of fear and indecision, summoning up the great thought.
 Conclusion: I have the hammer! – bliss!
 And if vermin disgust you so much that you quickly move up a step because of them – then they should have the right to exist!
 15 [49]
 cold egoism – to exploit the weak: why does it run counter to feeling?
 the same person is perceived differently by our different drives
 444 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 15 [50]
 To know," a delusion.
 Even laws of nature merely long-held habits.
 Assuming that someone has a strong will, then a skeptical philosophy is best in order to spur this will most effectively to action.
 Express trains everywhere! the rich too warmly clothed morality of the weak as mimicry?" – wanting "to absorb."
 15 [51]
 not to want the means only for the sake of the end!
 Conscience is the feeling whereby we become aware of the order of rank among our drives.
 15 [52]
 Unconscious memory
 Comfort (as the longest-lasting happiness that is possible for ancient philosophers)
 Skepticism suffices against all metaphysics 15 [53]

to locate all bliss in skepticism (the doubt concerning pessimism)

15 [54]

(chap(ter)) dis-satisfied people as life principle (One virtue!)

15 [55]

Limitations of the moral point of view – every individual plays a part in the whole cosmic entity – whether we know it or not – whether we want it or not!

15 [56]

(chap(ter)) molding and remolding process of pious people, of priests

15 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1883 445

15 [57]

(chap(ter)) the herald's call to individuals (and their ideals)

15 [58]

law for lawgivers

We must transform ourselves from those who pray into those who give blessings

15 [59] imperious people the – – –

15 [60]8 Hartmann M(iscellaneous) W(ritings)? Ranke Popes'? Wellhausen"! vlon) der) Goltz Dreher'? Moldenhauer Zinzen-dorf Bentham-Benecke®?

Buddhism by Kern Leipzig Otto Schulze*

[16 = Z II 1a. Autumn 1883]

16 [1]

Nature must be imagined as analogous to human beings, as erring, experimenting, good and evil – as fighting and overcoming itself.

16 [2]

There are three solitudes, that of someone who creates, that of someone who waits, that of shame. – I know the word and sign of the superhumans; but I don't say it, I am concealing it from myself. – To live in shame, in the face of a great truth.

16 [3]

In Act II the different groups come and bring their gift.

"What did you do?" – They say it. – "Then it is done in the spirit of Zarathustra."

The rabble, cold and without much inner need, will be the first to smile at the doctrine of recurrence. The most basic life drive is the first to give its approval. At the very end a great truth wins over the most superior humans: this is the suffering of truthful people.

Act I. Solitude as a result of being ashamed of himself: An unspoken thought for which he feels too weak (not hard-hearted enough) The temptations to mislead him about this. The messengers of the chosen people invite him to the festival of life.

16 AUTUMN 1883 447

Act II. He attends the festival incognito. He reveals himself when he finds himself venerated too much.

Act III. In happiness, he proclaims the superhumans and their doctrine. Everyone deserts him. He dies as the vision leaves him on account of the pain he feels at the suffering he has created.

Funeral rite. "We killed him" – Noon and eternity.

16 [4]?

The gentlest person must become the most hard-hearted: and perish in the process. This the psychological problem. Experience came imperiously: but my will spoke to it – then it was already on its knees, pleading.'

Don't dancers have their ears in their toes?4

Zarathustra's virtue still lives for us! A star went under in barren space: but its light is still on its way and is transformed – and when will it cease to be on its way"

Do you want to be a stumbling block to those who stride ahead? Then limp along in front of whoever is in a hurry.°

Even what we have left undone weaves the fabric of the entire future: even nothingness itself is a weaver and master weaver.'

Many grow weary of themselves: and only then does the happiness begin that was reserved for them.®

My drink should still make you sneeze, and my sparkling wines should tickle your nose and fill you with lust.?

"It is showing itself": says your complacency? No, it is withdrawing and it will withdraw more and more.!!°

448 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

16 [5]"

The profound sterility of the 19th century. I have not met a single person really capable of introducing a new ideal. For a long time, the character of German music gave me false hopes.

A stronger type in which our powers are synthetically fused

—
my faith. Apparently everything is décadence. This downfall must be guided so that it makes a new form of existence possible—ble for the strongest people.

16 [6]

Don't be impatient! Superhumans are our next step! For this, for this limitation, moderation and manliness are required.

16 [7]?

Do as I do: only those who do, learn — only as a doer will I also be your teacher."

That a bolt of lightning would strike your feed and your maws would learn to feed on fire!

The pride of my eagle whips my will with its wings: but the surge of pride also founders on this cliff.

Am I not the meteorological divide? Don't all winds come to me and proclaim their will to me?!®

I want to vanish in a dark thunderstorm: and in my final moment I want to be both human and lightning."

You crash up against me — but to no effect! I am striking you with my oar: you still must carry my boat into immortality!!

®

Did I ever fall asleep on my fame? Every kind of fame has been like a bed of thorns to me."

Perhaps as Zarathustra III: This is the book of the seven solitudes.

16 AUTUMN 1883 449

"And the ice and innocence of my peaks are also still aglow."*®

To me you are arid grass and steppe: but I want to make wildfires of you and heralds with tongues of fire."!

Gold flashes in his dark eyes: a golden bark floats there on black waters.??

You are clever and have clever fingers: not until your fingers have crept back into your fist, will I even want to believe in your power.??

I know how to put my checkered saddle blanket on you: and anyone who knows horses also knows just what it means to be

 in the saddle.*4
 I still am like a cock in a strange barnyard, pecked at even
 by hens."
 There is more injustice in admiration than in contempt.?°
 How high up do I live? Never yet when I climbed did I count the flights of stairs to where I live: where all stairways end, that's where the roof over my head begins?"
 You will have to be hauled up by your hair into your heaven!?!®
 You claim to be made of finer cloth, you visionaries? That you don't merely know how to dress and disguise yourselves better! You know how to hide your substance beneath a cloak y better!
 If I remain otherwise invisible, then I still wish to be visible at the masts of solitary voyagers and explorers – as a flame and sign of hope.°°
 450 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 Didn't the world stand still? How this silence wound itself around me with terrible coils and held me fast?!
 A woman said: "I may have broken my wedding vows. But first my wedding vows broke me!"??
 To seduce those who love us so that they do something that is shameful in their eyes and ours – this is the cruelest thing
 that cruel people do.
 And if the stars don't want to fall from the sky for you, then throw your star into the sky – let that be the extent of your evil!
 And those who throw themselves down from the heights at the people below: what price did they put on broken limbs?*4
 You are also looking back, when going forward: and people have to run into you a lot."
 I listened for an echo, but heard only praise.*°
 Talking a lot about ourselves is also a means of concealing ourselves.*"
 Whoever does not make us fertile will certainly leave us indifferent.*®
 We do good deeds for our neighbors, but we do not create for them.??
 Eventually the truth will really triumph: some kind of error was fighting on its behalf.*°

Just at the point where your honesty ceases, your eye sees nothing more“!

16 AUTUMN 1883 451

His bad qualities allow him to be rewarded whenever they have allowed themselves to be overcome by virtue.*?

He is so convincing that he convinces the arguments themselves to run after him.”

16 [8]*

That Zarathustra reaches the highest level of distress and that not until then does he reach his greatest happiness: he becomes progressively unhappier and happier. In the moment when the contrast between both feelings becomes most terrifying, he perishes. For the outline.

16 [9]

“These are Zarathustra’s speeches on the seven solitudes”

–: they are meant to describe how distress grows along with happiness. Giving gifts, like creating, shows its other face.

Hard-heartedness in virtue:“© agony in compassion and justice:

isolation and homelessness for the friend of those who will come: creating as a kind of enchantment that brings with it a disenchantment in regard to everything that is there: displeasure felt toward the most superior exemplars alienates us from those who must be worked on: etc.

16 [10]

To seize for myself the total immorality of the artist in regard to my material (humankind): this was the work of my last few years.

To seize for myself intellectual freedom and joy, in order to be able to create and not to be tyrannized by alien ideals.

(Basically, it matters little what I had to break away from: yet my favorite mode of breaking away was artistic in nature: i.e.,

I constructed an image of what had captivated me up until then: like Schopenhauer, Wagner, the Greeks (genius, saints, metaphysics, all previous ideals, the highest morality) – simultaneously a tribute out of gratitude.

452 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

16 [11]

It was necessary to liberate myself from the delusion that nature would have to unlearn having goals.

Liberation from world-weariness. Now, for sake of this goal, my doctrine of the redemption of humanity from itself.

"now they know and are too disgusted to act p 35 Birth of Tragedy. "art saved them – and by means of art they saved their own life." Fundamental thought. My life from then on is the consequence.

To become artist (one who creates), saint (one who loves), and philosopher (one who knows) in one person: – my practical goal!

The message: to find space and strength and courage to create. (Restricted to the human, as opposed to "world process" and "hinterworld")*8

To create for myself freedom from the old ideals: with the best motives, I turned in the direction of the opposing ideals: I looked for the best even from this era.

I broke away: from education, from the kind of scholars that have existed up to now

"pessimist of the intellect."

emergence of "intellectual conscience": "what is true originally more useful and brings more honor? Mixed Opinions and Maxims p. 13.

My mockery of the pretensions of world-process advocates, my disbelief in a "drive for knowledge in itself," I allowed the historical sense to develop out of only three drives. – Everything was already there.

Hatred of Kantian obscurantism, of the Kantian doctrine of disinterested pleasure and of the quietism of the will.

16 [12]

Thanks to those who are there taking?!

16 [13]

Take pity on your foot so that it doesn't step into a morass:

Don't even bother kicking those who betray their friends."

16 AUTUMN 1883 453

16 [14]

A history of origins® was required for overcoming ideals (philosopher, artist, saint) that have been held up to now. In place of saint-lovers, I put people who reimagine all phases of culture lovingly-fairly: historical people of the most profound piety.

In place of geniuses, I put people who create human beings beyond themselves (new concept of art (against the artistry of artworks)

In place of philosophers, I put free spirits, who are superior to scholars, researchers, critics and who, existing above many ideals, still remain alive: who, without becoming Jesuits, and in spite of all this, lay the foundations for the illogical nature of existence: those who liberate us from morality.

Schopenhauer as Educator p. 60 "Only after, in our present or in some future incarnation, we have been taken up into that most sublime order of philosophers, artists, and saints will a new goal also be established for our love and our hate – in the meantime, we have our task."*4

The value of error (delusion) of forgetting finally the value of evil of enmity

16 [15]"°

My differences with Rée: the basic disagreement, dependence on an origin' and breaking away from it – not "egoistic" and "unegoistic"

He lacks a historical sense of the extraordinary variety in the codes of values comprising what is good.

H(uman,) A(ll Too Human) p. 79.7

Different derivation of the sense of justice and of vanity.

I am fighting against the notion that egoism is harmful and reprehensible: I want to create a clean conscience for egoism.

I claim that the herd instinct is originally the stronger and more powerful one: that acting individually (not acting in accordance with lineage) has been perceived to be evil.

454 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

they say: to find something reprehensible, only out of habit – – –

Ree thinks, utility is something trivial: his entire way of looking at things is dependent on moral prejudice.°®

p. 47 "when nothing about punishments reminds us that they are a means of deterrence, then the impression must arise that they are a kind of retribution.""" Why? What is retribution any-way? He thinks that a sense of justice emerges because something appears {to be} retribution. But the concept of retribution has not been investigated. In addition, {he} overlooked the fact that all punishment emerges out of revenge.

"There can not be retribution for actions that are necessary"

p. 49° Of course there can be! He thinks there should not be, it would be unfair! i.e., he himself is operating under moral presuppositions.

Sense of justice i.e., to demand that retributive suffering occurs.

– According to Rée the consequence of 2 errors: 1) that punishment appears to be retribution 2) that the will is considered to be free.

He thinks that we would not undertake retribution if we considered our neighbors to be unfree. Now consider what retribution is here: first to prevent, to stop the harm from continuing. There cannot be retribution against a falling rock.

– He is right.

Rée errs when he allows a sense of justice to emerge from the punishment and as a result of the punishment: whereas punishments emerge from this sense of justice.

There must be retribution for those who injure us because they have undermined our awareness of our power: it is a crime against our self-esteem.

It is in no way sufficient: only those who want the well-being of others for their own sake have a morally good purpose, but we should ask what kind of well-being.

He is only interested in the emergence of the judgments "good" and "evil" – but the precise makeup of these actions, their actual

utility (in relation to their assumed utility) is what interests me.

16 AUTUMN 1883 455

Morality initially self-glorification of the powerful and of the ruling caste.

Pleasure-displeasure are accompanying phenomena, not goals.

16 [16] Will-o'-the-wisp® in a swamp.

16 [17]

Substitute for revenge: as soon as we've grasped that it was the violation of our feeling of power that so upset us, then we should think about how we might increase our feeling of power. It is a failure of intellect for us to insist that we are injuring the very one doing the injuring and injuring that person even more.

But

this is still the case with our criminal justice system.

Here the communal feeling of power is compromised when someone breaks the law: a brave undertaking, a noble act done in the best interest-of the community, could quite easily be interpreted as being directed against it! Individuals should provide compensation for injuries that other individuals inflict: as something like benefactors who overcompensate. – Yet if individuals have been insulted, they should move to a higher level and thereby generate and extend their feeling of power. All the baseness of wretched people should become a spur and a ladder for the noble. – But we should not have retribution for individual actions: actions are symptoms of the whole being – there are no actions that are performed only once. As soon as I recognize: "people are capable of that" – then my entire position toward them changes: from now on I perceive them to be my enemy and I wish not only to fight against them, but also to annihilate them. – "They are no longer part of our group" is our rule of thumb.

My program: do away with punishment: for us. Counter-retribution as nonsense. (If something is evil, then whoever performs the counter-retribution is certainly committing the same evil.) The purpose is not to deter, but rather to protect ourselves against further harm (along with irritation at the fact that we were too gullible)

456 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

16 [18]

Contra Rée: where there is suffering, then something has been done contrary to utility – in nature, something contrary to purpose.

16 [19]

If it is true that the standpoint of the common good has determined the value of what is not self-interested: now we must still ask: is the judgment true, justified? Is a benevolent person beneficial?

16 [20]

Wherever there are living things, there are sudden explosions of force: the subjective feeling is that “free will” is involved. The number and power of these explosions initially determine the value of a living thing: then the direction that is given to these explosions. When we speak of “motives for action,” we always mean only “motives for direction.”

16 [21]

Goal: to build up the entire body and not just the brain!

16 [22]

We must think just as ruthlessly about the masses as nature does: they preserve the species.

16 [23]

The face of Jesuitism grins from behind my first phase: I mean: consciously holding on to an illusion and being forced to incorporate this illusion as a basis for civilization.”

Or also:

Buddhism and the demand for nothingness (the Schopenhauerian contradiction between theory and practice not sustainable). Wagner succumbed to the first danger.

16 AUTUMN 1883 457

16 [24]

NB! History of superior humans. Breeding better humans is enormously more painful. To demonstrate through Zarathustra the ideal of the kind of sacrifices required for this:

to leave homeland, family, fatherland. Life lived under the contempt of prevailing ethics (despised). Agony of experiments and failures. Breaking away from all of the enjoyment offered by the older ideals (they taste somewhat threatening, somewhat foreign to the tongue)

16 [25]

Delight in causing pain, because it is accompanied by an increase in the feeling of power: most intense when preceded by some kind of diminishment – thus, in revenge.
Delight in doing good evolved in completely the same way – and generosity is sublimated revenge and for that reason a much greater delight.

16 [26]®

Every living thing expands its force outward as far as it can and subjugates what is weaker: in this way, it takes delight
in itself. The increasing “anthropomorphism” within this tendency consists in the ever more subtle perception of how difficult
it is really to incorporate the other: how the extensive damage may indeed demonstrate our power over it, yet at the same time alienate us still further from its will – thus making it less easily subjugated.

16 [27]

Moral valuation initially refers to the distinction between superior and inferior human beings (or castes) morality is initially self-glorification of the powerful: and contempt in regard to the powerless. Not “good” and “evil,” but rather “noble” and “base,” is the original feeling. Only then are the differing actions
and characteristics called noble, and the ones in opposition to them
called base.

458 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

16 [28]

Thieves do not act in order to take delight in power, they do not project themselves into the effect that their actions produce in others. No more than do robbers, or people who kill others in order to take something from them. But they reveal that they are afraid of us, that's why --

16 [29]

In what way is injury an injustice? -- The need for retribution emerges when injury occurs: what is this? Not to be confused with the feeling that we have recognized an enemy and that we will make it impossible for this enemy to do us further damage. Or with the intention of recovering what was taken from us or some equivalent. A bitterness remains. Enemies are not felt to be bad in themselves: but the person injured almost always feels self recrimination: we were too careless, our weapons were not in good condition, we should have seen the warning signs long ago, etc. This disappointment in ourselves

-- thus a diminished self-esteem -- is the main reason for the bitterness we feel in revenge: and even the motivation for subtlety in carrying out our revenge.

Because everything is paid for and some equivalent for everything exists, fantasizing has even led to inventing equivalents

for harm: and to speaking of retribution. But basically all
of this is concerned with something else, with much more than a repayment. Retribution is merely hypocrisy and whitewashing for those who avenge themselves. "Guilt."

The feeling of desire for revenge ceases when the injuring parties abase themselves, make restitution for the harm: at that point they are vanquished.

The intention to do harm is originally not even considered:
rather the fact that someone has been harmed and how much.

Punishment follows at that point. The harm inflicted is paid back -- is the oldest form, not a hostile mentality. Outrage emerges in response to the harm done, and so to the enemies' success, not to hostility toward them. It is the feeling of
16 AUTUMN 1883 459

the vanquished – the demand for retribution: not the feeling that wrong has been done. ‘ Revenge, the demand for retribution, is not the feeling that wrong has been done, but rather that I have been vanquished – and that I must now restore my standing by any means necessary.
 Injustice emerges only after an agreement is broken, in other words, when peace and loyalty are violated. This is outrage about an unworthy action, unworthy of the assumed equivalence of feelings. Therefore, something base, something
 contemptible must be involved which refers to a lower level.
 The counter-intention can only be to move unworthy beings to this lower level: thus separating them from us, expelling
 them,
 humiliating them, disgracing them. Meaning of punishment.
 The meaning of punishment is not to deter, but rather to move someone to a lower place in the social order: this person
 is no longer counted among our equals.
 Every measure that achieves this is adequate. “Ostracism.”
 The system of punishment must develop in this direction!
 16 [30]°”
 Zarathustra 3: The others are allowed to obey: and their vanity demands that they do not appear to be dependent on great people but rather on “principles.” 16 [31]
 Bitterness about ourselves in matters of revenge transforms itself
 in lesser natures very quickly into being outraged toward enemies
 and into wishing to accuse them of something contemptible
 460 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 16 [32]
 How powerful people are overpowering and arrogant in regard to the subjugated: the development of prudence and anthropomorphism allows this overpowering and this arrogance to be intellectualized more and more. But why should power not want to take delight in itself!
 The supreme relationship remains, that of those who create toward their material: this is the ultimate form of arrogance

and dominance. In this way, the organic form is brought to completion for the first time: thus resembling the way in which the body is dependent on impulses of the will and takes delight in itself when it is under the most control.

16 [33] Liberation from Morality.

Organic-moral® (competition of the affects and supremacy of one affect over the intellect"°)

Revenge, injustice, punishment.

Anyone who believes in good and evil can never treat evil as a means of achieving good; and every teleological worldview that doesn't completely break with ethics is /ost.

There could be a history of value judgments concerning food: in that case, the basic question would still remain: what value is involved in this or that having been eaten? – Thus, the question remains: what is the value of things having always been done in this or that way, apart from the question: what kind of values have been assigned to the actions up to now?

—

The history of value-estimations up to now, and their rationale, is something other than the estimation itself.

No person will say: stones that are falling constitute morality. Well then! human beings climb – and that is also not morality!

The collective conscience. The atavism in the estimation of unegoistic people.

16 AUTUMN 1883 461

16 [34]

Weaker people give in, and subjugate themselves, when revenge is senseless.

16 [35]"

"Whatever Zarathustra has decided, this will happen: how should his great soul be capable of changing its resolve!"

16 [36]?

Let us hold fast to the notion that humans are the predator of all predators! It is said that humans love themselves: but this is precious little love!

16 [37]

Zarathustra recognizes that he is also not there for his friends "Who are my friends!" Neither for the people, nor

for individuals! Neither for the many nor for the few! To overcome friendship! Sign of his self-overcoming at the beginning of
III

Emerson p. 4267? Depiction of the sage.

16 [38]

When he sees through Pana, Zarathustra dies from compassion for her compassion. Before that, the moment of supreme contempt (supreme bliss!)

Everything must be fulfilled, namely, everything from the preface.

16 [39]

The final circumstance, remaining silent in the most refined way hinders all great success: as soon as h(uman) beings are completely in harmony with the truth, they move all of nature.

III Part Zarathustra

462 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

16 [40]

This has to do with more than giving gifts: with creating, with overpowering! Fundamental concept of the second solitude (Beginning of IIL.)

Our "gifts" are dangerous!

16 [41]

Controlling humankind for the purpose of overcoming it Overcoming by means of doctrines that bring about its downfall, except for those who can survive it.'°

16 [42]

First everyone turns away from Zarathustra (this to be depicted in stages'). Zarathustra enraptured, doesn't notice.
Pana

wants to kill him. /n the moment when she wields the dagger, Zarathustra understands everything and dies in pain from this compassion. This is to be made clear!

16 [43]

The "truth," the "annihilation of illusions," "even of the moral illusion" – as the great means of overpowering humankind (of its self-destruction!) Part III.

NB. All the sufferings associated with Zarathustra's development as depicted here are to be depicted as much greater than what superior humans suffer on account of their visitors.

16 [44]

"It was out of love that I caused the greatest suffering:
now I

melt away at the suffering I caused –

16 [45]

When everyone has gone, Zarathustra reaches out his hand to the serpent: "what advice does my cleverness offer me?" – it bites him. The eagle tears it to pieces, the lion hurls itself on top of the eagle. When Zarathustra saw his animals fighting, he died.

16 AUTUMN 1883 463

16 [46]

No one has time for me? Very well, then I shall wait. What is the deal with a time that "has no time"!"

16 [47]

Zarathustra's thanksgiving prayer of a convalescent.'®

16 [48]

Zarathustra as "autumn," as "plowshare," etc. – different P melodies!

16 [49]

Speech on the innocence of becoming. Beatitude" sub specie aeterni 8?

The consecration of what is smallest.

Those who make vows.

The new kings

The breaking of the tablets. (From Part 4 beginning of Scene 3)

Great humans as rivals of majestic nature.

The two movements (toward the last humans and toward the superhumans).

The redemption of evil people.

As children, a much longer youth, encompassing many countries and industries and trades.

The new teachers as precursors of the greatest sculptors (imposing their type)

The most burdensome knowledge as hammer.

Praise of mercy (for the sake of those to come)

Summoning enemies! (we need them for the sake of our ideal!

To transform our enemies of equal breeding into gods and thus to raise ourselves up and transform ourselves!

Those who create, those who love, those who know, unified by power.®!

The will to suffer – to feel suffering deeply as means of transformation.

464 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

The parasite as the bad person. We must not be merely those who enjoy existence – ignoble.

The rejoicing conscience: as prayer.
Contra praise and blame. To shine after centuries; predeter-min(ation) of the future.
Overpowering the past: and then forgetfulness that heals,
the divine circle.
The holy laughter.
The song of solace (set to my music).
The teaching of return is the turning point of history.
16 [50]

Solitude necessary for a time, so that our being becomes whole and permeated – completely healed and hardened.
New form of community: to stand our ground as warriors.
Otherwise the mind grows tired. No “gardens,” and just “withdrawing from the masses.” War (but without gunpowder!) between different thoughts! and their armies!
New nobility, through breeding. Foundations festivals for families.
A new division of the day; physical exercise for all ages.
Competition as principle.
Sexual love as competition with the principle of what is becoming, what is to come, as the prize. – “Ruling” is taught, practiced, hard-heartedness as well as mercy. As soon as one condition has been mastered, it is essential to strive for a new
one.

To allow ourselves to be taught by evil people and to give even them the opportunity to compete. To use those who make things decadent. – This should be the justice of punishment, that the offender should be able to be used as an experi-mental subject (for new nourishment): this is the consecration of punishment, that here an offender will be used up for the greatest benefit of those who are to come.

We spare our new community because it is the bridge to our ideal of the future. And we work for it and let others work for it.

16 AUTUMN 1883 465

Places of residence.

Kind of community.

Wars.

The new nobility.

Experiments (punishments etc.)

To redeem the woman in women.

The many wanderings of the individual's soul. Long youth.

The time for solitude.

82

The choice of places of residence, new (Indic peoples as cautionary example!)

To redeem the woman in women!®?

Physical strength should be on the side of the greatest thoughts – that's how long the war between the different thoughts must last!

16 [51] Plan for Zarathustra III

Zarathustra 3: the transition from freethinker and hermit to having to rule: gift-giving is transformed – from giving, there emerged the will's exercising its compulsion to take. The tyranny of the artist initially as self-disciplining and self-tempering!

Psychology of those who rule. (The desire for friends reveals itself as desire for tools of the artist!)

Zarathustra 3: first fleeing from the "inexpressible truth" skepticism, self-ridicule, voluntary blindness, increasing misery, feeling of weakness. The 7 solitudes – attempt to find refuge, to rest somewhere in a past worldview. Objections to his doctrine present themselves. The seducers as well. (To insert:

"the song of solace.")

The most profound suffering is not for his own sake, but rather for the sake of those dearest to him who bleed to death on account of his doctrine. – But following this experience, 466 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Zarathustra simultaneously rises to the greatest hard-heartedness against himself and against those nearest to him and thinks only of the "future."

At the end, the lion as Zarathustra's third animal – symbol of his ripeness and tenderness.*4

"Thanksgiving Prayer of a Convalescent": Part 3 concludes with this.

16 [52]

The love for friends would like to force Zarathustra to

withhold his great truth: even after he has admitted it to himself.

– This is the problem of those who rule: they sacrifice those they love to their ideal.

16 [53]

The band of those sacrificing themselves gathered at Zarathustra's grave. Previously they fled: now, when they find him dead, they become the heirs of his soul and they raise themselves up to his height. (This the last scene in Zarathustra 4 –

“the great noon” – clear – unending sky)

16 [54]

Everything warns Zarathustra about speaking further: omens. He is interrupted. One of them kills himself, another goes mad. Mood of divine exuberance® in the artist –: it must come to light. After he has simultaneously demonstrated the truth of the return and shown the superhumans, he is overwhelmed by compassion.

Exaltation increasing within him (én this exaltation he goes through all stages of evil – but for the sake of his goal.

Here he is the teacher of evil, of hard-heartedness etc.) and “glow of the Alps” – gathering gloom among his listeners. Rain at the end etc.

16 AUTUMN 1883 467

16 [55] Plan for Zarathustra 4.

1. The victory parade, the plague city, the symbolic funeral pyre. 30 deeds. 30

. The last speech with omens, interruptions, rain, death. 30 great noon – forebodingly clear and eerie. 30

w

16 [56]

“Do you want this once again?”

Clairvoyant about his gift-giving and teaching, about his love for his friends.

He feels the supreme responsibility resting on his shoulders.

What happiness!

Will to suffer and the strength of character on the path (cold people, hard-hearted people, parasites).

Every authentic life an experiment!

Morality up to now based in weakness: we wanted authority and we designed leisure for ourselves.

The contradiction of goodness and creativity: this is the problem of wisdom.

16 [57]

Even the drives of future humankind are also already present and demand to be satisfied – although we are not yet consciously familiar with them. Thus, even in great individuals there is an apparent concern for as yet nonexistent needs.

16 [58]

These are the speeches of the seven solitudes, which Zarathustra spoke to his heart after he had abandoned his friends and even his animals; and at that time, he would have loved to have abandoned himself.

468 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

16 [59]

The woman in women should be emancipated!®®

16 [60]

It is not enough to proclaim a doctrine: we must also change human beings by force, so that they accept it! – Zarathustra finally grasps this.

16 [61]

To overcome the past within us: to combine drives in a new way and to direct them all together toward one goal: – very difficult! The evil drives are certainly not the only drives that must be overcome – even the so-called good drives must be overpowered and newly consecrated!

The temptations:

to rest in a worldview from the past.

Derisive skepticism and self-disintegration: what could you “create” then!

“you aren’t strong enough! Leave it to someone stronger!”

Enjoy your fatigue! Admire yourself!

convince yourself that your compassion is a virtue and that you are sacrificing your knowledge for the happiness of others.

Go ahead and admit to yourself what is meant by this will to create – imperiousness, which cannot be satisfied just anywhere. “Friends?” You want to have tools!

And so why tell this truth in the first place! Even if you were allowed to believe that it is the truth! There are really no

constraints on you anymore! No "obligation to the truth"! You destroy in all others the pleasure they take in what is before them, you are the teacher of the great fatigue it-self!

you disempower virtue and cause it to be praised less, thus desired less. You yourself rob humankind of the force with which it could pursue the goal!

16 AUTUMN 1883 469

16 [62]

The degree of psychological subtlety decides whether people interpret their actions as good or evil. And not only subtlety, but also their desire for revenge, bad moods, good nature, frivolity etc.

16 [63]

NB. The thought itself will not be articulated in the third part:

only prepared for.

First: critique of everything taught up to now.

Which means of consolation were lost to him.

faith and trust in a supreme wisdom and goodness faith in that which is good, the voice of duty etc.

Evil conscience (the best conscience is influenced by fear, mistrust of ourselves, skepticism, having to keep silent, distortion of, etc.)

The song of those who fly.

Humans as rivals of majestic nature.

Fear of the consequences of the doctrine: maybe the best natures perish because of it? The worst accept it?

Solution Zarathustra III: you must elevate yourself above morality, you have seen through it – all of your misery was the result of it.

there is no other way for human beings to overcome themselves.

Keeping the smallest secret cripples all of his strength: he feels that he has avoided a thought up to now, – now the thought hurls itself upon him with all of its force! It is a wrestling match: who is strong enough, Zarathustra or the thought?

470 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

What is the point of truth? – It has become the strongest drive, the will to truth! Zarathustra can do nothing else!®"

– and whether I count forward from now or backward from now: I hold the belt of infinity in my hand and – – – Fools say: “but at that point infinity would certainly have been completed”: yet we must be exact in the use of our words and never call something a beginning which at some other time we call an end.

His reassurance: the effect cannot be anticipated!

the greatest thought does its work in the slowest and most delayed way!

its most immediate effect is a substitute for faith in immor-talities: does it increase good will toward life?

Maybe it is not true: – may others wrestle with it!

16 [64]

1. Solitude in shame and weakness and silence in the face of a great thought.

What is the point of truth!

2. Solitude, in which all the old reasons for solace have been lost.

4. Solitude without friends, indeed with the awareness that we are sacrificing our friends.

6. Solitude in eternity, beyond morality: the creative one and goodness. No alternative solution exists except to create another being that does not suffer as we do.

Determinism:#® “I am a fatum® for everything that is coming!” – is my answer to determinism!

7. Solitude of a sick person. Song of solace. Growing weary, growing silent. Sanctified through suffering.

13 p(ages) each. Each time at the end, the thought that overcomes.

16 AUTUMN 1883 471

NB. All concerns are signs of the will to suffer, a deepening of pain: when the pain is most intense, Z(arathustra) throws it aside:

greatest concluding moment (the lion): I will this!!!

Hymn at the end: the victorious one. (10 pages)

16 [65]

The third part is Zarathustra’s self-overcoming, as a model for humankind’s self-overcoming – for the benefit of the superhumans.

For this, it is necessary to overcome morality.

You sacrifice your friends – they are profound enough to perish as a result: and they didn't create the thought (which still occupies me!)

This as a last counterargument which confronts Zarathustra – the strongest enemy. Now Zarathustra is becoming ripe. In Part 4 Zarathustra dies when he notices the pain of his friends: and they abandon him. – But after his death, his spirit comes over them.

Institutions as the aftereffects of great individuals and as a means of planting great individuals and of rooting them – until finally fruit emerges.

16 [66]

Wrestling contest for the use of the power that humankind represents! Zarathustra calls for everyone to join this wrestling contest. (Part 4 Zarathustra's speeches)

16 [67]

The eudaemonistic-)social ideals lead human beings back – perhaps they are targeting a very useful worker-species – they invent the ideal slaves of the future – the lower caste that can't be missing!"°

The "happiness of those who know" and their obtuseness up to now about the fruits of knowledge – song of ridicule. 472 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

16 [68]

The short-lived force of artists' drives – they stop near the image of their ideal and they themselves no longer even follow the ideal – song of ridicule. Not to mention the audience!?! They should be teachers – these artists!

16 [69]

How much the field marshal sacrifices, the prince, those responsible to themselves – this is to be highly revered!

16 [70]

Actually, humans always try to use collectives to make the great individual expendable etc. But they are completely dependent on those role models.

16 [71]

The conflict of those who rule is the struggle between their love for those who are more distant from them and their love

for those who are closest to them.
Being a creator and goodness are not opposites, but rather one and the same thing, yet with a more distant or a closer perspective.
16 [72] The weak must obey.
16 [73]
To find the measure and the mean in striving beyond humankind: the supreme and most powerful kind of human being must be found! To continue depicting the supreme tendency in miniature – perfection, ripeness, glowing health, mild emanation of power. To work as artists do at their daily tasks, to bring us closer to perfection with each work, to be the best brother there is. Honesty in admitting motives to ourselves, as befits those who are powerful.
NB. everything can be ruined by the madness of longing!
16 AUTUMN 1883 473
16 [74]
NB. The inner difficulties of Part 3 have to appear at the end as completely unnecessary: when faced with the general insight, they must cancel themselves out.
16 [75]
Every sacrifice made by someone who rules is repaid a hundred times over.
16 [76]
General insight perhaps: the organic itself is the law, we cannot do anything else – absolute determinism. The many possibilities that we see, confuse us.
16 [77]
The great mass, force of the individual is wasted in this way,
like that of the sun. Or???

16 [78]?
A fact, a work, is newly eloquent for every age and for every new kind of human being. History is always articulating new truths.
16 [79]
Zarathustra 3. This entire distress, with the aversion to suffering, came from the feeling that the force was not yet sufficient

– an instinct of weakness that initially hindered action (even hindered the articulation of the thought!) – The will to suffer is immediately present when the power is strong enough.

“The stillest hour” was a temptress.

16 [80]

NB. Zarathustra’s mood not madly impatient for the superhumans!

it is serene, can wait, but everything that is done has taken on meaning as the way and the means to get there – and must be done well and completely.

474 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Serenity of the great torrent!!! Consecration of the smallest!!! all disquiet, fervent longing, all disgust should be depicted and overcome in Part 3!

(Gentleness, mildness of Parts 1 and 2), etc. everything a sign of a force that is not yet sure of itself!)

In the midst of Zarathustra’s convalescence, Caesar stands there, unrelenting, benevolent – the split between being creator, benevolence, and wisdom is annihilated. Light, serenity, no exaggerated longing, happiness in a moment that has been properly applied, made eternal!

16 [81]

Beyond midlife – irrevocably sacrificed – no going back!

16 [82]

(4) Speeches: great honesty in regard to morality – as befits

those who are powerful Compilation of things in life that take hold of us

16 [83] (Zarathustra 3.)

Recapitulation: to create superhumans by every means. But you fall in love with your friends and with yourself! The thought became a burden to us.

1. Clairvoyance. tossed about on the ocean

. Summoning up the truth.

. Beyond midlife – irrevocably sacrificed.

. Song of mockery about the pessimists.

. Las fatum.

. Majestic nature and human beings.
. Song of those who fly.
. What it means to be a friend! Praise of friends (who perished) of the quiet world-beautifiers who create, praise of ho pe – not before now!
oN Aun Aw DN
16 AUTUMN 1883 475
9. beyond good and evil
12. Commiseration with those who rule and with their sufferings.
18. In his desire for commiseration, he seeks out his animals and finds the cave destroyed.
20. Temptation to suicide. The serpent in the high mountains.
22. Rainbow. Lioness with flock of doves. Praise of a primordially determined nature that turns everything into its own happiness.
against the nonsense of reclusiveness 16 [84] (Zarathustra 4.) 1. The invitation. 2. The victory parade. 3. The convalescents' thanksgiving song. 4. The great noon.
5. The new community. I found that humans had become inferior, minor virtues, minor misdeeds.*
6. Where to? (Places of residence)
7. The new nobility and its education. (Multiplicity and unity) (Powerful and puny people)"
8. The woman in women"
476 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
Bridging "poor and rich."
12. Punishment and evil people. The new leniency for the sake of those who are coming. Evil people praiseworthy as destroyers, for destruction is necessary." Afterward as a source of power.
13. Life as an experiment: happiness in figuring things out or in experimenting (skepticism). Death and the desire to see ourselves yield because we are inhibiting life.
14. The breaking of the tablets. The ideal "lawgiver." A herald's proclamation.
15. The I sanctified. "Selfishness" and "imperiousness" above all. Teichmüller) p. 131.°8 Called heretical up to now, all drives, because too strong in the wrong position, rehabilitated."

16. The redemption of those who have passed away. The great noon filled to the brim with unified opposites.!°°

17. Praise of cool dialectical reason, as kingly = strongly influential for feelings. The grateful eye. Warding off the monstrous.

18. The sanctification of laughter and dance. (the body as testimony of growth)

20. The innocence of becoming. The struggle with chance. the new "immortality" "will to suffer"

16 [85]

Concerning Zarathustra's convalescence at the conclusion of the third part.

Zarathustra musing like a god about whether he will communicate his thought to humans. What motivates a god in relation to humans?

16 AUTUMN 1883 477

To reinterpret religion from this standpoint: a god in his relationship with humans.

Zarathustra 3. "I myself am happy" – when he has abandoned humans, he returns to himself. It avoids him like a cloud.

How the superhuman being must typically /ive, like an Epicurean god.

a kind of divine suffering is the content of Zarathustra 3. the Auman condition of the lawgiver is only cited as an example his intense love for his friends seems like an illness to him – he is again at peace.

When invitations arrive, he gently avoids them.

Main doctrine: It lies in our power to remake suffering into a blessing, poison into nourishment. Will to suffer.

What it means to be human flew toward me, its shadow surrounded me, then I felt weakness.

16 [86]

To rule? To impose my type on others? Dreadful! Isn't observing a variety of other people precisely what makes me happy? Problem.'®!

To challenge to a contest of power precisely those who like to conceal themselves and who would like to live for themselves – even the wise, pious, silent people in our country! Mocking their enjoyment of solitude!

All creative natures fight for influence even when they live alone – "posthumous fame" is merely a false expression for what they want.

The enormous task of those who rule, those who educate themselves – they must model within themselves the kind of human beings and peoples over which they want to rule: they must already have become masters there!

All virtue and selfovercoming makes sense only as a kind of preparation for those who rule!

Against all those who merely enjoy! Solitude, too, as self enjoyment, even the solitude of those who mortify themselves.

478 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

A diamond sword cuts every darkness into pieces for me: I have now become clairvoyant – I have certainly been obsessed with clairvoyance for far too long!!°?

Good days want to walk on good feet!©%

Demand: the new law must be capable of being actualized – and overcoming and the higher law must grow out of the actualization. Zarathustra makes room for the law by canceling the “law of laws,” morality.

Laws as backbone.

to work on them and to create, as we perfect them. The previous slave mentality on trial!

Zarathustra himself has become a sage who rejoices in his foolishness and a pauper who rejoices in his wealth. Scene: the fool and the pauper in 4.

I do not want to establish a single ideal of the sage, but rather a hundred ideals of the fool! Zarathustra 4.

Against the ferocious theatrical stoic magnificence of the “sage.”

The lawgiver type, its development and its suffering.

What's the point of giving laws at all?

Zarathustra is the herald who summons many lawgivers.

(For 4) Initially law-giving. Then, after the prospect of breeding superhumans has been broached by means of this law-giving – great gruesome moment! Zarathustra proclaims the doctrine of recurrence – which only now has become bearable, even for him for the first time!

16 [87]

If our fellow humans are merely one form of our perceptions: then it follows that ruling is merely one form of se/frule: and the will to be ruler is = the greatest victory over our own fear and compassion and transformation of the other into our function – therefore production of an organism.

16 [88]

I will not give to (those) other people the rights that I have won for myself: instead they should steal them for themselves!
 16 AUTUMN 1883 479
 as I do – and may they take them and rip them away from me! In this way, there must exist a law which is an extension of me, as if it wanted to make all people in my image: so that,
 in contrast to my image, individuals may discover themselves and make themselves stronger.
 New appraisal of human beings: advancing the question:
 how much power is in them?
 how much multiplicity of drives?
 how much ability to communicate and absorb?
 Those who rule as supreme type.
 To make the past fertile and to breed the future – let that be my present time!
 Zarathustra himself the jester who jumps over the poor tightrope walker – for 3) self-mockery.
 First scene of 3) perhaps “the wanderer” and a conversation with lightning that suddenly blazes forth: thus does his will blaze forth suddenly for him.
 Mockery of the slavish subjugation in morality (under the ancient law of somebody or other) To form a long-lasting individual (a people) in order to translate their thoughts into flesh blood and will Those who take a right for themselves will not give this right to others – but rather will be their opponents in the act of taking it for themselves. the love of the father who resists
 the son,!04
 The great educators are like nature: they must pile up barriers so that the barriers may be overcome.
 Against all who enjoy: – ignoble to confront life in only this way! To accept all enjoyment as rest! In this way, true enjoyment for the first time!
 We are punished most severely for our virtues.!°
 A person makes an action valuable: but how should the action make the person valuable!
 5
 480 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

It is cool, the moon is shining, no cloud is in the sky – there's no point in living.

16 [89]

Zarathustra 3 Beginning. Recapitulation. You want to teach about the superhumans!°° – but you have fallen in love with your friends and with yourself and made life into a refreshment.

The blessed isles make you soft – now you become depressed and passionate and berate your enemies. Sign of weakness: you avoid a thought.

But you should convince the world and convince humans to crush themselves.

(The reformer languid in his own community: his enemies are not strong enough. Thus his greatest enemy must emerge, a thought.

The thought as an objection to life and to the continuation of life)

16 [90]

Regret: this is revenge on ourselves.

and I give this advice to my enemies and to all those who spit and spew:

as the teacher of the great contempt (The penultimate)

How could I bear it otherwise, teaching you the great contempt? –!7

[17 = N VI 6. Autumn 1883]

17 W!

And when someday you can no longer endure life, you must attempt to win its favor – for such has always been the artful strategy of the greatest sages.

Truly their most artful, boldest strategy was to believe in a god just when they felt the devil coming too close.

They learned to switch names for things: and so things became switched around in their minds – behold, this is the artfulness of the greatest sages in its entirety!

Most people are too crazy to be self-interested – their happiness makes all of them crazy.

They sacrifice everything for one thing – this is a kind of love; this willfulness and self-absorption loom over all people.

Their intense insanity bubbles forth out of their love – but it is a poor calculator and despises huckster virtues."

Yet huckster virtue and the huckster's money-grubbing? fingers and cold eye – this is even beneath the dignity of an animal.

Everything that can be bought is worth little: I spit this doctrine into the faces of hucksters.

There are things, whether the hucksters know it or not – in whose proximity money sounds completely shameless.

Money passes through all fingers: therefore learn to handle money with kid gloves.

Praise be to puny poverty: for all hucksters scheme after great wealth.

482 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

17 2 Hucksters Teachers

Tools

Princes.

they all deserve each other?

Concerning evil people (imperious people – this is the mark of evil people)

17 [3]°

Those who have always spared themselves a lot will still finally get sick from sparing themselves too much.

He speaks roughly – but not from a rough soul: every gust of wind makes him speak more hoarsely, this sensitive little thing!

Ultimately, the best, most fertile land (concerning evil people)

7 [47]

Zarathustra makes fun of previous attacks on evil and selfish people, on passionate people (for the benefit of weaklings)

77 [5]

And we often teach despairing people to be strong only by telling them about their weakness.®

Some are gluttons, others nibblers – both contemptible!" Begetters and breeders!°

17 [el Against noise

You can mold and remold the soul by means of nutrition with salts baths and exercise – how could you not bring healing to sick souls?

17 AUTUMN 1883 483

There were times when oaths and vows were made on a mortar !?

In order to change the soul it is necessary to change the body.!?

Holy iron shavings and bone fragments, Egyptian nights locked up in canisters, having thrown coal on the fire, I have completely smothered it: it was too small anyway

17 [7]

Oh these narrow dull huckster-souls! Whenever money jumps into the money box, the hucksters jump in along with
it.

Whose souls have been a money belt and whose happiness has been dirty pieces of paper – how could their blood ever become clean?

It still flows lifeless and poisonous and foul smelling unto the tenth generation.

stagnant and foamy

17 [8]

We have unlearned this: there is no virtue for all, there are superior and inferior human beings: equal rights for all is the most extraordinary injustice.

17 [9]!°

On hucksters.!"

On substitute teachers.!8

On princes.

On laws.

On pious people.

On speed.

The great curse.

The city.

– On science – Visit of the fool. – Mocking.

– Zarathustra seeks the cave. Symbol.

– Hermit. – Speech.

484 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

17 [10]

And if I cannot live the way I wish,!° then I have no wish
to live – this is how the most saintly people still think."°

So, does a drive want to be satisfied? Does it want freedom and peace from itself? Has any will ever willed not to will?
That it creates, this is what drives all drives: and probably that it also sleeps in for a while – (in order to) become fully awake while creating!

But you distorted the essence of willing into unwillingness and into willing against itself

you misinterpret(ed) the voice of the weary will

So, is sleep an invention in response to death? And would it be the case that whoever wants to sleep is someone who is weary of dying? The liveliest person can snuffle and snore.?!

Scribblers and screamers, hasty idlers, those panting with ambition, pushy and shameless people."

"The virtue of daily life suffices" – we must learn modesty even in virtue??

17 [11]*4 On diminishment.

The big city. as a stake at which people are burned:

1) the deep thought etc.

clumsy as a corpse"

17 [12]

Beware, you who are the wealthiest: your puny acts of charity bring impatience and spark more outrage than any miserli-ness: you drip like wide-bottomed bottles with all-too-narrow necks – bottles like these have already had their necks broken many times.

These neighbors and their puny distress, this city and its meager happiness – this slowly chips away at your strength; you are unlearning how to inflict great pain.

17 AUTUMN 1883 485

17 [3]?

Contented sows or dying gladiators – don't you have any other options?

A lustful eye cast over a bilious soul?'

Whenever something dead is dug up, a lot of living things always get sick; sickness and harmful vapors live under excavated earth.

Gravediggers dig themselves into illness, – – –

We begin as imitators and end up imitating ourselves – this is the last childhood.

The compassion of the greatest people is firm," like the hand-shake of a giant.

I wanted to be a light to them, but I made them blind; this is every sun's complaint, it puts eyes out.

How do I get through the city gate? said Zarathustra – I have unlearned how to be a dwarf.

The greatest thing about great people is what is maternal in them: the father is merely a matter of chance.

For them, being forced to give birth means the future; they do not understand what their happiness will be – they don't gloat about any kind of "freedom."

From my snow-capped peaks on downwards, I find every flower, I am all-too-human, I am also still almost-animal.

My fury still obeys me
and little children do not always come to him who suffers them to come.??

486 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

You cough, but this is no objection to strong winds.
Your maw roars: food and drink! Your belly roars in response, lots! Your lusting eye: good!
Alas, says Zarathustra, I cannot exempt myself from hell
– the underworld, where everything dead rises up against me, and where even the shades speak: life is torture.?!
Your ailments set themselves against you and accuse you on account of the virtues you gloat about: and what doesn't suit your body, how should this – – -*?
Your street talking is making you sicker than your street walkers: and precisely these are your most secret sicknesses.

There is a great hypocrisy among you: those who command pretend to have the virtues of those who obey.
Born to rule, but where would I have found a teacher who could teach me how to rule? That's why I am trying to persuade them when I should be commanding them!
Yet persuasion is the flattery that a superior shows to an inferior and that a lord shows to – – –
And not until everything goes as we will, does everything also go as we wish.
It writhes as if about to be martyred: it does not speak, it subjects itself to the martyrdom of keeping quiet.
Oh, Zarathustra advocate of life! You must also be the advocate of suffering!'
Human beings must become more evil. Zarathustra 4 this is the greatest suffering for me – I must make them more evil!
and wherever I see the sticky fingers of a huckster, I prefer to draw the short straw.

17 AUTUMN 1883 487

The black sad sea lies before you – you must cross even beyond that, too!34
to live among dwarves
I see crumpled houses – a child probably took them out of the box. Crumple(d) souls Time feels different in the dark than in the light.
spoiled by many puny triumphs – he has always had it easy – intimate and welcoming, but lowly like a door through which a tall person does not enter."

Wise forgetfulness and the art of sailing in every wind –
two new virtues.*°

Only those who begin steering toward their goal have the wind at their back.

To outwit chance and lead it around by the hand – suffer chance to come to me, it is innocent like a little child.⁷
The doctrine of life Zarathustra 4 terrible-dithyrambic Seed of life strewn from star to star."

Beauty cloaks the man

– to become smooth and hard-hearted, we must bring our secret solitude into the crowd.??

"it hurts, therefore it is bad" – this is the oldest and most recent conclusion and the basest of all base things.

Ever since I have understood this origin of bad things, I have laughed at all this babble about good and bad.

Beyond what is good and bad

488 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

I respect virtue when it is the caution of someone who is pregnant: but what do I care about the virtue of those who are infertile!

17 [14]

sparing of ourselves, the wise forgetting, the bliss of those who hope, the generosity of those who also conceal their aloneness,?? – – –

Fear has made humans tame: their weakness has grown out of the fear they feel of their monster "selfishness and imperiousness."

So why, then, do you howl through the night, you monster?

You writhe, you torment yourself, what could bring you comfort?

You are sleeping poorly, an evil dream has come to you, you are groaning under the weight of evil thoughts."

You want the best for yourselves and you still want even the best for me, now then – what would be the point of hurting you with my pain!

There would be so much of you that would be ruined because of me, and so little that would be improved: let me be silent!

I am sad for you and I have a grudge against myself on your account: alas that I am (not) strong enough to deliver you from evil dreams!

Your eyes stay open, they are sleepy, half-dead, sad eyes:
your mouth is open, a gurgling choking sound the fear of you had crippled them – awe lets them walk again warm breath, limbs stretched out drunk with sleep – an open eye and yet a vacant stare, he – lost to himself – seeking something, sullen
I trust you even more in a storm your countless jaws and bared teeth
17 AUTUMN 1883 489

Thus my destiny lies before me like the sea, in dark sadness, chagrined, aged, still drunk with sleep, with open mouth,
dreaming.*?

Alas the eye open, and still a vacant stare, breathing warmly,

wound around (itself), slurping

17 [15]?

There is the black sad sea, like my destiny it lies before
me

– an open eye, but still craving sleep and still not looking
in my direction.

Alas, the sea breathes with warm breath, like my destiny, wound around itself on the pillow of its crags, and groans
in evil anticipation.

I am sad for you, you dark monster, and for your sake I bear a grudge against myself. Alas, that I do not possess enough strength to deliver you from evil dreams!

– What are you doing, Zarathustra? Do you want to comfort the sea with your song? Have you already become a compassionate spectator of your own future?

Alas, you are a love-sick fool and excessively trusting!
even toward everything that is terrible! (You) go to every monster in order to pet it!

A breath of warm air, a bit of soft fur around the claws:
and

already seductive tones are pouring from your flute – truly
(you) are yearning for everything that is alive!

Better to trust your destiny, you blissful trusting man,
even if it roars like a sea from a thousand maws – better still

its teeth bared against you in a storm than such a pregnant black sullenness at night!

Your tenderness toward everything that lives is your danger, oh Zarathustra! If you would have no creative will, watch out!

All those who create must become hard hammers! Come to me, you most terrible of smiths who forges even the hammer itself into hardness.

490 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

17 [16]*4

Now everything is just great! For the hucksters are wearing swords and walrus mustaches, and the regiment itself is the place of the bowlegged."

Now everything is just great!

The best regents without principles, bringing joy to many – and my best friends are among them

He felt no lust for crime, his taste was too healthy and bright for such lusts.

But he also spared himself nothing and he committed crimes against crime, for now he took the shortest paths.

And if a straight line is not a path at all, then the shortest path must be the crooked one

It is a shipwreck that first spits him toward his promised lands

The greatest danger lies behind us – over there, where the blessed isles are

I think little of prayer, I think more kindly of cursing:
and now I call upon you to curse all cowardly devils who whimper and fold their hands and want to pray.

the sea has gone mad – a snow-white mon(ster) has just enough snow to drink its fill until mentally ill.

Now you speak to me of praying

Goats geese and other crusaders, led by the holy spirit?

you will be slit open, they believe that you have swallowed gold

17 AUTUMN 1883 491

I am Zarathustra the Godless: who is more godless than I? "8 telling stories around the evening campfire (instead of the doctrine)

to set crowns on our own heads

with a voice like a stonemason's chisel.

they creep around everywhere like lice lust loves twilight: adventure shuns the day.

Pity those who would want to entertain others“? if this were no longer their livelihood!

They must fight with the wild animal, hunger, otherwise their entertainment would be that of a wild animal – aimed at us.

There are people with skills and people with jobs, there are those who can stand on their own – they have to stand up for themselves.

Thus do I praise myself for my part. Now it was your turn to praise me.

ill people and obsessed people queasy and querulous you soon become accustomed to what is around you: and where you customarily sit becomes the seat of customs.
and with you I will always be like oil and water – floating on top, unless we get vigorously shaken up together.

492 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

servileand supine

You call them stilts – but they are pride’s strong feet
He rises and swells beyond all bounds: is it possible that his fate soured him?

a contrarian is a bad spouse to himself

“by accident”? – this is not a good nobleman, even if he is of the oldest line?!

trumpeters and other butterflies

17 17]?

By all that is bright and strong and good “wisdom is a creative labor pain” goodness

a means and a tool, like – – –

Next to every warehouse I saw an alehouse that’s where they look for wine

And anyone who does not find warmth in spiced wine looks for it in spicy women.

A shipwreck spat him toward land.’

17 [18]°4 No “T” in Zarathustra 4!

17 [19]

Why are you blaspheming against yourself?

17 [20]*°

a puny community in the middle of nowhere, and their miserably clad mystification®®

17 AUTUMN 1883 493

Zarathustra) the Godless?°”

You are being pursued, a price has been put on your head
Keep it up, they can pursue us all they want: until now, success has always come to those who are most relentlessly pur(sued)°®

17 [21]"

Where is Zarathustra coming to us from? Who are father and mother to him?® Destiny and laughter are Zarathustra's f(ather) and mother: cruel destiny and loving laughter spawned

a scion like that.

Cheerfulness as the secret foretaste of death.

"I am seeking Zarathustra. Zarathustra became lost to me.

17 22)"

the will to evil how it grows brighter and more beautiful on the contrarians™ origin of virtue

Did I come to vilify vice and to warn against pickpockets?®

17 [23]

The sky is on fire and the sea spits at me"

17 [24]®

common and limited enough for the most limited advantages, they still read the rubbish of their happiness like tea

leaves.

They are rich: but their eyes are still thieves' eyes.

put good clothes on them – now they are rag-pickers and vultures in disguise.

Curse – the brotherhood of hatred and lightning bolts

I went in search of origins – this alienated me from all reverence: and all around me it became strange and lonely.

494 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

But finally reverence itself blossomed secretly again – and behold! my tree of the future sprang forth for me –:

Now I sit in its shadow.

17 [25] °° relentlessly pursued, never caught!

putrid, tepid, rancid blood you wanted to take the wildness out of humans, but you have made them weak

you made wolves into dogs and humans themselves into the finest human pets.

17 [26]

On Scribblers and Screamers 17 [27] to bring unity into the greatest tension of a multitude of oppositions – goal.

to condemn single drives as heretical and to kill them for those who cannot bring them into a beautiful unity – inferior moralities – their value.

the highest dialectic and its equal in every way, the strength of feeling.

what is most terrible: imperiousness and selfishness saints

17 [28]°

Chorus of fools "once we were sages"

0 17 [29]

a movement like a storm – and one goal and serenity at every place on the route

Zarathustra discovered that human beings had become inferior"?

17 AUTUMN 1883 495

evil people as destroyers worth honoring – destruction is necessary./?

Self-love and self-contempt – synthesis.

"Who among us is a seducer?" said Zarathustra and smiled – for amemory had come to him.

to cram the great noon full of resolved oppositions.'?

It is the age of puny people"

17 [30]

There are those who are actors without knowing it and those who are actors without wanting it.'

Some people will: but most are only willed."

To have a better sense of justice in my little finger" than they have in their heads."8

As long as selfishness is considered to be fundamentally evil, you will never honestly be able to derive anything good from it – and you have to honestly derive everything from it. For that reason I have the organic-moral.'?

17 [31]®°

Zarathustra 4 at the end: fulfillments

Zarathustra 1 Preface: poor people (lowly, superfluous people) as rich people, the sages happy to feel ignorant and foolish for a while (to become fools – festival of fools)

Choruses of poor people of fools

Zarathustra 3, 1 premonition that terrible things will happen.

3, 2 the wanderer's deepest semblance of serenity to collect the most painful things

496 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

17 [32]

to be burned at the stake, not for our faith, but for our doubt'®!

You ride quickly to your goal; but your lame foot will arrive with you at the same time!®?

You say it is moral to do good for your neighbors? But then you would already have to know what is good for them!

17 53)" On servants a) rich people b) kings

Priests and merchants now rule.

17 [34]

There is a secret insight: great crimes are no longer needed – but rather many small ones.

in no way do I want "the happiness of others" – I much prefer their discomfort and despair under certain conditions

What! To tell the "truth"! I want to express my feelings and not to conceal myself.⁸⁴ Sp(encer) D(ata of) Eth(ics) p.

269.8°

Egoism not in contradiction with the heroic mode of thought!

Generosity, how you allow so many foreign and hostile thought processes to get power over you, you thinkers!

trapped in their tiny hearts®®

17 [35]*"

Deeply mistrustful of destiny, ready for sudden decisions, badly governed

17 AUTUMN 1883 497

Do I love human beings? Do I love myself? But they are a part of my plan, like me.

17 [36]*° Zarathustra 3 On Boredom.

17 [37]

I require a lot of altruism for the sake of my ego and its lust to possess.

axoacial!®?

17 [38]°

This is the choice I have given myself: whatever / did not want before, this is what\ must want afterward (putting things right, fitting things in – digesting – but checking to see if I can do it!

17 [39]"

§ to make a poor person rich Emerson p. 383."

§ Bliss within the greatest expanse of the soul, longest ladder up and down

working redemptively against stuffy "sages."

The world – exuberance of a god"

Sin as enjoyment of self-abolishing.*

17 [40]"°

you are overlooking what a monstrous thing every organic process already is, what a unity of opposites.

 To hurl ourselves again into opposites, after a drunken moment of reconciliation.
 the most expansive soul, which can err the furthest within itself%° the greatest sages, who hurl themselves into the ocean of foolishness the most necessary people, who hurl themselves into coincidences
 498 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 the one who is, who is becoming the one who has, who wants to approach each other again and again and to flee again and again the soul, for which everything is a game" 17 [41]
 $ (Zarathustra) 4 What is bad?
 $ (Zarathustra) 4 the most superior soul, depiction of superhumans
 Do you not see how time is only an audacity and space an exuberance? And which mischief of freedom can be more mischievous than my rolling wheel of reasons and conclusions? they want no one to hurt them: that is why they come before him and please him – these cowards!"?
 17 [42]
 Epictetus as opposite 17 [43]'°° 11245 Reclus.
 17 [44]
 The one who warns: Zarathustra! Everything is ready to fall apart." Tell your people to save themselves and to give up their self-indulgent solitude.
 Zarathustra: Let my people be gathered and let heralds summon them to come to the great noon.
 17 [4s] Recipe for the mundane
 Do what you want, but take care not to offend with it,
 Do what you can, but take care not to be conspicuous about it.
 17 AUTUMN 1883 499
 17 [46]
 they want to learn how to play and have yet to learn how to be serious.¹⁰⁴
 It might be possible to fly – but first you have to know how to dance like an angel.
 No leaps in virtue! But a different path for every person!
 Yet
 the supreme path is not for everyone! Still, everyone can be a bridge and a lesson for others!!

17 [47]

Perhaps it is not permissible to think about the meaning and value of art and artists as I do here, especially not now:

perhaps even less so to write about this the way I do – : perhaps I have many things to atone for.

17 [48]

A small light, but even so, a great comfort

106 deep mistrust (of nature) needed

the breeding of strong humans.

Do what you want – assuming that you are the kind of people who can will and not be willed.!"

ove your neighbors as yourselves, assuming that you love

Love y1 hb y l that you | yourselves!

109 17 [49]

The average person today is my greatest enemy – I owe it to Rée that I have gotten to know this person.

He had no ch(aracter): what could he do? So he had to steal one for himself.!!°

SOO UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

17 [sol

Not to believe in God.

Consequently things do not go as God wills. (Against the cowardly submissiveness that has made human beings weak: I teach a profound mistrust of this.)

17 [51]?

Zarathustra 3. He wonders: what has made human beings so puny, anyway?

Opposite of his friends moral phrases as a theatrical means of enhancing ourselves.

his disgust grows ever greater how pleased I (am) that I have my friends and that my thought /ives in them!

to fritter away

Happiness does not want to be sought, but rather to be found.

We should no longer seek what we have.

Anyone who has nothing to do is troubled by nothingness.

Whatever I want to do for you, you cannot do for me! And whatever I do not want you to do for me, why should / not do this for you?

17 [52]

$ against the dubiousness of justice

§ against clemency, as if we have to spare superfluous people!

"Alas, how necessary is everything that is superfluous!" you tell me

§ against weakness, induced by trust. I teach profound mistrust.!!4

§ against anxiety about shedding blood in short: against all morality as weakening.

17 AUTUMN 1883 501

§ against religious communities à la Moravians!!> – Christians.

Concerning Zarathustra 4. You must first gain strength as destroyers!

17 [53] "6

they are getting weaker and weaker – ever since I stopped seeing them.

Mockery of my blessed isles, where some have fled– after a while it doesn't matter!

Concerning Zarathustra 4) It is high time to stir up the flame again.

It is now necessary to give up God: humankind would become too feeble otherwise.

17 [541

Defiance in selfabasement, going so far that he demands deadly revenge on witnesses that's why God must die!

Even the animals are mew: thus I myself am willing it once again, anew.

Zarathustra 4. Widespread revolution – the sinking of the isles as omen.

17 [ss]

Zarathustra 3. The consolation of the saint outrages Zarathustra, he recognizes where weakness comes from.

Onward! Once again!

The saint: Do you want all this once again? and leaves.

After this, Zarathustra summons the most burdensome thought.

(Zarathustra) 3. Weakness your danger!

(Zarathustra) 3. A devil's grimace.

(Zarathustra) 3. Was the journey necessary?

Happiness is chasing after me: that's because I do not chase after women – and happiness is a woman.

502 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

17 [56]?

It is still too early for Zarathustra: up to now I was still my own precursor

The superhumans emerge around the midpoint of the course.
the success of all things that are relentlessly pursued!?'°
My tombs opened: my pain which had been buried alive, rose again – it had slept well under shrouds, in order now
to get in a good night's watch.!!?

not to wade through foreign slime.!!??

(Zarathustra) 4 Supreme moment: one more time in the name of all being!"

17 [57]

The thought that morality owes its origin to lawgivers and that – – –

17 [58]!

Beware of willing anything halfway: be decisive in indolence and in action. And whoever wants to be lightning must be a cloud for a long time.!??

You must learn the long silence: and no one should see into your depths. But not because your water is cloudy and your face is unreadable, but rather because your depths are too deep.

17 [59]'?'°

And anyone who woos the virtues of the strong should forgo the virtues of the weak: and let there be no contempt
in your renunciation.

How can you want to learn to dance when you have not even learned to walk! And those who fly, and their bliss, are

even above those who dance

17 AUTUMN 1883 503

Already I feel that I am dreaming: so perhaps I am almost awake?

We should only steal when we cannot rob: thus speaks the code of honor among rogues.

17 [60]!?'° Prescription 1) strengthen the will 2) no lasciviousness 3) learn silence 4) learn solitude

5) profound mistrust and profound trust!"

6) seek out your!" enemies, yet find your friends.

17 [61]130

I do not want you to do anything "in order" or "because"
and "so that," but rather everything for its own sake and
for the pleasure it gives you.

An end is what desecrates every thing and every deed: for whatever must become the means is desecrated

17 [62]!3!

Plant yourself in the soil – as a new duty

Praise of chance, as it seeks out its friends

Doctrine of long-term willing in place of happiness

The old values annihilated

17 [63]?

So much goodness, so much weakness! It is not yet time to be benevolent.

§ On the community of cowards

Your stone is getting brittle!

to give the will a backbone

§ Our dignity as an eternal type

§ science teaches him nothing but its own fleetingness and transitoriness

504 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

17 [64]? My freedom's curiosity for novelty prisons.

134 took flight, even into

17 [65]

A curse on the fact that the best people secluded themselves without having children.

17 [66]'3°

Zarathustra 3 There is a hesitation within you: this created – – –

Modestly embracing a little happiness and, in that very moment, already modestly making eyes at another little happiness.

Watch out if you wanted to buy them, but offered too little, and thereby made their virtue stronger!

17 [67]

At noon, my happiness loomed hot above me (and) sucked thirstily from my ocean, I love strong winds and also know where they go and from where they roar. Soon I will become a strong storm to implant our will so that it will become a long-term will and a tall tree with broad branches.

§ I do not want the virtues of the strong to be confused with something else.!?8

17 [68]

Napoleon's speech – contempt for h(uman beings), he drives his nation to the heights and again awakens the thought that a people may only live by finding faith in his supreme right. to make hard-hearted instead of meek – long-term instead of fleeting – proud instead of modest

17 AUTUMN 1883 505

Conscience A chiseled arrow –

Do not speak to me of events! Nothing will ever happen to you except you yourselves!4° 17 [69]!

§ (Zarathustra) 4 the great contempt in the face of the eternity of the individual.

After that, redeeming: behold! I teach you about the super-humans § (Zarathustra) 3 none of them believe in their supreme right – peoples sages etc.

Conclusion of Zarathustra 3 “Arise abysmal thought! Now I am your equal!!*? “Make it hard as stone. You are my hammer!

–

Bliss of predetermined nature – hymn.

(Zarathustra) 3 Beginning. You have abandoned many things already –

Long eulogy with mockery at the end

All honor to those with a lust for power who took their contempt out on weak humans.”3 17 (ye

Anyone who up to now has had the most contempt for people – has this person in doing so not always been the people’s greatest benefactor?

Take the child away – its gaze kills!

17 [71]”°

wrapped in a black cloud – do I bring you the plague? eternal satisfaction hurled itself into its opposite journalists as corpse robbers taking something from the half-dead and the dead

17 [72]°

Zarathustra 4 “let them come to me!”!47

506 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

“You bring good news: the swamp is moving”

If the most superior h(uman) being is not a ruler of the people-ple, then the hucksters will rule.

Say it mornings and evenings: I despise hucksters, I want to break their fingers. Better more Handel than handlers!!”

against teachers who are not role models

Conclusion Behold, this is unchosen bliss)

17 [73]’”

A. Blanqui

l'éternité par les astres Paris 1872.150

17 [741°

the suffering of superior people on account of the imperfection of their inferiors

(the suffering) of God on account of h(uman)k(ind)

you have understood how to strangle ambition within them: to be the last among you – this would give them more pleasure than to be the first

What makes superior humans suffer is not that which is inferior to them, but rather knowing that there is still something superior to them

17 [75]

Zarathustra 3. alone godless terrible terrifying, Zarathustra should appear this way to the hermit – the predatory /ion who finds delusion and arbitrariness in what is most holy

17 AUTUMN 1883 507

17 [76]

to make enemies, ever more intellectual ones – or everything becomes dull

Did I really come here to make human beings happy?

Whoever seeks pleasure will find little of it – even if seeking it for others

Pleasure is a woman: she runs after anyone who spurns her.!??

17 [771

Zarathustra 3 Beginning. (Zarathustra) is satisfied – the seed is well sown.

He has much in store for his disciples: first they must ripen.

17 [78]*

you figure out how to be happy and in the process you forget all future generations

Miscalculation in regard to happiness – we must want unhappiness.

to sacrifice the happiness of contemporaries for future generations.)

Ask women:!*¢ having a good time is not the point of giving birth.

17 [79]

There will be qualities having to do with our intellect that pertain to it as an intellect, and other qualities that pertain to it as a human intellect: this is now the point of actual conflict, and we must not tire of sorting differentiating doubting and offering things to be learned

17 [80]!57

not to determine the value of things according to accompanying phenomena, e.g., letting labor pains dictate what birth is about! Then it would certainly be bad!

508 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

"There is something that wants to command me. Why are we wrestling with each other, let's see who is stronger!" this is g 8 how people become evil.

Alas for my melancholy! And even if I can still make it smile – angels should dissolve into tears when they see this smile. In the afternoon, when all light grows still.

Now no one who loves me remains alive; how could I still love life!

this thought! it only has to touch me with its fingertips and

I shiver and blush – and my heart beats until I feel it in my throat.

now I know it and I have grown happy and tired along with it – now "that's enough!" – According to you – yet / want to do what I told you to think their hearts were courteous even in the face of frustrating coincidence – they took it as wisdom for hedgehogs, to raise their quills against destiny.

Artists

Here is something that commands – and not even a living soul with eyes and eyes of lightning, but rather – – –

When the hours slip away from us on tiptoes, in the afternoon, there where even all light grows more still –

The ocean lies there, long and spread out: and without shame in its blue nakedness?

And whenever I have no ladder, then I climb on top of my own head

17 AUTUMN 1883 509

Zarathustra, said the helmsman, I don't like this!

To depict what was heart-wrenching about my break with W(agner).

It got so still for me – there was no stillness before this:

(when) no one thinks of me and everyone speaks of me.
He is unshakeable: and when he complains, it is more a concession to you and it is a cloak that he throws over his hard-heartedness.

Alas, my yoke is heavy! the yoke of supreme obsession.
The only thing I have ever sought is my home, this hits home!*® with me the hardest.

17 [81]

It is a mistake to see altruism as a refinement of egoism.
This

would mean ranking it too highly.

The drives whose effect is most emphatically called selfish are the least selfish, e.g., the urges for food sex and wealth.

Here there is not yet any thought of a self but rather only of the preservation of a specimen "human."

The control of these urges (or making them more difficult to satisfy!) is a consequence of the craving for self} of a feeling of self.

the common drives want above all and only to be satisfied at the cost of the other drives.

17 [82]?

– and the chimes of the bell are running in soft shoes –
And when the frost makes our souls crack and crunch, we rejoice: and we do not praise the land where butter and honey

– flow. !%0

510 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

A costly drop of sweet spicy wine hidden in a block of ice – this is happiness to me – yes, if there were gods they would be envious of me on account of this drop!

And even when someone wants to lie down in our sunny spot, then we laugh, full of doubts, and we ask ourselves: are we made in order to make others happy!

For us, happiness is the great exception and source of wonder: we fear it and we fear being in it, we gently push it away from us, as a mistrustful lover would do.

17 [83]

tricky as doors that secretly open, so that the thieving wind whooshes through

17 [84]

Look at this clear sky, will you! Has it not swallowed up
and guzzled all of the stars – and yet it found its innocence
again.

My happiness once descended into a valley in order to find lodging, my own sweet burning happiness, there I found these pure souls open, like welcoming gates.

Alas, it rankles me and it worms around, my silly worm and abyss of thought!

17 [85]"®'

Zarathustra, said the h(ermit), until now I took you for a sage, but what amazes me about you above all else is that I now see that you are clever as well. The worst lies behind us

– yet you have escaped.

and looked at him sideways.

loutish virtues

17 AUTUMN 1883 511

17 [86]

Once I have overcome myself in regard to this, who then will overcome me? And that is why this victory will be the seal of my perfection!

how could I dare to call you forth and look upon you!

17 [87]!

Only then, when Zarathustra has mastered his greatest pain, will he fight for victory against his greatest dragon.

It was refugees and castaways who discovered new lands:

half-destroyed people have always been the conquerors.

Zarathustra, if we do not perish for your sake, we will make our escape for your sake. But I have never seen things this bad,

and nevertheless the worst now lies behind us.

Yet the helmsman who had been the last to hear Zarathustra speak, uncovered his head and said reverently – – –

17 [88]

La gaya scienza'® is absolutely necessary for someone who thinks as I do and wants something like this.

17 [89]

Honor and perfection to you oh Zarathustra!

[18 = N VI 7. Autumn 1883]

18 [1]!

If you can't pray, why can't you at least curse? Don't you see that we are fighting for our lives?

I fear you because you laugh while we fight for our lives:

you look like someone who is sure that you will live.
 Or die – said Zarathustra.
 And if we get out of this, I want to say “God is not? – and Zarathustra taught me this.”
 I forgive you your mistrust, yet I give you nothing in exchange for your trust.
 I found in all things an arrogance that I called divine. And since I also found this arrogance in my soul, I also call my soul div(ine.)*
 You believe in wonders and wonderworkers; true need would also teach you how to pray. The old counterfeiters of the mind
 have also minted a counterfeit of your intellect.
 He lays his hand on millennia.
 18 pP
 On Tumult.
 4. Once, as Zarathustra was shipwrecked and spit out toward land and once, as he was riding a wave, he wondered: “where
 18 AUTUMN 1883 513
 has my destiny gone? I do not know where I should go from here. I am losing myself” He hurls himself into the tumult.
 Then, overcome by disgust, he looks for comfort in something – in himself® 18 [3]
 the one who flies (as a discoverer who lays his hand on a millennium)
 18 [4]? 4. On Puny People. 5. Hucksters etc.
 18 [5]
 That the dice might fall the wrong way for us, is this a reason not to play dice? On the contrary – that’s where the spice
 58 is.
 18 [6]
 In painful agitation, Zarathustra tests violent people, fools,
 and those who fly, in order to determine if he finds himself
 in them – to no avail!
 Only after he learns of the death of friends
 He does not find himself in any human being – so he seeks out animals.
 § intensely mocking himself as advocate of life
 18 [7]
 I do not like sullen sneaks and salamanders. I can’t stand will-o'-the-wisps either and everything that comes out of the swamp.

So is life a swamp?

514 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

18 [8]

A little song, but a great comfort for those who can sing
it:

and truly they must be good songbirds!

18 [9]

Suffering overflowed within him: this broke forth and poured down toward a sea of patriarchs.

He called the sea of all patriarchs, God— for this, righteous

men called him a blasphem(er.)

18 [10]

Alas, my soul, how did you grow so hard-hearted toward the one who had such superabundant love for you!

18 [11]

egomaniacal, selfobsessed, still not heard — and at the same time a hero

18 [12]

Whenever gold clinks, there a whore winks. And there are more whores than gold pieces. Whoever can be bought I call a whore. And there are more who can be bought than there are gold pieces.

18 [13]

I am best at despising life: and I love life most of all:
there is no paradox in this — no contradiction.

Emotional torment

18 [14]

§ My head is foolish, but my heart is wise.

§ Everything leaves and passes away — everything comes back.

— and leaving and passing away themselves come back

18 AUTUMN 1883 515

This now over there, has already been — it has already been countless times

This doctrine has never been taught before. How's that? It has been taught countless times already — Zarathustra has taught it countless times.

18 [15]!°

Pain teaches hens and artists to cluck. Ask women: having a good time is not the point of giving birth.

I saw wood piled up for someone to be burned at the stake:

brittle and pressed down, the woodpile waited for a spark:
 its own weight oppressed it He breathed out his desires to the boys: he rasped!! his words through dried-out gums, but the boys did not hear him
 We must scream at boys: violently rip open the door of their ears and eyes
 18 [16]
 In the dumbest world, there is indescribable enjoyment to be had even in a small bit of reason.
 Often I no longer know what I should ward off; I prefer to jump in and try things for myself.
 The power to transform things into myself, always growing.
 Assuming there were a God, the world could never be conceived as dumb enough for him.
 18 [17]
 to observe pain magnanimously – often the third generation is the first one to deal with our pain i.e., a new power has grown within that generation.
 magnanimous in regard to people of the future – and this is the magnanimity of those who create, who love their work more than their today.
 satisfied people by far the most dangerous (satisfied with given ideals) especially the satisfied puny sullen people.
 516 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 18 [18]!2
 So have I come to vilify vice? And to warn against pickpockets and shoplifters?
 Did I not come to teach them my riches and all my fullness's excess yearning
 18 [19]"? On Princes. On Teachers. On Evil People. On Fame.
 Conversation with Lightning
 18 [20] On the Great Yearning. On Divine Desires" On Pregnancy.
 18 [21]
 to force my enemies back behind their gate and to paint pale spots on the side of their gate
 The way through all 7 solitudes: in the end, the serpent 18 [22]
 Did I not teach you about – the superhumans?
 18 [23]
 What do you know of sensuality! What could you know of sensuality!
 Sensuality is one thing, giving birth is another. Ask women:
 having (a) g(ood time) is not the point of giving birth.

Pain makes artists and hens cluck. Sensuality is silent – hear now my words on fame.

18 AUTUMN 1883 517

thus she waits in the family way, !° radiant and satisfied,
the pregnant one.

18 [24]!"

If you have your virtue in your ears, just see how well you endure the noise of life. We are punished most often for our virtues.

18 [25]

My destiny, defend me from all small victories! Preserve me so that, just this once, my triumph – is as great as this destiny.

I am speaking to you, providence of my soul, destiny that I will be a surprise and never be anticipated, appearing

like a ghost

that I do not grasp fear, but rather require the greatest danger in order to break free of the disgust that life pours into me.

18 [26]

How many caves there are in life!

Being accustomed to caves, our yearning for them – a passage through dark tubes

18 [27]

You bolt of lightning, cutting diamond, gold zigzag! Answer me, so that I can see whether you are cutting and sharp only for the sake of appearance.

I often took you for a thinker – because, as with you, a thought walks through clouds: and as with you, a thought awakens the thunder that sleeps and rumbles behind the clouds.

18 [28]

I learned to walk on a day that was awake: to walk lightly on steady feet through a day that was awake.

518 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

While sleeping and dreaming – tell me, what did I learn that put me in a good mood even while sleeping and dreaming?

18 [29]

NB whenever I climbed up the mountain ridges
a herald for all brothers of the noon

18 [30]"? Sneaks, mousetraps

– For am la tricky money-huckster and a jingling purse?

Even in the good old days every day brought me a bad newspaper
 I have found this arrogance of wisdom in all things: that it tells all things to walk on the feet of fools.
 As little reason as possible: she does not take anything more in her knapsack, this arrogant wisdom when she tills her field
 during the day and walks across country.
 As little) r(eason) a(s) p(ossible) – this is, more delicately phrased: chance. All things run there and back on the feet
 of chance – – – Happiness and innocence are the most shameful things on earth: neither wants to be sought. We should have them – and we should not even know that we have them.
 their thoughts run counter to me: their meaning is a counter-meaning, their wit is a yes-but wit – but they do not stand and they do not walk – – – Everything speaks, everything betrays, and today's rasping ghost is already tomorrow's trumpeting at the marketplace
 18 AUTUMN 1883 519
 My foot is a cloven hoof: and I trot and totter with it over hill and dale, day and night, across and overland, and I am
 the devil's own, whenever lust makes me run fast
 My hand is a fool's hand: pity all tables and walls and anywhere else that saves a place for fools' truths
 My mouthpiece belongs to the people: my speech is strange to all scribblers and ink-slingers
 18 [31]! On the Will to Suffer On Unchosen Bliss. Before Sunrise On Self-Diminution. The Wintersong On Passing By The Return Home of the Solitary One.
 The Other Dance Song.
 18 [32]
 Selfishness: a dirty and libelous word for the nature of everything living – that it wants to grow and to create beyond itself that each and every thing walks around pregnant with its future – the lust of pregnant things and that, in its lust,
 it is often a miracle to itself 18 [33]
 The powerful call their happiness virtue – their flowing overflowing happiness, their gift-giving that rules.

18 [34]

Everything talks, everything is talked to death; and what today still seems too hard for the tooth of time will tomorrow already be rent and ripped to pieces, hanging from a hundred maws.

520 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Everything talks, everything goes unheard; people might try to ring in their wisdom with bells, the hucksters at the marketplace drown them out with the clinking of pennies.

Everything talks, no one wants to listen. All water roars to the ocean, every creek hears only its own roar.

Everything talks, no one wants to understand. Everything falls into the water, yet nothing falls into deep wells.

Everything talks, everything sets things right. Injustice is pursued – relentlessly pursued but rarely captured.”!

Everything talks, no(thing) succeeds, everything clucks, but no one wants to lay eggs.

Oh my brothers! That you are not learning silence from me!

And solitude!

Everything talks, no one knows what to say. Everything runs, no one learns to walk anymore.

Everything talks, no one hears me sing: Oh that you did not learn stillness from me! And the suffering of solitude!

18 [35]?

The time of gods was at an end long ago: they laughed themselves – to death.

This happened when the most godless word of all went out from a god himself – the word:?? you shall have no other gods before me: thus an old graybeard of a god forgot himself.

A god has never been so pathetic in his jealousy as to command: “you should have no other gods before me!”

And back then all gods laughed and wobbled on their chairs and cried out: “Is it not the nature of divinity that there are gods but no God?”

You rogue-jester Zarathustra, how divinely you spoke to the last person who still believes in God!

18 [36]

And when I had done what was most difficult for me and was celebrating my triumphs of overcoming, blissful and exhausted,

18 AUTUMN 1883 521

then they screamed – they claimed I had stepped thoughtlessly on the toes of their vanity.

They all want to make themselves into a statute: and those who can only climb, command: “thou shalt not fly.”

I am hard on myself: and I often take revenge for being hard on myself by ignoring the injustice that others have committed – their i(n)justice) against me!

And even if it is your guilt: I take it upon myself and call
it

my guilt.

18 [37]

And how could I talk you out of your willing, you with the will of a lion! For I can read all of your willing in your eyes.

18 [38]

I bless you, oh Zarathustra, just as if you, along with me, belonged to one god and were a child of the same hope.

The way I see you – how could you want things to go badly? Even if I do not understand what you say right away

This is, after all, what you are saying: and I will be astounded

if you should ever persuade anyone with talk like this – unless

it would be corpses and buffoons

And I prefer to believe that you could win over animals rather than people: especially your own animals! that ugly serpent there and the roaring bird!

Thus spoke the hermit, for he was afraid of Zarathustra's animals: and when the serpent stuck out its head just a little,

behold, then the hermit jumped up and ran away.

Thus they parted from one another, laugh(ing) like 2 b(oys.)

18 [39]

This is my word that wanted to choke me!!

This is my serpent that crept into my craw

522 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

18 [40]

What was most difficult for me, I learned to do in secret:
who had eyes for it, when I embarked alone into terrifying new oceans?

And when I turned my back on all beloved idols, who saw me go! Unseen I strode out into the burning deserts.

18 [41] The sealing”

18 [42]

And always, when I thought of my solitude, truly, it was always as if I spoke from far away "oh precious solitude!"

18 [43]?

"Humans are something that must be overcome": to my ears this sounds like a laughing dancing piece of wisdom.

But

they think I am calling them – to crawl to the cross!

Certainly: before we learn how to dance, we must learn how to walk.

18 [44]

To live for the sake of the future §

the breaking of the tablets

18 [45]" "

Redemption! I spit out the serpent's head!

Redemption! I taught the will even how to will backwards stillest hour Zarathustra you are ripe – lioness doves

Every time the midpoint when the wil/to the future emerges:

the greatest event awaits!

Prosperity and loving refreshment?'

Oh loving refreshment of my heart!

18 AUTUMN 1883 523

18 [46]?

Or did they fear my cursing? – for my curse is the brotherhood of hatred and of lightning bolts

They have made puny advantages puny – and now they are reading even the rubbish of good fortune like tea leaves!

Scarcely had fate soured them a bit – than they rose and swelled beyond all bounds.

These people in puny communities in the middle of nowhere, mist and conceit of all Bible-thumpers?

soft fleeting modest'!

18 [47]

That I have a decent handful of courage for living: this means,

I have a little key on me – which leads to nothingness.

That I have a decent handful of courage for nothingness – this means: I know that all nothingness – – –

The handful of force, my I – ridiculed by the universe of forces!

What I want? – to make courage into a small key for those who have failed

Courage for the few, to have their will prevail against the way-too-many

To compose and to create something higher than humans have been up to now completely without responsibility, to embark into being, to teach bliss, which says: I want this one more time for (the sake)

of this moment.

18 [48]? Ring of Rings

I whenever I dreamed of being the midpoint and noon of humankind.

II whenever I, like the alpenglow, brought back everything great from the past and made it shine.

524 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

III whenever I molded the future like wax.

IV whenever I broke the tablets and threw them down the mountain.

V whenever I went out – arrogance skepticism.

18 [49]

Humans are something that must be overcome: this is the doctrine of life as the great self-overcoming.?

18 [50]

I am a lawgiver, I write new things on my tablets: to the lawgivers themselves, I am law and tablet and herald's proclamation.

18 [51]

If I am the advocate of life – then I must also continue to be the non-advocate of its eternal change! –

A return of the greatest and the smallest things and of the entire ball and knot of reasons and conclusions.

18 [52]

My cleverness left me, this agile cat: my pride roared into the air! it seeks adventure for itself.

Now I sit here with my foolishness – the world quiet like a garden, the air tired from so many pleasant smells.

What welcome distress my foolishness causes me: it never wants to sit quietly and is always tumbling from the chair – will it ever grow tired of itself?

It does not grow tired even of its singing: but it learned the tune from children, evenings when purple bliss hangs in the sky.

I forgive my foolishness, for it knows not what it sings: and because I am so alone, I sing along with its nonsense – despairing at how often it falls from its chair in the process.

18 [53] On my walk I found his long jackass ears –

18 AUTUMN 1883 525

I also found my serpent, which had lost its head."

8 [54]

you had saved all your purple and emerald bliss
Heat lightning of my happiness

18 [55]

Dühring – a p(erson) who scares people away from his way of thinking because of who he is and who, like an eternally yapping and viciously biting junkyard dog," lay down in submission before his philosophy.

18 [56]?

the humans who were overcome were themselves the fathers of the superhumans.

Thus do I teach and do not grow weary of it: humans are something that must be overcome: for behold, I know that they can be overcome – I saw them, the superhumans.

18 [57]

"Do I have time to wait for my animals? If they are my animals, then they will know how to find me" Zarathustra's silence

"you seek words of lasting peace in my place, the hermit's place: the lasting peace of the deep world – alas, is this lasting peace a hermit's heights?

And if the word of this peace goes through my ear and bone and marrow, does it seek and, for this reason, still find friends?"

Oh Zarathustra – the hermit replied – this is merely the way you speak: I do not understand it: – and with this way
of speaking you will have a better chance of persuading animals than persuading people.?[®]

18 [58]

How much warmth do we know how to – withhold

526 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

18 [59]?

One! Midnight commences – its song rises up out of the deep world through ear and bone and marrow.

Two! Deep is all woe, but pleasure is deeper still and if lays its hand on your breast – this goes through bone and marrow.
(it)

18 [60]

So which suns would have set that once glowed for you on the heights and on the innocence of your pinnacle!

18 [61]

Whatever a grapevine and a storm have in common, something unspeakable – in this even you should be a grapevine and a storm.

18 [62]

almost starved by his expectations, on dark paths over which hope flashes for me like heat lightning

18 [63]

[19 = N VI 8 Autumn 1883]

19 [1]

Consolation 1) that there is so much that cannot be figured out

2) that there is so much to make amends for.

advocating love for someone evil, someone who suffers.

ocean-paths to break! old tablets

19 [2]?

§ Do you still remember oh Zarathustra how you were in the forest among p(eople) for the first time, how the birds were calling above you, how you felt the great abandonment

2) the great abandonment while among companions, when you grew tired of giving gifts

3) the great abandonment by the stillest hour

Concerning the distinction from solitude

19 [3]°

The fabulists and dusk-dwellers and everything else that flies,

crawls and limps on lame legs between evening and night.

528 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

19 [4]

Pebble-chewers is what I call those who are all too satisfied

all too friendly:

Hog bellies – this is what I call these pebble-chewers and they pray to everything as if to their God – this is the taste of gluttons, the taste of those who stuff themselves with everything –

19[5]

Oh my brothers, out of malice, for once I want to do things the way puny hinterworlders do them: behold, I am drawing the hinterworlders in the sand here! May someone come and pick them out of the sand!"

Some kind of faith is already bringing bliss to some hinterworlders: onward, grab them when they're like this!

Oh my brothers. There are those among you who understand how to laugh something into nothing – to laugh it out of the room! And truly, laughter is a good way of killing!

I tell these kinds of people to follow my example: I came to them as their prelude.

And to those who have no peace at all, unless they finally see the world from behind, I advise:

should the world not be the exuberance of a god?

19 [6]

for in laughter all evil drives become holy: however, in such a way that everything heavy becomes light –

19 [7]°

And every time the lion laughed, Zarathustra felt moved as never before, so that he felt around for his heart: for it always seemed to him as if a stone had been lifted from his heart and yet another stone and again another stone.

19 AUTUMN 1883 529

19 [8]? Return Home. The Other Dance Song. Oaths. The Convalescent. The Old and New Tablets.

Hermits.

19 [9]®

You stir, you stretch? – You rasp.’ There is nothing new anymore – you rasp – let me sleep!

This is it: there is nothing new anymore, this is what you are yourself, abysmal thought: now you are awake!

19 [10]

You must also want to triumph; therefore it is not enough to be a fighter and a mercenary of life:

Thus do I whisper in the ear of Frisians and Saxons: to triumph you must also want to triumph!

Once life recruited you to be its mercenary – this is true: but now I advise you to recruit life to be your servant.

19 [11]

Whatever we lack but have a need for, this is what we should take: therefore, I took a clear conscience and made it my own.

19 [12]’°

Tam in their midst like a diamond among lumps of kitchen coal: they do not believe me when I say: Oh my brothers! We are such close relatives!

19 [13]

Feeling good will toward the ocean and toward everything ocean-like, I feel the most good will just when they contradict

me –

530 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

19 [14]! On new Kings.

"Soon a storm will arise? – thus speaks my soul, the prophet,!? shaking: for the coming storms are already circulating within it.

(Cities and kingdoms and kings of the great contempt)

And the long dusk limps along in front of the storm, this sadness, tired and drunk with death, this sadness that speaks with a yawning mouth. "Everything is the same, everything is empty, everything has been" – thus it yawns and drags its feet and is so tired that it can neither sleep nor die.

19 [15]

Or who is it that you love?

Organ grinders!

to bless i.e., to give a beautiful soul to chance.

choice: before and after the shaping force against what is past serenity of those who wait courage of those who take risks

Pure i.e., without purpose.

19 [16] Forest animals On future songs to listen to your yearning

[20 = Z II 2. Autumn 1883]

20 [1]!

You go the way of greatness: now these are destined for you, abyss and – pinnacle in one.

Do not look around: let this be your greatest act of courage, that no trail remains behind you.

Here no one shall creep after you: wherever your foot has trod, here the path has been obliterated and above it is written "impossibility."

What previously was your greatest danger has now become your last refuge.

The time has passed when you were still allowed to be a wish: whatever you still are now, this should be hand and will and grip of willing.

Some people will, but most are only willed.'

And you should bestow everything good upon yourself as someone who could also do without it.

There are those who are actors without knowing it, and those who are actors without wanting it.?

That we could bear our immortality – this would be supreme.

Have I gotten to the point where I teach puny people their puny virtues? They already know how to find them for themselves and they resent it terribly that I am not made envious by what they find.⁴

532 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

20 [2]

On the ocean.

Speech to his friends. I wanted to spare them, not to send them around as apostles, I became too loving toward them – now I have annihilated them by doing just this.

All in vain up to now!

Life, at midpoint, irretrievably sacrificed.

The most terrible thought of an eternal return of wastefulness.

Wasted humankind (and all fighting and greatness an eternally pointless game) (serpent and shepherd)

Unchosen bliss (the convalescent and pleasure in the superficial)

Seeing while in the great outdoors.

While demanding compassion, seeks his animals.

Clairvoyance concerning his wanting to give gifts. Wanderer, lightning.

Compassion for tyrants and for creators of peoples.

“I am trying it once again” solution. – Skepticism turned against all pessimism. – Forgetting, new beginning, as with all prophetic people.

Beyond Good and Evil (conclusion) prepared to do anything.

20 [3]° Draft for Zarathustra 3.

1. On the ocean. “Let the wind blow.” Columbus-like. Premonitions, driving forces, in what direction?

Irretrievably sacrificed. The wanderer. Late autumn.

2. A place to rest. The happiness of the free spirit. Not bound even to his friends (you have set them free!) What does one person matter! The “wanderer.” Hesitate in your happiness!

Mood of “joyful science” and critique.

3. The burial rites and the speech to the friends. The most tender aspect of a solitary person.

4. Driven out, fleeing, despised. To summarize all the misery of the founders of religion, misery which comes from without.

20 AUTUMN 1883 533

6. Clairvoyant about his "giving of gifts" and about his "love." – To feel like a golden lock and chain for many selves, this is his selfishness – this reveals the one who rules. – Goal: to personally portray the unity of the greatest multiplicity, the beauty of what is most ugly, the necessity of what is most coincidental. The state as means.

7. The only thing left for him is to tyrannize himself – with an unlimited will to suffer. Mockery of previous pessimists.
8. To summon up the most painful truth (possibility). What if you experienced this eternally again!

10. Mockery of those who trust life. Oh, that there were someone I could curse!

11. Beyond "good" and "evil" – the tartuffery" of the weak. Spencer 2 p 110°

12. Mockery of the artists: who relax in the pictures they create. – True meaning of fame: I want to be a spur and to score the flanks of all who come until they bleed.

13. Mockery of the enjoyment of those who know. "level-headed and ordinary"

14. Final escalation: wasted humankind. Compassion for those who rule and for their distress, and mockery of them.

16. He rips his serpent to pieces, the shepherd dies, he fights with his eagle.

20. The will: let us try it once again! Skepticism turned against pessimism.

21. The appearances: rainbow, lioness with flock of doves, the children's choirs.

534 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

20 [4]

As long as action is called for, that is, commanded: synthesis

(the abolition? of the moral person) is not yet present. Not being able to do otherwise: drives and commanding reason above and beyond purpose: enjoying themselves in action. Teichmüller p. 55.'°

the will itself is to be overcome – all feeling of freedom no longer created out of the opposite of compulsion!

to become nature!

Error of Aristotle p 65"

for lust does not move us and the commanding reason does not move us.

the will does not move us, rather it is an accompanying phenomenon.

20 [5]

Against the Epicur(eans) – they freed themselves from an error and they are enjoying freedom as former prisoners do. Or they have overcome, or believe they have overcome, an opponent that they envied, without pity for those who did not feel themselves prisoners but rather felt themselves sheltered, still without pity for the suffering of those who were overcome.

20 [6]

To evaluate the most inferior people according to their effect on “great people.”

1) the freeloaders – those who nest in the weaknesses of strong and great people

2) people in pain, who, like mosquitoes, inflict a lot of small pain on great people and in this way diminish them – who also cloud up the clear sky with their yammering.

3) the well-meaning ones who do not know how to resist and who ruin the great people who are commanders: they make them into contemptuous people.

4) the comfortable ones: they make life trivial with their pleasure

20 AUTUMN 1883 535

20 [7]

“The courageous person is the person who endures, fears or dares what should be done and why it should be done and how it should be done and when it should be done”!? Arist(otle) Liberator from the delusion “God” and even more from the delusion “God and humans.”

Determining what it means to dwell on the earth the eternal meaning of the individual. ego.

20 [8]?

Not complaining à la Hamlet! NB.

Plan for Zarathustra 3. 1 Zarathustra on the ocean.

2-10 Zarathustra hears of the death of the blessed isles.

Speeches against his true enemies.

The disturbing effect of his praise on his friends:

the city overthrown, Zarathustra has to tear himself away: he despises their weakness in this.

terrifying outbreak of his contempt, and praise of tyrants and of the most evil ones

11-12 Z(arathustra's) solitude. In vain! It is too late!

Death of the youth with the serpent. – Symbol.

13 Sick, appalled, Zarathustra seeks his cave. His animals flee and do not recognize him, the cave is utterly destroyed.

14-20 The hermit's speech. Zarathustra sees that trusting in God is the ultimate source of all weakening. One more time! Decision.

21-22 Summoning up the most terrible most abysmal thought. Predetermined nature – hymn.

Unchosen bliss (like a jealous man who pushes his beloved woman away from himself and who is still gentle in his hard-heartedness)

536 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

20 [9] Zarathustra 3. Several speeches at the "grave" why did they have to depart from you?

In the end, compassion for all rulers and tyrants who took their contempt out on weak people (they exerted their own will to the extreme)

none of them (peoples, sages, good people) believe any more that they are entitled to a superior humankind – I expose their innermost doubts!

"I do not want the virtues of the strong to be confused with those of the weak."

Curse, so that the best people have to withdraw!

On the Reign of Cowards.

concerning the characteristics of friends'® (in the end, most stirring praise 1. strengthen the will no lasciviousness learn silence solitude profound mistrust and profound trust!"

seek out your enemies, yet find your friends.

Ane YP

20 [10]"® Zarathustra 4.

The king and the fool offer the notion that Zarathustra's coming is necessary.

Zarathustra draws ever smaller circles: great speeches in which he excludes. Ever smaller circles, on higher mountains.

First of all 1) the freeloaders are excluded, then 2) the hypocrites 3) the weak well-meaning people then 4) the unwitting hypocrites of morality.

Last scene: depiction of the supreme soul" that can reach down the deepest, of the most expansive soul that can err

 the
 20 AUTUMN 1883 537
 furthest within itself, of the most necessary soul that hurls itself into coincidences, of the soul that is, that falls in love with becoming; of the soul that has, which demands and wills; of the soul that flees from itself again and again and over-takes itself again: that is completely self-love and for that reason complete in everything: of the soul for whom everything is a game; wisdom that hurls itself into the ocean of foolishness:
 laughter and tears: the world, exuberance of a god: redemption from all unique stuffy "sages" etc. – Sin itself as enjoyment of self-abolishing."° Allbeings merely preliminary exercises in unification incorporation of opposites.
 Redemption from chance: what I have allowed to happen, I know I can make this up to myself afterward: and therefore wanting afterward what I did not want before.
 a goal all by itself
 After this, out of happiness for superhumans, Zarathustra relates the secret that everything returns.
 Effect. Pana wants to kill him.
 He finally grasps it, goes through all transformations, up
 to and including the most victorious, yet as he sees her lying there broken – he laughs. Climbs, laughing, up onto the cliff:
 but having arrived there he dies happy.
 Gripping effect of death: those who make vows.
 20 [11]?! Concerning the Single Victory.
 Just as I once saw him triumph and die: the friend who hurled divine moments and lightning bolts into my dark youth – playful and profound, storming forward toward joy while still in the storm of battle, bleeding more as he suffers,
 and where enemies were nearing the chosen flag, – the most cheerful one among the dying, the most decisive one among the victors, contemplating-anticipating as he stands

538 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

atop his destiny – exhilarated that he was victorious, laughing that in dying he was victorious –

commanding through dying: – and he commanded annihilation and no mercy –

Oh you my will, my In-Myself, Above-myself! you my necessity! Make it so that I triumph in this way – and spare me for this one victory!

Preserve me and spare me and protect me from all puny victories, you destiny of my soul and cusp of all need, you my necessity!??

20 [12]?

Don' I know, like you, all cheerfulness – even the cheerfulness in the anticipation of near-death: for the great burden that I bore, let me often rejoice in times of great danger puny community in the middle of nowhere and mist and conceit of all Bible-thumpers – they all need rooms and little chambers for their praying!

Like me, you are “by accident” this is the oldest nobility in the world.”⁴

and not to their promised land do I wish to follow the spirit that they call holy: I have always seen goats and geese among its leading crusaders intimate and welcoming, but like gates through which only lowly things pass.”

20 [13]

The solemn toy trumpeters,”” who with their melodies preach dreary doctrines and lies.

I wish I could already see the pillar of fire in which they are being burned: for such pillars of fire must precede the great noon.

How many caves does life have

20 AUTUMN 1883 539

Before Sunrise.

20 [14]

I have found in all things an arrogance I call divine. I have found this arrogance even in my soul.

 I have found this arrogance of wisdom in all things, that this wisdom tells all things to walk on the feet of fools.
 As little reason as possible: this wisdom does not take more than that in its knapsack when it walks overland and tills
 its field in the daytime.
 All things run on the feet of chance – to there and back and upward to wisdom, – this is its blissful safety, that it lures all things to itself
 only by using chance.
 20 [15]""
 Preferring most of all to be nourished by innocent things and impatient and ready to fly away from those few things:
 why shouldn't something about me be bird-like?
 The spirit of gravity, arch enemy even to the body as well:
 where did my enmity not follow it! Where has my winged mortal hatred not flown and not gone astray!
 20 [16]? Prophet Annihilator One who creates Unifier Explorer (ocean) Dancer – Laughing one
 One who flies – One who triumphs
 [21 = Mp XV 3b. Autumn 1883]
 21 [i]! (Concerning 3.)
 Summoning up the weightiest truth.
 Song of mockery of all previous pessimists.
 Song of mockery of religions and their attempts to flee.
 Song of mockery of socialists Jesuits and Epicureans.
 Song of mockery of artists up to now.
 Compassion and honor to all great lawgivers, field marshals and conquerors.
 What friends!
 Overcoming nature by means of great humans.
 Song of the one who flies.
 The sick person's song of comfort – Tired: growing still.
 Will to suffer.
 "Tam fatum"
 "beyond morality," above and beyond all praise.
 skepticism as temptation?
 suicide as temptation
 Hymn of the convalescent.
 To conquer for ourselves the country that we deserve, no matter in whose hands the country wants to be 21 [2]° Plan for Zarathustra 3.
 Solitude in shame and silence when facing the greatest thought.

Avoiding the animals

21 AUTUMN 1883 541

(Solitude) of a single will that conceals itself from everyone, but that raises everyone up

Solitude

without friends, indeed with the feeling of having sacrificed

them.

Solitude bereft of all reasons to feel comforted, song of mockery of all previous forms of pessimism (well beyond all previous modes of thought).

Solitude and temptations. Song of mockery of previous attempts by religion to flee

Solitude of supreme responsibility. Song of mockery of socialists and Jesuits and Epicureans.

Solitude beyond morality, in eternal perspectives. Overcoming of great nature through humans. Song of the one who flies.

Solitude of the sick person. Song of comfort. Becoming tired and quiet. Sanctified through suffering. The will to suffer and to intensify the suffering.

"I will this!" Hymn of the convalescent and of the victorious

one. The laughing lion and the swarm of doves. (A temptation – nothing more! he himself and his thought) The 4 animals arrive (pride with cleverness – power with gentleness) – they approach each other 21 [3] Plan for Zarathustra 4. 1. The invitation.

2. The victory parade. The plague city. The stake (the old culture was burned).

3. The spring festival with choruses.

4. Being called to account before Zarathustra: "what have you done?" (what have you invented?)

Kind of community (as in Corsica).

. Places of residence. . Wars and wrestling matches. . the new nobility.

. the temptations (with evil people, "punishments" etc.)

ON AM

542

II.

I.

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

to redeem the woman in women'

slaves (beehives) learn to bear serenity. More machines.

Reshaping the machine into the beautiful time for solitude. Division of the day.

long youth and the transformations.

After that, Zarathustra's great speeches, similar to prayers.

13.

21.

a few unusual saints arrive, who are also disciples: also a fool (Epicurus?)

The sanctification of laughter. Future of dance. Victory over the spirit of gravity.

. The innocence of becoming.

. The consecration of the smallest.

. The breaking of the tablets. Praise of cool reason!

. The redemption of evil people and the redemption from moral judges!

. Summoning the enemy.

. The new kings – as model teachers.

. The eternal "I" and its sanctification. Determinism and its solution. There is no morality and no absolute responsibility, we determine them for ourselves

beatification of drives

Decisive moment: Zarathustra asks all the masses at the festival: "do you want all of this once again?" – everyone says "Yes!"

He dies of happiness as this happens.

(the sky clear, low) (ominous, clear, eerie)

(deepest silence, the animals around Zarathustra, he has covered his head, arms spread on the stone slab – appears to be sleeping) the howling dog something luminous terrible quiet moves above and away from all of their thoughts

The speeches by those who make vows, around his corpse, constitute the conclusion.

Those who make vows.

21 AUTUMN 1883 543

22. etc. The great noon as turning point – the two paths.

The hammer for overpowering humans: supreme development of the individual, so that it must perish on account of itself (and not, as has been the case so far, on account of dietary mistakes!) (how death came into the world!)

What happiness!

The one who creates as the self-annihilator. Someone who is a creator out of goodness and wisdom. All previous morality surpassed!

In the end the vows – terrible oaths!

ar [4]

Chorus of the godless (overcoming the churches)

Chorus of the honest (overcoming moral tartuffery)

Chorus of the penitents of the mind (overcoming idealistic vanity)

The order? of the hard-hearted (overcoming compassion)

The rogue-fools.

1. New order of rank of humans and new distribution of rights.

Visitors at Zarathustra's place he is asked for help

1) universal slave-revolt 2) softening of hearts, weakness

3) darkening and insanity

the happiness of the community (but solitary people enjoy it!)

the happiness of truthful people (as opposed to all the effort of playing hide and seek). The omens.

the burning of the large city.

21 [5]

Finite as space: infinite as time.

with indestructibility, eternity is given and beginninglessness by being determined, a limit to the multiplicity of new forms.

544 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

21 [6]°

Humans are that which must be overcome. Here I hold the hammer that will overcome them!"

This viewpoint brings bliss to Zarathustra at the conclusion of Part III he becomes ripe in the process.

the previous evasions and attempts to flee in the face of the greatest thought:

Nirvana, the thought of nothingness brings bliss.

the wonderful re-creation in the beyond and then eternal life

(in Christianity)

bestialization, as bien public? – consequence of Eudaimonists socialists Jesuits.

absolute skepticism about our minds and practical letting

ourselves go. "What do I know about actions!"

Determinism: I myself am fate and I have conditioned existence for all eternity.

Many drives fight within me for supremacy.

in this I am a replica of everything that lives and I can explain it to myself.

Suddenly the terrible chamber of truth opens. There is an unconscious reaction of self-defense, caution, concealment, protection from the weightiest knowledge: this is how I have lived up to now. I kept something secret from myself; but the restless pronouncements and rolling away of stones turned my drive into something overpowering. Now I roll the last stone:

the most terrible truth stands before me.

I. Summoning truth up from the grave.

We created it, we awakened it: highest expression of courage and of the feeling of power.

Mockery of all previous pessimism!

We wrestle with it – we discover that our only way to bear it is to create a being that bears it: unless we would freely

21 AUTUMN 1883 545

choose to blind ourselves again and make ourselves blind to it. But we are no longer capable of this!

to bite off the head of the serpent!

We created the weightiest thought – now let us create the being for whom the thought is light and blissful!

In order to create, we must give ourselves greater freedom than has ever been given to us; in addition, liberation from morality and relief by means of festivals (intimations of the future! to celebrate the future, not the past! To compose the myth of the future! To live in hope!) Blissful moments! And then to draw the curtain again and to turn our thoughts to concrete immediate goals!

[22 = Z II 3a. End 1883]

22 [1]!

Alone with myself and with my rejoicing conscience

You had your friends together on a tiny island and your enemies among them: how sweet it is to love and to hate!

Doesn't the father still have to resist the son even in what he does best? And anyone who has ever claimed a right for himself will not give this right even to his own son, out of love."

We are punished most severely for our virtues. And thus learn to guess where your virtue lies: there, where you have been most severely punished.?

Lonely days want to walk on courageous feet.'

I have become clairvoyant: a diamond sword cuts every darkness to pieces for me.'

The reflection of their happiness flew over me like a shadow:

and when they felt strong and sure-footed, mistrust crept toward me and its sibling, weakness.

We should redeem the woman in women!® And let women lust for men but not for what is manly!

22 END 1883 547

Still no one has time for me. But what is the deal with a time that has no time for Zarathustra!"

I am told that humans love themselves? Is this true? I have still found humans to be the predator of all predators, even against themselves.°

"What Zarathustra has decided, this will happen: how should his great soul be capable of changing its resolve!?" Take pity on your foot so that it doesn't step into a morass:

and that's why you should not even bother kicking those who have betrayed their friends.!°

I recognize people who are super rich by this: they thank those who take from them."

For me there are no true orators and super-orators unless they can convince the arguments themselves to run after them.!?

You are riding quickly enough to your goal; but your lame foot is mounted alongside you and will arrive with you at the same time.!?

This is my fear on your behalf: that you will stumble just when you are at your pinnacle!

There are those who are actors without knowing it and those who are actors without wanting it.'

Some will, but most are only willed.

The time has passed when you still were allowed to have wishes.!®

548 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Puny virtues are necessary for puny people: but who can convince me to believe that puny people are necessary!"

You aren't envious of their virtues – they will never forgive you for that!

You go the way of greatness: now these are destined for you, abyss and pinnacle in one.

Stop looking around: let this be your greatest act of courage, that behind you no path remains.

Here no one should creep after you: wherever your foot has trod, there the path is obliterated and above it is written: impossibility.

What previously was called your final danger has now become your last refuge.!!®

This is his folly: he cannot endure all those who give warning or the voices of birds – he flees into his abyss because he has been warned about it.

"Chance" is what the weak call it. But I say to you: what could befall me that my gravity would not compel and draw to itself?

Look, will you, how I first stew each coincidence! in my juices: and when it is done, it means, for me, "my will and destiny."

Whatever it is about my chance that seems foreign to my body and will, how could I offer hospitality to that! Look, will you, only friends approach friends.

Warning birds flew up out of my happiness itself.

Experience came imperiously: but my will spoke to it – already it was on its knees, pleading."°

Do you want to be a stumbling block for those who stride ahead? Do you want to limp along in front of whoever is in a hurry???

22 END 1883 549

Those who look backward and go forward deserve to be run into: lest they punish their eyes with their lying feet.*

"It is showing itself" you complacent ones say: but complacency always withdraws and will keep withdrawing more and more.

23 more.

Even what we have left undone weaves the fabric of the entire future: even our nothingness is a master weaver and a woman spinning webs."4

Many have grown weary of themselves: and only then does the happiness that was reserved for them catch up with them – but they have always been running on too rapid feet!"

My drink should still make you sneeze: my sparkling wines should tickle your noses and fill you with lust.?°

Ask my foot whether I find your manner pleasing: dancers have their ears in their toes, do they not.?7

I have reached the end of my humanity: I, the gentlest person, have become the most hard-hearted –

Did I ever fall asleep on my fame? Every kind of fame has been like a bed of thorns to me.”8

Am I not the meteorological divide? Don’t all winds come to me and proclaim their will to me?”

And the ice and innocence of my peaks are also still aglow.*°

I still am like a cock in a strange barnyard, pecked at even
by hens.?!

There is more injustice in your admiration than in your contempt”

550 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Do as I do: only doers learn; and only as a doer do I want
to be your teacher.??

That a bolt of lightning would strike your feed! That your maws would finally learn to feed on fire!*4

You crash up against me like waves: – but I strike your heads with my oar. Behold, you bear my boat into immortality!’

Here stands my will: the surge of my pride still founders on ir.

I want to make wildfires of you and heralds with tongues of fire: but until now you were only arid grass and steppe.?”

Gold flashes in his dark eyes: a golden bark floats there,
on

black waters.38

Actors have no time to wait for justice: and often I have looked at impatient people to see whether they were not actors.

They all want to exist – and they call this justice. And “to make things equal” – – to spare too much – some people are like this: to yield too much – other people are like that.

We should only steal when we cannot rob: thus speaks the voice of honor among rogues

Already I feel that I’m dreaming: so perhaps I am almost awake?

How can you want to learn to dance when you have not yet learned to walk? Yet those who fly, and the bliss of above
and

below, are even above those who dance.

22 END 1883 551

And anyone who woos the virtues of the strong does not have to glance lustfully at the virtues of the weak, but rather should pass by these pretty maids without taking notice.>*"°

Alas, it's too bad that you believe you have to despise what you have merely renounced!

One day I noticed that I had lost my patience: so I went out looking for it – and I looked high and low. But you probably think, my friends, that I found it again? Quite the contrary:

yet I discovered so much in the course of my journey that I have to tell you about it – and I swear to you, just as we are setting forth for the first time, that you will lose your patience during the telling. – And don't think that I would have it any other way: for the best of everything that I have learned and discovered since then is just this: "it is time for many people to lose their patience."

And above all, for you, my friends!

Beware of willing anything halfway: and be as decisive in indolence as you are in action."!

And whoever wants to throw lightning bolts must float in the sky as a cloud for a long time.*?

You must learn the long silence; and no one should see into your depths.*?

And those who excel at silence are not the ones who veil their faces and cloud their waters, making them impossible to see through.

Instead, it is the bright, the brave, the transparent ones who excel at silence, whose depths are so deep that they cannot be revealed even through the clearest water.

For it is through these that silence reveals itself not to be silent.

552 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

It is still too early for me: up to now I have only been my own precursor and herald's proclamation.

You should not wade through foreign slime: rather, here your talent lies in running fleetingly across it like a look
of divine contempt.

All things that are pursued relentlessly have been successful

up to now."4

My tombs opened: my pain which had been buried alive
rose again.— it had concealed itself under shrouds in order
to get a really good night's sleep, — have pity on me, in order
to get in a really good night's watch!"

My happiness is chasing after me, said Zarathustra — that's because I do not chase after women: and happiness is a woman.*°

And humans abased themselves to such a degree before God, and they carried their self-defiance so far, that now
they seek deadly revenge: and so, he who saw everything had to die!

Revenge on witnesses — —"

This is shame's scam: it wants to believe it is only giving
way to violence; and what it would like most of all is just to*® yield

and to wallow in the despair of weakness.

Anyone who has nothing to do is troubled by nothingness."

Whatever I do not want you to do for me, why should Z not be allowed to do it for you? And, truly, that which I must do

for you, precisely this you cannot do for me}?

They all have no character: what could they do! they had to steal one for themselves."!

22 END 1883 553

Do what you want anyway: but first be those who can will something!

Love your neighbors as yourselves anyway: but first be those who love themselves"

A small light, but even so a great comfort for the voyager whom the night wants to betray to the wild ocean."?

To forget: this is a divine skill. And those who want to rise

into the heights, and to fly, must throw much that is heavy into the depths and make themselves light — that's what I call

a divine lightness-skill.>4

At a distance, we think poorly of someone else. But two people together – how could they not wish each other well! Solitude ripens: it does not sow seeds.

Watch out if you wanted to buy some people but you offered too little, and now you have made their virtue stronger because it has already said no once.

Modestly embracing a little happiness and, in that very moment, already modestly making eyes at a new little happiness –

My freedom, and its curiosity for novelty, took flight, even into prisons.?°

I see so much goodness, so much weakness: and you treat each other properly and deftly, like grains of sand.

An end is what desecrates every thing and every deed: for what is holiness, if it does not lie in the heart and conscience of the thing and deed!

554 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

I do not want you to do anything “in order” and “because” and “so that,” – but rather everything for its own sake and for the pleasure it gives you.”

And if up to now someone has had complete contempt for people – has that person in doing so not always been the people’s greatest benefactor?°®

“What does this dark cloud of a person want? Does he want to bring us the plague!”

“Take the children away: eyes like that scorch young souls.”*?

You speak falsely of events and coincidences! Nothing will ever happen to you except you yourselves! And what you call coincidence – you yourselves are your own incidents and accidents!

At noon, my happiness loomed hot above me, my sun drank thirstily from the ocean – now a night of clouds comes along and sudden winds.

I know well where winds come from and where they roar

61 off to

to implant his will so that it becomes a tall tree and still brings shade to future generations – a long-term will!®?

What is this that you call your conscience, anyway? Not a law, but rather the fact that you need a law and an arm to hold you steady, you drunken stumbling people!

“soft, fleeting, modest”®

should I stand there and whine about that whore, happiness? Or about "Stepmother Nature"?

22 END 1883 555

You are building a fence around yourself with praise and blame.

And when you cannot endure life, you must attempt to win its favor – for such has always been the artful strategy of the greatest sages.

Their most artful, boldest strategy was to believe in God whenever they felt that the devil was too near.

They learned to switch names for things: and so things became switched around in their minds. Behold, this is the artfulness of the greatest sages in its entirety!

Most people are too crazy to be self-interested: their happiness makes all of them crazy.

They sacrifice everything for one thing – this is a kind of love. This willfulness and self-absorption loom over all people.

Their intense insanity bubbles forth for them, out of their love: but it is a poor calculator and despises the cold virtues of the huckster.

For huckster-virtue, the huckster's money-grubbing fingers and lusting eye – this is even beneath the dignity of an animal.

Everything that can be bought is worth little: I spit this doctrine into the faces of hucksters.

Money passes through all fingers: therefore learn to handle money and moneychangers with kid gloves.

Praise be to puny poverty: for all hucksters scheme after great wealth.

Wherever coins ring, whores rule.

Those who have always spared themselves a lot will finally get sick from sparing themselves too much.

556 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

He speaks roughly but not from a rough throat: every gust of wind makes him speak more hoarsely, this sensitive little thing!"

And we often teach despairing people to be strong only by speaking to them about their weakness.

Some are gluttons, others nibblers – both contemptible.

Begetters and breeders.

Oh these narrow huckster-souls! Whenever money jumps into the money box, the hucksters' souls jump in along with

it.

Whose souls have been a money belt and whose happiness has been dirty pieces of paper – how could their blood ever become clean?

It will flow lifeless and foul smelling unto the tenth generation-tion:© the descendants of the hucksters are indecent.

On scribblers and screamers.'° On substitute teachers."

Get away from me, my tempter, Zarathustra said to the old man and kissed his trembling hand; he smiled at his own words, for a memory had come to him."

It is the age of puny people."

To have a better sense of justice in my little finger" than those people have in their heads.

Chorus of fools i.e., of sages who briefly feel themselves to be ignorant und foolish"

Chorus of the impoverished i.e., of narrow-minded superfluous people whose yoke is light. – Emerson p. 283.

22 END 1883 557

To be burned at the stake, not for our" faith, but rather for doubting our faith –

I no longer want to conceal what I feel: why are you talking to me about truth!"

His mind is trapped in the cage of his tiny heart."®

Do I love human beings after all? But they are a part of my plan – yet this is the extent of my love."?

Mistrustful and full of ulcers, capable of sudden willfulness, determined guard and lurker

Whatever I did not want before, this is what I must want afterward – no other choice has been given to me.®"

Opposed to the stuffy sages, redeeming from them – the soul, to which everything becomes a game.*!

They want no one to hurt them: that is why they beat all people to the punch and please them – these cowards!??

"Do what you want, but take care not to be conspicuous about it! Do what you can, but take care not to offend with it!"

Recipe for the mundane.

There are no leaps in virtue.®4 seek out your enemies, find your friends®°

Prescription: to will for a long time, no lasciviousness, learn silence, learn solitude, learn profound mistrust?®

the stone is getting brittle®"

558 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

to give the will a backbone – by means of an organization®
A curse on the fact that the best people are secluding themselves without having children.®?

To the murderer of God, the seducer of the best people, the friend of evil people"

Anyone who up to now has had the most contempt for people, has this person in doing so not been the people's greatest benefactor?!

– Corpse robbers who know how to steal something even from the pockets of the dead and half-dead Better more Handel than handlers!

Say it mornings and evenings: "I despise hucksters, I want to break their sticky fingers."

What makes superior humans suffer is not that which is inferior to them, but rather knowing that: "there is still some-thing superior to me." Propelled into the heights, like a ball

– this is what they call "climbing."

You have strangled their ambition! To be the last among you would give them more pleasure than to be the first!"
"Pleasure is a woman: she runs after anyone who spurns her."

You are figuring out how all people could be happy and in the process you have forgotten future generations – the happiness of most people!"

Just ask women! Having a good time is not the point of giving birth.?⁷

22 END 1883 559

"It wants to command me? Come on, let's wrestle with each other: perhaps my will is stronger!" – concerning the emergence of evil people.

Now no one I love remains alive: how can I still love life! Angels dissolve into tears when they see him smile Tired and happy, like everyone who creates, on the seventh day.

My heart was courteous even in the face of frustrating coincidences: to raise my quills against destiny seemed to me like wisdom for hedgehogs.

Already the hours run on tiptoes across our hearts.

And whenever I had no ladder, I always climbed on top of my own head.

There was no stillness before this: no one thinks of me and everyone speaks of me.

I sought myself and a place where I might be at home – this hit home with me the hardest.”®

I sought my heaviest yoke: that’s where I found my selfishness.

He is unshakeable, and when he complains, then it is more a concession to you and a cloak that he spreads over his hard-heartedness.??

I do not praise the land where butter and honey – flow.!°°
“The worst lies behind us”)?!)

“I thought you were a sage – but what astounds me about you more than anything else is your cleverness.!”?

560 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

loutish virtues!”

“I want to live the way I wish or I have no wish to live” – this is how the most saintly people still think.1%

Where I always felt fear, I will finally make a wish – oh abysmal thought, now I am still learning to love the abyss!!
Selfishness and imperiousness have brought lies to an absolute pinnacle.

You are look(ing) at the rock of the highest mountains, aren’t you? Did it not form under the oceans?

Beware, you who are the wealthiest: puny acts of charity spark more outrage about you than extreme miserliness. You drip like wide-bottomed bottles with all-too-narrow necks – bottles like these have already had their necks broken many times.!06

These neighbors and their puny distress, this city and its meager air – this chips away at your strength every day. How could you want to learn how to cause great pain in this place!7

Clumsy as a corpse!®®

“Let us be modest in virtue as well! Only modest virtue can get along with comfort” –

Scribblers and screamers, those panting with ambition, pushy and shameless people –!”

For does a drive want to be “satisfied,” as you teach? Does it want to be free of itself and have peace? Has a will ever willed not to will?

22 END 1883 561

What drives all drives is that they create: and if they sleep for a while, then they are only sleeping in, in order later to become – fully awake.

We have to sleep in, so as to become fully awake.

But you have distorted the essence of willing into unwilling and willing against itself; you have always misinterpreted the voice of the tired will and the snuffling and snoring of the sleeping one.!!°

For is sleep an invention in response to death? And would whoever wants to sleep be someone who is weary of dying?

Even the liveliest person can snuffle and snore.!!!

Equal rights for all – this is the most extraordinary injustice: for then the most superior humans lose out.!!?

Equality was always praised most highly: it wins the praise of most people – of those people who were not allowed to have equal rights!

He broods on his misfortune like a hen on an egg.

Oh you who know, you, too, are intrusive! And this is to be your reward, that you always see the foreground of all things!!"?

His mind is failing – now the good and the bad in him grow more visible: he grows darker – alas, if it were only new stars that now grow more visible!

22 [2]!14 Plan for Zarathustra 3.

At the ocean (late at night)

On unchosen bliss. On the virtue that diminishes.

On the stake.

562 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Zarathustra's self-knowledge (as a betrayal of friends) Now the disaster begins. Story. Zarathustra's defense: 1) on lawgivers and princes 2) on hucksters 3) on substitute teachers 4) on pious people the great curse Story.

The fool's comfort – on science – everything the same, equal, etc.

Zarathustra seeks the last thing that loves him: in vain.

Conversation with lightning. Eternally "In vain!"

The boy and the serpent Zarathustra sick. The saint Z(arathustra's) answer for the saint. The decision.

Praise of predetermined nature as farum.!!

The way of the convalescent.

5

116 22 [3]

It is treasonous to strive for greatness: whoever has it, strives for goodness.!!”

The deepest love does not know what to call itself and is probably asking itself, “Am I not hatred?” – If we once – – –18

Do we not do the same thing awake as we do in our dreams?

We always first invent and poetically imagine the people we associate with – and in the next instant we have already forgotten this.!!?

When will man and woman stop misunderstanding each other? Their passions walk with different strides, – they measure time according to different measures.!”°

22 END 1883 563

In order to see far away, we need to learn to see beyond ourselves.!!?

And those who believe in their life after death surely have also learned to be dead in life.!!?

People of faith!?? do not hate freethinkers the most, but rather new thinkers that have a new faith.

Ponderous, melancholic people become more lighthearted through hate and love: here they rise to their surface.!*4

The matter is clarified: now it does not concern us anymore.

Beware of becoming too enlightened about yourself!

Compassion for the entire race – this leads to hard-heartedness against every individual.!”

Terrible experiences seek out terrible people.

I, too, am the ore with an iron destiny: this is how I felt whenever you mentioned destiny.

He has his own god for himself: but ever since I saw that god, I have seen in him only the ape!” of his god.

There is a degree of inherent mendacity that we call “good conscience.”

They chase after anyone who convinces them that they have lost their way. It flatters them to hear that they had a way at

all.!?7

The great thoughts that come from the heart and the petty ones that come from the head – both are badly conceived.!”8

564 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

You want to be judged by your intentions and not by your effect? But where do you get your intentions anyway? From your effect!!”?

Those who haven’t known how to find the way to their goal live more brazenly and more frivolously than those who have no goal: they want to laugh it off and get over their loss.!

°°
The danger for sages is to become infatuated with foolishness.

They sacrifice themselves, not out of compassion, but rather out of abundance: they reward others, they reward them with themselves'?

The devil, a friend of knowledge, stays away from God: only from far away is it possible to develop an eye for gods.!*
Love brings what is superior and unusual in someone to light: this is how it beautifies – through deception about someone (most of all self-deception!) But pay attention to what happens when people are aware of being loved but do not love back: there the soul itself reveals its sediments.!*4
Not only the herd, but also the shepherd, has need of a bellwether.!

Why so apart? – I find no one else I could obey and no one I would even like to command.!?®

An elephant that tries to stand on its head.!?7

You think everything has been accomplished when you have rendered lightning harmless? But / want it to work for me. – This is how I think of all the evil in you and in me.!

®

22 END 1883 565

The innocence in a lie is the sign of sincere belief in something.'?

We always love only our desire and not what we desire.'*P
Time feels different in the dark than in the light.

And wherever I see the sticky fingers of hucksters, I prefer to draw the short straw.!"!

There before you lies the black sad sea – you must cross that, too! Zarathustra 3.14?

Crumpled houses, absurdly resembling a child's toy: if only a soul would shove them back in the box again! – crumpled souls

Intimate and inclusive, but lowly, like doors which let in only lower things.!??

Spoiled by many puny triumphs – he has always had it easy: he never became familiar with the best kind of seriousness.!

44

Human beings must become more evil – this is the greatest sorrow of the one who knows! And anyone who wants to create superior humans must make them even more evil – this is the suffering of those who create and are benevolent!

Oh Zarathustra advocate of life! You must also be the advocate of suffering! I cannot exempt you from hell – the underworld must rise up against you, the shades must still bear witness: "Life is torture."

A lustful eye – nourishment for a bilious soul!

When a big city expands into the country, it does not bring fertilizer to the land but rather corruption and horror.

566 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Where have I witnessed the schooling and upbringing of people who are one day supposed to command? With doctrines of obedience, they had to flatter and feign their way into the company of those who obey.

Your virtues do not suit your bodies: your bodily ailments accuse the virtues that you gloat about.

Sickened as much by street talking as by street walkers: and precisely these are your most secret sicknesses.

There is great hypocrisy among you: those who command pretend to have the virtues of those who obey.

I try to persuade where I should be in command: this is what my bad education wants. This kind of persuasion is no better than flattery – here superior people are flattering their inferiors.

When everything goes as we will, it also goes as we wish.!?° Everything from the past is a text with a hundred meanings and interpretations and truly! a path into many futures! yet those who give the future a single meaning also determine the single meaning of the past.

"It is not yet time for me to play the fool" says Zarathustra, when the fool says: "Throw everything away, dance and act as a human being would toward yourself and us."

For some, solitude is a sick person fleeing, for others, solitude is fleeing from a sick person.

These people drive the masses insane and make them puff themselves up so that their barrels overflow – they serve tyrants: and those people make tyrants puff themselves up and jump around until they burst – thus do they serve the masses.

22 END 1883 567

This man laughs like a lightning bolt – but afterward he rumbles for a long time, like thunder Contented sows or dying gladiators – don't you have any other options?

 Gravediggers dig themselves into illness; deadly vapors rest beneath old excavated earth. It is not good to stir up a morass.
 They imitate themselves – this is their second childhood.
 The compassion of the greatest people is firm," like the hand-shake of a giant.
 Doesn't the sun lament: "I wanted to be a light to them, but I put out their eyes – I blinded them!
 "How do I get through the city gate? I have unlearned what it is like to live among dwarves."
 The greatest thing about great people is what is maternal in them. – The father – this is always only a matter of chance.
 My fury still obeys me.
 Beneath my peak and my snows I find all the regions of the living.
 and little children do not always come to him who suffers
 them to come.
 You cough and think that this is an objection to strong winds.
 "We want food" you roar: your bellies add "Lots!" to this, your lusting eye adds: "Good!"
 568 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 What is the basest of all base things? A conclusion, the oldest and most recent conclusion: "It hurts, therefore it is bad."
 Since I have understood this "therefore" and this origin of bad things, I have laughed at all your "good and bad"! My laughter resounds beyond your "good and bad."
 Beauty hides the man.!
 To become smooth and hard-hearted we must go into the crowd, but also we must take along our secret solitude.
 Strewn from star to star like the seed of life?
 Terrible dithyramb of life in Zarathustra 4.
 Suffer chance to come to me! It is innocent like a little child.
 To outwit chance and lead it around by the hand.
 Only those who know where they are going also know what wind is at their back.
 Two new virtues – wise forgetfulness and the art of setting sails according to the wind.!"
 Women are becoming more manly: there are too few men.!*°

In kindness there is a lot of contempt for people, but no trace of hate and love for people.!!*

When the devil sheds his skin, his name also falls away. The bite of conscience!" a bite from God and if this God is a God of love – a love bite?

22 END 1883 569

I see their star and I am delighted: but now they actually think of it as my star.

Don't listen to what they say – but look at the set of their jaws! They may lie with their tongues, but they are still speaking the truth with their mouths!!°?

And what was the point of all nature being created if not that I might have signs I can use to speak with souls!

Now everything is just great! For now hucksters are wearing swords and walrus mustaches, and the regiment itself has gone over to the bowlegged.!54

This is the black sad sea, like my destiny it lies before me

–

Alas this pregnant listlessness at night! An open eye, but still drunk with sleep and still alien, it looks in my direction.

The sea breathes its warm breath on me, like my destiny, and tosses and turns on the pillow of its crags, it groans as though its expectations were evil –

I am sad for you, you dark monster, and for your sake I bear a grudge against myself. Alas, that I do not possess enough strength to deliver you from evil dreams!

What are you doing, Zarathustra? Do you want to comfort the sea with your song? Have you already become a compassionate spectator and harbinger of your own future?

What are you doing, love-sick fool, you superblissful trusting man? But, full of trust, you have always walked right up to all terrible things, even wanting to caress every monster.

A breath of warm air, a bit of soft fur around the claws: – and already seductive tones were pouring from your flute, with great yearning you always approached everything that was alive.

Now you must get to know this monster for my sake!

5709 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Better to trust your destiny, even if it roars from 1000 maws like a sea, better still if it bares its teeth at you in a storm than such pregnant sullenness each night.!°

 There is nothing more evil than a sleeping ocean and a pregnant destiny: how will you get over these black depths
 if you don't want to be more evil and more black than they are?
 Whatever you might still encounter will come to you as your destiny: the time has passed when you could also still encounter a coincidence!
 If you can't pray, then why can't you at least curse?
 I fear you because you laugh while we fight for our lives:
 you look like someone who is certain that he will live.
 Live or die – said Zarathustra.
 And if we get out of this, I want to say: "God is not, and Zarathustra taught me this."
 I forgive you your mistrust, yet I would not give a plug nickel'5° for your trust.
 You still believe in wonders and wonderworkers, true need would also teach you how to pray. The ancient counterfeiter of the mind have also minted a counterfeit of your intellect!" –
 Disgust grips me, I am still only 3 days away from – – – Cheerfulness as the secret foretaste of death – it lifts the great burden of our task from our shoulders.!°8 Zarathustra: Where is Zarathustra from? Who are father and mother to him? "Destiny and laughter are Zarathustra's father and mother; cruel destiny and loving laughter have together spawned a scion like that."!°?
 22 END 1883 571
 The sky is on fire, the sea spits at je!60 a puny community in the middle of nowhere and mist and conceit of all Bible-chumpers!® 22 [4]'°?
 Scene on the ship.
 Impression that human beings are becoming diminished.
 His fear increases.
 Death and downfall of the isles.
 Zarathustra seeks himself in the tumult:!!° with the contrarians (evil people) the violent ones the sculptors the discoverers the fools
 22 [s]!6%
 For did I come to warn against pickpockets and to vilify vice?!
 You are being pursued.
 Keep it up: this is a good way to pursue me: up to now success has only come to those who are most relentlessly pursued.!66

They are getting fed up with their hating and raging and they have visions of light on lonely roads that say to them:
"Why not try loving!" –

There is a raging love that is so sweet!"

A shipwreck spat him toward land, on the crest of a wave he came riding into his promised land!"

By all that is bright and strong and good – this God – – –'®
572 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Next to every warehouse I saw an alehouse: their souls are chilled, they would like to find warmth in spiced wine or even

in spicy women.!®

Know this, for someone who creates, wisdom and goodness is!70 not a characteristic, but rather a means and condition a contrarian, to himself a bad – spouse

"By accident" – not a good nobleman, even if he is of the oldest line.!7!

Trumpeters and other butterflies

"Your fate has soured you somewhat – now you rise and swell up beyond all bounds" – says the fool to Zarathustra.
You call them stilts – but they are pride's strong feet –
long feet!

Servile and supine, obsequious and obnoxious, queasy and querulous

"how could I not be like oil and water when I am with you – always on top! – we would have to be vigorously shaken up together before it would be otherwise" says Zarathustra
to

the captain, who is surprised at his cheerfulness.!"" whatever lives around you soon becomes part of what lives in you: it becomes customary. And where you customarily sit becomes the seat of customs.

ill people and obsessed people

"Thus do I praise myself for my part, and that should be enough for me. Now it was your turn to praise me."!7?

22 END 1883 573

There are people with skills and people with jobs – but there are also those who stand on their own, who must stand up for themselves – or else they fall.!4

– they fall on top of you, like monuments of demigods!

I am Zarathustra the Godless: who speaks here: who is more godless than I am? then I want to become his disciple.'

people like that have always had to crown themselves – they always found the priests too cowardly

Telling stories around the evening campfire!"

against noise – it strikes thoughts dead!”’
 with a voice like a stonemason’s chisel
 they creep around everywhere it is diseased and disgusting, like lice – why shouldn’t we crack them!
 the greatest danger lies behind us – there in that direction, where the blessed isles are. We set forth at just the right time.
 “Or too late” said Zarathustra.
 to curse all the cowardly devils within you who love to whimper and fold their hands and who would like to pray to something.
 goats geese and other crusaders, led by the holy spirit!”
 “they will slit you open, Zarathustra: you look like someone who has swallowed gold” Pity those who would want to entertain others, if this were no longer their livelihood?
 574 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS
 They must fight against the wild animal, hunger – otherwise their entertainment would be that of a wild animal – aimed at us.!”?
 Their boredom would be a brood hen here
 Common and limited enough for even the smallest of advantages, they read the rubbish of good fortune like tea
 leaves
 Yes, they are rich – but their eyes are still thieves’ eyes.
 Rag
 dealers. Vultures. !8°
 My curse – the brotherhood of hatred and lightning bolts.
 I went in search of origins: there I cut myself off from all reverence – all around me it became strange and lonely.
 But whatever is reverent in me – blossomed secretly; there a tree sprang forth for me, I sit in its shadow, the tree of
 the future. !8!
 “I am one who reveres the future” relentlessly pursued, never caught!®? putrid tepid rancid blood!®?
 You made wolves into dogs and humans themselves into 8 human pets!#*
 22 [6]
 I respect virtue when it is the caution of those who are pregnant: but your virtues are the virtues of those who will never give birth. !85

All great things walk crooked paths: but these great things must be seen from a wider perspective: this was their courage, to take a crooked path toward a single goal.

22 END 1883 575

Great people and great rivers take crooked paths toward their goal: crooked, but toward their goal. This is what is most courageous about them, that they still fear what is crooked.

22 [7]

stalwart in war, stalwart in birth: that's what I want in men and women:

The best taste is not the one that knows how to taste everything: I love contrary choosy palates and tongues, the ones that

I»

say "I

No one wants her as a gift: so she already needs to sell herself!!8°

To rule – and no longer to be the servant of a god – this has survived as a means of ennobling humans

22 [8]!87 On the Will to Suffering.

On the Vision and the Riddle.

On Unchosen Bliss. Before Sunrise. On the Virtue That Diminishes. On Passing By. The Wintersong. On Apostates. The Return Home. On the Three Evils. On the Spirit of Gravity. The Summoning The Convalescent. On the Great Longing. On Old and New Tablets And One More Time! The Other Dance Song. On the Ring of Rings.

[23 = Z II 4. End 1883]

23 [x]

A brief innocent story that nevertheless has caused a lot of mischief: I'll tell it to you – you can tell the part about the mischief to yourselves!

There once was a boy who was told with looks and speeches:

"whatever your father is, this is not your real father!"

This troubled the child and caused him to reflect; and finally he said to himself in his heart of hearts, completely in secret: "is there nothing finer in the world than a real father?"

And when the child learned to pray, his first prayer was:

"God, please give me a real father!"

Yet the child grew older and his secret love and prayer grew older with him: the teenage boy grew up among women and priests: –

A teenage boy, living among women and priests, grew profound and shy about love, and even about the word “love” growing profound and thirsty for the dew of love, just like thyme in the night –

thirsty and shivering with thirst and a friend of the night because the night is full of shame and fragrant incense –

His soul itself took on the fragrance of the priests’ incense and the women’s innocence: yet it was still ashamed of this fragrance.

And just as a typical teenage boy prayerfully desires that a woman love him, so too he prayerfully desired the love of a father and was ashamed even of his prayer.

23 END 1883 577

And so it came to pass that one day his prayer floated away into clouds of light, and words descended from the clouds of light:

“Behold, this is my beloved son in whom I am well pleased.”?

Is this possible! the teenage boy said. I, the beloved son of him, to whom I just prayed for a father? God my father! Is this possible?

This ancient all-powerful Jewish god with furrowed brow and parted lips – is my father! Can this be possible?

But he says it himself, and he has never yet lied: what can I do! I have to believe him!

Yet if I am his son, then I am God: yet if I am God, how am I human? – It is not possible – but I have to believe him!

The human in me – this is surely nothing but God’s need for love: for just as I have thirsted for a father, so he has surely thirsted for his children.

That I am human, this is surely because of humans: I am meant to lure them to my father – – to lure them into loving: oh these fools who have to be lured into loving!

They must love God: this is an easy doctrine and a pleasant one – to us children of God, a light yoke is given to bear:

we must do what we most like to do.

This doctrine and wisdom is easy to grasp: even the poor in spirit may reach out their hands to it

Many things about humans aren't very divine: if we take a shit,? how are we supposed to be God in that moment?

But (it) is even worse with the other kind of shit called sin:

humans want to keep it with them always and not to let go of it.

But I guess I have to believe it: it is possible to be God and still to take a shit: so I shall teach them to let go of their shit and become gods.

23 [2]

I recently drank of ancient wisdom, an unimaginably ancient heady wine of wisdom.

578 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

23 [3]* On Fame.

Sensuality is one thing, giving birth something else. Ask women! Having a good time is not the point of giving birth.' Pain makes hens and artists cluck. Sensuality stammers —: now hear me stammer my words on fame.

It is sensual, to press our hand into millennia as if into wax.

Sensual, to write on the will of millennia as if on bronze. It is sensual to melt stars of the future in the goblet of our will: sensual, reverently to shake out worlds on the rugs of eternity beneath us.

23 [41°

One! Midnight begins! Wafting from afar, from the deep world below — does midnight's word seek its final resting place where I am, the hermit's place?

Two! The final resting place of the deep world — for is it really a hermit's pinnacle?" When it resounds through my ears and blood and marrow, does it seek — does it seek and still find its peace?

Three!

23 [5]?

On the Ways of the One Who Knows.

"How did you, oh Zarathustra, come to your wisdom: did you fly there? — this you ask of me — so that we may learn from you how we can fly to our wisdom?"

You asked well: you should also be taught well. Anyone who asks a good question is already more than halfway to an answer.

I have come to my wisdom through many ways and means,
I did not climb to the pinnacle on a ladder and staircase,
to this place where my eyes roamed into the distance that is mine.

And I never asked people: I asked and tried out the ways for myself. My entire journey was trying things out and asking.

23 END 1883 579

Among people I was always the well-concealed one: whether I climbed or flew or stood and paused: they did not see me with their eyes.

They did not hear me with their ears: and often I listened for an echo but I heard only – praise.'

I spoke directly into their ears when I embarked on to new terrifying seas: is that how I concealed it? Yet now, when I wandered into new terrifying deserts before their very eyes who saw me wander?

—

And whenever I climbed rope ladders into many a window,
whenever I rode many a mast with nimble legs: I remained well

concealed from them, along with my wicked deeds and adventures. It often seemed to me to be malicious bliss, to sit on the highest masts, like a flame: maybe a tiny light, but still a great comfort for exhausted voyagers and castaways.'°

I learned another kind of blissfulness and wickedness whenever a thawing wind blew: so that my torrent rose ever higher and my ice built up to towering heights – then I rejoiced.

I found enough weak and gentle people – they call themselves good and deal gently even with virtue; I found enough hypocrites as well, who misuse the name of justice.

I heard self-deceivers speak to me, whose lies rest innocently on hearts and tongues; even many parasites greedily pushed their way in to join the feast of my wisdom.

23 [6]

You should not drink until you are thirsty: and you should not dance until the spirit moves you. And only learn how to lie so that you understand what truth-telling is!

You should not be driven back to the truth until you are hungry for it: and when you have drunk your fill of the good wines of truth, then you will also want to dance.

23 [7]" Prelude.

Oh my brothers! That you first learned silence from me!
And solitude!

580 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

23 [8]'? On the Ultimate Consolation.

Behold, how everything was set up to be a workshop for creative souls: everything indispensable to creative souls is there in abundance: even including pain.

23 [9]? The Wintersong. On Passing By. On Rulers. On Those Who Enjoy. On Image-Shapers. On Evil People. On Lawgivers On Discoverers. Before Sunrise (Vow)

On the Vision of the Most Solitary One.

The Other Dance Song. On Solitude. On the Great Longing. On Laughing and Flying. Conversation with Lightning. On Eternity. On Free Will. (Below!)

1. On the Will to Suffer

On Passing By.

Before Sunrise.

Yes! And Amen!

On the Great Longing. The Other Dance Song. Below!

The Wintersong.

23 END 1883

On Pregnancy.

On Solitude.

On Fame.

On Rulers.

On (Teachers) Image-Shapers. On Evil People.

Conversation with Lightning.

On the Vision of the Most Solitary One.

On Laughing (and the Spirit of Gravity).

Song of the One Who Flies.

On Lawgivers (Breaking of the Tablets)

On Those Who Enjoy.

On Discoverers (Chance)

23 [10]

2. On Examined Riddles.

4. Before Sunrise. 5 6

. On the Virtue That Diminishes ("Powerful People").

. On Apostates. 7. On Passing By. 8. On the Single Victory.

9. On the Ways of the One who Knows.

10. The Wintersong. 11. On the Great Longing. 12. The Return

Home. 13. On the Three Evils. 14. The Other Dance Song. 15.

The New Tablets.

16. On the Spirit of Gravity.

17. On Convalescence. 21. And One More Time!

22. On the Ring of Rings.

(18-20 are missing)!

581

582 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

– On the Will to Suffer.

On Examined Riddles. – On Unchosen Bliss – Before Sunrise.

– On the Virtue That Diminishes

– On Apostates. – On Passing By. On the Will to Victory. –

The Wintersong. On the Great Longing. – The Return Home. –

On the Three Evils. – The Other Dance Song. – The New Tablets

– On the Spirit of Gravity.

– The Convalescent. And One More Time! On the Ring of Rings.
the Summoning Up

On the Vision of the Most Solitary One.

On the Will for the Ring.

On the Great Longing.

And One More Time!

On the Ring of Rings.

On Consolation in Magnanimity (“Pain”)

Abolition of Sin (because no God)

(only a parable)

On the Ultimate Consolation Without Sin. On Princes and Peoples –

[24 = Mp XVII 1b. Winter of 1883–1884]

24 [1]

That it is difficult to get close to the Greeks, that after studying them for a long time we feel even more distant from

them:

this is the proposition and the entirely personal frustration

with which I wish to begin my observations about the Greeks as connoisseurs of human nature. We can live with them for a good while, while holding beliefs that are opposite to theirs

and we learn that our alienation? is more instructive than our feeling of familiarity

perhaps a Greek would experience the way we have delved deeply in uncovering what is human to be an impiety against nature, a shameless act. Conversely, we feel alienated – yvapn;?

to hear “where there is knowledge, action must follow” and
that virtue should be bliss, this sounds so strange and implausible to us that we do a double take to see if it was meant as a joke. It is as if they had given the intellect another layer of skin.

24 [2] philosophical legacy of classical antiquity: – “purpose”

– God and human (the point of view before Copernicus)

– pleasure as motive

– logic, the overvaluing of consciousness.

– the soul

584 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

there is no “thing in itself” any more than there can be “absolute knowledge.”

I replace fundamental truths with fundamental probabilities – provisionally accepted guidelines by which to live and think

these guidelines not arbitrary but rather correspond to an average degree of habituation.

Habituation is the result of a selection made by my various affects, all of which, during this process, wanted to have a sense of well-being and to preserve themselves.

24 [3] to observe creative power how much it sacrifices of the organism (often destructive)

how it, when impregnating, transforms another organism and puts it into greatest danger.

The degrees of creative power

1) actors, creating figures out of themselves, e.g., la Faustin*

2) poets sculptors painters 3) teachers – Empedocles 4) conquerors 5) lawgivers (philosophers)

generally, the type has yet to be found, except in the lowest levels: the history of suffering and joy has yet to be documented. False positions e.g., philosophers who position themselves externally – but this is only a temporary condition and is necessary for being pregnant.

24 [4]>® The Eternal Recurrence. A Book of Prophecy.

I. Presentation of the doctrine and of its theoretical pre-suppositions and consequences.

24 WINTER 1883–1884 585

3. Potential consequences of it being believed (it brings everything to the point of upheaval)

a) Means of enduring it b) Means of eliminating it

Time of greatest danger.

Founding of an oligarchy above the peoples and their interests: education for the sake of a universally human politics. Counterpart of Jesuitism.

24 [5]

On the emergence of logic

original chaos of ideas

ideas that fit together remained, most of them perished – and are perishing.”

Creating – as selection and finishing of what has been selected.

(This is what is essential in every act of will?)

24 [6]

I have always felt a sense of decline in regard to German culture.

this often made me treat the entire phenomenon of European culture unfairly, because I had become familiar with a culture in decline.

the sound of Kant('s) senile and Chinese-like music is fading out,

The Germans are always a little late in arriving: they make things profound, e.g.

dependence on foreign countries (how polyphonic!): e.g.,

Kant – Rousseau – sensualists Hume – Swedenborg

Schopenhauer – Indic peoples and Romanticism, Voltaire.

Wagner – French cult of ghastliness and great opera, Paris and escape back to original conditions. (sister-marriage Law of latecomers (province after Paris, Germany after France, such that, of all people, Germans discovered what is Greek

586 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

the more we develop the strength of a drive, the greater the inclination to try to hurl ourselves into its opposite?

Wagner's style of decadence: the single phrase becomes sovereign, subordination and orientation become random. Bourget p. 25.10

24 [7]

both of the greatest philosophical points of view (discovered by Germans) that of becoming, of evolution that is oriented around the value of existence (but the pathetic form of German pessimism must first be overcome!

brought together by me in a decisive way everything becomes and eternally returns

– slipping away is not possible!

Supposing we could judge value, what would be the result?
the thought of r(ecurrence) as principle of selection, in service to force (and barbarism!!) Humankind's ripeness for this thought.!!

Enlightenment concerning the fact that there is no thing in itself and

The 1) no knowledge in itself!

great 2) no good and evil in itself!

nega 3) no goal and no origin!

-tions.

The essence of the organic is the least slippery concept.

Purposes as accompanying phenomena of needs. Even the philosophies: our need right now is to de-moralize the world:

otherwise we could not to live anymore. The absolute "un-freedom of the wiill)," interpreted morally, arouses resistance.

24 WINTER 1883 -1884 587

24 [8]

With respect to the feeling of power, humans can be divided into

A) pitiful people: those for whom the smallest satisfaction is already enough. Proud people, even "good people."

B) dissatisfied people, who want satisfaction outside themselves

C) Those who believe themselves to be full of power

D) etc.

24 [9] Psychology of Error! ?

Whenever we do something, a feeling of force emerges, often preceding what is done, in envisioning what is to be done (as when we catch sight of an enemy, an obstacle that we believe we are capable of dealing with): always accompanying this feeling. We instinctively think that this feeling of force ought

to be the cause of the action, that it ought to be "the force."

Our

belief in causality is the belief in force and its effect; a transfer-

ence of our experience; whereby we identify force with the feeling of force. – Yet nowhere does the force move things, the force that is felt "does not set the muscles in motion."

"We have no idea, no experience, of such a process." – "We experience just as little of the necessity of a movement as of the force as something that makes things move." Force ought to be that which compels! "We only experience that one thing follows another – we experience neither the compulsion, nor the choice, that one thing follows another." Causality is first created through the projection of compulsion into the process of following. A certain "comprehension" emerges thereby, i.e., we have anthropomorphized the process for ourselves, made it "more familiar": that which is familiar is the habitual familiarity of a feeling of force that is conjoined to human compelling*">

588 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

24 [10]

It is true that "necessity{" can also mean "every time when A occurs, B will follow. Degree of probability (certainty) whereby the occurrence of what follows may be expected. This certainty rests on experience: B has always followed A, there has never been a non-B that has followed A. Conceptual support through the fact that processes of following, which are of a nature similar to AB, are cited to produce the certainty that

B will follow A."!°

"It is also the case that the sensation" of force cannot be derived from motion. Sensation in general cannot be derived from motion.!?

Also supporting this is merely an illusory experience: in a substance (brain), sensation is engendered by transferred movement (stimuli). But engendered? Would that then have proved that the sensation did not yet exist there at all? so that its arising would have to be understood as a creative act of the motion that has taken place? The state of this substance, in which there is no sensation, is only a hypothesis! no experience!!?

– therefore sensation as property of substance:

there

are sensing substances."?®

"Do we have experience of certain substances not having sensation? No, it is just that we do not experience that they have it. It is impossible to derive sensation from non-sensing substances."?! – Oh such hastiness!??

24 [11]

"I want to go": but 1) I have to go, and the willing" is only something incidental which produces no motion at all, a prior image. 2) This image is unbelievably raw and indeterminate compared to what happens, it is conceptual and completely general, so that innumerable realities overlap underneath it.

Therefore it cannot be the cause of what happens. – Purposes are to be eliminated.

24 WINTER 1883 –1884 589

24 [12]

When an officer gives the order "present arms," the soldiers do it. He commands, they want to do it now. In reality, what they do now is something different for each one of them: but to crude organs it looks the same. Those who act purposefully often find those purposes fulfilled: i.e., they see crudely and do not at all recognize what truly happens. That the world of what happens corresponds to our incomplete image of what happens, overlaps with it, this is the faith of teachers of purpose.

The less that is known, the easier it is to maintain this faith.

24 [13]

"In the development of thought there must have come a point when it became conscious, such that whatever were designated as properties of things were sensations of the perceiving subject: at this point, the properties ceased to belong to the thing. "The thing in itself" remained. The distinction between things in themselves and the thing for us was based on the ancient naive perception that projected energy into the thing:

but analysis has shown that even force was imaginatively ascribed to the thing, and in the same way – substance. “The thing affects a subject?” Root of the idea of substance in language, not in that which is external to us! The thing in itself is no problem at all!”°

What exists should be thought of as sensation that has, as its foundation, nothing else lacking in sensation.”®

In motion no new content is given to sensation. With respect to content, what exists?” cannot be motion: therefore form of existence.???

NB. The explanation of events can be attempted, first: by representing images of events that precede the events (purposes) second: by representing images that follow the events (the mathematical-physical explanation.

These approaches should not be confused with each other.

Therefore: the physical explanation, which is the picturing of the world out of sensation and thought, cannot itself derive sensation and thought again and make them emerge: rather, physics must consistently construe even the sensing world as lacking sensation and purpose – all the way up to the most superior humans. And the teleological explanation is only a history of purposes and is never physicalist!

590 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

24 [14]

A multiplicity of forces, conjoined through a common nutritive process, is what we call “life.” All so-called feeling, representing, thinking is part of this nutritive process as a means of making it possible, i.e., 1) a resistance to all other forces 2) an arrangement of these according to shapes and rhythms 3) an evaluation in regard to incorporation or separation.*°

Humans believe in “being” and in things because they are form-building and rhythm-making creatures.

The shapes and forms that we see, and in which we believe we have things contained, are all absent. We simplify ourselves and we conjoin some “impressions” through figures that we create.

Those who close their eyes discover that a form-building drive continues to function and that innumerable things are attempted that do not correspond to any reality.

2. Humans are rhythm-making creatures. They project all events into these rhythms, it is a way of gaining control of the "impressions."

The way they nourish themselves and acquire things is to shape them into "forms" and rhythms: comprehension is at first only creation of "things." Knowledge a means of nourishment.

24 [15]

Science does not ask what drove us to this willing: in fact, it denies that willing has occurred and thinks that something entirely different has happened – simply put, that the belief in will and purpose is an illusion. It does not inquire into the motivations for an action, as if these had already existed in our consciousness prior to the action: rather, it first divides the action into a mechanical group of appearances and seeks the prehistory of this mechanical movement – but not in feeling perceiving thinking. That is why it can never accept the explanation:

24 WINTER 1883 –1884 591

perception is what was supposed to be explained in the first place. – Its problem is really this: to explain the world without resorting to perceptions as causes: for that would certainly mean: seeing perceptions as causes of perceptions.

Its

task is in no way accomplished.

Thus: either no will – the hypothesis of science – or free will. Latter assumption the prevailing feeling that is incapable for us, even if the hypothesis were proved.

The popular belief in cause and effect rests on the presupposition that free will is the cause of every effect: before this we do not have the feeling of causality. Thus, this presupposition underlies even the feeling that every cause is not an effect but rather in the first place always a cause – if the will is the cause. “Our acts of will are not necessary” – this is contained in the concept “will” The effect after the cause is what is necessary – that’s how we feel. –That even our willing must absolutely be like that, is a hypothesis?! But willing: = purposeful willing. Purpose contains a value judgment. Where do value judgments come from? Is the basis a consistent standard of “pleasant and painful”?

But in innumerable cases we do not make something painful until we project our value judgment into it.

Range of moral value judgments: they play a role in almost every sense impression. The world is colored for us through them.

We have projected the purpose and the value: through this we have within us an immense /atent force: but comparing values reveals that opposing things were seen (as) valuable, that many codes of values have existed.

therefore nothing valuable “in itself”

592 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

the analysis of codes of values reveals their establishment as the establishment of conditions of existence for narrowly defined groups (and often mistakenly): for the sake of preservation.

in observing contemporary humans, it becomes obvious that we apply widely differing value judgments, and that there is no more creative force left in there – the basis: “the condition of existence” is now absent from moral judgments. The judgments are much more superfluous. They have not been this painful in a long time. –They are becoming arbitrary. Chaos.

Who creates the goal that remains ascendant above humankind and also above the individual? In earlier times, the point of morality was preservation. But now no one wants to preserve anything anymore, there is nothing left there to preserve.

Therefore an experimental morality, to give ourselves a goal.??

species-preserving

24 [16]" About the Origin of our Value Judgments.

We can spatially analyze our own bodies, and then we get exactly the same representation of them that we do of the solar system, and we no longer notice the distinction between the organic and the inorganic Hymn to value judgment.

In earlier times, the movements of the stars and planets were explained as effects of consciously purposeful beings: we don't need this anymore, and it has been a long time since we have regarded purpose-setting consciousness as adequate for explaining even bodily movements and personal transformations.' The vast majority of movements have nothing whatsoever to do with consciousness: also nothing to do with perception. Perceptions and thoughts are very limited and rare in relation to the countless number of events in every moment. Conversely, we perceive that a purposefulness prevails in the smallest event, for which our best

24 WINTER 1883 –1884 593

knowledge is inadequate, a cautiousness, a selection, a collation, compensation etc. In short, we discover an activity that would have to be attributed to a vastly superior and more comprehensive intellect than the one of which we are conscious. We learn to think less highly of all consciousness: we unlearn how to make ourselves responsible for ourselves, since we, as conscious, purpose-setting beings, are only the smallest part of this process. We perceive almost nothing of the numerous influences in every moment, e.g., air electricity: enough forces could exist that continuously influence us, even though they never enter into our perception. Pleasure and pain are such rare and limited phenomena compared with the countless stimuli that a cell transmits, or an organ transmits, to another cell, or to another organ. It is a phase of modesty in respect to consciousness. We finally understand the conscious I itself merely as a tool in service to that superior, more comprehensive intellect: and here we can ask whether all conscious willing, all conscious purposes, all value judgments are not perhaps just means through which something essentially different must be achieved than what appears within consciousness. We tend to think: it has to do with our pleasure and displeasure — — — but pleasure and displeasure could be the means by which we would have to accomplish something that lies outside our consciousness — — — It is to be demonstrated how much all that is conscious remains on the surface: how action, and the image of action, differ, how little is known of what precedes an action: how fanciful our feelings “freedom of the will” “cause and effect” are: how thoughts are only images, just as words are only signs of thoughts: the impossibility of explaining every action: the superficiality of all praise and blame: how essential invention and imagination are, in the place where we consciously live, how we speak in all of our phrases about inventions (including affects), and how h(uman) connections rest upon a transmission and continual re-creation of these inventions: while fundamentally the real connections (through procreation) continue on their unknown path. Are human beings really changed by this belief in common inventions? Or is the complete system of ideas and value judgments merely itself an expression of unknown changes? So, do willing, purposes, thoughts, values really exist? Is all of conscious life perhaps only a mirror image? And even when a value judgment appears to define a human, does essentially something entirely different happen? In short: assuming we could successfully explain that which is purposeful in the workings

594 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

of nature without assuming a purpose-setting I: could ultimately our purpose-setting, our willing, etc. perhaps be only a sign language for something essentially different – namely something not-willing and unconscious?’ Merely the most subtle impression of this natural purposefulness of the organic, but nothing different from it?
And briefly put: perhaps the entire development of the mind has to do with the bod): it is its history that is becoming tangible, a history of a superior body being formed. The organic is still ascending to higher levels. Our craving for knowledge of nature is a means by which the body wants to perfect itself.
Or rather: hundreds of thousands of experiments are performed, in order to change nutrition, ways of living, lifestyles of the body: consciousness and the value judgments it contains, all kinds of pleasure and displeasure, are signs of these changes and experiments. In the end, this has nothing at all to do with humans: they must be overcome.*’

24 [17]

They think of themselves as being present at the emergence of organisms: what is it about this process that has been perceivable through sight and touch? What can be rendered in numbers? Which rules manifest themselves in the movements?
Thus: humans want to categorize every event as an event for sight and touch, consequently as movements: and they want to find formulas that will simplify the enormous mass of these experiences. Reduction of all events to something that can be measured by human senses? and mathematicians.

24 WINTER 1883 –1884 595

This has to do with an inventory of human experiences: assuming that humans, or rather the human eye and conceptual ability, might have been eternal witnesses to all things.

24 [18]*°

Science – this has been up to now the elimination of the complete confusion of things by means of hypotheses which “explain” everything – therefore motivated by the intellect’s aversion to chaos. – This same aversion possesses me when I observe myself: I, too, would like to imaginatively represent to myself the inner world by means of a schema and move beyond intellectual confusion. Morality was just this sort of simplification:

it taught that humans were recognizable, familiar. – Now we have destroyed morality – we have again become completely obscure to ourselves! I know that I know nothing of myself: Physics reveals itself as an act of charity for the emotions:!* science (path to knowledge) gains a new allure after morality has been eliminated – and because here alone we find consistency, we have to orient our lives around it in order to preserve consistency for ourselves. This results in a kind of practical contemplation about the conditions of our existence as those who know.

24 [19]*?

Morality of truthfulness in the herd. “You should be knowable,*? express what is within you through clear and constant signs – otherwise you are dangerous: and if you are evil, the worst thing for the herd is your ability to disguise yourself. We despise what is secret what is unknowable. – Consequently you must consider yourself to be knowable, you must not be concealed from yourself, you must not believe in your ability to change.” Thus: the demands of truthfulness presuppose a person’s knowability and stability. Actually, the point of education

is to bring a member of the herd to a particular belief concerning the essence of human beings: it first creates this belief and in addition it demands "truthfulness."

596 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

24 [20] *4

The Faith in "Affects." Affects are a construction of the intellect, a fictional account of causes that do not exist.

All cor-

poreal general feelings® that we do not understand are intellectuallytually interpreted, i.e., a reason is sought as to why we feel this or that way, in persons, experiences etc. thus, something deleterious dangerous foreign is assumed as if it were the cause of our bad mood: actually it is added to the bad mood for the sake of being able to think about our condition. – Frequent blood flows to the brain accompanied by the feeling of suffocation are interpreted as anger: people and things that enrage us are triggers for the physiological state. – After the fact, once we have grown accustomed to them, certain processes and general feelings are associated so regularly that the sight of certain processes incites this same state of general feeling and accompanies any kind of circulation blockage, production of semen etc.: thus through proximity: we then say "the affect is triggered."

Judgments are already present in "pleasure" and "displeasure": stimuli are differentiated according to whether they do or don't enhance the feeling of power.

24 [21]*°

The faith in willing. It is a faith in miracles to posit a thought as the cause of a mechanical movement. The consistency of science-ence demands that, after we have made the world conceivable for ourselves through tiny images, we also make affects desires willing etc. conceivable to ourselves, i.e., we reject them and we treat them as mistakes of the intellect.

24 [22]*"

Denunciation did not become a part of punishment until certain penalties were attached to despicable people (e.g. slaves). Those who were punished most often were despicable people and finally there was something to denounce in punishment itself. –

24 WINTER 1883-1884 597

24 [23]®

We believe thinking to be the strongest and most consistent activity at all levels of life, in every perception and apparent suffering as well! In this way, thinking obviously becomes most powerful and most demanding, and in time tyrannizes all other forces. In the end, it becomes "the passion in itself."

24 [24]

– – – thus selflessness would further evil. Virtue would be foolishness and self-contradiction. Those who would want to make human beings better could not do so by means of their goodness but rather by resisting their charitable inclinations.

24 [25]"

supreme fairness and generosity as state of weakness (the New Testament and the early Christian community) (revealing itself as complete bêtise" in the Englishmen Darwin, Wallace).

Those of you with superior natures, your fairness is driving you to suffrage universel'! etc., your "humanity" is driving you to generosity in response to crimes and stupidity. /n time you will make possible the victory of stupidity and of thoughtless

people

(Comfort and stupidity –the means) (e.g., Bismarck – Externally: age of brutal wars, revolutions, explosions Internally. ever growing weakness of human beings. Events as triggers. Parisians as the European extreme."

Consequence.

1) Barbarians,

first, of course, in shaping culture up to now (e.g., Dühring)

2) Sovereign individuals (where concentrations of barbarian force are combined with a lack of restraint regarding everything that has come before)

Age of the greatest stupidity, brutality and misery of the masses, and of the most superior individuals.

598 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

24 [26]?

At our core: ? not knowing, which way out? Emptiness.

Attempt to get beyond this through intoxication.

Intoxication as music

Intoxication as cruelty in the tragic enjoyment of the downfall of what is most noble.

Intoxication as blind fervor for individual people (or ages) (as hatred, etc.)

Attempt to work mindlessly as a tool of science.

to open our eyes to the many small pleasures e.g., even as someone who knows. Modesty in regard to ourselves.

to generalize modesty concerning ourselves into a kind of pathos mysticism, the lustful enjoyment of the eternal void.

art for its own sake "le fait," "pure knowing" as narcotics for disgust with ourselves 36

some sort of regular work, some sort of small stupid fanaticism

the confusion of all means – illness through universal immoderation. (Debauchery kills pleasure.)

1) weakness of the will as result.

2) having felt, by contrast, extreme pride and the humiliation of minor weaknesses.

24 [27]" Morality for Moralists.

1 Little knowledge of our effect false presuppositions concerning our motivations

2 Exchange of moral labels; good people not wanting to see.

Motives of moralists, self-knowers, confessors etc.

4 Health and illness and their manifestations in good and evil people. The body as master teacher. Morality as sign language.®

5 Evil as organic function. Good people as degeneration, stagnation etc. "Altruism."

Ww

24 WINTER 1883 –1884 599

6 Conscience of the community and of the individual. At the end, the individual as majority.

7 The future of morality. Religions.

24 [28] My Innovations. Further development of pessimism the pessimism of the intellect.

moral) criticism, disintegration of the final consolation knowing the signs of decline veiled by delusion every strong action culture isolated, unjust, thereby strong

1.) My ambition to counter the decline and the increasing weakness of personality. I sought a new center.

2.) Impossibility of this ambition recognized!

3.) After this / went further along the path of disintegration, – there I found new sources of strength for individuals. We must be destroyers! – –

I recognized that the state of disintegration in which individual beings can perfect themselves as never before – is a reflection and exemplary case of universally shared existence.”

Theory of chance, the soul a selective and self-nourishing being exceptionally clever and continuously creative (this creative power usually overlooked! understood only as “passive”)

I recognized the active force that which is creative in the midst of chance

– chance is itself merely the collision of creative impulses

I held up eternal recurrence against the numbing feeling of general disintegration and imperfection!“

24 [29]

Fear of death as an European illness.

Fear easy to instill, even in stupid fish Herd animals mainly fearful,

hearing highly attuned to alarm signals.

600 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Moral judgments (fear and aversion) very different, inculcated early. The art of rendering judgments against others, something all teachers of virtue have in common.

24 [30]

to connect skepticism with heroic feelings

Skepticism of weakness and skepticism of courage

To imagine a human being without morals, who everywhere brings forth even the opposite judgment

Napoleon.

24 [31]%

Compassion and love for humankind as development of the sex drive.

Justice as development of the drive for revenge.

Virtue as pleasure in resistance, will to power.
Honor as public recognition of that which has affinity and equal power.

aversion to the calculating frogs

All virtues physiological states namely the main organic functions perceived as necessary, as good.

All virtues are actually refined passions and intensified states.

24 [32]

Unfreedom or freedom of the will? There is no will.®4

The individual is something completely novel and someone who creates novelty.

24 [33]°°

Individuals are something absolute, all actions entirely their own.

In the end, they take the values for judging their actions from within themselves: this is because even those words that have been passed down must be interpreted by them in a completely individual way for themselves. The interpretation of the formula is at least personal, even if it creates no formula: as interpreters they are still creative.

24 WINTER 1883 –1884 601

24 134"

All actions must first be prepared in as mechanical a way as possible, before they are willed. Or: "purpose" does not appear in the brain until, for the most part, everything is prepared for its completion. Purpose an "inner" "stimulus" – nothing more.

There is no "will": this is merely the understanding's simplifying concept, like "matter."

24 [35]

Our sense organs as causes of the external world? But they themselves are indeed also nothing but effects of our "senses."

– Our image of the eye is a product of the eye.

24 [36]

1) There is no matter" – no atom p. 53

2) There is no space. (The prejudgment "empty of matter" is what created the assumption of spaces in the first place.

3) There is also no cause and effect. Rather: if a tension occurs here, a release of tension must occur in the whole rest of the world. (That the tension occurs is in turn the "consequence" of a release of tension elsewhere.) But it cannot possibly be a sequence: rather, simultaneously, tension increases here and decreases there. The processes that are actually connected to each other must transpire absolutely simultaneously. We single out a point as "effect," e.g., when a person falls over after being shot. But this is an immense chain of connected "effects." If time were necessary for the sake of the "effect," then there would be a plus without the corresponding minus, at least for moments: i.e., the force would sometimes wax sometimes wane Vogt p. 654 we should presuppose a living rhythm, not cause and consequence!

4) we must not assume any absolute creation, because nothing can be comprehended with this "concept." To create force, that is not there, suddenly out of nothing: this is no Aypothesis at all! (contra Vogt p. 2 etc.)

602 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

5) We can recognize the emergence of the organism from the "moral drives" of humans, reasoning from this developing process back to the development of the lowest organisms. Moral drives are the history of selfregulation and function-building of a whole (state community): how is the individual given a feeling of function?

The individual is an egg. Colony-building is the task of every individual

24 [37]"°

Omnia naturalia facienti sunt indifferentia, sed abstinenti vel neganti bona aut mala."

Reference Matter

Notes

The following symbols are used throughout the text and notes:

[] || t} ()

NL

Deletion by Nietzsche

Addition by Nietzsche

Addition by the translators

Addition by the editors

(Colli and Montinari)

Unfinished or incomplete sentence or thought

Underlined once by Nietzsche Underlined twice or more by Nietzsche

Books in Nietzsche's personal library

Variants and editions of Nietzsche's works are referred to by the following abbreviations:

CW

KGB

KGW

KSA

Le

Pd Pm

The Complete Works of Friedrich Nietzsche

Briefwechsel: Kritische Gesamtausgabe Werke: Kritische Gesamtausgabe

Werke: Kritische Studienausgabe Twenty-volume 1894 Leipzig edition of Nietzsche's works (Großoktav-Ausgabe) Preliminary draft

Printer's manuscript (clean final copy of handwritten MS)

606

Sd Se

NOTES

Second draft Subsequent emendation

Titles of Nietzsche's works are referred to by the following abbreviations:

AC

BGE

BT D DD DS

EH GM

HAH

HL

JS MM

NCW

SE

TI

The Anti-Christian

Beyond Good and Evil

The Birth of Tragedy

Dawn
 Dionysus Dithyrambs
 David Strauss the Confessor and the Writer
 Ecce Homo
 On the Genealogy of Morality Human, All Too Human On the Utility and Liability of History for Life
 The Joyful Science
 Mixed Opinions and Maxims Nietzsche Contra Wagner Schopen-hauer as Educator Twilight of the Idols Unfashionable Observations The Wagner Case
 Richard Wagner in Bayreuth The Will to Power
 The Wanderer and His Shadow Thus Spoke Zarathustra
 Unless another volume of the Complete Works is indicated,
 all

cross-references to fragments are ones that appear in this volume.

References to the following works will also appear in the notes:

Flügel

Felix Flügel, A Practical Dictionary of the English and German Languages in Two Parts! Praktisches Englisch-Deutsches und Deutsch-Englisches Wörterbuch in zwei Theilen. Leipzig: Julius E. Richter; Hamburg: John Augustus Meissner, 1852. This is an expanded edition
 NOTES TO PAGES 3–4 607

of his father Johann Gottfried Flügel's A Complete Dictionary of the English and German and German and English Languages in Two Volumes/Vollständige Englisch-Deutsches und Deutsch-Englisches Wörterbuch in zwei Theilen, first published in 1830.

Grimm Deutsches Wörterbuch von Jacob und Wilhelm Grimm.
 16 Bde. in 32 Teilbänden. Leipzig 1854-1961. Quellenverzeichnis Leipzig 1971. Online version at <http://www.woerterbuchnetz.de/DWB>.

Pfeiffer Friedrich Nietzsche – Paul Ree – Lou von Salome:
 Die

Dokumente ihrer Begegnung. Auf der Grundlage der einstigen Zusammenarbeit mit Karl Schlechta und Erhart Thierbach ("The documentation of their meetings." Based on previous collaboration with Karl Schlechta and Erhart Thierbach). Edited by Ernst Pfeiffer. Frankfurt on Main: Insel Verlag, 1970.

{1 =N V 9a. N VI 1}

1. "solitudo continuata dulcescit"] "Continued solitude grows

sweet" {Cf. Luigi Boniforti (1817-1909), I lago Maggiore e suoi din- torni: Corografia e guida storica, artistica, industriale ("Lake Maggiore and its surroundings: Chorography and historical, artistic, industrial guide") (Milan: Brigola, 1871), 239.}

2. Madonna del Sasso. (Locarno)] The Pilgrimage Church above the city of Locarno.

3. {See our notes on the translation of the pronoun man in the

Translators' Afterword, 726-27.}

4. {These notes are based in part on books by the physicists Johann Karl Friedrich Zöllner (1834-82), Über die Natur der Come- ten: Beiträge zur Geschichte und Theorie der Erkenntniss ("On the nature of comets: Contributions to the history and theory of knowl- edge") (Leipzig: Engelmann, 1872); and Johann Gustav Vogt (1843-1920), Die Kraft: Eine real-monistische Weltanschauung "Force: A real-monistic worldview") (Leipzig: Haupt & Tischler, 1878).}

5. unlearn] verlernen {N has in mind here the deliberate and systematic attempt to discard or forget erroneous habits and opinions.}

608 NOTES TO PAGES 4-6

8. "Suaviter in re, fortiter in me."] "Gentle in action, resolute in me." A paraphrase of Fortiter in re, suaviter in modo ("Resolute in action, gentle in manner"), saying of the Jesuit general Claudio Aquaviva, Industriae ad curandos animae morbos ("Curing the illnesses of the soul"), Venice 1606 (according to Büchmann).

10. Cf. 311] 34; {1[9]; 311] 224; 22[3]_563; /S 262. {Hereand throughout these notebooks, wherever Nietzsche uses singular inflection to describe all members of a species (wer/"anyone who"), an ethnicity

(der Chinese), or a vocation (der Dichter), we have pluralized the nouns and their possessive referents in order to preserve gender neutrality. For a detailed explanation of our approach, with examples, please see the section "Singular Universals" in the Translators' Afterword, 730-32.}

u. Cf. note to 1[6].

14. Vademecum. Vadetecum] "Go with me. Go with you" {A vade mecum is a handbook for ready reference that someone can carry around.}

Keinem Genueser mehr!

Immer starrt er in das Blaue, Fernstes lockt ihn allzusehr!

*

Muth! Auf offnem Meer bin ich,

Hinter mir liegt Genua.

Und mit dir im Bund gewinn ich Goldland und Amerika.

Stehen fest wir auf den Füßen!

Nimmer können wir zurück. Schau hinaus: von fernher grüßen

Uns Ein Tod, Ein Ruhm, Ein Glück!

NOTES TO PAGES 6-8 609

Friend take this book and do not trust*

a Genoese ever again!

What is farthest draws him all too much!

I was as one, I am as two,

Behind us lies Genoa,

And with golden threads I spin

A fortune for myself – Hallelujah!

*Read this book and do not trust {variant to the starred line above}

the future and America {variant to the double-starred line above}

19. Verse from Lou von Salomé's "Prayer to Life"; she gave N this poem when she left Tautenburg, Cf. Pfeiffer 450.

20. sub specie trecentorum annorum?] {A play on the Latin phrase sub specie aeternitatis, literally "under the aspect of eternity," which since Spinoza has meant "universally true."

Here N

means "under the aspect" or "within the timeframe of 300 years."}

21. A later addition, in part, of already treated or yet to be treated topics.

22. neighborliness] Nächstensucht {N means "neighbor" here in the sense of Jesus's second great commandment, "Love your neighbor as yourself" (Matthew 22:39); cf. 1[22]; 17[30].}

Was liegt an Särgen und Leichentüchern!

Dies ist ein Wille, dies ist ein Versprechen,

Dies ist ein letztes Brücken-Zerbrechen,

Dies ist ein Meerwind, ein Ankerlichter,

Ein Räderbrausen, ein Steuer-Richten,

Es brüllt die Kanone, weiß dampft ihr Feuer,

Es lacht das Meer, das Ungeheuer –

25. {Cf. 1[19]; 17[30].}

610 NOTES TO PAGES 8-16

29. Cf. 3[1] 26; {see the Translators' Afterword, 743-44, for notes on the translation of N's Gemiith}.

30. Dated by Peter Gast "2 October 1882" in the notebook; actually to be dated beginning of August 1882, which may be concluded from Paul Rée's letter of 6 August 1882 to Lou von Salomé (in Tautenburg); cf. Pfeiffer 177.

31. {N's use of the masculine singular universal includes both men and women. We do not pluralize "medium" here for the sake of clarity.}

Cf. 1[65]; {3[1] 10}.

34. choice] Willkiir {We believe that "choice" best captures these allusions to Kant's technical term in his moral theory.}

36. {Cf. 3[1] 226.}

37. state] Zustand {The negation of the German term in this context indicates the impossibility of isolating any phase within a process}.

38. {Cf. sft] 54-}

39. death] der Tod {Here in nominative case, which we are assuming was meant to be den Tod (in the accusative).}

40. {Cf. 1[78]; sie] 53.}

43. "Faites... terre."] "Get married out of friendship in order to have children. Love has little to do with progeny. If you see a human being in front of you that you love more than yourself, you will be happy. But it is not the woman that one can love more than oneself, it is the child, it is the innocent being, it is the divine type that vanishes more or less while growing up, but, in the course of some years, brings us back to the perception of an ideal on earth." {Maxime du Camp cites this letter from George Sand of 21 June 1868 in his "Souvenirs littéraires. XIII: Lui et Elle; intérieur de journal," published in Revue des deux mondes 52

(15 August 1882): 729.}

NOTES TO PAGES 16–22 611

46. {Cf. 11111}; 3[1] 16.}

47. imperiousness] Herrschsucht {Which N sometimes contrasts with Selbstsucht ("selfishness").}

48. {Cf. [111]; 3[1] 17; BGE 139.}

49. women] Frauen {Cf. 311] 351c; 1[50]; 12[1] 92.}.

50. On the Reemergence] Zur Wieder-Entstehung {In not distinguishing between zu and von in N's titles, we follow the usage of the Stanford edition.}

51. Cf. 311] 15; ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 4.

52. Cf. 311] 13; {4[226]; 12[1] 147; 13[14]; 16[7]}.

61. advocatus diaboli] "devil's advocate"

65. Cf. 1[24, 67]; 3[1] 1225 s[1] 66; 1[43, 108]; 3[1] 50, 49, 8; 1[72,

73]; BGE 129, 133.

66. we know them through and through] ihre Maaße und Gewichte kennen

67. repeating beings] periodische Wesen

68. {Cf. 3[1] so; 22[3]_564; BGE 129.}

69. {Cf. 311] 49; 22[3]_564.}

71. {Cf. 1[88]; 5[1] 61; 1[108].}

72. {Cf. 3[1] 8}

73. will for power] Machtwille

612 NOTES TO PAGES 22-25

77. {Cf. 311] 29; 22[3]_563.}

81. menand women] Männer und Frauen

87. women] Frauen

89. {Cf. 1[73]; si] 61; 1[108]. We translate Untergang as "downfall" in this volume, but we have changed the verb here to accommodate the transitive meaning.}

Spanische Grammatik (Leipzig: Verlag G. A. Gloeckner, 1882);

N

misspells the name of Schilling's publisher.}

Muft du mal drauf beißen.

97. {These works are cited in Friedrich von Hellwald, Kulturgeschichte in ihrer natürlichen Entwicklung bis zur Gegenwart

("Cultural history in its natural development to the present")

(Augsburg: Lampart, 1876), 8, 9, 13, 65. Hellwald's text was an important source for N of information concerning Zarathustra;

in fact, N's first reference to Zarathustra (cf. CW 13, 11[195]) follows closely from this text, p. 169. N's connection with Hell-wald's text was first discovered by Paolo D'Iorio; cf.

"Beiträge zur

Quellenforschung," Nietzsche-Studien 22 (1993): 395-97.}

98. {Cf. Eduard Hitzig, Untersuchungen über das Gehirn: Abhandlungen physiologischen und pathologischen Inhalts ("Studies of the brain: Treatises with physiological and pathological content") (Berlin: August Hirschwald, 1874).}

NOTES TO PAGE 25 613

100. {Cf. Paul von Lilienfeld, Gedanken über die Socialwissenschaftenschaft der Zukunft ("Thoughts on the social science of the future", 2 vols. (Mitau: E. Behre, 1873).}

101. Cosa... dura!!!} {Beautiful and mortal things/Pass away and do not last!!!} Underlined by N. A verse from Sonnet 248 of the

Canzoniere, also called Rarum vulgare fragmenta, by Petrarch}

Mir fortan und meinem Griff!

Offen ist das Meer: in's Blaue

Treibt mein Genuesser Schiff. OK

Alles wird mir neu und neuer

Hinter mir liegt Genua.

Muth! Stehst du doch selbst am Steuer,

Lieblichste Victoria!

preceded by MM}: Unmoved heart, a mute hand at the helm.
 There [to that place] {I} want to go
 Genoa – that sank, that disappeared!
 [is] [that disappeared, is] Genoa – have I already forgotten
 it?
 Heart, stay unmoved! Hand, [Gloria] stands at my Hold the helm, hand! Who stands there at the helm for me?
 Ocean and fame [– and death] before me!
 –and Land! Gloria – and Gloria! You stand at the helm
 614 NOTES TO PAGE 25
 I want – to go there! Friend
 [Gloria]
 Do not trust a Genoese ever again!
 He is always staring into the blue
 What is farthest draws him all too much!
 What is most foreign is dear to me today
 Genoa lies far[s] behind
 To there – or toward death!
 [MM: According to the drafts and attempts cited above, the following transitional version seems possible:]
 That's the way I want to go! Friend, do not trust
 A Genoese ever again!
 He is always staring into the blue
 What is farthest draws him all too much!
 What is most foreign is dear to me today
 Genoa lies far behind
 Gloria! You stand at the helm
 To there – or toward death!
 N V 9, 18-17:
 Open is the sea: into the blue Drives my Genoese ship
 To there, and I trust
 Myself from now on and my grip.
 Everything becomes new and newer to me
 Genoa lies behind me:
 And you yourself stand at the helm,
 Dearest Victoria!
 N V, 19:
 ToL.
 I want to go there, and I trust Myself and my grip from now on!
 Open is the ocean: into the blue

Drives my Genoese ship.

NOTES TO PAGE 26 615

Everything becomes new and newer to me

Genoa lies behind me

And you yourself stand at the helm*

Dearest Victoria!

*Courage! You yourself stand at the helm {Variant to the starred line above.}

[MM: On the same page is the following variant to the second strophe:]

What is most foreign is now dear to me

Genoa lies behind me

Courage! She herself stands at the helm.

(MM: This variant was rejected, yet it inspired the change in the third line of the second strophe that is depicted above.]

106. Cf. 3[2].

Zu einsam wuchs ich und zu hoch:

Ich warte: worauf wart' ich doch?

OK

Zu nah ist mir der Wolken Sitz:

Ich warte auf den ersten Blitz.

Wen liebt ich so wie dich, geliebter Schatten!

Ich zog dich an mich, in mich – und seitdem

Ward ich beinah zum Schatten, du zum Leibe.

Nur daß mein Auge unbelehrbar ist,

Gewöhnt, die Dinge außer sich zu sehen:

Ihm bleibst du stets das ew'ge "Außer-mir".

Ach, dieses Auge bringt mich außer mich!

Whom have I loved as I love you, beloved shadow!

I pulled you to me, into me – and ever since

I am more shadow than I was before*

You more body than ever before and everyone [sees] [wonders] says:

616 NOTES TO PAGES 26-27

[Two became one, a shadow and a body

only that my own eye refuses to believe it

This is so] And still – that I for you

*Did I almost become a shadow [forever] only and you [Almost became] a body: no longer two, [only] our transformation continues

{Variants to the two starred lines above.}

ur. (Sanctus Januarius)] ("Holy January"). {A pun on Saint Januarius, the patron saint of Naples.}

112. "Die fröliche Wissenschaft."

(Sanctus Januarius)

Dies ist kein Buch: was liegt an Büchern!

An diesen Särgen und Leichentüchern! Vergangnes ist der Bücher Beute:

Doch hierin lebt ein ewig Heute.

113. hold on] Pd: cling

114. To whatever... hold!] Pd: Whatever {will let} me cling
to my happiness

(1876.)

Nicht mehr zurück? Und nicht hinan?

Auch für die Gemse keine Bahn?

OK

So wart'ich hier und fasse fest,

Was Aug' und Hand mich fassen läßt!

xk

Fünf Fuß breit Erde, Morgenroth,

Und unter mir – Welt, Mensch und – Tod!

{KSA/KGW failed to include the closing exclamation point.}

Heil dir, Freundschaft! Meiner höchsten Hoffnung Erste Morgenröthe! Ach, ohn' Ende

Schien oft Pfad und Nacht mir,

Alles Leben

NOTES TO PAGES 27-28 617

Ziellos und verhaft! Zweimal will ich leben,

Nun ich schaw' in deiner Augen

Morgenglanz und Sieg, Du liebste Göttin!

First guarantor Of my last hope Defiance and consolation Of tired souls despairing Guarantee and prelude Of distant triumph I want to live twice

To look twice into your eyes'

Morning splendor and midday peace

[Oh] Friendship! (N V 9, 14)

Hail to You, Friendship First guarantor Of my highest hope Defiance and consolation [After] in starless nights, When struggle and life [seemed] [meant] to me [to be in vain]

[nothing] I want to live twice,

To look twice into your eyes'

Morning splendor, oh Goddess Friendship! Friendship! (N V 9, 13)

118. phrase] Wort {Wort can also be translated as "word." We find "phrase" more appropriate to this context.}

Lebend'gem Worte bin ich gut: Das springt heran so wohlgemuth, Das grüßt mit artigem Genick, Ist lieblich selbst im Ungeschick,

Hat Blut in sich, kann herzhaft schnauben, Kriecht dann zum Ohre selbst den Tauben,
618 NOTES TO PAGE 28

Und ringelt sich und flattert jetzt,
Und was es thut – das Wort ergetzt.
Doch bleibt das Wort ein zartes Wesen,
Bald krank und aber bald genesen.
Willst ihm sein kleines Leben lassen,
Mußt du es leicht und zierlich fassen,
Nicht plump betasten und bedrücken,
Es stirbt oft schon an bösen Blicken –
Und liegt dann da, so ungestalt,
So seelenlos, so arm und kalt,
Sein kleiner Leichnam arg verwandelt,
Von Tod und Sterben mißgehandelt.
Ein todttes Wort – ein häßlich Ding,
Ein klapperdürres Kling-Kling-Kling.
Pfui allen häßlichen Gewerben,
An denen Wort und Wörtchen sterben!
If you grasp at it with an icy glance
Then it quickly closes its eyes.
How can you then
With its little shadow-corpse
How can you bind word to word
I'm a friend of [the German] lively phrase
That jumps out at us with such good faith,
[That has its endearing clumsiness
Its hearty eye]
That greets us with an artful curt[skill]sy Endearing even in its clumsiness
[And wants you... it]
[It has] Has blood within, [an eager creature] can sniff heartily [eagerly] (N V 9, 180)
[And] Creeps |then| even into deaf ears
Yet it always will remain a [W] delicate creature, [Quickly]

Soon sick and yet soon well
[And] if you |wish| to let it live its fleeting life:*

NOTES TO PAGE 28 619

Don't crudely grab and crush it,
It often dies merely from an evil [cold] eye.
[You may do that, you deformers,
With its little shadow-corpse]
[And lies then]
[And] there lies there then so [deformed] deformed,
So soulless, so poor and cold

Its little corpse [completely] terribly transformed, brutalized through death and dying
[You] How ugly is a dead phrase]
You see it lying there and run away:
How ugly is a dead phrase!
Your grip [with hands] must be refined [and light] {Variant
to the starred line above.}
(N V 9, 179)

And shame on every ugly business,
Through [which little animal-phrases die] [the phrase-beasts]

Through which the friendly [P] animals die!
To bookbinders and day laborers
[The phrase, a marvelous beast winged, small]

A dead phrase – an ugly thing a bone-on-bony cling-cling-cling;
And cursed be the ugly business
[Through] [Through which friendly little animals]
Through which phrases and phrase lets die,
[through bookbinders and day laborers]
[That] They fight among themselves without renown
The little men those swine
And call it “style” and take pride in it and now it curls up and flutters,
And what it does – the phrase delights, (N V 9, 178)

620 NOTES TO PAGES 28-36

123. women] Frauen

124. women] Frauen

125. {Cf. 2[46]; 3l1] 53; [a] .}

128. women] Frauen

129. women] Frauen

130. power] Kraft {We usually translate Kraft as “force,” especially in passages related to his concept of drives, but here “power”

seems to be a more suitable rendering.}

[2 =N V 9b.]

1. “On the occasion of Buddha’s prophecy about Metteyya, the next Buddha, who will appear on the earth in the distant future, it reads: “He will be the leader of a multitude of hundreds of thousands of disciples, just as I am now the leader of a multitude of hundreds (Cakkavattisihanada Sutta)." Hermann Oldenberg, Buddha: Sein Leben, seine Lehre, seine Gemeinde (Berlin{: Hertz,} 1897), 162n (the 1881 edition in NZ, 144n).

2. {Carl Gustav Carus, Vergleichende Psychologie oder Geschichte der Seele in der Reihenfolge der Tierwelt ("Comparative psychology or history of the soul in the hierarchy of the animal kingdom") (Vienna: Brownmiiller, 1866).}

Apparently copied out of a card catalogue.

Vogt] {Johann Gustav Vogt; cf. notebook 24, note 68.}

Lindau] {Paul Lindau}

. Wilbrandt] {Adolph von Wilbrandt}

(Cf. 7, 73]; 9[36].}

. Crossed out by N; cf. 3[1] 27.

. Cf. 3[1] 307; BGE 103.

10. And... blind.] |And| yet proclaim to me, you animals: Is [not] the sun already at its noon height? Is [not] the serpent [lin its light]] [called] eternity |called?| already coiling itself [, in its light?

Thus Zarathustra's hour had |already| come.] Zarathustra goes blind.

ur. Cf. si] 109; 12[1] 185.

YQ

yp PN AYA

NOTES TO PAGES 37-40 621

12. Cf. 3[1] 209. 13. Cf. 3[1] 210.

1s. Cf. 3[1] 200.

Sensuality rears its head like a dog that wants to have a bite of meat, even in the most cerebral interaction of the 2 sexes with each other. [MM: Similar thoughts in Lou Salomé's journals from this time: cf. Pfeiffer 208, 239.]

21. Cf. 5[1] rro. {The expanded context of 5[1] 110 indicates that N is talking about cats.}

Hebrews 12:6; cf. also Proverbs 13:24; Revelation 3:19.

27. Cf. 3[1] 188. 28. Cf. 3[1] 180. 29. Cf. 3[1] 187.]] [=]

30. Cf. 3[1] 178; ZI "On the Viper's Bite."

31. Cf. 3[r

34. necessary] {In this case N italicizes noth in nothwendige because it is a compound word, but there is no way to render this in English except by italicizing part of the word.}

36. {N is punning on the proverb Geteiltes Leid ist halbes Leid, i.e., "A problem shared is a problem halved."}

37. Refers to the following aphorisms: HAH 237, Renaissance and Reformation, D 88, Luther the great benefactor; JS 149, The failure of reformations.

622 NOTES TO PAGES 40-42

38. Cf. 3[1] 66; 12[1] 114; CW 15, 31[52]; 32[9]; Z IV "The Festival of the Ass."

40. to ultimate knowledge] zur letzten Erkenntnis

41. wall of knowledge] Zaun der Erkenntnis

43. it doesn't look so bad an ele(phant] es sieht da nicht übel aus ein Ele(phant {This reflects the ungrammatical sentence in the original.}

47. Cf. 3[1] {64}: "It is not how... to be loved"; 3[1] 72; {22[3] 564}; BGE 79.
(3=ZI)

1. On the... eternity!" -] Cf. 111s]; 111or]; 3[4]. 3[4] is an earlier version; motto and title added later.

2. "Dorthin will ich! Und ich traue
"Mir fortan und meinem Griff.
"Offen ist das Meer, ins Blaue
"Treibt mein Genuesser Schiff.
"Alles wird mir neu und neuer,
"Weit hinaus glanzte Raum und Zeit - "Heil dir, Schiff! Heil deinem Steuer!
"Um dich braust die Ewigkeit!" -

3. "Beyond. . . Sentences.] From: "Desay-uno" {"Breakfast"}/"Disillusionment." {These were possible alternative titles; die Ernüchterung ("Disillusionment") could also be translated as "Sobriety."}

4. "ilsait... plaisirs."] "Those who know how to enjoy life are sensible sluggards brooding over their pleasures." {Cf. Guillaume Amfrye de Chaulieu, Oeuvres de Chaulieu, d'après les manuscrits de l'auteur: Tome premier (La Haye: Bleuët, 1774), 59-60. N might also have come across this line from the Duc de Nevers in an article by Amédée Renée, "Les nièces de Mazarin. Troisième partie:

 NOTES TO PAGES 42-45 623
 La Duchesse de Mercoeur, La Princesse de Conti, La Duchesse de Modène. – Le Duc de Nevers," in Revue contemporaine, Fourth year, Vol. 22 (Paris: Bureaux de la Revue Contemporaine, 1855): 150.}

8. superior qualities] das Hohe
 9. base qualities] dessen Niedriges
 u. Cf. ZII "The Wanderer; {22[1]_ 561}.

22. their neighbors] ihre Nachsten {Not in the Christian or "neighborhood" sense, but rather "those to whom they are closest."}

27. Cf. 1[47]; BGE 86; first version: Behind all the feelings a man has for a woman there still lies contempt for the female sex.

28. superiority] Höhe

30. {Cf. 22[3]_562.}

32. poetically imagined] erdichten

624 NOTES TO PAGES 45-48

44. Cf. N to Heinrich von Stein, beginning December 1882
 {KGB III:1, 288}.

47. Cf. 12[1] 119; Z II "On Scholars"; "On Tarantulas"; {9[48];
 12[42, 43]; 13[6]}.

48. We... explained.] First version: Something is often considered to be absurd only because the conventional explanations
 for it are absurd: a deceptive work of art is the result. {N switches from passive voice in the first version to the singular universal pronoun man in the final version, which we render here as
 "we."}

so. Cf. Z I "On Reading and Writing."

51. genius gravitationis] "spirit of gravity" or "demon of gravity"

54. brought to light] sich aufklart {N's wordplay is between sich aufklären ("brought to light") as a passive substitute and aufgeklärt sein ("enlightened").}

NOTES TO PAGES 48-51 625

65. Cf. 2[49]; N to Elisabeth N, Beginning of {9} September 1882 {KGB III:1, 252}.

67. {Cf. 22[3]_564.}

72. Those... enemy.] Pd: If people have never been against you, you will [never subjugate them] never become their ruler.

74. Cf. Vauvenargues: "Les grandes penseés viennent du coeur" {"Great thoughts come from the heart"}, quoted in Arthur Schopenhauer, Parerga and Paralipomena, vol. 2, trans. Adrian Del Caro and Christopher Janaway (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2015), 12; cf. 22[3]{_563}; CW 18, 20[29].

78. Cf. 2[41]; 12[1] 114; CW 15, 31[52]; 32[9]; Z IV "The Festival of the Ass."

83. by means of truthfulness] über seine Wahrhaftigkeit Humans" 7.

87. Cf. 12[1] 112; ZI "On the Viper's Bite." N crossed out this first version: Behind every person who judges stands the executioner.

88. First version: When we are sublimely above good and evil, we see all tragedies as unintended comedies and are far from granting tragic natures the greatest significance. III:1, 259}.

go. Cf. 22[3]{_565}; BGE 180.

626 NOTES TO PAGES 51-55

93. Cf. 3[1] 149; ZI "On the Flies of the Marketplace." First version: Cowardice in the face of a neighbor is a basic character trait of very loveable people.

94. grab... neck] am Schöpfe fassen

100. an appendage] From: the embodiment

101. as an appendage . . . action] als Zubehör einer einzigen Tat

102. a chalk line drawn around a hen] der Kreidestreich um die Henne {Refers to a trick used by hypnotists, whereby a hen would refuse to step across a chalk line, even though it was capable of doing so.}

105. First version: A. "What you are teaching here is not yet your philosophy!" B. Why not? A. "If it were yours |my friend,| you would (1) demand nothing more except to dance – at least once a day. (2) walk differently: you should be seen dancing at (least) once a day! Dancing is the proof [since] of truth for me, the proof of force." Later version: Our stride reveals whether we have found our path. Cf. ZIV "On Superior Humans" 17.

109. "One person... around") "Einer ist doch noch zuviel um mich" {A play on the proverb Drei sind einer zu viel, or "Two's company, three's a crowd."} uo. Cf. ZI "On Friends."
ur. Cf. BGE 174.

114. to each my own] jedem das Meine {A play on the saying jedem das Seine, or "to each his own."}

NOTES TO PAGES 55-59 627

115.
116.
117. 118.
Cf. BGE 65a.
Cf. 5[17]; 12[1] 111; ZI "On the Flies of the Marketplace."
Cf. si] 2093 12[1s]; 13[15].
Pd: We believe in things that do not exist e.g., selflessness, always at the cost of things that exist, e.g., selfishness.

120. Cf. ZI "On Little Women, Old and Young." {Cf. 4[38]; sli] 73b.}

I.
122.
123.
124.
125.
126.
127. 128.

Cf. 4[104]; 5[1] 166; ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 4.
 Cf. CW, 31[52]; 32[8]; BGE 65.
 Cf. BGE 64.
 All women] "Alle Frauen
 'All women... one.] Cf. ZI "On Friends."
 Cf. BGE 152.
 Cf. Z I "On Reading and Writing."
 Cf. Z II "On Compassionate People"; {12[1] 107; 13[8]}.
 {English speakers feel pangs of conscience, Germans "bites"
 of conscience, so the pun on GewissensbisselBeifen is lost here.} 130.
 The . . . animals.] Cf. 12[1] 110; Z II "On Compassionate
 People."
 132. 133. Cf. 12[1] 108; BGE 170.
 First version: with some decent will to live – there is little suffering on account of the "Will to Live." 135. 136. 137. 138. 139. 140. 141. 142. 143.
 Cf. slr] 167; BGE 151.
 Cf. 3[1] 85; ZI "On the Flies of the Marketplace."
 Cf. BGE 63.
 Cf. ZI "On Friends."
 Cf. ZI "On the Virtue of Gift-Giving" 3.
 Cf. ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 9.
 Cf. Z I "On Reading and Writing."
 Cf. BGE 156.
 First version: Nothing is more pathetic than to see good people straining to prove that superior h(uman beings) were created in the image of their god.
 628
 145.
 146.
 Cf. ZI "On Reading and Writing."
 Cf. 5[33].
 {Pluralization was not possible here because of the discussion of two individuals.} 149.
 150.
 Cf. Z I "On Reading and Writing."
 and... will stink] and morality is removed from the world, namely, talked to death
 152. 153. 154. 155. 156. 157.
 Cf. 12[1] 106; 13[8]; Z II "On Tarantulas."
 Cf. ZI "On Reading and Writing."

Cf. ZI "On Reading and Writing."
 Cf. ZI "On Reading and Writing."
 Cf. BGE 157.
 Cf. ZI "On the Way of Those Who Create." First version:
 Every sensation that doesn't kill us is killed by us.
 159. 160. 161. 162. 163. 164.
 Cf. 2[35].
 Cf. ZI "On the Viper's Bite"; {2[33]}.
 Cf. 2[34]; ZI "On the Viper's Bite."
 Cf. 2[31].
 women] Frauen
 three-eyed] dreiäugig {A metaphor of supernatural vision or insight from the iconography of Zeus in Greek mythology.} 166. 167. 168. 169. 170. 171.
 Cf. ZI "On the Pale Criminal."
 Cf. BGE 159.
 Cf. ZI "On the Viper's Bite."
 Cf. 2[32]; ZI "On Love of One's Neighbor."
 Cf. 2[30].
 Cf. 2[28]; 5[17]; ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 4; paraphrase of Hebrews 12:6; cf. also Proverbs 13:24; Revelation 3:19.
 173. 174. Cf. 2[22]; ZI "On Chastity." Cf. 2[27]; BGE 161.
 NOTES TO PAGES 63-68 629
 177. 178.
 179. 180.
 181. 182. 183.
 Cf. 2[21].
 Cf. 2[20]; ZI "On War and Warrior Peoples."
 Cf. 2[19].
 Cf. 2[18]; Z I "On Friends."
 Cf. 2[16]; ZI "On Little Women, Old and Young."
 Cf. 2[17].
 Cf. 12[1] 104; BGE 162. {The wordplay here is between Nachster, the biblical designation for a fellow human being,
 and Nachbar, someone living in close proximity; both are translated
 by "neighbor."}
 185. 186. 187. 188. 189.
 190.
 191. 192. 193. 194.
 Cf. BGE 100.
 Cf. 12[1] 105; Z II "On Compassionate People."
 Cf. ZI "On Loving Thy Neighbor."
 Cf. 2 [13].
 Cf. 2[14].

Cf. 4[96]; 5[17]; ZI "On the Viper's Bite."
 Cf. 2[38]; ZI "On the Viper's Bite."
 Cf. BGE 67.
 Cf. CW, 31[53]; 3219]; Z IV "On Superior Humans" 9.
 Cf. ZI "On Chastity." 196. females] Weibchen {With no attributive to provide the pejorative nuance implied by the diminutive, we chose what some regard as a pejorative form in American usage.}
 197. 198. 199.
 200.
 201.
 202. 203. 204. 205. 206. 207.
 Cf. 2[29].
 Cf. 1[24]; ZI "On the Way of Those Who Create."
 Cf. 1[25]; si] 59.
 Cf. 118]; {1[9]; 3[1] 34]; 2213]_563; JS 262}.
 Cf. 1[38]; 25[171].
 Cf. 1[40]; BGE 66.
 Cf. CW 15, 31[53]; 32[9]; BGE 69.
 Cf. CW, 31[53]; 32[9]; Z IV "On Superior Humans."
 Cf. 12[1] 151; Z II "The Prophet."
 Cf. ZI "On War and Warrior Peoples."
 Cf. BGE 68.
 630 NOTES TO PAGES 69-72
 BGE 99.
 213. {Cf. 4[165]; 5[2]; 1118]; 18[43, 49, 56]; 21[6]; 24[16].}
 214. aside from the ten thousand people who have superior spirits.] abseits von dem oberen Zehntausend des Geistes, cf. GM
 II 7.
 218. feeling] Empfindung {We translate this as "feeling"
 when N doesn't mean sensation or perception. Elsewhere we also use
 "feeling" to translate Gefühl.}
 221. the stars... "above you,"] {This is an allusion to Kant's famous conclusion to the Critique of Practical Reason that is now inscribed on his tombstone: "Zwei Dinge erfiillen das Gemiit mit immer neuer und zunehmender Bewunderung und Erhfurcht, je öfter und anhaltender sich das Nachdenken damit beschäftigt:

der bestirnte Himmel über mir, und das moralische Gesetz in mir."

("Two things fill the mind with ever new and increasing admiration and reverence, the more often and more steadily one reflects on them: the starry heavens above me and the moral law within me") (Immanuel Kant, Critique of Practical Reason, rev. ed., trans. Mary Gregor [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2015], 129.)).

Superior Humans."

NOTES TO PAGES 72-79 631

231. 232. 233.

234.

235.

236.

intellect] Geist {Which can also mean "spirit."}

Cf. BGE 77.

Cf. Z I "On the Viper's Bite."

Cf. BGE 78.

Cf. 1[26].

Cf. 4[200]; 4[42]; 12[1] 96; 13[19]; Z IV "No Longer in Service"; Z II "On Compassionate People."

238. 239.

240.

241.

242.

243.

244.

245.

246.

Cf. ZI "On Reading and Writing."

Cf. Z I "On Reading and Writing."

Cf. BGE 95.

Cf. 12[1] 146; 13[14]; Z III "On Unchosen Bliss."

Cf. ZI "On the Tree on the Mountainside."

Cf. ZI "On Loving Thy Neighbor."

Cf. ZI "On Little Women, Old and Young"; {cf. 4[161]}.

Cf. Z I "On Reading and Writing."

humans] Menschen {N juxtaposes humans with women in this passage.}

248. 249.

250.

Cf. ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 4.

Cf. BGE 94; {cf. 4[13]; s[1] 113}.
 "Ella guardava suso, ed io in lei"] "She looked upward, and I at her"; cf. Divina Commedia, Paradiso II, 22: "Beatrice in suso, ed io in lei guardava" ("Beatrice looked upward, and I at her").
 252. 253. 254. 255. 256. 257. 258.
 compulsion] Trieb {Which we usually translate as "drive."}
 Cf. 4[42].
 Cf. BGE 173.
 Cf. BGE 172.
 {Cf. Matthew 18:3.}
 Cf. BGE 96.
 Cf. 12[1] 148; 13[14]; 16[7]; Z IV "On Superior Humans"
 u. {We translate der Nächste (neighbor or fellow human being in the Christian sense) as "neighbor" and in this case pluralize it to preserve gender neutrality.}
 632
 Cf. BGE 98. {Germans speak of the "bites of conscience" (Gewissensbisse); cf. note 129 above.} 263. 264. 265. 266. 267. 268. 269. 270.
 271.
 272. 273. 274.
 275.
 276. 277. 278. 279. 280.
 281.
 282.
 283.
 284.
 285.
 286. 287.
 Cf. 12[1] 95.
 Cf. BGE 182.
 Cf. 5[35].
 Cf. 5[35]3 12[1] 53; 13[12]; Z II "On Compassionate People."
 Cf. 12[1] 945 5135].
 Cf. 5[35].
 Cf. 5 [35]; ZI "On Matters of Joy and Passion."
 Cf. 5[35, 33]; 12[1] 142; BGE 183.
 Cf. 5[33].
 Cf. 12[1] 90; 13[16]; 16[7]; BGE 169.
 Cf. 5[33].
 Cf. 5[35].
 women] Frauen

Women... as such.) CF. 1[50]; 12[1] 92.
 I... persons.] Cf. Z I "On Friends."
 Cf. ZI "On Freely-Chosen Death."
 Cf. BGE 104.
 Cf. 12[1] 91; Z II "On Virtuous People."
 Cf. D 275.
 Cf. BGE 97.
 Cf. BGE 185.
 N skips over number 363 in his notebook.
 Cf. ZI "On War and Warrior-Peoples."
 Cf. ZI "On Little Women, Old and Young."
 Cf. 4[95, 110]; 5[1] 29; ZI "On Chastity." {We render er as "he" because it is a reference to Zarathustra.}
 289. Cf. BGE 107.
 291. general feelings] Gemeingefühle {The term gemein has two
 «
 meanings, one of which is "general" or "shared in common,"
 the other "base." N might have either of these in mind because morality refers to a shared phenomenon but also to base feelings like resentment.}
 NOTES TO PAGES 84-90 633
 292.
 Cf. BGE 109; ZI "On the Pale Criminal."
 294. pia fraus] "pious fraud" {In the Catholic dogma of the "pious fraud," Jesus is presented as the bait on the hook of the cross with which Leviathan (the demon of the deep, i.e., the devil) is taken and made to render up the souls he has seized.} 295. 296. 297. 298. 299.
 301.
 impia fraus] "impious fraud"
 Cf. BGE tos.
 sancta simplicitas] "holy simplicity"
 Cf. ZI "On the Way of Those Who Create."
 Cf. ZI "On the Pale Criminal."
 .. him] Cf. BG E 113.
 {See the Translators' Afterword, 748-93, for our arguments in favor of translating Übermensch as "superhumans."}
 302. 303. 304. 305. 306. 307. 308. 309.
 310. 311. Cf. 12[1] 179.

Cf. 12[1] 109; BOE 88.
 Cf. BGE 112; {12[1] 89; 13[8]}.
 Cf. sl] 127; BGE 184, 111.
 Cf. 12[1] 180; Z II "On Compassionate People."
 Cf. ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 3.
 Cf. 12[1] 87
 Cf. BGE 171.
 Cf. 12[1] 181.
 Cf. Z I "On Chastity"; {cf. Matthew 8:31, Mark 5:12, and Luke 8:32}.
 313. 314. 315.
 316. 317. 318.
 Cf. 12[1] 149.
 Cf. BGE 123.
 Cf. BGE 168.
 Cf. BGE 167.
 Cf. BGE 122.
 with our mouths and faces] mit Munde und Maule {N is playing off the idiom ein Maul machen, "to pout."} 320. 321.
 Cf. BGE 120.
 Cf. ZI "On War and Warrior-Peoples."
 634 NOTES TO PAGES 90-92
 331. IfGod... love.] Cf. 22[3]{_568}. {We preserve N's word-play on the "bites of conscience"; cf. note 129 above.}
 337. those who darn its socks] Strumpfwirker {Strumpfwirker were weavers of socks, the bottom caste of what was considered to be one of the lower professions.} 339. There are... manly.] Cf. Z III "On the Virtue That Diminishes"; {cf. 22[3]_568}.
 341. This thinker... red hot.] Cf. 3[1] 11; BGE 91; {1[64]; 4[29];
 sl] 67}.
 Hoch wuchs ich iiber Mensch und Thier;
 Und sprech ich – Niemand spricht mit mir.
 OK
 Zu einsam wuchs ich und zu hoch:
 Ich warte: warauf wart' ich doch?
 OK
 Zu nah ist mir der Wolken Sitz,– Ich warte auf den ersten Blitz.
 OK
 NOTES TO PAGES 93–97 635
 On to New Seas.

Freundin – sprach Columbus – traue Keinem Genuesen mehr!

Immer start er in das Blaue, Fernstes zieht ihn allzusehr!

xk

Wen er liebt, den lockt erg erne
Weit hinaus aus Raum und Zeit – – Über uns glänzt Stern bei Sterne,
Um uns braust die Ewigkeit. xx

[4=N Voc. N VI 1b. NV 8.]

1. {Cf. N to Heinrich von Stein, beginning December 1882, KGB III:7/1, 312.}

3 [1] 92.}

4. {Cf 30] 4385 si] 94-}

s. {Cf. 4138]; si) 72.}

6. {Cf. s[1] 96.}

9. god-humans] Gottmensch {We use this rendering when N refers to polytheistic systems; we use “God-made-human” when N uses Gottmensch to refer to Jesus.}

u. Cf. 4[13).

13. bustle] Lärm (“noise”)

14. {Cf. Hermann Oldenberg, Buddha: Sein Leben, seine Lehre, seine Gemeinde (Berlin: Hertz, 1881), 375, NL; translated by William Hoey as Buddha: His Life, His Doctrine, His Order (London:

Williams and Norgate, 1882): 367.}

15. {Cf. 4[9].}

16. {Cf. 3[1] 313; si] 113; BGE 94.}

636 NOTES TO PAGES 97-102

19. woman] Frau

20. lam... go away.] Like Socrates; cf. Plato, Phaedo Goa.

22. love me(a)ls] Liebesma(h)le {A reference to the Eucharist

and perhaps to Wagner’s opera Das Liebesmahl der Apostel (1843) .}

23. {Cf. 4[32, 115, 249]; sft] 175.}

25. Cf. 4[22, 204, 213]; 5[32]; ZI “Zarathustra’s Preface”
5; “On

a Thousand and One Goals.”

27. tool] Mittel {The standard translation is “means,” but “tool” captures it better in this context.}

28. superhumans] {One of the few times N uses the term
Übermenschen in the plural; see also 4[254], 5[32], 10[37, 41], and 13[26].}

Peoples.”
37. creative] Schaffende {Usually translated as “those who create.”}
38. Cf. 3[1] 21; ZI “On the Flies of the Marketplace”; 5[1] 87,
86, 88; BGE 119.
39. Cf. slt] 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 75, 78, 76, 74, 73, 773 Si] 95; 3l1)
128; ZI “On War and Warrior-Peoples”; “On Little Women, Old and Young.”
40. blessed? Be blessed] selig werde? Sei selig {The standard English translation of selig werden is “to be saved” or “to find salvation,” whereas the standard English translation of selig sein, as in the Beatitudes, is “Blessed is/are...” We translate selig as “blessed” in both clauses to preserve the wordplay; cf. Matthew 19:16.}
NOTES TO PAGES IO–III 637
41.
42.
43.
44.
45.
46.
47.
48.
49. 50. 51. 52. 53-{Cf. 4l]s si] 72.}
{Cf. 3[1] 128; 5[1] 73b.}
Cf. 1[83]; CW 13, 11[195].
Cf. 5[1] 85, 84, 83, 82, 81, 80, 79.
{Cf. si] 83; 12[1] 195.}
Cf. s[1] 122, 121.
{Cf. 3[1] 68.}
ancient] alt
{Cf. 3[1] 287; 4[200]; 12[1] 96; 13[19].}
{Cf. 3[1] 317}
Cf. BGE 143; sl1] 48, 47; {3[1] 19}.
{Cf. 3[1] 18.}
abolish] aufheben {N could also have a Hegelian term in mind here, in which case “supersede” might be a more natural translation.} 54.

ignorance] Unkenntnis {As opposed to the standard term Unwissen.}

S. 56.

$7. 58.

{Cf. 2[43]; 3l1] 65; 22[3]_564.}

{Cf. 3[1] 51, 60; 1[34, 79, 80]; 4[44]; sl] 46; 12[1] 200.}

Cf. 3[1] 109.

distress] Noth {N could also have "hardship," "adversity," " . » « ys .

misery, or "want" in mind.}

60.

61.

62. 63. 64.

65.

escort] Geleit {N omits the verb here.}

Cf. 4[139, 75]; ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 3.

Cf. 4[169].

Cf. 12[1] 124.

Cf. 12[1] 127, 126.

{François duc de La Rochefoucauld, De la Rochefoucault's Sätze aus der höhern Welt- und Menschenkunde ("De la Rochefoucauld's phrases from the study of the higher world and human beings"), trans. from the French by Friedrich Schulz (Breslau: Wilhelm Gottlieb Korn, 1793), 77. NL. De la Rochefoucauld's Maximen und Reflexionen, trans. from the French by Friedrich Hörlek (Leipzig: Philipp Reclam, 1875), 26, nr. 183. NL.}

66. 67. Cf. 12[1] 130, 131. Cf. 12[1] 139.

638 NOTES TO PAGES III-II

70. utile... dulce] utile = useful; dulce = sweet {Cf. Horace, Ars poetica, lines 343-44: Omne tulit punctum qui miscuit utile dulci, lectorem delectando pariterque monendo. ("He wins every hand who mingles the useful with sweet, by delighting and instructing the reader at the same time.") These lines are annotated by N in his copy of Des Q. Horatius Flaccus Sämmtliche Werke. Zweiter Theil: Satiren und Episteln; Für den Schulgebrauch, ed. Georg Theodor August Kriiger (Leipzig: B. G. Teubner, 1853).}

71. sit tibi terra levis] "May the earth rest lightly on you" {A benediction for the dead, often inscribed on tombstones or other gravestones, and commonly abbreviated STTL.}

 73. mosquitoes] Mücken {The "bloodsucking" context here
 indicates that N probably had mosquitoes (Culicidae) rather than gnats (Nematocera) in mind. Our nineteenth-century desk encyclopedia also attributes a bloodsucking function to Mücken. The strictness of the distinction Mückenl Stechmücken also varies regionally}
 75. just... avenged] {This loses N's pun on gerecht ("just")
 and gerächt ("avenged").}
 78. {Cf. 5[33].}
 81. drives me crazy] zum Aus-der-Haut fahren
 83. I don't... a meal.] {This is a play on the German ex-pression der Appetit kommt beim Essen ("appetite comes with eating"),
 itself derived from Rabelais's "L'appétit vient en man-geant."}
 84. {Cf. si] 24 12[1] 156.}
 85. darkness... well."] {A reference to the German proverb
 Im
 Dunkeln ist gut munkeln = "Darkness is good for whispering";
 cf.
 si] 26.}
 NOTES TO PAGES I-123 639
 87. honorable men] Biedermann {The term Biedermann was translated in N's time as man of honor, man of worth, gentleman, or worthy, and had not yet acquired the exclusively pejora-tive connotations that modern German has of a limited, prov-
 in-cial outlook.}
 88. until fame arrives] zum Leuchten kommen {literally, until [one] becomes illustrious or famous}.
 90. brakes] Hemmschuh {Hemmschuh refers to a shoe-like device applied to the outside of the wheel of a carriage or other vehicle to provide braking ability.}

 92. {Cf. 4[83].}
 97. {Cf. 4[67].}
 100. primum vivere] "first live"
 101. Cf. 4[75].
 103. mom] Miitterchen
 108. bon gout] "good taste"
 109. Cf. 5[1] 158, 157.
 11. reason] (die) Vernunft {The definite article die appears
 in brackets in the original German and is not translated in the English equivalent.}
 13. {Cf. si] 155; 22[5]_572.}
 640 NOTES TO PAGES 123-131
 115. Cf. 5[1] 161, 162.
 116. {Cf. [1] 153.}
 117. {Cf. 5[33].}
 120. {Cf. 3i] 368; 4[110]; si] 29.}
 121. "Virtue of Gift-Giving."
 123. {Cf. 4[210, 228]; 5[7, 17].}
 124. At least... eclipsed in time.] Dafür versinkt ihr nicht ganz in der Zeit.
 126. {Cf. 3[1] 130; sl] 166.}
 127. {Cf. 3[1] 272.}
 129. {Cf. 3[1] 368; 4[95]; sii] 29.}
 130. "Freethinking"] "Freigeist" {The context of this word indicates intellectual and cognitive, not affective, improvement, thus pointing to "freethinking" rather than "free spirit."}
 133. {Cf. s[1] 176; {5[17]; 16[9]; 22[3]_563}.
 138. Moldenhauer] {E. F. Theodor Moldenhauer, nineteenth-century German astronomer and cosmologist, author of Die Axendrehung der Weltkörper: Beitrag zur Lösung einer naturwissenschaftlichen Frage ("The axial rotation of the world body: Contribution to solving a scientific question") (Berlin: Weber, 1871), and Das Weltall und seine Entwicklung: Darlegung der neuesten Ergebnisse der kosmologischen Forschung ("The universe and
 its evolution: Presentation of the latest results of cosmological research") (Cologne: Mayer, 1882).}

NOTES TO PAGES 131-138 641

139. Mainländer] {Philip Mainländer (1841-76), German poet and philosopher. N was familiar with his central philosophical work, Die Philosophie der Erlösung ("The philosophy of redemption"). NL.}

141. {Cf. 4[145].}

142. in-and-for-itself] An-und-für-sich {Although this has become a standard phrase in German, its origin is Hegelian and N no doubt recognizes this.}

145. heal, savior] {In German, "heal" (heilen) and "savior" (Heiland) are cognate.}

148. primum mobile] "first moved" {The primum mobile in Ptolemaic astronomy was the outermost sphere of the heavens, which was the first mover of the universe. It is also associated with Aristotle's "prime mover," as in 4[138].}.

150. {Cf. 4[49].}

151. Cf. sit] 181, 1825 {sl1] 7}.

152. moralis] {Cf. Charlton T. Lewis and Charles Short, A New Latin Dictionary (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1879): of or belonging to manners or morals, moral (a word formed by Cicero).

"Illness" is underlined by N, "moralis" is not.}

155. {Cf. 4[122].}

156. ends] Zweck {N is playing off the distinction between means and ends in this fragment, so we translate Zweck here as

"end" rather than "purpose."}

157. codes of goodness] Gütertafel

159. peach] Apfel ("apple") {Apfel is translated here as "peach," since in N's time it could refer to any kind of juicy fruit. See

Grimm 1:532-43.}

642 NOTES TO PAGES 138-145

160. sensibility] Gemüth {See the Translators' Afterword, 743-

44, for how we translate Gemiith}
 162. most intellectual] die Geistigsten {Another possibility is "most spiritual"; we chose "most intellectual" because the preceding fragment is concerned with reason.}
 165. this timelessness] dies ohne Zeit
 166. everything . . . straight] {Cf. Isaiah 45:2; Luke 3:5.}
 167. {Cf. 3[1] 303.}
 169. {Cf. 3[1] 245; 11[8]; 18[43, 49, 56]; 21[6]; 24[16].}
 170. laugh and weep] {An allusion to Franz Schubert's song
 "Lachen und Weinen" ("Laughter and Weeping"), composed in 1822, D. 777 in Otto Erich Deutsch's catalogue.}
 172. {Cf. als₁}.
 174. one] {As we explain in the Afterword, the singular reference to what has been created refers to a single category or species
 that includes a plurality of instances or members; see 732-34.}
 177. golden ee {Cf. Ecclesiastes 12:6.}
 180. {Cf. si] 254; 5[22]; 12[5]; 13[7]; 16[7].}
 181. Cf. šii] 255.
]]] I
 186. {Cf. s[1] 158.}
 188. charcoal burners] Kohlenbrenner {Charcoal burning was known for being a low-paying, dirty, dangerous profession.
 Burners
 [[183. Cf. sl [[]
 NOTES TO PAGES 145-153 643 were forced to travel constantly to gain employment. The joke here is that the Church is approaching people who experience hell
 on earth with threats about the hell to come.} 191. shoo-fly] Fliegenwedel {A device associated with horseback riding; could be attached to saddle or harness.} 193. Cf. si] 263, 264; {12[1] 199; KSA mistakenly notes fragment 4[198]}.
 194. {Cf. 3[1] 287; 4[42]; 12[1] 96; 13[19].}
 196. coincidence] Zufall {The standard rendering, "chance," does not work here.}
 197. {Cf. 4[20, 22].}
 198. minds] Geister {In this context, this could also be "spirits."}

 199. a little old lady] das alte Weibchen {N does not mean any particular "little old lady," hence the change to the indefinite article.}
 200. rattle... drum] {In English, drums roll; in German, they rattle.}
 Uebermenschen {Here N means the subject to be taught, not the audience. See 5[8] and 16[89], where "superhumans" are also
 the subject matter.}
 205. {Cf. 4[100, 228]; 5[7, 17].}
 211. {Cf. 5[18].}
 213. {Cf. 1[59]; 30] 13; 12[1] 147; 13[14]; 16[7].}
 644 214.
 215. 216. 217. 218. 219.
 220.
 221.
 Cf. 5[7, 17].
 bring] richtet {The verb is singular, the subject plural
 here.}
 {Cf. 4[100, 210].}
 Cf. 5[13, 16, 17, 20, 32].
 ingenuity] Geist
 {Cf. 3[1] 182.}
 {Cf. 4[266]; 5[14, 32].}
 Cf. si] 260.
 out of... into the fire] aus dem Regen... unter die Traufe
 {The German equivalent of "out of the frying pan into the fire" is literally "out of the rain into the drainpipe."} 223.
 224.
 225.
 226.
 Cf. ZI "On the Viper's Bite."
 Cf. ZI "On Despisers of the Body."
 Cf. ZI "On the Three Transformations."
 {they}] {The antecedent of "they" in the phrase "If they did" in the following sentence is missing in the German.} 228. 229. 230. 231.
 Cf. {4[17, 32, 115);} sl] 175.
 Cf. ZI "On Professorships of Virtue."

Cf. 5 [32].

lock, stock and barrel] Kost und Küche {An obscure locution. Grimm 11:1847 cites Kost und Kleidung as analogous in English to

"room and board."}

233. 234. 235.

236. 237. 238.

239.

after this position] nach dieser Seite

Cf. ZI "On the Virtue of Gift-Giving."

Cf. 5[16, 20].

{Cf. 41230}; s[r].}

noxious] böse {Here adapted to the herbal metaphor.}

Cf. 5[32].

knowing one] die Wissenden {As opposed to die Erkennenden ("the ones who know").}

240.

The belly of existence] Der Bauch des Seins

242. good] Nutzen {Translated as "good" here in the context of utilitarianism.}

NOTES TO PAGES 166-170 645

[5 =Z I 2a. Mp XV 3a.]

L Collection of sayings from the early manuscripts (especially N V, N VI, N V 8); numbered by N.

5. consumption] Schwind sucht {The term in N's time for consumption (tuberculosis).}

1u. Cf. 1211] 141.

1s. Cf. 4[72]; 12[1] 56; BGE 18.

17. darkness... well."] {A reference to the German proverb Im

Dunkeln ist gut munkeln = "Darkness is good for whispering"; cf.

41].}

24. "Honorable men"] "Biedermännerei" {Biedermann or "honorable man" was an ideal in Nietzsche's time. By using the pejorative suffix -erei, he is saying that anyone who lives up to this ideal is contemptible.}

646

30.

31. 32. 33.

34.

35.

36.
 37. 38.
 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44.
 45.
 46.
 47.
 48.
 {Cf. 4[62].}
 {Cf. 4[62].}
 {Cf. 4[62].}
 Cf. 1[ss].
 Cf. 4[44]; ZI "On the Way of Those Who Create."
 Cf. 4[44]; 12[1] 200; {cf. 3[1] 51, 60}.
 Cf. 4[43].
 {Cf. 4[43].}
 Cf. ZI "On Friends."
 Cf. 1[43, 78].
 Cf. 12[1] 182.
 Cf. 4[26]; BGE 116.
 Cf. 3i] 73; {2[42]}.
 Cf. BGE 117.
 Cf. 125]; 301] 223.
 Cf. 1[5]; 12[1] 184.
 Cf. 1[67, 70, 88]; {1[73, 108]}.
 Cf. 1[87]; 1[108]4; 12[1] 194; BGE 114.
 Cf. 1[86]; 1[108] 2.
 "Perish . . . ocean!"] Gehe unter in diesem Meer {Untergehen has the literal sense here of disappearing under the waves.} 50.
 SI.
 52. 53- 54. 55-
 CE 1[72].
 temperaments] Naturen
 Cf. 1[70].
 Cf. 4[29]; {1[64]; 31 11; 3l1] 445; 4129]; BGE 91}.
 Cf. 1[62].
 become blessed . . . be blessed] selig werde . . sei selig
 {The standard English tr  hsl  rion of selig werden is "to be saved" or "to find salvation," whereas the standard English translation of selig sein, as in the Beatitudes, is "Blessed is/are . . . " We translate selig
 as "blessed" in both clauses to preserve the wordplay. Cf.
 Matthew 19:16.}

57. Cf. sii] 95, 4[38]; cf. N to Heinrich von Stein, early December 1882 {KGB III:1, 287}.

NOTES TO PAGES 174-177 647

60. Cf. 4[38].

61. Everything... pregnancy.] Cf. ZI "On Little Women, Old and Young"; cf. 3[1] 128; 4[38].

63. Cf. 4[38]. 64. Cf. 4[38]. 65. Cf. 4[38].

68. Cf. Z I "On War and Warrior-Peoples."

77. Cf. 4[34]; Z I "On War and Warrior-Peoples."

];

82. Cf. 4[4]; Z I "On War and Warrior-Peoples."

83. Cf. note to sl1] 70.

4

90. Cf. 4[6]; ZI "On Matters of Joy and Passion."

648

NOTES TO PAGES 177-II

100. your] sein {The context indicates that this probably refers back to "you."}

IOI.

102. 103. 104. 105. 106. . Cf. 4l].

. Cf. 4[77]; 12[1] 197.

. Cf. 4[49, 75]; ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 3.

. Cf. 301] 95; BGE 184.

. Cf. 4[76].

. Cf. 4[76]; ZI "On Preachers of Death."

Cf. al1s, 77]; ZI "On Little Women, Old and Young."

Cf. 4[18]; ZI "On Little Women, Old and Young."

Cf. 4[28].

{Cf 4[27].}

Cf. 4[41].

Cf. 4[76].

Cf. 4[87]; 12[1] 198; Z II "The stillest Hour."

Cf. 4[82]; s[1] 142.

Cf. 4[78].

Cf. 4177).

Cf. 4[77]. Cf. 4[77].

. The point must be reached] So weit soll es kommen

SCH 415 771:

. Cf. 4[78].

123.

Cf. 4[78]; ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 3.

Cf. 4[86]; Z I "On Matters of Joy and Passion"; "On the Tree on the Mountainside."

126.
 127.
 128. 129.
 Cf. 4[78, 84].
 Cf. 4[84].
 Cf. 4[79].
 Cf. Z I "On Little Women, Old and Young."
 NOTES TO PAGES 181-184 649
 131.
 132.
 133.
 134.
 135. 136. 137. 138. 139.
 140.
 141.
 142.
 145.
 146.
 147.
 148. 149.
 150. 151.
 152. 153. 154. 155.
 156. 157. 158. 159.
 160.
 161. 162.
 Cf. 4[88].
 Cf. 4[89].
 Cf. 4[93]; ZI "On the Viper's Bite"; {4[104]}.
 Cf. 4[93].
 Cf. 4[92].
 Cf. 4[92]; 5[33]; ZI "On the Viper's Bite."
 Cf. 4[91].
 Cf. 4[11]; 5[33].
 Cf. 4[90].
 Cf. 4[90, 186].
 Cf. 4[88].
 Cf. 4[76]; {4[85]; cf. Heraclitus, Diels-Kranz fragment
 "It is not possible to step twice into the same river"}.
 Cf. ZI "On the Three Transformations"; 4[92, 96, 112].
 Cf. 4[94].
 Cf. 4[r].
 Cf. 3[1] 130; 4[104]; ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 4.
 Cf. 3[1] 146; BGE 151.
 Cf. a ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 3.
 CF. aal sliz): {16[9 i ab ae
 {Cf. 4[113].}

Cf. ZI "On the Three Transformations."
 Cf. 4[144].
 Cf. 4l].
 moral drives] sittlichen Triebe {N uses sittlich to refer to the morality of customs; see GM II. Cf. 4[142].} 164.
 165.
 Cf. 4[142]. {Cf 4[135].}
 650
 166. 167. 168. 169.
 172. 173. 174.
 175.
 {Cf. 4[136].}
 Cf. ZI "On the Pale Criminal."
 Cf. ZI "On the Pale Criminal."
 {Cf. 4[117].}
 Cf. 4[148] {and note to 5[1] 170}; 12[20].
 Cf. 12[21].
 Cf. ZI "On Preachers of Death."
 Cf. 5[19, 30]; ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 3.
 Cf. 12[18].
 Cf. ZI "On Preachers of Death."
 knowledge] das Wissen 177. you... dozing.] Cf. ZI "On the Pale Criminal." 178.
 179. 180.
 181. 182. 183.
 184.
 185.
 186. 187. Cf. 4[148 188. Cf. 3[1]124; 12[15]; 13[t]. Cf.
 12[13].
 Cf. 12[14]; {s[1] 214; 10[17]; 1201] 171; 12 [13];
 13[1]_375}-
 knowing . . . being known] Wissen und Erkenntsein
 Cf. 12[13, 14]; {5[1] 213; 10[17]; 12[1] 171; 13[1]_375}-
 Cf. 4[148]; si] 221.
 Cf. 4[184]; ZI "On Preachers of Death."
 Cf. 4[148].
 J; sin] 216. Cf. 4[152]. Cf. 5[27].
 191.
 {Cf. Ralph Waldo Emerson, Versuche (Essays), trans. G.
 Fabricius (Hanover: Carl Meyer, 1858), 361, cited in the Preliminary Note by Mazzino Montinari to the Reference Matter to Z
 in
 CW 7; cf. also ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 2.}

193.
 194
 195.
 Cf. 1[72]; 5[1]65; ZI "On Preachers of Death."
 . Cf. ZI "On Preachers of Death."
 Cf. 12[9].
 196. Cf. ZI "On Preachers of Death" {N repeats the number 234 for this fragment.
 197. {Cf. Gustav Teichmüller, Die wirkliche und die scheinbare Welt: Neue Grundlegung der Metaphysik ("The real and the ap-
 par-
 NOTES TO PAGES 192-195 651
 ent world: New foundation of metaphysics") (Breslau: Koebn-er, 1882), 131-32.}
 Preface" 4}.
 199. Cf. 12[8]. {N is quoting from Teichmüller, Die wirkliche und die scheinbare Welt, 132.} 200. {N here misquotes from Teichmüller, Die wirkliche und die scheinbare Welt, 246. The original – "Was werden soll und werden wird, ist der Grund dessen, was wird" – would be translated: "What should become and what will become is the basis for what will be."}
 Isaiah 40:4, Luke 3:5}.
 211. Cf. 4[176]; 5[22]; 12[15]; 13[7]; 16[7]; Cws, 3116];
 32[9]; ZIV
 "The Leech."
 652 NOTES TO PAGES 196-200
 225. moments of great contempt] die großen Verachtungen
 232. them] ihn {Refers to those being taught rather than the superhumans; cf. 4[208].}
 234. icons] Bilder
 241. news] Wort
 243. Cf. 4[229, 210, 228, 96, 224, 214, 175, 114]; ZI "Za-rathustra's Preface" 4; "On the Viper's Bite"; "On the Flies of the Marketplace"; "On Child and Marriage."
 244. {Cf. 4[100, 210, 228]; 5[7].}
 245. {Cf. 3[1] 211; 4[96]; ZI "On the Viper's Bite."}
 246. {Cf. 4[175]; sl1] 253.}
 247. {Cf. 4[114]; si] 176; 16[9]; 22[3]_563.}

248. {Cf. 3[1] 1225 12[1] 111.}

249. neighbors] der Nächste {N uses the biblical term for "fellow human being," as in "Love thy neighbor as thyself."}

251. Cf. si] 197; 5[30]; ZI "On the Virtue of Gift-Giving";
"Zarathustra's Preface" 3.

252. beyond this earth] überirdisch {We do not have one English term that renders the "super" of N's intended meaning, so we paraphrase here.}

NOTES TO PAGES 200-208 653

259. reveals] verrättht

263. clown] Hanswurst {The clown-buffoon of German and Austrian improvisational theatre, with roots in the Italian commedia del arte. By Luther's time, the name had become a pejorative
term for anyone of unsophisticated and clownish demeanor}

265. Cf. sii] 197; slig]; ZI "Zarathustra's Preface" 3; {4[6]; si]
103}.

266. terra incognita] "unknown land"

268. {Cf. 4[271].}

BGE 183; Z I "On the Viper's Bite."

270. {Cf. 5[17].}

271. {Cf. 4[68].}

272. {Cf. 4[71].}

273. {Cf. 4192}.}

[6 = M III 3b.]

1 Cf. 6[2, 3, 4]; the dating determined on the basis of the draft of a letter from N to Lou von Salomé (M III 3, 18-19)
{KGB
Il:1, 295-96}; cf. Pfeiffer 263 et passim. {The organization of the fragments in this notebook have been altered to follow the organization as found in N's handwritten notebook.}

2. Asceticism] Ascetism {N appears to use the terms Ascetism and Ascetismus interchangeably.}

3. one] {KSA/KGW mistakenly underline eine; see <http://www.nietzschesource.org/DFGA/M-III-3,10>.}

654 NOTES TO PAGES 208-214

4. {Cf. 4[51] and the corresponding note. This fragment has been reformatted in accordance with the notebook; see http:// www.nietzschesource.org/DFGA/M-III-3,11.}

5. to renouncing] aufzugeben {KSA/KGW mistakenly fails to underline aufzugeben; see <http://www.nietzschesource.org/DFGA/> M-III-3,8.}
 [7 = M III 4b]
 1. Draft of "Morality for Moralists"; cf. N to Overbeck in the summer {14 August} of 1883 {KGB Ill:1, 427}: "In the meantime the outline for a 'Morality for Moralists'? completed." 7[201]; 24[27]; CW 15, 25[2]; CW 16, 34[213].
 2. egoist(ic) principle] {Cf. Eduard von Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins: Prolegomena zu jeder künftigen Ethik ("Phenomenology of moral consciousness: Prolegomena to every future ethics"), pt. 1: "Das pseudomoralische Bewusstsein" ("Pseudomoralistic consciousness") (Berlin: C. Duncker's Verlag, 1879), 1-102. NL.}
 3. Critical retrospective on BT, N's notes on the first edition (1872). {Where N cites from BT, we have used the language that appears in the translation by Sean D. Kirkland and Andrew J. Mitchell in CW 1.}
 4. innocence of becoming] Plans with this title also exist dating back to this time; cf. 8[26]; 14[1].
 5. principium individuationis] "principle of individuation"
 6. art... being] {Cf. BT "Foreword to Richard Wagner."}
 7. {N incorrectly writes "p. 54"; the line quoted appears on p. 34, BT 7}
 8. p. 82... existence] BT 15.
 9. "which stares... inscrutable") {BT 15.}
 10. p. 92 Quintessence.] BT 17 (Beginning).
 u. p. 102... art.] BT 18.
 13. "another... 120.] BT 21.
 15. p. 136... sense] BT 23 (Conclusion).
 16. p. 142... hope] BT 24 (Conclusion).
 NOTES TO PAGES 214-221 655
 17. Lecky I 199.] {William Edward Hartpole Lecky,} Geschichte des Ursprungs und Einflusses der Aufklärung in Europa (History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe), 2 vols.

 (London: Longmans, Green, 1865)}, trans. H. Jolowicz, 2 vols.
 (Leipzig/Heidelberg{: C. F. Winter,} 1873), 1:199. NL.
 18. {"Reference to chap. 4 of Johann Joachim Winckelmann, Gedanken über die Nachahmung der griechischen Werke in der Malerei und Bildhauerkunst ("Thoughts on the imitation of Greek works in painting and sculpture") (1755).
 19. the image of the sufferer] das Bild Leidenden {The genitive article is missing}
 Bewusstseins, 776.
 21. evil conscience] böses Gewissen {As opposed to "bad conscience" / schlechtes Gewissen.}
 22. Rée] On the critical dialogue with Paul Rée, cf. 7[24, 48,
 137]; 15[47]; 1615]; 16[18]; 17[49]; CW 15, 25[259]; 26[202,
 218]; CW
 16, 35[34]; 38[18]; GM Preface 4-7; EH "Books" HAH.
 23. intérêt] "interest"
 24. plaisir) "pleasure"
 25. moral theory] Moralistik {A pun on Optik, giving the nuance
 of an academic subject, e.g., Germanistik.}
 26. noblesse] "nobility"
 27. superpowerful] Übermächtiger
 29. {Following Leopold Schmidt, Die Ethik der alten Griechen ("The ethics of the ancient Greeks"), 2 vols. (Berlin: Wilhelm Hertz [Bessersche Buchhandlung], 1882), vol. 1. NL.}
 30. women] Frauen
 31. Reverence for elders... modern] Cf. Schmidt, Die Ethik der alten Griechen, 2:304: "in the Greek world elders were revered about as much as women are revered in the modern world."
 Griechen, 2:314.}
 33. {Cf. Menander's play Farmer: "The best man, Gorgias, is
 the man who knows/How to take many unrequited blows;/This quickness to resent things, this excess/Of virulence, prove littlemindedness."

656 NOTES TO PAGES 222-226

See John Maxwell Edmonds, The Fragments of Attic Comedy, vol. 2

(Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1961), 587.}

34. unfreedom of the will] Unfreiheit des Willens

35. What would the commonalities . . . (Tertullian)] {These paragraphs were 7[23] in KSA, but were moved by Montinari to the end of 7[22] in the revised later edition of KGW}

37. That which ... itself] {This paragraph was included at the end of 7[22] in KSA, but was made 7[23] by Montinari in the revised later edition of KGW}

38. Cf. note to 7[17]. {Cf Paul Rée, Der Ursprung der moralischen Empfindungen (The Origin of Moral Sensations) (Chemnitz: Schmeitzner, 1877), §4, 52-58. NL.}

39. Written following the reading of Hartmann's Phänomenologie, cf. note to 7[10].

40. {Cf. WP 1026.}

41. {Cf. WP 1026.}

42. those who are not self-interested] des Uneigennütigen

43. {Cf. Spinoza, Ethics, Proposition 26: "Whatsoever we endeavor in obedience to reason is nothing further than to understand; neither does the mind, in so far as it makes use of reason, judge anything to be useful to it, save such things as are conducive to understanding." Cf. also Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins, 12.}

Roux's Kämpfe der Theile im Organismus {: Ein Beitrag zur Vervoll-ständigung der mechanischen Zweckmässigkeitslehre ("Struggle of the parts within the organism: A contribution to the completion of the doctrine of mechanical expediency") (Leipzig: Engelmann, 1881), NL.}; cf. note to CW 13, 11[128].

45. "he is... collected"] {Cf. Paul Deussen, Das System des Vedānta nach den Brahma-sūtra's des Bādarāyana und dem commentare des Cankara (Leipzig: F. A. Brockhaus, 1883), 444.

NZ;
translated by Charles Johnston as The System of the Vedanta Accord- ing to Badardya's Brahma-sūtras and Cankara's Commentary Thereon Set Forth as a Compendium of the Dogmatics of Brahman-ism from the Standpoint of Cankara (Chicago: Open Court, 1912), 411; translation modified.}

NOTES TO PAGES 227-236 657

46. {Cf. Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins, 10.}

47. {Cf. Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins, 181-82.}

48. that's... thought] Looking back to the time period 1869-75.

49. prudential morality] {Cf. Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins, 15ff.}

50. "Hints... philosophy." Cf. CW 13, 11[195].

51. moral insanity] {In English in the original. Cf. Henry Maudsley, Zurechnungsfähigkeit der Geisteskranken (Leipzig: Brockhaus, 1875), 164-67. NL. Authorized German translation of Responsibility in Mental Disease (New York: D. Appleton, 1875), 170-73.}

52. "No one... herself!"] {N's translation of the line from Stendhal quoted in 7[46]. This is also how Stendhal's line appears in the German translation, Über die Liebe, in Stendhal, Gesammelte Werke, ed. and trans. Friedrich von Oppeln-Bronikowski (Berlin: Im Propyläen, 1921), 4:54.}

53. Napoleon . . . century.] {According to KGW Nachbericht, this line belongs in 7[45]. KSA 10 had this as the entirety of 7[46].}

54. Stendhal... donner."} {According to KGW Nachbericht, this is a separate fragment. KSA to had this as the first paragraph of 7[43]: "If a lady doesn't succeed in finding someone willing to take her, she will still succeed in finding someone she can sell herself to." Cf. Stendhal, De l'amour (Paris: Michel Lévy Frères, 1857), 38. NL.}

59. {WP 725.}

Death of Empedocles, st version, 1417. See The Death of Empedocles: A Mourning-Play, trans. David Farrell Krell (Albany: State University of New York Press, 2009), 87.}

61. {Cf. 7[47, 62, 125]; 8[26]; 24[16, 27].}

62. {Cf. 7[47, 58, 62, 125]; 8[26]; 24[16, 27].}

63. is experienced] wird... durchgemacht

658 NOTES TO PAGES 236-242

65. feeling!] Gefühl!

66. {This line from Ihering is cited in J. J. Baumann, Handbuch der Moral nebst Abriß der Rechtsphilosophie ("Handbook of morality along with an outline of the philosophy of jurisprudence") (Leipzig: S. Hirzel, 1879), 387-88. NL. Cf. Rudolf von Ihering, Der Zweck im Recht ("The purpose of law") (Leipzig: Breitkopf & Hartel, 1883), 2:191, 212, 226.}

67. Anact... etc] {Cf. Albert Hermann Post, Bausteine für eine allgemeine Rechtswissenschaft auf vergleichend-ethnologischer Basis ("Building blocks for a general jurisprudence on a comparative-ethnological basis"), 2 vols. (Oldenburg: Schultz, 1880/1), 1:224. NL.}

69. moralize] moralisieren {Moralisieren has a broader meaning in German, beyond "sermonizing" or "preaching," having to do with "thinking morally" or "exercising moral categories."}

70. consequences . . . feelings] Folgen . . . Empfindung {We usually render Empfindung as "sensation" when Gefühl is present in the same fragment, but here the context calls for "feelings."}

71. {Cf. note 67 above.}

72. surl amour v. p. 252.] N's copy no longer extant in N's Library. {Cf. Stendhal, De / amour, 252, where he refers to Helvétius.}

73. "le plaisir"] "pleasure"

74. Cf. Eugen Dühring, Kursus der Philosophie als streng wissenschaftlicher Weltanschauung und Lebensgestaltung ("Course of philosophy as strictly scientific worldview and guide to life") (Leipzig{: Koschny,} 1875), 147. NL. {Nietzsche misquotes Dühring, whose text reads: "sein mechanischer Zustand stets ein Theilzustand der universellen Mechanik des Kosmos ist" (its [the body's] mechanical state is always a partial condition of the universal mechanics of the cosmos).}

75. {According to Roux.}

76. {Cf. Schmidt, Die Ethik der alten Griechen, 2:403ff.}

77. Cf. note to CW, 11[128]; {cf. Roux, Der Kampf der Theile im Organismus, 73-89).
 struggle of parts for space in the exchange of materials, or the struggle for nutrients in cases of shortages thereof with or without the effect of stimuli, newly developing characteristics can win out and spread in direct ways, namely in direct competition with the old ones, whereby the latter are either directly destroyed or consumed, assimilated (assimilation itself is certainly most universal and progressive process)."

NOTES TO PAGES 243-245 659

80. the... weaker] Cf. ibid., 91.

81. the advantage... rule] Cf. ibid., 76-78.

82. When . . . nourishment.] CF. ibid., 75: "If there is a lack of nutrients for an extended time, then it is true that struggle for space can take place, but only those connections will remain which cet. par. [all other things being equal] use the least material for replication, whereas other processes are simply starved out, thus disappearing by means of self-elimination."

84. ira] "wrath"

87. Cf. ibid., 63: "Furthermore, the position seems to me to be justified that Darwin articulates in an outstanding example, without developing the underlying principle, when he mentions that, with increasing age, people's handwriting sometimes comes to resemble that of their father. The basis for this lies in the thought that inherited acquired characteristics of ancestors, instead of reestablishing themselves after youth and adolescence, can be suppressed by means of shaping influences of the outside world on impressionable youth still capable of assimilation, and not until ripe old age, when this interaction with the outside world has become less extensive, do they become more and more prevalent. Correspondingly, I believe I have observed that family characteristics in men, especially psychological ones, sometimes develop and appear more and more in old age, after they have been suppressed by pedagogical influences outside the family."

89. inequality] Ungleichheit {This could also be "dissimilarity."}

91. Processes . . . fructification.] Cf. ibid., 79; in places copied word for word.

660 NOTES TO PAGES 245-258

92. The... stimulus.] Cf. ibid., 81: "in the process of which the more reactive substance took on relatively more stimuli."

96. forms] Arten

98. are not superfluously "prudent":] überflüssiger Weise "klug" ist:

99. itis our custom] bei uns {In German this can refer to national, regional, or ethnic customs and practices.}

100. Public-spiritedness] Gemeinsucht {This appears to be N's coinage, occurring only in this notebook.}

101. Great men] Große Menschen {translated here in deference to the "great man" theory of N's time; cf. Thomas Carlyle, Heroes,

Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History (London: Fraser, 1841), 47:

"The History of the world is but the Biography of great men"}.
 102. un-noble] unnoble
 103. to those who have ears to hear it.] {Cf. Matthew 11:15, Mark 4:9.}
 104. {Cf. 7[47, 58, 62]; 8[26]; 24[16, 27].}
 105. advantage and ulterior advantage] Nutzen und Hinter-nutzen
 106. Mainländer] Philipp Mainländer, Die Philosophie der Er-lösung ("The philosophy of redemption"), and ed. (Berlin: Grieben,} 1876),
 107. "the gleam . . . themselves." {Cf. ibid., 65.}
 108. "comparable... temperaments") {Cf. ibid., 58.}
 109. {This list of qualities is copied from ibid., 57-58.}
 110. {Cf. ibid., 59, for these modifications.}
 ui. Cf. note to 7[17].
 112. debate] Kampf {Usually translated as "struggle".
 113. "The condition . . . limb." {Citation from Ernst Heinrich Weber, Untersuchungen über den Erregungsprozess im Muskel- und Nervensystem ("Investigations of the process of stimulation in the muscle and nervous system") (Leipzig, 1870). Cf. Michael Foster, Lehrbuch der Physiologie, trans. Nicolaus Kleinberg (Heidelberg: Winter, 1881), 502; originally published as A Textbook of Physiology (London: Macmillan, 1877), 413: "And in all the movements of our body we are conscious, even to an astonishingly accurate degree, as is well seen in the discussions concerning vision, of the amount of the contraction to which we are putting our muscles. In some way or other we are made aware of what particular muscles or groups of muscles are being thrown into action, and to what extent that action is being carried." (It should be noted that Kleinberg's German translation differs significantly from Foster's English text.)

Foster draws heavily upon Weber's work.}

114. Cold... Weber)] {Cf. Foster, Lehrbuch der Physiologie, 499; A Textbook of Physiology, 410: "And Weber has pointed out that cold bodies feel heavier than hot bodies of the same weight."} us. When 2... skin.] {Cf. Foster, Lehrbuch der Physiologie, 497; A Textbook of Physiology, 409: "When two sensations follow each other in the same spot at a sufficiently short interval they are fused into one; ... When sensations are generated at points of the skin too close together they become fused into one."}

116. {Cf. Mainländer, Die Philosophie der Erlösung, 60-62.}

117. "which call... solitude"] {Cf. Ralph Waldo Emerson, Versuche (Essays), trans. G. Fabricius (Hanover: Carl Meyer, 1858),

393. NL. Originally published in English as The Collected Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson, vol. 3: Essays, Second Series (Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1983), 100.}

118. "these delights . . . sober."} {Cf. Emerson, Versuche, 392; Essays,

Second Series, 100. The full sentence, which Nietzsche truncates, reads in the original "These enchantments are medicinal, they sober and heal us."}

119. {Cf. WP 941.}

120. everlasting] das Unvergängliche {Probably a reference to the conclusion of Goethe's Faust II.}

121. {WP 61}

122. {Cf. Gustav Teichmüller, Die wirkliche und die scheinbare

Welt: Neue Grundlegung der Metaphysik ("The real and the apparent world: New groundwork of metaphysics") (Breslau: Koebner, 1882), 204.}

123. {Cf. Emerson, Versuche, 410; Essays, Second Series, 112:

"To the intelligent, nature converts itself into a vast

- promise."}
124. {Cf. Schmidt, Die Ethik der alten Griechen, 1:232.}
- 662 NOTES TO PAGES 263-268
125. the work of the gods] Werk der Götter {The verb is omitted.}
127. {Cf. Schmidt, Die Ethik der alten Griechen, 1:168ff.}
128. {Cf. ibid., 170.}
129. {Cf. ibid., 267-68; 26Qç = surfeit; Üßgtg = hubris}
130. {Cf. ibid., 261.}
31. {Cf. ibid., 260.}
132. {Cf. Homer, Miad 18.107-110.}
133. {Cf. Schmidt, Die Ethik der alten Griechen, 266.}
134. {Cf. ibid., 281.}
135. {Cf. ibid.}
136. {WP 758.}
137. otium] "leisure"
138. feeling] Empfindung {This could also be "perception."}
139. {Cf. Schmidt, Die Ethik der alten Griechen, 274.}
141. {Cf. Karl Semper, Die natürlichen Existenzbedingungen der Thiere ("The natural conditions of existence of animals"), 2 vols. (Leipzig: Brockhaus, 1880), 1:18-19, 236-37, 241-42, 218-19; 2:222-23, 257. NL}
142. the creator] die Schöpferin {N uses the term Schöpferin ("female creator"), which refers back to the feminine noun Sympathie ("sympathy").}
143. {Cf. Alfred Espinas, Die tierischen Gesellschaften: Eine vergleichend-psychologische Untersuchung ("Animal societies: A comparative-psychological examination"), trans. W. Schlosser (Braunschweig: Vieweg, 1879), 367-68. NL.}
144. {Cf. Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins, 591.}
145. {Cf. Roux, Der Kampf der Theile im Organismus, 37.}
146. {Cf. Leon Dumont, Vergnügen und Schmerz: Zur Lehre von den Gefühlen ("Pleasure and pain: On the doctrine of the feelings") (Leipzig: Brockhaus, 1876), 30-31. NL.}
147. {Cf. Schmidt, Die Ethik der alten Griechen, 269.}
148. {Cf. Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins, chap. 1.}
149. competition] Kampf
- NOTES TO PAGES 268-274 663
150. {Cf. Schmidt, Die Ethik der alten Griechen, 2:273.}

151. {Cf. ibid., 274.}
 152. {Cf. ibid., 342.}
 153. {Cf. ibid., 353.}
 154. {Cf. ibid., 358.}
 155. {CA ibid., 357.}
 156. {Cf. ibid.}
 157. {Cf. ibid., 361.}
 158. {Cf. ibid., 362.}
 159. {Cf. Roux, Der Kampf der Theile im Organismus, 96-97.}
 160. {Cf. ibid., 98.}
 161. {Cf. ibid., 102.}
 162. {Cf. ibid., 110.}
 163. {Cf. ibid.; altered quote.}
 164. open-mindedness] Freisinnigkeit
 165. {Cf. ibid., 149.}
 166. {Cf. ibid., 151.}
 167. Georg Heinrich Schneider, Der thierische Wille: Systematische Darstellung und Erklärung der thierischen Triebe und deren Entstehung, Entwicklung und Verbreitung im Thierreiche als Grundlage zu einer vergleichenden Willenslehre ("The animal will: Systematic description and analysis of the animal drives and their emergence, development, and distribution in the animal world as the basis of a comparative study of the will") (Leipzig{: Abel} 1880), 29. NZ. In the passage cited by N, Schneider gives a definition of the rudimentary organs as no longer functional; they "once had a purpose": this is true – according to N in this fragment and in other passages – of "evil people."
 168. a person's ability to know absolutely (be known absolutely)] an der absoluten Erkenntniß (Erkantheit)
 170. {Cf. Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins, Sf.}
 171. {Cf. ibid., 6off.}
 174. @Qdvnoaic] "practical wisdom"
- 664 NOTES TO PAGES 274-280
176. {Cf. ibid., sff.}

180. confidently expect a lot of ourselves] von uns viel versprechen können {N is playing with different meanings of the verb versprechen}

183. {Cf. ibid., 39.}

184. {Cf. Arthur Schopenhauer, Sämtliche Werke, vol. 3: Der Welt als Wille und Vorstellung, vol. 2, ed. Julius Frauenstadt (Leipzig: F. A. Brockhaus, 1877), 731. NL. Translated in English by Judith Norman, Alistair Welchman, and Christopher Janaway as The World as Will and Representation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2017), 652.}

185. {Schopenhauer, Parerga and Paralipomena 2, §172, cited in Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins, 43.}

187. Cf. Teichmüller, Die wirkliche und die scheinbare Welt, {82-83}.

188. Concerning a critique of Hartmann's Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins.

189. {Cf. Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins, 26.}

190. facta] "facts"

191. {WP 698}

192. sull'indole del piacere e del dolore)] "On the Nature of Pleasure and Pain"

193. il solo principio . . . essere positivo.] {"the only moving principle of man is pain. Pain precedes every pleasure[.] Pleasure is not a positive state." Cf. Dumont, Vergnügen und Schmerz, 35-36. Kant notes this endorsement of the Milanese philosopher Count Pietro Verri (1728-97), whose words he paraphrases, in §58 of Anthropology from a Pragmatic Point of View. Kant was familiar with Verri's work Idee sull'indole del piacere (1774) in its German translation by Christoph Meiners, Gedanken über die Natur des Vergnügens ("Thoughts on the nature of pleasure") (Leipzig: Weygand, 1777).}

NOTES TO PAGES 280-288 665

194. chronic] wiederkehrender {Cf. Dumont, Vergnügen und Schmerz, 36.}

195. {Cf. ibid., 37.}

196. {Cf. ibid., 32.}

197. {Cf. Schneider, Der thierische Wille, 58.}

198. On the concept "Jesuitism," cf. Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins, 567-69, {645-48}.

200. {Cf. 16[41].}

202. robs] beraubt {N added a period after beraubt and then continues with its genitive objects.}

203. noblest] höchsten {In most cases, we translate the adjective höchst as "supreme." Here we prefer "noblest" to reflect English usage with "end."}

206. {Cf. ibid.}

207. Cf. Post, Bausteine für eine allgemeine Rechtswissenschaft,

1:201.

208. {Cf. ibid., 214.}

210. center of gravity] Schwergewicht

213. voluntary] willkürlich

Waldo Emerson, vol. 2: Essays, First Series (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1979), 78: "There is less intention in history than we ascribe to it."

219. Cf. Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins, 599.

666 NOTES TO PAGES 289-290

[8 = Mp XVII 1a.]

L {Cf. Gustav Klemm, Allgemeine Cultur-Geschichte der Mensch-

heit, Band 4: Die Urzustände der Berg- und Wüstenvölker der activen Menschheit und deren Verbreitung über die Erde ("Universal cultural history of humanity, vol. 4: The primordial states of the nomadic mountain and desert peoples and their expansion over the earth")

(Leipzig: B. G. Teubner, 1845), 370.}

2. {Cf. Oscar Peschel, Völkerkunde ("Ethnology") (Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot, 1874): 176-77.}

3. {Cf. Gustav Klemm, Allgemeine Cultur-Geschichte der Menschheit, Band 6: China und Japan (Leipzig; B. G. Teubner, 1847), 130-31.}

4. {Cf. Peschel, Völkerkunde, 454.}

5. {Cf. John Lubbock, Die Entstehung der Zivilisation und der Urzustand des Menschengeschlechtes, erläutert durch das innere und äußere Leben der Wilden, trans. A. Passow (Jena: H. Costenoble, 1875), 15-16. NL. Originally published as The Origin of Civilization and the Primitive Condition of Man: Mental and Social Condition of Savages, 3rd ed. (London: Longmans, Green, 1875.)}

6. The Siamese... rice.] {Cf. David Kaltbrunner, Der Beobachter: Allgemeine Anleitung zu Beobachtungen über Land und Leute für Touristen, Exkursionisten, und Forschungsreisende ("The observer: General guide for tourists, hikers, and researchers on making observations about a land and its people") (Zurich: J. Wurster, 1881), 676-78. NL.}

7. -justas... mist] {Cf. James Bell Pettigrew, Die Ortsbewegung der Thiere: Nebst Bemerkungen über Luftschiffahrt (Leipzig: Brockhaus, 1875), 8; originally published as Animal Locomotion: or Walking, Swimming and Flying, with a Dissertation on Aeronautics (London: Henry S. King, 1873).}

8. -justas... its wings)] {Cf. ibid., 177.}

9. {Cf. 16[63, 83], 18[3], 20[3, 16], 21[1, 2], 23[9].} Die Ortsbewegung der Thiere, 7{f.}.
u. Cf. GM III 17.

12. {Cf. William Shakespeare, Was ihr wollt, trans. August Wilhelm von Schlegel, in Shakespeares dramatische Werke in 9 Bänden, vol. 4, trans. August Wilhelm von Schlegel und Ludwig Tieck (Berlin:

NOTES TO PAGES 290-293 667

Georg Reimer, 1854), act 1, scene 3, 133. NL. N cites the standard German translation and refers to "Sir Andrew Aguecheek" by his character name in the Schlegel-Tieck translation: "Junker Christoph."

14. {Many of N's notes here and in the remainder of this notebook can be traced to his reading of Albert Hermann Post, Bausteine für eine allgemeine Rechtswissenschaft auf vergleichend-ethnologischer Basis ("Building blocks for a general jurisprudence on a comparative-ethnological basis"), vol. 1 (Oldenburg: Schulz, 1880); vol. 2 (Oldenburg: Schulz, 1881). NZ.}

15. {Cf. ibid., 1:191.}

16. {Cf. ibid., 1:58, 73-74, 77, 81, 82, 85, 92-98, 103, 104, 108-

13, 122-243 2:37-38, 46-47, 55.}

17. jus primae noctis] "the right of the first night" {Often referred to by medievalists writing in English as the "droit du seigneur."

It refers to the putative right of the lord to sleep with any peasant bride on her wedding night.}

18. young females] Weibchen {This is the standard German term for the female of the species in animals.}

19. in our culture] bei uns

20. separatio quoad thorum et mensam] "separation from bed and table" {An ecclesiastical decree that allowed husband and wife to live separate lives without annulling the marital bond.}

21. noAig] "polis," i.e., "city-state"

22. {Cf. Post, Bausteine für eine allgemeine Rechtswissenschaft, 2:55.}

23. even old Don Quixote!] noch der Don Quixote! {We provide an equivalent for N's use of the definite article with a proper name, associated in German with provincial or dialect usage.}

24. {Cf. Post, Bausteine für eine allgemeine Rechtswis-senschaft,

 2:76-77, 88, 119-21, 217.}

25. blood debts] Blutgeld {The traditional English term for Blutgeld is the Old English term "wergild," or literally, "man-money," the amount of compensation paid by a person committing an offense to the injured party. We translate it as "blood debt" to make the term accessible to modern readers and to distinguish it from "blood money," which has a different sense.}

668 NOTES TO PAGES 294-302

Die thierischen Gesellschaften: Eine vergleichend-psychologische Untersuchung ("Animal societies: A comparative-psychological investigation"), trans. W. Schloesser (Braunschweig: Vieweg, 1879), 525-27. NL. Originally published in French as Des sociétés animales: Etude de psychologie comparée, and ed. (Paris: Bailliere, 1878).}

34. {WP 771}

35. sacrificio dell'intelletto] "sacrifice of the intellect" {N underlines sacrificio}.

36. what is there, still so good] das Vorhandene noch so gute {N places two phrases here side by side, with the probable meaning of "no matter how good."}

38. {N's page references here and below are to Leopold Schmidt, Die Ethik der alten Griechen ("The ethics of the ancient Greeks"), vol. 2 (Berlin: Verlag von Wilhelm Hertz [Bessersche Buchhandlung], 1882). NL.}

39. refuted] gefälscht.

40. {On Baltasar Gracián, cf. N's letter to Heinrich Köselitz of 20 September 1884, KGB III:1, 535.}

42. they] man {A better rendering than "we" here, because N is referring to all Greeks.}

43. yv@di oavtónj "know thyself"

44. subtext] Hintergedanken {See Grimm 10, 1503.}

45. modove . . . Xivaioa.] "Plato in front, Plato in back, Chi-maera in the middle." Paraphrase of Jad 6.181, where the chimaera is described as "lion-fronted and snake behind, a goat in the middle." Cf. BG E 190.

NOTES TO PAGES 303-309 669

46.

47.

48. 49.

50.

SI.

52. 53. 54. 55. 56.

{WP 787}

{Cf. 7[7] and corresponding note.}

{WP 372.}

good people] Heading added in the summer of 1888.

{WP 418.}

{WP 574; cf. BGE Preface, 16, 17, 54.}

Cf. 7[268].

{Cf. 7[7] and corresponding note.} {Cf. 16[33].}

{Cf. 7[47, 58, 62, 125]; 24[16, 27].}

{WP 10.}

9 =NVL.)

I.

Collection of sayings and turns of phrase related to Z II;
for the most part adopted in 13[1].

8. 9.

{Cf. 12[43]; 13f]_373; 13[9].}

{Cf. 13[1]_373.}

{Cf. 13[1]_373.} {Cf. 13[1]_374.} {Cf. 13[1]_374.}

. I you and he.] Ich Du und Er {N capitalizes the pronouns
here.}

{Cf. 13[1] 371); 13[11]; 16[4]; 22[1]_548.}

{Cf. 13[1]_372.}

Cf. Z II "The Prophet"; {cf. 13[1]_373.}

snored] röchelte {Röcheln, to snore, to wheeze, to snuffle, has connotations of a death rattle.}

12. 13. 14. 15. 16. 17.

13[1]_380; 16

18.

19.

Arrangement of ZI.

As in 9l1]; {cf. 13[1]_380}.

to convert to my cause] euch zu mir bekehren

"Party liner] "Mensch der Partei" surge] Brandung {As in the sense of surf or the ocean; cf. 7); 22[1]_550.}

1]{_396; 13[6]}; Z II "On Virtuous People."

1){_376}; Z II "The Child with the Mirror."

1){_376; 13[12]}.

Cf. 13 Cf. 13 Cf. 13

670 NOTES TO PAGES 310-316

21. Cf. Z II "On Virtuous People."

25. {Cf. 13[1]_378.}

27. {Cf. 13[1]_389, 13[12]; 16[7].}

28. bark] Kahn {A larger, open river- or sea-going vessel, usually with one mast, used for cargo on rivers or in coastal trade; in Nalso a general term for sea-going vessel.}

29. {Cf. 13[1]_389; 16[7]; 22[1]_550.}

30. {Cf. 13[1]_389; 16[7]; 22[1]_550.}

32. {Cf. 13[1]_390; 16[7]; 22[1]_549.}

33. {Cf. 9[18]; 13[1]_389.}

36. {Cf. 13[1]_393; 13[8]; 16[7]; 22[1]_549.}

38. Lavie... qui pense.] "Life is a tragedy for those who feel, and a comedy for those who think." {The line "The world is a comedy to those that think; a tragedy to those that feel" appears often in Walpole's letters; the line "La vie est une tragédie pour ceux qui sentent, et une comédie pour ceux qui pensent" is also attributed to Jean de la Bruyère.}

40. removing mountains] Berge versetzen {An allusion to Paul's words on love from 1 Corinthians 13:2.}

43. grace] Anmuth

48. {Cf. BGE 260.}

NOTES TO PAGES 316-323 671

so. Cf. 13[2].

54. they shoot off their mouths; we are supposed to think that this is out of the abundance of their hearts.] sie nehmen den Mund voll; man soll meinen, das Herz gehe ihnen über. {N is playing off the biblical passage in Matthew 12:34, "for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," which Luther translates as "Wes das Herz voll ist, des geht der Mund über." In substituting the idiom den Mund vollnehmen, meaning "to shoot off one's mouth," N puts the hypocrisy in the worst possible light. Luther was particularly proud of this translation, and cites it in his 1530 Open Letter on Translating}

ss. {Cf. 12[42]; 13[20].}

56. {Cf. 13[1]_372; 16[4]; 22[1]_549.}

60. {Cf. 3l1] 49; 12[1] 119; 12[42, 43]; 13[6].}

61. Individuum est aliquid novum] "The individual is something new"

62. {The addition of the definite article is needed to render the clarity of N's German.}

63. {Cf. 12[42].}

67. Nacht ist es – nun reden lauter alle springenden Brunnen – und auch du, meine Seele bist ein springender Brunnen.
 Nacht ist es – nun erst erwachen alle Lieder der Liebenden.
 Und auch du, meine Seele, bist das Lied eines Liebenden.

672 NOTES TO PAGES 324-330

68. knowledge] Wissen

70. {Cf. Daniel Darc, Petit bréviaire du Parisien (Paris: Paul Ollendorff, 1883). N misspells Ollendorff's name.}

[10 = N VI.]

Cf. 13[3]{_402}. . Cf. 13[3] {404}.

Key terms in Z II (from earlier fragments).

. {Cf. 16[90].}

my I] mein Ich {The I is the subject of the sentence doing the dreaming. Cf. 10[10].}

7. hound of hell] Höllenhund {See the Translators' Afterword,

740-41, on the translation of Höllenhund.}

8. {Cf. 13[3]_400.}

u. Cf. 13[3]{_405; 10[41]; 13[17, 25]}.

12. {Cf. 10[35]; 17156]; 22[1]_552.}

15. the Corsican] {Napoleon}

18. {An allusion to Kant; cf. 10[40]; 13[24, 27]; 16[84]; 21[3].}

20. aging virgins] alter Mädchen {The term for "old maid" was alte Jungfer in N's time, which survives in modern German. Cf. Flügel ss1.}

DD "Amidst Birds of Prey."}

24. {Cf. 9[15]; 13[1]_372.}

25. Cf. 13[78]; {5[1] 213, 214; 12[1] 171; 12[13, 14]; 13[1]_375; allu- sion to the end of Goethe's Faust II, lines 12104-5}. Rwhre sn

NOTES TO PAGES 330-337 673

26. Cf. 13[1]{_377}.

29. Cf. 13[18]; 12[43].

35. your neck is too stiff] zu gerade im Rücken sein

38. Twilight of the gods] Götterdämmer {Not Götterdämmerung, which would be the title of the fourth and final opera in Wagner's Der Ring des Nibelungen.}

41. {Cf. 13[3]_407.}

42. Cf. Z II "The Tomb Song"; "The Stillest Hour"; {cf. 10[8]; 17[56]; 22[1]_552}.

43. word] Wort {We keep this in the singular in order to reflect "word" in the sense of John 1:1.}

48. Those who speak freely] Freisprecher {N could also be referring to acts of exoneration, but the context of the list indicates otherwise.}

II); fragments 10[46, 47] are also included.

52. {Cf. 16[4].}

674 NOTES TO PAGES 338-343

[11 =N VI)]

L Arrangement of Z II.

2. What is... vanity.] Cf. 12[44]; Z II "On Human Prudence."

3. Cf. Z II "The Child with the Mirror."

4. {Cf. 3l1} 245; 4[165]; 18[43, 49, 56]; 21[6]; 24[16].}

5. {Cf. 9[48]; 18[55].}

. Refers to a third part of Z (immediately following or during the writing of Z II).

7. {Cf. 22[1]_558.}

8. Cf. BGE 83.

9. Arrangement of Z II. . Cf. 13[r]. . Cf. 13[13]. . Arrangement of Z II. . Arrangement of Z II.

NY

a)

D HM ©

= w

{12 = Z,}

1. Published for the first time as an annual issue (1975/76) for "Authors and Friends of the House of De Gruyter." Collection of sayings from HAH, MM, WS, D, and JS, as well as from earlier notebooks from the period 1882/83; with emendations and changes; used for Z II, II, IV, BGE. {In an effort to follow the editorial decision to maintain translation consistency across the CW volumes, we have used the language of the already published translations by Gary Handwerk of HAH, MM, and WS, by Brittain Smith of D, and by Adrian Del Caro of BGE, making changes only where we deemed it necessary in order to maintain consistency with our global translation decisions.}

2. {Cf. HAH 482.}

3. {Cf. HAH 483.}

4. {Cf. HAH 494.}

5. {Cf. HAH 498.}

6. {Cf. HAH 504.}

7. {Cf. HAH 506.}

8. {Cf. HAH 508.}

9. {Cf. HAH sis.}

10. {Cf. HAH 514.}

NOTES TO PAGES 343–346

II.

12. 13. 14. 15. 16. 17. 18.

19.

20. . {Cf. HAH 320.} . {Cf. HAH 308} . {Cf. HAH 301} . {Cf. HAH 295.}

{Cf. HAH 529.} {Cf. HAH 544.} {Cf. HAH 564.} {Cf. HAH 310.}

{Cf. HAH 582.} {Cf. HAH 580.} {Cf. HAH 575.} {Cf. HAH 402.}

{Cf. HAH 391.} {Cf. HAH 388.}

{Cf. MM 6}

. {Cf. MM 406.} . {Cf. MM 402.} . {Cf. MM 390.} . {Cf. MM 378} . {Cf. MM 381.}

. {Cf. MM 368.} . {Cf. MM 362.} . {Ch MM 357.}

. spirit] Geist {This could also be understood as "mind."}
 . {Cf MM 353.} . {Cf. MM 348.} . {Cf. MM 341.}
 . {Cf. MM 313; John 12:14.}
 . {Cf. MM 309.} . {Cf MM 274.} . {Cf. MM 267} . {Cf. MM 255.}
 . {Cf. MM 240} . {Cf. MM 202.}
 {Cf. MM 168.}
 . {See note 34 above.} . {Cf. MM 160.} 675
 NOTES TO PAGES 346-348
 . {Cf. MM 136.} . {Cf MM 140.} . {Cf. MM 128.} . {Cf. MM
 120.4} . {Cf. MM 34.}
 . {Cf MM 36}
 . {Cf. MM 65.}
 . {Cf. 3[1] 341; 5[35]; 13[12].}
 . {Cf MM 773} . {Cf. MM 82.} . {Cf. WS 340.} . {Cf. WS 335.}
 . {CE WS 325.}
 . {Cf. WS 290.}
 62. {Cf WS 240.}
 64
 . {Cf WS 254.}
 . {Cf. WS 18. N here alludes to a saying of Diogenes the Cynic;
 cf. Diogenes Laertius, Lives of Eminent Philosophers 6.2, 6, 41.}
 65.
 74 dum
 75: 76.
 {Cf. WS 55.} . {Cf. WS 120.}
 . {Cf. HAH 83.}
 . {Cf. HAH 76} . {Cf. HAH 66}
 . {Cf HAH 186.}
 . {Cf. HAH 187}
 . {Cf. HAH 560; cf. Matthew 25:14-30.}
 . {Cf. HAH 568}
 . "Should . . . into it." "Soll das Band nicht reifen – mußt
 al drauf beißen." {Cf. 1[97]; 3i] 51; BGE 140.}
 77. {Cf. D 557}
 78. 79. 80.
 81.
 {Cf. D 380.} . {Cf D 391.} . {Cf. D 299.} . {Cf D 249.} .
 {Cf. D 208.} . {Cf. D 185.} . {Cf. 301] 444.} . {Cf. 3[1]
 404.} . {Cf. 3l1 . {Ch 3i
 . {Cf. 301] 349; 13l16]; 1

. {Cf 3l1} 356.} . Women] Frauen . {Cf. 1[50]; 3[1] 351.} .
 {Cf. 3l1} 336.} . {Cf. 3[1] 3425 5[35].} . {Cf. 3[1] 338.}
 Tu
 . {Cf 3[1] 264; BGE 73}
 . {Cf 3[1] 270; BGE 73a.
 . {Cf. 3l1} 273; 13[8]; 1
 . {Cf 3[1] 249; BGE 101.
 . {Cf. BI] 243}; 13l16);
 BGE 99.}
 106. {Cf. 3[1] 251.}
 107. {Cf. 13[16], JS 214.}
 }]; } 16
 . {Cf. 3[1] 287; 4142, 200}; 677
 422; 22[3]_569; BGE 166.}
 394; 12[1] 89; 13[8].} 6[7]; BGE 1169.}
 13[19].}
 6[7]; CW 15, 31[36]; 32[9].}
 [7]; 23[5]; CW 1s, 31[35, 36]; 3210];
 108. {Cf. 3[1] 202; BGE 162; the wordplay is between Nächster,
 Jesus's designation for a fellow human being, and, in the latter two, Nachbar, the term for someone living in close proximity.}
 {Cf. 3[1] 206.}
 {Cf. 3[1] 170; 13[8].} {Cf. 3[1] 138}
 {Cf. 30] 141; BGE 170.} {Cf. 301] 139; 31] 393.} {Cf. 3[1]
 139.}
 {Cf. 301] 122; s[17].} {Cf. 3l1} 77}
 III.
 112. 113. 114.
 678
 NOTES TO PAGES 351-354
 117. grab us by the scruff of the neck] am Schopfe fassen
 {Cf. 3[1]
 86; BGE 179}
 118. 119.
 122.
 123. 12
 {Cf. 2[41]; 3[1] 66; CW 15, 3152]; 32[9].}
 {Cf. 1[49], 3[1] 474
 {Cf BGE 141}
 {Cf. 30] 44.}
 {Cf. 3[1] 38; 22[3]_563.}

{Cf. 3[1] 49; 9[48]; 12[42, 43]; 1316].}

4. superior qualities . . . base qualities] das Hohe . . .
 dessen
 Niedriges {Cf. 1[92].}

125.
 126.
 127.
 128. 129. 130.
 131. 132. 133.
 134.
 {Cf. GM II x} {Cf. 4[53].} {Cf. 4[56].}
 dulce] "sweet" {Cf. 4[59] and note 70 in Nb 4 on Horace's Ars poetica.
 "sweetening things."}

136. 137.
 {Cf. 13[6]; 16[7].}
 {Cf. 4[64]; N is playing with the distinction between gerecht
 (just) and gerächt (avenged).}

138. 139.
 140. 141. 142. 143. 144. 145. 146. 147. 148.
 {Cf. 3[1] 389.}
 {Cf. 3[1] 217.}
 {Cf. sii]; 13[8]; BGE 81.}
 {Cf. 4[58].}
 {Cf. 3[9].}
 {Cf. 5[1] 20.}
 {Cf. 3[1] 3473 5133, 35]; BGE 183.}
 {Cf. 25[301].}
 {Cf. 3[1] 414.}
 {Cf. 3[1] 300; 13[14].}
 {Cf. 1[59]; 3i] 13; 4[226]; 13[14]; 16[7].}

NOTES TO PAGES 354-357 679

149. {Cf. 3[1] 328; 13[14]; 16[7].}
 150. {Cf. 3[1] 415}
 151. {Cf. 3[1] 234.}
 152. {Cf. 4[112]; si] 5.}
 153. {Cf. 4[131].}
 154. {
 156. {Cf. si] 193.}
 157. {Cf. 13[10]; D 48.}
 158. {Cf. 3[1] 260.}
 159. error veritate simplicior] "error is simpler than truth" {Cf.
 D 168.}

160. Ubi pater sum, ibi patria.] "Wherever I am father,

there is the fatherland." {Reworking of the Latin expression ubi panis, ibi patria (where there is bread, there is [my] country).}
161. {Cf. D 235.}
162. Here where we live] Bei uns {This idiom locates the action
or experience within a country, a region, or a community.}
163. {Cf. D 236.}
164. {Cf. D 535.}
165. {Cf. D 537.}
166. {Cf. {5[1] 213, 214; 10[17, 24]; 12[13, 14]; 13[1]_375;
13[18]; cf.
lines 12104-11 of Goethe's Faust II.}
167. {Cf. MM 325.}
168. {Cf. WS 131.}
169. {Cf. WS 132.}
170. {Cf. 3[1] 392.}
171. {Cf. 3[1] 402.}
172. {Cf. 3[1] 411}
173. {Cf. si] 554
174. {Cf. 1[5]; si] 60.}
175. {Cf. 2[r]; si] 109.}
176. {Cf. 3l1] 167.}
177. {Cf. 4[71]; sla) 14.}
178. {Cf. 3[1] 300.}
179. {Cf. 3[1] 94; BGE 150.}
180. {Cf. 1[85].}
680 NOTES TO PAGES 358-366
181. {Cf. 1[87, 108]; 5[1] 62; BGE 114.}
182. {Cf. 4[40]; s[1] 83.}
183. {Cf. 51] 112; BGE 118.}
184. {Cf. 4[77]; sh] 123.}
185. {Cf. 4[87].}
186. advocate] Anwalt
187. {Cf. 41199]; sl1] 264.}
188. {Cf. 3[1] 51, 60; 1[34, 79, 80]; 4144); sl1] 46.}
CW is, 31[6, 9].
t
[e]
193. {Cf. 4[160]; sl] 247; 13[17]; Isaiah 40:4.}
196. Cf. s[1] 234; Z II "On Those Who Are Sublime."
200. Cf. sl1] 213, 214; 13[1]{_375; 10l]; 12[1] 171}.
205. peach] Apfel {We switched the fruit (from "apple") in order preserve the wordplay with "fuzz."}

208. effect at a distance] {This is N's translation of actio in distans; cf. JS 60.}

209. the arc of the motion] Bewegungskurve

211. secondary manifestation] Nebenäußerung

(1786-1826), first performed 25 October 1823 in Vienna}

NOTES TO PAGES 367-373 681

214. {Cf. 3[1] 49; 9[48]; 12[1] 119; 12[43]; 13[6].}

215. {Cf. 9[48].}

216. Collection of fragments, used mostly for Z II "On Taran-tulas"; cf. 13[1] as well.

217. {Cf. 3[1] 39; 9[48]; 12[1] 119; 12[42]; 13[6].}

218. {Cf. ol}; 13[1]_3685 13[9].} 219. {Cf. 13[1]_375.} 220.

{Cf. 13[1]_379.} 221. {Cf. 13[1]_379.} 222. {Cf. 13[1]_379.}

223. {Cf. 13[1]_383.} 224. {Cf. 13[1]_382.} 225. {Cf. 9[17];

13[1]_390.}

226. {Cf. 13[1]_397; 16[7]; 17[48]; 23[5]; 22[1]_553.}

227. {Cf. 10[21].}

13=Z.

1. Collection of sayings and turns of phrase for the most part from Notebook 9 (N VI 2), and in part from Notebook 10 (N VI 3); enhanced by emendations; used for Z II and early drafts 13[6-9, I, 12, 14-19].

. {Cf. 9[14, 36, 56]; 13[20].}

. {Cf. oft.}

. {Cf. o[14].}

. {Cf. ofa}; 13[11]; 16[4]; 22[1] _375}

{Cf 9 l}

{Cf. i}

. {Cf. 9[45].}

. {Cf 12l14.}

u. {Cf olis, 45}; 10[17]; 16[4].}

12. {Cf. 9[49]}

13. {Cf. 9[3].}

14. {Cf. 9[13]; 13[1]_375; 12l11.}

15. [CA 16[4]; 22[1].}

16. {Cf. 9[46].}

Peyarayp

>] 0

682 NOTES TO PAGES 373-378

17. {Cf. ol1}; 12[43]; 13[9].} 18. {Cf. ol1.} 19. {Cf.

ol1.} 20. {Cf. 9l1.}

21. "Black on White"] {Probably a reference to a game similar to mahjong.}

22. queen] Herrin {Herrin = "mistress," but this meaning in English is now obsolete, so we have opted for a different term for a female figure of authority.}

23. {Cf. 10[38].}

24. {Cf. 9[1].}

25. {Cf. 9[1].}

26. {Cf. 13[8].}

27. mere woman] Weibchen

28. {Cf. Genesis 2: 21-27}

29. {Cf. 9[30]; 13[11].}

30. {Cf. 9[30].}

31. in the tree "Future"] auf dem Baume Zukunft {The quotation marks are not in the German but are inserted here to indicate N's suggestion that this is the name of the tree.}

32. {Cf. 9[30]; 12[43].}

33. {Cf. 9[30].}

34. {Cf. 10[23, 24]; 12[1] 171.}

35. floating around right now] jetzt in der Luft liegen

36. {Cf. gl₁₁; 13[12].}

37. {Cf. 9l₁₀.}

42. {Cf. 16[4]; 22[1]_376.}

43. {Cf. 16[4]; 22[1]_377.}

44. {Cf. 10[18].}

45. Every intellect... my intellect.] Aller Geist . . . mein Geist

{This could also be "spirit" or "mind."}

46. {Cf. 9[ro].}

47. {Cf. 9l₁₆.}

NOTES TO PAGES 378-385 683

48. {Cf. 13[7].}

49. {Cf. 16[4]; 22[1]_549.}

so. {Cf. 9[23]; 13[1]_386.}

st. {Cf. 16[4]; 22[1]_549.}

52. {Cf. 13[11].}

53. {Cf. 12[9, 43].}

54. {Cf. 16[7]; 22[1]_550.}

ss. {Cf. 13[12]; 16[7]; 22[1]_550.} 56. {Cf. 9[6].}

57. {Cf. 9[6].}

63. {Cf. 9[53].}

64. {Cf. 13[7].}

65. Via Appia] {The Appian Way was one of the first and most important Roman roads, stretching 350 miles from the Roman Forum to modern-day Brindisi. Cf. 9[4]; 13[20].}

66. {Cf. 13[11]; 16[7]; 17[158]; 22[1]_551.}

67. {Cf. 13[6].}

68. {Cf. 12[43].}

69. {Cf. 12[43].}

70. boat] Nachen {An open vessel, about the size of a gondola, propelled by oars or a longer oar, used for light cargo on rivers or for transporting passengers to ships at anchor; in a letter written
1 June 1859 (KGB I:1, 66) from his first year at Schulpforta to his childhood friend Wilhelm Pinder, N includes a poem in which he uses this term for the boat in which Charon transports
the dead to the Underworld.}

71. {Cf. 13[10, 14]; 16[7]; 22[1]_550.}

72. {Cf. 13[23].}

73. {Cf. 16[7]; 22[1].}

74. intellect . . . intellect.] Geist. . . Geist {This could also be rendered as "spirit."}

75. {Cf. 13[8].}

684

NOTES TO PAGES 385-392

76. son of man] Menschensohn {Reflects the standard biblical term.}

77- 78. 79.
. {Cf. 16[7]; 22[1]_549.} . {Cf. 4[210]; 5[9].}
. make better forecasts of human weather] daß sie die Wetterzeichen des Menschen besser reden machen

90 91. Acts 92 Tanz
. {Cf. 9[18].}
{Cf. 9[18]; 16[7]; 22[1]_550; a reference to Pentecost. See 2:3.}
. this gold dances leaps and crouches] es hebt und senkt sich der dieses Gold {Our paraphrase reflects the more extensive description in 9[18]; see also 16[7]; 22[1]_550.}

93. 94.
95.
96. 97.
98 99
{Cf. 9[18], 13[12]; 16[7].}

. {Cf. 9[19]; 13[18]; 16[7].}
100. {Cf. 9[19]; 16[7]; 22[1]_549.}
101. Did not cry out Nol] Riefen nicht Nein! {There is no subject
referent for the verb "Riefen."}
102. {Cf. 9[32].}
103. {Cf. 9[32].}
105. {Cf. 9 106. {Cf. 9
[104. {Cf. 9[32]
[
[
NOTES TO PAGES 392-403 685
107. 108. 109. . {Cf. olal].} . {Cf. 9f].}
. {Cf. 9[20]; 13[8]; 16[7]; 22[1]_549.}
{Cf. 9[31].} {Cf. 13[8].} {Cf. [21]; 13[8].}
{Cf. 13[7].}
. {Cf. 13[8].}
{Cf. 13[18].}
. {Cf. 16[7].}
{Cf. 16[7].}
dressing and disguises] Kleider und Verkleidung
{Cf. 16[7].}
. {Cf. olis].} . CA. ol]; 13[6].}
. driver and beater] Treiber und Dränger {Hunting terms that characterize the men who drive the hunted animals into a place where they may be killed.} 123.
{Cf. 12[43]; 16[7]; 17148]; 23[5]; 22[1]_553.}
124. {Cf. 16[7].}
126. Collection of sayings and turns of phrase, only some of which are from earlier notebooks (Notebook 10 = N VI 3 in particular); used sparingly for Z II.
127. 128. 129. 130.
131.
132. 133. 134.
135.
136. 137. 138. 139.
{Cf. 13[14]; 16[7].}
{CE£. 10[4]; 13[3]_4034}
{Cf. 13[18]; 16[7].}
686
140.
141.
142.

143.
 144.
 145.
 146.
 147.
 148. 149.
 150. 151. 152. 153. 154.
 {Cf. 10[4]; 13[3]_400.}
 {Cf. ro[r], 16[7].}
 ties up hearts until they shatter] die herzzerschnürende
 {Cf. 10[19]. [19].
 ICH. 10[23]
 [32].
 ICH. 10[33].}
 {Cf. 10[34].}
 binders and tamers] Binder und Bandiger {We read binden } } 4 } in the sense of "binding and loosing," the power given by God.)
 156. you should be given that] {N uses the idiom das soll
 man euch zu Ehren sagen, literally, "in all fairness, that should be said to you." Cf. 10[34].}
 157. 158. 159.
 160.
 161. buckets of love] händevoll Liebe
 {Cf. 10[25; 10[35].}
 {Cf. 16[7]; 22[1]_549.}
 Notused for Z.
 that those who create] das den Schaffenden {The verb is omitted; the inflection indicates that the worm is doing something to those who create.} fragments; {cf. 9[23]; 13[1]_387-88}.
 163.
 164.
 165.
 166.
 167.
 168. 169. 170.
 {Cf. 35] 49; 9[48]; 12[1] 119; 12[42]; 12[43].}
 (CA. 9[7]; 13[1]_397.)
 {Cf. note to 12[1] 135.}
 {Cf. 12[1] 133; 16[7].}

{Cf. 13[1]_382.}

Like note 162 above.

{Cf. 13[1]_3774}

{Cf. 13[1]_3785 22[1]_549.}

NOTES TO PAGES 410–414 687

171. {Cf. 13[1]_378.} 172. {Cf. 13[1]_382.}

173. {Cf. 13[1]_393.}

174. {Cf. 13[1]_393.}

175. {Cf. 4[176]; sl] 254; 5[22]; 12[5]; 16[7]; CW 15, 31[6, 9].}

176. {Cf. 13[3]_402.}

177. {Cf. 13[1]_398.}

179. {Cf. 13[1]_372.}

180. {Cf. 13[1]_374.}

181. {Cf. 13[1]_385.}

182. {Cf. 9[21]; 13[1]_393.}

183. {Cf. 9[20]; 13[1]_393; 16[7]; 22[1]_549.}

184. {Cf. 13[1]_394.}

185. {Cf. 13[1]_395.}

186. {Cf. 13[1]_392.}

187. {Cf. 5[r]; 12[1]_138; BGE 81.}

188. {Cf. 3[1]_170; 12[1]_106.}

189. {Cf. 3[1]_138 and corresponding note; 12[1]_107.}

190. {Cf. 3[l] 273; 12[1]_99; 16[7]; CW 15, 31[36]; 32[9].}

191. {Cf. 3[1]_394; 12[1]_89.}

192. {Cf. 475, 279]; 5[21].}

194. {Cf. 12[43]; 13[1]_373.}

195. {Cf. 10[22].}

196. {Cf. 13[1]_381].}

Overcoming."

198. {Cf. 12[1]_160.}

199. {Cf. 4167, 79].}

201. {Cf. 9[30]; 13[1]_375.}

202. {Cf. si] 227}

203. {Cf. 12[12].}

204. {Cf. 13[1]_397.}

205. {Cf. 13[1]_382; 16[7]; 17[58]; 22[1]_551-}

206. {Cf. 13[1]_379.}

688

207. 208. 209.

210. 211.

212. 213. 214. 215.

216. 217. 218. 219.

220.

221.

222.

223.
 224.
 225.
 226.
 227.
 228. 229.
 230. 231. 232. 233.
 234.
 235. 236. 237. 238. 239.
 240.
 241.
 242.
 {Cf. 9l]; 13[1] 373.}
 {Cf. ol]; 13[1]_3715 16[4]; 22[1].}
 {Cf. 13[1]_379.}
 Like note 162 above.
 {Cf. 13[1]_379; 16[7]; 22[1]_550.}
 {Cf. 9[24]; 13[1]_386.}
 {Cf. ol]: 3] 376].}
 {Cf. 9[23]; 13[1]_386.}
 {Cf. 9[18], 13[1] ; 16[7].}
 {Cf. 9[17]; 131] -390.}
 {Cf. 9[17]; 13[1]_390.}
 {Cf. 3[1] 80; 5[35]s 1201] 53.}
 Like note 162 above; {cf. 10[36]}.
 {Cf. 10[36].}
 {Cf. 13[]_387.}
 {Cf. 11[16].}
 Like note 162 above.
 {Cf. 13[1]_372.}
 {Cf. 13[1]_384; 13[10]; 16[7]; 22[1]_550.} {Cf. 13[3]; 16[7].}
 {Cf. 3[1] 300; 12[1] 146.}
 {Cf. 1[59] 3[1] 13; 4[226]; 12i] 147; 16[7].}
 {Cf. 3i] 328; 12i] 148; 16[7].}
 {Cf. 13[11]_377.}
 {Cf. 111s].}
 Like note 162 above; {cf. 9[24]; 13[1]_386}.
 {Cf. 3[1] 124; 5[1] 209; 12[15].}
 Like note 162 above.
 {Cf. 13[]_373.}
 {Cf. 13[1]_391.}
 {Cf. 10[38]; 13[1]_374.}
 {Cf. 10[38]; 13[1]_374-}
 {Cf. 12[1] 103.}
 {Cf. 3[1] 243; 12[1] 101; 16[7]; 23[5]; BGE 99.}

{Cf. 30] 349; 12[1] 90; 16[7]; BGE 169.}
 Like note 162 above; {cf. 13[1]_398}.
 {Cf. 13[1]_392.}
 NOTES TO PAGES 418-427 689
 244. {Cf. 4[160]; 5[1] 247; 12[6].}
 246. {Cf. 9[19]; 13[1]; 16[7].}
 247. {Cf. 13[1]_394.}
 248. {Cf. 13[3, 18]; 16[7].}
 249. {Cf. 3[1] 342; 12[1] 94.}
 250. old wives] alte Weiber {Translated here as "wives" because of the connection in English to "old wives' tales."}
 251. young and female] junge Weibchen
 252. {Cf. 10[1].}
 254. {Cf. 13[29, 31].}
 255. {Cf. 13[1]_382.}
 256. {Cf. 3[1] 287; 4[42, 200]; 12[1] 96.}
 258. {Cf. 9[32].}
 259. {Cf. 9[14, 36, 56]; 13[1]_396; 13[20].}
 260. {Cf. 9[4]; 13[1]_382.}
 ZU.
 Sicily.}
 265. {Cf. 13[1]_383.}
 690 NOTES TO PAGES 428-437
 [14 = M III 2b]
 1 Cf. 7[268].
 2. impetus] "passions" {This is the Latin plural, not our English translation.}
 [15 =N VIs]
 1. The writings of this notebook constitute an attempt that N
 abandoned to continue his Zarathustra work after the completion of Z II with a third and a fourth part; these writings were given little attention later during the writing of Z III.
 2. notto... of life!] {Cf. BGE 4.}
 4. {Cf. Sir Walter Scott, The Monastery: A Romance (1820)
 and
 The Abbot (1820), a sequel to The Monastery.
 5s. {Cf. Joseph Haller, Altspanische Sprichwörter und sprichwörtliche Redensarten aus den Zeiten vor Cervantes ("Old
 Spanish proverbs and proverbial phrases from the times before Cervantes") (Regensburg: Manz, 1883).}

6. {Cf. Wilhelm Leopold Colmar Freiherr von der Goltz, Das Volk in Waffen: Ein Buch über Heerwesen und Kriegführung unserer

Zeit ("The People in arms: A book on military affairs and warfare of our time") (Berlin: Decker, 1883). NL}

7. {Cf. 16[86]; 22[1]_546.}

8. {Cf. 22[1]_546.}

9. suspends... in favor] aufhebt

10. {Cf. 16[86].}

11. agon] "contest," "struggle"

12. ancestry] Herkunft

13. Emerson p. 237.] N refers to the following passage in Versuche (Essays), {trans. G. Fabricius (Hanover: Carl Meyer, 1858), NL; originally published in English as The Collected Works of

Ralph Waldo Emerson, vol. 2: Essays, First Series, ed. Alfred Riggs

Ferguson, Joseph Slater, and Jean Ferguson Carr (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1971), 190}: "The one thing which we seek with insatiable desire is to forget ourselves, to be surprised out of our propriety, to lose our sempiternal memory, and to do something without knowing how or why; in short, to draw

NOTES TO PAGES 437-440 691

a new circle. Nothing great was ever achieved without enthusiasm.

The way of life is wonderful: it is by abandonment. The great moments of history are the facilities of performance through the strength of ideas, as the works of genius and religion.

'A man, said Oliver Cromwell, 'never rises so high as when he knows not whither he is going.' Dreams and drunkenness, the use of opium and alcohol are the semblance and counterfeit of this oracular genius, and hence their dangerous attraction for men. For the like reason, they ask the aid of wild passions, as in gaming and war, to ape in some manner these flames and gen-

er-osities of the heart." {Although KSA 14 notes that the Cromwell
quote "was underlined by N," this is not in fact correct;
although the entire page was repeatedly highlighted, these particular lines are uniquely highlighted by seven marginal lines.} On Cromwell's quote, cf. SE 1, CW 2, 174.
14. then you must bring them up, bring them up to you! so mußt du erziehen, zu Dir hinauf ziehen! {N's wordplay is on erzie-hen, meaning "to raise" or "to educate."} 15. {These lines were copied by N from Wilhelm Leopold Colmar Freiherr von der Goltz, "Feldherren und Feldherrenthum" ("Field marshals and their domain"), Deutsche Rundschau 31 (April-June 1882): 378-402.}
16. rooted in the earth] wachse aus der Erde
17. {Cf. ibid., 390; said about Alexander}
18. {Cf. ibid., 399; the quote is from Thomas Carlyle, Geschichte
Friedrichs II: Von Preußen, genannt Friedrich der Große (History of Friedrich II of Prussia, Called Frederick the Great), first published in English in 1858 (the sentence quoted appears in vol. 4,
p. 168),
trans. J. Neuberger (Berlin: Verlag der Königlichen Geheimen Oberhofbuchdr., 1866), 178: "Ich will es vollbringen oder
ster-
ben!" ("I will achieve it or die!").} 19. {Cf. Goltz, "Feldherren und Feldherrenthum," 387; the quote is from Aristotle: "Der Zorn ist notwendig, ohne ihn triumphiert man in Nichts" ("Anger is necessary, without it
there is no victory"). Cf. Seneca, De ira ("On anger") 1.9.2: "Ira, inquit
Aristoteles, necessaria est, nec quidquam sine illa expugnari potest." English translation: "On Anger," in Seneca, *Moral
and
692 NOTES TO PAGES 440-441*
Political Essays, ed. and trans. John M. Cooper and J. F.
Procopé

(Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995), 27: "Anger," says Aristotle, "is needful; no fight can be won with it."}

20. {Cf. Goltz, "Feldherren und Feldherrenthum," 388; the quote is from Carl von Clausewitz, Vom Kriege (Berlin: Dümmlers Verlag, 1832), 4: "in so gefährlichen Dingen, wie der Krieg eins ist, sind die Irrthümer, welche aus Gutmüthigkeit entstehen, gerade die schlimmsten." English translation: On War, trans. Michael Howard and Peter Paret (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984), 75: "war is such a dangerous business that the mistakes which come from kindness are the very worst."}

21. {Cf. Goltz, "Feldherren und Feldherrenthum," 383.}

22. {Cf. ibid., 384; the quote is attributed to Tamerlane: "Wie klein ist diese Erde für den Ehrgeiz eines großen Fürsten" ("This earth is too small for the ambition of a great prince").}

23. measure] Verdienst

24. {Cf. ibid.; cf. also Theobald Chauber, Friedrich der Große, König von Preussen: Sein Leben und Wirken (Stuttgart: Scheible's, 1834), 277: "Das wahre Verdienst eines Fürsten besteht in der aufrichtigen Neigung zum allgemeinen Besten in seiner Liebe zum Vaterlande und zum Ruhm" ("The true merit of a prince consists in the sincere affection for the general good in his love of country and glory").}

25. {Cf. Goltz, "Feldherren und Feldherrenthum," 386.}

26. {Cf. ibid., 379-83.}

27. {Cf. ibid., 382, where this remark is attributed to Alcibiades.}

28. {Cf. ibid., where this remark is attributed to Xenophon.}

29. {Cf. ibid., 383, where this remark is attributed to Napoleon in reference to war. Cf. Bruno Colson, ed., Napoleon on War, trans. Gregory Elliott (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2015), 126: "in war, morale and opinion are more than half of reality."}

30. {Cf. Goltz, "Feldherren und Feldherrenthum," 380.}

31. {Cf. ibid.; this remark is taken from Napoleon's letter of 26

September 1797 to the Minister of Foreign Affairs: "Tous les grands événements ne tiennent jamais qu'à un cheveu." (Corres-

pondance de Napoleon I^{er}: Publiée par ordre de l'empereur Napo-

l^{éon} III (Paris: 1859], 3:342).}

NOTES TO PAGES 441-445 693

32. {Cf. Goltz, "Feldherren und Feldherrenthum," in reference to the Prophet Mohammed.}

33. is stewing in his own juices] in seinem eigenen Saft kochen

{Or literally, "to boil in one's own juice."}

34. {Cf. JS 341}

36. To know] erkennen {Cf. the Translators' Afterword, 739-40, on the rendering of wissen and erkennen.}

37. mimicry] {In English in the original. N is almost certainly referring to British naturalist Alfred Russel Wallace (1823-1913), who discussed mimicry in animals as a form of "protective resemblance."

Cf. D 26; TI "Forays" 14.}

39. {Cf. Eduard von Hartmann, Gesammelte Studien und Aufsätze gemeinverständlichen Inhalts ("Collected studies and essays for a more general audience") (Berlin: Duncker, 1876).}

40. {Cf. Leopold von Ranke, Die römischen Päpste, ihre Kirche und ihr Staat im sechszehnten und siebzehnten Jahrhundert ("The Roman popes, their church and their state in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries"), 3 vols. (Berlin: Duncker und Humblot, 1834-36).}

41. {Cf. Julius Wellhausen, Prolegomena zur Geschichte Israels

("Prolegomena to the history of Israel"), 2nd ed. (Berlin: Reimer, 1883). NL.}

42. {Cf. Eugen Dreher, Der Darwinismus und seine Consequenzen in wissenschaftlicher und socialer Beziehung ("Darwinism and its consequences in relation to science and society")

(Halle: Pfeffer-fer, 1882). NL; Ton und Wort mit Bezugnahme auf das Musik-Drama R. Wagners ("Tone and word with reference to the musical drama of R. Wagner") (Halle: Pfeffer, 1880).}

43. {Cf. Jeremy Bentham, Grundsätze der civil- und criminal-gesetzgebung ("Principles of civil and criminal legislation"), German trans. by Friedrich Eduard Beneke (Berlin: C. F. Amelang, 1830) of Traité de législation civile et pénale, ed. and trans. Etienne

Dumont (Paris: Bossange, Masson, et Besson, 1802).}

44. {Hendrik Kern, Der Buddhismus und seine Geschichte in Indien: Eine Darstellung der Buddhistischen Kirche ("Buddhism

694 NOTES TO PAGES 446-450

and its history in India: A presentation of the Buddhist church"),

2 vols., trans. from Dutch by Hermann Jacobi (Leipzig: Schulze, 1882, 1884).}

(16 = Z II 1a.)

1. Plan for a Zarathustra drama (after the completion of ZI).

2. Collection of sayings and turns of phrase, drawn completely from earlier notebooks, especially 9, 10, and 13.

3. {Cf. 90}; 13[1] _371; 13[11]; 22[1]_548.}

4. {Cf. 9l}; 13l _372; 22[1]_549.}

5. {Cf. olis}; 10[17]; 13[1]_372.} 6. {Cf. 13[1]_373;

22[1]_548.} 7. {Cf. 13[]_376; 22[1]_549.} 8. {Cf. 13[1]_377;

22[1]_549.} 9. {Cf. 13[1]_378; 22[1]_549.} 10. {Cf.

13[1]_378; 22[1]_549.}

u. A later addition from early 1888.

12. Like 16[4]. 13. {Cf. 13[1]_379; 22[1]_sso.} 14. {Cf.

13[1]_379; 13[12]; 22[1]_550.} 15. {Cf. 9[6]; 13[1]_380;

22[1]_550.} 16. {Cf. 13[1]_381; 22[1]_549.}

17. {Cf. 13[1]_382; 13[11]; 17[58]; 22[1]_551.}

18. {Cf. 13[1]_383; 13l, 14]; 22[1]_550.}

19. {Cf. 13[1]_384; 22[1]_549.} 20. {Cf. 13[1]_388;

22[1]_549.} 21. {Cf. 9[18]; 13[1]_389; 22[1]_s.}

22. {Cf. 9[18]; 13[1]_389; 22[1]_550.}

23. {Cf. ol18], 13[1]_389; 13l12].} 24. {Cf. 9[19];
13[1]_390; 13[18].} 25. {Cf. 9[i]3 13[1]_390; 22[1]_549.}
26. {Cf. 9[20]; 13[1]_393; 138]; 22[1]_549.}
27. {Cf. 13[1]_394.} 28. {Cf. 3l]_394.} 29. {Cf. 13[1]_395.}
30. {Cf. 12 [43]; 13[1]_397; 17148]; 2315]; 22[1]_553.}
31. {Cf 13[1]_397}

NOTES TO PAGES 450-454 695

32. {Cf. 13[3]_399; 13[14].}
33. {Cf. 13[3]_400; 13[18].}
34. {Cf. rolr], 13[3]_405.}
35. {Cf 13[3]_407; 22[]_549.}
36. {Cf. 3l1] 243; 12[1] 101; 13[16]; 23[5]; CW 15, 31135, 36]; 32[10];
38. {Cf. 1[59]; 3l1] i 4[226]; 12[1] 147; 13[14].}
39. {Cf. 3[1] 328; 12[1] 148; 13[14].}
40. {Cf. 3[1] 273; 12[1] 99; 13[8].}
41. {Cf. 4[176]; si) 2543 5[22]; 1215]; 13[7]; CW 15, 3116, 9].}
42. {Cf. 12[1] 133; 13[6].}
43. {Cf. 22[1]_547}
44. Draft of a plan before the completion of Z III; in conjunction with this, see the plans and drafts 21[1-6].
46. {Cf. alu]; sl1] 176; 5l17]; 22[3]_563.}
7. "they... life"] Cf. BT 7.
Hartmann's Philosophie des Unbewussten ("Philosophy of the Unconscious").}
49. "pessimist of the intellect."] According to J. Burckhardt's
Definition der Griechen ("Definition of the Greeks"), cf. CW 12, 5[70] and accompanying note; {cf. MM 11, CW 4, 16}.
so. "what... honor.] Cf. MM 26, CW 4, 21.
s1. Cf. 22[1]{_547}.
53. history of origins] Entstehungs-Geschichte
54. {Cf SE 5, CW 2, 214, lines 25-28.}
56. origin] Herkommen {Also later in this fragment} Empfindungen (Chemnitz{: Schmeitzner,} 1877), NL. {Translated
by Robin Small as The Origin of the Moral Sensations, in Paul Rée, Basic Writings, ed. Robin Small (Urbana: University of Illli-nois Press, 2003): 81-167.}
696 NOTES TO PAGES 454-461
59. {Cf. Rée, "The Origin of the Moral Sensations," 114:

"But
 if nothing in the punishments carried out reminds one that they are a means of deterrence for the future, it must come to seem that they are a retribution for the past."} 60. {Cf. ibid., 115: "Actions that are necessary cannot be subjected either to attribution of responsibility or to retribution for what has occurred."}
 61. Will-o-the-wisp] Irrlicht {Phantom lights engendered by decaying plants in swamps and wetlands, associated in myth with beings that lead travelers astray}
 63. {WP 760}
 Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins: Prolegomena zu jeder künftigen Ethik ("Phenomenology of moral consciousness:
 Prole-gomena to any future ethics") (Berlin: Duncker, 1879), 646.
 NL.}
 65. {WP 769.}
 70. competition . . . intellect] {WP 613.}
 73. As in 16[8]; the same is true without exception for the fragments that immediately follow, all the way to the end:
 16[38-90].
 74. N is referring to the following passage in Emerson's Versuche {Essays: Second Series, "Politics"}: "To educate the wise man,
 the State exists; and with the appearance of the wise man,
 the State expires. The appearance of character makes the State unnecessary. The wise man is the State. He needs no army, fort, or navy, — he loves men too well; no bribe, or feast, or palace, to draw friends to him; no vantage ground, no favorable circumstance. He needs no library, for he has not done thinking;
 no church, for he is a prophet; no statute book, for he has the lawgiver; no money, for he is value; no road, for he is at home where he is; no experience, for the life of the creator shoots through him, and looks from his eyes. He has no personal friends, for he

 NOTES TO PAGES 461-475 697 who has the spell to draw the prayer and piety of all men unto him, needs not husband and educate a few, to share with him
 a select and poetic life. His relation to men is angelic; his memory is myrrh to them; his presence, frankincense and flowers." {Much of this} excerpt was underlined by N, the entire passage highlighted several times.
 75. completely in harmony with the truth] vollkommen der Wahrheit {We attempt to capture the strangeness of the phrasing.}
 76. {Cf. 7[238].}
 77. {Cf. 22[1]_547.}
 78. {Cf. the third movement of Beethoven's penultimate string quartet (String Quartet No. 15 in A Minor, Op. 132), subtitled "Heiliger Dankgesang eines Genesenden an die Got-theit" ("Holy Song of Thanksgiving to the Deity from a Convalescent").}
 79. Beatitude] Seligpreisung {A reference to the Beatitudes
 in the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5:3-11).}
 80. sub specie aeterni] "under the aspect of the eternal" {That is, in its essential or eternal form. Phrase associated with Spinoza.}
 81. unified by power] Einheit des { ...} in der Macht {The inflection makes it clear that all three groups are included.}
 82. {Cf. 16[59, 84]; 21[3]; 22[1]_547}
 83. {Cf. 16[59, 84]; 21[3]; 22[1]_5474
 84. ripeness and tenderness] Reife und Mürbe {We use "ripeness"
 and "tenderness" here instead of the more conventional translations "maturity" and "mellowing" in order to maintain N's botanical analogy.}

85. exuberance] Übermuth

86. {Cf. 16[50]; 21[3]; 22[1]_547.}

87. Zarathustra... nothing else!] {An allusion to Luther's remark in Worms: "Here I stand. I can do nothing else."}

88. Determinism] {N uses the English term here, and the German term Determinismus below.}

89. fatum] "fate," "one's lot" {N here underlines the Latin fatum.}

90. that can't be missing] die nicht fehlen darf

91. audience] die Empfänger

93. {WP 974.}

94. {Cf. 17[29]; 22[3]_623.}

698 NOTES TO PAGES 475-483

95. {Cf. 17[29]; 18[4]; old); 22[1]_548; 22[1]_562.}

96. {Cf. 16[50, 59]; 22[1]_547}

97. {Cf. 17[29].}

98. {Cf. Gustav Teichmüller, Neue Studien zur Geschichte der Begriffe, Heft 3: Die praktische Vernunft bei Aristoteles ("New studies on the history of concepts, vol. 3: Practical reason according to Aristotle") (Gotha: Perthes, 1879); Teichmüller mentions "selfishness" on p. 130, not 131.}

99. {Cf. 17[27].}

100. {Cf. 17[27, 29, 40].}

ror. {Cf. 15[21].}

102. {Cf. 15[18]; 22[1]_546.}

103. {Cf. 15[18]; 22[1]_546.}

104. {Cf. 22[1]_545.}

105. {Cf. 3[1] 25; 4[31]; 16[88]; 18[24]; 22[1]_546; BGE 132.}

106. teach about the superhumans] den Übermenschen lehren {Cf.
4[208] and 5[8], where "superhumans" are also the subject matter}

107. {Cf. 10[3].}

[17 =N VI 6.]

2. huckster-virtues] Krämer-Tugenden {We have chosen the term "huckster" for Krämer because the usual term, "shop-keeper," is not pejorative enough to capture N's meaning.}

3. money-grubbing] geldklebrige

5. they all deserve each other] sie sind alle einander wert

{Cf.
 17[9]; 18[19]; 22[2].}
 6. {Cf. 22[1]_555.}
 9. {Cf. 22[1]_556.}
 10. {Cf. 22[1]_556.}
 u. Cf. 22[5]_573.
 12. mortar] Mörser {As in mortar and pestle, here used for mixing herbs, as opposed to "on a bible or altar."}
 3. {Cf. 4[17]}
 NOTES TO PAGES 483–490 699
 14. . {Cf 22[1]_561.}
 16.
 Arrangement predates the composition of Z III.
 . {Cf. 17[2]; 18[19]; 22[2].} . {Cf. 22[1]_562; 22[2].}
 the way I wish] wie ich Lust habe {We here deviate from the usual rendering of Lust ("desire" or "pleasure") to preserve the wordplay} 20.
 21.
 22. 23. 24.
 25.
 26.
 27.
 {Cf. 22[1]_561.}
 {Cf. 17[10, 26]; 22[1]_556; 22[1]_560.}
 {Cf. 22[1]_560.}
 Cf. 22[2].
 {Cf. 22[1]_560.}
 Cf. 22[1]{_560}.
 {Except for the second phrase, cf. 22[3]_567.}
 {Cf. 22[3]_565.}
 29. firm] hart {We chose the equivalent adjective for "hand-shake" in English.} 30.
 {Cf. Matthew 19:14; Mark 10:14; Luke 18:16. For the next three phrases, cf. 22[3]_567.} 31.
 44
 {Cf 22[3]_565.}
 . {For the next four fragments, cf. 22[3]_566}
 . {For the next five fragments, cf. 22[3]_565.}
 . {Cf. 17[15]; 22[3]_565; 22[3]_569.}
 . {Cf. 20[12]; 22[3]_565.}
 . {Cf. 22[3]_568.}

. {Cf. 22[3]_568.}

. {Cf 22[3]_568.}

. {For the final three fragments, cf. 22[3]_568.}

. aloneness] Alleinsein

. {Cf. 17[14]; 17[15]; 22[3]_569.}

. So why, then, . . . dreaming.] Cf. Z III "The Wanderer."

. Cf. Z III "The Wanderer"; {17[14]; 22[3]_569}.

. Cf. 22[3, 5] {Included in this fragment are a series of clever phrases and wordplay, some of which are repeated or revised in later notebooks.}

45.

{Cf 22[3]_569.}

700 NOTES TO PAGES 490-495

46. {Cf. 17[17]; 18[12]; 22[5].}

47. {Cf. 20[12]; 22[5].}

48. {Cf. 17[20]; 22[5].}

49. entertain others] ihnen Unterhaltung schaffen {The word-play is between Unterhaltung ("entertainment") and Unterhalt ("liveliness").}

50. "by accident] "von Ohngefähr"

51. {Cf. 20[12]; 22[5].}

53. {Cf. 17[16]; 18[2]; 22[5].}

56. {Cf. 18[46]; 22[3]_571.}

57. {Cf. 17[16]; 22[5].}

58. {Cf. 17[25, 56]; 18[34]; 22[1]_5525 22[5]_5733 22[5]_574.}

60. {N here alludes to the opening scene of Wagner's Siegfried (first performed in Bayreuth 16 August 1876), where the hero asks his foster father Mime: "Wer is mir Vater und Mutter?" ("Who are father and mother to me?").}

62. {Cf. 22[4].}

63. {Cf. 18[18]; 22[5].}

66. {Cf. 17[20, 56]; 18[34]; 22[1]_5523 22[5]_57% 22[5]_574} II; {cf. 17[10]; 22[1]_556; 22[1]_so}.

71. {Cf. 16[84].}

72. {Cf. 16[84]; 17[29].}

73. {Cf. 16[84]; 17[27, 40].}

74. {Cf. 16[84]; 18[4]; zoli; 22[1]_548; 22[1]_556.}

75. {Cf. zol; 22[1]_548.}

NOTES TO PAGES 495-498 701

76. {Cf. 17[48]; 20[1]; 22[1 547].}

77. finger] Zehe {We switch from "toe" to "finger" to render the idiom.}

79. {Cf. 1[19, 22].}

Z III; cf. also the plans in Group 21.

81. {Cf 22[1]_557.}

84. {Cf. 22[1]_557.}

85. {Cf. Herbert Spencer, Die Thatsachen der Ethik (The Data of Ethics, part 1 of vol. 1 of The Principles of Ethics), trans. Benjamin Vetter (Stuttgart: Schweizerbart, 1879), 269. NL}

89. akrasia] "weakness of will"

go. Cf. 22[1]{_557}.

92. {Cf. Ralph Waldo Emerson, Versuche (Essays), trans. G. Fabricius (Hanover: Carl Meyer, 1858), NL; "Manners," in The Collected Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson, vol. 3: Essays, Second Series (Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1983), 89–90.}

93. {Cf. 19[5]; 20[10].}

94. enjoyment of self abolishing] Selbst-Aufhebung-Genuff {See our notes on Aufhebung in the Translators' Afterword, 738; cf. 20[10].}

96. {Cf. 20[r].}

97. {Cf. 22[1]_557.}

99. {Cf. 22[1]_557.}

ror. Like 17[2].

102. to fall apart] zu Grunde gehn

702

104.

105.

106.

107.

108.

II.

112. 113.

114.

{Cf. 22[3]_565.}

Cf. 22[1]{_557}.

{Cf. 12[43]; 13[1]_397; 16[7]; 22[1]553; 23[5].}

{Cf. 17[130]; 20[1]; 22[1]_5474}

{Cf. 22[1]_553.}

Cf. note to 7[17].

{Cf. 22[1]_552.}

{Cf. 17[52, 60]; 18[1]; 20[9]; 22[1 557.]}

Like 17[2]; cf. 22[1] {_552}.

Like 17[2] and 117[18].

{Cf. 17[50, 60]; 18[1]; 20[9]; 22[1]_557.}

Moravians] Herrnhuter {The Moravian Church or Unitas Fratrum had a threefold ideal of faith, fellowship, and freedom, and a strong emphasis on practical Christian life rather than on doctrine or tradition. First founded at the end of the sixteenth century, it experienced revival under the leadership of Nikolaus Ludwig, Count Zinzendorf, in the town of Herrnhut in Saxony in the eighteenth century.}

116.

117. 118. 119.

123.

124.

125.

126.

127.

Like 17[9]; ef. 22[1]{_552}. Cf. 22[1]{_552}.

. {Cf. 17[20, 25]; 18[134]; 22[1]_552; 22[5]_573; 22[15]_574-}

. {Cf. 10[8, 35]; 22[1]_552.} . {Cf 22[1]_552.}

Cf. 17[18].

Cf. 22[1]{_ssi}.

{Cf. 13[1]_382; 13[11]; 16[7]; 22[1]_551.}

Cf. 22[1]{_5513 17167}; 20[9]}.

Cf. {20[9] (characteristics of friendship)}; 22[1]{_557}-

{Cf. 17[50, 52]; 18[1]; 20[9]; 22[1]_557}

your] seinen {We use the second-person form to convey the context of advice; cf. 20[9]; 22[1]_557.}

130.

131. 132. Like 17[9].

Cf. 22[1]{_557}. Cf. 22[1]{_554}.

NOTES TO PAGES 504-509 703

134. novelty] Neugierde {Cf. Grimm 13:656-57.}

138. {Cf. 17[59]; 20[9]; 22[1]_551-}

139. in his supreme right] an sein höheres Recht {This could also refer to the supreme right of the people.}

140. {Cf. 22[1]_554.}

141. Concerning a third and fourth part dating before the composition of Z III.

142. {Cf. 22[1]_560.}

143. {Cf. 20[9].}

147. {Cf. Mark 10:14.}

148. {Cf. 22[1]_558}; N's term is Händler, which means "merchants." We try to preserve the wordplay on Handel's name here.}

149. In this book, Auguste Blanqui argued for a notion close to thoughts of eternal return of the same; cf. Henri Lichtenberger, Die Philosophie Friedrich Nietzsches, {trans. into German from the French by Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche (Dresden and Leipzig{: Carl Reissner,} 1899), 204-9.

150. {Cf. Louis-Auguste Blanqui, L'éternité par les astres (Paris: Librairie Germer Baillière, 1872); translated by Frank Chouraqui as Eternity by the Stars (New York: Contra Mundum Press, 2013).}

1st. Cf. 22[1] {_558}.

152. {Cf. 22[1]_558.}

154. {Cf. 22[1]_558.}

155. future generations] die zukünftigen Menschen

156. women] Frauen {N uses Weiber in 18[15, 23]; 22[1]_558; 23[3].}

158. obsession . . . hits home] {We try here to re-create N's wordplay with Sucht ("obsession"), mein Heim suchen ("sought . . . my home"), and Heimsuchung ("hit home").}

704 NOTES TO PAGES 509-522

159. Cf. 22[1]{_559}. 160. {Cf. Exodus 33:3.} 161. Cf. 22[1]{_559}. 162. {Cf. 22[1]_559.}

{18 = N VI 7.}

i Cf. 22[3]{_570}.

2. "God is not] "es ist kein Gott {Here as in 22[3], N varies his usual phrase es gibt keinen Gott ("there is no God"). The meaning is essentially the same.}

3. {Cf. 17[50, 52, 60]; 20[9]; 22[1]_557.}

4. {Cf. 20[14].}

6. {Cf. 17[16, 17]; 22[5].}

7. {Cf. 16[84]; 17[29]; 20[1]; 22[1]_548; 22[1]_556.}

8. that's where the spice is] hier ist der Pfeffer {Literally, "here is the pepper."}

10. {Cf. 17[78]; 18[23]; 22[1]_558; 23[3].}
 u. rasped] röchelte
 12. {Cf. 17[22]; 22[5].}
 14. {Cf. 13[3]_402.}
 15. {Cf. 17[78]; 18[15]; 22[1]_558; 23[3].}
 16. in the family way] gesegneten Leibes {A "proper" euphemism for pregnancy.}
 17. {Cf. 3[1] 25; 4[31]; 16[88]; 22[1]_546; BGE 132.}
 21. {Cf. 17[20, 25, 56]; 22[1]_5523 22[5]_571; 22[5]_574.}
 23. word] das Wort {"Word" has the dual meaning in English of "individual word" and "saying."}
 24. {Cf. 18[57, 59].}
 25. sealing] Besiegelung
 26. {Cf. 3l1] 245; 4[165]; 11[8]; 18[49, 56]; 21[6]; 24[16].}

NOTES TO PAGES 522-530 705

28. loving refreshment] Liebsal {A pun on the German Labsal, meaning "refreshment."} 30. Bible-thumpers] Betbrüder {We think "Bible-thumpers" is the closest equivalent; cf. 17[20]; 22[3]_571.}
 31. {Cf 22[1]_554.}
 33. {Cf. 30] 245; 4l165]; 11[8]; 18[43, 56]; 21[6]; 24[16].}
 34. Ich fand aufmeinem Gange seine langen Esels-Ohren – ich fand auch meine Schlange, die hatte den Kopf verloren.
 36. junkyard dog] Kettenhund {Literally "dog on a chain."}
 37. {Cf. 3l1] 245; 4l165]; 11[8]; 18[43, 49]; 21l]; 24[16].}
 38. {Cf. 18[38, 59].}
 {19 = N VI 8}
 1. to break] zerbrechen {Consistent with the wording in Exodus 32:19, KJ V.}
 . Cf. Z III "On Apostates."
 . Cf. Z III "On Old and New Tablets."
 . {Cf. 17[39]; 20[r].}
 . Cf. ZIV "The Sign."
 . Arrangement of Z III.
 . Cf. Z III "The Convalescent."
 9. rasp] réchelst {Has connotations of a death rattle.}
 u. Cf. 16[49]; 21[3].
 12. my soul, the prophet] meine Seele, die Wahrsagerin {The feminine inflection does not necessarily indicate that N thinks of the soul as female, so we have not translated Wahrsagerin as "prophetess."}
 CON AM A WwW

706 NOTES TO PAGES 531-538

(20 = Z II 2,)

2. {Cf. 170, 48}; 22[1]_547.}

3. {Cf. 17[30]; 22[1]_547.}

4. {Cf. 16[84]; 18[4]; 22[1]_548; 22[1]_556.}

7. tartuffery] Tartufferie {From the character in Molière's Tartuffe (1664).}

8. {Cf. Herbert Spencer, Einleitung in das Studium der Sociolo-gie ("Introduction to the study of sociology"), ed. Heinrich Marquardsen (Leipzig: Brockhaus, 1875), 2:110. NL.}

9. abolition] Aufhebung

Neue Studien zur Geschichte der Begriffe, Heft 3: Die praktische

Vernunft bei Aristoteles ("New studies on the history of concepts,

vol. 3: Practical reason according to Aristotle") (Gotha: Perthes, 1879).}

u. {Cf. ibid., 65.}

12. "The courageous... done"] {Cf. ibid., 76.}

1s. {Cf. 17[59, 67]; 22[1]_551.}

16. {Cf. 17[60]; 22[1]_557.}

17. {Cf. 17[50, 52, 60]; 18[1]; 22[1]_558.}

19. {Cf. 17[40].}

20. {Cf. 17[39].}

22. you my necessity] {Here Zarathustra's invocation "Du meine

Notwendigkeit" ("You my necessity") recalls and inverts Sieg-

fried's invocation to his sword Notung in act 1, scene 3 of Wagner's opera. N also puns on Wende ("cusp") and Noth-wendigkeit

("necessity").}

24. {Cf. 17[16]; 22[5].}

25. {Cf. 17[13]; 22[3]_565.}

NOTES TO PAGES 538-546 707

27. toy trum peters] Schnurrpfeifer {Flügel 847 defines Schnurr-

pfeifel Schnurrpfeiferei as a vulgar term for frivolous or meaningless things or activities, here a reference to the abysmal quality of their message.}

 28. {Cf. 18[1].}
 [21 = Mp XV 3b]
 2. temptation] Versuchung {This could also be rendered as "experiment."}
 4. {Cf. 16[50, 59, 84]; 22[1]_547.}
 5. order] der Orden {In the sense of a fraternity or religious
 order.}
 7. {Cf. 3l₁ 245; 4[165]; 11[8]; 18[43, 49, 56]; 24[16].}
 8. bien public] "public good," something available for the common good (e.g., clean air).
 9. {N noted the link between socialism, Jesuitism, and eudaimonistic ethics in Eduard von Hartmann's Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins: Prolegomena zu jeder künftigen Ethik (Berlin:
 C. Duncker, 1879), 649-50. NL}
 10. actions] Handeln {N means "acting" here, as in engaging
 in activity or action.}
 [22 = Z II 3a.)
 1. Revised copy from the earlier notebooks (13, 15, 16, 17, 18) containing sayings and turns of phrase that were adopted in part for ZII.
 2. {Cf. 16[88].}
 3. {Cf. 3[1] 25; 4[31]; 16[88]; 18[24]; BGE 132.}
 4. {Cf. 15[18]; 16[86].}
 5. {Cf. 15[18]; 16[86].}
 6. {Cf. 16[50, 59, 84]; 21[3].}
 708 NOTES TO PAGES 547-551
 so
 3. {Cf. 17[32].} 14. {Cf. 17[30]; 20l₁.}
 15. {Cf. 17[30, 48]; 20l₁.}
 16. {Cf. 20[r]; 22[1]_547.}
 17. {Cf. 16[84]; 17[29]; 18[4]; 2011]; 22[1]_548.}
 19. coincidence] Zufall {Here N adds the modifier jeden ("every"),
 our shift from "chance" to "coincidence" refers to a single instance}
 20. {Cf. 0l₁; 13[1]_373; 13[11]; 16[4].}
 21. {Cf. 13[1]_373; 16[4].} 22. {Cf. 13[3]; 16[7].} 23. {Cf
 Bi 378; 16[4].}

[3 [24. {Cf 30)]. 25. {Cf. a 16[4]. 26. {Cf. 13[1]_378;
 16[4]. 27. {Cf. glas]; 13[1]_3725 16[4].}
 28. {Cf. 13[1] 384; al 7}
 29. {Cf. 13[1]_381; 16[7].} 30. {Cf. 13[1]_388; 16[7].} 31.
 {Cf. 9[19]; 13[1]_390; 16[7].}
 32. {Cf. 9[20]; 13[1]_393; 13[8]; 16[7].}
 33. {Cf. 13[1] 379; 16[7].}
 34. {Cf. 13[1] 379; 13[12]; 16[7].}
 35. {Cf. 13[1]_383; 13[10, 14]; 16[
 36. {Cf. 9[6]; 13[1]_380; 16[7].} 37. {Cf. 9[18]; 13[1]_389;
 16[7].} 38. {Cf. 9[18]; 13[1]_389; 16[7].}
 39. We should only steal. . . taking notice.] {Cf. 17[59].}
 40. {Cf. [17[67]; 20[9].} 41. {Cf. 17[58].} 42. {Cf. 13[11]; 16[7]; 17[58].}

714

NOTES TO PAGES 551-556 709

43. {Cf. 17[58].}
 44. {Cf. 17[20, 25]; 18[34]; 22[5]_571; 22[5]_574.}
 46. {Cf. 17[55].}
 47. {Cf. 17[54].}
 48. is just to] soll nur... sein
 49. {Cf. 17[51]}
 so. {Cf. 17[51].}
 st. {Cf. 17[49].}
 52. {Cf. 17[48].}
 53. {Cf. 12[43]; 13[1]_397; 16[7]; 17[48]; 23[5].}
 54. divine lightness-skill] göttliche Leicht-Fertigkeit {N's word-play here is between Leichtfertig "taking things lightly"
 and Leicht-Fertigkeit "being adept at making ourselves light."}
 ss. {Cf. 17[66].}
 56. {Cf. 17[64].}
 58. {Cf. 17[70]; 22[1]_558.}
 59. {Cf. 17[70, 71].}
 60. are your own incidents and accidents!] was euch zufällt
 und auf euch fällt! {Cf. 17[68].}
 61. {Cf. 17[67].}
 62. {Cf. 17[67].}
 63. {Cf. 18[46].}
 64. happiness] Glück {This could also be "good fortune."}
 66. {Cf. 17[3].}
 67. {Cf. 17[3].}
 69. Oh these narrow . . . tenth generation] Oh diese en-gen . . . ins

zehnte Geschlecht {Cf. 17[7].}
 70. {Cf. 17[10], 26}; 22[1]_560.
 71. {Cf. 17[9]; 22[2].}
 72. {Cf. 17[29].}
 73. {Cf. 16[84]; 17[29]; 18[4]; 20[1]; 22[1]_548.
 74. in my little finger] in der linksten Zehe {We switch from
 "toe" to "finger" to render the idiom; cf. 17[30].} 710
 75-
 {Cf. 17[28, 31].}
 our] seinen {We are translating this as a singular universal ("man"), but N might intend it as referring to Z himself or some individual in the narrative; cf. 17[32].} 77: 78. 79.
 {Cf. 17[34].} {Cf. 17[34].} {Cf. 17[35].}
 . {Cf. 17[38].} . {Cf. 17[40].} . {Cf. 17[41].} . {Cf
 17[45].} . {Cf. 17[46].}
 {Cf. 17[60]; 20[9].}
 . {Cf. 17[50, 52, 60]; 18[1]; 20[9].}
 . {Cf. 17[63].}
 . {Cf. 17[63].}
 . {Cf. 17[65].}
 . {Cf. 11[r].}
 . {Cf. 17[70]; 22[1]_544.
 . Corpse robbers . . . fingers."} {Cf. 17[72].}
 . {CE 17174}
 ACE 17[74].}
 . {Cf. 17[76].}
 . {Cf. 17[78].}
 . {Cf. 17[78] . {See 17[80], note 157.}
 . It wants to command... . hard-heartedness.] {Cf. 17[80].}
 . {Cf. 17[82].}
 . {Cf. 17[85].}
 . {Cf. 17[85].}
 . "The worst... virtues] {Cf. 17[85].}
 . {Cf. 17[10].}
 . {Cf. 17[69].}
 . {Cf. 17[12].}
 . {Cf. 17[12].}
 . {Cf. rf}
 . {Cf. 17[26]; 22[1]_556.
 ; 18[15, 23]; 23[3].}
 NOTES TO PAGES 561-565 7U
 uo. {Cf. 17[10].}

un. "Let us be modest... snore.] {Cf. 17[10].}
 112. {Cf. 17[8].}
 13. {Cf. 3[1] 5.}
 114. Shortly before the final composition of Z III. {This section includes what appear to be possible titles for Z, but the parenthetical comments and the outlines convinced us not to capitalize these items as we have done for the items in 22[8] below.}
 us. fatum] "fate"
 117. {Cf. 1[63]; 3[1] 12.}
 118. {Cf. 3[1] 22.}
 119. {Cf. 3[1] 24.}
 120. {Cf. 3[1] 23.}
 121. {Cf. 3[1] 38; 12[1] 118.}
 122. {Cf. 1[8, 9]; 3[1] 34; 311] 224.}
 124. {Cf. 3[1] 42.}
 125. {Cf. 4[114]; si] 176; 51]; 16[9].}
 126. ape] Affen {Cf. Z III "On Passing By," where N uses the same play on words between "ape" and "imitator."}
 127. {Cf. 3[1] 62.}
 128. {Cf. 3[1] 63.}
 129. {Cf. 3[1] 57.}
 Bo. {Cf. 1[70]; 3[1] a BGE 133.}
 131. {Cf. 2[45];
 132. {Cf. 2[so]
 133. {Cf. 1[70]; soh BGE 129.}
 134. {Cf. 2[47]; 301] {64}, p. 61, 3-8; 311] 72.}
 135. {Cf. 3[1] 71}
 136. {Cf. 311] 70}
 137. {Cf. staa] 311] 65; 4[44].}
 138. {Cf. 311] 74.}
 139. {Cf. 3[1] 82.}
 140. {Cf. 3[1] 105.}
 142. {Cf. 17[15]; 22[3]_569.}
 712
 143.
 144 145. 146
 147. 148.
 149 150. 151.
 {Cf. 16[84]; 17[29].}
 {Cf. 17[43]: 20[12].}
 Crumpled houses . . . bilious soul] {Cf. 17[13].}
 Where have I witnessed . . . as we wish.] {Cf. 17[13].}

firm] hart
 {Cf. 20[19].}
 Contented sows . . . to the wind.] {Cf. 17[13].}
 {Cf 30] 444.
 {Cf. 30] 429.
 bite of conscience] Gewissensbiss {We speak of "pangs of conscience," whereas the Germans speak of "bites of conscience."
 We preserve N's wordplay here; cf. 3[1] 436.
 153. {Cf. 3[1] 422; 12[1] 88.
 154. {Cf. 17[16].}
 155. This is the black sad sea . . . each night] {Cf. 17[14, 15];
 22[3]_565.
 156. not give a plug nickel] keinen Heller geben {A "Heller" was a small copper coin worth about half a penny.
 157. 158. 159.
 160.
 161. 162. 163.
 164.
 165.
 166.
 167. 168. 169.
 170.
 Ifyou can't pray, .. . intellect] {Cf. 18[1].}
 lifts... from our shoulders] enthebt {Cf. 17[21].}
 {Cf. 17[21].}
 {Cf. 17[23].}
 Bible-thumpers] Betbruderei {Cf. 17[20]; 18[46].} Like 22[2].
 {Cf. 18[2].}
 Like 22[1].
 {Cf. 17[22]; 18[18].}
 {Cf. 17[20, 25, 56]; 18[34]; 22[1]_552.
 {Cf. 17[16, 17]; 18[2].}
 {Cf. 17[17].}
 {Cf. 17[17].}
 is] ist {N uses the third-person singular ist to match
 "characteristic" with "means and condition." 171. 172. 173. 174. 175.
 {Cf. 20[12].}
 a contrarian, .. . cheerfulness.] {Cf. 17[16].}
 {Cf. 17[16].}
 ill people . . . fall.) {Cf. 17[16].}

{Cf. 17[20].}

NOTES TO PAGES 573-583 713

176. {Cf. 17[16].}

177. {Cf. 17[6].}

178. {Cf. 20112.}

179. with a voice... at us.] {Cf. 17[16].}

180. {Cf. 17[24]; 18[46].}

181. [went in search... the future.] {Cf. 17[24].}

182. {Cf. 17[20, 25, 56]; 18[34]; 22[1]_5523 22[5]_571.}

183. {Cf. 17[25].}

184. {Cf. 17[25].}

185. {Cf. 17[13].}

186. {Cf. 7[43].}

(23 = Z 11 4)

2. {Cf. Matthew 3:17; Luke 3:22, 9:35.}

3. if we take a shit] wenn man Koth läßt {N's wordplay is between Koth (shit or filth) /assen – "to take a shit" – and, in the next sentence, Koth halten – "to keep it."}

5. {Cf. 18[z, 23]; 23[3].}

7. {Cf. 18[57].}

8. Compilation for a chapter from Z III that was never completed.

9. {Cf. 301] 243; 12[1] 101; 13[16]; 16[7].}

10. {Cf. 12[43]; 13[1] 397; 1617); 17148]; 22[1]_553-}

15. {This annotation is N's.}

[24 = Mp XVII 1b.]

17, 5196, 98]. 2. alienation] Befremden

714 NOTES TO PAGES 583-588

3. yvoun] "sign" "mark" "mind" "intelligence" "opinion" {The Greek is obscure here, and it is quite possible that there was an error when N's manuscript was transcribed.}

4. la Faustin] {Parisian actress and eponymous protagonist of Edmond de Goncourt's 1882 novel.}

5. {WP 1057.}

6. Cf. CW 15, 25[1, 6, 227, 323]; 26[259, 465]; 27[58, 80, 82]; CW 16, 34[191].

7. original chaos . . . perishing.] {WP 508.}

9. in regard to... its opposite.] {Cf. WP 92.}

10. Bourget p. 25.] A reference to Paul Bourget, Essais de psychologie contemporaine ("Essays on contemporary psychology") (Paris{: Lemerre,} 1883); cf. WA 7 note 66.

u. both of the greatest . . . this thought.] {WP 1058.}

12. origin] Herkunft {In CW, Ursprung is usually translated as "origin" and Herkunft as "descent," but we believe that the context dictates this rendering. Cf. note 34 below}

13. Psychology of Error] Title added later (August 1888) according to the plan in CW 18, 18[17].

15. {Cf. Richard Avenarius, Philosophie als Denken der Welt gemäss dem Princip des kleinsten Kraftmasses: Prolegomena zu einer Kritik der reinen Erfahrung ("Philosophy as thinking of the world in accordance with the principle of the least amount of energy: Prolegomena to a critique of pure experience") (Leipzig: Fues's Verlag (R. Reisland), 1876), 45-46.}

16. {Cf. ibid., 46}

17. sensation] Empfindung {In this fragment, and in 24[13], we have departed from our usual translation of Empfindung as "perception" or "feeling" so as to reflect the fact that N is quoting from the positivist philosopher Avenarius.}

18. {Cf. ibid., 47}

19. {Cf. ibid., 47-48.}

20. {Cf. ibid., 49.}

21. {Cf. ibid., 50.}

22. "Tt is also the case that... such hastiness!] {WP 626.}

NOTES TO PAGES 588-598 715

23. the willing] das Wollen {In German, this could be either "wanting" or "willing," and here N is referring to the nature of the will and free will.}

24.

25. {WP 562.}

"In the development . . . at all!] {Cf. Avenarius, Philosophie als Denken der Welt, 58-59.}

26.

27.

28. 29. 30.
 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39.
 40.
 41.
 42. 43. 44.
 what exists] Das Seiende form of existence] Form des Seins
 In motion... . existence.] {Cf. ibid., 60.}
 A multiplicity . . . or separation.] {WP 641.}
 Science does not ask . . . hypothesis.] {WP 6673
 But willing: =... a goal.] {Cf. WP 260.}
 {Cf. WP 676.}
 Origin] Herkunft
 personal transformations] sich-Verändern
 {Cf. 7[47, 58, 62, 125]; 8[26]; 24[27].}
 {Cf. 3[1] 245; 4[165]; 11[8]; 18[43, 49, 56]; 21[6].}
 {WP 640.}
 measured by human senses] auf den Sinnenmenschen
 {WP 594.}
 emotions] Gemüth {See the Translators' Afterword, 738-44.}
 {WP 277}
 knowable] erkennbar
 {Cf. WP 670}
 general feelings] Gemeingefühle {Grimm defines this term as meaning sense impressions that have to do with the body
 in general, such as pain and hunger}
 46. 47- 48. 49. 50.
 51.
 52.
 53-54.
 {Cf. WP 670.}
 {WP 741}
 {WP 611.}
 {Cf. WP 130.}
 bétise] "stupidity" {Underlined by N.}
 suffrage universel] "universal suffrage"
 {Cf. Bourget, Essais de psychologie contemporaine, 152-53.}
 {Cf. WP 29.}
 At our core] im Innersten {"in our heart of hearts," "at the core of our being"}.
 716 NOTES TO PAGES 598-602
 55. "le fait"] "the fact"
 56. art... ourselves.] {Cf. Bourget, Essais de psychologie contem-

pordaine, 158-59, 209.}

58. {Cf. 7[47, 58, 62, 125]; 8[26]; 24[16].}

59. My Innovations. . . . universally shared existence.]

{Cf. WP

417.}

61. against... imperfection!] {Cf. WP 417}

62. {Cf. Francis Galton, Inquiries into Human Faculty and Its Development (London: Macmillan, 1883), 213: "There is an Oriental phrase, as I have been told, that the fear of the inevitable approach of death is a European malady."}

63. {Cf. WP 255.}

66. {Cf. WP 767}

67. {Cf. WP 671.}

Weltanschauung ("Force: A real-monistic worldview")

(Leipzigf:

Haupt und Tischler,} 1878). NZ.

69. matter] Stoff {We also render Materie as "matter" in the concluding sentence of 24[34].}

70. {Cf. CW 6: 19[3].}

71. Omnia naturalia . . . mala] "All natural things are indifferent to the person who is acting; (it is) to the person who is holding back, or denying, that they are good or evil."

Translators' Afterword

Paul S. Loeb and David F. Tinsley

The fragments and notes contained in this volume, which Nietzsche wrote while composing Thus Spoke Zarathustra (Z), cover the period from July 1882 through the winter of 1883-84.

We begin by providing a biographical sketch for this time in Nietzsche's life. We then discuss briefly the philosophical works

he produced, as well as the principal authors and thinkers

Nietzsche was reading. The bulk of this Afterword is devoted to issues of translation. We start by explaining our philosophy and then illustrate our approach by providing examples of global translation decisions that could not be addressed in the endnotes. We then focus our attention on the proper translation of Nietzsche's crucial terms Mensch and Übermensch, in light

of Nietzsche's evolving philosophical concept of superhumans.
Nietzsche's Life, 1882-1884: A Biographical Sketch!
Other than occasional visits to his mother and sister in Naumburg in Thuringia, Nietzsche's pattern of residence had taken on a certain regularity. Supported by his pension from the
1. For this section, we draw upon the Chronicle of Nietzsche Life by Colli
and Montinari (KSA 15 / CW 19); Ronald Hayman, Nietzsche: A Critical Life
(Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin Books, 1982); Curtis Cate, Friedrich Nietzsche
(New York: Overlook Press, 2002); and Julian Young, Friedrich Nietzsche: A Philosophical Biography (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010).
Thanks to Daniel Blue for helpful feedback regarding this section.

718 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

University of Basel, as well as by his mother's generous shipments of clothing and his favorite foods, he would spend the summers in his "cave," a dark room in the second story of
the Durisch family home in the mountain village Sils Maria in southeastern Switzerland, and his winters in search of healthy air in a series of Mediterranean port towns, first in Genoa, then in Rapallo, and finally in Nice.
1882 marked a time of turmoil and transition in Nietzsche's life. Never robust, his health had worsened significantly during the previous year. His growing blindness had reached a critical stage, and he struggled, with limited success, to control, by means of diet, exercise, and self-diagnosis, his frequent bouts of debilitating nausea and seizures. Persona non grata in Bayreuth
after his break with Wagner in 1877, Nietzsche also experienced
two significant periods of estrangement from his own family.
The first rift with his sister Elisabeth and his mother came as a result of his catastrophic relationship with Lou Salomé, which reached its greatest intensity in Tautenberg in the summer

 of 1882 and imploded in Leipzig in November of the same year.
 His friendship with Paul Rée was a further casualty of this failed relationship. A second major rift with his family followed Elisabeth's announcement, in September 1883, that she planned to marry the Prussian super-patriot and anti-Semite Bernhard Förster. Nietzsche found support and understanding in visits and correspondence with Franz and Ida Overbeck in Basel, as well as in his friendship with the composer Heinrich Köselitz, a.k.a. Peter Gast, who also served as Nietzsche's proofreader
 and sometime scribe.
 In 1882 Nietzsche felt a semblance of good health restored,
 a return of energy and optimism, which brought renewed productivity in his philosophical writing. The winter and spring
 of 1882 had seen him complete The Joyful Science, in which he proclaimed the death of God. During his summer sojourn in Tautenberg, the only summer during these years he did not spend in Sils Maria, he was correcting the final proofs of /
 S.
 Having conceived the doctrine of eternal recurrence the previ-
 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 719
 ous summer at "The Rock" near Sils Maria, he finished part I of Z during a ten-day stretch of good weather in Rapallo in January 1883, part II in Sils Maria the following July, and part III in Nice in January 1884. According to his own account, he had taken up work on part IV, finishing it in February 1885.
 Although he would not begin the actual writing of *Beyond
 Good and Evil* until June 1885 in Sils Maria, Notebooks 4, 7, and 24 document how much the topics of that later book already occupied him during his writing of Z.
 Notebook 1 is dedicated to Lou Salomé, who visited Nietzsche in Tautenberg, a scenic forested region south of Naumburg, beginning on 7 August, for three weeks of daily walks and intense conversations. Its tone reflects Nietzsche's exhilaration in anticipation of her visit. He had made her acquaintance through his friend Paul Rée, the German moral philosopher and Darwinist, whose Psychologische Beobachtungen (Psychological Observations) had inspired Nietzsche and broadened his exposure to British and French thinking. Salomé eventually proposed that the three of them live together, chastely, for a year in an informal "monastery of free spirits." This idealized community of minds provided a facade for the ruthless competition between the two men for an exclusive and less than chaste relationship with Salomé. Both of them unsuccessfully proposed marriage. Notebooks 2 and 3 stem from the last few days in Tautenberg with Salomé and from Nietzsche's time in Leipzig, where Rée and Salomé visited him after he had fled his family's enmity. His sister Elisabeth, who had turned against Salomé since their visit in Bayreuth, did all she could to turn Nietzsche's mother and Nietzsche himself against Salomé.' Notebooks 4-6 reflect a period of extreme isolation and depression in the winter of 1882-83, when Nietzsche considered

2. Psychologische Beobachtungen (Berlin: Duncker, 1875); translated and edited by Robin Small as Psychological Observations, in Paul Rée, Basic Writings (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2003), 1-80. Nietzsche's Wayward Disciple (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1968).

720 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

suicide following the implosion of his relationship with Salomé. Nietzsche recovered enough to finish part I of Z. 4 Notebooks 7 and 9 stem from the late spring and early summer that Nietzsche spent in Genoa and Rome, a time of reconciliation with his family. Notebook 8 and Notebooks 10-14 were composed in the productive summer of 1883 in Sils Maria, where Nietzsche completed part II of Z. They coincide with his final

break with Rée and his coming to terms with the end of his relationship with Salomé.

Notebooks 1s–21 contain notes from the late summer of 1883 in Sils Maria and the early fall, when Nietzsche was intensely occupied with part III of Z. Nietzsche also visited his family in Naumburg for a few weeks until the second rift with his sister. Notebooks 22 and 23 reflect Nietzsche's productivity following the move to his new winter home in Nice; Notebook 24 stems from early January and February of 1884, when he completed part III of Z and resumed his work on part IV. Nietzsche's Notes on Secondary Sources?

The years 1881–83 marked a time of transition in Nietzsche's studies as well, from his self-described "middle" period to his

"late" period, and featured a review and rereading of authors

he had first consulted in the mid-1870s, including Schopenhauer, Emerson, Eugen Dühring, Philipp Mainländer, and F. A. Lange.[®] His creative focus for most of this period was on Z, CW, on the different stages in Nietzsche's composition of Z. 5. In this section we offer a brief look at the principal sources that Nietzsche cites, quotes, or paraphrases in the notebooks of this volume. A more complete list of references to his source material may be found in the endnotes. See Thomas H. Brobjer, Nietzsche's Philosophical Context: An Intellectual

Biography (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2008), 222–26, for a comprehensive list of sources, organized by year and by notebook. For more detailed analysis of Nietzsche's sources, organized by topic, see Robin

Small, Nietzsche in Context (Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 2001). TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 721

but there are also many preparatory notes that find later application in BGE. Notebook 7 even features an early version of BGE 260, in which the notions of master- and slave-morality are presented for the first time.

The notes that Nietzsche took while developing his thoughts on the status of the self, the genealogy of morality, and the relationship of rational thought to the physiological functions of drives are found mainly in Notebooks 7, 15, and 16. In Notebook 7, where Nietzsche is writing on egoism and morality, we find notes on the German philosopher Eduard von Hartmann, whose Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins ("Phenomenology of moral consciousness")⁷ was an important source on Spinoza. Nietzsche's critique of metaphysics and of the "I" as a foundation of epistemology had many sources. Later in these notes he refers specifically to the German philosopher Gustav Teichmüller's Die wirkliche und die scheinbare Welt ("The real and the apparent world"),⁸ the dualism of Teichmüller's title being one of the fundamental concepts that Nietzsche wished to refute. Although Nietzsche's friendship with Rée ended with the Salomé debacle, his reception and rejection of Rée's ideas on moral philosophy continue in these notebooks (see Notebook 7n). Nietzsche reread Dühring's Kursus der Philosophie ("The course of philosophy")⁹ during this period. It is from Dühring that Nietzsche appropriated and modified the term ressentiment that would occupy such a key place in On the Genealogy of Morality! Many of Dühring's works are among the most heavily annotated in Nietzsche's personal library.

7. Eduard von Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins: Prolegomena zu jeder künftigen Ethik ("Phenomenology of moral consciousness: Prolegomena to every future ethics") (Berlin: C. Duncker's Verlag, 1879).

8. Gustav Teichmüller, Die wirkliche und die scheinbare Welt: Neue Grundlegung der Metaphysik ("The real and the apparent world: New groundwork of metaphysics") (Breslau: Koebner, 1882).

Weltanschauung und Lebensgestaltung ("A course in philosophy as strictly scientific worldview and guide to life") (Leipzig: Koschny, 1875).

722 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

The physiological bases of sense impressions and the dynamic of competing drives were another point of focus and study for Nietzsche during this period. There is frequent reference to the German zoologist and founder of experimental embryology, Wilhelm Roux. For the images of the body as source of expansion of energy and joy, Nietzsche draws upon the works of Mainländer (né Philipp Batz), the German poet and philosopher, particularly Mainländer's Die Philosophie der Erlösung ("The philosophy of redemption").¹ One source on feelings of pleasure and pain that Nietzsche consulted at this time was the French philosopher and psychologist Leon Dumont's Vergnügen und Schmerz: Zur Lehre von den Gefühlen ("Pleasure and pain: On the doctrine of feelings").² For the physiological mechanisms informing sense impressions, Nietzsche appears to have relied upon Michael Foster's A Textbook of Physiology, in the Nicolaus Kleinenberg German translation,³ which drew substantially upon the work of Leipzig professor Ernst Heinrich Weber, who explored the connections between human physiology and psychology. Nietzsche also references three sources on animal physiology and drives that he consulted during this time, by the German ethnologist and animal ecologist Karl Semper, the French philosopher Alfred Espinas, and the German zoologist Georg Heinrich Schneider.

Nietzsche's eclectic interests in aesthetics, cultural history, and law find mention elsewhere in these notebooks. He cites from the Irish historian William Lecky on architecture as well as from the German classical art historian and archaeologist Johann Winckelmann's famous essay on depictions of suffering. Nietzsche's continuing fascination with the ancient Greeks

u. Philipp Mainländer, Die Philosophie der Erlösung (Berlin{: Grieben,}

1876),

12. Léon Dumont, Vergnügen und Schmerz: Zur Lehre von den Gefühlen

(Leipzig: Brockhaus, 1876).

Kleinenberg (Heidelberg: Winter, 1881).

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 723

is especially evident in Notebooks 8 and 24, reflecting in part his reading of German classicist Leopold Schmidt's Die Ethik der alten Griechen ("The ethics of the ancient Greeks").!4

Nietz-

sche's interest in Eastern philosophy and Hinduism from his early period, which came from Schopenhauer, was revitalized in part by his rereading the translations and works of his friend

Paul Deussen, the German Indologist and professor of philosophy at the University of Kiel. His references to guilt and innocence in light of judicial punishment quote the German legal scholar Rudolf von Ihering.

Our Philosophy of Translation

Our goal in translating Nietzsche's unpublished notebooks is not only to provide a precise English translation of each word or phrase but also to capture the style and spirit of what Nietzsche was trying to say, as Nietzsche might have formulated it in English." For Nietzsche, language is everything. How cleverly Nietzsche expressed a thought was often as important to him as what he was saying. Thus, in searching for English equivalents for Nietzsche's German, we have sought to recapture at least some of the wordplay, wit, and clever phrasing (Schlagfertigkeit) that permeate his writing.

Communicating the sense of Nietzsche's text to readers who do not read German poses challenges rarely encountered when translating the philosophical writing of other authors. Some of Nietzsche's formulations in these notebooks draw as much upon literary traditions, for example, the rhetoric of the aphorism – looking back to Goethe, Lichtenberg, Montaigne, and

14. Leopold Schmidt, Die Ethik der alten Griechen, vol. 1

(Berlin: Wilhelm Hertz [Bessersche Buchhandlung], 1882). Michael A. Scarpitti in their translation of the material known as The Will to Power. See their “Note on the Text and Translation” in The Will to Power (London: Penguin Books, 2017), xxvii-xxxiii.

724 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

beyond – as they do upon the rhetoric of traditional philosophical argument. Many formulations anticipate the incredible range of rhetoric and genre that characterizes Z. As Clancy Martin rightly observes, [another problem with translating Z – perhaps the thorniest of all – is that Nietzsche imitates so many different kinds of writing in the book. As a philologist and nineteenth-century German, he is often classical: sometimes Thucydidean, sometimes Platonic, sometimes satirical after Juvenal or Persius, sometimes as clear, precise and methodical as Aristotle. As a minister's son and a parodist and opponent of Christianity his style is often biblical, and specifically Lutheran. And, finally, as German's greatest stylist yet, he is innovative and above all modern: modern in the sense that we more commonly associate with French and English writers in the early twentieth century.!]®

Our approach to translating Nietzsche set in motion a continuous process of linguistic exploration and return, analogous to that of expatriates, who, having been immersed in another language and culture, are confronted, after returning home, with the challenge of communicating the otherness of the experience in a language with a different vocabulary and different cultural norms and expectations. The Latin-derived English term “translate” and its inseparably-prefixed German equivalents übersetzen/übertragen connote this sense of carrying something over or across a barrier or divider – in this case, to use one of Nietzsche's favorite metaphors, the vast ocean that divides

Nietzsche's nineteenth-century German and our twenty-first-century American English.

Navigating this "ocean" required continuous attention to the historical context of Nietzsche's language, which meant taking into

16. Clancy Martin, review of Thus Spoke Zarathustra, comparing the translations of Adrian Del Caro and Graham Parkes, Notre Dame Philo- sophical Reviews: An Electronic Journal, 2008.02.06, <http://ndpr.nd.edu/news/thus-spoke-zarathustra/>.

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 725

account semantic developments in German – and in English – since Nietzsche's time. We therefore found it essential to consult works such as Flügel's Praktisches Englisch-Deutsches und Deutsch-

Englisches Worterbuch in zwei Theilen ("Practical dictionary of the English and German languages in two volumes") from 1852, Grieb's Deutsch-Englisches und Englisch-Deutsches Wörterbuch ("Dictionary of the English and German languages") from 1885,

Kiirschner's Universal-Konversations-Lexikon ("Universal encyclopedia for conversations") from 1900, and Biichmann's Geflügelte

Worte: Der Citatenschatz des deutschen Volkes ("Dictums: A treasury of quotations for the German people") from 1882 and 1910, along with the Nietzsche Wörterbuch from the De Gruyter Nietzsche Online resource, the indispensable online Grimm Wörterbuch (Grimm), and the condensed print and online editions of the OED." Although we did not view reference works contemporary with Nietzsche as definitive in themselves, they did help us decide, for example, whether vergewaltigen ("to rape" in modern German) was to be understood predominantly in sexual terms, how positively the image of a Biedermann ("man of honor" or "upright citizen") was viewed in Wilhelminian society, and how Übermensch and übermenschlich were translated before Nietzsche. The descriptions and illustrations in Kürschner helped us to reimagine the science, technology, and fashion of the nineteenth century. Biichmann allowed us to identify the sources and specific phrasing of famous quotations and literary allusions, as they were understood in Nietzsche's time. In the endnotes, we provide translations of quotations in French, Latin, and Greek; we document Nietzsche's frequent references and allusions to events and proverbs of the Luther Bible; Wörterbuch in zwei Theilen (Leipzig: Julius E. Richter; Hamburg: Meissner, 1852); Christoph Fr. Grieb, Deutsch-Englisches und Englisch-Deutsches Wörterbuch, 2 vols. (Stuttgart: Neff, 1885); Joseph Kürschner, Universal-Konversations-Lexikon (Berlin: Hermann Hilger Verlag, 1900?); and Georg Büchmann, Geflügelte Worte: Der Citatenschatz des deutschen Volkes (Berlin: F. Weidling, 1882, 1910).

726 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

we identify philosophers and authors prominent in Nietzsche's time, some of whom remain largely unknown to nonspecialists; and we define obscure technical terms from proto-industrial Wilhelminian society such as Nachen ([jolly] boat) or Fliegenwedel (shoe-Ay/fly whisk).

Notes on Some Common Grammatical Constructions

Because of their origins as West Germanic dialects of Indo-European, as well as the structural and pedagogical influence of Latin on the development of the written languages, German and English have many grammatical constructions in common. However, divergent patterns of usage mean that some constructions flow more naturally in one language than in the other, even when both languages accept them as grammatical. That's why we sometimes choose alternatives that we think read better in American English, in order to capture the fluency and impact of Nietzsche's German."?

A salient illustration of this approach involves how we render the third-person singular universal pronoun man. Following Walter Kaufmann, a few translators still render man by using the universal impersonal third-person English pronoun "one." Although grammatical, the usage of "one" as an impersonal universal is disappearing from American English, replaced by pronominal universals such as "you" or "we." The challenge is that Nietzsche uses man continually in his writing, and such usage flows naturally in Nietzsche's prose. But when one uses

"one" to render man, one often finds that one's prose no longer flows quite so well. That's why we chose to substitute the pro-nominal plural universal "we" for man, along with its possessive pronoun "our" for sein.

18. Hill and Scarpitti follow a similar approach: "[T]here are many grammatical constructions which, while equally possible in both languages, are far more natural in German than in English." Thus, they prefer not to "reproduce such constructions at the price of making Nietzsche's writing appear far clunkier in the original that it actually is" (Will to Power, xxix).

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 727

Man liebt immer nur seine We always love only our desire Begierde und nicht das Begehrte. and not what we desire.

(3[1] 105)

This use of first-person plural can introduce a nuance of inclusion between narrator and readers that is not conveyed by man.

We adjust our phrasing wherever this nuance conflicts with what we think Nietzsche was trying to say. The pronoun man can also function as a passive substitute in German, something that has no real equivalent in English. When Nietzsche uses man in this way, we render it in the passive whenever possible.

Personen, die man zu einem People who were employed for an Unternehmen benutzt hat, enterprise which has failed should welches mifSrathen ist, soll man be doubly compensated.

(1[5])

doppelt belohnen.

Inflection

The fact that German is more highly inflected than English influenced our basic approach in decisive ways.

(1) We add the noun "people" to adjectival constructions in which the nominal form is omitted in order to distinguish between das Gute (the good, what is good) and die Guten (good people). We realize that in doing so we are moving away from usage that has been accepted since Kaufmann. But translating both das Gute and die Guten as "the good" introduces ambiguity that is not there in the German, where inflection makes it clear whether the reference is to a quality or to a person. Thus, when we translate die Guten as "good people," the chapter title Von den Tugendhaften in Z as "On Virtuous People," and so on, we are not adding anything to what Nietzsche says. His formulations make it clear which one he means;

we are merely preserving the clarity of the original.

(2) Differing levels of inflection also mean that word order is used more often to convey emphasis in German, whereas English typically uses word order to identify subject and object functions and must therefore rely upon adverbial phrases or clauses to convey emphasis. Nietzsche often begins declarative clauses with the accusative object or a prepositional phrase, a standard syntactical device to convey emphasis in German. Retaining such inversion in the English sentence results in clunky phrasing or even ambiguity.

728 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

We therefore prefer to use standard English word order

and try to convey Nietzsche's emphasis in other ways.

Über jedes Leiden sind wir We are outraged by each act of empört, wenn es sinnlos ist, suffering, when it is senseless,

"unverdient" ... "undeserved"... (7[9])

(3) In German, inflection allows readers to identify most pro-nominal antecedents through gender, number, and case agreement; in English, readers must rely on number agreement and syntax. In cases where the antecedent of "it" is not clear
in English, we replace "it" with the nominal form of the antecedent to preserve the clarity of Nietzsche's prose, as with our substitution of "the ocean" (in bold) in the following passage

Ich blicke hinab in das Meer: I look down into the ocean: it lies

still steht es und tiickisch blickt _ placidly and out of it an image

mir aus ihm ein Bild entgegen. looks treacherously back at me.

Ein kostbares Bild mit weißen In its arms the ocean holds Brüsten hält es in seinen Armen: a priceless image with white

träge und tückisch schleicht es breasts: it steals languidly
and über den Sand, daß – – – treacherously across the sand, so that – – – (9[t])

Flavoring Particles (Modalpartikeln)

German and English both use adverbial flavoring particles to convey nuances of the speaker's intentions or expectations.

But

different flavoring particles have emerged in the historical development of each language, and even where cognates have survived

(denn!"then"; nämlich!"namely,"), it is not always preferable to use the cognate or even one equivalent word to express what Nietzsche was trying to convey. The semantic diversity of

the

flavoring particle doch and the temporal connotations of the flavoring particle erst pose particular challenges, and we provide the following examples to illustrate our approach. The ubiquitous doch occurs almost four thousand times in Nietzsche's writings and functions not only to convey greater emphasis but also as the principal particle of contradiction for negations and of contrast for diminutions. The context determines that we render doch as

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 729

"still" (7[25]), as "but" (7[30]), as "yet" (7[44] and 7[52]), and as

"and yet" to begin a clause (7[75]).

The particle erst has two principal contexts in Nietzsche's notes:

(1) As a synonym for zuerst ("first" or "initially"), for example, marking the first time an action or event occurs.

(2) In combination with adverbs or conjunctions, jetzt erst, dann erst, erst wenn, or by itself, as a synonym for erst recht, for example, when the action or event is occurring for the first time but not until or only after an initial condition has been met. The challenge is to find an equivalent in English that expresses this nuance of conditional temporality. We think that negating the resulting action or event, as in the following example, conveys the conditional aspect and allows the English to flow as naturally as Nietzsche's German.

Erst wenn ihr diirstet, sollt ihr You should not drink until you trinken: und erst wenn der Geist are thirsty: and you should not euch treibr, sollt ihr tanzen. dance until the spirit moves you.

Und lernt erst lügen, damit ihr And only learn how to lie so that versteht, was Wahrheit-reden ist! you understand what truth-

Der Hunger erst soll euch zur telling is! You should not be Wahrheit zuriicktreiben: und driven back to the truth until wenn ihr voll seid der guten you are hungry for it: and when Weine der Wahrheit, werdet ihr you have drunk your fill of the auch tanzen wollen. good wines of truth, then you will also want to dance. (23[6])

 To render Erst wenn ihr dürstet, sollt ihr trinken as “you should y drink only when you are thirsty” conveys the restrictive nuance
 y y y y:
 but misses the nuance of “not until” implicit in Nietzsche’s use of this construction.

730 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

Gerundive and Standard Nouns of Creativity or Cognition Nietzsche makes extensive use of attributive and nominal gerundives to designate cognitive or creative activity. For example, he is careful to differentiate between the standard noun for “creator, der Schöpfer, and its gerundive variant, “someone who creates,” der Schaffende, with the latter term occurring in variants over two hundred times in his works, notes, and letters. To render both Schöpfer and Schaffender as “creator” obliterate
 a key semantic distinction in Nietzsche’s German. Therefore,
 we maintain the distinction by using “one who creates” or “someone who creates” in the singular and “those who create”
 whenever we pluralize to preserve gender neutrality (see below).
 We follow the same approach with analogous pairs such as Kenner!
 Erkennende (connoisseur/someone who knows), Lehrer/Lehrende (teacher/someone who teaches), and so on.

Singular Universals

Nietzsche frequently uses masculine singular inflection in his discussions of species (der Mensch), ethnicity (der Chinese), or vocation (der Dichter). Take, for example, his claim “der wird durch seine Instinkte geleitet" (7[239]), which has traditionally been translated as "man is guided by his instincts."

Mensch

When

Nietzsche uses masculine singular inflection in such contexts, he does not have an individual in mind, but rather a universal prototype that embodies all of the qualities typically associated with humanity. In choosing Mensch instead of Mann, Nietzsche clearly has a universal prototype in mind that includes men and women. But as soon as a possessive pronoun is required, German and traditional English usage both call for masculine inflection (sein/"his").

We decided to move away from traditional English usage for two reasons: (1) our desire to preserve gender neutrality –

we no longer wanted to allow masculine inflection to stand for the universal prototype; (2) we were concerned about the TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 731 potential that contemporary readers less fluent in German might confuse the gendered connotations of "man" and "his" with the universal connotations of these pronouns. We then weighed some contemporary translators' alternatives for rendering such universality. We decided against universalizing the possessive pronoun itself by pluralizing it (der Dichter! sein

= "the poet"/"their") for two reasons: (1) it is ungrammatical;

(2) there is the potential for overlap with pronouns associated with emerging gender-neutral usage in the US. We also decided against using feminine inflection ihr/"her" consistently or alternating the gender of the possessive pronoun (sein = "his," then "her," then "his," etc.). Any of these approaches would obscure or even destroy the complexly consistent gendering that is one of the foundations of Nietzsche's worldview. In the end, we settled upon the option of pluralizing nominal forms as a grammatical alternative that preserves the sense of proto-typical universality. Thus, we render "der Mensch wird durch seine Instinkte geleitet" as "human beings are driven by their instincts."

We extend this pluralization model to include ethnic designations:

Der Chinese ißt sehr viel The Chinese eat very many Gerichte in sehr kleinen dishes in very small portions.
Portionen. (81)

as well as to vocations,

Wer als Dichter mit baarem Those who, as poets, want to pay Golde zahlen will, muß mit with pure gold must pay with seinen Erlebnissen zahlen: their experiences: for this reason, deshalb verbittet sich aber der though, poets refuse to tolerate Dichter seine nächsten Freunde having their closest friends as als Interpreten – sie errathen, interpreters – their closest indem sie zurück rathen. friends figure things out by giving them feedback. (7[111])

732 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

as well as to masculine singular interrogative universals: Wer seinen Gegner tödten will, Those who want to kill their mag erwägen, ob er ihn nicht enemies should consider whether gerade dadurch bei sich this act will immortalize their verewigt. enemies for them. (12[1] 77)

and even to some neuter singular gender designations:

Vom Weibe On Women {not: "On the Woman"} {title of 1[111]}

As soon as a singular modifier is added, either an adjective (der christliche Gott! "the Christian God") or a restrictive phrase or clause (die Unschuld der Lügen "the innocence of a lie"), the singular definite article is called for in English. In the plural, the definite article is often dropped: die weiblichen Affecte =

"female affects." In general, when a masculine possessive universal is called for, we pluralize.

Punctuation

Translators of Nietzsche still struggle with the issue of rendering his punctuation. We have tried to preserve Nietzsche's original punctuation wherever possible. This works well, for the most part, with colons, semicolons, dashes, and exclamation points.

However, the rules dictating comma usage differ to such a degree between German and English, especially in regard to dependent clauses, that we do occasionally delete Nietzsche's commas where English usage does not call for them. We also add commas where their absence would result in ambiguity or lack of clarity in rendering Nietzsche's original.

Translating Unpublished Fragments

Translating Nietzsche's unpublished fragments meant taking several issues into account that surface less often when translating his published works.

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 733

Issues of Genre

Nietzsche used these notebooks for many different purposes.

He composed Z between 1883 and 1885, and large portions of the notebooks served as a laboratory for working on outlines and phrasing for Z. Our readers can follow his different plans for organizing the material, changes in the titles of the different sections, and early versions of passages that are among his most famous. There is even a brief outline for a Z drama. There is also a good deal of material relating to the composition of BGE, notably in Notebooks 3, 7, 12, and 15; BGE appeared in 1886. The notebooks in this volume also contain a small collection of poems, Nietzsche's notes on authors and works he was reading, and commentary on philosophical topics and issues of the day.

Issues of Style

A significant challenge involved translating the frequent ellipses.

Often Nietzsche chose not to complete a thought, substituting three long dashes, which could indicate that he

considered the conclusion to be foregone or else that he believed
he still had work to do.
Eure Krankheiten treten gegen Your ailments set themselves euch auf und verklagen euch ob against you and accuse you on der Tugenden, deren ihr euch account of the virtues you gloat briistet: und was euch nicht about: and what doesn't suit auf den Leib paßt, wie sollte your body, how should this das ein — — — — — (17[13]) Nietzsche also frequently abbreviated words for which Colli and Montinari supplied emendations. Here, on occasion, we adjusted the angle-bracketing of the words to make the English
as comprehensible as the German:
So w(enig) Viernunft) a(ls) As little) r(eason) a(s) p(oss-ible)
m(öglich) — das ist, artiger — this is, more delicately geredet: Zufall. Auf den Füßen phrased: chance. All things run des Zufalls laufen alle Dinge there and back on the feet of hinweg und zurück — — — chance — — — (18[30])
734 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD
As a general rule, we tried to convey rather than to resolve ambiguities in Nietzsche's original phrasing. We preserved
the ellipses, kept fragments fragmentary, found English equivalents for his abbreviations, and retained ungrammatical usage.
We only provided emendations when it seemed to us that the text of our translation would appear incomprehensible to the English reader in a way that Nietzsche's original text would not appear to the German reader.
We also learned to be alert to Nietzsche's use of appositives, generally a series of two or more unpunctuated, equivalent nouns or phrases. Rendering these appositives differs from rendering a grammatical series, that is, three or more nouns or phrases joined by commas and a concluding conjunction (usually und/"and" or oder/"or") that signals whether they are
to be considered as alternatives or as synonyms within a collective concept. Unless the lack of punctuation renders the

fragment incomprehensible, we provide an English equivalent for each appositive without punctuation in order to maintain the ambiguity of relationship conveyed by Nietzsche's German. Zarathustra 3. einsam gottlos Zarathustra 3. alone godless furchtbar fürchterlich soll terrible terrifying, Zarathustra Zarathustra dem Einsiedler should appear this way to the erscheinen – hermit – (17[75])

Our readers will also notice that Nietzsche repeats or revises particular thoughts, turns of phrase, or even entire fragments within the body of our twenty-four notebooks, a process that will extend into volume 15 of The Complete Works and, in some cases, into Z (CW 7) itself. Some changes involve as little as substituting a semicolon for a comma. In other places, Nietzsche-sche undertakes minor revisions; see, for example, the four variations at 13[1]_ 379, 13[12], 16[7], and 22[1]_550. Colli

and Montinari

note many of these variants, but they also miss a substantial number of them. We provide what we hope are comprehensive lists of these passages, with the goal of allowing readers to follow how Nietzsche's phrasing and thoughts evolved during the three-year period covered by this volume.'

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 735

Issues of Content

Our approach to translating the content of the fragments and notes collected in this volume has been influenced by the existing translations of Z and of other works that Nietzsche would subsequently publish, especially BGE. The history of translating Z into English extends back more than a century, generating not only a working English vocabulary for Z but also a range of possibilities for the translation of each fragment-ment. We sometimes break with precedent, most notably in our translation of Mensch and Übermensch, but also in translating some other key terms (see below). Once we determine the translation of an individual term in a particular context, we use that translation in all of Nietzsche's notes to Z and in our translation of Z.

We do not document which specific fragments Nietzsche chose or adapted for Z, beyond those already noted by Colli and Montinari. In our view, making such connections is in itself an interpretive act. The De Gruyter Nietzsche Online website provides the most complete documentation of Z references in the unpublished material. Any repetition of a term or even a particular phrase can easily be documented by an on-line search. We document repetitions or adaptations of individual fragments within the notes themselves. For the longer fragments, such as 13[1], 13[3], and 22[1], we provide the page number within this volume as a convenience to our readers.

Our volumes also contain material that Nietzsche chose not to use for Z, for example, in Notebooks 13 and 15. This presents a different challenge for translators. Although we have the published version of Z to document Nietzsche's final decisions

19. Locating such parallel passages is done most efficiently through online searches on websites such as NietzscheSource and De Gruyter's Nietzsche Online.

736 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

regarding diction and phrasing, there is no way of knowing what decision he had made at the time he recorded a particular note or a particular version of a fragment. The absence of a term, such as Pergament, or a character, such as Pana (13[3]_ 401), or a scene, such as Zarathustra's conversation with the king in 13[4], in the published version of Z, or conversely, its presence in abandoned material, is not necessarily evidence against its validity as part of the process of development in Nietzsche's phrasing and thought. Therefore, even if all translators agree on the rendering of a term or phrase in the published lished version of Z, this does not guarantee that such a rendering is valid for Nietzsche's notes.

There are also extended sections that contain the actual notes that Nietzsche took on works by authors such as Emerson, von Hartmann, and Roux, most notably in Notebooks 7, 15, 16 and 24. Where Nietzsche quotes from German translations of works written originally in English or French, our editors, Alan D. Schrift and Duncan Large, assisted us in finding existing English versions of those works. Where Nietzsche appears to be paraphrasing or rendering the content in his own words, we provide our own translation.

Other sections, most notably "Böse Weisheit"/"Wicked Wisdom," the collection of aphorisms at the beginning of Notebook 12, consist of excerpts or revisions from earlier works such as The Birth of Tragedy, Dawn, and Human, All Too Human, plus material that would be included in BGE. In such cases, passages are noted and the sources are identified wherever possible. Some notebooks contain material subsequently incorporated into the text edited by Nietzsche's sister and published as The Will to Power. If the work Nietzsche is quoting has already appeared in the Stanford edition of Nietzschesche's Complete Works, we use the existing Stanford translation of the passage, although we do standardize the rendering of grammatical constructions like man (see above) as a courtesy to our readers.

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 737

Translating Nietzsche's Poetry

The period from 1882 to 1885 also marks Nietzsche's return to poetry after a five-year hiatus." Indeed, in the eleven-year period between the publication of "An die Melancholie" ("To Melancholy") in 1871 and the poems of /S, Nietzsche published only three poems, "Der Wanderer" ("The Wanderer"), "Am Gletscher" ("At the Glacier"), and "Der Herbst" ("Autumn"). Nevertheless, as Philip Grundlehner has noted, Nietzsche "believed poetry to be a vital and inseparable part of his production as philosopher." The "New Columbus" variants included in this volume illustrate the fact that Nietzsche "revised many of his poems sometimes over a period of years," which is further evidence that he took his poetry seriously."

And unlike Schopenhauer, Nietzsche's "poetry is not separate from philosophy" but rather "it adds a dimension that prose does not permit."?*

We attempt to convey the beauty and profundity of Nietzsche's poetry, but we do not attempt to duplicate his rhyme schemes, thereby privileging accuracy in content over the aesthetic effects of form.

In regard to word order, German inflection allows for even greater latitude in poetry than it does in prose. This is also true of English, to a more limited degree.

Hence, we do maintain German word order in some lines whenever we think that doing so preserves the integrity or the flow of a particular poem.

20. In translating the poems that appear in these notes, we drew upon several insights presented by Philip Grundlehner, The Poetry of Friedrich

Nietzsche (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986).

21. "The Wanderer" was included in a letter to Erwin Rohde (18 July 1876, KGB II:5, 177): "At the Glacier" and "Autumn" were both composed during Nietzsche's ill-fated but productive stay in Rosenlaubad above Bern in August 1877. For the original text and an English translation, along with extensive analysis, see Grundlehner, The Poetry of Friedrich Nietzsche, 63-88.

738 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

A Glossary of Standardized Terms

In the glossary that follows, we discuss our choices for some important terms in Z and the notebooks that are associated with it, especially in cases where we diverge from precedent.

In our endnotes, we briefly state our reasons for rendering other less common or more obscure terms.

aufheben – The word fields divide in English among (1) the standard meaning of the verb aufheben, which we render as “abolish”; (2) specialized meanings in conjunction with particular accusative objects (we “lift” a ban, we “set aside” a judgment, we “repeal” a law); (3) the reflexive verb sich aufheben, which we render as “cancel themselves out” or “nullify themselves”; (4) and variants of the reflexive noun Selbst-Aufhebung, which we don’t think Nietzsche intended in a Hegelian sense and which we render as “self-abolishing,” to mirror the form of Nietzsche’s key term Selbstüberwindung (“self-overcoming”).

Bildner (der) – Here we follow Gary Handwerk in HAH and HAH II, rendering Bildner as “sculptor” (Handwerk also uses “shaper”), except for the hyphenated noun Götzen-Bildner, where we follow the standard English locution “idol-makers.” Nietzsche generally prefers Künstler for “artist” (almost a thousand occurrences in his works, notes, and letters) and reserves Bildner as a special metaphor of creation through destruction.

Empfindung (die) – At B in the Critique of Pure Reason, Kant translates Empfindung with the Latin sensatio and Wahrnehmung with the Latin perceptio. Following this suggestion, English-speaking translators of Kantian and post-Kantian German philosophical texts have usually chosen to render these two terms as “sensation” and “perception.” But Kant is idiosyncratic in this respect and is not following any generally accepted usage in the German language. In fact, as these notes show, Nietzsche uses the term Empfindung in a much wider sense that actually does follow the generally accepted use of this term and does not adhere to the very technical and restricted use proposed by Kant for use in philosophy discussions related to his preferred topics. It is true that post-Kantian philosophers such as Hegel and Schopenhauer attempt to follow Kant's usage in this respect (hence the similar translation of their use of these two terms), but it is certainly not the case that all German philosophers continued to follow Kant's proposed meanings. Nietzsche did not; in fact, as our translation shows, he most often had in mind the affective sense of the term Empfindung that is best captured by our English term "feeling." Moreover, when Nietzsche does have in mind the more cognitive associations of the term Empfindung (as in 7[198] and 24[13, 15, 16]), he usually has a wider sense in mind that is best captured by our English term "perception." When Nietzsche clearly has something like sensation in mind (as in 7[139] and 7[223]), we have not hesitated to render Empfindung as "sensation." In short, we should not always apply Kant's severely restricted and technical distinction between Empfindung and Wahrnehmung to Nietzsche's use of these terms unless we are positive that Nietzsche is quoting or discussing some Kantian or neo-Kantian text or topic (as in 5[1]239 and 7[223]). Our translation looks closely at each place where Nietzsche uses these two terms and makes a case-by-case contextual decision that we think best captures his meaning.

TRANSLATOR’S AFTERWORD 739

erkennen/Erkenntnis (die) /Erkennende(r) – In contrast to the fundamental verbs of knowing, wissen and kennen, which describe a situation, condition, or result, erkennen and its variants describe a process through which knowledge is gained. Of the semantic variants for erkennen cited in the Deutsches Wörterbuch von Jacob und Wilhelm Grimm, we distinguish in Nietzsche's notes between the mundane sense of "to recognize" or "to realize" and the epistemological process paraphrased in Grimm as geistiges erkennen und einsehen, which can include knowledge or insights gained through reason or experience.

740 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

Rather than attempt to generate an artificial vocabulary that could do justice not only to distinctions within standard

German usage but also to philosophical discourse then and now, we decided to render Erkenntnis/Erkennen as “knowledge/known.” We opted for this conventional rendering for three reasons: (1) it reflects actual English usage in the epistemological debates among Kant’s British interlocutors such as Locke, Berkeley, and Hume, of which Nietzsche was aware and which he took into account; (2) it has been preserved and sustained in contemporary philosophical discourse about Nietzsche’s epistemology; (3) it better reflects Nietzsche’s semantic preferences in the unpublished notes, where erkennen predominates over wissen. We document a few exceptions in the endnotes.

Erlösung/erlösen – We translate Erlösung as “redemption” in most passages, rendering Nietzsche’s litany Erlösung von Erlösern as “redemption from redeemers.” We believe that “liberation” is closest to N’s meaning in 16[z] and 16[33], and we use this to render his other litany, Man soll das Weib im Weibe erlösen as “Woman must be liberated from women.” In some contexts, we prefer the biblical phrasing “to deliver ourselves” or “to deliver us from” because of the potential confusion with the therapeutic connotations of “redeeming ourselves.”

Feuerhund (der)/Höllenhund (der) – Feuerhund and Höllen-hund designate the same being in Nietzsche’s notebooks, where images of hell predominate (cf. 13[2], 13[3]_400 and 13[3]_403), as well as in Z II and IV, where there is more emphasis on classical mythology and on Zarathustra’s quest for essential minerals from the center of the earth. Translators from Kaufmann onward have chosen the literal rendering “firehound/fire-hound/fire hound” for Feuerhund, which we did not adopt for three reasons: (1) “firehound” is a neologism that has no place in the English vocabulary of the underworld or hell; (2) in English, compound nouns beginning with “fire”

usually connote beings, tools, or structures that prevent fire,

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 741

not embody it; (3) “firehound” does not resonate with the political connotations that most commentators see in Nietzsche's Feuerhund. The word Feuerhund can also mean “andiron,” but this sense of the word has a separate etymology.” The American English equivalent of Feuerhund is not “firehound” but rather the regional southern variant “firedog,” further evidence that Hund should not be translated here by its cognate. Höllenhund is the German equivalent of the English word “hellhound,” used in folklore studies to designate any mythical dog with supernatural powers. As a category, hellhounds include Cerberus, the three-headed monster dog that guards the gates of the Underworld in Greek mythology; Garmr, the bloodstained guardian of Hel's gate in Old Norse mythology; and the raven-ing wolf/dogs that accompany Wotan or Graf Hachenberg in the Germanic mythology of “The Wild Hunt” (Die wilde Jagd), popularized by Jacob Grimm and adapted by several composers in Nietzsche's time. We render Höllenhund as “hound of hell” and Feuerhund as “hound of fire” to preserve the semantic distinction while retaining the parallels in form.

Freigeist [der] /Freigeisterei [die] – After consultation with our editors and with translators across CW, we have translated this term as “free spirit(s)” when the context indicates Nietzsche's positive position vis-a-vis what he is saying about these figures, as in 1[42] and 20[3]. We have translated the term as “free thinker(s)” when the context indicates that Nietzsche is voicing criticism vis-a-vis these figures, as in 4[16],

6[1], and

6[4]. We provide an endnote whenever the context calls for a departure from this general principle.

Frau [die] /Weib [das]/Weibchen [das] – Weib was the prevalent gender designation in Nietzsche's time, referring to women of every age, social status, and class. As the generic

25. See Grimm. Similar citations will subsequently be referred to according to the URL provided by Grimm for the term, in this case, <http://www.woerterbuchnetz.de/DWB?bookref=3,1594,56>. Both of our nineteenth-century German-English dictionaries translate it as “and-iron” or “firedog.”

742 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

term, its connotations were neutral, and designations could venerate or disparage, depending on its modifiers.° Readers accustomed to Fraulein as the primary designation for gender and social function in modern standard German must come to terms with the different semantic emphasis of Nietzsche's time, as illustrated by Nietzsche's comment in an early letter to Erwin Rohde (9 December 1868; KGB I:2, 351):

“Ubr-

gens auch mit seiner Frau, die ein ganz unmenschlich verdienstvolles Weib sein soll” (By the way, the same thing is true of his wife, who they say is an admirable woman in every way).

The translator's dilemma lies in finding equivalents for the above reversal of nuance, since the singular noun “woman?” is not only the generic term in English for an adult female, paired with “man,” but also can designate, in the singular without an article, the entire gender. We believe “women” is the best term for universal gender designations (see above), since the plural can stand for Nietzsche's pronouncements about the entire gender. In the case of Nietzsche's mantra “Das Weib im Weibe erlösen!” (To redeem the woman in women!; 16[50]), we use both the singular and the plural to preserve the distinction Nietzsche has in mind.

We searched long and hard for an English term that could convey the misogynist etymology associated with Weib, the literary motif of misogynist disparagement, das böse Weib, and the expletive Weiber! in German. Contemporary slang

("bitch," "witch," "wench," etc.) is too transitory and fails to resonate with the entire English-speaking community. American women colleagues whom we consulted suggested the technical generic term "female" in its colloquial form as the best misogynist equivalent, so we have made use of that.

26. <http://www.woerterbuchnetz.de/DWB?bookref=28,329,25>: "an sich gilt weib für die frau jedes alters und standes, für die ledige, verheirathete, verwitwete, lebende und tote, für jungfrauen und mütter" (weib is a valid designation for a woman of any age and social class, for unmarried, married, widowed, living and dead women, for virgins and mothers).

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 743

Nietzsche's love of supercilious diminutives such as ein altes Weibchen or ein junges Weibchen further complicates the process. "Little old lady" is a fair rendering of the former term, but there is no good equivalent in English for "little young lady." The Z I chapter title "Von alten und jungen Weiblein" presents a particularly interesting challenge. We follow Kaufmann, Del Caro, and Parkes with some minor variations in rendering it as "On Little Women, Old and Young."

Geist (der) – Most scholars agree that this term is one of the most difficult to translate, because there is no single word in English that captures everything that is meant by the German word. Accordingly, we have chosen to translate this word in different ways depending on the context. Where we think that Nietzsche is emphasizing the cognitive, rational, and intellectual aspects of the term, we have rendered it as "mind" or "intellect." Where we think that he is emphasizing the term's affective nuances having to do with emotion, feeling, pleasure, and value, we have rendered it as "spirit." This is not to say, however, that either of these aspects is meant to exclude the other. For example, a freier Geist is a "free spirit" in the sense of being an independent and morally unconstrained person who is liberated on both cognitive and noncognitive levels." Gemiith (das) – Our translation of Gemiith reflects its transitional status in Nietzsche's time.® In early translations from the Latin, Gemiith could be equated with either mens (the mind) or animus (the spirit). In the eighteenth century, Gemüth designated the home of all mental faculties, including perception and concepts or thoughts, "the total unity of our inner being," of which Geist (mind) was just a part. In the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, Gemüth became more narrowly associated with Empfindungen (feelings/sense 27. Thanks to Matthew Meyer for his advice on this entry.

28. http://www.woerterbuchnetz.de/DWB?bookref=5,32_93,72.744

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

impressions/sensations) and came to be understood as the repository for emotions and even sensuality. By the middle of the nineteenth century, the tendency was to distinguish between Geist, the mind as repository of reason and understanding, and Gemiith, the faculty of feeling and perception.

Gleichniss/Gleichniß (das) – Nietzsche makes frequent ironic reference in these notebooks to the concluding rhymes of Goethe's Faust II, "Alles Vergangliche ist nur ein Gleichnis" (All that is transitory is only a symbol). In passages where the allusion to Faust is clear, we render Gleichnis as "symbol," following almost all Faust translators. In biblical contexts, we render it as "parable." Elsewhere the context dictates whether we translate it as "metaphor," "simile," or "analogy."

hart/Härte (die) – Although most translators have chosen to render these terms with the English cognate in all contexts, we see a clear distinction in American English usage between "hard" as an attributive for objects versus "hard" as an attributivetive for persons. Flügel, one of our nineteenth-century sources, preserves the distinction between “rough, harsh, severe” conditions and “callous, fierce, inhuman” attitudes. The same problem exists for “hardness.” We don’t say “he showed great hardness in his dealings with others.” We don’t believe Nietzsche is restricting hart to a physical characteristic. He means “hardened,” “callous,” or “unyielding.” Our solution is to render hart, when meant as a personal attribute, as “hard-hearted.” We add attributes to the nominal variants that specifically signal that Nietzsche has personal characteristics in mind, such as “hardness of feeling” or “hardness of heart.” For example, we render the key phrase from Z III, “The Wanderer,” Gelobt sei, was hart macht, as “Praise be to whatever makes us hard-hearted.” For descriptive predicate adjectives, we prefer “hardened.”

héhere Menschen – With the exception of Graham Parkes, all Z translators use the English cognate “higher” in this context. We do not follow precedent here, because we do not believe that “higher men” or “higher human beings” conveys what Nietzsche is trying to say. The standard English equivalent adjective expressing connotations of “greater” or “more significant” is the Latin term “superior,” not “higher,” and that is what we use, except when English usage of the nominal form dictates something else, such as “more lofty feelings,” “greater pleasure,” or “higher purposes.”

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 745

kleine Menschen – Here we choose alternatives to the English phrasing “small people” or “little people,” in which there is too much potential for ambiguity between connotations of stature and connotations of social significance. We settled upon “puny” as the adjective that best conveys Nietzsche’s contempt. We settled upon “smallness” as the best equivalent of the nominal form, Kleinheit.

klug/Klugheit (die) – In Nietzsche it is necessary to distinguish between cleverness and prudence. For example, we render ihre dreiäugige Klugheit as “her three-eyed cleverness” (3[1] 181), but die Moral der Klugheit as “the morality of prudence”

(7[38]) and the chapter title in Z II, “Von der Menschenklugheit,” as “On Human Prudence.”

Kraft (die) – In most cases Nietzsche uses Kraft in scientific contexts to mean something like “force.” There are a few passages in Nietzsche’s notes where Kraft is better rendered as “power.” We note these exceptions.

Nächste (der)/Nachstenliebe (die) – The challenge here is to render the biblical phrasing that Nietzsche has in mind, translated in the most current version of the New Revised Standard Version of the Bible as “neighbor,” while avoiding confusion with the American English designation “neighbor” as “someone living close by.” Nietzsche himself plays with these connotations in 3[1] 202: “Unser Nächster ist nicht unser Nachbar’: so denken alle Politiker und Völker.” We render it as “Our neighbor doesn’t live in the neighborhood’: this is how all politicians and peoples think.” We choose to render the nominal form Nächstenliebe in biblical terms as “loving thy neighbor,” as in Jesus’s second great commandment, “Love thy neighbor as thyself.”

746 TRANSLATOR’S AFTERWORD

Selbstsucht (die)/Herrschaft (die) – Nietzsche uses the term Selbstsucht in contrast to several antonyms, in order to refute the negative connotations traditionally associated with this term. We render Selbstsucht as “selfishness” throughout our volumes, in contrast to Herrschaft (“imperiousness”), Nächstensucht ("neighborliness"), Gemeinsucht ("public-spiritedness"), and Selbstlosigkeit ("selflessness").

sollen/wollen – Nietzsche uses the dichotomy between the modal verbs du sollst and ich will repeatedly in these notebooks. This is his shorthand for the kind of human transformation he desires, moving from obedience before an external omnipotent God (du sollst) toward the internal imperative of the individual's will to power (ich will). To highlight the biblical context, we render the phrase du sollst, the basis for the Ten Commandments in German, in the archaic language of the King James Bible: "thou shalt."?? Translators since Thomas Common have rendered ich willin Nietzsche as "I will," which is problematical for several reasons. (1) /ch will without an infinitive verb is transitive and connotes either desire or present-tense volition, rendered most accurately as "I want (to)."

The

English equivalent "I will" is also transitive but connotes either future intention or present willing, not the modality of wanting. (2) If Nietzsche intended to render both as modal verbs, omitting the infinitive because it is irrelevant, then "I want to" and not "I will" is the proper rendering. (3) In placing the spirit of the lion above the gold-scaled dragon in "On the Three Transformations," Nietzsche is reversing the ideal modeled by Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane. In the King James version of Luke's gospel this passage reads: "Saying, 29. The New Revised Standard translation of the Bible renders this as "you shall."

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 747

Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me: nevertheless-less, not my will, but thine, be done." Luther rendered this as

"und sprach: Vater, willst du, so nehme diesen Kelch von mir, doch nicht mein, sondern dein Wille geschehe!" By contrast, Nietzsche advocates a transformation whereby humans will act according to the imperative "My will be done," that is, ever I want to happen, shall happen!" The English phrase "I will" with no accusative object does not convey this; most readers would understand this phrase as meaning "I will do this."

"What-

Thus, to communicate the essential nuance of volition, we translate ich willas "I will this."

Tafel (die) – For the nominal root, we distinguish between biblical contexts, in which we render Tafel as "tablet," and the contemporary context of moral philosophy, in which we render the term as "code." This differentiation allows us to preserve the traditional rendering of the Z III chapter as "On Old and New Tablets."

Zufall (der) – We translate the phenomenon as "chance" and an individual instance as a "coincidence" or an "accident."

We now move from a general discussion of our translation choices to a specific discussion of how we translate Nietzsche's crucial terms Mensch and Übermensch.

748 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

Translating Mensch and Übermensch

From Man to Humans

In German, the etymology of equivalents for "man" diverges into a masculine singular term for the male gender, der Mann, and a masculine singular term for the human species, der Mensch? Der Mensch has its origins in the adjectival form of Mann, but even the earliest sources show der Mensch and a neuter variant das Mensch?! signifying "in general, a human being, of both genders and of any age . . . and this general meaning occurs frequently in the singular as well as in the plural."?? The degree to which this contrast between the masculine singular form and the universal connotations became entrenched is evident in the surviving sixteenth-century singular idiom, das alle Menschen, as in "so wird dein alle menschen lachen" (then what is completely human in you [literally, what you share with all humans] will laugh). The flexibility of Mensch in connoting universality extends to an interchangeability of definite and indefinite articles (der Mensch can have the same connotation as ein Mensch). Species designations can occur in both the singular and the plural, thus making the pluralization of Mensch less significant than is usually the case.

Grimm documents the three principal occurrences of the masculine singular noun Mensch: (1) the metaphysical distinction between God the Creator and his human creations – “der Mensch, der Schöpfung Ruhm und Preis” (Gellert; human beings, the crown and prize of creation); (2) the mythological distinction between gods and humans – “je mehr du fühlst ein Mensch zu sein, desto ähnlicher bist du den Göttern”

30. There is a parallel etymology for the universal usage of the singular noun Mann in German, but Mensch dominates the word fields surrounding this usage.

31. The modern German slang variant das Mensch, i.e., a “woman of easy virtue,” is a later development.

32. <http://www.woerterbuchnetz.de/DWB?bookref=12,2021,16>.

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 749

(Goethe; the more you feel yourself to be human, the more you resemble the gods); and (3) the hierarchical distinction between angels, humans, and animals – “Was ist der Mensch? Halb Tier, halb Engel” (Haller; What are human beings? Half animal, half angel).” As we might expect, the metaphysical dimension evoked by Haller in the third example is absent in these two volumes of notes and in Z. Humans are most often designated by the masculine singular noun Mensch with the masculine definite article der. In contrast, the representative animal that Nietzsche most often chooses is the ape, designated by the singular noun Affe with the masculine definite article der.

Up until twenty years ago, given our philosophy of translation, the English equivalent designation “man” with the possessive pronoun “his” would have been our choice. But twenty-first-century English usage requires that Mensch be rendered in its nongendered form, as “human” or “human being.” The first possibility we considered was to maintain the singular universal in English, in this case “the human being” or “the human.”

But as soon as Nietzsche uses a possessive, the required form in English is “his,” which violates the universal meaning of Mensch in German as well as our aim of gender neutrality. For reasons that we reviewed at the start of this Afterword, we rejected switching to a gender-neutral pronoun such as “its” in such cases, or to an ungrammatical plural possessive such as “their.” But when we pluralized the Mensch occurrences, we found that the English reads well and that Nietzsche’s intended meaning is preserved: “Human beings are something that must be overcome.”

Pluralizing der Mensch, as we pluralize der Chinese or der Dichter, not only preserves gender neutrality whenever singular possessive pronouns are used, it is also consistent with the meaning and etymology of Mensch, even as it preserves the universalizing effect of its idiomatic usage. In the history of the German language, what is meant is not one individual but a universal prototype that stands for the entire human species, men, women, and children. Moreover, Nietzsche talks about human beings in two, largely distinct contexts. When Nietzsche’s context is the human species, we render Mensch as “humans” or “human beings,” depending on what reads better. When Nietzsche’s context is universal human behavior or psychology, we render Mensch as “person” or “people.” Notice that, in this latter context, the singular with a definite article, “the person” or even “a person,” does not convey the same degree of prototypical universality.

33. <http://www.woerterbuchnetz.de/DWB?bookref=12,2021,16.750> TRANSLATOR’S AFTERWORD

The Modifier übermenschlich

Most striking within the etymology of Übermensch and its variants is the predominance of the adjectival and adverbial form übermenschlich, beginning in the sixteenth century, when the German theologian Wendelin Steinbach defined it by reference to the Latin adjective supernaturalis in terms of qualities that are beyond humanity, such as immortality.' A digital search of texts published before 1850 contained in Projekt Gutenberg yields scores of citations of the adjectival form or its nominal derivations (das Übermenschliche "the superhuman" or "what is superhuman"; etwas Übermenschliches "something superhuman").*° By Nietzsche's time, übermenschlich had become a standard term to describe powers or abilities that exceed human capacity or capability, as in E. T. A. Hoffmann's Die Elixiere des Teufels (The Devil's Elixir; 1815-16): ". . . ja ich fühlte in dem Augenblick eine übermenschliche Kraft in mir emporkeimen . . . "

("indeed, in that moment I felt within myself a burgeoning superhuman strength"). Moreover, the standard English translation for the term übermenschlich was well established by the

34. <http://www.woerterbuchnetz.de/DWB?bookref=23,418,75>.

35. Nietzsche's earlier works demonstrate that he was accustomed to using the adjectival and adverbial forms. Cf. BT 1; Philosophy in the Tragic Age of the Greeks 8; HL 6 (CW 2, 122, |. 24); SE 6 (CW 2, 229, |. 36); WB 11 (CW

2, 327, |. 27); HAH 111, 143, 164, 441, 461; WS 73, 190; D 27, 60, 113, 548.

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD ret

mid-nineteenth century: it was "superhuman." The 1852 edition of Flügel (p. 966) and the 1885 edition of Christoph Grieb's Deutsch-Englisches Wörterbuch (p. 879) both translate übermenschlich exclusively as "superhuman."® And there is almost universal agreement among translators today that "superhuman" is the best rendering of übermenschlich??

From Superman to Overman

The etymology of the noun Übermensch demonstrates how Nietzsche took a word that had been in common usage since the Reformation and reshaped it for his own purposes. First documented in Dominican correspondence from 1527, Übermensch was used to describe the followers of Luther." Although Nietzsche-sche did not coin the term, Übermensch came to be associated with Nietzsche. In the 1882 edition of Biichman's Geflügelte Worte, the German equivalent of Bartlett's Familiar Quotations, there is no mention of Nietzsche or Übermensch. Yet, according to the 1910 edition, "The particular way that Übermensch is understood today was first developed through Nietzsche" (p. 424).

Before Nietzsche, the adjectival/adverbial form übermenschlich was the much more common term. After Nietzsche, the nominal form Übermensch achieved greater notoriety and usage. Nietzsche himself uses übermenschlich only a few times in this volume of notes, out of a total of nearly fifty occurrences in his works, notes, and letters. By contrast, Übermensch occurs almost two hundred times in his oeuvre, with almost one third of these occurrences documented in this volume.

36. Bilingual dictionaries, by their very nature, tend to focus on well-established terms and more conventional usage. Both dictionaries appeared before Nietzsche's publications during the period of this volume and before those publications were well or very widely known. Furthermore, of the four German adjectival synonyms immediately cited in Grimm, the two containing the prefix über are also translated in modern English through the Latin variant:

übernatürlich as "supernatural" and überirdisch as "supernatural" or "superlunary."

Handwerk, HAH §111 (CW).

38. <http://www.woerterbuchnetz.de/DW> B?bookref=23,417,31.

752 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

The translation history of Übermensch as a Nietzschean concept is much more contentious than that of its adjectival and adverbial variant, übermenschlich. For more than a half century, the standard translation of Übermensch was the upper-case noun

"Superman." In 1903 George Bernard Shaw translated Nietzsche's term Übermensch in this way in his famous and influential play Man and Superman. "Superman" was also Thomas Common's choice in his 1909 revision of the first English translation of Z (in 1896) by Alexander Tille (who had chosen "beyond-man"). Although Shaw and Common capitalized the term "Superman," this is not required by the German text any more than Nietzsche's parallel term Mensch calls for capitalization of the English translation "human."

"Superman" remained the standard translation of Übermensch until Kaufmann coined the term "overman" in 1954 and convinced most scholars to follow his lead. Kaufmann offered historical, morphological, and etymological arguments in favor of "overman." We will summarize these arguments and then explain briefly why we chose not to accept them. Faced with the monumental task of rehabilitating Nietzsche as a philosopher for American readers less than a decade after World War II, Kaufmann argued against the term "Superman" because he thought it brought to mind politically charged reminders of Nazi eugenics propaganda. But of course the term Übermensch brings to mind the same associations and reminders for speakers of the German language. Other translators have expressed reservations about the potential for contamination by the name

"Superman" in popular literature, comics, and film. But in fact Nietzsche's concept has had a significant influence on these popular references." In any case, the shift in translation preference for Mensch from "man" to "human" (see above) puts these reservations to rest.

39. Cf. Adam Barkman, "Superman: From Anti-Christ to Christ-

Type,"

in Superman and Philosophy: What Would the Man of Steel Do?, ed. Mark D.

White (Malden, MA: Blackwell, 2013), 111-20.

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 753

Kaufmann's morphological arguments focused upon the proper rendering of the prefix über. English offers two possibilities for the context in question, one derived from Latin, and the English cognate derived from West Germanic, "over."

"super,"

Translators who have recently followed Kaufmann in rendering Übermensch with the term "overman" or the ungendered and capitalized term "Overhuman" cite Kaufmann's argument that this term best conveys Nietzsche's associations with other über terminology that is usually rendered by means of "over," such as

Überfluss ("overflow"), überwinden ("overcome"), and übergehen

("to pass over").⁴ They also cite Kaufmann's reference to Nietzsche's knowledge of Ralph Waldo Emerson's concept of the Over-Soul in his 1841 Essays. But we think that the Latinate prefix "super" carries with it many of the same connotations of elevation and preserves enough of the wordplay with Nietzsche's parallel "over" locutions and contrasting "under" locution. Also, we don't think there is any conceptual connection between Nietzsche's concept of the Übermensch and Emerson's idealistic concept of the Over-Soul. In any case, the fact that

Nietzsche did not coin Übermensch renders moot the argument that "over" is a more felicitous translation than "super" because Nietzsche was familiar with Emerson's notion of the Over-Soul. Finally, as we mentioned above, the Latinate prefix "super" is quite naturally and standardly used to translate the adjectival and adverbial form übermenschlich, and we think it more important to capture this grammatical relation than the associations with other über terminology. Nietzsche uses the modifying form frequently in Ecce Homo, in association with the nominal form (EH "Destiny" 5).*

40. Friedrich Nietzsche, Thus Spoke Zarathustra: A Book for All and None, ed. Adrian Del Caro and Robert B. Pippin, trans. Adrian Del Caro (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2006); Friedrich Nietzsche, Thus Spoke Zarathustra: A Book for Everyone and Nobody, trans. Graham Parkes (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005). Studies 30 (2005): 102-14, 103.

754 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

In his etymological arguments for rendering Übermensch as "overman," Kaufmann claims he is going back to an "older term, 'overman, which has been reinstated.'"4? But by "older" he does not mean the English Nietzschean term used by previous translators such as George Bernard Shaw or Thomas Common (who both chose "Superman"); instead, he means an archaic English term that referred to a labor foreman, supervisor, or overseer. Obviously, this archaic term has nothing to do with Nietzsche's term.* We think it is time to dispense with Kaufmann's neologism. Whereas Nietzsche's term Übermensch has a history and a place in the German language prior to his influential use of it, the term "overman" in a Nietzschean sense has no history or place in the English language at all. From Overman to Superhumans

Our choice was therefore between "superhuman" and an ungendered modification of Kaufmann's neologism, "overhuman." We found "superhuman" to be the better choice because it corresponds to current standard English usage in its word field and because it is part of a tradition of translating Übermensch that extends back to the beginning of the sixteenth century. Moreover, in standard usage the universally accepted equivalent for Untermensch draws upon the Latin tradition: we say "subhuman." To maintain consistency, rendering Übermensch as "overhuman" would thus require a second neologism, "underhuman." In GM I 16, Nietzsche describes Napoleon as "diese Synthesis von Unmensch und Übermensch" (this synthesis of an inhuman and a superhuman). Here again, the standard term "superhuman" fits perfectly in this context, without

42. Walter Kaufmann, Nietzsche: Philosopher, Psychologist, Antichrist, 4th

ed. (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1974), 115.

43. A further counterargument to Kaufmann's morphological and etymological justifications for "overman" can be found in his translation of JS 382 in The Gay Science (New York: Vintage Books, 1974). If his arguments are valid for the noun, they should be equally valid for the adjective, yet Kaufmann renders the hyphenated adjective menschlich-übermenschlichen as "human, superhuman."

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 755

us resorting to the neologism "overhuman." "4 Certainly, the original meaning of Kaufmann's archaic term does not lend itself at all to the ungendered modification "overhuman," which has now become a completely invented English word.

And we find it telling that Kaufmann does not follow his own arguments but translates this passage as "this synthesis of

the inhuman and superhuman."

Once we agreed on the term "superhuman" for Übermensch in the Z volumes, we were confronted with the same challenges discussed above concerning how to translate Mensch. To translate late der Übermensch in the singular introduces the same ambiguity between the adjectival, "the superhuman," referring to qualities or behavior, and the nominal, "the superhuman," referring to beings. More important, when Nietzsche uses the term in its masculine singular form with the definite article, in most cases he is using the term as a masculine singular universal. As with the identical use of Mensch, Nietzsche does not have a single individual in mind but rather the universal prototype of an entire species.

Ich liebe den, der lebt, damit I love those who live to know

erkenne und der erkennen will, and who want to know so that damit der Übermensch lebe. the superhumans may live. (5[17])

Here Nietzsche's singular demonstrative den does not stand for one individual but rather for any individual who lives to know, and Nietzsche asserts that the purpose of these individuals living to know is so that the superhumans may live. As with Mensch, we did not want to render universal possessive pronouns in the singular with the masculine pronoun "his." In pluralizing both the demonstrative and the noun in the 44. When we experimented with rendering the adjectival form, the prefix "over" seemed particularly out of place; "superhuman virtues," for example, simply sounds better than "overhuman virtues" (25[80]). There is also the potential for confusion with adjectives like "overeager" between "over" and "overly," where readers wonder whether Nietzsche means "over and above" or "excessively."

756 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

above passage and elsewhere, we achieve Nietzsche's desired meaning, maintain gender neutrality, and avoid the misleading masculine singular inflection that has led some commentators to see der Übermensch as a single (male) individual. Many translators and scholars have concluded that der Übermensch refers to a special kind of male individual because Nietzsche uses the singular noun with a masculine definite article along with the associated masculine pronouns (ihn and sein) (see, e.g., 4[171], 4[224], *sl*₁, 12[17], 13[1], 18[56]). But Nietzsche makes identical and parallel uses of his term der Mensch—a term that translators and scholars routinely and correctly translate as a collective singular universal that means "humans" or "human beings." Moreover, Nietzsche will often move back and forth, with no contextual difference, between the singular noun, Mensch, and the equivalent plural noun, Menschen, and there are several passages in which he does the same thing with Übermensch and Übermenschen (see, e.g., 4[254], 5[32], 10[41], and 13[26]). The fact that Nietzsche sometimes uses the plural nonuniversal inflection Übermenschen is not evidence that he is using the singular Übermensch to refer to an individual but rather further grammatical evidence that he is using the singular universal inflection to refer to a category, group, or prototype. There is no place in these notes, or in Z, where the context shows that Nietzsche is using Übermensch to refer to specific individuals. Nor is there any such place for Nietzsche's contrasting expressions, der letzte Mensch (the last human beings) and der kleine Mensch (puny human beings). These should be compared with Nietzsche's use of the term der höhere Mensch (superior human beings), especially in part IV of Z, where the context clearly shows his intent to refer to specific individuals (such as the sorcerer, or the ugliest man, or the one-eyed pope).

10[37],

Finally, some have argued that it is best to leave the term Übermensch untranslated because it is well known by Nietzsche scholars and even to some extent in the culture at large." However, a general editorial decision was made that the entire Complete Works would leave no German words untranslated.

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 757

Also it would be odd to leave just the single term Übermensch untranslated in the whole Z book and in all the associated notebook material. More to the point, it would also be excessive to leave all of the associated adjectival and adverbial locutions (übermenschlich) untranslated; but if they are translated, the reader will lose the connection to the untranslated Übermensch.

Our decision to translate the masculine singular universal

Übermensch as “superhumans” obviates the reasons usually given in favor of capitalizing or gendering the English translation of Übermensch. It also avoids a potential typographical confusion between the nominal and modifying forms of this term (“superhuman”), and it removes the misleading suggestion, implicit in the term “Superman” and the associated male pronouns, that Nietzsche’s term refers to a male individual. Beyond these etymological and morphological arguments, we believe that there are compelling exegetical and philosophical arguments, rooted in the Z notebook material and in Z itself, for understanding Übermensch in terms of a species and not an individual. We now turn to these arguments.

Nietzsche’s Philosophical Concept of Superhumans

Throughout his career, Nietzsche uses the philosophical concept of superhumans in three different ways. We will call these the supernatural use, the superior-individual use, and the superior-species use. He inherited the first two uses from earlier traditions in German writing, one having to do with philological investigations of validating mythological narratives, and the other having to do with the Romantic valorization of heroic None, trans. Clancy Martin (New York: Barnes and Noble Classics, 2005).

758 TRANSLATOR’S AFTERWORD

individuals. But he invented the third use in response to Darwin’s theory of the origin of the human species. This particular use did not exist in the German language at all, not even in Nietzsche’s own published texts, prior to its introduction in 1883 with the publication of the first part of Z.%

The Supernatural Use

Nietzsche’s first published use of the concept of superhu-

mans occurs in the first edition of /S, §143, titled "Greatest Advantage of Polytheism."

This is the key passage:

The invention of gods, heroes, and superhumans of all kinds, as well as near-humans and subhumans [Uebersmenschen aller Art, sowie von Neben- und Untermenschen], of dwarves, fairies, centaurs, satyrs, demons, and devils was invaluable training for justifying the selfishness and sovereignty of the individual:

the freedom granted to one god in relation to other gods was in turn granted to oneself in relation to laws and customs and neighbors.*7

Read contextually within the rest of §143, this passage relates the concept of superhumans to the idea of polytheism. For this reason, the concept might be called a theistic concept. But this passage also relates the concept of superhumans to a group of invented supernatural beings who, like the gods, live above and outside human beings, in some distant superworld (über sich und ausser sich, in einer fernen Ueberwelt). These beings are associated with gods but are not themselves gods. They include heroes, near-humans, subhumans, dwarfs, fairies, centaurs, satyrs, demons, and devils. This is why we have called this first published mention a supernatural use of the concept of superhumans. Nietzsche also

But it applies as well to the more common adjectival and adverbial form, übermenschlich – as, for example, Nietzsche's supernatural use of this form in BT §1, his superior individual use of this form in D §548, and his superior species use of this form in JS §382.

47. In this passage, Nietzsche uses the alternative spellings, Uebersmensch and Ueberwelt.

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 759

contrasts his term Uebersmenschen with the linguistically related terms Nebenmenschen and Untermenschen, in this way positioning human beings at the center of a hierarchy of invented supernatural beings. The supernatural beings who are superior to human beings would seem to be the gods, heroes, and superhumans; those who are semi-equal to human beings would seem to be the dwarfs, fairies, centaurs, and satyrs; and those who are inferior would seem to be the demons and devils. The superhumans thus belong among the superior and elevated beings in Nietzsche's supernatural catalogue, along with the gods and the heroes. But even the heroes are not actually existing human beings, only invented mythological beings (like Odysseus or Siegfried). There is thus an important contrast to be drawn here with Nietzsche's second use of the concept of superhumans, a use that refers to actually existing figures such as Borgia and Napoleon. Nietzsche's supernatural use of the concept of superhumans is not original to him. He inherited this use from a tradition of philologists and historians who were seeking to discover the linguistic and mythological sources that could be used to define and validate what it meant to be German. These scholars applied the term when they were describing the hierarchies of invented gods and humans in their discussions of Greek, Roman, and Old Norse mythologies. Here is a representative example from Jacob Grimm's discussion of the sagas' representation of the "idisi" or wise women: Yet from the earliest times it [the term idisi], like the gr. vbuqn, appears to have been applied primarily to superhuman beings, who were seen to be lower than goddesses, higher than earthly women, taking the middle level that is under discussion

here."

48. Our decision to use "human" in place of the traditional English designation, "man," automatically shaped our choices for the variants of Mensch that Nietzsche uses in his works, notes, and letters: Gottmenschl "god-humans"; Halbmenschl "half humans"; Mitmensch! "fellow humans"; Nebemenschl "near-humans"; Uebermenschl "superhumans"; Unmenschl "inhumans"; and Untermenschl "subhumans."

49. Jacob Grimm, Deutsche Mythologie, 3rd ed., vol. 1 (Göttingen: Dieterichsche Buchhandlung, 1854), 372.

760 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

It is noteworthy that in this first published mention of the concept of superhumans, Nietzsche uses the plural term Uebermensen instead of the collective singular term Uebermensch. This is because, as we argue below, Nietzsche's later use of the concept no longer refers to a mere plurality of individuals (whether supernatural or actually existing) but rather to a single new species that could emerge sometime in the future and would be superior to the human species.

In the unpublished preparatory notes collected in this volume,

Nietzsche never mentions this supernatural use of his concept except in the very indirect and metaphorical sense that the members of this new species will relate to human beings as if they were indifferent Epicurean gods (7[21], 16[85]). However, in the published

Z he does allude back to his earlier supernatural use when he has Zarathustra describe what poets have typically believed about this concept. Here is the key passage:

Yet this is what all poets believe: that those who prick up their ears while lying in the grass or on secluded slopes experience some aspect of the things that are between heaven and earth.

And if tender stirrings come to them, then the poets always think that nature herself is in love with them:
And she creeps up to their ears to tell them secrets and enamored flatteries: the like of which makes them boastful and bloated before all mortals!

Oh, there are so many things between heaven and earth of which only poets have allowed themselves to dream!

And especially above heaven: for all gods are poetic metaphor, poetic plunder!

Truly, we are lifted ever higher – namely to the kingdom of the clouds: it is there that we place our motley young fools

and then call them gods and superhumans [Götter und Übermenschen]: –

Still, they weigh just enough for these thrones! – all these gods and superhumans [alle diese Götter und Übermenschen].

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 761

Oh, how weary I am of all these things that don't measure up, that are supposed to be must-see events! Oh, how weary I am of poets! (ZII "On Poets")

This passage is important because it includes the book's only pejorative and dismissive mention of the concept of superhumans.

For this reason, it is often cited as Nietzsche's critique of his own new Zarathustran concept of superhumans." However, a closer reading shows that this particular mention overlaps with Nietzsche's earlier use of the plural "Uebermenschen"

in

JS §143 in the following ways: superhumans are invented and false; they are supernatural and associated with gods; and they dwell above human beings in distant, cloudy heavens. By contrast, Zarathustra teaches that his own goal of creating superhumans can only be realized once all gods are dead; that these superhumans will be the natural fruit of thousands

of years of selective breeding among the descendants of his disciples; and that these superhumans will inhabit the earth and constitute the meaning of the earth. Thus, Nietzsche's actual point in this passage is to highlight the uniqueness and originality of his own Zarathustran use of the concept
of superhumans. He does so by contrasting it with the supernatural use of this concept by earlier scholars of mythology

such as Jacob Grimm. Of special interest to Nietzsche is the influence of these scholars on the poetic compositions of Wagner in which he dreamed up colorful fantasies of airy, imperfect, and quasi-divine superhumans. It is true that Zarathustra begins his speech by including himself among the poets who lie too much. Yet at this point in the speech where he has reviewed the lies that poets tell about superhumans, he has also declared that he is weary of such lies and indeed that he is weary of all poets, old and new, because they are all superficial, muddled, and vain.

so. Cf. Tom Stern, "Nietzsche on Context and the Individual," Nietzsche-forschung 15 (2008): 299-315.

762 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

The Superior-Individual Use

Following the publication of Z, Nietzsche uses the term Übermensch only six times in the texts that he published or prepared for publication. For the reader's convenience, we have collected these passages in the Appendix below. He uses the term once in On the Genealogy of Morality (GM 1 16), once in Twilight of the Idols (TI

"Forays" 37), once in The Anti-Christian (AC 6), and three times in EH (EH "Books" 1, Z, "Destiny" 5).°! These published passages are noteworthy, especially when considered together, because they reflect Nietzsche's appropriation of an earlier Romantic use of the concept of superhumans that is distinct from the philological use outlined above as well as from his new and original Darwinist use in Z.

In these passages Nietzsche expresses his view that there exist certain individual human beings who possess such extraordinary abilities that they should be regarded as superior in value

to most other human beings. One of the most famous and enduring presentations of this view can be found in Machiavelli's

Prince, where the virtu-laden Cesare Borgia is glorified as the best example of such a superior individual. This is why Nietzsche repeatedly mentions this lesser-known Renaissance figure in these passages. Following Machiavelli, Nietzsche is concerned to pit his admiration of Borgia against the socially sanctioned

"idealistic" type of superior individuals, that is, individuals who are usually regarded as superior in value to most others on account of their saintly and moral qualities. To Machiavelli's Renaissance Borgia, Nietzsche adds Napoleon as his own age's very best instance of a superior individual. Moreover, as Machiavelli did with Borgia and as he himself does with Borgia (BGE 197), Nietzsche emphasizes Napoleon's terrible, monstrous, and inhuman aspects as contributing to his superior value: "Napoleon:

one comprehends that the higher human being and the terrible

51. In EH, Nietzsche also quotes two places in Z where he uses the term

Übermensch (EH "Books" Z, "Destiny" 5).

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 763

human being necessarily belong together" (CW 17, 10[5]).

More

abstractly, Nietzsche writes:

The human is the beastly animal and super animal; the higher human being is the inhuman and superhuman being: these belong together. [Der Mensch ist das Unthier und Überthier; der höhere Mensch ist der Unmensch und Übermensch: so gehört es zusammen.) With each increase in the greatness and stature of the human being, so increases the depth and terribleness as well: one ought not will the one without the other – or rather: the more fully the one is willed, so then does one more fully achieve precisely the other. (CW 17, 9[154]).°

Notice that in 77 "Forays" 37 (see Appendix), Nietzsche refers to Cesare Borgia only as a kind of superhuman being (eine Art Übermensch), and then only when considered in relation to human-kind as a whole (im Verhältniss zur Gesamt-Menschheit). Nietzsche's point is that Borgia was only superhuman in an analogical and comparative sense. Nietzsche reinforces this last point when he also describes Borgia in these passages as a superior human being (ein höherer Mensch) or as a superior kind of human being (eine höhere Art Mensch) – meaning that, despite his superior abilities and his superior value, he was still human. This latter description is especially significant because it alludes back to Nietzsche's Zarathustran concept and narrative theme of superior human beings (höhere Menschen). In his speech devoted to this concept, Zarathustra tells the assembled superior men that God is dead and that they should no longer feel constrained by the prevailing dogma of human equality. He instructs them that the time has come for them to overthrow the long rule of the rabble and to take charge of the world (ZIV "On Superior 52. We cite this from George Leiner's translations from CW 17: Unpublished Fragments: Summer 1886–Fall 1887 (Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, forthcoming), which at times differ from our own translation decisions in this and our other volumes, most notably here with respect to höher, which we translate as "superior."

764 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

Humans" 1-3). Nevertheless, Zarathustra emphasizes, because the very greatest human beings are still failed and half-broken, and because they all contain the rabble within themselves, they are not his true concern. They can only prepare the way, and eventually sacrifice themselves, for the sake of his only true concern, the future superhumans. Here are the two key passages:

"You may indeed be superior humans, collectively," Zarathustra continued. "But for me – you are not superior and strong enough [.. .]

Nor are you beautiful enough for me and wellborn. I need clean, smooth mirrors for my teachings; on your surfaces my own image is still distorted.

Your shoulders are weighed down by many a burden, many a memory; in your corners many a wicked dwarf crouches. There is hidden rabble in you as well.

And even if you are superior and of a superior kind: much in you is crooked and deformed. There's no smith in the world who could hammer you smooth and straight for me."

(ZIV "The Welcoming")

Those who care the most ask today: "how will human beings survive?" But Zarathustra is the only one and the first to ask: "how shall human beings be overcome?"

The superhumans are dear to me, they are my first and only concern, – and not humans [Der Übermensch liegt mir am Herzen, der ist mein Erstes und Einziges, – und nicht der Mensch]: not our neighbors, not the poorest people, not those who suffer the most, not the best people –

Oh my brothers, what I am able to love in humans is that they are a passing-over and a passing-away [Oh meine Briider, was ich lieben kann am Menschen, das ist, dass er ein Übergang ist und ein Untergang). (ZIV "On Superior Humans" 3).

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 765

Thus, when we read Nietzsche's post-Zarathustra remarks about superior individuals like Borgia who actually existed in the past, we should keep in mind his sharp distinction between any such human beings and future superhumans. This sharp distinction applies even to Nietzsche's suggestion in AC 4 (see Appendix) that superior human individuals like Borgia may continue to emerge in the future. And it applies as well to his suggestion in the same text that such cases of great success may even consist in whole families (like the Renaissance Borgias), tribes (like the Huns or the Visigoths), or peoples (like the ancient Greeks and Romans). Whether emerging in the future or consisting of more than just a single individual, the bull's-eye will still be human and is therefore excluded from Nietzsche's new and original philosophical concept of superhumans. Although Nietzsche does not similarly qualify his description in GM 116 (see Appendix) of Napoleon as a synthesis of inhuman and superhuman qualities, he does explicitly introduce him as the most late-born human being (Mensch). This careful description should be contrasted with Zarathustra's pre-vision of a figure who is no longer human (nicht mehr Mensch) and who laughs with a laughter that is not human (das keines Menschen Lachen war) (Z III "On the Vision and Riddle" 2). This description of Napoleon should also be read alongside Zarathustra's crucial claim that a superhuman being has never yet existed (Niemals noch gab es einen Übermenschen; ZI "On Priests").^o This is a point that Nietzsche brings up several times GM II 24-25 and in EH that he designed his character Zarathustra's speeches and life story to express important and difficult truths that he himself was not strong or healthy enough to express in his own voice in his later nonfictional works. See chapter 8 of Paul S. Loeb, The Death of Nietzsche's Zarathustra (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010); and Paul S. Loeb, "Ecce Superhomo: How Zarathustra Became What Nietzsche Was Not," in Nietzsche's "Ecce Homo," ed. Duncan Large and Nicholas Martin (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, forthcoming).

766 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

in his preparatory notes (10[37], 10[41], 13[26]). In the immediate context of this claim, Zarathustra concedes to his disciples that great men have certainly existed in the past. But he warns his disciples to free themselves of their influence because, when seen stripped of their moral pretensions, even these greatest of individuals are all-too-human (allzumenschlich) and therefore still too closely related to the rabble and the puniest of human beings. This is why Nietzsche has Zarathustra cry out in despair toward the end of the published book:

I had once seen them both naked, the greatest human beings and the puniest human beings: all too similar to one another, – even the greatest still all too human! The greatest all too puny! – This is how I became sick and tired of human beings! (Z III “The Convalescent” 2)

Some of Nietzsche’s other remarks about Napoleon provide evidence that he includes even him in this observation. For example:

There are manners of the spirit by which even great spirits betray that they stem from rabble or semi-rabble: – for it is the gait and stride of their thoughts that betray them; they cannot walk. Thus, to his deep frustration, Napoleon himself could not walk like a prince and “legitimately” on those occasions when one really must know how, as in great coronation processions and the like: even there he was always merely the lead in a column – proud and hasty at the same time and very self-conscious of it. (JS 282)

In this way, then, Nietzsche is actually employing his new and original Zarathustran use of the term Übermensch to criticize the historically earlier tradition of using this term to refer to individual human beings who have superior abilities and superior value in relation to most other human beings. Indeed,

it is noteworthy that Nietzsche singles out the figure of Napoleon as the best instance his age has to offer of a superior individual who is a kind of superhuman compared to all other human TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 767 beings. Here Nietzsche lets his readers know that he is inheriting and superseding an earlier Romantic tradition that valorized heroic individuals – especially the contemporaneous Napoleon. In particular, Nietzsche is concerned to appropriate and criticize the language and ideas of two of the most important figures in this earlier tradition: Thomas Carlyle and Johann Wolfgang
 von Goethe.
 The British author Carlyle was best known in Nietzsche's time for his 1841 collection of lectures, On Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History. In this book, Carlyle inaugurated what is now called the great man theory of history, which he introduces
 as follows:
 For, as I take it, Universal History, the history of what man has accomplished in this world, is at bottom the History of the Great Men who have worked here. They were the leaders of men, these great ones; the modellers, patterns, and in a wide sense creators, of whatsoever the general mass of men contrived to do or to attain; all things that we see standing
 accomplished in the world are properly the outer material result, the practical realization and embodiment, of Thoughts that dwelt in the Great Men sent into the world: the soul of the whole world's history, it may justly be considered, were the history of these.*
 Having claimed that the history of the world is the biography of great men (p. 13), Carlyle argues that these great men have always been worshipped in the past and that this hero worship

is the bedrock of all human life:

Yes, from Norse Odin to English Samuel Johnson, from the divine Founder of Christianity to the withered Pontiff of Encyclopedism, in all times and places, the Hero has been worshipped. It will ever be so. We all love great men; love, venerate and bow down submissive before great men: nay can

54. Thomas Carlyle, On Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History

(Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993), 3.

768 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

we honestly bow down to anything else? Ah, does not every true man feel that he is himself made higher by doing reverence to what is really above him? No nobler or more blessed feeling dwells in man's heart. And to me it is very cheering to consider that no sceptical logic, or general triviality, insincerity and aridity of any Time and its influences can destroy this noble inborn loyalty and worship that is in man. In times of unbelief, which soon have to become times of revolution, much down-rushing, sorrowful decay and ruin is visible to everybody. For myself in these days, I seem to see in this indestructibility of Hero-worship the everlasting adamant lower than which the confused wreck of revolutionary things cannot fall. The confused wreck of things crumbling and even crashing and tumbling all round us in these revolutionary ages, will get down so far; no farther.

It is an eternal corner-stone, from which they can begin to build themselves up again. That man, in some sense or other, worships Heroes; that we all of us reverence and must ever reverence Great Men: this is, to me, the living rock amid all rushings-down whatsoever;—the one fixed point in modern revolutionary history, otherwise as if bottomless and shoreless."

In response to this argument, and also to Carlyle's concluding account of Napoleon as the most recent heroic great man, Nietzsche-sche wrote an extended critique of what he called "the hero-cult and its fanatics" (Der Heroen-Cultus und seine Fanatiker).

In the final remarks of this critique, Nietzsche associates Napoleon,

Carlyle, and Romanticism:

People of this sort lived, for example, around Napoleon: indeed, perhaps it was precisely he who introduced into the soul of our century the Romantic prostration before the "genius" and the "h » ero," a prostration alien to the spirit of the Enlightenment, he of whom a Byron was not ashamed to say, he was a "worm compared with such a being." (The formulas for such prostration were founded by that presumptuous old muddle- and surly-head,

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 769

Thomas Carlyle, who spent a long life trying to make reason romantic for his fellow Englishmen: to no avail!) (D 298)

Unlike Carlyle, Nietzsche is not inspired by Napoleon's existencetence to go along with his century's Romantic idea of worshipping-superior individuals. Indeed, this is the whole point of his new philosophical concept of superhumans, and this is why, in the passage from EH ("Books" 1; see Appendix), Nietzsche-sche dismisses those readers who have recognized Carlyle's "hero cult" in his word Übermensch.°

The other crucial figure regarded by Nietzsche as playing a key role in the earlier Romantic tradition is Goethe. He was almost universally venerated in Nietzsche's time as the greatest German poet." It is an interesting fact that Goethe thought highly of Carlyle and of his hero-worship lectures, whereas Nietzsche dismissed Carlyle but had the greatest admiration for Goethe. Indeed, it is obvious that Nietzsche considered Goethe to be one of the superior individuals (77 "Forays" 48-51). So when Nietzsche writes about Goethe's admiration for Napoleon, he makes it clear that this is not some kind of prostration or hero worship but rather the kind of respect that one great man extends another:

What is certain is that it was not the "Wars of Liberation"

that caused him to perk up, no more so than the French Revolution – no, the event for whose sake he rethought his Faust and in fact the whole problem of being “human” [das ganze Problem

“Mensch” was the appearance of Napoleon. (BGE 244)

56. For a useful discussion of Nietzsche’s understanding and criticisms of Carlyle’s lecture series, see William Meakins, “Nietzsche, Carlyle, and Perfectionism,” Journal of Nietzsche Studies 45 (2014): 258-78.

57. We use the term “Romantic” in the sense that Nietzsche understood it. British Germanists and some prominent American Goethe scholars, such as Jane K. Brown, see Goethe as a Romantic poet. But German Germanists and some of their American students use Goethe’s life as the template for the literary periodization of his time, whereby he moves from “Storm and Stress”

(Sturm und Drang) in his early work through (neo)classical to his status as one of the great poets of the Western tradition. According to the German scheme, Goethe rejects both early and late Romanticism as pathological.

770 TRANSLATOR’S AFTERWORD

And similarly:

In the midst of an age disposed to unreality, Goethe was a convinced realist: he said yes to all that was related to him in this respect – he had no greater experience than that ens realissimum called Napoleon. (TI “Forays” 50)

Nevertheless, and this is a point missed by most scholars, it is Nietzsche’s considered view that Goethe, like Napoleon and like all other great men, was still human-all-too-human and therefore not so different after all from the puniest of human beings. Just as Nietzsche ridicules Napoleon’s ignoble gait in JS

$282, cited above, so too he repeatedly makes fun of Goethe’s penchant for having his heroic figures, such as Werther or Faust, fall into worshipful Romantic prostration before some puny embodiment of "the Eternal Feminine" (das Ewig-Weibliche; Z

 I "On Poets"; BGE 236). For example:
 This century loves to ascribe to its most intellectual men a taste for immature, mentally deficient and modest little girls of the people, Faust's taste for Gretchen – this speaks against
 the taste of the century and its most intellectual men.
 (5[1] 17;
 see also ZI "On Child and Marriage") Hence, Nietzsche explains, Goethe's Faust, which is supposed
 to be a tragedy of knowledge, actually makes him laugh (3[1] 406):
 The Faust idea. – A little seamstress is seduced and made unhappy; a great scholar of all four branches of learning is
 the evil-doer. Can such unnatural things happen: No, certainly not! Without the assistance of the devil in person, the great scholar would not have brought it about. – Is this really supposed to be the greatest German "tragic idea," as we hear the Germans say? (WS 124)
 Thus, when Nietzsche deploys his new philosophical concept
 of superhumans, we should notice that this is his way of criti-ciz-ing and dismissing even the figure of Goethe, who as a young man loomed so large in the proto-Romantic "Storm and Stress"
 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 771 movement and whose turn toward classical genres was signaled,
 in part, by the versification and completion of Faust I.
 What this means more specifically is that Nietzsche intends his new Zarathustran concept as a criticism of Goethe's ironic use of the term Übermensch in the "study" scene of Faust I. Some scholars
 have argued that Nietzsche's Zarathustran concept of superhu-
 mans
 is a conscious adaptation of Goethe's Urfaust invention?

But a more careful analysis shows that Nietzsche regards Goethe's concept as applying merely to a superior individual, someone like Borgia or Napoleon or even Goethe himself; who is only a kind of superhuman when compared to most other human beings. Obviously Goethe wants his readers to marvel at Faust's stupendous abilities and superior value, which is why he has Faust take seriously the Earth Spirit's mocking description of him as a superhuman (Faust 1:489--90). But Nietzsche points to Goethe's taste in women and his ridiculous "Faust-Idea" as a demonstration of Goethe's own failed and puny human nature and as further proof that even the greatest of human beings who have been called superhuman must now be overcome and superseded by true superhumans. The evidence we have presented here contradicts in many ways the reading of Nietzsche's term Übermensch that was first proposed by Walter Kaufmann in his extremely influential study of Nietzsche's philosophy (first published in 1950).⁵⁸ According to Kaufmann, Nietzsche's Zarathustrian concept of superhumans is identical to his concept of superior individuals and is best exemplified by the figure of Goethe. But in arguing for this claim, Kaufmann ignores the development in Nietzsche's thinking and interprets the Zarathustrian concept by appeal to his earliest writings and to his final writings. Eliding the fact that Nietzsche had not yet conceived his concept of the superhumans, Kaufmann simply identifies it with the idea in Unfashionable Observations that the goal of humankind lies in its scattered and accidentally 58. Cf. Adrian Del Caro, "Zarathustra vs. Faust, or Anti-Romantic Rivalry among Superhumans," in Nietzsche on Art and Life, ed. Daniel Came (Oxford:

 Oxford University Press, 2014), 143-62.
 772 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD emerging highest specimens and single great men (On the Utility and Liability of History for Life §9, [CW 2, 151]; Schopenhauer
 as Educator §6 [CW 2, 215]). And dismissing the important qualifications and distinctions we have summarized above as "mattering little" Kaufmann simply identifies Nietzsche's Zarathustran concept of superhumans with his later discussion
 in GM, TI, AC, and EH (see Appendix) about scattered and accidentally emerging superior human beings (such as Goethe, Napoleon, and Caesar). With these identifications in mind, Kaufmann then offers his translation and interpretation of Nietzsche's Zarathustran use of the term Übermensch. According to Kaufmann, it means "overman" in the sense that it refers to a great man like Goethe who has overcome (mastered, sublimated) his animality (his passions, instincts, impulses)
 and thereby attained self-mastery and become truly human.
 But this interpretation belongs more properly in a discussion
 of the concept of freedom proposed by Rousseau and Kant. It has nothing to do with Nietzsche's insistence that even the best human beings like Goethe are not good enough and must be superseded by future superhumans.
 As a final point for this section, we would like to note
 that there is some overlap between Nietzsche's supernatural and superior-individual uses of his concept of superhumans. This is because JS §143 aims to explain how the invention of superhumans and other supernatural beings was the medium whereby superior individuals were able to express their own idiosyncratic ideals in the social context of a hostile central morality that declared a single human norm for everyone. As Nietzsche writes:
 But beyond oneself and outside, in a distant superworld, one was permitted to see a plurality of norms: one god was not
 the denial or blasphemy against another god! Here for the first time individuals were allowed, here for the first time the rights of individuals were respected. (/S 143)

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 773

According to Nietzsche's theory, then, supernatural superhumans were actually a projection of superior individuals. When people worshipped these fantastical supernatural figures, they were indirectly worshipping existing human beings in their midst.

This is why superior individuals and their superior abilities seemed to acquire a supernatural aura. Nietzsche had already made a similar point in his earlier books about the widespread tendency to attribute a supernatural status to superior individuals (the saint, the genius, the prince) who displayed superhuman (übermenschlich) qualities (HAH 1143, 164, 441, 461; WS 73, 190).

The Superior-Species Use

Nietzsche publicly unveiled his new and original concept of superhumans in August 1883 in the preface to part I of Z. He published this part on its own before he published parts II and

III in late 1883 and 1884, respectively, and before he published the first collected edition of parts I-III in 1886. He had a private printing of part IV distributed to a select group of individuals in 1885 (which he later attempted to recall), but he never published this part IV for the public and he did not include it in the 1886 collected edition of the book.®°

At the start of the narrative in this preface, Zarathustra descends from his mountain cave in order to impart the wisdom he has gathered in solitude for the past ten years. On the

60. In his influential commentary on Z, Nietzsche's Teaching (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986), 19-22, 181, 204, 257-58, Laurence Lampert argues that Zarathustra abandons his Übermensch teaching as the narrative of Z progresses and that this teaching plays no role in Nietzsche's post-Zarathustra works. But Lampert draws a mistaken contrast between the introductory "linear" teaching of superhumans and the final "circular" teaching of eternal recurrence and fails to understand Nietzsche's account of the internal coherence between these two teachings. He also ignores important textual evidence from part IV of Z (which he calls an "after-thought") and from later texts such as GM (II:12, 16, 24-25) and EH ("Books" Z, Z, "Destiny" 5). See Loeb, The Death of Nietzsche's Zarathustra, 203-6 and chap. 8.

774 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

way down, he encounters a hermit saint, and he is surprised to learn that the hermit hasn't yet heard the news that God is dead. Immediately following this important revelation, Zarathustra

proceeds to the town marketplace so as to begin his public teaching. In the first sentence of his first speech, Zarathustra announces his new doctrine of superhumans. We have included the original German passages here, and in a few places below, so that readers can follow Nietzsche's innovations: Ich lehre euch den Übermenschen. Der Mensch ist Etwas, das überwunden werden soll. Was habt ihr gethan, ihn zu überwinden?

Alle Wesen bisher schufen

etwas über sich hinaus: und ihr wollt die Ebbe dieser grossen

Flut sein und lieber noch zum

Tiere zurückgehn, als den Menschen überwinden?

Was ist der Affe für den

Menschen? Ein Gelächter oder eine schmerzliche Scham. Und ebendas soll der Mensch für den

Übermenschen sein: ein Gelächter oder eine schmerzliche Scham.

Ihr habt den Weg vom Wurm zum Menschen gemacht, und Vieles ist in euch noch Wurm. Einst wart ihr Affen, und auch jetzt ist der Mensch mehr Affe, als irgend ein Affe.

 I teach you about the superhumans.
 Humans are something that must be overcome. What have you done to overcome them?
 All creatures so far have created something beyond themselves: and you want to be the ebb of this great flood and would even prefer to go back to being animals than to overcome humans?
 What are apes to humans?
 A laughing stock or a painful embarrassment. And that is precisely what humans will be to superhumans: a laughing stock or a painful embarrassment.
 You have made your way from worms to humans, and much in you is still worm. Once you were apes, and even now humans are more ape than any apes. (ZI
 "Preface" 3; see also 4[181] and s[1] 255 in this volume)
 There are many clear indications in this key opening passage that Nietzsche is using the term Übermenschen to mean a new
 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 775
 and future species that will be superior to the human species.
 He compares superhumans to the human species as well as to two animal species, apes and worms. Just as humans have made their way from apes and worms, so, too, superhumans might make their way from humans. Just as all creatures so far have created something beyond themselves, so, too, humans should aim to create something beyond themselves, namely, superhumans. If they do not choose this goal or if they do not succeed in this goal, humans will be the ebb in the great flood of creation, and they will go back to being animals. In order to achieve this goal, humans will have to overcome themselves. At this future point in time, superhumans will be superior to humans, just as humans are now superior to the two animal species, apes and worms. Superhumans will regard humans as a laughingstock or a painful embarrassment, just as humans (who are even now more ape than any apes) regard apes in this way.

Although this passage does not explicitly refer to superhumans as a species (in the sense that humans, apes, or worms are usually characterized as species), there is a place later in the book where Zarathustra again warns his disciples about the possibility that humans might go back to being animals. He calls this potential movement "degeneration" (Entartung) – a term that for him signifies the stagnation and decay of the species (Art). By contrast, he says, he is concerned to teach them about an upward movement from species (Art) to super-species (Über-Art) – an obvious reference back to his introductory teaching of an upward movement from humans to superhumans:

Tell me, my brothers: what do we regard as bad and most bad? Is it not degeneration? – And where the bestowing soul is lacking we always infer degeneration.

Upward goes our way, from species over to super-species.

(ZI "On the Virtue of Gift-Giving" 1)

776

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

Even more explicitly, Nietzsche wrote the following preparatory note in which he envisioned the future coexistence of the human species with a new godlike superhuman species. Here he calls the superhumans a species (Art) in the same sense that humans are a species:

Meine Forderung: Wesen hervorzubringen, welche über der ganzen Gattung "Mensch" erhaben dastehen: und diesem Ziele sich und "die Nächsten" zu opfern.

Die bisherige Moral hatte ihre Grenze innerhalb der Gattung: alle bisherigen Moralen waren nützlich, um der Gattung zuerst unbedingte Haltbarkeit zu geben: wenn diese erreicht ist, kann das Ziel höher genommen werden.

Die eine Bewegung ist unbedingt: die Nivellierung der Menschheit, große Ameisen- Bauten usw. (Dühring zu charakterisieren als außerordentlich ärmlich und typisch-gering, trotz seinen pathetischen Worten)

Die andere Bewegung: meine Bewegung: ist umgekehrt die Verschärfung aller Gegensätze und Klüfte, Beseitigung der Gleichheit, das Schaffen Über-Mächtiger.

Jene erzeugt den letzten Menschen. Meine Bewegung den Übermenschen.

Es ist durchaus nicht das Ziel, die letzteren als die Herren der Ersteren aufzufassen:

My demand: to produce beings who stand sublimely above the entire species "human being": and who sacrifice themselves and "their neighbors" for this goal.

Morality up to now has had its boundaries dictated by the species: all moralities up to now were useful for establishing first and foremost the unconditional stability of the species: when this has been achieved, the goal can be set higher.

The one movement is unconditional: the leveling of humankind, giant ant hills etc. (Dühring to be characterized as extraordinarily impoverished and typically narrow, despite his lofty words)

The other movement: my movement: is conversely the intensification of all oppositions and divisions, elimination of equality, the creation of the superpowerful.

The former generates last humans. My movement, superhumans.
The goal is not at all to conceive of the latter as the masters of the former: but

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 777

sondern: es sollen zwei Arten rather: the two species should neben einander bestehen – exist alongside one another – möglichst getrennt; die eine as segregated as possible; the one,

wie die epikurischen Götter, like the Epicurean gods, having no

sich um die andere nicht concern for the other. (7[21]; see kummernd. also 16[85], 35[73])

In this passage, Nietzsche distinguishes between two kinds
of movement available to the still-fluid and as-yet-indeterminate

human species (BGE 62; GM III 13). The first is a leveling
and equalizing movement driven by human herd instincts that aim to stabilize and fix the human species as much as possible.

The endpoint of this movement will be the “last humans” (der letzte Mensch) – meaning that humans will stop evolving because there will no longer be any chaos left within the species driving it to create something beyond itself (ZI “Preface” 3).

Humans will have gone back to being animals because they will have the same fixed species nature as all other extant animal species that no longer aim at anything beyond their own herd survival and herd reproduction. In a preparatory note, Nietzsche explains this movement as a decision on the part of humans to come to a standstill as super-apes and as an image of the last eternal humans: “Der Mensch bestimmt stehen zu bleiben, als der Übermensch, Bild des letzten Menschen, der der ewige ist” (4[163]). It is noteworthy that he describes the no-longer-evolving humans as “super-apes” – thus suggesting again that the further evolution of humans will create a new species, the superhumans. This other movement is the one Nietzsche advocates on behalf of superior individuals like himself who still feel this chaos within themselves and therefore aim to destabilize the species as much as possible by intensifying any existing hostilities, inequalities, and power struggles (see also Z II “On Tarantulas”). This movement will be upward in the sense of producing superpowerful human beings who will stand above the whole human species and sacrifice themselves and others for the sake of creating a new and superior, godlike species, the superhumans.

778 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

Although Nietzsche draws an analogy here between superhumans and Epicurean gods, this passage and others like it show that Nietzsche's Zarathustran concept of superhumans has nothing in common with his earlier philological concept of supernatural superhumans.

Indeed, as we have seen, Nietzsche contrasts these two concepts within the text of Z. In the chapter on poets, Zarathustra ridicules the poetic invention of fantastic superhuman beings living in castles on the clouds. But in this preface he articulates a completely immanent and naturalistic concept of superhumans. He has Zarathustra teach that superhumans will really exist in the future on the actual earth and that they will represent a further and superior stage in the development that has already taken place on the way from actually existing animal species like worms and apes to the actually existing human species.

It is also significant that Nietzsche introduces his new concept of superhumans with Zarathustra's revelation that God is dead. Later in Z Nietzsche extends this idea to all gods and presumably to all the supernatural entities that were associated with divinity in JS §143:

"All gods are dead: now we want superhumans to live." ["Todt sind alle Götter: nun wollen wir, dass der Übermensch lebe."| (Z I "On the Virtue of Gift-Giving" 3 see also ZIV "On Superior Humans" 2)

Thus, according to Nietzsche, the end of all belief in divinity and in supernatural superhumans is a precondition for the emergence of a new belief in the possibility of humans overcoming themselves and creating a superior species of superhumans. In an especially helpful later passage, Nietzsche contrasts humanity's very real ability to conceive and create this new species with the impossible task of conceiving and creating divinity:

Einst sagte man Gott, wenn People used to say God when man auf ferne Meere blickte; they gazed out over distant seas; nun aber lehrte ich euch sagen: yet now have taught you to say:

Übermensch. superhumans.

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

Gott ist eine Muthmaassung;
aber ich will, dass euer Muthmaassen nicht weiter reiche, als euer schaffender Wille.
Könntet ihr einen Gott schaffen? – So schweigt mir doch von allen Göttern! Wohl aber könntet ihr den Übermen- schen schaffen.

Nicht ihr vielleicht selber, meine Brüder! Aber zu Vätern und Vorfahren könntet ihr euch umschaffen des Übermenschen:
und Diess sei euer bestes Schaffen! –

Gott ist eine Muthmaassung:

aber ich will, dass euer Muthmaassen begrenzt sei in der Denkbarekeit.

Könntet ihr einen Gott denken? – Aber diess bedeute euch
Wille zur Wahrheit, dass Alles verwandelt werde in Menschen-Denkbares, Men- schen-Sichtbares, Men- schen-Fühlbares! Eure eignen

Sinne sollt ihr zu Ende denken!

779

God is a conjecture; but I don't want your conjecturing to extend further than your creating will.

Couldyou create agod? – Then don't you dare speak to me of any gods! But you could certainly create superhumans.

Perhaps not you yourselves, my brothers! But you could recreate yourselves into fathers and forefathers of superhumans:

and let this be your best creating! –

God is a conjecture: but I want your conjecturing to be limited to what is conceivable.

Could you conceive a god?

– But this is what the will to truth should mean to you, that everything be transformed into what is humanly conceivable, humanly visible, humanly tangible! You should think your own senses all the way through to their conclusion! (Z II "Upon the Blessed Isles")

Nietzsche comments here that people used to dream about impossible supernatural beings. But now they need to be taught to think realistically about how they can re-create themselves into ancestors of a future superhuman species. In a couple of brief preparatory notes, he goes further than this and suggests that previous human dreams of supernatural beings were actually a product of humankind's dissatisfaction with itself and of its resulting desire to create a superior species of superhumans:

780 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

Unsere Verachtung des Our contempt for h(umans)

M(enschen) trieb uns hinter die drove us beyond the stars. Sterne. Religion, Metaphysik, als Religion, metaphysics, as Symptom einer Begierde, den symptom of a desire to create Übermenschen zu schaffen. superhumans. (4[214])

Ich betrachte alle metaphy- I regard all metaphysical and sischen und religiösen Denk- religious modes of thought as weisen als Folge einer Unzufrie- results of a dissatisfaction with denheit am Menschen eines humans, of a drive for a superior, Triebes nach einer höheren, superhuman future – except übermenschlichen Zukunft – that humans wanted to flee into nur daß die Menschen sich ins the beyond: instead of building

Jenseits flüchten wollten: statt an on the future. A misunderstanding-der Zukunft zu bauen. Ein ing on the part of superior Mißverständniß der höheren natures who suffer on account of Naturen, die am häßlichen Bilde the ugly image of human beings.

des Menschen leiden. (CW₁, 27[74])

These unpublished fragments are especially interesting because they offer Nietzsche's background thinking when he has Zarathustra declare, right after announcing his new teaching, that his listeners should want superhumans to be the meaning of the earth:

I implore you, my brothers, remain faithful to the earth and do not believe those who speak to you of extraterrestrial hopes! [...]

I love those who do not first seek behind the stars for a reason to perish and be a sacrifice: who instead sacrifice themselves for the earth, so that the earth may one day belong to superhumans [dass die Erde einst der Übermenschen werde). (ZI "Preface" 3-4; cf. also ZI "On the Virtue of Gift-Giving" 2 and 5[17])

These collected passages also show that Nietzsche's new Zarathustraconcept of superhumans has nothing to do with the Romantic concept of superior individuals. Whereas the former is entirely directed toward the far future, the latter is inspired by the historical past. Whereas the former envisions something that has never yet existed, the latter idolizes famous instances of past existence. And whereas the former imagines a new species that will be superior to all human beings, the latter glorifies the greatest human specimens, who are nevertheless still puny by virtue of being human. Again, Nietzsche contrasts these two concepts within the text of Z.

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 781

Niemals noch gab es einen A superhuman being has Übermenschen. Nacktsah ich never yet existed. I saw both Beide, den grössten und den naked, the greatest and the kleinsten Menschen: – puniest human beings: –

Allzuähnlich sind sie They are all too similar to noch einander. Wahrlich, one another. Truly, I found even auch den Grössten fand ich – the greatest – all too human! allzumenschlich! (Z II "On Priests")

Ihr höchsten Menschen, You most superior human denen mein Auge begegnete! das beings whom I have ever laid ist mein Zweifel an euch und eyes on! this is my doubt about mein heimliches Lachen: ich you and my secret laughter: I rathe, ihr würdet meinen suspect you would call my Übermenschen – Teufel heissen! superhumans – devils!

Ach, ich ward dieser Oh, I became weary of these Höchsten und Besten müde: aus most superior and best human ihrer "Höhe" verlangte mich beings: from their "pinnacle" I hinauf, hinaus, hinweg zudem was compelled upward, outward, Übermenschen! and away to superhumans!

Ein Grausen überfiel mich, I was overcome with dread als ich diese Besten nackt sah: when I saw these best human da wuchsen mir die Flügel, beings naked: then I sprouted fortzuschweben in ferne wings to soar away into distant Zukiinfte. futures.

In fernere Zukiinfte, in Into more distant futures, südlichere Süden, als je ein into more southern souths than Bildner träumte: dorthin, wo any artist ever dreamed: there, Götter sich aller Kleider where gods are ashamed of all schämen! clothing! (Z II "On Human Prudence")

782 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

In part IV, Nietzsche depicts Zarathustra's interactions with a collection of diverse superior men who are modeled on actual men who were famous during Nietzsche's time, some of whom played an important role in his own development: Napoleon
(the kings), Tolstoy (the voluntary beggar), Schopenhauer (the soothsayer), Wagner (the sorcerer), Paul Rée (the leech-brain expert), Lord Byron (the shadow), and David Strauss (the ugliest man).

Here Nietzsche offers an extensive catalogue of all the various ways in which these superior men are lacking because aspects
of them still belong to the herd, the mob, and the rabble (as symbolized by their long-eared companion, the ass). In his speech
welcoming these superior men to his mountain cave, Zarathustra tells them that they are not strong, healthy, beautiful, or wellborn enough for him and that they are not the ones to whom his heritage and name belong. Only his chosen disciples, the ones he calls his children, the ones who will become ancestors of the superhumans, the ones he calls his new beautiful species (meine neue schöne Art), are entitled to his name and his heritage (Z IV "The Welcoming"). Similarly, in his speech to the assembled superior men about his concept of superior human beings,
Zarathustra urges them to help him create superhumans, since these are his first and only concern – not humans, not even
the very best among them (ZIV "On Superior Humans" 1-2). In these passages, then, Nietzsche invents a new use for the term Übermensch that had never before appeared in his own writings or in the history of German thought. Looking back at his introduction of this new use in part I of Z, it is not difficult to guess the stimulus for this invention. As commentators have noted from the start, what is most striking about this introduction is Nietzsche's clear and direct allusion to Darwinism, which he later calls "the last great scientific movement" (JS 357).

Thomas Brobjer, Nietzsche and the "English": The Influence of British and American Thinking on His Philosophy (New York: Humanity Books, 2008), 235-71.

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 783

Most obviously, Nietzsche writes that humans were once apes and that as a consequence they now regard apes with a feeling of painful embarrassment. This is the most famous image associated with Darwinism at the time Nietzsche was writing. Ten years earlier, in his first published text after BT;

Nietzsche had alluded to this image in his polemical confrontation with David Friedrich Strauss's influential book The Old Faith and the New: A Confession. Although Strauss claimed to replace Christianity with Darwinism, Nietzsche argued that he refused to acknowledge the radical consequences of Darwinism. Referring to Strauss's chapter titled "Apes and Humans: Darwin on the Descent of Humans from Apes"

("Affe und Mensch: Darwin über die Affenabstammung des Menschen"), Nietzsche wrote:

With a certain crude contentment [Strauss] covers himself with the shaggy cloak of our ape-genealogists and praises Darwin as one of humankind's greatest benefactors ... (HL 7, CW 2, 39, lines 1-4)

In later years, Nietzsche encountered this same famous image in some of his most closely studied readings. For example, his philosophical partner, Paul Rée, had singled out this image

in his brief introduction to. The Origin of Moral Feelings.
After writing that Darwin's discovery of the theory of evolution now enabled us to trace moral phenomena back to natural causes, Rée summarized this theory in a single proposition:
This natural explanation is fundamentally based on the proposition: The higher animals have evolved from the lower by means of natural selection, humans from apes.
Writing during his stay with Rée in Sorrento, Nietzsche includes
the following observation in HAH. Here Nietzsche anticipates 62. David Friedrich Strauss, Der Alte und der Neue Glaube: Ein Bekennt-nis (Leipzig: S. Hirzel, 1872).
Ernst Schmeitzner, 1877).
784 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD
Zarathustra's claim that humans once were apes and might even return to being animals – unless they act to avoid this fate:
The whole of humanity is perhaps only a developmental phase of a certain animal species of limited duration: so that human beings came from apes and will again become apes, while there is nobody who takes any interest whatsoever in this wonderful comic ending [. . .] the decline of universal world
culture might some day lead to an even more heightened repulsiveness and eventual bestialization of humanity to the point of apishness. – Precisely because we can envision this perspective, we are perhaps in a position to prevent the future
from reaching such an end. (HAH 247)
Finally, writing just a few years later, Nietzsche anticipates Zarathustra's remark that humans feel painful embarrassment when confronted with the news of their evolutionary origins in apes and other animals. But he is much less optimistic about the possibility of humans achieving any kind of grandeur in their evolutionary future:
The new fundamental feeling: our permanent transitoriness. – Formerly one tried to get a feel for the majesty of human beings by pointing backward toward their divine descent:
this has now become a forbidden path, because before its gate stands the ape along with other heinous beasts, grinning knowingly as if to say: no farther here in this direction.

So,

one has a go of it now from the opposite direction: the path humanity pursues shall serve as proof of its majesty and kinship to God. Alas, this too leads nowhere! At the end of this path stands the funeral urn of the /ast human and gravedigger (with the inscription "nihil humani a me alienum puto"). However high humanity may have evolved – and perhaps at the end it will be standing even lower than at the beginning! – there is in store for humanity no more a transformation into a higher order than for the ant and the earwigs, which, at the end of their "earthly days," will not ascend to kinship with God and eternal life. The Becoming dragsthe Has Been along behind it: why should an exception to this eternal spectacle be made for some little planet and again for some little species on it! Away with such senti-

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 785

men-talities! (D 49)

On a more abstract level, Nietzsche's introduction of his new concept of superhumans at the start of part I of Z includes several background principles that he regards as advances made by the Darwinist scientific movement:

No living species, not even the human species, has been divinely created.

No living species, not even the human species, is eternal or immutable.

Instead, all living species, including the human species, are a product of natural evolution.

All living species, including the human species, are transitory, impermanent, and subject to flux. They have an evolutionary origin, are capable of evolutionary change, and may be subject to evolutionary extinction.

All living species, including the human species, are interrelated and evolutionarily descended from other living species.

The human species is an animal species.

The human species is evolutionarily descended from an ancestor that is shared by the simpler and more primitive ape species. Therefore, the human species shares traits with the ape species.

In terms of geological chronology, all the animal species, including the human species, share evolutionary ancestors with far simpler and more primitive animal species, such as invertebrate animal species like the worm. Therefore, the human species shares traits with the worm species.

786 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

Clearly, then, Nietzsche's invention of a new philosophical concept of superhumans was made possible by his sympathetic reception of the contemporaneous Darwinist movement. Because of this movement, he was able to conceive the idea that humans might be capable of further evolution and even create a better species.⁶⁴

However, this doesn't mean that Nietzsche's new concept is Darwinist. In fact, when reviewing his accomplishments in EH, Nietzsche singles out for scorn the "learned cattle" who suspect him of Darwinism on account of his concept of superhumans (EH "Books" 1; see Appendix). The reason for this is, again, easy to find in his introduction of this concept in part I of Z. For nowhere here does Nietzsche mention Darwin's theory, cited above by Paul Rée, that natural selection is the means whereby species evolve. Instead, Zarathustra says that all living creatures so far, except humans, have created something beyond themselves and that they have done so by overcoming themselves. Whereas all other living creatures are clearly exceeded by humans, humans are not exceeded by anything else on earth (Z II "On Old and New Tablets" 23). So in

64. Nevertheless, there are scholars who write about the topic of Nietzsche and Darwinism but continue to interpret the Übermensch as a kind of superior (male) individual. Cf. Dirk R. Johnson, Nietzsche's Anti-Darwinism

(Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010), 57-60, 64-66, 77; John Richardson, Nietzsches New Darwinism (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004), 209.

65. In his commentary, Kaufmann acknowledges "the plain fact" that, despite Nietzsches remark in EH, his introduction of Zarathustra's Uebermensch teaching invites a Darwinist interpretation (Nietzsche: Philosopher, Psychologist, Antichrist, 311-13). But instead of exploring this connection further, Kaufmann resorts to Nietzsche's much earlier text, UO, in order to claim that this teaching concerns only his admiration for superior individuals like Goethe. In an especially far-fetched exegetical argument, Kaufmann claims that the reason Nietzsche dismissed the Darwinist interpretation is that he expected his readers to construe Zarathustra's simile of the ape by recalling his much earlier remark that "the philosophers, artists, and saints" are "truly human beings and no-longer-animals" (SE 5).

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 787

order for humans to create something that exceeds them, that is, the superhumans, they will have to overcome themselves. Here Nietzsche anticipates the new teaching that Zarathustra will unveil in part II of the book, in the key chapter titled

"On Self-Overcoming." In this chapter, Nietzsche simply dismisses what was then the most famous aspect of Darwin's theory of natural selection, indeed the aspect mentioned in the title of his book – namely, his doctrine of the struggle for existence or the struggle for life (Kampf um's Dasein, Kampf um's Leben).°° He then replaces it with his own new doctrine of the struggle for power:

"He who shot at the truth with the phrase 'will to existence' certainly did not hit it: this will – does not exist!

"For: that which is not cannot will; yet what is in existence, how could this still will to exist!

"Only where there is life, is there also will: but not will to live, instead – thus I teach you – will to power

"Much is esteemed more highly by the living than life itself; yet out of esteeming itself there speaks – the will to power!" (See also BGE 13; JS 349; TI "Forays" 14)

In this speech, Nietzsche argues against Darwin that living creatures do not compete for survival; they do so in order to gain power. But this raises the question as to how Nietzsche can offer an alternative naturalistic explanation of the newly demonstrated fact that species evolve. In Darwin's view, the struggle for existence plays an essential role. Those living creatures whose randomly acquired heritable variations do not offer them an advantage in adapting to their environment will lose this struggle against their competitors and will be selected out of existence – thus leaving their competitors to flourish and evolve.

For Nietzsche, however, the answer lies in his claim that living

66. Charles Darwin, On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selec- tion, or the Preservation of Favored Races in the Struggle for Life (London:

John Murray, 1859).

788 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

creatures value power more than survival. This means that they are even willing to risk their survival and select themselves out of existence, if this will make them feel more powerful. Nietzsche calls this process "life's selfovercoming":

Wherever I found living creatures, there I found will to power; and even in the will of those serving I found the will to be master.

That the weaker should serve the stronger, of this they are persuaded by their will, which wants to be master over what is weaker still: this is the one pleasure they cannot renounce.

And just as the lesser surrender to the greater, in order that they may take pleasure in their power over the least: in this way even the greatest may still surrender and for the sake of power wager – life itself [...]

The surrender of the greatest is this, that there is risk and danger and a death-defying roll of the dice [...]

And life itself told me this secret. "Behold," it spoke, "I am that which must always overcome itself.

"Of course you call it will to reproduce or drive to a purpose, to something higher, more distant, more manifold: but all this is one, and one secret.

"I will rather perish than renounce this one thing; and truly, wherever there is downfall and the falling of leaves, behold, there life sacrifices itself – for power!" (Z II "On Self-Overcoming")

It is important to notice that Nietzsche's argument here focuses only on those living creatures that are the most powerful and whose dominance has left them no viable competitors in the universal struggle for power. But they want to feel more power still, and so they are driven to create something greater beyond themselves, that is, a future species that will be much more powerful than they are. They must therefore breed stronger offspring and then select themselves out of existence by seeking the greatest risks and dangers – thus leaving their descendants

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 789

to flourish and repeat the same cycle until eventually a new species has emerged. In this way, they are able to gain a pleasurable feeling that their power extends far beyond the limits of their own short lives and their current sphere of control.

In the preface to part I of Zarathustra, published twenty-four years after the appearance of Darwin's On the Origin of Species, Nietzsche has his protagonist announce to humans that it is time for them to set a goal and plant the seed of their highest hope. This is because they have now attained their state of maximum power and no longer have any viable competitors on earth. As Zarathustra tells the superior men:

"What is farthest, deepest, highest to the stars in humans, their monstrous power [Des Menschen Fernstes, Tiefstes,

Sternen-

Hochstes, seine ungeheure Kraft|" (ZIV "On Superior Humans" 15). But they still have the drive for more power, or as Zarathustra puts it in more poetic terms: their soil is still rich enough to grow the tallest tree; the string of their bow is still tense enough to launch the arrow of their longing beyond the human; they still have enough chaos within them to give birth to a dancing star; and their cloud is still dark enough to discharge a bolt of lightning. According to Nietzsche, what will motivate the most powerful human beings into setting this goal is their dissatisfaction-with humankind in general and even with themselves.

So Zarathustra encourages the most powerful human beings to intensify their feelings of self-contempt as much as possible. First, he asks them to construct as their greatest experience the hour in which they feel contempt for all those aspects of themselves that they have previously valued: their happiness, reason, virtue, justice, and compassion. All of these should now be regarded as poverty, filth, and wretched contentment. Second, in a long passage modeled on the Bible's Sermon on the Mount, Zarathustra asks the most powerful human beings to convert their intensified feelings of self-contempt into an overwhelming desire to perish and to sacrifice themselves for the sake of superhumans. And finally, recognizing that his recently educated audience may now

790 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

feel too proud to accept his first two lessons, Zarathustra describes for them the most contemptible kind of humans, the future last humans, those whose will to power has declined to the point where they are no longer able to feel any self-contempt, where they merely want to live as long and as contentedly as possible, and where they merely blink at the idea of creating something beyond themselves.

Nietzsche doesn't specifically mention the selective-breeding aspect of his evolution theory in the "Preface" or in the
"On

Self-Overcoming" chapter of Z. Instead, he dwells on this aspect when applying his theory to the human species in the rest of the book and in his preparatory notes: "the humans who were overcome were themselves the fathers of superhumans [der überwundene Mensch selber war der Vater des Übermenschen]" (18[56]; cf. also 15[4], 16[86]). Speaking to his chosen disciples,

who have been repeatedly instructed that humans must be overcome, Zarathustra teaches them to think of love, marriage, and children as necessary steps on their way to becoming ancestors of superhumans. Here are the relevant passages:

Bitterniss ist im Kelch auch der besten Liebe: so macht sie

Sehnsucht zum Übermenschen,

so macht sie Durst dir, dem

Schaffenden!

Durst dem Schaffenden, Pfeil und Sehnsucht zum Über-menschen: sprich, mein Bruder, ist diess dein Wille zur Ehe?

Heilig heisst mir solch ein Wille und solche Ehe. –

Also rathe ich allen Redlichen;

und was wäre denn meine Liebe zum Übermenschen und zu Allem, was kommen soll, wenn ich anders riethe und redete!

There is bitterness in the cup of even the best love: thus it causes longing in you for super-humans, thus it causes thirst in you, the one who creates!

Thirst of the one who creates, arrow and longing for superhumans: speak, my brother, is this your will to marriage?

Such a will and such a marriage, I call these holy. – (Z I “On Child and Marriage”)

Thus I counsel all honest people; and what then would my love for superhumans be, and for all that is to come, if I counseled and spoke otherwise!

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

Nicht nur fort euch zu pflanzen, sondern hinauf
– dazu, oh meine Brüder, helfe euch der Garten der Ehe!

Der Strahl eines Sternes glänze in eurer Liebe! Eure Hoffnung heiße: “möge ich den Übermenschen gebären!”
Ihr Einsamen von heute, ihr Ausscheidenden, ihr sollt einst ein Volk sein: aus euch, die ihr euch selber auswähltet, soll ein auserwähltes Volk erwach-sen:

791

Not only to propagate yourselves further, but rather upward – oh my brothers, may the garden of marriage help you in this! (ZIII “On Old and New Tablets” 24)

Let the ray of a star shine in your love! Let your hope be called: “may I give birth to superhumans!” (ZI “On Little Women, Old and Young”; see also 4[100])

You solitary ones of today, you withdrawing ones, one day you shall be a people: from you who have chosen yourselves a chosen people shall grow: – and from – und aus ihm der them the superhumans. (ZI “On Übermensch.

the Virtue of Gift-Giving” 2)

Many scholars have criticized Nietzsche for not understanding

Darwin’s theory of evolution, or for offering flawed arguments against this theory, or for proposing an implausible alternative to this theory.” But they don’t really investigate his new Zara-

thustran concept of superhumans as a superior species, and they don’t see how this concept was his first and most important public response to Darwin's theory. This concept would not have been possible without Darwin's destruction of previous theologically based theories of eternal and immutable species.

It is true, of course, that in Darwin's account of environmentally adaptive fitness there is no room for the idea of superior and inferior species. But this point is also the inspiration for Nietzsche's rejection of the previous theologically based consensus that humankind is the peak of evolution (AC 14). By Cambridge University Press, 2002), 21-55.

792 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

arguing against Darwin that living creatures struggle for power instead of survival, Nietzsche is able to envision a species that will be superior to humankind because it will be more powerful.

He is also able to modify Darwin's theory that species evolve through natural selection with his claim that supremely dominant species may risk their survival and select themselves out of existence for the sake of obtaining still greater power. And whereas Darwin often depicts nature as a kind of agent of artificial selection, Nietzsche locates this agency in the individual members of these supremely dominant species as they aim to extend their power through their artificially selected progeny.

Because Nietzsche claims that his theory of evolution can explain everything that Darwin's theory explains (BGE 13), as well as cases of self-sacrificing organisms that Darwin had trouble explaining, critics might want to respond that he is offering the wrong kind of explanation.[®] In particular, they might concede that Nietzsche's theory of evolution through selfovercoming and artificial selection could be a plausible account of how human beings would choose to create a superior species. However, because it appears to attribute purposive long-term planning to all living creatures, Nietzsche's theory would seem to be nothing more than an anthropomorphic projection onto nature. Nietzsche's rebuttal to this serious charge would explain how he is actually following Darwin in offering a strictly naturalistic account of future human evolution. He is not imbuing nature with mind but rather translating the human mind back into nature.[®] Just as Darwin proposes that all seemingly species-specific human behavior can be explained in terms of instincts that are shared with all other animal species, so too Nietzsche argues that the human longing to create superhumans

The Origin of Species: "I confine myself to one special difficulty, which at first appeared to me insuperable, and actually fatal to my whole theory."

Philosophy," in Nietzsche and the Philosophers, ed. Mark Conard (New York: Routledge, 2017), 9-39.

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 793

should be explained in terms of an unconscious and irrational drive for power that they share with all other living creatures. This is why, for example, Nietzsche chooses the zoological language of "breeding" (Züchtung) to describe the human creation of superhumans. Indeed, he argues in his later works, it was actually Darwin who anthropomorphically projected into nature the struggle for existence that permeated his own Malthusian milieu of restricted will to power, overpopulation, and scarce resources (JS 349; TI "Forays" 14).[°]

Conclusion

Our goal in this Afterword has been to offer some helpful advice on Nietzsche's writing and philosophy in his 1882-84

notes. This advice is intended for English-speaking readers who are not fluent in German and are obliged to accept the expertise and wisdom of his translators. In terms of Nietzsche's writing, we have aimed to show in more detail than usual how he used the German language and how translators like us convert this stylistically complex and innovative usage into an accurate and readable English. We hope to have communicated the many complicated issues that any translator of Nietzsche must take into account and also to have demonstrated, through summary and examples, the principles that underlie our approach. In terms of his philosophy, we have concentrated on Nietzsche's invention in these notes of a new use for the German term Übermensch. Walter Kaufmann's vastly influential translations

70. A separate interpretive question concerns Nietzsche's view that no superhumans have ever existed despite the fact that human beings have always been engaged in practices of selective breeding. Why does Nietzsche think that this same practice, along with a focus on self-overcoming, should now lead to the creation of a superhuman species? The answer to this important question lies in Nietzsche's emphasis on Zarathustra's new teaching of eternal recurrence. See chapters 7 and 8 of Loeb, The Death of Nietzsche's Zarathustra; and Paul S. Loeb, "Nietzsche's Transhumanism: Evolution and Eternal Recurrence," in Nietzsche and Transhumanism: Precursor or Enemy, ed. Yunus Tuncel (Newcastle, UK: Cambridge Scholars, 2017), 83-100.

794 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD

and interpretations have led generations of translators and readers to suppose that Nietzsche's new use of this term referred merely to his admiration for extraordinary human individuals like Napoleon and Goethe. But we have argued here that close attention to the linguistic, textual, and philosophical context of Nietzsche's new use of the term Übermensch shows that he was inspired by Darwin's discoveries to conceive of the idea that human beings might be driven by their tremendous will to power into creating a superior species that would relate to all human beings, no matter how extraordinary, in the same way that humans now relate to apes.

Appendix

Appearances of the term Übermensch in Nietzsche's published works following the publication of Thus Spoke Zarathustra

Like a final sign pointing to the other way Napoleon appeared, the most singular and late-born human being [Mensch] there ever was, and in him the incarnate problem of the noble ideal in itself – and consider well what kind of problem it is:

Napoleon, this synthesis of an inhuman and a superhuman

[diese Synthesis von Unmensch und Übermensch) . . . (GM 116)

As was to be expected, the whole ferocity of moral stultification that, as we all know, passes for morality itself in Germany many, was mobilized against my concept of "beyond good and evil"—: I could tell some pretty tales about that. Above all, I was asked to reflect on the "undeniable superiority" of our time in its ethical judgment, the genuine progress we have made here: in comparison with us, a Cesare Borgia should not be presented as a "superior human being" at all, as a kind of superhuman being [als ein "höherer Mensch," als eine Art Übermensch], as I present him ... (TI "Forays" 37)

TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 795

Humanity does not represent a development for the better or the stronger or the superior in the way this is believed today. "Progress" is merely a modern idea, which is to say a false idea. The European of today remains, in terms of value, deeply inferior to the European of the Renaissance; further development is absolutely or, by any form of necessity, enhancement, intensification, strengthening.

In another sense, in individual cases there is continual success in the most diverse places in the world and from the most diverse cultures where a superior type does in fact present itself: something that is a kind of superhuman in relation to humanity as a whole [etwas, das im Verhältniss zur Gesamtmenschheit eine Art Übermensch ist). Such serendipities of great success have always been possible and perhaps will always be possible. And even whole families, tribes, and peoples can in certain circumstances represent just such a lucky hit. (AC 4)

In the final analysis, this is my typical experience and, if you prefer, the originality of my experience. Those who thought they had understood something by me fashioned something of me in their own image – not infrequently the opposite of me, for example, an “idealist”; those who understood nothing of me denied that I came into consideration at all. – The word “superhumans” [Das Wort “Übermensch”] to designate the type that has turned out best, in contrast to “modern” humans, to “good” humans, to Christians and other nihilists – a word that becomes, in the mouth of a Zarathustra, that destroyer of morality, a most thought-provoking word, is almost invariably, and completely innocently, understood in the sense of those values whose opposite was manifested in the figure of Zarathustra, in other words, as the “idealistic” type of a superior kind of human, half “saint,” half “genius” . . .

This has caused other learned cattle to suspect me of Darwin-ism; they have even recognized in it the “hero cult,” so wickedly rejected by me, of Carlyle, that great unconscious, unintentional counterfeiter. When I whispered in someone’s ear that he should look around for a Cesare Borgia rather than a Parsifal, he could not believe his ears.”! (EH “Books” 1)

796 TRANSLATOR’S AFTERWORD

Here, at every moment, human beings are overcome, here the concept “superhumans” has become the highest reality – at an infinite distance beneath him lies everything that was ever found great in the human being. [Hier ist in jedem Augen-blick

 der Mensch überwunden, der Begriff "Übermensch" ward hier höchste Realität, – in einer unendlichen Ferne liegt alles das, was bisher gross am Menschen hiess, unter ihm.) (EH "Books"
 Z)
 Zarathustra, the first psychologist of the good, is – therefore
 – a friend of evil. When a decadence-kind of human has climbed to the rank of the most superior kind, this could only happen at the expense of their opposite kind, the strong kind of human confident about life. When the herd animal glows in the radiance of the purest virtue, the exceptional human must have been devalued into evil. When mendacity at any price appropriates the word "truth" for its perspective, a really truthful person must be relegated to the worst of names.
 Here, Zarathustra leaves no doubt: he says that his recognition of the good, the "best," was exactly the thing that aroused his horror at the human in general; through this dislike, his wings had grown ready "to soar off to distant futures," – he does not conceal the fact that Ais type of human, a relatively superhuman type, is superhuman precisely in relation to the good people, and that the good and the just people would call his superhumans devils . . . [dass sein Typus
 71. See also Nietzsche's letter to Malwida von Meysenbug (20
 October 1888, KGB III:s, 458): "– – for your own purposes, you have again – something I never forgive – made my concept 'superhumans' [meinem Begriff
 "Übermensch"] into a 'more sophisticated sham,' into something resembling sibyls and prophets: whereas every serious reader of my texts has to know that the one type of human being that cannot disgust me is a type completely antithetical to the ideal-idols of yesteryear, a thousand times more similar to Cesare Borgia than to a Christ."
 TRANSLATOR'S AFTERWORD 797

Mensch, ein relativ übermenschlicher Typus, gerade im Verhältniss zu den Guten übermenschlich ist, dass die Guten und Gerechten seinen Übermenschen Teufel nennen würden . . .]

You most superior human beings whom I have ever laid eyes on! this is my doubt about you and my secret laughter: I suspect you would call my superhumans – devils! [ich rathe, ihr würdet meinen Übermenschen – Teufel heissen!)

You are so alienated from greatness with souls like yours, that you would find superhumans terrifying in their goodness . . . [So fremd seid ihr dem Grossen mit eurer Seele, dass euch der Übermensch furchtbar sein würde in seiner Güte . . .] (EH "Destiny" 5, quoting Z II "On Human Prudence")

Index of Persons

Page numbers followed by n and nn indicate notes.

Aeschylus (525?-456? BCE), Greek tragedian, 332

Aguecheek, Sir Andrew, comic character in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, 290, 667n

Alcibiades (450?-404 BCE), Athenian politician and general, 692n

Alexander the Great (336-323 BCE), king of Macedonia, 691n

Antigone, daughter of Oedipus and key figure in Sophocles's Oedipus trilogy, 301

Aquaviva, Claudio (1543-1615), Italian Jesuit priest, often referred to as the second founder of the Jesuit order, 608n

Ariadne, in Greek mythology the rescuer of Theseus from the labyrinth, later consort of Dionysus, 109, 388

Aristotle (384-322 BCE), Greek philosopher and scientist, 265, 274, 440, 534-35, 641n, 691-92n, 698n, 706nI, 724

Ascoli, Graziadio (1829-1907), Italian linguist and philologist, 8

Avenarius, Richard (1843-96), German-Swiss positivist philosopher, 714n-715n, 715nn-26, 715n

Balzac, Honoré de (1799-1850), French writer, 299

Batz, Philipp. See Mainlander, Philipp

Baumann, J. J. (1837-1916), German author of several theological and philosophical works, 284-87, 658n, 665n, 665nn-I

Beethoven, Ludwig van (1770- 1827), German Romantic composer, 364, 697n

Beneke, Friedrich Eduard (1798-1854), German 800 psychologist and philosopher, translator of Bentham's Traite de legislation civile et pénale (1802, ed. Etienne Dumont)

into German, 445, 693n

Bentham, Jeremy (1748-1842), British philosopher and economist, 258, 445, 693n

Berkeley, George (1685-1753), British empiricist philosopher and Anglican bishop, 740

Bismarck, Otto von (1815-98), Prussian chancellor from 1871 to I, 230, 597

Blanqui, Louis Auguste (1805-81), French socialist and political activist, 506, 703nn-50

Boniforti, Luigi (1817-1909), Italian poet and illustrator, author of a historical and artistic guide to Arona and the road to Lake Maggiore (1855), 607n

Borgia, Cesare (1475-1507), Italian nobleman, politician, and cardinal, exemplary figure for Machiavelli and Nietzsche, 759, 762-63, 765, 771, 794, 796

Bourget, Paul (1852-1935), French author and critic, 586, 714nI, 715n, 716n

Brahma, supreme being of Hinduism, 97

INDEX OF PERSONS

Brehm, Alfred Edmund (1829- 84), German zoologist, 324

Buckle, Henry Thomas (1821-62), English historian and philosopher, 10, 610n

Buddha (ca. sth c. BCE), Indian religious leader and founder of Buddhism, 94, 620nI, 635n

Burckhardt, Jacob (1818-97), Swiss art historian, mentor, and friend of Nietzsche, 299, 695n

Byron, George Gordon, Lord (1788-1824), English Romantic poet, 768, 782

Caesar, Gaius Julius (ca. 100- 44 BCE), Roman general, statesman, and historian, 224, 252, 325, 474, 772

Cardano, Gerolamo (Latin: Hieronymus Cardanus) (1501-76), Italian Renaissance mathematician and philosopher, 280

Carlyle, Thomas (1795-1881), Scottish essayist, historian, translator (of Goethe), and novelist, 660nI, 691n, 767-69, 795

Carus, Carl Gustav (1789- 1869), German physiologist, psychologist, and painter, friend of Goethe's and author of numerous works, including Vergleichende Psychologie oder Geschichte der Seele in der Reihenfolge der Tierwelt ("Comparative psychology or history of the soul in the order of the animal kingdom") (1866), 620n

INDEX OF PERSONS

Chamfort, Sebastien-Roch Nicolas (1741-94), French playwright, revolutionary, and aphorist, whose Maximes et

Pensées were published posthumously in 1795, 217
 Chauber, Theobald (pseudonym for Berthold Auerbach) (1812–82), author of a biography of Frederick the Great (1834), 692n
 Chaulieu, Guillaume Amfrye de (1639-1720), French poet, 622n
 Cherubini, Luigi (1760-1842), Italian composer who lived and worked in France, 364 Christ. See Jesus
 Cicero, Marcus Tullius (106-43 BCE), famed Roman orator, philosopher, and politician, 291, 641n
 Circe, sorceress in Homer's Odyssey, 65, 353
 Clausewitz, Carl Philipp Gottfried von (1780-1831), Prussian general and military theorist, 440, 692nn- 22, 692n-693n 801
 Coleridge, Samuel Taylor (1772-1834), English poet, critic, and philosopher, 433
 Columbus, Christopher (ca. 1451-1506), Italian explorer, 6, 25, 93, 532, 608n, 613n, 6351346, 737 Copernicus, Nicolaus (1473- 1543), Polish astronomer, 583
 Cratylus (sth century BCE), Greek philosopher described by Aristotle as a follower of Heraclitus and intellectual influence on Plato, 302
 Cromwell, Oliver (1599-1658), English general and statesman, 691nI
 Dante Alighieri (1265-1321), Italian epic poet, 77, 236, 299, 631n
 Darc, Daniel, pen name of Marie Serrure Régnier (1840-87), author of the humorous dictionary Petit bréviaire du Parisien (1883), 324, 672n
 Darwin, Charles (1809-82), English naturalist, renowned for his theory of evolution, 143, 597, 659n, 693n, 758, 762, 782-83, 786-87, 789, 791-94
 Demosthenes (384-322 BCE), Athenian statesman and orator, 4 802
 Deussen, Paul Jakob (1845- 1919), German Indologist, professor of philosophy at the University of Kiel, and friend of Nietzsche from his days at Schulpforta, 656n, 723
 Diogenes (400/390-328/323 BCE), Greek philosopher, 269, 676n
 Dionysus, Greek god of wine and fertility, to whom Asiatic origins were often attributed, 297, 323, 388
 Don Quixote, eponymous character in novel by Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra (1547-1616), 293, 667n
 Dreher, Eugen (1841-1900), German philosopher and literary critic, 445, 693n
 Du Camp, Maxime (1822-94), French writer and photographer, 16, 610n

Dühring, Eugen (1833-1921), German philosopher and political economist, positivist, and socialist critic of Marxism, 218, 241-42, 322-23, 328, 339, 525, 597, 658n, 720-21, 776

Dumont, Léon (1837-77), French psychologist and philosopher, 662n, 664n-665n, 722

INDEX OF PERSONS

Emerson, Ralph Waldo (1803- 82), American transcendentalist philosopher and essayist, 259, 263, 288, 437, 461, 497, 556, 650nI, 661nn-18, 661n, 665n, 690n, 696n, 701n, 720, 736, 753

Empedocles (490?-430? BCE), Greek natural philosopher, 584, 657n

Epictetus (55?-135? BCE), Stoic philosopher, 498

Epicurus (342-270 BCE), Greek natural and moral philosopher, 218, 246, 255, 261-62, 268, 274, 298, 477, 534, 540-42, 760, 777-78

Eros, classical Greek God of love, 89

Espinas, Alfred Victor (1844-1922), French philosopher, influenced by the work of Comte and Spencer, 283, 662n, 665nn-6, 668nn-33, 722

Euryanthe, eponymous character of German opera by Carl Maria von Weber, first performed in Vienna in 1823, 364, 680n

Faust, eponymous character of Goethe's tragedy, wagers his soul, 88, 168, 661n, 744, 769-71

INDEX OF PERSONS

Förster, Bernhard (1843-89), Prussian superpatriot and anti-Semite, co-founder, with Nietzsche's sister Elisabeth, of the settlement "New Germany" in Paraguay, 718

Förster-Nietzsche, Elisabeth (1846-1935), Nietzsche's sister, 625n, 703n, 717-20, 736

Foster, Sir Michael (1836- 1907), English physiologist, 660Nn-661NII, 722

Friedrich the Great (1712-86), king and creator of modern Prussia, 440, 691n, 692n

Galton, Francis (1822-1911), English statistician, psychologist, eugenicist, and polymath, 716n

Gast, Peter. See Köselitz, Heinrich

Gellert, Christian Fürchtegott (1715-69), German professor of philosophy, poet, and novelist, 749

Gluck, Christoph Willibald (1714-87), German opera composer, synthesizer of the French and Italian traditions, 364

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von (1749-1832), German classical poet, novelist, 803 playwright, and natural philosopher, 28, 299, 661n, 672n, 679n, 723, 744, 749 767, 769-72» 786n, 794

Goltz, Wilhelm Leopold Colmar Freiherr von der (1843-1916), Prussian field marshal and military historian, 433, 445, 690n, 691nI, 691nI, 692nn- 22, 692n-693n

Goncourt, Edmond de (1822-96), French writer and literary and art critic, 714n

Gracian, Baltasar (Balthasar Grazian) (1601-58), Spanish Jesuit writer and philosopher, 298-99, 668n

Gretchen (Margarete), tragic heroine and Faust's savior in Goethe's Faust, 168, 770

Grimm, Jacob (1785-1863), German philologist, jurist, and mythologist, and Wilhelm (1786-1859), author and anthropologist, co-authors of the historical German dictionary Deutsches Wörterbuch, 607, 715n, 725, 739, 741, 748, 759, 761

Haller, Albrecht von (1708- 77), Swiss physiologist and poet, 749

804

Haller, Joseph (1810-86), German author of a book on old Spanish proverbs from the time of Cervantes (1883), 433, 690n

Hamlet, Shakespearean tragic hero, 236-37, 535

Handel, Georg Friedrich (1685- 1759), German-English Baroque composer, 506, 558, 703n

Hartmann, Eduard von (1842-1906), German metaphysical philosopher, 215, 267, 273, 275-276, 278, 284, 288, 445, 654n, 655n, 656n, 656n, 657nn-47, 657n, 662n, 662n, 663nn-73, 664nn- 79, 664nn-83, 664nn- 86, 664nn-89, 665n, 665n, 665nn-20, 693n, 695n, 696n, 707N, 721, 736

Haydn, Franz Joseph (1732- 1809), Austrian classical composer, 364

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770-1831), German idealist philosopher, 637n, 641n, 738-39

Hegesias (ca. 330-270 BCE), Cyrenaic philosopher, 276

Hellwald, Friedrich von (1842-92), Austrian author

INDEX OF PERSONS

ofbooks on geography and the history of culture, 612n

Helvetius, Claude-Adrien (1715-71), French materialist and utilitarian philosopher, 217-18, 240, 658n

Heraclitus of Ephesus (535-475 BCE), pre-Socratic Greek philosopher known for his doctrine of constant change, 649n

Hitzig, Eduard (1838-1907), German neurologist and neuropsychiatrist, 25, 612n

Hoffmann, E. T. A. (1776- 1822), German novelist, composer, and caricaturist, 750

Hölderlin, Friedrich (1770- 1843), German poet, 657n

Homer (ca. 9th or 8th c. BCE)

Greek epic poet, author of the Iliad and Odyssey, 211, 215, 228, 298-300, 662n

Horace (65-8 BCE), Latin pastoral poet, 638n, 678n

Hume, David (1711-76), Scottish philosopher, 585, 740

Ihering (Jhering), Rudolf von (1818-92), German legal scholar, sometimes called the father of sociological

INDEX OF PERSONS

jurisprudence, 237, 658n, 723

Isis, Egyptian goddess of the earth and moon, 369

Jaspers, Karl Theodor (1883-1969), German-Swiss psychiatrist and philosopher, 737n

Jesus (5? BCE-30? CE), central figure of Christianity, 8, 16, 49-50, 73, 108,

139, 275, 279, 326, 609n, 633n, 635n, 677n, 746-47, 796n

Johnson, Samuel (1709-84), English poet, satirist, critic, and lexicographer, 767

Juvenal, Decimus Junius (60?-127? CE), Roman poet and satirist, 724

Kaltbrunner, David (1829-94), Swiss author and geographer, 666n

Kant, Immanuel (1724-1804), German Enlightenment philosopher, 214, 217, 219,

222, 227, 253, 261, 280, 321,

452, 585, 610n, 630n, 664n, 672n, 738-40, 772

Kern, Hendrik (1833-1917), Dutch linguist and Orientalist, 445, 693n

Kleinenberg, Nicolaus (1842-97), German zoologist and 805 evolutionary morphologist, 660-61nI, 722

Klemm, Gustav (1802-67), German anthropologist and librarian, author of a ten-volume history of culture, 666n, 666n

Köselitz, Heinrich (aka Peter Gast) (1854-1918), author and composer, Nietzsche's closest collaborator over many years in preparing his manuscripts for publication, 131, 610n, 668n, 718

La Bruyère, Jean de (1645-96), French essayist and moralist, 670n

Lange, Friedrich Albert (1828-75), German materialist philosopher, 720

Laocoön, son of Acoetes in Greek mythology, whose tragic story is included in Virgil's Aeneid and the marble sculpture of whom was the subject of aesthetic debates, 215

La Rochefoucauld, Francois, duc de (1613-80), French moral philosopher, 55, 73, 109, 217, 228, 298, 637n

Lecky, William Edward Hartpole (1838-1903), Irish historian and political theorist, 214, 230, 655n, 722

806

Lichtenberg, Georg Christoph (1742-99), German physicist, satirist, and aphorist, 723

Lichtenberger, Henri (1864- 1941), French Germanist, author of the first French work on Nietzsche (La Philosophie de Nietzsche, 1898), 703n

Lilienfeld, Paul von (1829- 1903), statesman and social scientist of imperial Russia, 25, 613nI

Lindau, Paul (1839-1919), German writer, dramatist, and founder/editor, from 1878-1904, of the well-known monthly Nord und Sud, 34, 620n

Locke, John (1632-1704), English empiricist philosopher, 740

Louis XIV, the Sun King (1638-1715), longest-reigning monarch of France, 228

Lubbock, John (1834-1913), English banker, politician, scientist, and polymath, 666n

Luke, author of the third Gospel and the book of Acts, 8, 275, 746

Lully, Jean-Baptiste (1632-87), Italian-born French composer and dancer, 364

INDEX OF PERSONS

Luther, Martin (1483-1546), German Augustinian friar who launched the Reformation, 230, 621n, 653n, 671n, 697n, 725, 747; 751

Machiavelli, Niccolò (1469- 1527), Italian diplomat, philosopher, and writer, 762

Mainländer, Philipp (né Philipp Batz) (1841-76), German poet and philosopher, 131, 256, 641n, 660nnI-10, 661nI, 720, 722

Mandeville, Bernard de (1670- 1733), British (Dutch-born) philosopher, political economist, and satirist, 218

Maudsley, Henry (1835-1918), British psychiatrist and essayist on medical and literary topics, 657n

Meister Eckhart (1260-1328?), German Dominican mystic and theologian, 433

Menander (ca. 342-ca. 290 BCE), Greek comic dramatist, 221, 655n

Metteyya, the future Buddha, 34, 620nI

Meysenbug, Malwida von (1816-1903), German writer and friend of Wagner and Nietzsche, 796n

INDEX OF PERSONS

Michelangelo (1473-1564), Italian Renaissance painter, sculptor, and architect, 211

Mohammed (ca. 570-632), founder of Islam, 693n

Moldenhauer, E. F. Theodor, 19th-century German astronomer and cosmologist, 131, 324, 433, 445, 640n

Molière, Jean-Baptiste Poquelin (1622-73), French comic dramatist, 706n

Montaigne, Michel Eyquem de (1533-92), French moral philosopher and essayist, 217, 299, 723

Napoleon Bonaparte (1769- 1821), French general and emperor, 56, 224, 230, 252, 370, 428, 441, 504, 600, 657n, 672n, 692n, 692n, 754, 759, 762, 765-72, 782, 794; as "the Corsican," 328

Nausicaa, Phaeacian princess in Homer's Odyssey, 79

Nevers, Philippe Jules Mancini, Duke of (1641- 1707), courtier at the court of Louis XIV, 42, 622-23n

Odysseus, legendary Greek king of Ithaca and hero of Homer's Odyssey, 79, 759

807

Oedipus, mythical Greek king of Thebes, central figure in Sophocles's Oedipus trilogy, 239

Oldenberg, Hermann (1854-1920), German Indologist, 620n, 635n

Ollendorff, Paul (1851-1920), French editor and publisher, 324, 672n

Orpheus, legendary musician, poet, and prophet of ancient Greece, 300

Overbeck, Franz (1837-1905), German Protestant theologian and friend of Nietzsche from the 1870s onward, 654n1, 718

Overbeck, Ida (1848-1933), wife of Franz Overbeck, 718

Pana, called Corinna outside of these notes, a mythical woman invented by Nietzsche in an alternative

Z sketch having to do with the death of Empedocles, 400-1, 461-62, 537, 736

Parsifal, eponymous character in Wagner's opera which premiered in Bayreuth in 1882, 214, 796

Pascal, Blaise (1623-62), French mathematician, physicist, and Catholic philosopher, 217, 298

808

Pasquale di Paoli, Filippo Antonio (1725-1807), Corsican revolutionary and leader, 232

Paul, Saint (5?-67? CE), apostle of Jesus, author of much of the New Testament, 227, 670n

Periander (?-587? BCE), second tyrant of the Cypselid dynasty in Corinth, 84

Pericles (495-429 BCE), Greek statesman and orator, 265, 269, 299

Persius (34-62 CE), Roman (Etruscan) poet and satirist, 724

Peschel, Oscar (1826-75), German geographer and ethnographer, 666n, 666n

Pettigrew, James Bell (1834– 1908), Scottish naturalist, 666nn-8, 666n

Pindar (522?-443? BCE), ancient Greek lyric poet from Thebes, 433

Pinder, Wilhelm (1884-1928), childhood friend of Nietzsche, 683n

Plato (429?-347? BCE), ancient Greek philosopher, 89, 94; 264, 269, 299-300, 302, 636n, 668n, 724

Post, Albert Hermann (1839-95), German judge and legal expert, 284,

INDEX OF PERSONS

658n, 665nn-8,

667n-16, 667n,

667n, 668nn--31 Prometheus, Greek titan, 117

Rabelais, Francois (ca. 1494-1553), French Renaissance writer, physician, and humanist, 638n

Rameau, Jean-Philippe (1683-1764), French composer and music theorist, 364

Ranke, Leopold von (1795- 1886), German historian, 445, 693n

Reclus, Jacques Elisée (1830-1905), French geographer, writer, and anarchist, 498

Rée, Paul Ludwig Carl Heinrich (1849-1901), German moral philosopher, close friend and correspondent of Nietzsche during the period of Human, All Too Human, 29, 217, 223, 230, 258, 442, 453-54, 456, 499, 607, 610n, 655n, 656n, 695n–696n, 718-21, 782-83, 786

Renan, Ernest (1823-92), French philosopher of religion and politics, 8

Renée, Amédée (1808-59), French historian and man of letters, 622n

INDEX OF PERSONS

Rohde, Erwin (1845-98), German classicist scholar, lifelong friend of Nietzsche, 737n, 742

Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712-78), Geneva-born French political philosopher and novelist, 166, 585, 772

Roux, Wilhelm (1850-1924), German zoologist and founder of experimental embryology, 244, 267, 271, 656n, 658n, 658n–659n, 659nn-88, 659nn-91, 662n, 663nn-63, 663nn-66, 722, 736

Salome, Lou Andreas (1861- 1937), Russian-German writer known for her friendships with great writers and thinkers of her day, 3, 28, 607, 609n, 610n, 621n, 625n, 653n, 718–21

Sand, George, pen name of Aurore Dupin (1804-76), French Romantic novelist, 16, 610n

Schilling, Julius Karl Josef (1834-1922), professor of Spanish and author of a popular Spanish grammar textbook, 24, 612n

Schmidt, Leopold Valentin (1824-92), German classical philologist best known for his work Die Ethik der alten Griechen (1882), 268, 655n, 655nn-32, 658n, 661n, 662nn-31, 662nn-35, 662n, 662n, 663nnI-58, 668n, 723

Schneider, Georg Heinrich, 10th-century German zoologist and theorist of human and animal psychology; 272, 280-81, 663n, 665n, 665n, 722

Schopenhauer, Arthur (1788-1860), German philosopher, 214, 218, 222, 274, 276, 303, 307, 451, 453, 456, 585, 625n, 664nn-86, 720, 723, 737, 739, 782

Schubert, Franz (1797-1828), Austrian Romantic composer, 642n

Scott, Sir Walter (1771-1832), Scottish historical novelist, 433, 690n

Semper, Karl Gottfried (1832- 93), German ethnologist and animal ecologist, 662n, 722

Seneca (ca. 4 BCE-65 CE), Roman Stoic philosopher, dramatist, and statesman, 69InI

Shakespeare, William (1564- 1616), English poet and dramatist, 236-37, 290, 299, 666n 810

Shaw, George Bernard (1856- 1950), Anglo-Irish playwright and critic, 752, 754

Siegfried, Norse hero of the third opera of Wagner's Ring cycle, 706n, 759 Simonides (556?-467? BCE), Greek lyric poet, 265

Socrates (470?-399 BCE), Greek philosopher, 212-13, 217, 222, 229, 246, 264, 269, 298-300, 636n

Sophocles (496-406 BCE), Greek tragedian, 298

Spencer, Herbert (1820-1903), English philosopher, 496, 533, 701n, 706n

Spinoza, Baruch de (1632-77), Dutch-Jewish rationalist philosopher, 218, 226-27, 249, 302, 609n, 656n, 697n, 721

Spontini, Luigi Pacifico (1774-1851), Italian opera composer and conductor, 364

Stein, Heinrich Ludwig Wilhelm von (1833-96), German philosopher and historian of philosophy, 624n, 635n, 646n

Steinbach, Wendelin (1454- 1519), German theologian, 750

Stendhal, pen name of Henri Beyle (1783-1842), French

INDEX OF PERSONS

Romantic novelist, 217-18, 230, 240, 282, 657n, 657n, 658n

Strauss, David Friedrich (1808-74), German philosopher, theologian, and historian, 782-83

Swedenborg, Emmanuel (1688-1758), Swedish scientist, philosopher, theologian, and mystic, 433, 585

Taine, Hippolyte (1828-93), French literary critic and historian, 333, 673n

Tamerlane (1336-1405), Turkic-Mongol conqueror, 692n

Tartuffe, eponymous character in Molière's play, first performed in 1664, 533, 543, 706n

Teichmüller, Gustav (1833-88), German philosopher, 261, 277, 476, 534, 650n, 651nn-200, 661NI, 664n, 698n, 706nnI-12, 721

Tertullian, Quintus Septimus Florens (ca. 150-230),

Carthaginian theologian and Church father, 222, 655nn-36

Theognis (6th century BCE), Greek elegiac poet, 264

INDEX OF PERSONS

Thucydides (460-395 BCE), Greek historian and author of the History of the Peloponnesian War, 299, 301; 724

Timon (431-404 BCE), Athenian citizen known for his misanthropy, mentioned in Aristophanes's Lysistrata, 76

Tolstoy, Leo (1828-1910), Russian novelist, 782

Vauvenargues, Luc de Clapiers, marquis de (1715-47), French moralist and aphorist, 625n

Verri, Count Pietro (1728-97), Italian educator, economist, philosopher, and jurist, 280, 664n

Vogt, Johannes Gustav (1843-ca. 1920), materialist philosopher and professor at the University of Leipzig, author of Die Kraft: Eine real-monistische Weltanschauung ("Force: A realist-monist worldview") (1878), 34, 601, 607n, 620n, 716n

Voltaire, pen name of François-Marie Arouet (1694-1778), French Enlightenment philosopher and writer, 94, 585

811

Wagner, Richard (1813-83), German late Romantic operatic composer, dramatist, and theorist, 136, 214, 217, 339, 364, 451, 456, 509,

585-86, 636n, 654n, 673n, 693n, 700n, 706n, 718, 761, 782

Wallace, Alfred Russel (1823-1913), British humanist, naturalist, geographer, and social critic, 597, 693n

Walpole, Horace (1717-97), 4th Earl of Oxford and English writer and man of letters, 312, 670n

Weber, Carl Maria von (1786-1826), German Romantic composer and opera director, 680n

Weber, Ernst Heinrich (1795-1878), German physiologist, considered one of the founders of experimental psychology, 258, 660n-661N, 722

Wellhausen, Julius (1844-1918), German biblical scholar and orientalist, 445, 693n

Werther, the youthful, suicidal protagonist of Goethe's novel The Sorrows of Young Werther (1774), 770

Wilbrandt, Adolf von (1837- 1911), German novelist and playwright, 34, 620n

812

Winckelmann, Johann Joachim (1717-68), German classical archaeologist and art historian, 215, 655n, 722

Xenophon (430?-354 BCE), Athenian historian, soldier, and student of Socrates, 300, 692n

Zarathustra (Zoroaster), fictional prophet-hero of Nietzsche's Thus Spoke Zarathustra, 36, 96-101, 104, 113, II-34, 137, 140-50, 158, 160, 174, 176-85, 196-201, 308, 310, 317, 323, 326, 332, 336-39, 365, 371,

INDEX OF PERSONS

397-403, 408-9, 421-22, 431-43, 446-48, 451, 457-80, 482-511, 512-15, 520-22, 525, 527-28, 532-37, 540-44; 547, 552, 556-561-62, 565-73, 578-79, 612n, 620n, 632n, 673n, 690nI, 694-11, 697-187, 706n, 734, 736, 740, 760-66, 771-75; 778-91; 795-96

Zinzendorf, Nicolaus Ludwig Graf von (1700-60), German religious reformer and bishop of the Moravian Church, 433, 445, 702n

Zöllner, Johann Karl Friedrich (1834-82), German astrophysicist, 607n

Subject Index

Page numbers followed by n and nn indicate notes.

Abyss, 97, 178, 327, 338, 378, and great actors, 83; who 397, 403, 414, 510, 531, 548, communicate, 117; without 560 knowing it or without Accident, 108, 261, 492, 538, wanting it, 495, 531, 547-3 554, 572, 700N, 709n, without love, 128

Action(s): forgetting past body and, 252; causes vs. deeds, 118, 178, 358; free and unegoistic, 208; good, 306, 373-74; as good or bad, 239; herd instinct and, 453; intentions and, 219, 234, 288; motives and, 12, 272, 319, 456, 591; pleasure and, 239-40, 282; prehistory of, 265; purposelessness of, 274; representation of, 273; unegoistic, 278

Actors: antithesis of, 108; concerning, 417-18; downfall of, 108; honoring, 121, 180;

justice and, 550; little conscience in, 102; performance by, 180; power occasions for, 88; competi- tion of, 460; conquering, 114; contest of, 369; as critiques of knowledge, 45; discrediting, 136; of dis- tance, 248, 255; enemies and, 221; evil, 112, 170; female assessment of, 16–17, 32; as fictional ac- counts of causes, 596; giving names to, 45;
good and evil and, 138; heap of, 132; illnesses and, 243; irrationality of, 168; mascu- line vs. feminine, 45; morality and, 255; music and, 83; names of, 243; noblesse and, 231; overcoming, 172; passion about justice and, 46; playing of against one another, 96; plebeian mistrust of, 246; praise and blame of, 137; purifiers of, 203; revealed, 89; as sign language, 234; strong, avoiding, 112; in superior humans, 370; unleashing on others vs. self, 87; value judgments and, 136, 184

814

SUBJECT INDEX

69; hedgehogs, 508; horses,
290, 312, 318, 390, 419, 441, 449; hucksters beneath dignity of, 481; humans back into, 431; humans still almost-animal, 485; judging humans from standpoint of, 262; living among humans as, 57, 351; lynx eyes, 155; morality and, 238; oxen, 384, 390; panthers, 388; preparing Aidos, 263 the earth for, 119, 180; rats, Alms, 130, 141, 148, 183, 227, 289, 293; scorpions, 81, 205; 347 sea creature crawling up on Altruism, 296, 439, 497, 509 land, 194; sea slugs, 404; Ambitions, 44, 53, 440, 484, societies of, 296; speaking 506, 558, 560, 599 to, 97; "Speech to the Angels, 72, 100, 150, 178, 384, 499, 508, 559, 749
Animals: arriving from the sky, 433; bear claws, 155; bears, dancing, 369; becoming perfect as, 125; beetles, 404; belly of whale, 368, 383;
boar, 382, 410; cave bear, 391; danger of turning back into animality, 121; dear to me, 407; drives and affects, following, 239; eating, 289; elephant standing on head, 40, 49, 106, 564; fish, 314, 386, 414, 599; flaws of, 289;
flies, 290, 368, 398, 418; forest animals, 530; frogs, 313, 386, 395, 415, 600; goats, 388, 490, 538, 573; God become animal, feeling like, Animals," 176; spider, 368; suffering and, 187; wolves,

126, 156, 404, 494, 574, 741;
 Zarathustra and, 125, 398, 432, 521, 525, 533, 535, 540-42.
 See also Apes; Birds; Buffalo; Butterflies; Cats; Dogs; Donkeys; Doves; Dragons; Eagle(s); Hound of fire; Hound of hell; Lions and lionesses; Peacocks; Serpent(s); Tarantulas; Worms and earthworms Anthropomorphism, 336, 420, 457, 460
 Anti-Christian, The (Nietzsche): commentary on, 762, 765, 772, 795
 Ape(s), 12, 87, 140, 144, 194, 563, 711, 749, 774-75; 783-855
 SUBJECT INDEX
 786n, 794; "ape" ideal, 12; commentary on, 783-84; as embarrassment, 144, 194; of his god, 563; human beings as, 87; humans as super- apes, 140, 777
 Architecture, 214, 216
 Arrogance: as danger, 393; called divine, 539; in goodness, 87; the lie in art and, 128; of the powerful, 460; Wagner's tasteless, 136; as wellspring of evil, 179
 Ars poetica (Horace), 638n
 Art: believing in, 214; direction for, 161; for its own sake, 598; Greek, 299-300; joy and the lie in, 128; knowledge and, 214; as metaphysical, 213; new art form, 203; prestige and, 344; sanctified means and vile end, 346; saved by, 213; science and, 213; as surface, 206; thinking about, 499; tragedy and, 214, 452 Artists: beauty of the body and, 260-61; becoming artist, saint, and philosopher, 452; communicating themselves, 248; courteous hearts, 508; drives and ideals of, 472; immorality and, 451; mockery of, 533, 540; new, 436; pain and, 515-16, 578; preservation of the species and, 327; rabble 815
 and, 70; sculptors, 331, 463; thinking about, 499; tyranny of, 465; as victims of their works, 162
 Asceticism: degeneration and, 229; of intellect, 108; as liberation from morality, 208-9; of mind, 202; necessity out of virtue, 347; purpose of, 141; reason and, 206; science as, 108
 Author(s). See Writer(s)
 Authority: against, 438; ethics and, 211; opinion as, 17, 44;

patriarchal, 294; recognition of, 255; of superior beings, 255; unconditional shoulds and, 321; wanted, 467
 Badness: actions and, 239; bad actions as functional, 266; best woman as bad, 98, 178; emergence of, 135, 184; evil becoming bad, 222; evil vs., 184, 237, 361; feeling of, 239; good people and, 263; hurt as, 487, 568; prestige and, 344; servitude and, 242; state of those who judge and, 288; what we take to be bad, 443
 Barbarism, 35, 235, 298, 586, 597
 Beauty: benevolence and, 396; beyond humans, 383; bodies and, 256, 260-61; cloaking man, 487; defending self 816 with, 316; desire and, 313, 387; as diabolical, 201; heroes and the beautiful, 395; hiding the man, 568; holding mirror to, 402; holy laughter of, 390; the ideal and, 261; intuiting soul and, 269; Kant on, 261; knowledge and, 384; male vs. female, 291; obsession with, 313; penitence and, 383; persuading through, 368; as shadow of perfection, 382, 420; as shield, 311, 368; sight of sublime vs., 72; silence and, 270; speaking beacons of, 395; in ugliness, 533; what most deserves admiration, 217
 Becoming, 303, 498, 537, 586; innocence of, 305, 463, 476, 542 Belief: abandoning, 360; conventional explanations and, 46, 624n; education into, 595; form vs. content and, 56; in God, 57, 500, 555; knowledge to serve, 382; in metaphysical things, 130; not for long, 186; seeing and not believing, 109, 352; in self, 330, 377; strong feeling and, 206; those who stammer are believed, 57; in time, 336; truth and, 322, 468; unneeded, 207; will and, 307,
 SUBJECT INDEX
 590-91; without justification, 65; in Zarathustra, 127
 Betrayal, 38, 63, 98, 283, 518; of friends, 264, 283, 452, 547, 562
 Beyond Good and Evil (Nietzsche), 42, 622n; commentary on, 719, 721, 733, 735-36
 Birds, 57, 177, 186, 283, 289-90, 327; 329, 381, 417, 405, 521, 527, 539, 548; cock pecked at by hens, 312, 390, 449, 549; geese, 490, 538, 573; hens, 515-I, 561, 578; hummingbirds, 281; ostriches, 163; songbirds, 344, 514
 Birth of Tragedy, The (Nietzsche): commentary on, 736, 758n

Blessed isles, 421, 435, 480, 490, 501, 535, 573

Blessings: to become blessed, 102, 173; curses and, 72; evil deeds as, 276; giving a beautiful soul to chance, 530; love and, 170; those who do not love me, 111

Blindness: a being who will strike everyone blind, 434; choosing, 545; honesty and, 143, 193, 200, 359, 450; redeemers and, 333; sun and, 384, 485, 567; in twilight, 159; to upward

SUBJECT INDEX

path, 327; will to, 393, 410;

Zarathustra and, 36, 620n

Bliss: of above and below, 550; earthly vs. heavenly, 275; hinterworlders and, 528; impossible, 276; malicious, 579; Nirvana and, 544; purple, 524-25; teaching, 523; thought and, 545; as ultimate purpose, 274; unchosen, 532-33, 536, 561; virtue and, 583; Zarathustra and, 544

Blood: anxiety about shedding, 500; as bad witness for truth, 130, 184; books written with, 168; churches founded on, 101, 159; doctrine poisoned by, 184; of ocean, 4135 poisoned, 378; putrid, tepid, rancid, 494, 574

Blood debts, 293, 667n

Blood feuds, 134, 137, 294

Body: adaptation of, 151; ailments of, 486, 566; altering, 151, 252; anger and, 320; atrophied, 229; beauty of, 256, 260-61; building up, vs. brain, 456; changing soul and, 483; consciousness vs., 254; contempt for, 260; correctives of, 151; cosmo- logical mechanics and, 241; creation and movement of, 192; designation and valuation of bodily states, 817

319; despisers of, 158; development of the mind and perfection of, 594; embodied self and, 202; as evil, 201; goal and, 152; gravity and, 539; healthy, 151; improving, 254; labor and, 151; laws of nature, ignorance of, 194; liberation from, 302; as master teacher, 598; monster of, 315; muscle condition, 258; new, 98; parts telegraphically connected, 274; passions and, 318; of predators, magnificent, 228-29; reason, wisdom, and, 157; sacrilege against, 201; sign language of, 253-54, 288; spatial analysis of, 592; underbellies, 115; what doesn't suit, 486; will and, 460; wonder and, 258

Books, 7, 26, 60, 89, 126-27, 168, 346, 356, 391
 Borneo, 289
 Brahmanism, 229, 249, 298
 Bravery. See Courage
 Buddhism, 34, 151, 291, 456, 620nI
 Buffalo, 283, 316, 391, 417
 Butterflies, 47, 399, 492, 572
 Calculation, 133, 233, 249 Catholic Church: Jesuitism, 273, 280, 297, 453, 456,
 818
 540-41, 544, 585; priest-state, 297; as state form, 283
 Cats, 9, 38, 57, 62, 126, 148, 156,
 177-78, 229, 380, 404, 621nI Cause and causality: absolute, 436; affects and, 596; belief in, 108; cause and effect, 153, 224, 236, 352, 434, 591, 593,
 601; error of the first cause,
 107; feeling of force and, 587; feelings and, 225; gone, 219; meaning of, 317; perceptions as causes of perceptions, 591; turned into sinners, 349; unknow-ability of, 213; war and, 95, 176
 Caves: Zarathustra and, 125,
 133, 398, 422, 475, 483, 533,
 535
 Cells, organic, 7, 226, 244-45, 271
 Chance: commentary on, 747;
 dice, 76, 141, 179, 199, 279, 359; explaining world through, 142; giving a beautiful soul to, 530; as little reason as possible, 518; outwitting, 568; praise of, 503; purpose and, 142, 193, 200; redemption from, 5373 running on feet of, 539; suffering, 487, 568; theory of, 599; the weak and, 548
 Chaos: within, 118, 179;
 aversion to, 595; commen- tary on, 777, 789; culture
 SUBJECT INDEX
 and, 322; to each his own and, 60; giving birth to a dance of stars, 150; of ideas, original, 585; imminent, 120; judgments and, 592; as rule, 95, 176
 Character: decisions and, 83;
 human interaction and, 76; Napoleon and, 224; stealing, 499, 552; strong, 285; superior intellect and, 319; temperaments

as qualities of will, 256-57; transformation of, 245; true, 286; typical experience and, 70; unpleasant consequences and, 115; to want something and to make it happen, 77; yes or no on, 166
 Chastity, 65, 353 Children: becoming again, 129, 166, 354, 567; best people not having, 504, 558; child raising, 17, 32; child within, 130, 152; egoism of, 79; eye of, 159; game of, 141, 193, 200, 359; heavenly, 383; innocence like, 487; land of, 314, 386, 417; love of, 16, 98, 610n; matrilineage and patrimony, 290-917; with mirror, 383, 398-99, 421-22; as monuments to passion, 172; mother's compassion for, 260; not coming to him who suffers them, 485, 567; play and, 97, 177; as superior to parents, 155; toys swept into abyss, 378, 414; women and men compared to, 45; Zarathustra and, 398-99. See also Procreation
 SUBJECT INDEX
 China, 289, 292, 295
 Choice: of actions, 240; before and after, 530; among ethics, 207; drives and, 282; heroism and, 11; morality and, 14, 171; prudence and, 215; spontaneous energy and, 285
 Christianity: Bible-thumpers, 523, 538, 571; cleverness and, 275; cowardice and, 100; Eros poisoned by, 89; fairness as weakness, 597; folly not to accept, 275; impotent love of humanity, 82; La Rochefoucauld and, 228; love meal, 101; moral complexity of soul, 228; origin of, 286; re-creation and, 544; self-deception and, 429; Wagner and, 214. See also Moravians Church(es): charcoal burners and, 145, 342n; feelings, emergence from, 214; founded on blood, 101, 159; as gravestone, 103, 174; as love-deprived people, 105; as mendacious kind of state, 110, 352; overcoming, 543; preachers of death and, 163. See also Priests
 819
 Clairvoyance, 435, 467, 474, 478, 532-33, 546
 Cleverness: Christianity and, 275; commentary on, 745; fingers, clever, 311, 389, 415, 449; as inspiration or demonic, 266-67; pride and, 155; returning, 433; sage vs., 559; virtue and, 212; women and, 62; Zarathustra and, 462, 510
 Coincidence, 108, 261, 492,

538, 554, 572, 700N,
709n, 747. See also Accident
Commanding: as experiment,
432; God, 52; individuals and, 210; learning to command, 355; obedience
and, 50, 221, 486, 564, 566;
the one who can command, 331, 406; persuasion and, 315, 368, 375, 566; reason and, 534; through dying, 538
Commandments, 227, 239, 520-21, 609n. See also
"Thou shalt"
Communication: ability of, 479; actors and, 117; of artists and philosophers, 234, 248; creation as, 100;
how is it possible?, 131; of knowledge, 63; of yourself, 15, 29; Zarathustra and, 476 Compassion: agony in, 451; antidote to, 86; as cross, 183;
cruelty and, 19, 21, 65, 88; 820 cult of, 80; as danger, 14, 393; despair and, 86; as God's hell, 134; of greatest people, 485, 567; hard, 101, 175; hard-heartedness and, 130, 184; as hellish feeling, 133, 183; heroes and, 41, 48; for humanity as tyranny, 47, 351; intellect and, 119; as laughable, 88; laughing at, 423; to lawgivers, 540; madness and, 154; morality and, 80, 144; moral pessimists and, 167; of mother for child, 260; origin of, 296; overcoming, 543; pain and, 215; Pana and, 461; pinnacle above, 326, 403; renown of, 222; for rulers, 533; for self,
260; souls and, 132; subtlety of, 171; superhumans and,
127, 131, 329, 332, 396, 4053 in superior humans, 370; universal, 247; velvet sheen of, 54; as virtue, 52, 468; weak, 214; Zarathustra and, 399, 466 Competition: of affects, 460; among social classes, 270; in different moralities, 268; of drives, 61; feeling of power and, 146; hubris and, 263; intellectual object of, 244; peculiarities perfected through, 300; philosophers and, 298;
as principle, 464; sexual love as, 464
SUBJECT INDEX
Concealment: of faces, 369; of feelings, 496, 557; influential people and, 322, 366; power contests and, 477; shame and, 281, 317, 401; talking about ourselves as, 450; those who conceal nothing about themselves, 37, 63; of thoughts from self, 72; Zarathustra and, 579

Conscience: adaptation of, 216; bad conscience as tax, 55; bite of, 91, 568; blood debts and, 293; clear, 529; collective, 237, 460; of community and individual, 599; convulsions of, 324; drives and, 444; evil, 216, 469; evil vs. good conscience, 22; freedom as, 84; of friends, 150; good vs. bad, 267; holiness in, 553; intellectual, 452; law and, 554; mendacity and, 563; pangs of, 57, 84, 119, 351, 411, 419; responsibility separated from, 293; tragedies of, 88; training, 80; tyrant within and, 61; as ventriloquist, 113

Consciousness: body vs., 254; development of, 589; intellect and, 364, 593; overvaluing of, 583; purpose and, 592-94; will and, 364

Contempt: admiration, injustice, and, 312, 393, 411,

SUBJECT INDEX

449, 549; benefactors and, 554, 558; for body, 260; for the comfortable, 437; displeasure of, 143; divine, 552; great, 196, 480; hermit and, 141; for humans, 150, 198; injustice and, 312, 393; kindness and, 90, 568; lust for power and, 505; morality

begins with, 250; mouth free of, 190; Napoleon and, 504; outlawing and, 294-95; renunciation and, 502; of rulers and tyrants for the weak, 536; self-contempt, 156, 495; teaching, 149, 197; for types of people, 220; who has the most, 505; for women, 16; Zarathustra and, 432, 475

Courage: to burn yourself up, 106, 171; cowardice and, 316, 391; crooked paths and, 575; danger and, 114; the extraordinary and, 328; for the few, 523; freedom and, 242; of great things, 574; highest form of, 114-15; sense of life and, 257; in women, 54

Cowardice: bravery and, 316, 391; Christians and, 100; community of cowards, 503; cruel people and, 354; denying procreation to cowards, 79; pleasing people and, 557; priests and, 821

573; reign of cowards, 536; as sin, 37

Creative people and those who create: glossary on, 730; goodness and, 472; hating themselves, 419; new languages and, 313; praising poverty of the intellect and skepticism, 328; productive people vs., 167; ruling and, 438; seeing through things and, 360; seeking new languages, 387; as self- annihilators, 543; solitude and, 336,
 446; souls, creative, 580; unleashing affects on others vs. self, 87; wisdom and goodness as means and condition, 572 Creativity and creation: above and beyond ourselves, 186-87; asceticism of intellect and, 108; as communication, 100; comprehension and, 590; creative character of everything that happens, 153; desire and, 187; destruction and, 191; drives and, 484; enduring life through, 120; freedom in, 361, 545; giving gifts vs., 462; goodness vs., 467; happiness and, 118; hatred and, 46, 419; honesty of, 79; incorporation of one's own image, 248; living above 822 and beyond yourself, 175; loving life and, 191; neighbors vs., 123, 182, 354, 416, 450; new values and, 102; power, creative, 255, 584, 599; right to create, 207; running away from yourself, 102; self-mutila- tion and, 173; something higher than humans, 523; suffering and, 190; as transformation,
 331; unbelief and, 55; vice vs., 308; will to create, 468, 489 Creators: as destroyers, 191; goodness and, 472; of the herd, 266; of justice, 138; loving their work, 114; moralities and, 233; the one who knows, 99; out of goodness and wisdom, 543; tyrants and, 135, 532; women as idleness of, 345
 Crime: great vs. small, 496; justifying, 77; lust for, 490.
 See also Punishment
 Criminals: contempt for, 78; deeds vs., 84; "enemy" vs., 79;
 as holy, 99; pale criminal in a dungeon, 117; significance in world history, 55; the unnamable and, 55 Cross: of compassion, 105, 183, 396; crawling to, 522; ghastly god and, 379; love for humans as, 147; loving
 SUBJECT INDEX
 God and, 387; nailing themselves on, 233, 313
 Cruelty: being good at, 119, 179; compassion and, 19, 21, 65, 88; cowardice and, 354;
 evil and, 95, 176; god and, 379; heroism and, 21, 112, 152; intellect and, 119; intoxication as, 598; laughter as, 293; moral outrage and, 16;

 pride of,
 88; to self, 19; as sensuality, 53; to what is loved, 110; will to suffer and, 8, 66, 172;
 women and, 24, III
 Culture: barbarians and, 597; decline of, 585, 599; historical people and, 453; labors on behalf of, 259; masculinity and, 268; moralities and, 219; taste
 and, 235; value of, 159, 202; vanished, longing for, 37, 65; will to, 260
 Curses and cursing, 490, 512, 523, 570, 573
 Cynics, 429
 Dance: dancers with ears in their toes, 320, 372, 417, 447, 549; Dionysian, 117; ecstatic, 398; sanctification of, 476; Zarathustra and, 308, 566
 Danger, 88, 114, 121, 135, 215,
 250, 255, 300, 338, 344, 349, 390, 429, 517; arrogance as,
 SUBJECT INDEX
 393; compassion as, 14, 393, 396; convictions as, 342; disdain for, 251; faith in knowing and being known as greatest, 188; as impetus, 233; of insanity, 129; lying and, 250; for the sake of honor, 231; truth and, 342-43; ultimate knowledge as greatest, 360; the weak as, 367, for the wise, 40, 48;
 woman as, 9I
 Darwinism, 143; commentary on, 719, 762, 782-83, 785-95
 Dawn (Nietzsche), 40; commentary on, 736, 758n, 768-69, 784-85 Death: beginning at birth, 144, 189; burial rites, 532; cheerfulness and, 493, 570;
 fear of, 213, 599; as festival, 95, 176, 180; freely-chosen, 36; funeral pyres, 421, 467; funeral rites, 119; gravedig- gers, 416, 485, 567; justifying, 162; life after, 4 living close to, 117; longing for, 413; as means to victory and triumph, 14; nearness of, 169; night watchman and midnight chamber of the dead, 309, 327-28; preachers of the slow death, 158;
 purpose of, 201; resurrection, 4; second, 4, 66; sleep and, 484, 561; song of, 432; sudden, 187, 361, 422; 823 tombs, 326, 334, 552; of youth with snake, 535; Zarathustra and, 447, 462, 471, 486. See also Killing Deception: egoism and, 13; invention of, 192, 359; lies of self-deceivers, 579; love and, 50, 564; in moralistic and religious literature, 235; poets and, 420; self-decep- tion as habit, 252

 Degeneration, 46, 107, 117, 143, 229, 598, 775
 Demigods, 52, 357, 573
 Demons, 88, 150, 267, 419, 436
 Denial: of life and morality, 35; of moral significance, 288; of purposes, 213; self-denial, 73, 79, 167, 2773 trust and, 55; of truth vs.
 lies, 344; of unfreedom of will, 58
 Desire: beauty and, 313, 387; corporeal, adaptation of, 151;
 creation and, 187; as happiness, 188; for life, 213-14; love of, 54, 565; as sacred, 201; for superhu- mans, 196 Destiny: coincidence and, 508; loving 36, 76; meeting and loving, 186; my will and, 548; pregnant, 570; small victories and, 517; of soul, 538; standing atop, 538; unluckiest roll of dice, 179; wanted by will, 414; 824
 Zarathustra and, 489, 493, 513, 570
 Determinism, 309, 470, 473, 542, 544
 Deterrence. See Punishment Devil(s): being God's advocate with, 146, 195, 358; deification of, 8, 66; as father of gods, 173; genius gravitatio- nis, 47, 624ns; God and, 12, 19-20, 47, 74, 4203 morality and, 80; as neighboring ideal, 14; Zarathustra taking as his own, 326
 Devil's advocate (advocatus diaboli), 10-11, 19, 43
 Dice, 76, 141, 179, 199, 279, 359
 Dionysian, the, 117, 297, 299, 314, 315
 Disgust: bad emerging from, 135, 184; breaking free of, 517; counter-disgust and, 136; for the foreign, 247-48; narcotics of, 598; need for vice and, 67-68; overcom- ing, 474; from puny people, 104, 175; Zarathustra and, 500 Distance: affect of, 248, 255; architecture and, 216;
 solitude and, 68
 Dogs, 9, 62, 103, 121, 123, 174, 180, 185, 229, 289, 293, 391,
 494, 525, 542, 574, 62120, 705n, 741; dog called "I," 145;

dog-like people, 220.

SUBJECT INDEX

See also Hound of fire; Hound of hell

Donkeys, 117, 168, 337, 377; 416

Doves, 183, 323, 381, 432, 475;

522, 533, 541

Downfall: of blessed isles, 435; of heroes, 214; intoxication and, 598; madness and, 154; overcoming and, 462; procreation and conception as, 379; striving for, 20; teaching to bring about, 281

Dragons, 158, 311, 342, 389-90, 511, 746

Dreams, 45, 70, 83, 95, 173,

206, 314, 325, 328, 386, 488-89, 503, 518, 550, 562, 569

Drives: above and beyond ourselves, 186-87; accumulated force and, 281; animals and, 239; of artists, 472; battling our drives, 216; beatification of, 542; called heretical, 476; combining in new way, 468; to conceal, 281; condemning or killing, 494; demands of, 233; denying, 316; discharged, 216; economy of, 287; as effect, not cause, 224; ego and, 304; ethical taste and, 211; evil, 468, 528; of future humankind, 467; Greek, 301; historical sense and,

SUBJECT INDEX

452; as holy, 189; hurling into opposite, 586; interaction among, 281, 509, 544; knowledge and, 202, 452; living morality and, 207; lower, 429; many, in every action, 287; moral, 602; perceiving people according to, 443; performance vs. result, 286; as personification, 287; pleasure and, 286; promised pleasure and, 282; rank order among, 444; rationalizing, 166; satisfaction in, 287; selfishness and, 509; self-mutilation and lust, 173; sexual, 52, 291, 600; socialization of, 243; social vs. individual, 296; sovereign drive, 235; speaking through philosophers, 234; as superior organs, 271; superior organs and, 274; tyrant within and, 61; value judgments and, 136; want satisfaction, freedom, and peace, 560; what drives drives, 484, 561; wounded, 215

Eagle(s), 289, 308, 313, 331, 360,

378, 380, 386, 397, 412, 417,

448; Zarathustra and, 36,

125, 309, 399, 401, 462, 533

Earth, 159-60, 170, 199, 201

308, 315, 317, 324, 333, 380,

389, 406, 439

825

Ecce Homo (Nietzsche):

commentary on, 753, 762, 765n, 769, 772, 773n, 786, 795-97
 Education: herd and, 595;
 historical, 420; Plato on, 264; of rabble, 70; rulers and, 477; school as sanctioned form, 11; Schopenhauer as Educator, 453, 786n; solitude and, 436; state and, 246; women and, 354 Egoism: altruism and, 509;
 deception and, 13; degenera- tion and, 229; drives and, 304;
 egoistic principle, 211;
 ethics and, 211; as fact vs.
 principle, 285; falsely labeled, 439; hatred and, 77; heroic mode of thought and, 496; no moral principle, 268; praise and, 226; prudence and, 215; Rée and, 453; unegoistic action, 278; as will to happiness, 277 Ends and means: cause and effect and, 236; end justifies the means, 283; goal-setting and, 278; individual as fruit of, 286; language of feeling and, 224; a sign language, 260; as tiniest part of what happens, 225
 Enemies, 79, 110, 156, 216, 348-49, 458, 507, 587; affects 826 and, 221; being spared by, 38, 63; forgiving, 81, 204;
 laughing at, 339; lust for, 390; mourning, 59; natural, 96;
 need for, 90; not blessing, 438; passing by, 316, 391; reverence in, 58; seducing, 391; seeking out, 503, 536, 557; suffering of, 269; summoning, 463, 542; transforming into gods, 463;
 true, speeches against, 535 Enlightenment, 47, 101, 298, 441, 563, 586 Envy: beauty and, 261; devil and, 264; egoism
 and, 77;
 love and, 64, 89; not moral,
 269; suppressed, 367; their virtues and, 548 Epicureans, 430, 441, 534, 540-41. See also God/gods Equality: elimination of, 218; as injustice, 483, 561; people are not equal, 46, 322, 351, 367, 409; praise of, 561; teachers of, 409; tyrants and, 369; will to, 368 Error(s): of Aristotle, 534; as condition of life, 432; Epicureans and, 534; error veritate sim plicior, 355, 679n; fighting on behalf of truth, 350, 417; funda- mental, 218, 281; Greek, 300; "Psychology of Error," 587;
 truth supported by, 72;
 value of, 453; world as, 207
 SUBJECT INDEX

Eternal recurrence, 14, 302, 359, 584-85, 599. See also Eternal return
 Eternal return: 20, 190, 337, 431, 464, 466, 524, 532, 584-86, 703n. See also Eternal recurrence Ethics: customs reshaped into, 87; egoism and, 211; ethical viewpoint, 235; eudaimonistic, 707n; motives named as ethical, 12; of Spinoza, 227
 Eudaimonism, 227-28, 544, 707n
 Evil: action and, 237; affects, overcoming, 112; arrogance as wellspring of, 179; bad reputation of, 78; bad vs., 184, 237, 361; becoming,
 486, 508, 565; best man as,
 98, 178; as blessing, 276; capacity for, 374; conscience, evil, 22, 216, 469; counter-retribution and, 455; critiquing action and, 208; cruelty and, 95, 176; degeneration and, 229; dreams, 488, 489, 569; drives and, 468, 528; for each his evil, 20; education into, 14; emergence of, 135, 184;
 everything good coming out of, 18; evildoers as unhappy, 242; gods as cause of, 263; in good people, 58; greatness
 and,
 SUBJECT INDEX
 23, 28; hatred of, 81; heroes of, 109; individual action as, 453; as inspiring, 239; intentions and, 250; as judgment, 429; La Roche-foucauld and, 55; liberation of, 35; lightning compared to, 50, 564; love and, 527; morality vs., 60; moral pessimists and, 167; my evil, 188;
 nausea and, 151; as necessary and useful, 9; not feeling ashamed of, 109; organic function and, 288, 598; original sin = original virtue, 51; parasitism as, 428; powerful people and, 224; as precursor to good, 288; predators, bodies of,
 228-29; as preliminary stage of a good, 2373 preservation of, 16, 170; puniness vs., 86, 353; puny people incapable of, 77; revenge and, 312; roots compared to, 90; selfishness supposed as, 8, 4953 selflessness and, 597; superior humans, 565; value
 of, 453; in weak vs. great people, 64; will to, 493; Zarathustra and, 399, 466. See also Good and evil Evil people: emergence of, 559; imperiousness and, 482; Jesus and, 50; moralizing by, 59; preservation of, 112; 827 punishment and, 476; redemption of, 436, 463, 542; seen naked, 383, 406; taught by, 464; Zarathustra and, 482
 Evolution, 586; commentary on 787-93. See also Darwinism

Excess: Greek aversion to, 263; joylessness and, 346; of morality, 9; of power, conquering as, 248, 396

Exercise, 362-63

Existence: belly of, 163-64; conditioned for eternity, 544; conditions of, 208-9, 592; forgotten, 358; into goal of the plan, 99; of a god, 156; justification of, 146, 195, 212, 358; perfecting, 438; science and, 213; suffering and, 187; superhumans as meaning of, 201; things as limit of, 355, 413; uncanny and without meaning, 201; value of, 586; wagering, 332; will to exist, 412

Experience(s): beyond, 133; came imperiously, 306, 371, 414, 447, 548; causality, force, and, 587; character and, 70; collecting of, 363; compassion and, 80; consciousness and, 364; digestion of, 111, 353; every action, 236; illusory, 588; inventory of, 595; nothingness and, 312; 828

poets and, 63, 88, 250; profound people and, 182; terrible, 48, 563

Eye, 5, 27, 71, 89, 147, 159, 183, 265, 303, 308, 318, 327, 381, 383-85, 389, 393, 396, 409-11, 413, 476, 485-86, 488, 493, 508, 515, 521, 554, 565, 567, 601. See also Blindness

Faces: human, 51, 89, 344; as mask, 402, 410

Failure: consolation and, 436; forgiving opponents of, 56, 199, 351; happiness in, 435; of intellect, 455; as proof, 154, 198, 200

Faith: bliss from, 350, 4173 hinterworlders and, 528; knowledge, knowing, and, 106, 188, 324; new thinkers and, 563; persons of, 22, 86; religion vs., 160; of teachers of purpose, 589; unconditional, 166; in willing, 596; in wisdom and goodness, 469

Fame, 83, 117, 367, 383, 533, 549, 578

Family, primitive, 293-94

Fathers, 290-91, 343, 367, 485, 546, 567, 576

Faust (Goethe), 88, 661n, 672n, 679n, 769-71

Feelings, 12, 37, 59, 61, 65, 81, 101, 134, 138, 155, 162, 183,

SUBJECT INDEX

196, 202, 214, 216, 225, 239, 265, 298, 301, 318, 475-76, 596, 630n, 632n, 658n; action and, 271, 365; contradictory, 21; compassion as hellish, 133, 183; delicate, 170; of desire for revenge, 458-59; drive and, 224, 271; glossary on, 738-39, 743-44; the herd and, 197; honoring, 195; judgment and, 318, 362; lofty, 53, 70, 161, 228, 315, 430; of man for a woman,

 16, 623n; masculine, 110; morality and, 84, 138, 171, 209, 246, 259, 267; noble, 262; of "noble" vs. "good," 53 origins of, 211, 362; of overflowing, 220; for poetry, 15; of power, 21, 146, 215, 233, 237, 239-40, 258,
 322, 455, 457, 544, 5873 puny,
 194; and representations, 236; of sarcastic people, 110;
 shame for, 71, 97, 1763 skepticism and heroic, 600;
 strongest, as image-like, 366; of being touched, 10; truth vs., 207, 5573 of the vice-ridden, 68; will and, 144, 194, 224, 363; woman's, of weakness, 31
 Female. See Woman Festival(s): cleansing and sanctification of the earth, 315; of cosmic designations,
 SUBJECT INDEX
 434; death as, 95, 119, 176, 180; of the earth, 434; of fools, 495; foundations, 464; of friendship, 434; gathering of individuals, 162; invention of, 203; of life, 336, 446-47; of murder-of-God- penitents, 320, 367, 420; procre-ation as, 180; of virtue, 124; Zarathustra and, 542
 Fiji-Islanders, 293
 Fire hound. See Hound of fire
 Flux, 118, 120, 121, 124, 135, 182
 Flying: laughing and, 580; song of one who flies, 540-41, 581; those who fly,
 290, 469, 474, 502, 513, 533,
 539, 550
 Foolishness, 57, 115, 130, 155,
 169, 351, 374, 436, 439, 495;
 497, 514, 524, 537, 564, 597
 Fools, 102, 341, 478, 494-95, 536, 539, 556, 562, 566
 Force: basic principles, 3; driving, 241; expanding, 457; explosions of, 456; feeling of, 240, 587; humans as resistance forces, 590; multiplicity of, 590; outpouring of, 278; plastic, 285; prudence as lack of, 249; recurrence and, 586;
 ruling, 436; sensation of, 588; transformation of, 432
 Foreignness: appropriation and, 245; Germany and, 829

585; hatred and disgust of, 247-48; matrilineage vs. patri-mony and, 290-91; of old ideals, 457; resisting, 271; the strong vs. the weak
 and, 259
 Forgetting: deeds, forgotten, 178, 358; as divine skill, 553;
 existence of, 352; memory usually forgotten, 10; of self, 437; themselves, 199; wise, 487-88, 568
 Forgiveness: blame and, 81, 204; of enemies vs. friends, 81, 204; justifying, 114, 204; revenge after, 216
 Freedom: annihilation of, 441; in creating, 361, 545; drives and, 484; Epicureans and, 534; as fruit of love, 181; as good conscience, 84; illness and, 14; intellectual, 451; law vs., 182; morality and, 3;
 from old ideals, 452; overcoming will and, 534; philosophy and, 304; On those who speak freely, 414-15; from what, for what, 160; of willing, 187
 Free-spiritedness: glossary on, 741; knowledge of, 122; morality and, 13-14; philosophers and scholars vs., 453; preservation of the species and, 327; selfishness as means to, 13; thinking and speaking, 84
 830 Freethinking and freethinkers, 127, 129, 465, 640n; glossary on, 741; morality and, 97, 208-9; religion and, 21, 45, 563 Free will and freedom of the will: cause and effect and, 153, 591; desire for revenge and, 237; dissolution of, 432; as error, 207; explo- sions of force and, 456; feeling of force and, 240; laughing at, 309, 376; punishment and, 237; suffering and, 52, 144, 194, 358; unfreedom and, 600; unrestricted creativity and, 285; willing liberates, 330; will or, 591 Friends and friendship: characteristics of, 536; enemies vs., 58, 81, 204; enemy in, 171; marriage and, 22, 48, 171, 610n; overcoming, 461; solitude without, 541; Zarathustra's love for, 467, 477, 480 Future, the: art and, 161; bit in the tail by past, 121; conditions of, 212; flew too far into, 392, 418; giving birth and, 485; harbinger of, 569; of humanity, 288; justifying people of, 154, 198; molded like wax, 524; myth of, 545; nest in the tree of, 375; new community
 SUBJECT INDEX
 and, 464; people of, 515; predetermination of, 464;
 tree of, 574; will to, 522;

Zarathustra and, 466, 489
 Genius: preservation of the species and, 327; superhu- man and, 378; women and, 54, 167
 Genius gravitationis, 47, 624nsI
 Germany, 109, 112, 585
 Gifts, 38, 63, 76, 89, 126, 149, 153, 197-98, 354, 432, 438-39, 451, 462, 465, 527, 532-333 gift-giving virtue, 106; of self, 315 Giving: lover and, 76; of powerful people, 519; ruling and, 438, 519; shamelessness and, 357; shame of the gift-giver, 307, 420; squandering souls and, 153, 197, 198; Za-rathustra and, 113
 Goal(s): actions and, 240-41; good and evil and, 323; humankind and, 98; no goal and no origin, 586; to reach superhumans, 146
 God/god(s): absolute causality and, 436; after there are no more gods, 186; ape of,
 563; beauty luring beyond, 383; become animal,
 69; becoming a god,
 385; becoming one with, 196; believing in, 500, 555;
 SUBJECT INDEX
 choked to death on theology, 43; colorful brats called, 330, 418; commen- tary on, 760; compassion as hell of, 134; conscience and, 91; Copernicus and, 583; creation and, 74, 135, 197;
 death of, 22, 134, 199, 501, 778-79; delusion and, 441;
 devil and, 12, 14, 19-20, 47, 146, 173, 195, 358, 481, 564; epicurean, 218, 477, 760, 777-78; error of the first cause and, 107; evil and, 178, 263; god-humans and, 95; gods but no God, 520;
 good and evil and prejudices of, 103, 174, 355; head drawn from the sea, 386, 414; hell for, 74, 105, 134, 147, 350, 420; human beings loved for sake of, 40; if there were gods, 328, 405; image of, 59, 627143; laughed themselves to death, 520; learned Greek, 92; mask of, 311, 378; murderer of, 339, 558; murder-of-God penitents, 320, 367, 420; naked, 201, 410; naked image of, 398; sin and, 103,

174; the son of, 105; sons of God, 50, 105; stopgap, 3073 suffering, 14, 20, 199, 506; twilight of, 333; union with godhead, 249; who proves his existence, 156; word of, 831
 520; Zarathustra and, 491, 521, 573
 God-humans, 95, 122, 177
 God-made-human, 103, 139, 174, 635n
 Good, the: good in itself, 138, 238; Hartmann on, 275; as judgment, as taste, 248;
 new vs. old, 67; Ree on,
 223; rulers determining, 220
 Good and evil: annihilation of, 405; away with, 112; being above, 51, 625n; belief in, 460; beyond, 90, 96, IO, II, 174, 207-9, 532-33; as costly false illusion, 413; creating your own path, 148; culture peoples and, 235; estranged from life, 413; everything
 good coming out of evil, 18; evil as preliminary stage of a good, 237; evil perceiving as good, 100; "experts" on, 353; fixation on, 223; as God's prejudices, 103, 174, 355; good as diminished evil, 77; good as puny evil, 78; good as transformation of an evil, 173; good from those capable of evil, 306; good in itself and evil in itself created by affect, 138; goodness becoming by means of evil, 142, 195; goodness from those capable of evil, 306;
 good 832 was done in evil, 73; interpretation and, 469; knowing, 103;
 nature and,
 446; noble and base vs., 457; origin of, 158; in rank of passions, 323; rebaptizing evil as good, 172; Rée on, 454; utility of, 454. See also Evil
 Goodness: codes of, 138; creators and, 472, 543; La Rochefoucauld's denial of, 55
 Good people: as degeneration and stagnation, 598; as disgusting, 62, 154; duty and, 113; great people compared to,
 60, 357; and
 just people, 38, 63, 105, 385;
 misery of humanity and, 11; Phariseeism and, 11, 46, 60,

100; pitiful people and, 587; puny people becoming, 78; seen naked, 383, 406; skepticism and, 212; superhumans and, 536; worthlessness of, 100

Gravity, 81, 341, 539, 542, 548

Greatness: downfall and, 20;

dramatizers of, 83; events, great, 69; evil humans and striving for, 23, 28; striving for, 19, 44, 562; Zarathustra and, 132

Great people or great men: despair and, 442; as dramatizers, 88; evil in, 64;

SUBJECT INDEX

followers of, 34.4; good people compared to, 60, 357; great cause and, 82; inferior people's effect on, 534-35; as living species, 252; the maternal in, 485,

567; a people as detour on the way to, 90; as their own followers, 397, 414

Greeks: appropriation and, 245; as connoisseurs of human nature, 297-302; the Dionysian as access to, 315; excess, aversion to, 263; frustration with, 583; Germans and, 585; as opposite of barbarians, 298; pessimism and, 213

Guilt: confessing, 348; instilling, 97; isolation as, 90; as valueless, 213; virtues kneeling before, 442; weaning from, 320, 367; weight of, 185

Habit(s), 72, 87, 584; laws of nature as, 444

Hamlet (Shakespeare), 236-37

Happiness, 56, 69, 86, 195, 212,

238, 252, 263, 286, 377, 435;

500, 507: comfort and, 444; of community, 543; in creating, 118; desire as, 188; dying of, 542; egoism and, 277; Epicurean, 441; experiencing only our own, 438; in experimenting, 476;

SUBJECT INDEX

as a goal of action, 240-41;

harmful to science and, 206; in harm to enemies, 269; Hartmann on, 267, 273; illusions necessary for, 227; long-term willing vs., 503;

for men vs. women, 178; as monstrous force, 322; as multiplicity, 436; not the purpose of life, 277; of others, 278, 468, 496; pleasure and, 273; powerful people and, 224, 519; religion and, 113; sages, 439; striving for, 267, 278; for superhumans, 537; of those who know, 471;

of virtue and reason, 366; virtue as, 224, 298; women and, 501, 552; Zarathustra and, 447, 451, 552

Hard-heartedness: in compassionate people, 130; evil and, 224; gentle people and, 337, 447, 549; meekness vs., 504; mercy and, 464; as strength, 356; as virtue, 451; Zarathustra and, 466

Hatred: egoism and, 77; of the equal or superior, 78; of the foreign, 247-48, 295; of life, 188; love and, 45, 69, 292, 562; as moral, 269

Health: bad conscience and, 11; digestion and, 353; illness as experiment for, 146, 194; time for, 336. See also Illness and sickness

833

Heart(s): cold-heartedness, 133, 354; head as entrails/stomach of, 56, 127, 183, 199;

head is foolish, heart is wise, 514. See also Hard-heartedness

Hedonism, 228, 262

Hell: compassion and, 133-345

for God, 74, 105, 134, 147,

350, 420; Zarathustra and,

326, 399, 400, 403, 486, 565

Hell hound, 326, 332, 403; glossary on, 741. See also Hound of hell

Herd, the: attitude of "I" and,

151; community vs., 107; evolution of the "I" and, 209; fear in, 599; herd-instinct and self, 70; hidden in the "I," 196; individual action vs., 453; losing self in,

174; love of, 98; as no good,

95; no "I" prior to, 145;

"thou shalt" and, 87

Hermit: on alms, 148; beware of hurting, 124; as deep well,

182, 204; as experimenter, 533; Zarathustra

and, 506, 510, 521, 525, 535

Heroes: the beautiful and, 395; burden and weariness of,

393; as cheerful, 110, 353; commentary on, 767-70; compassion and, 41, 48; cruelty and, 152; deification of the devil and, 8, 66; downfall of, 214; of evil,

834

109; as highest love for the

"I," 21; honored as type, 309; hurting those we love, 20; as laughingstock, 357; opinion of, 95; resting of, 394; sacrifice and, 48; serpent and, 342; spirit of, 126; tragedy and,

Heroism: cruelty and, 19, 112; egoism and heroic mode of thought, 496; recurrence and, 20; skepticism and, 600
 Hinterworld, 161-62, 164
 Honesty, 210, 410; blindness and, 143, 193, 200, 359, 4503 free-spiritedness and, 13; missing in moralists, 210; morality and, 474 Honor, 220-21, 245; among rogues, 503, 550; courage and, 440; feelings and, 195; injured, 231-32; and equal power, 600; women and,
 IIO-II
 Hope: beyond this earth, 199; German, 214; passions as all accompanied by, 320; redemption from revenge as highest, 369
 Hottentots, 289
 Hound of fire, 332, 335, 340, 423-25; glossary on, 740-41
 Hound of hell, 326, 403, 672n; glossary on, 741 Hubris, 263
 SUBJECT INDEX
 Hucksters, 301, 403, 481-83, 486, 490, 506, 518, 520, 558, 565, 569; huckster souls 483, 555, 556; huckster virtue 481, 555
 Human, All Too Human (Nietzsche), 5, 40, 4533 commentary on, 736, 738, 783-84
 Human beings and human-kind: to annihilate for sake of life, 416; as apes, 87; beyond themselves, creating, 453; creating something higher than, 523; fathers of superhumans, 525; as first movement (primum mobile), 135, 184, 188; as fluid and malleable, 433; as form-building and rhythm-making creatures, 590; imperfection of, 19, 43; last, 142, 196, 218; love for, 19, 40, 43, 77-78, 180, 193, 439, 557; new order rank of, 443, 543; overcoming, 140, 196, 462, 522, 524-25, 544; as predators, 461, 547; pregnant humankind, 151, 197; as species alongside superhumans, 218; still almost-animal, 485; as super-apes, 140; ugliness of, 317; value of, 431
 Hunger: as chemical state, 223; for knowledge, 320,
 SUBJECT INDEX
 420; for truth, 579; as unpleasant feeling, 362
 Hypocrisy: of good people, 11; marriage as, 48; retribution

as, 458
 "T": dog called, 145; entities contained in, 145; eternal, 542; herd and evolution of, 209; herd hidden in, 196; "I will this" as understanding of, 306; the kitten I, 149; moral action and, 314; not prior to herd, 145; "On the Morality of the 'I,'" 7; as primum mobile, 146; self vs., 318; Teichmüller on, 261; violence done by, 66; "you" as older than, 111
 Ideal, the: beauty and, 261; the eye and, 5; idealization, 262; of a person, as caricature, 16, 47, 351; power and, 367; sexual love and, 14; shattering, 139
 Idealist(s): against, 35; in fog, 250; Germans and, 217; hatred as, 56; judgments of, 20; La Rouchefoucauld as, 228; milksops, 405; moral arrogance of, 136; vanity of, 543
 Ideals: "ape" ideal, 12; artists and, 472; creating from old ideals, 452 overcoming, 453; sacrificing to, 466; transcending, 71 835
 Idols, 128, 183, 408, 410-11, 441
 Ignorance, 106-7, 118, 180, 194, 201
 Illness and sickness: affects and, 243; superhumans and, 142, 193. See also Health Illusion, 192, 227, 239, 241, 318, 359
 Immorality: artists and, 451; immoral people as contemptible, 220; means to knowledge, 105; onward to, 382, 420; preservation of the type and, 151; sexual drive and, 52
 Immortality, 307, 383, 470, 476, 531, 550
 Individual(s): actions of, 600; atomistic, 9, 120; disintegration and, 599; as fruit of community, 286, 288; great, 471-72; Hartmann on, 215, 284; herd instinct vs. individual action, 453; honored as type, 309-10; vs. humanity/collective, 9, 47, 78, 293-96, 351, 563, 602; impulses and, 319, 3673 institutions as aftereffects of, 471; as multiplicity, 288; self-glorification of, 224; as something new, 322; sovereignty of the, 215, 232, 597; Spinoza on, 227; state vs., 246; struggle among, 836
 246; supreme development of, 543

Injustice, 10, 39, 65, 125, 157, 216, 459, 521; acts of mercy and, 306, 374; admiration and, 312, 393, 449, 549; as condition for existing, 208;
 equal rights as, 483, 561;
 injury and retribution, 458.
 See also Justice
 Inner world, 318, 319, 362, 364, 366-67, 595
 Insanity: in groups, 59; moral,
 Instinct: herd-instinct, 70, 87, 453; love and, 48, 248; moral, 267, 301; nobility and, 298; purpose and, 281;
 for revenge, 108, 352 Intellect: affects and, 596;
 consciousness and, 364, 593;
 feeling of power and, 455; interplay, organic actions, and, 364-65; pessimism of,
 452, 599; sexuality and, 72; weak nervous character and, 319 Intentions: action and, 219, 252, 288; as coincidences, 251; drives and, 166; effects and, 48, 564; as secondary, 278
 Intransitory, the, 332, 356, 360, 375, 418, 438
 Irrational, the, 40, 48, 168, 343
 "I will this": glossary on, 746-47; the good and, 127;
 SUBJECT INDEX
 hymn of the convalescent, 541; "I follow" vs., 118; man vs. woman and, 97, 178; morality as, 211; new good people and, 35; "thou shalt" vs., 87; as understanding of "J," 306;
 Zarathustra and, 471
 Jesuits, 273, 280, 297, 453, 456,
 540-41, 544, 585, 707n
 Jews, 8, 216, 222, 225, 315
 Joy: art and, 128; willing as bringer of, 358
 Joyful Science, The (Nietzsche), 40; commentary on, 718, 737, 758, 761, 766, 770, 772,
 778; Sanctus Januarius, 26
 Judgment: Demosthenes on,
 4; evil as, 429; female, 17,
 32; of the powerful, 238 Judgments: of good people, 11; Greek philosophers, 300; of idealists, 20; Jesus and, 50; moral, 129, 137, 184, 208, 238, 253, 276, 592. See also Value judgments

Jus primae noctis, 291
 Justice: creators of, 138; feeling of power and, 455; love and, 43; mercy vs., 408; people are not equal, 46, 322, 351, 367, 409; reforming concept of, 134; retribution and, 454; revenge and, 328, 405, 600; righteous people and, 409; as sanctioned form, 1;
 SUBJECT INDEX
 subjugation to state justice,
 Kin-groups, 294
 Knowledge: affects as critiques of, 45; art and, 214; beauty and, 384; drives and, 202, 452; faith and, 324; glossary on, 739-40; illusion and, 227; for its own sake, 57;
 knowing as creating, 188; lawbreaking and, 73; lies about value of, 171; life for the sake of, 40, 49; limits and self-destruction of, 214; living for, 153, 189; losing value, 186; love of, 114, 171; morality and, 57, 59, 105; none in itself, 586;
 poets on, 419; religion and, 11; of self, 56, 432;
 Socrates and, 213; tree of, 57; truthfulness and, 40, 50, 172; unconditional, rejection of, 35; values and, 360;
 weightiest, 544; Zarathustra and, 401
 Labor, forced, 275
 Language(s), 75, 313, 371, 387
 Laughter: at ethical world- order, 334; evil drives and, 528; at free will, 309, 376;
 God-made-human and, 139; gods laughed themselves to death, 520; good way of killing, 528; of the heights,
 837
 368, 382, 410, 421-23; holy, 390, 464; joyful science and, II, 193, 200, 359; killing through, 59; at redeemers and the compas- sionate, 423; sanctification of, 378, 410, 476, 542; shattered by, 330; tragic natures and, 51; Zarathustra and, 371-98, 493, 570
 Law(s): conscience and, 554;
 freedom vs., 182; against innovators, 267; Islamic, 295;
 Jewish, 227; making for yourself, 177; mind obeying its own, 222-23; moral feelings and, 171; of nature, 444; people who are walking legislation, 248; Zarathustra and, 435
 Lawgivers: I am the lawgiver, 524; ideal, 476; law for, 4.45;

origin of morality and, 502; superhumans and, 478; those who feel themselves to be, 258; type of, 433;
 Zarathustra and, 478
 Leaders, 49-50. See also Commanding; Rulers Liberation: from delusion of God, 535; from humans, 302; from intellect, 384; from morality, 208, 305, 453, 460, 545; from world-weariness, 452
 Lies and lying: in education, 104; good conscience as 838 mendacity, 563; go with life, 138; in moralistic and religious literature, 235;
 poets and, 127; praise of, 35;
 of self-deceivers, 579; superhumans, liars as signposts to, 164; transitoriness as lie, 418; truth and ability to lie, 67; truth as demanding, 68; by truthful people, 39, 62 Life: absurdity of, 196; advocate of, 368, 383, 524, 565; affirmation of, 167;
 after death, 4, 46, 563; to annihilate human beings for sake of, 416; art and, 161-62, 213; assessment of, 274; bliss as ultimate purpose of, 274; clock of, 310; cuts into life, 383; denying, 35, 413; desire for, 213-14, 321; destroying in order to live, 186; error as condition of, 432; as experiment, 154, 162, 198, 200, 203; fearing, 117, 169, 191; festival of, 336; good and evil estranged from, 413; good will toward, 470; illogical nature of, 213; impoverished, 179; indestructibly powerful and pleasurable, 213; justifying, 162; knowing and, 153; lies go with, 138; love of, 46, 75, 372; as multiplicity of
 SUBJECT INDEX
 forces, 590; new ways to live, 160; praise and hatred of, 188; preaching and turning away from, 368; preservers and friends of, 34; primum vivere, 120; renunciation of, 209, 327; sacrifice of, 431, 441, 532; stimulus to, 246; things that make it easier, 112; thinking of life for recuperation,
 120, 179-80; as torture, 486, 565; as tragedy or comedy, 312; trust in,
 434, 475, 533; as willing of purpose, 277; will to live vs.

 to suffer, 58; will to power in, 412; worthlessness of, 277; Zarathustra and, 487 Lightning, superhumans as,
 130
 Lions and lionesses, 118, 152,
 180, 339, 432, 506, 521, 668n, 746; child within and, 130, 152; with doves, 475, 522, 533, 541; fighting the eagle, 462; laughing, 528, 541; Zarathustra and, 462, 466, 471, 528
 Love: of children, 16, 75, 98, 354, 416; feminine and masculine ideals of, 20; freedom as fruit of, 181; free-spiritedness and loving attitude, 13; friendship not turning into, 54; as fruit of obedience, 181; of God, 161,
 SUBJECT INDEX
 568; God as, 58; for human beings, 19, 43, 77-78, 193, 439, 557; of humans for themselves, 461; for the I, highest, 21; in image of our God, 59; loving thy neighbor, 64, 98, 107, 123, 156, 164, 499, 553; marriage
 and, 48, 168, 171; men vs. women and, 29, 37, 65; morality and, 121, 144; for sake of God, 40; of self, 75, 103, 174, 354, 416, 495; sense of life and, 257; sensuality and, 89, 110; sexual, 14, 22-23, 28, 172, 358, 464; of shepherd and herd, 98; superhumans and, 86, 120, 181; supreme soul and, 537;
 of truth, 67, 69; of universe, 161
 Luke, Book of (Bible), 8
 Lust: for enemies, 390; for heights, 53; marriage as sanctioned form of, 11; for power, 263, 505; for self-destruction, 21
 Madness: praise and blame as, 138; superhumans and, 142, 193; tarantula venom and, 418; Zarathustra and, 133. See also Insanity
 Madonna del Sasso Church, Locarno, Italy, 3, 607n Marriage: children and, 16, 155, 610n; friendship and, 839
 22, 171, 610n; love and, 48, 168, 171; matrilineage, patri-mony, and, 290-92; for those incapable of love or friendship, 48, 106 Martyrs and martyrdom, 127, 131, 237, 297, 343, 486

Masks: of a god, 311, 378;
 godly, grinning, 310; of life, 423; need for, 7; our own face, 402, 410; of politeness, 345; truthfulness as, 7 Masses: breeding superhu- mans and, 210; preservation of species and, 456; Zarathustra and, 542 Master-morality, 219
 Masters, 218, 345, 348, 356, 477
 Melancholy: ponderous, melancholic people, 46, 563; tarantula's bite and, 398, 418
 Men: beauty of, 291; child in, 91; compared to children, 45; cruelty of, 110; friends with a woman, 168; heart and, 74; "I will this," 97, 178; love and, 29, 37, 65; passions of women vs., 562; too few, 92; treated like children by women, 32 Metamorphosis, 190 Metaphor, 151, 429, 434; commentary on, 724, 744 Metaphysics: art and, 213; interference of, 129; metaphysics of, 318; skepticism and, 444;
 840 superhumans and, 150; value of, 206
 Milan Cathedral, 214
 Mind(s): asceticism of, 202; building up whole body vs.
 brain, 456; commentary on, 743; consciousness and, 364; obeying their own laws, 222-23; penitents of the, 154, 162-63, 198, 200, 203, 335, 339, 411, 543
 Miserliness, 87, 484, 560
 Misery: happiness and, 86; heroes, cheerfulness, and, 41, 48; of the masses, 597; morality as cause of all, 469; and recurrence, 133; will
 and, 278;
 Mistrust: Aristotle on, 265; of destiny, 496; as drive, 216;
 of everything good, 222; health and, 58, 184; healthy spirit and, 200; of the metaphysical, 130, 207; of nature, 499; Socrates's, of affects, 246; of weakness, 500, 546
 Mixed Opinions and Maxims (Nietzsche), 452
 Mohammedans, 11
 Morality: abolishing, 319; of actual people, 229; actual vs.
 theoretical, 273; affects and, 137, 255; ancient, disenga-ging from, 158; animals and, 238, 296; annihilation and
 SUBJECT INDEX
 resurrection of, 324, 4203 beyond, 470, 540-41 compassion and, 80, 144; competition among moralities, 265, 268; complexity of moral feelings, 258, 267; as condition of life, 123, 209; conditions of existence and, 19; corporeal states
 and, 148,

151; critique of, 203, 366; as dead, 9; destroying, 135, 189, 2273 dissolution of, 120; erroneous self-observation and, 287; evil as antithesis of, 9, 60; experimental, 592; free-spiritedness and, 13-14; future of, 262; "good and evil" vs. "noble and base," 457; Greek, 229, 301; Hartmann on, 276; of the "T", 7; illusion and, 239; as impossible, 219; instinct and, 267; intellect colliding with, 123; as interpretation, 84; as "I will this," 217; Kant's moral sense, 321; knowledge and, 40, 57, 59, 105, 122; law-of-laws, 478; liberation from, 208, 305, 453, 460, 545; limitations of moral point of view, 444; love and, 58, 121, 144; master- and slave-, 219; multiplicity of, 136; nature and, 195; noble, 239; obedience, law, choice, and freedom, 171; organic-moral, 309, 495; as original sin, 57; origin of, 265, 502; overcoming, 97, 471; pleasure and, 167, 228; power-morality, 269; preservation of the species and, 302; as proto-scientific method, 84; of prudence, 227, 274; purification from revenge as, 323; Rée on, 217; refutation of, 3, 208; religious attitudes and, 319; ruling caste and, 455; saints and annihilation of, 71; selfishness and, 13; self-overcoming, 302; shame and, 75; as sign language, 230, 233-34, 288, 598; silliness of, 319; as simplification, 595; slavish subjugation in, 479; the state and, 14; superior humans and, 122, 182; as taste, 235; theory, moral, 218, 228; tracing everything back to, 85; of truthfulness in the herd, 595; types of, 233, 288; unfreedom of will and, 586; as useful to the most powerful, 246; value judgments and, 139; values, new moral code of, 109; victory over itself, 36; voluntariness and, 286; weakness and, 85, 444, 467; as weariness, 35; what-is-impossible-for-humans in, 113 841
SUBJECT INDEX

Moral value judgments. See Value judgments

Moravians, 501, 702n

Motives: actions and, 12, 272,

319, 456, 591; of a god, 476;

honesty in, 472; pleasure as, 583

Murder-of-God penitents, 320, 367, 420

Music: affects and, 83; artists of sounds, 184; explaining,

1373 love of, 116, 170; as sign language, 234; as vital, 213; women and, 81, 82
 Mysticism, 72, 249, 305, 423, 433, 598
 Myth, 213-14, 298, 317, 545
 Nature: analogous to humans, 446; anthropomorphizing of, 336, 420; beyond humans, 385; deification of, 262; Emerson on, 263; laws of, 444; overcoming, 540-41; poets and, 419; primordially determined, 439; religion and, 152
 Nausea, 117, 151, 718. See also Disgust.
 Necessity: absolute causality and, 436; acts of will and, 591; emancipated from purpose, 303; redefining,
 IOI
 Neighbors: compassion sensitivity toward, 80; creating vs., 123, 182, 354,
 842
 416, 450; doing good for, 496; glossary on, 745-46; loving, 64, 98, 107, 123, 156, 164; loving as yourselves, 499, 553
 Newspapers, 60, 70
 Nobility and the concept of "noble": base vs., 457; Epicurus and, 246; "good"
 vs., 5; Greek feeling of, 301; instinctive action and judgment, 298; labor and, 322; new,
 through breeding, 464
 Noble people: feeling of force and, 240; good people and,
 52; morality and, 265
 Noon: brothers of, 518; and eternity, 23, 104; great, 336, 434 446, 467, 476, 495, 498,
 539, 543; of humankind, 523
 Nothingness: choking on, 312, 393; as master weaver, 376, 447, 549; Nirvana, 544; perished from, 312; striving into,
 35; troubled by, 500, 552; yearning toward, 94
 Obedience: absolute, in Kant, 227; command and, 566; drive to, 211; learning, 355;
 love as fruit of, 181; moral feelings and, 171; to own laws, 222-23; to self, 204; tyrants and, 177; virtues and, 486; the weak and, 472; women
 and, 17, 170
 SUBJECT INDEX
 Obsession: making a name for oneself, 374, 417; with revenge, 97, 127, 178, 241 Organic, the: arrogance, dominance, and, 460; ascending to higher levels, 594; chemical processes and, 241-42; creative power and, 584; as law, 473; liberation from morality and,

460; moral drives and, 602; organic-moral, 309, 495; overcoming, 321; power and, 319; as slippery concept, 586; struggle among tissues, 269-705 virtues and, 600
Overcoming: affects, 112, 172; compassion, 543; Epicureans and, 534; free-spiritedness and, 13; friends, 461; fundamental flaw in humans, 339; humans, 140, 196, 462, 522, 524-25, 544; ideals, 453; love, 402; morality, 97, 471; nations, 228; nature, 540-41; the organic, 321; species-overcoming, 180; virtue, 152; Zarathustra and, 471. See also Self-overcoming Overman: commentary on translation of Übermensch, 754-57. See also Superhumans Ownership, and knowledge, 59, 112
SUBJECT INDEX
Pain: as accompanying phenomena, 223, 455; breeding better humans and, 457; compassion and, 215; creative souls and, 580; in Epicurean theory, 268; Greeks and, 299; more strongly felt than pleasure, 242; pleasure as mother of, 335; rational will and, 280; self-inflicted, 130; truth and, 390; usefulness of, 242; value judgments and, 591; value of, 243; will and, 309; Zarathustra and, 438, 511 Paradox, Mandeville taking pleasure in, 218
Parasites, 90, 262-63, 271, 283, 429, 464, 467, 579
Passion(s): bodily states and, 318; free-spiritedness and, 13; of men vs. women, 562; sanctification of, 123; selfishness and, 48; supreme, 128; thinking as, 597; virtues and vices as, 320, 600; will and, 318
Past, the: bites future in the tail, 121; meanings of, 566; overpowering of, 464; redeeming people of, 154, 198; time not flowing into, 339
Peacocks, 72, 323, 350, 373, 417, 423
Penitence and penitents: beauty and, 383; of the 843 mind, 154, 162-63, 198, 200, 203, 335, 339, 411, 543; murder-of-God penitents, 320, 367, 420 Perception(s): apperception, 236; as causes of perceptions, 591; commentary on, 739; consciousness and, 592; drives vs., 271. See also Sensations and sense perceptions

Perfection: beauty as shadow of, 382, 420; in obedience, 17; victory and, 511; Zarathustra and, 511 Pessimism: belief in purpose and, 276; belief in time and, 336; German, 586; Greeks and, 213; of Homer, Sophocles, and Epicurus, 298; of intellect, 452, 599; mockery of, 533, 540, 544-45; moral pessimists, 167; skepticism and, 444, 532-34;
 solitude and, 541; song of mockery, 474; teachers of, 398;
 value of, 421
 Pharisees and Phariseeism: as counterpart, 203; despising, 98; good people as, 11, 46, 60, 100; hatred of evil, 81;
 oppression and, 223; unjust treatment of, 16 Philosophers: becoming artist, saint, and philosopher, 452; communicating themselves, 844
 234, 248; free spirits vs., 453;
 Greek, 297-302; one ruling drive as truth, 235; preservation of the species and, 327;
 theory of fundamental error, 218; two categories of, 110; understanding and being convinced by, 118; of unpleasant truths, 308 Philosophy: Brahmin, 229; as drive to return from multiplicity, 299; freedom and, 304; of the future 428; heroic, 23, 228; impossibility of, 34; outcome of, as tragic event, 214; philosophical systems, 51; of right, 297; skeptical, 444; of slaves, 264
 Piety: age division and, 292; fraud, pious and impious, 84, 633n; honesty vs., 133 pious people, 10, 178, 204, 436, 444, 477; saint-lovers
 VS., 453
 Play, 91; and seriousness, 97, 177, 499 Pleasure: as accompanying phenomena, 223, 455; actions from pleasure or displeasure, 239-40; bound by language of displeasure and, 224; consciousness and, 593; death and, 262; drives and, 286; in Epicurean theory, 268, 274; Hartmann
 on, 273;
 SUBJECT INDEX
 Helvetius, Epicurus, Mandeville, and Stendhal on, 217-18; as judgment, 318; lusts and, 115; Mainländer on, 256; morality and, 167; as motive, 583; pain and, 242, 335; pursuit of, 228; taking, in ourselves, 247-48; in truth, 192, 359; universal pleasure in the human beast, 222; will and, 111,

273, 277; as woman, 507, 558
 Poems: "At the Glacier," 737;
 "Autumn," 737; "Friend," 6; "Hail to you, Friendship!," 617n; "In the Mountains," 26-27; "It is night ...," 323, 380, 381;
 "New Columbus," 25, 613-15n, 737; On the High Seas, 42, 93;
 "The Phrase," 27-28, 618-19n; Pine and Lightning, 92; Porto fino, 92; Sanctus Januarius, 26; "This is no book...," 7; "To Friendship," 27; "To Melancholy," 737; "To the Ideal," 26, 615-16n; "Toward New Seas," 609n; "The Tree Speaks," 26;
 "The Wanderer," 737
 Poetry, 133, 161, 300
 Poets: concerning, 418-20; exploiting experiences, 63; path of suffering and, 250;
 SUBJECT INDEX
 supposed to lie, 127; trage- dies of conscience and, 88
 Police: Espinas on, 283; religion as form of, 349
 Politeness, vanity the mask of, 345 Power: benevolence and, 396; clever fingers vs. fist and, 311, 389, 415, 449; collective, 233; commentary on, 787-88; competition and, 263; conquering and excess of, 248; contempt for influence of, 319; creative, 255, 584, 599; desire for revenge and, 237; expand- ing force and, 457; expend-ing itself, 367; fear of, 249; feeling of, 322, 544, 587; great actors and, 83; helping and, 215; honor and, 600; lust for, 263, 505; Napoleon, Bismarck, and, 230; not wanting to rule, 331, 406; organizing power and the species, 428; seized by superior humans, 223; states of fullness of, 101; streaming forth, 385; stronger vs.
 weaker and, 370; struggle for, 319; taking delight in itself, 460; thirst for, 189, 201; those who create, love, and know unified by, 463;
 those who fear it, 247; truth and, 355; weakness and, 31; will to perpetuate a power 845 relationship, 245; wrestling contest for, 471. See also Will to power
 Powerful people, 224, 227, 246-47, 302, 460, 519
 Praise and blame: absurdity of, 253; as madness, 138; of ourselves vs. of others, 132; pleasure, morality, and, 167
 "Prayer to Life" (Salomé), 609n
 Preachers, 108, 149, 158, 163, 367-68
 Pregnancy: all human action revolving around, 24; with future, 519; humankind walking around pregnant, 151, 197; the "I" and, 7; love of oneself and, 357; with our own child, 104, 174, 358; as quintessential condition, 17, 33; riddle of woman and, 56;

 savage wisdom and, 315, 375; as solution to women, 103, 174; teleology of, 55; we all want to be pregnant, 117. See also Procreation Prejudices: of God, 103, 174, 355; intentions as, 219; Rée and moral prejudice, 454; satisfaction and, 287; words as, 347
 Present, the, 87, 167, 198, 430
 Preservation of the species, 14, 281, 302, 326, 332, 456
 Pride: cleverness and, 155; of cruelty, 88; of eagle, 448; 846 memory vs., 68; of the weak, 253
 Priests: Catholic priest-state, 297; honored as type, 309; humiliation, revenge, and, 396; ruling, 496
 Primitive societies, 289-96
 Prince (Machiavelli): commen- tary on, 762-63
 Procreation: above and beyond ourselves, 186-87; breeding vs. moralizing, 245; downfall and, 379; drive toward, 361;
 as festival, 180; as obligation, 52; precondition of, 22.
 See also Children; Pregnancy; Reproduction Progress, 12, 75, 209
 Prophecy, 36, 331, 381, 436
 Prudence: egoism and, 215; as lack of force, 249; love and,
 98; morality of, 227, 274; pain avoidance and, 279
 Psychology: of error, 587
 Punishment: Baumann on, 287; clemency, 500; denunciation and, 295, 596; deterrence and, 54, 62, 232, 268, 454; doing away with, 455; elimination of parasitic humans, 283; evil people and, 476; experimental subject treated as offender and, 464; freedom of the will and, 237; in Germanic tribes, 290;
 injury and,
 SUBJECT INDEX
 458-59; judicial, alongside reward, 237; justice and, 43; justifying, 77; meaning of, 459; natural consequences and, 231; not for guilt, 237; oldest meaning of, 297; outlawing and ostracism, 294-95; and proportional pain, 250; and protecting the weak, 232; Rée on, 454; retribution and, 454; right to individual approach to, 321;

sacrificial cults and, 284; setting own law of, 177; society preserved by, 223; and suffering, 215; of unfree vs. free people, 284; unfree will and, 241, 275; for virtues, 45, 101, 199, 479, 517, 546; weaning from, 320, 367

Puny people: becoming good people, 78; beehives and workers, 475; commentary on, 745; disgust from, 104, 175; evil companions vs., 86, 353; excess love and, 119; incapable of evil, 77; solitude and, 159

Purpose(s): absolute causality and, 436; actions, purpose- lessness of, 274; arbitrary, il- logical, 279; of asceticism, 141; belief in, 590-91; to be eliminated, 588; chance and, 142, 193, 200; as condition of existence, 208;

SUBJECT INDEX

conditions as, 286; consciousness and, 592-94; as corrupting concept, 274; of death, 201; explaining world through, 142; faith of teachers of, 589; final purposelessness, 207; hap- piness as, 278; as inner stimulus, 601; instinct and, 281; joy in idea of, 286;

necessity emancipated from, 303; pessimism and, 276; prehis- tory of, 265; redemp- tion from, 441; sensation and, 590; squandered, 285; suffering and, 276, 456; usefulness and, 226; utility and subordinate purposes, 273; willing and, 187, 277

Quietism, 13, 452

Race, 8, 98, 294

Rationality, 138, 168, 305

Reason: asceticism and, 206;

in body, 157; cool, praise of, 328, 422, 542; cool and dialectical, 476; dreams and, 206; as exception, 95, 176; greater kind of, 279; happiness of, 366; as little as possible, 518; lunatics' love for, 139; preserved by suffer- ing, 187; small bit of, 515; Socrates and, 213; teaching, 123; tyrant within and, 61. See also Rationality

847

Recurrence: atavism, 51, 267,

272, 276, 296, 460; enduring, 187; eternal, 14, 302, 359,

584-85, 599; formulas for, 100; on the philosophy of, 20; theory of, as burden, 34

Redemption: bringing, 326;

from chance, 537; children and, 417; commentary on, 740;

from eternal flux, 118,

182; of evil people, 436, 463,
 542; I spit out the serpent's head, 522; laughing at redeemers, 423; from life, 276; moral pessimists and,
 167; of people of the past,
 154, 198; from purposes, 441; from redeemers, 317, 324, 371, 396, 420; redeem- ers as binders and tamers, 407; sages and, 497; Schopenhauer and, 303; of self vs. others, 94, 175; suffering, existence, and, 187; superhumans and, 505; of those passed away, 476; through illusion, 213; universe finding, 442; Zarathustra and, 399 Religion: barbarism and, 35; faith vs., 160; freethinkers and, 21; "I must" vs. "thou shalt" and, 113; lies and deception in literature of, 235; living in opposition to, 20; mockery of, 540; moral attitudes and, 319; music

848

and, 82; nature and, 152; no need for, 122; persons of faith vs. religious, 22, 45;
 police, belief in and, 82, 349;
 power and, 249; religious viewpoint, 235; as sanc- tioned form, 11; solitude and, 541; superhumans and, 150; as surface, 206; weaker sex and, 31-32; what is done out of love and, 58; women, sexual satisfaction, and, 78. See also God/god(s); Preachers; Priests Renaissance, 230, 621n
 Renunciation: despising vs., 551; of earthly bliss, 275; of happiness, 278; illness and, 162; of life, 209, 327; of the metaphysical, 421; no contempt in, 502; univer- sally successful, 207 Reproduction, 14, 215, 243. See also Procre-ation
 Responsibility: conscience and, 293; irresponsibility, 210, 212; Plato and, 264; to self, 472, 593; self-determi- nation vs., 542; supreme, 467, 470, 541; thinking of life vs., 120
 Ressentiment, 290n; commentary on, 721
 Resurrection, 4, 103, 174, 324, 334 Retribution. See Punishment

SUBJECT INDEX

Revenge: cause and effect and, 352; desire for, 237, 458-595 feeling of power and, 455; instinct for, 108, 352; justice and, 11, 328, 405, 600; moral outrage as, 41, 48;

 "now I am just" vs. "now I am avenged," 113, 3533 obsession with, 97, 127, 178, 241; power and, 457; priests and, 396; purification of, 323, 366, 420; redeemed, 369; retribution and, 458-59; the state and, 231-32; unfree will and, 231; unlearning, 76; vendettas, renunciation of, 232; weaker people and, 461; wellspring of, 368; on witnesses, 501,
 552; women and, 17, 33, 44
 Revolution, 255, 332, 423, 501 Romanticism, 585; commentary on, 768-71
 Rulers: Caesar and Napoleon as living species, 252; compassion and mockery for, 533; contempt and, 536; ennoblement and, 575; "good" determined by, 220; love for the distant vs. closest and, 472; morality and, 455; overcoming and, 281; people being against, 625n; power and not wanting to rule, 331, 406; priests and merchants, 496;
 SUBJECT INDEX
 psychology of, 465; sacrifice and, 466, 473; selfishness and, 533; superior humans vs. hucksters, 506; as supreme type, 479; task of, 477; teaching how to rule, 486; virtues pretended by, Leaders Sacrilege, 186, 199, 201, 395, 411
 Sage(s): cleverness vs., 559; Emerson on, 461; foolish- ness and, 439, 494-95, 497; 564; superhumans and, 536; supreme right and, 505; working redemptively against, 497; Zarathustra as, 436, 478
 Saints: annihilation of morality and, 71; becoming artist, saint, and philoso- pher, 452; at home among the evil, 271;
 as plebeian ideal, 246; preservation of the species and,
 327; Zarathustra and, 562
 Salvation, 154, 198, 249
 Satisfaction: action as willing of, 278; desire for beauty vs., 313; drives and, 286-87, 467, 484, 509, 560; justice and, 245; self-, 112, 299, 325, 404; sexual, 78; striving for greatness and, 19
 849 Scholars: breaking away from,
 452; dust around, 394; free spirits vs., 453; as penitents of the mind, 154, 198
 Schopenhauer as Educator
 (Nietzsche), 453; commen- tary on, 786n Science: art and, 213; as asceticism, 108; as elimina- tion of confusion, 595; on existence, 213; happiness as harmful to, 206; honest, 413; joyful, 141, 193, 200, 359; lessons of, 503; mindless tools of, 598; scientific people moving backwards, 116, 169; on will, 590-91

 Self: belief in, 330; denial of,
 79; despising, 67, 73; embodied, 202; enlighten- ment about, 47; fairness to others vs., 18; herd and, 70, 174; as image, 365-66; "I" vs., 318; love of, 103, 174;
 remaking and being good to, 60, 203; revulsion toward, 73.
 See also "I"
 Self-abolishing, 20, 98, 497,
 701n, 738
 Self-destruction, 21, 24, 28, 172-73, 214, 296, 462
 Selfishness, 476; commentary on, 746; drives and, 509; as evil, 8, 495; free-spiritedness and, 13; as marriage of self-interest and passion, 48; 850 nature of everything living, 519; old morality and, 13;
 pregnant with our own child and, 104, 174, 358; selflessness and, 56, 71, 627n; will to pleasure and, 11; Zarathustra and, 482 Self-knowledge, 56, 75, 109, 352, 562 Selflessness, 56, 71, 597, 627n Self-overcoming: commentary on, 788-89;
 morality and, 302; as strongest trait, 97 Self-sacrifice, 126, 232, 346, 421 Sensations and sense percep- tions: abstract truth and, 171; as actions, 236; as active, 226; all properties as, 192; commentary on, 743-44; as effects of senses, 601; force, sensation of, 588; intuition-images and, 277;
 physics and history of, 589-90; sanctifying, 124; sense organs, 362-63, 601. See also Perception(s) Serpent(s): becoming a dragon, 342; boy and, 562; called eternity, 36, 620n; most clever animal, 36; crept into my craw, 521; death of youth with snake, s; dwelling within God, 38, 63; entrails and filth of,
 311, 378; as God's prejudice, 103, 174, 355; on good and
 SUBJECT INDEX
 evil, 103, 174, 355; head, biting off, 545; head, spitting out, 522; of knowledge, 160; locks of fear, 311, 368, 390; lost its head, 525; morality as, 185; in high mountains, 475; proclaimed coming of eagle and, 397; ripped to pieces, 533;

seven solitudes and, 516; and shepherd, 532-33; tooth of, 346; wild, tangle of, 185;
 Zarathustra and, 36, 125, 399, 401, 462, 521
 Sexual drive, 52, 291, 600
 Sexuality, 72, 78
 Sexual love, 14, 22-23, 28, 48-49, 172, 358, 464
 Shame: concealment and, 281; of gift-giver, 307, 420; of good and evil, 149; humans as animals with red cheeks, 86, 349, 411; for immorality and morality, 75; knowledge and, 57; rage vs., 124, 127, 181; solitude and, 336, 446; virtue without, 212; Zarathustra and, 540
 Shamelessness: compassion and, 52; fundamental drives and,
 234; giving and, 357; knowledge of human nature as, 301,
 583; universal pleasure in the human beast, 222
 Shepherds, 50, 95, 98, 103, 157, 564
 SUBJECT INDEX
 Shoulds, 106, 121, 321. See also
 "Thou shalt"
 Sickness. See Illness and sickness
 Siegfried (Wagner), 700n
 Sign languages, 233-34, 253-54, 260, 266, 288, 305, 598
 Silence: beauty and, 270; deathly, 307; double, 329, 405; excelling at, 551; learning, 503, 520, 557, 5793 unlearning,
 309, 376; Zarathustra and, 540, 542
 Sin(s): forgiving, 103, 174; God not allowed to sin, 55; gods as cause of, 263; knowing and, 73; original, 51, 573 as sacrifice, 439
 Skepticism: aversion to the sublime and, 68; bliss in, 444; creation and, 328; experiment and, 476; and heroic feelings, 600; metaphysics and, 444; morality, mistrust, and, 55; mysticism and, 72; pessi- mism and, 444, 532-343 as temptation, 475, 540; will and, 444
 Slave-morality, 219
 Slavery: as barbarism, 264; casting off chains of, 276; commands from individuals as, 210; love and, 37, 65;
 rebellion as noblest attitude, 83; universal slave-revolt, 543
 851 Slaves: contempt for rebellious desires of, 82; kneeling and habits of, 389; necessity of, 210, 543; nobility and, 232; philosophy done by, 264; slavish mentality, 264; primitive family collective and, 293-94; workers- species as, 471

 Social classes, competition among, 270
 Social collectives, 295-96
 Socialism and socialists: equality and, 335, 423; Jesuitism and, 280, 544, 707n; mockery of, 540-41
 Society: decaying, 156; disintegrating into individuals, 296; ends and means and, 223; enduring, 99; justice and, 237; primitive, 289-96; punishment and, 223, 275; representing supreme human type, 282
 Solitude: beyond morality, 541; education and, 436; in eternity, beyond morality, 470; learning, 503, 520, 557, 579; as necessary, 464; of one who knows, 189; pessimism and, 541; seven solitudes, 421, 448, 451, 465, 467, 516; silence and, 307, 309, 376; suffering of, 520; superhumans and, 187; of supreme responsibility, 470, 852
 541; temptations and, 470, 541; of Zarathustra, 535, 540
 Soul(s): aristocracy of, 259; art and, 442; beauty and, 269; deep, 198; destiny of, 538; expansive, 4973 extensive, 177; of geniuses and saints, 158; of a god, 310; good actions and, 306, 374; huckster-souls, 483, 555-56; inventors of new states of, 367; molding and remolding, 482; moral complexity of, 228; "most extensive," 94; overflowing, 156; of the powerful, 430; purification of, 201; as selective, self-nourishing being, 599; squandering, 149, 153, 197-98; superior, 498; supreme, 537; vastness of, 437; of Zarathustra, 150, 196, 461, 466, 547
 Sovereignty, Hartmann on, 215; individual, 597; of nobility, 232
 Space, 3, 222, 601; and being, 137, 184; finite, 543; infinite, 8
 Species, preservation of, 14, 281, 302, 326, 332, 456
 Spirit: commentary on, 743; of Zarathustra, 147-48, 446, 471
 Spiritism, 9-10
 Star(s): burned out, 330; dance of, 150; of the future, melting, 578; made to
 SUBJECT INDEX
 revolve around humans, 184; new, 410, 438; new sky with, 378; seed of life strewn, 487, 568; seeking beyond, 154, 198; throwing, 400, 419, 450
 State(s): as calculable utility, 233; corporations and, 321; democracy as decline of, 315; development of, 270; formation of, 295; individual vs., 246; morality and, 14; preachers of death and, 163; revenge and, 231-32; superior humans as heads of state, 429; the weak, protection of, 232 Stealing: blessed to steal vs. receive, 353, 412; taking vs., 126; when cannot rob, 503, 550

 Stimuli, 245-46; sense impressions as, 318, thoughts as, 321
 Stoicism, 246, 261, 279, 298
 St. Peter's Basilica, 216 Stupidity, 597; deification of nature as, 262; and denial of unfree will, 58; as necessity, 194, 358; utilitarians as, 111
 Style, in writing, 15-16, 29-30, 347, 356
 Sublime: aversion to, 68; beyond experience, 133; collection of states and objects, 324; gestures and,
 SUBJECT INDEX
 118; nature and, 262; pain and, 130; perceived as uncanny and false, 72; sight of beautiful vs., 72; Stoics and, 261; the ugly and, 91;
 Wagner and sublime gestures, 339; you sublime ones, 392
 Sublime people, 72, 82, 112 Success: as proof, 154, 198, 200; relentless pursuit and, 493, 502, 552, 571 Suffering:
 absence of, as goal, 276; advocate of, 565; aversion to, 473; Cardanus on, 280; existence and, 187;
 free will and, 52; of God, 14, 20, 199, 506; gods as cause of, 263; Greeks and, 299; justification of, 422; life as, 191; morality and, 238; poets and, 250; power to remake, 477; preachers teaching, 108; reason preserved by, 187; sanctifica- tion through, 470; of solitude, 520; of superior humans, 462, 506, 558; trivial and great, 86; truth and, 139, 158; utility and,
 456; will to live and, 58,
 627n; without pity for, 534; Zarathustra and, 462, 465, 486. See also Will to suffer
 Suicide, 34, 39, 61, 432s 475;
 540
 853 Superhumans: already been?, 159, 203; antithesis of, 142;
 birth of, 100; bridge to, 153; characteristics becoming visible, 422; commentary on appearances of the term after Thus Spoke Zarathus- tra, 794-97; commentary on N's superior-individual use of, 762-73; commentary on N's superior-species use of, 773-93; commentary on N's supernatural use of, 758-61; commentary on translation of, 748-57; compassion and, 127, 332, 396; to create by every means, 474; creation of, 118, 120, 124, 150, 180, 187, 396; desire for, 196; doctrine of, 134; doctrine of recurrence and, 434; emergence of, 502; ever lived?, 378; giving birth to, 126; as goal, 146; hallucinations and madness and Dionysian dance, 117; happiness for, 537; hard-heartedness and, 332, 337; how they must typically live, 477; humans as fathers of, 525; humans like apes to, 144, 194; ignorance of, 154; image of, 409; island of, 383; knowing and, 153; lawgivers and, 478; liars as signposts to, 164; as lightning, 130; living to 854 know for, 198; love and, 120, 181; love for, 86, 129, 152, 195, 316, 401; as meaning of human existence, 201; movement toward, 463; news of, 198; as next step, 448; not love be compassionate persons, 131; not yet, 335, 424; overcoming love with love for, 402; preparing the earth for, 119, 180; proclaimed, 447; rainbow and bridge of, 331; redeemed revenge and, 369; return as derived from, 337; shadow of, 382, 420; shaping, 121; as species alongside humans, 218; still all too human, 334; superior soul and, 498; teaching about, 197, 505, 516; time for, 134; unequal humans and, 367; vault above the peoples, 385; veil of becoming and, 361; vision of, 127; will for, 443; without pinnacle above compassion, 326; word and sign of, 336, 446; Zarathustra and, 466, 473, 480 Superior humans: age of, 597; commentary on, 744-45, 762-73; commentary on superhumans vs., 763-64, 780-82; doubt about, 536; duration of lofty feelings and, 70; equality as injustice, 483, 561; evil, 565;

SUBJECT INDEX

as heads of state, 429; history of, 457; measuring, 357; on the morality of, 122; moral law broken by, 182; Napoleon, 370; power seized by, 223; responsibility, agony of, 122; as rulers, 506; self-redemption and self-preservation of, 302; suddenly achieved, 161; suffering of, 462, 506, 558; superior types among, 247; value judgments and, 220

 Superior species, 255-56, 428; commentary on, 773-93
 Symbol: glossary on, 744; the intransitory as, 332, 356, 360, 375, 418; symbolism as mental state, 318
 Tablets, 107, 158, 374, 412, 463,
 476, 522, 524, 527, 529, 542,
 575, 581-82, 705n, 705NI0, 747, 786, 791
 Tarantulas, 327, 340, 398, 405, 418, 423-26
 Tartuffery, 533, 543, 706n Taste: ethical, 211; morality as matter of, 235; valuations and, 359; virtues vs., 52
 Teachers, 248, 506; artists as, 472; body as master teacher, 598; doers as, 379, 448, 550; of equality, 409-10; flaws as, 46; of great fatigue, 468;
 of laws vs. lawgivers, 258;
 new kings as, 542; and not
 SUBJECT INDEX
 remaining a pupil, 90; of pessimism, 398; precursors of greatest sculptors, 463; of purpose, 589; to rule, 486; students and seriousness of, 58;
 about the superhumans,
 149, 152, 197, 201, 480, 505,
 516, 643n; tarantulas as, of "the worst possible world," 327, 405, 418; and teaching to lie, 62; of virtue, 600; Za-rathustra as, 466
 Thing in itself, 584, 586, 589
 Thinking: age tired of, 213, 303; as difficult, 249; moralistic, 211; nature of, 304-5; as passion in itself, 597 as worst form of madness, 359, 418. See also Thoughts Thoughts: art saves as fundamental, 452; coming as stimuli, 321; egoism and heroic mode of thought, 496; of eternal recurrence, 14, 586; vs. feeling, 236; great vs. petty, 49, 563; human, 130; midwife for, 18, 47; and mysticism, 72; of necessity, 436; philosophers striving for freedom of, 276; physical strength and, 465; as revelation of the affects, 132; as signs, 196; of suicide,
 61; unhistorical mode of,
 431; words as signs of, 196, 855 593; world as, 143. See also Thinking
 "Thou shalt": away with, 238;
 brutal feelings and, 37; from clumsy maws, 4053 commentary
 on, 746;

egoism vs., 268; "I feel like" and, 87; "I must" vs., 113; "I will" vs., 87; kill thyself, 191; make a name for thyself, 374; new, 122; no longer visible, 181; nothing that commands, 120; resistance to, 211; steal away, 191; as understanding of "you," 306

Thus Spoke Zarathustra (Nietzsche): commentary on notebooks and, 717, 720, 734-36; commentary on "superhumans" in, 760-61, 764-66, 770, 773-83; 785-91; commentary on translation of, 724; notes and plans for, 104, 431-40, 442-45, 448, 459, 461-63, 465-67, 469-71, 473-80, 495-98, 500-2, 504-7

Timaeus (Plato), 264

Time: belief in, 336; in dark vs. light, 487, 565; flowing into the future, rage at, 339; not a subjective form, 3; perceptions of, 261; timelessness, 140, 193; transitoriness as lie, 359, 418; Zarathustra and, 547

856

Tragedy: art and, 214, 452; birth of, 288; of conscience, 88; heroes and, 52; life as tragedy for those who feel, 312; tragic natures and laughter, 51; writers of, 110, 353

SUBJECT INDEX

suffering and, 139, 158; teaching abstract, 15, 30, 171; terrible, 544; unconditional friends of, called good, 204; unpleasant truths, 308; weightiest, 540; will to, 73, 413, 470; women

Transcending: the age, 354, 369; one's ideal, 71, 350

Truth(s), 18, 105, 222-23, 273, 343, 390, 417, 468, 579; and, 170; Zarathustra hunting ugly, 310, 371, 420;

Zarathustra's, 466 Truthfulness, 7, 39-40, 50, 62, annihilation of illusions, 462; blood as bad witness for, 130, 159, 184; convictions as enemies of, 342; as courage, 242; cruelty of, 68; dance as proof of, 53, 62n; destroys belief, 322; error and, 72, 347, 350, 355, 411, 417, 450 error veritate simplicior, 355, 679n; of eternal return, 466, 533; feeling not proof of, 207; great, 336, 446; human beings in harmony with, 461; history articulates new, 473; knowledge and, 40, 50, 172; liars as sensitive to, 250; love of, 67,

69, 144; morality and, 227; morality of, in the herd, 595; morality of the "I" and, 7; philosophers and, 235; pleasure in, 192, 200, 359; possession of, 68, 235; power and, 302, 355; reverence vs., 182; seeking, 109; shallow, 61; 139, 172, 264; herd's morality of, 595

Twilight of the Idols (Nietzsche): commentary on, 762-63, 770, 772, 794

Tyrants, 55, 230, 566; as strongest drive within us, 61; compassion for, 532, 536; creators and, 135; equality and, 369; higher self as, 103; obedience to, 177; pain as school for, 88, 357; praise of, 535; within, 173, 176

Ugliness: beauty of, 533; called beautiful, 110; of human faces, 344; of humans, 317; mirror held up to, 312, 393; the sublime and, 91; truths, ugly, 310, 371; voices, ugly, 329

Understanding and misunderstanding: as being to best advantage, 306; God as excuse for lack of, 382; men and women and, 45, 562; of morality, 254; of nature, 152, 422; reading vs. hearing leading to, 89; of self, 366; as sensation of pain, 266; simplifying concepts and, 601; Spinoza on, 656n

SUBJECT INDEX

Unfashionable Observations (Nietzsche): commentary on, 772, 786n

Uniforms and uniformity, 95, 176

Utilitarianism, 111, 222, 228, 258

Utility and usefulness, 225-26; drives and, 304; good and evil and, 454; Rée on, 454; as slave-theory, 264; Spinoza on knowing and, 226; state as calculable utility, 233; subordinate purposes and, 273; suffering and, 456

Valuation(s): affects and, 137; of bodily states, 319; castes distinctions and, 457; conscience and, 216; contradiction and, 158; life and, 191; moral systems in, 208

Value judgments: affects and drives colored by, 136, 184; common good and, 456; condition of existence absent from, 592; Darwinism and, 143; Greek philosophers and, 299;

857 history of, 460; inculcation of, 600; moral feelings and, 318; morality and, 139; nothing valuable in itself, 591; origin of, 430, 591-94; superior humans and, 220; value of life in, 191

Values: created, 161-62;

determining value and disvalue, 143; divine ancestry of, 437; false measures of, 160; knowledge and, 360; new, inventors of, 102; new moral code of, 109; old, annihilated, 503; one who posits, 208; right to, 155; shattering with superior values, 158; taste and valuations, 359

Vanity, 248, 272, 459; actors and, 417; compassion and sensitivity a sign of, 80; demanding to be loved, 85; diminishing oneself in people's eyes and, 113; of good people, 73; overcoming idealistic, 543; injured, 369; intellectual, 89; Kant's moral, 321; as mask of politeness, 345; of others and self, 54; of sublime people,

112; of truth, 68; veneration and, 402; wounded, 87, 338

Vedas, 227 Vegetarianism, 118 Vengeance. See Revenge

858

Vice(s): creation vs., 308; disgust and need for, 67-68; as passions, 320; vilifying, 493, 516, 571

Virtue(s): ascetic makes a necessity out of, 347; bad qualities overcome by,

353, 410, 451; compassion as, 52, 468; despising, 195; diminishing, 561; Diogenes on, 269; disempowering, 468; as duty and doom, 198; as foolishness and self-contradiction, 597; good of the many and, 164; happiness and, 298, 366, 519; hard-heartedness, 130, 451; lower vs. higher, 163; modesty in,

484, 560; no

leaps in, 499, 557; no virtue for all, 483; one is a lot, 152,

199; original sin = original virtue, 51; origin of, 493;

overcoming, 152; passions and, 320-21, 600; as physiological states, 600; of the powerful, 222; powerful people and, 224; pregnancy and, 488; punishment for, 45, Io,

199, 479, 517, 546; puny, 531,

548; rejecting the virtuous, not virtues, 149, 196; revenge and, 222; reward and, 158, 199; rule and, 477; ruling force and, 436; self-sacrifice and, 421;

SUBJECT INDEX

shame, cleverness, and, 212;

of the strong, 504, 536; of strong vs. weak, 502, 5513 superhumans and, 332; as superpower, 99; supreme female virtue, faith in, 32; taste as habitual, 52; of those who rule and those who obey, 486; of those who will never give birth, 574

Wanderer and His Shadow,

The (Nietzsche), 770

War(s): border markers, and,

119, 180-81; cause and,

95, 176; constitutional monarchs want, 116; cruelty of religious, 16; friends, going to war for, 110; holy in, 94, 176; inner, as development, 14; men and women's roles in, 91, 114; moral, 235; as sanctioned form of murdering your neighbor, 11; peace as means to new, 104, 174; revenge as silent in, 104, 174; scared by,

92; between thoughts and their armies, 464

Weakness: as danger, 501;

destruction or assimilation of the weaker, 242; fairness and generosity as, 5973 of good people, 25; morality based in,

467; noticing, 356; of personality, 599; of will,

SUBJECT INDEX

280, 598; women as weaker sex, 31-32; Zarathustra and, 535

Weak people: assimilated by the strong, 85; calling themselves good, 397, 579; contempt for, 536; as danger, 367;

exploiting, 443; morality of, 444; obedience and, 472;

praise and blame in, 258; revenge and, 461; tartuffery of,

533; virtues of, 502, 551; Zarathustra and, 482

Wealth: and puny acts of charity, 484, 560; delight in, 436; hucksters and, 481, 555;

in life and of gesture, 15, 29;

meaning of desire for, 259;

real purpose of, is to forget,

261; Zarathustra and, 436, 478

Will: belief in, 590-91; to believe, 307; to blindness, 393, 410; body as dependent on,

460; consciousness and, 364; to culture, 260; as delusion,

322, 376; delusion born out of pain and contemplation, 309;

to equality, 368; to evil, 493; to exist, 412; expanding force and, 457; faith in willing, 596; feelings and, 224, 363; as form-giver, 287; freedom of all willing, 187; or free will, 591; to the future, 522;

859 gave birth to itself, 376; to goodness, 413, 443; to justice, 409; to live, 166; to live vs. to suffer, 58, 627n; man vs. woman and, 74; there is no will, 600-1; outpouring of force and, 278; to overcome an affect, 172; pleasure and, 273, 2773 for power, 21; power relationships and, 245; purpose and, 277; and pursuit of happiness, 278; qualities of, 256-57; quietism of, 452; of Schopen-hauer, 307; science on, 590-91; skeptical philosophy and, 444; for superhumans, 443; "thou shalt" vs. "I will this," 87; to truth, 73, 413, 470; unfreedom of, 58, 231, 275, 586;

 weakness of, 280, 598; vs. being willed, 495, 499, 531, 547, 560. See also Free will and freedom of the will Will to power, 166, 227, 412,
 600; commentary on, 787-90
 Will to Power, The (Nietzsche): commentary on, 723n, 736
 Will to suffer: creation and,
 190; cruelty and, 8, 66, 172;
 power to remake suffering, 477; strength of character and,
 467; transformation and, 463
 860 Wisdom: body and, 157; calculation and, 249; Dionysian, 297;
 faith in,
 469; as folly, 422; of god,
 375; as woman loving the warrior, 91; Zarathustra and, 578 Women: affects, female assessment of, 16-17; as barbaric, 17, 33, 44; beauty of, 291; becoming manly, 92,
 568; as bird, cats, or cows, 57; bravery in, 54; as childlike, 354; children understood by, 45; as coarse and clumsy, 110; contempt for, 16; contempt for other women, I, 44; as cruel, 24;
 as dangerous playthings, 91; "don't forget the whip," 83; as educators, 354; emancipa- tion of, 91; expectations in sexual love, 23, 28, 172, 358;
 genius and, 167; giving birth, 507, 515-16, 558; glossary on, 741-43; happiness and, 501, 552; intellect of, 62; love and,
 29, 37, 40, 48, 65; made of a rib, 374, 411; mother's compassion for child, 260; music and, 81-82; obedience and, 17, 77, 170; passions of men vs., 562; pleasure as woman, 507, 558; as property, 292;

reverence for, 221;

SUBJECT INDEX

riddle of, 56; secrets of, 83;
sensuality and, 81-82, 349; superhumans, giving birth to, 126; sweet and bitter, 164;
teleology of pregnancy and,
55; truths and, 170; war and, 91; as weaker sex, 31-32; the woman in, 465, 468, 542, 546; on women in general, 32-33;

See also Female; Pregnancy

Worms and earthworms, 53,
135, 163, 289, 298, 3II, 345,
378, 389-90, 408, 434, 5IO,
686n, 768, 774-75, 778, 785

Workers, 321, 471

Writer(s): in blood, 168; God learning Greek to become a, 92; learning to read and, 115; of maxims, 76; of prose vs. poetry, 15, 30; vs. speakers, 15, 29; of tragedies, 110, 353; as traitors, 63;

writing for themselves, 60

Writing, 75; as imitation, 1s, 29;

for oneself, 303; of poetry, 133, 161; shamelessness in, 38;
style and, 15-16, 29

Youth: death of youth with snake, 535; late, 4-5, 43; overcoming, 129, 166, 354; suffering and becoming of, 303

The Complete Works of Friedrich Nietzsche

IN NINETEEN VOLUMES

IO

I

The Birth of Tragedy/Unpublished Basel Writings (Winter
1869/70-Fall 1873)

Unfashionable Observations

Human, All Too Human I

Human, All Too Human II/Unpublished Fragments from the Period of Human, All Too Human II (Spring 1878-Fall 1879)

Dawn

The Joyful Science/Idylls from Messina/Unpublished Fragments from the Period of The Joyful Science (Spring
1881-Summer 1882)

Thus Spoke Zarathustra

Beyond Good and Evil/On the Genealogy of Morality

The Case of Wagner/Twilight of the Idols/The Anti-

Christian/Ecce Homo/Dionysus Dithyramps/Nietzsche Contra Wagner
 Unpublished Fragments from the Period of The Birth of Tragedy (Fall 1869-Spring 1872)
 Unpublished Fragments from the Period of Unfashionable Observations (Summer 1872-Winter 1874/75)
 Unpublished Fragments from the Period of Human, All Too Human I (Winter 1874/75-Winter 1877/78) Unpublished Fragments from the Period of Dawn (Winter
 1879/80-Spring 1881)
 Unpublished Fragments from the Period of Thus Spoke Zarathustra (Summer 1882-Winter 1883/84)
 Unpublished Fragments from the Period of Thus Spoke Zarathustra (Spring 1884-Winter 1884/85)
 Unpublished Fragments (Spring 1885-Spring 1886) Unpublished
 Fragments (Summer 1886-Fall 1887) Unpublished Fragments (Fall 1887-Winter 1888/89) Editors' Afterwords/Chronology of Nietzsche's Life/
 General Index
 Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
 Names: Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm, 1844-1900, author. |
 Loeb, Paul S., translator, writer of afterword. | Tinsley, David F., translator, writer of afterword. | Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm, 1844-1900. Works.
 English.
 1995 ; V. 14-15.
 Title: Unpublished fragments from the period of Thus spoke Zarathustra /
 Friedrich Nietzsche ; translated, with an afterword, by Paul
 S. Loeb and David F. Tinsley.
 Description: Stanford, California : Stanford University
 Press, 2019- |
 Series: The complete works of Friedrich Nietzsche ; volume 14-15 |
 "Translated from Friedrich Nietzsche, *Sämtliche Werke: Krit-
 ische*
Studienausgabe, ed. Giorgio Colli and Mazzino Montinari, in 15 vols.
 This book corresponds to Vol. 10." | Includes bibliographical references and indexes. Contents: I. Summer 1882-winter 1883/84 – II.
 Spring 1884-
 winter 1884/85.
 Identifiers: LCCN 2018019454| ISBN 9780804728874 (v. 1:

cloth: alk.

paper)

| ISBN 9781503607521 (v. 1: pbk. : alk. paper)

Subjects: LCSH: Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm, 1844-1900—

Notebooks,

sketchbooks, etc.

Classification: LCC B.E L 2019 | DDC 193—dc

LC record available at <https://lccn.loc.gov/2018019454>

Typeset by Classic Typography in 10.5/12 Adobe Garamond

AR d

@

; | a re

IN NINETEEN VOLUMES

Alan D. Schrift and Duncan Large, Editors

Based on Friedrich Nietzsche: Sämtliche Werke. Kritische Studienausgabe in 15

Bänden (1980), edited by Giorgio Colli and Mazzino Montinari. The Colli-

Montinari edition is of particular importance for the fragments and variants, comprising more than half of Nietzsche's writings, many of which were published there for the first time.

VOLUME 14

Unpublished Fragments

from the Period of Thus Spoke Zarathustra (Summer 1882-Winter 1883/84)

Translated, with an Afterword, by Paul S. Loeb and David E Tinsley

This volume provides the first English translation of Nietzsche's unpublished notebooks from the period in which he was composing what he considered his most important work, Thus Spoke Zarathustra. Crucial transitional documents in Nietzsche's intellectual development, the notebooks mark a shift into the philosopher's mature period. They reveal his long-term design of a fictional tetralogy charting the journeys of his alter-ego, Zarathustra. Here, in Thus Spoke Zarathustra's teaching about the death of God; his discovery that the secret of life is the will to power; and his most profound and frightening thought—that his own life, human history, and the entire cosmos will eternally return. During this same period, Nietzsche was also beginning to make plans for Beyond Good and Evil, and the notebooks provide insight into his evolving theory of drives, his ideas about morality, and his initial thoughts on one of his best-known concepts, the superhuman (Übermensch).

Paul S. Loeb is Professor Emeritus of Philosophy at the University of Puget Sound.
David E Tinsley is Professor Emeritus of German and Medieval Studies at the University of Puget Sound.
WWW.SUP.ORG
Stanford University Press i l i i o l i M I l i i i n

Appendix B

Nachlass Volume 16: Unpublished Fragments (Spring 1885 – Spring 1886)

Translated by Adrian Del Caro

igea noes Unpublished Fragments (Spring 1885—Spring 1886) Translated, with an Afterword, by Adrian Del Caro [Page 1] Friedrich Nietzsche Unpublished Fragments (Spring 1885 Spring 1886) Translated, with an Afterword, by Adrian Del Caro STANFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS STANFORD, CALIFORNIA [Page 10] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 3 background a European condition in which the same horrible and filthy partisan activity we already find in France today also rules in Germany. 34[17] Has anyone ever conceded “profundity” to a female? So far I have not had respect for any female. D’Epinay compared with Galiani! And justice — has this ever — — — 34[8] The Italians genuine and original only in the bloody satire. From Buratti on, who provided the decisive turn to the genius of Byron. Even in Carducci there is nothing that Germans or French would not have done better. 34[9]’ I do not know myself: the demand for self-knowledge seems to me a divine joke or a Greek childishness (niaiserie®): they have a wealth of it! — But if someone has given his opinion on 500 things, then it is possible that others will “know” him. Well then! 34[10] Affectation of “scientism” e.g., “femininisme,”? but also g German periodicals’ “reviews-style.” 34[11] Our time consumes and lives on the morality of earlier times. 34[12] Pascal offended by the idea that the weather, that bright and cheerful skies influence him.!® Now — the theory of milieu’! is most convenient! everything exerts an influence, the result is the human being itself. [Page 100] 35 MAY-JULY 1885 93 indeed that, as far as there has been virtue in the world, it consisted in their kind of striving for their own happiness consequently also general happiness: none of all these ponderous, conscience-troubled herd animals — for that is what all of them are —wants to know anything of the fact that there is an order of rank of human beings, consequently that one morality for all is an impairment of the highest human being, that what is fair for one absolutely cannot be fair for another; that on the contrary the “happiness of greatest number” is a nauseating ideal for anyone (who) has the distinction of not belonging to the greatest number. — From France recently Comte’s superficial juxtaposition of altruism and egoism — but there is no altruism at all! — has made its way to England; and now we see e.g., in Herbert

Spencer the attempt to reconcile again with this too, but with such bad will toward taking any concept seriously anymore that henceforth in England even urinating would count among the altruistic activities. In Germany — where they do not even know what to do with the moral naïveté of Schopenhauer, E. von H(artmann) recently held forth on the Comtean idea — held forth to the tune of 871 pages” — ; and, without a single German bursting into laughter, solemnly and formally threw egoism out the door at the front, only to welcome it again in the name of “altruism” at the back. Indeed, there is no better way to visualize the uncanny fact of an almost sudden dumbing down of Europe’s peoples — visible in today’s Germany and England as well as in France and Italy — than by leafing through their moralistic books. At best I could highlight 3 small texts as exceptions (although even in these nothing fundamental is said): One is the book of a German Jew, Paul Rée, which bears the title? — On account of its form it deserves distinction and carries something of that genuine philosophical habitus to which Stendhal once gave a sharp formulation:?? — — — Rée adopts once more, with a subtle hand, the more rigorous habits of taste of the old French moralists — his book comes like a refreshing aroma from that “good old time,” far from all the edifying ulterior motives of which morality books written in German tend [Page 101] 94 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS to smell — : unfortunately he also has the same defects as those French, the narrow horizon, the wretchedness of knowledge; his hypotheses are cheap and a waste of breath; he completely lacks “the historical gaze and tact,” that is to say, the actual and single virtue that German science of the 19th century has over all older sciences. In the end it is a book that “stimulates the appetite.” Secondly I name the subtle, melancholy-robust book of a Frenchman? — — — , which, to be sure, like nearly everything that comes from Paris makes it all too plain where pessimism is really at home today: (namely not in Germany) And what good is all positivism and resolute kneeling before the “petits fait”?! In Paris they suffer as if from cold autumn winds, as if from a frost of great disappointments, as if winter were coming, the final, ultimate winter — and the best and the bravest, like that fine fellow Guyau, (tremble and shudder the while, even when they put on such a brave face with their “positivisme”?:? who believes that to which they want to persuade us with irony, that that trembling and shuddering even belong to the charms and seductive arts of life? To be sure: “shuddering is the finest portion of humanity”? — Goethe said that, and Goethe — was allowed to say it! But a Parisian? — Finally I single out the polemic book of a German half-Englishman, which contains enough spirit, acid and science to thoroughly “break down” that combination of bêtise*4 and Darwinism that Herbert Spencer put into the world under the title Data of Ethics: Rolph, Biologische Probleme 1881. To be sure, apart from the polemics there is nothing to praise in this book; and at bottom what offends us here, just as in the book that it contests, is the chiming-in of insignificant people on areas where only a select kind of knower and “experienced one” speaks without immodesty.)^{35[35]}°7 What separates me most thoroughly from the metaphysicians is: I do not grant them that the “I” is what thinks: on the [Page 102] 35 MAY-JULY 1885 95 contrary I take the 7 itself as a construction of thinking, of the same rank as “material,” “thing,” “substance,” “individual,” “purpose,” “number”: therefore only as regulative fiction with whose help a kind of constancy, consequently “knowability” is posited into, fictionalized into a world of becoming. The belief in grammar, in the linguistic subject, object, in verbs has so far subjugated the metaphysicians: I taught that this belief should be abjured. The I is first posited by thinking: but up till now it was believed, as the people believe, that in “Z think” there existed something of direct certainty and this “I” was the given cause of thinking, by analogy with which we “understood” all remaining causal relations. However habitual and indispensable that fiction may be now, this offers no proof against its fictitiousness: something can be a condition of life and be false nevertheless. 35[36] Having freed myself from the tyranny of “eternal” concepts, I am on the other hand far from therefore plunging myself into an abyss of skeptical arbitrariness: on the contrary I ask that concepts be regarded as experiments with whose help certain kinds of humans {can be} cultivated and for their preservability and duration — — — 351371” The falseness of a concept is for me not yet an objection to it. Perhaps our new language sounds strangest in this respect: the question is, how far is it life-promoting, life-preserving, speciespreserving. I am even fundamentally of the belief that the falsest assumptions are precisely the most indispensable to us, that without an acceptance of logical fiction, without measuring reality against the invented world of the absolute, self-identical, human beings cannot live, and that a renunciation of this fiction, a practical dispensing with it, would amount to the same thing as a renunciation of life. To admit untruth as a condition of life: this truly means to rid oneself in a terrible way of the accustomed value emotions — and here, if anywhere, what matters is [Page 103] 96 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS not “bleeding to death” from the “known truth.” In this supreme danger one must immediately summon the creative basic instincts of humans, which are stronger than all value emotions: those which are the mothers of value emotions themselves and enjoy their sublime consolation in eternal birthing over the eternal perishing of their children. And finally: what power was it that forced us to abjure that “belief in truth,” if not life itself and all its creative basic instincts? — so that we therefore do not need to conjure up these “mothers”: — they are already up here, their eyes look at us, we simply execute that to which their magic has persuaded us.” 35[38]° — And as concerns act(ual) philos(ophy) in France today: no one should believe that these stout positivists that is to say empiricists from the school of Comte, or the successors of Stendhal Montesquieu Condillac — heirs of the best that the 18th century had — like Taine, constitute a contrast to the skeptical mood of the century. 35139)" Noon and Eternity. I. On the Order of Rank. 2. The Legislators. (Cultivation of new ruling castes) 3. On the Ring of Rings. Or: "The Mirror." 4. The Great Blessings. 3slo]"? Noon and Eternity. Visions and Prophecies. 34" Noon and Eternity. Prophecies of a Man of the Future. [Page 104] 35 MAY-JULY 1885 97 Part One: On the Order of Rank. Part Two: On the Rulers of the Earth. Part Three: On the Ring of Rings. Part Four: On the New Dying. 35142]4 — until we, too, are capable of calling out with sufficient pride the words that Pericles called out to his Athenians in that funeral oration: to every land and sea our boldness has broken a path, everywhere founding timeless memorials for things good and wicked. 35143] In the end let us guard against the knowledge of human nature of these Sainte-Beuves and Renans, against this kind of sounding-out and sniffing-out of the soul as it is practiced by these unmanly and spineless hedonists of the spirit: it seems shameful to us when they fumble around with curious fingers on the secrets of humans or ages that were higher, stricter, deeper and in every respect nobler than they themselves: such that they would not have readily opened their doors to any such roaming half-women. But this nineteenth century, which has sacrificed all the finer instincts of order of rank, no longer knows how to rap the fingers of these unwanted interlopers and gate crashers; indeed, it is proud of its "historical sense," by virtue of which the sweating plebeian is allowed, providing he comes with scholarly instruments of torture and questionnaires, to penetrate even into the company of the supremely unapproachable, among the saints of conscience as well as among the eternally disguised rulers of [Page 105] 98 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS the spirit. More skepticism lies hidden beneath its historical sense and knowing than one sees at first: an insulting skepticism aimed at the difference in rank between human beings, and the same shameless demand for "equality" is even extended to include the dead, whom the paid servants of public opinion now presume to use against any of the living. But we are no skeptics — we still believe in an order of rank of human beings and problems and wait for the hour when this doctrine of rank and of order will onceagain inscribe itself plainly on the faces of this rabble-like society of today. Perhaps this hour is also our hour. Is it possible, if we are not skeptics, that we are critics or "criticists"? And if in our name we particularly underscored experiment and the joy in experimenting, does this perhaps occur because we love to avail ourselves of experiments in a broad and dangerous sense, but for the sake of a more deeply understood critique? Are we perhaps secretly, to the best of our knowledge, compelled to go further as experimenters than the soft-hearted and coddled taste of our century can condone? Indeed, we do not wish to forgo all those qualities that separate the critic from the skeptic: the certainty of value standard, the conscious application of a unity of method, cunning courage, standing alone and being able to answer to oneself; indeed we confess to a joy in no-saying and dissecting, a certain cruelty of the hand that steadily wields the scalpel even if it is the heart that bleeds. We are harder — and perhaps not only toward ourselves — than “humane” people may wish; we do not get mixed up with “truth” because it “pleases” or “elevates” or “inspires” us — on the contrary our faith is small that truth could ever bring with it such pleasant feelings. It sounds awkward to many ears when we say: our suspicion is aroused precisely where our emotion rises up in beautiful surges; we smile if someone believes anything is proved by saying: “but this thought elevates me: how could it not be true?” Or: “this work delights me: how could it not be beautiful?” Or: “this artist enlarges me: how could he not be great?”TM On the contrary with critics we have — [Page 106] 35 MAY-JULY 1885 99 35144]*” Superstition about the philosopher, confusion with the scien(tific) person. As if values inhered in things and one only needed to determine them. To what extent they explore among given values (their hatred of appearance, body etc.) Schopenhauer with respect to morality. (Scorn for the utilitarian) In the end the confusion goes so far that Darwinism is regarded as philosophy: and now dominance is held by the scientific people. Even the French like Taine seek or think they seek without already having the value standards. Bowing down before the “facts,” a kind of cult. In fact they annihilate the existing valuations. Explanation of this misunderstanding. The commander emerges rarely, he misinterprets himself. One thoroughly wants to divert authority from oneself and posit it into circumstances. — In Germany appreciation for the critic belongs to the history of awakening manliness. Lessing etc. (Napoleon regarding Goethe) In fact this movement was cancelled out again by German romanticism: and the reputation of German philosophy hinges on it, as if the danger of skepticism were eliminated by it, and faith could be proven. Both tendencies culminate in Hegel: at bottom he generalized the fact of German criticism and the fact of German romanticism — a kind of dialectic fatalism, but in honor of the spirit, actually with the submission of the philosopher under reality. — The critic prepares the way: nothing more! With Schopenhauer the task of the philos(opher) dawns, that what is at stake is a determination of value: always still under the domination of eudaemonism (scorn for Hartmann) the ideal of pessimism. 35145] The philosopher as legislator, as attempter of new possibilities, his means. He uses religion. The New Testament — what Christianity can do. His opposite: the morality of the herd animal. Likewise the freethinkers etc. [Page 107] IOO UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS How the herd animals today imagine the “Superior Human”: to be demonstrated using V. Hugo. Those who prepared the way for me: Schopenhauer. the extent to which I deepened pessimism and first made it entirely palpable to myself by inventing its highest opposite. Then: the ideal artists, those offspring from the Napoleonic movement. Then: the higher

Europeans, forerunners of the great politics. Then: the Greeks and their emergence. I gave hints in the Birth of Tragedy about the relationship between “necessity” and “art.” The Germans and the spirit. The personal education of the philosopher: solitude. The Dionysian. 35146] Paete, non dolet!®? Paete, this pessimism does not hurt! Paete, Eduard does not bite! Paete, look at me: am I not friendly blue, yes even Prussian blue; Paete, indeed, I leave nothing at all to be desired Paete, non dolet! Paete, this pessimism does not hurt! Paete, your Arria does not bite! Paete: Eduard is full of knowledge, cozy, humane, friendly, even friendly to the empire, even Prussian blue, in sum Eduard is a girl Friday and his pessimism leaves nothing at all to be desired I was in error back then: I thought E(duard) vlon} H(artmann) was a subtle superior mind and joker who was making fun of the pessimistic embarrassment of the age; I found the invention of his “unconscious” so malicious, so witty, it seemed to me a real mousetrap for the doleful and dumb of philosophical dilettantism as it spreads more and more across Germany. But now they insist on assuring me that he means it seriously: and they are practically forcing me to believe in it: but is it [Page 108] 35 MAY-JULY 1885 IOI supposed to stop being entertaining for me? Am I supposed to have to stop laughing when this Arria again and again tries to encourage her Paetus not to be afraid of the dagger, I mean of Hartmannian pessimism? Paete, she calls tenderly, non dolet! 35147] § No critics. Embarrassment. Finally “the scientific human being.” The English. § Neither pessimists nor optimists. Schopenhauer’s great position — that the destruction of an illusion still does not yield truth, but one more piece of ignorance, an expansion of our “empty space,” a growth of our inner “desolation” —*° § Basic thought: the new values must first be created — we are not spared this! The philosopher must be like a legislator. New types. (How the highest types (e.g., the Greeks) were cultivated so far: to consciously will this kind of “chance”)?! § His means: Religions, moralities § Meaning of Christianity. § Meaning of the democratic way of thinking. § Freethinkers, included in this movement? Victor Hugo. § Unconscious counter-movements: Napoleon, the 30s, R(ichard) W(agner). § The new philosopher can only emerge in connection with a ruling caste, as their highest spiritualization. Great politics, rule of the earth are near; complete lack of principles for this? — (irony toward the empty German spirit) § The European and his education. § Period of grand experiments. Humans with their own canon of values. Institutions for the cultivation of superior humans. § The “for the time being” of philosophers. Their solitude. § Prepare the “Beyond Good and Evil.” State of “morality.” 15 § Dionysus. 15: 110 | 6 3 big pages for each section [Page 109] 102 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 35148] Preface. It matters little to me today whether I was right or wrong with respect to R(ichard) W(agner) and Schopenhauer: if I erred, well, my error accrues to the dishonor neither of those mentioned nor myself. What is certain is that in those early days it was a tremendous boon to me to be able to paint my idealist colors, in which I viewed the images (of the) philosopher and (the) artist, not entirely upon the unreal but as it were upon previously sketched figures; and if I was accused of having looked at the aforementioned with a magnifying eye, then I am glad to be so accused — and glad, too, for my eyes. At least the reader of the second Unfashionable Observation should not be in doubt as to how little I was always concerned about the truth and — — — What I wrote at that time — and wrote less than painted, and on top of that heatedly and, as it seems to me today, in a daring and not unobjectionable alfresco: this would not become more true if I portrayed it again more gently, colorfully and rigorously now that my hand and eye have perhaps learned something in the meantime. Each period of life understands “truth” in its own way; and whoever steps up to that painting with youthful and stormy senses and great demands will find as much truth in it as he is capable of seeing. My first four U(nfashionable) O(bservations), to which I now add a fifth, sixth and seventh after ten years, were attempts to lure to myself the kind of humans who belong to me: thus fishhooks cast to hook “my kind.” Back then I was young enough to go fishing in such a way with impatient hope. Today — after a hundred years if I may measure time according to my standard! — I am still not old enough to have lost all hope, all patience. How strange it sounds to my ears even today when an old man compresses his experience into these words: — — — Thus speaks Goethe: could he be right? Then how unreasonable it would be to grow as old a(nd) as reasonable as Goethe! [Page 11]

4 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 34[13] Things which my stomach digests poorly or not at all: potatoes, ham, mustard, onions, pepper, anything baked in fat, puff pastry, cauliflower, cabbage, lettuce, all oily vegetables, wine, sausage, butter sauce on meat, chives, fresh breadcrumb, all sourdough bread. Anything roasted, any meat served rare, veal, roast beef, leg of lamb, egg yolk a(nd) milk also whipped cream, rice, semolina, cooked warm apples green peas beans carrots roots fish, fresh butter brown white bread crust. 34[14] The kind of open and hearty familiarity that is needed today in a democratic age in order to be beloved and respected — in sum that for which someone today is treated as an “upright human being”: this gives a moralist much to laugh about. All profound people enjoy their kind of relief here; it is such a pleasure to play at comedy and — — — 34[1]”? The ancients read aloud. 34[16] Among immoderate people, e.g., English rabble, naturally the doctrine of abstinence acquires tremendous power. Among the moderate it is a laughable matter. 34[17] Dionysian. What unfortunate shyness to speak as a scholar on a subject of which I should have been able to speak as an “experienced one.” And what does someone who has to write poetry care about “aesthetics”? One should practice one’s trade, and send curiosity to the devil! 34[118]? The XXth Century. Abbé Galiani once said — — — now since I do not in the least share the unwarlike views of my departed friend Galiani, [Page 110] 35 MAY-JULY 1885 103 And it would be fair like the Greeks to heed their judgment concerning old age: — they hated growing old more than death, and loved to die when they felt themselves becoming reasonable in that manner. Meanwhile youth, too, has its own kind of reason: a reason that believes in life, love and hope 35[49]°4 As concerns R(ichard) W(agner): there was a moment in my life when I vehemently pushed him away from me. Away from me! — is what I cried. This kind of artist is untrustworthy precisely where I tolerate no joking. He tried to come to an “arrangement” with existing Christianity by extending his left hand to Protestant communion — he spoke to me of the delights he was able to experience from this communion — but at the same time his right hand to the Catholic Church: he offered it his Parsifal and let himself be known as a “creature of Rome” in partibus in fidelium” by all who had ears. 35150] The laws of thinking as results of organic development — a fake positing force must be assumed — likewise inheritance and continuation of the fictions. 3s1s] In a world of becoming in which everything is conditioned, the acceptance of the unconditional, of substance, of being, of a thing etc. can only be an error. But how is error possible? 3s[52] To show succession ever more clearly means explanation: nothing more! 35153] To concede perception even for the inorganic world and moreover with absolute accuracy: there “truth” reigns! With the organic world begin indefiniteness and illusion. [Page 111] 104 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 35[54]°° That a state of equilibrium is never achieved proves that it is not possible. But in an indefinite space it must have been achieved. Likewise in a spherical space. The shape of space must be the cause of eternal motion and ultimately of all “imperfection.” That “force” and “inertia” “remaining self-identical” are in conflict with one another. The extent of force as magnitude as fixed, but its essence fluid, tense, compelling, — — — 3s1ss}°° “Timeless” to be refuted. In a specific moment of force the absolute conditionality of a new distribution of all its forces is given: it cannot stand still. “Change” belongs to its essence, therefore also temporality: but by this only the necessity of change is once again conceptually posited. 351]°° Time is not a priori given. Spir 2, p. 7. illogical character of our knowledge of bodies, cf. 2 p. 93. 35157]? That there are identical things, identical cases, is the basic fiction already when making a judgment, then when making an inference. 35158] In the chemical world reigns the sharpest perception of difference in force. But a protoplasm, as a multiplicity of chemical forces, has an uncertain and indefinite overall-perception of a foreign object. 351] The transition from the world of the inorganic into that of the organic is that from the firmest perceptions of force values and power ratios into that of uncertain, indefinite ones. because [Page 112] 35 MAY-JULY 1885 105 a multiplicity of warring beings (= protoplasm) feels itself in opposition to the external world. 35[60] The restless will to power or to constant creation or to transformation or to self-overpowering 35[61]°° “so-called time a mere abstraction, neither existing objectively nor a necessary and original representational mode of the subject” (Spir) 2, p. 15. 35[62] The Germans have no culture: they are dependent on Paris now as before — the cause is they still have no character. Our great human beings do not constitute a race, but individuals. But what is it that I formerly set aside and on which I founded my hopes, German music? 35163] NB. Misunderstanding about Richard Wagner is enormous in Germany today: a(nd) since I have contributed to increasing it, I want to pay my debt and attempt to decrease it 35164] NB. For two centuries there was only one contrast between French and Ital{ian) music. In the struggle between Gluck and Piccini it sharpened and came to a head: here Gluck was perceived entirely as a representative of French taste — as a representative of the noble, pompous and rationalistic. The Germans as musicians listened in turn in the direction of France and Italy: even today the Germans do not yet have their own taste in music [Page 113] 106 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS It seems to me that Wagner once again brought French taste to predominance over Italian, i.e., over Mozart, Haydn, Rossini, Bellini, Mendelssohn, but it is the taste of 1830s France: literature become dominant over music as over painting. “Program-music,” with the “sujet” in the forefront! 35165] Beethoven belongs to Rousseau and to the humanitarian current which partly anticipated the Revolution, partly succeeded it transfiguratively, but even more he belongs to the main event of the last century, the appearance of Napoleon. Mozart presupposing the society of the Rococo age 35166] Difference between actors, like Schiller and Wagner and Goethe isolated, between Pietism and Hellenism, doubtful whether he should not write in French. Lessing — Bayle Frederick the Great keen on France Frederick II on Moorish-Eastern enlightenment Leibniz between Christianity Platonism and mechanics. Bismarck learning from Napoleon III and Cavour 35167] If mechanics is only a logic, then what follows for it is also what applies for all logic: it is a kind of spine for vertebrates, nothing true-in-itself. 35[68] On the Ring of Rings. NB. An inside belongs to the power that transforms and always remains the same, a kind of character of Proteus-Dionysus, disguising itself and enjoying itself in transformation. To comprehend the [Page 114] 35 MAY-JULY 1885 107 “person” as deception: in fact heredity is the main objection, insofar as innumerable formative forces from much earlier times assert their constant existence: in truth they struggle in it and are ruled and tamed — a will to power cuts through persons, it requires the diminution of perspective, “egoism,” as an occasional condition of existence; on every step it looks out for an even higher one. The diminution of the effective principle to a “person,” to the individual. 35169] NB. How much someone bears of the truth, without degenerating, is his standard. Likewise how much happiness — — likewise how much freedom and power! On the order of rank 35[70] The most rigorous school needed, misfortune, illness: there would be no spirit on earth, also no delight and jubilation. — Only great-spirited, tense souls know what art, what cheerfulness are. 3s(71@ Zarathustra) can only succeed when he has first established the order of rank. 3572] NB. There must be many superhumans: all goodness develops only among its kind. One god would always be a devil! A ruling race. On “the rulers of the earth.” I. Zarathustra can only succeed after the order of rank has been established. At first this will be taught. II. The order of rank executed in a system of earthly rule: the rulers of the earth last, a new ruling caste. Springing up from them here and there, quite Epicurean god, the superhuman, the transfigurer of existence. [Page 115] 108 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS III. The superhuman interpretation of the world. Dionysus. IV. Lovingly returning to the closest and smallest things 35174. from this greatest alienation, Zarathustra blessing all his experiences and dying as a blesser. J Zarathustra) 5. I. g CON AM Great trumpet-herald’s noise. Happiness of loud notes! Zarathustra I. I am that predestined human who determines values for thousands of years. A hidden one, one forced to go everywhere, a human without friends who has rejected every homeland, every rest. What makes the grand style. Becoming master over one’s happiness as well as one’s unhappiness: a — — — My gift will only be received when there are receivers: for this order of rank. The greatest events are the latest to be comprehended. — To this extent I must be a legislator. . The time of its appearance: the most dangerous middle, where it can go over to “last human,” but also — — characterized by the greatest event: God is dead. Only humans do not yet notice anything of the fact that they are living only on inherited values. The general negligence and squandering. . — Basic insight: “good” and “evil” are now observed as from the eye of the “herd animal.” Equality of humans as goal. Against this me: (The One God as preparation for herd morality!) the teacher of the order of rank. . Leaders, herds and isolated ones. The tempters. . Complete humans and fragments. . Those who turned out well and turned out badly. . Creators and those who were shaped. Difference in strength. . Artists and small completers. [Page 116] 35 MAY-JULY 1885 109 to. the scientific people as describers and most comprehensive organs. u. the lordly people, as attempts at cultivation. 12. the religion founders; as attempts at new universal value positing. 133. the feeling of imperfection: the penitents 14. The strain in the direction of perfection: the pious, the beautiful souls, the great longings 1s. The force to do the perfect somehow (master-artisans artists officials scholars etc. 16. the earth now lying there as a marble workshop: a ruling race is needed, with absolute power. 351751% 1. Zarathustra awakening on the old fortress. Hears the drumming of the heralds. 2. The test. “Do you belong to me?” 3. The rose festival parade. 4. The doctrine of the order of rank. 5. Nighttime on the bridge. 35176] °8 (49) What is noble? Preface to “Mixed Opinions and Maxims” — meticulousness in the most external things, even the fr(ivolous)

ap(pearance), in word, clothing, demeanor, insofar as this meticulousness sets apart, keeps at a distance, protects from being confused for someone else. — the slow gesture, also the slow gaze. There are not too many valuable things: and these automatically come to and want to go to the valuable ones. We have a hard time admiring. — the bearing of poverty and of neediness, also of illness. — the avoidance of small honors, and suspicion of everyone who easily praises: for the praiser believes that he understands [Page 117] IIO UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS what he praises: but to understand — Balzac revealed it, this typical ambitious one — comprendre c'est éгалer.^o — Our doubt about the communicability of the heart goes deep; solitude, not as chosen but as given, — the conviction that one has responsibilities only to one's kind, behaves toward others as he pleases: that only inter pares? can justice be hoped for (unfortunately not counted on in the least). — irony toward the “talented”; belief in nobility of birth even in moral matters. “Aristocrats of the spirit” — is a euphemism for Jews. — to always feel oneself as someone who has to forgive honors: whereas it is not very often that someone is found who is allowed to honor him. — always disguised: the higher the type, the more a human needs the incognito. God, if there were one, should be permitted, for purposes of decency, to reveal himself in the world only as a human. — the capacity for otium,” the absolute conviction that a trade in any sense does not disgrace one, to be sure, but certainly disennobles. Not “industriousness” in the bourgeois sense, as highly as we esteem it, or like those insatiably cackling artists who do as the hens — cackle and lay eggs and cackle some more. — we protect the artists and poets and whoever is a master in anything: but as beings who are of a superior kind than these who are only skilled at something, than the merely “productive people,” do not confuse us with them. — enjoyment of forms; the taking-under-protection of everything related to form, the conviction that courtesy is one of the great virtues; suspicion of all kinds of letting-oneself-go including all freedom of the press and thought, because under them the spirit becomes comfortable and oafish and relaxes. — pleasure in women, as in a perhaps smaller, but subtler and lighter kind of being. What happiness to encounter beings who always have dance and folly and finery on their minds! They have been the delight of all very tense and profound manly souls, whose lives are burdened with great responsibilities. [Page 118] 35 MAY-JULY 1885 III — pleasure in princes and priests, because even in the assessment of the past at least symbolically and on the whole even literally they uphold the belief in a difference of human values, in sum in the order of rank. — the ability to keep silent: but not a word of this before listeners. — bearing of long hostilities: the lack of easy reconciliation. — disgust with demagoguery, with the “Enlightenment,” with “coziness,” with rabble-like intimacy. — the collecting of precious things, the needs of a higher and more selective soul; wanting to have nothing in common. His books, his landscapes. — we revolt against bad and good experiences and do not so quickly generalize. The individual case: how ironic we are toward the individual case when it has the bad taste to behave like a rule. — we love what is naive and the naive, but as observers and higher beings, we find Faust to be just as naive as his Gretchen. — we have a lowly estimation of the good, as herd animals: and know how among the worst most malicious harshest human beings often an inestimable gold drop of goodness keeps itself hidden, which all mere kindness and milky soul — — — — we do not consider a human of our kind refuted either by his vices, nor by his follies. We know that we are hard to recognize, and that we all have grounds to give ourselves foregrounds. 35177] Letters of Count — — — Edited by J. v. A. After the death of my mother. Invent anecdotes. [Page 119] 112 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 35[78]]? Preface. Is one permitted to publish letters? — A venerable friend of mine was accustomed to pronouncing the word “public” never without malice. The nineteenth century, he once said, loves truth, as everyone knows: well, with precisely this taste it offends my taste! I fear that if this continues, people will write only public letters from now on. Yes, he said on another occasion, it could come to pass that at some time a decent human being would summarize his entire morality in a single sentence: thou shalt — lie! Sir, you shall absolutely and always lie! Or you, too, are what everyone else already is — “public”! This was his secret opinion of the taste of our century. As I contemplated giving a title to his collection of letters and opinions, it crossed my mind to characterize them thus: “The Mirror. An Opportunity for Self-Reflection. For Europeans.” May one glean from this tasteless idea of mine at least how much value Z personally ascribe to these letters — and why I give myself the right to publish these letters precisely out of hatred for everything that is called “public” today. 35179] Century of minstrels (t(he) p(eople) of the dishonest burial) (Galiani) murderers boredom. 35180] The Germans of Yesterday and of the Day After Tomorrow A Contribution to the Critique of the German Soul 35[81] The demagogues in art. — Hugo Michelet Sand R. Wagner 35182] A pessimistic way of thinking and doctrine an ecstatic nihilism can be indispensable to precisely the philosopher under certain [Page 12] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 5 I am not afraid to prophesy a few things and therefore, possibly, bring about the cause of wars. 4 34!] A tremendous coming to one’s senses after the most terrible earthquake: with new questions. 34[20] NB. The centuries just prior to the last rejected the Gothic as barbarism (the Goth back then was synonymous with the barbarian): the next to last century rejected Homer. Therein lies a taste: a strong will to one’s Yes and one’s No. — The capacity to enjoy Homer again is perhaps the greatest achievement of European people — but it has been paid for dearly enough. 34[21] Baudelaire, already entirely German, except for a certain hyper-erotic ailment that smells of Paris 34[22]]° Taine, who had the boldness of invention to find the typical between Hegel and Henri Beyle,¹⁰ his method, which essentially means: history can be comprehended only through concepts; but the concepts must be created by the historical human being: and the history in which there are only 4, 5 factors is the most comprehensible. 34[23]” the masquerade of the bourgeois, e.g., as Salambé and as Saint Anthony 34[24] Some who are at bottom shallow and light beings — peoples as well as individuals — have their most estimable and supreme moments when all of a sudden, to their astonishment, they become heavy and melancholy. In the same way, perhaps for the [Page 120] 35 MAY-JULY 1885 113 circumstances: as a powerful pressure and hammer, with which he smashes races that are degenerating and dying out and clears them out of the way, (in order) to pave the way for a new order of life or in order to impart a longing for the end to what is degenerate and wants to die out.” For the delaying and deepening of peoples and races a pessimistic way of thinking, a religion of negation and escape from the world, an ecstatic desensualization and uglification of life can — — — 35183] But, insofar as I have these kinds of worries and prepare a long answer to such a question — oh, maybe I myself am nothing more than a long answer to this question? — I already hear that broken and malicious voice 35[84]”^o Gai Saber. Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future. By Friedrich Nietzsche. To the Mistral.” Introduction. Book One: The Prejudices of the Philosophers. Book Two: Beyond Good and Evil. Book Three: To the Artists. Book Four: The Mirror. An Opportunity for Self-Reflection for Europeans. Book Five: The Noble Soul. Among Friends: An Aftersong.”[®] the ideal cloister, for the preservation of delicate plants the future of music — Europeans’ music music of grand style the snares of language Wagnermania and Hegelmania as intoxicants “classic” — inapplicable word in music [Page 121] II UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS the hermits, like Goethe, Beethoven, and the demagogic or courtly or ecclesiastical artists. education of musicians. against the “nationalistic” ambitions in art concept of culture; — style etc. rejection of pessimisme, likewise of all eudaemonistic points of view. III To the Artists. New concept of the creator; the Dionysian. New festivals. The transfiguration. “Perfected Infinity” pain and joy purpose value judgments in perceptions of taste, colors, sounds establish concepts the re-interpretability of the world — but holding on to the basic features what is pathological about philosophers cause and effect the economy of affects the “persona” Luther’s discourse, the Bible as the foundation of a new poetic form. [Page 122] [36 = W I 4. June-July 1885] 36h] Gai Saber. Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future. By Friedrich Nietzsche. Appendix The Modern Soul. Attempt at an Elucidation concerning Today and Tomorrow. 36[2] Never has more been demanded of living creatures than with the emergence of terra firma: accustomed to and equipped for life in the sea, now they had to turn around and overturn their body and their customs and act differently in all things than they had been accustomed up till then — so far there has been no more remarkable transformation on earth. —Just as back then the sea descended into the faults caves pits and acquired depth through cave-ins, through a slow breaking down of the earth: so, too, what now transpires among human beings perhaps offers the precise opposite, to speak metaphorically: namely humans are becoming whole and rounded, the faults caves and pits are disappearing and consequently also — terra firma is disappearing. For a human made rounded and whole by my way of thinking, “everything is in the sea,” the sea is everywhere: but the sea itself has lost its depths. — Yet I was on my way to a quite [Page 123] 116 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS different metaphor and only got lost! I wanted to say: like everyone I was born a land animal — and now nevertheless I must be a sea animal! 3603] Germany, which is wealthy in talented and highly educated scholars, for a long time has lacked great souls, powerful spirits to such an extent that it appears to have forgotten what a great soul, what a powerful spirit is: and nowadays human beings who are mediocre and turned out badly take themselves to market, almost in good conscience and devoid of all embarrassment, and praise themselves as great men, reformers; as does for example Eugen Dühring, a talented and well-educated scholar, but who reveals with almost every word that he harbors a petty soul and is crushed by narrow jealous feelings; also that he is not driven by a powerful, brimming, benevolently squandering spirit — but by ambition! But to thirst for honors in this age is far unworthier of a philosopher than in any earlier age: today where the rabble rules, where the rabble bestows the honors! 36[4] When the philosopher joins the homines bonae voluntatis,’ the good-natured, compassionate, gentle, everyday people, then it is as if he landed in humid air and beneath a cloudy sky: for a short time it does him good, he feels relieved, as it were; but if he pays close attention, he notices how he himself is becoming comfortable and negligent in this false environment; vain too — but above all melancholy. In order to quickly learn how weak and meager is the constitution of this good-natured human material, with all their obliging appearance, he might irritate and wound their vanity, let him get them to the point where they become abusive: then the “undeeppness” of these waters will betray itself soonest, and also surely what kind of sand and filth or presumptuousness lies hidden beneath all this well-mannered light azure surface. [Page 124] 36 JUNE-JULY 1885 117 36[5] The women in Europe, quite aside from their real business (“laying children”) are useful for many good things. It is pleasant to dance with Viennese women. With a French woman one can causer, with an Italian poser, with a German — oser.! Among Jewish women are the best prattlers of all: the model for this, all wrapped up in Goethean lace and smugness, was Rahel’ A Russian woman has usually experienced something, occasionally thought something. English women know how to blush in the most feminine and heavenly manner, almost without a reason, like the angels; in sum, we would never finish if we once tried to stiffly and steadfastly prove the usefulness of woman — something that everyone believes in — using the m(odel) of E(nglish) u(tilitarians). 36[6]° Gai saber. Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future. To the Mistral. A Dance Song. Part I. 1. “Without a passionate pleasure Conclusion. “And do you know what ‘the world’ is to me? Part II. Conclusion. “When I was very young, Dionysus. Part III. On the Future of the Arts. Part IV. The Mirror. Part V. Among Free Spirits. 36[7]’ My “compassion.” — This is a feeling for which no name suffices for me: I sense it where I see a waste of precious capabilities, for example at the sight of Luther: what strength, and what tasteless back woods-problems (at a time when in France [Page 125] 118 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS the courageous and cheerful skepticism of a Montaigne was already possible!) Or where I see someone fall short of what he could have become, due to the influence of a stupidity of chance. Or even when thinking of the fate of humankind, as when I watch, with fear and contempt, the European politics of today which under all circumstances is also working on the fabric of the future of all human beings. Indeed, what could become of “humans” if — — ! This is a kind of “compassion”; even if there is no suffering one with whom I might suffer here.’ 36 [8]? Moralia? Just as from time immemorial humans have lived in profound unfamiliarity with their bodies and allow a few formulations to suffice for communicating about their well-being, so too is the case with our judgments on the value of humans and deeds: privately we cling to a few external and incidental symbols and have no feeling for how deeply unfamiliar and foreign we are to ourselves. And as concerns judgment about others: how quick and “certain” even the most cautious and the fairest are to judge! 36[9]” Moralia. Sparse reflection is required to expose the fact that there is no “good in itself” — that something good must be thought only as “good for what,” and that what is good in one purpose necessarily will at the same time be “evil and harmful” in many other purposes: in sum that each thing to which we . [<4 Do. . . . (3 1» apply the predicate “good” is likewise characterized as “evil for precisely that reason. 36[10]!? How long has it been that I have made an effort to prove the complete innocence of becoming in myself !? And what strange paths I have already walked in doing so! Once the right solution [Page 126] 36 JUNE-JULY 1885 119 seemed to me that I decreed: “existence, as something resembling a work of art, is not at all under the jurisdictio” of morality; on the contrary morality itself belongs in the realm of appearance.” Another time I said: all guilt-concepts are objectively completely worthless, but subjectively all life is necessarily unjust and alogical. A third time I extracted from myself the denial of all purposes and perceived the unknowability of causal combinations. And why did I do all this? Was it not to provide myself with the feeling of complete irresponsibility — to position myself outside of any praise and blame, independent of all formerly and today, in order to pursue my goal in my way? — 36[11] At bottom morality is hostile toward science: already Socrates was this — and moreover because science takes things as important that have nothing to do with “good” and “evil,” and consequently take importance away from the feeling for “good” and “evil.” For morality wants the whole human being and his entire strength to be at its service: it regards it as a squandering of someone who is not rich enough to squander when a human seriously concerns himself with plants and stars. This is why in Greece things rapidly went downhill with scientism when Socrates dragged the illness of moralizing into science; a height such as that in the mentality of a Democritus, Hippocrates and Thucydides was not achieved for a second time. 36[12]!6

Human Being in Relations with Others It is a sign of a lack of noble-mindedness when someone on the street responds to a greeting before he has recognized the person who greeted: — greeting and kind of greeting should be distinctions, after all — with the sole exception that a prince (or he qui range aux souverains!) goes his way and is greeted. It is his prerogative not to have to know anyone, but to have to be known by all. A parable. [Page 127] 120 UNPUBLISHED

FRAGMENTS 36[13]!8 The H(uman Being) By Oneself Alone: How differently one perceives the business and the work of his life if he is the first in his family to do it or when the father and grandfather have already been active in the same way! In the former case, where one is the first, one has much more inner distress from it, also a much more sudden pride; good conscience is not yet wedded to such an activity, and something about it will readily be felt as arbitrary, as incidental. 36[14]” What value Wagner might have for the non-musician, and might also retain going forward, the question should be spared us for now. Without any doubt Richard Wagner gave the Germans of this age the most comprehensive notion of what an artist could be: — respect for “the artist” suddenly shot up: everywhere he awakened new valuations, new desires, new hopes; and perhaps not least through the merely heralding, incomplete, imperfect nature of his artistic creations. Who did not learn from him! And even if not so directly, like the artists of elocution and the poser-humans”° of every kind, then certainly at least indirectly, “occasioned by Richard Wagner,” as one may be allowed to say. Even philosophical knowledge gained no meager impulse from his appearance, of this there is no doubt. Today there is an abundance of aesthetic problems of which even the subtlest minds had no whiff before Richard Wagner — above all the problem of the actor and his relation) to the different arts, not to mention psychological problems as they are copiously provided by Wagner’s character and W(agnerian) art. To be sure: insofar as he himself ventured into the realm of knowledge he deserves no praise, on the contrary an unconditional rejection; in the gardens of science he always distinguished himself only as the most immodest and untalented intruder. The “philosophizing” of Wagner belongs to the most illicit kinds of dilettantism; that people did not even know enough to laugh at it is German and belongs to the old German “cult of obscurity.” But if one [Page 128] 36 JUNE-JULY 1885 II absolutely wants to assist him in the acquisition of honors and statues even as a “thinker” — the good will and the subservience of his disciples will not be able to forgo this — so be it! then I recommend he be depicted as the genius of German obscurity itself, with a smoking torch in hand, inspired and in the act of stumbling over a stone. When Wagner “thinks,” he stumbles. — But we will be concerned with Wagner the musician). 36[15]” If the world had a goal then it must have been reached. If an unintended final state existed for it, then it likewise must have been reached. If it were generally capable of stopping and becoming fixed, of “being,” if it had this capacity for “being” for only a single moment in all its becoming, then in turn all its becoming would have ended long ago, therefore also all thinking, all “spirit.” The fact of a “spirit” as a form of becoming proves that the world has no goal, no final state and is incapable of being. — But the old habit of thinking of goals with every event that happens and of a guiding creative God with the world is so powerful that a thinker has trouble in not thinking to himself that even the aimlessness of the world is a purpose. This notion — namely that the world deliberately avoids a goal and even knows how to artificially guard against getting caught in an orbit — must occur to all who wish to decree upon the world the capacity for eternal novelty, that is for a finite, specific, unchangeable force of constant size as is “the world” — the miracle-capacity for infinite restructuring of its forms and states. The world, even if no longer a god, is still supposed to be capable of divine creative force, of infinite transformational force; it is supposed to willfully resist falling back into one of its old forms, it is supposed to have not only the intention but also the means to protect itself from every repetition, thus in every moment it is supposed to control each of its movements with respect to avoiding goals, final states, repetitions — and whatever else may be the consequences of such an unforgivably insane manner of thinking and desiring. That is still the old religious way of thinking and [Page 129] 122 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS desiring, a kind of longing to believe that in some way the world is indeed the same as the old beloved, infinite, boundlessly creative God — that in some way “the old God still lives” after all — that longing of Spinoza’s which expresses itself in the phrase “deus sive natura” (he even felt “natura sive deus” —). But what then is the proposition and belief with which the decisive turn, the now attained upper hand of the scientific spirit over the religious god-creating spirit is most distinctly formulated? Is it not: the world, as force, must not be thought as unlimited, for it cannot be thought thus — we forbid ourselves the concept of an infinite force as incompatible with the concept “force.” Therefore — the world also lacks the capacity for eternal novelty. 36 [16] If I could have my way: then it is time to declare war on European morality, and likewise on everything that has sprouted from it. This temporary order of the peoples and states of Europe must be smashed. The Christian-democratic way of thinking favors the herd-animal, the diminution of human beings, it weakens the great motivating forces (evil —), it hates compulsion, harsh discipline, great responsibilities, great risks. The mediocre win the day and assert their value standards. 36[17] But to whom do I say this? Where then are these “free spirits”? Is there even such a thing as “between ourselves”? — I look around me: who thinks, who feels as I do about this? Who wants what my most concealed will wants? But so far I found no one. Perhaps I only searched badly? Perhaps those who suffer from my kind of new plight and new happiness must conceal themselves in the same way that I do — ? And don masks as I did? — And consequently are not much good at seeking their kind? We new philosophers, we tempters, think otherwise — and we do not want to leave it at thinking. We think more freely — perhaps the day will come when people see with their own [Page 13] 6 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS cattle-rabble that formerly started grunting morally in English Puritanism or today as English Salvation Army — the penitential spasm is their highest achievement of “humanity”; we should simply acknowledge this. — But others become superior when they become lighter! There is no doubt: when a kind of human being has lived out entire generations as teachers physicians pastors and models, and without constantly looking out for money or honor or positions: then ultimately a higher and subtler and more spiritual type arises. In this manner the priest, providing that he reproduces through strong women, is a kind of preparation for the future emergence of superior human beings. 34[25] Such dogmatic people as Dante and Plato are the most distant and perhaps for that reason the most alluring: who live in a house of knowledge that is carpentered and held together by faith. The first in his own, the other in the Christian-patristic. There is an entirely different strength and mobility to maintaining oneself in an incomplete system, with free, open vistas, than in a dogmatic world. Leonardo da Vinci stands higher than Michelangelo, Michelangelo higher than Raphael. 34[26] Praised among the educated of today (who all pro pudor!® read newspapers) are the profound people. But what do those who are in a position to praise profound people know about profundity themselves! — They are dangerous people: of this there is no doubt at all. We otherwise do not tend to praise the abysses! 34[27]”° Letters To a Philosophical Friend. On the Occasion of Thus Spoke Zarathustra. By Friedrich Nietzsche. [Page 130] 36 JUNE-JULY 1885 123 eyes that we also act more freely. Meanwhile we are difficult to recognize; people have to mistake us. Are we “freethinkers”? In all European countries and likewise in North America there are now “freethinkers”: do they belong with us? No, gentlemen, you want almost the opposite of that which lies in the intentions of those philosophers whom I call tempters; they sense little temptation to trade mendacious pleasantries with you. Indeed, if you “freethinkers” had only a whiff of what one can free himself from, and where one is then driven! I believe you would be among the most raging opponents of that which I call my “freedom of spirit and my “Beyond Good and Evil.” That I no longer need to believe in “souls,” that I deny “personality” and its alleged unity and in each human being find the material for very different “personae” (and masks), that to me “absolute spirit” and “pure knowing” signify mythical creatures behind which a contradictio in adjecto? clumsily conceals itself — with this I am perhaps on the same path as many of those “freethinkers,” not to mention at all the denial of God, with which even today a few self-satisfied Englishmen assume they are providing a tremendous sample of free-mindedness. What separates me from them are valuations: for they all belong to the democratic movement and want equal rights for all, they see in the forms of our previous old society the causes for human deficiencies and degenerations, they enthuse about smashing these forms: and sometimes they imagine the most humane thing they could do is to help all human beings to reach their degree of spiritual “freedom.” Briefly and plainly, they belong to the “/evelers” — to that kind of human being who crudely offends my taste in every way, and offends my reason even more: I want war and opposites even in matters of the spirit; and more war than ever, more o(pposites) than ever; I would sooner condone the harshest despotism (as a school for the flexibility of the spirit) than the humid tepid air of an age of “freedom of the press,” in which all spirit becomes comfortable and stupid and stretches its limbs. In this matter I am still today what I was — “untimely.” [Page 131] 124

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS But we new philosophers: we are not only beginning with the portrayal of factual order of rank and value differences in humans, but we also want precisely the opposite of an assimilation, an equalization: we teach estrangement in every sense of the word, we tear open chasms as they have never existed before, we want humans to be more evil than they ever were. For the time being we ourselves still live as strangers to one another and concealed. It will be necessary for us for many reasons to be hermits and even to don masks — consequently we will be in a poor position to seek our kind. We will live alone and probably know the agonies of all seven solitudes. But if we do cross one another’s path, by accident, then you can bet that we will fail to recognize one another or mutually deceive ourselves.”⁴ 36[18]”° I am wary of speaking of chemical “laws”: this has a moral aftertaste. On the contrary what is at stake is an absolute determination of power relationships: the stronger gains mastery over the weaker, at least as far as the latter cannot assert its degree of independence — here there is no mercy, no sparing, even less a respect for “laws”! 36[19]°° It is improbable that our “knowledge” should reach further than is just required for the preservation of life. Morphology shows us how the senses and nerves, as well as the brain develop in proportion to the difficulty of finding nourishment. 36[20]”° Even in the realm of the inorganic, for an atom of force only its own neighborhood comes into consideration: the forces in the distance even themselves out. Herein lies the kernel of the perspectival, and why a living being is “egoistic” through and through. [Page 132] 36 JUNE-JULY 1885 125 36[21]28 The weaker presses itself upon the stronger, from a need for nourishment; it wants to find shelter, wants to become one with it if possible. The stronger on the contrary fends things off, it does not want to perish this way; on the contrary, in growing it splits itself in two and into several parts. The greater the pressure for unity, the more one can infer weakness; the greater the pressure for variety, difference, internal dissolution, the more strength is there. The drive to approach — and the drive to repel something are the bond in the inorganic and well as the organic world. The whole separation is a prejudice. The will to power in every combination of forces, fending off the stronger, pouncing on the weaker is more correct. NB. Processes as “beings.”?? 36[22]° The connection between the inorganic and the organic must lie in the repelling force that every atom of force exerts. Life would be defined as an enduring form of the process of force determinations, where the different combatants for their part grow unequally. The extent to which a resistance lies even in obeying; one’s individual power is by no means surrendered. Likewise in commanding there is a concession that the absolute power of the opponent is not vanquished, not incorporated, dissolved. “Obeying” like “commanding” are forms of jousting. 36[23]°! Continuous transitions do not allow us to speak of “individual” etc.; the “number” of beings is itself in flux. We would not speak of time and know nothing of movement if we did not, in a crude manner, believe we saw “things at rest” beside “things in motion.” Just as little would we speak of cause and effect, and without the erroneous conception of “empty space” we would not have arrived at all at the conception of space. [Page 133] 126 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS The principle of identity has as background the “appearance” that identical things exist. A world of becoming could not be “comprehended,” not “known” in the strict sense: only insofar as the “comprehending” and “knowing” intellect finds an already created crude world, pieced together entirely from illusory things, but become firm, insofar as this kind of illusion has preserved life — only to this extent does something like “knowledge” exist: i.e., a measuring of earlier and more recent errors against one another. 36[24] The sun: its movements are results 1) of the drive to pounce on the planets 2) this brings forth an approach to all 3) defending itself against a stronger sun 36[25]223 I believe in absolute space, as a substratum of force: the latter limits and structures. Time eternal. But in itself there is no space, nor time: “changes” are only appearances (or sense-processes for us); if we nonetheless posit regular recurrence among these, then nothing is proven thereby but this simple fact, that it has always happened this way. The feeling that the post hoc? is a propter hoc? is easy to deduce as a misunderstanding; it is understandable. But appearances cannot be “causes”! 36[26] “Subject” “object” “predicate” — these separations are made up and are now slapped like schemata on all apparent facts. The false fundamental observation is that I believe am the one who does something, who suffers something, who “has” something, who “has” a quality.° This “doing” “suffering” “having” ——— 36[27] Philosophy, in the only way I still grant it validity, as the most universal form of history, as the attempt to somehow describe Heraclitean becoming and abbreviate it in symbols (to translate it so to speak into a kind of illusory being and to mummify it) [Page 134] 36 JUNE-JULY 1885 127 36[28]?” That “heredity,” as something quite unexplained, cannot be used for explanation, but only for describing, for fixing a problem. Precisely this applies to the “capacity for adaptation.” In fact nothing is explained through morphological representation, supposing it were completed, but a tremendous fact is described. How an organ can be used to some purpose, that is not explained. In these things as little would be explained with the assumption of causae finales’ as with causae efficientes.° The concept “causa” is only a means of expression, nothing more, a means for describing. 36[29]° There are analogies, e.g., to our memory another memory that makes itself noticeable in forms in heredity and development. To our inventing and experimenting, an inventing in the application of tools for new purposes etc. That which we call our consciousness is innocent of all essential processes of our preservation and our growth; and no mind could be so subtle that it could construe more than a machine — which is far exceeded by every organic process. 36[30] One is unfair toward Descartes if one takes lightly his invocation of God’s credibility. In fact, from the start it is only with the assumption of a God who is morally similar to us that “truth” and the search for truth are something that promises success and has meaning. Leaving this God aside, it is permitted to ask whether being deceived does not belong to the conditions of life. 36[31]4142 The triumphant concept “force” with which our physicists have ousted God from the world requires one more enhancement: an internal world must be attributed to it, to which I refer as “will to power,” i.e., as an insatiable demand for displaying [Page 135] 128 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS power; or application, exertion of power, as creative drive etc. The physicists cannot rid the “effect at a distance” from their principles: just as little as a repelling force (or attracting one) There is no helping it: one must grasp all motion, all “appearances,” all “laws” only as symptoms of an internal event and use to the limit the analogy of the human being.? In the animal it is possible to deduce all its drives from the will to power: likewise all functions of organic life from this single source. 36[32] Leibniz is dangerous, as a proper German who needs foregrounds and foreground-philosophies, daring and mysterious to the extreme in himself, but without nobility Spinoza is deeper more comprehensive more hiding in caves than Descartes: Pascal in turn deeper than Spinoza. Measured against such hermits of the spirit and conscience Hume and Locke are humans of the surface;

— — — 36[33] On the Critique of the German Soul. 36[34]* Of the world interpretations that have been attempted so far, the mechanistic today seems to stand triumphantly in the foreground: clearly it has good conscience on its side; and no science believes for itself in progress or success unless it is won with the help of mechanistic procedures. Everyone knows these procedures: one leaves “reason” and “purposes” out of it, as much as possible, one shows that in due time everything can evolve from everything, one does not conceal a gloating grin when once again the “apparent intentionality in the fate” of a plant or an egg yolk is traced to pressure and thrust: in sum, one wholeheartedly honors, if a humorous expression is permitted in so serious a matter, the principle of the greatest possible stupidity. Meanwhile precisely in these distinguished intellects who belong to this movement a premonition, an anxiety can be detected, as [Page 136] 36 JUNE-JULY 1885 129 if this theory had a hole that before too long could become its final hole: I mean the hole that is their rock bottom*® from which they will leak when they are in their moment of highest need. Pressure and stress themselves cannot be “explained,” one cannot be rid of the actio in distans“? — we have lost our belief in even the ability to explain and we admit with a peevish expression that describing and not explaining, that the dynamic world interpretation with its denial of “empty space,” of particle atoms, will soon hold sway over physicists: whereby of course in addition to dynamis an inner quality — — — 36[35]° Using the Body as a Guide. — Supposing that “the soul” was an attractive and mysterious idea from which philosophers justifiably parted only with reluctance — perhaps that which they are now learning to exchange for it is even more attractive, more mysterious. The human body, in which the entire most distant and most recent past of all organic development again becomes lively and embodied, through which and over and beyond which a tremendous inaudible stream appears to flow: the body is a more amazing idea than the ancient “soul.” 36[36]° At all times people have believed better in the body as our most certain being, in sum as the ego, than in the spirit (or the “soul” or “the subject,” as school discourse now says instead of soul). No one ever hatched the notion that his stomach could be understood as a foreign, perhaps divine stomach: but his thoughts as “given from beyond,” his valuations as “inspired by a god,” comprehending his instincts as demonic activity: for this tendency and taste of human beings there are testimonies from all the ages of humanity. Even today, especially among artists, there is abundant evidence of a kind of amazement and reverential suspension of judgment when they are presented with the question of how they succeeded in their best throw [Page 137] 130 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS and from which world the creative idea came to them: when they ask in this manner, they have something like innocence and childish shame, they scarcely dare to say “this came from me, this was my hand that threw the dice.” — Conversely, even those philosophers and religious people who had the most compelling grounds in their logic and piety to take their corporeality as a deception, and indeed as an overcome and dispensed-with deception, were not able to avoid recognizing the stupid fact that the body has not gone away: for which the most remarkable testimony is to be found partly in Paul, partly in the Vedanta philosophy. But what ultimately does strength of belief mean! Therefore it could still be a very stupid belief! — What needs contemplating here: — And in the end, if the belief in the body is only the result of an inference: supposing it were a false inference, as the idealists maintain: is it not a question mark against the credibility of the spirit itself that it is the cause of such false inferences? Supposing multiplicity, and space and time and motion (and whatever else may be the presuppositions of a belief in corporeality) were errors, what suspicion will be aroused against the spirit by that which occasioned such presuppositions in us! Enough, the belief in the body is for the time being still a stronger belief than the belief in the spirit; and whoever wants to undermine it, at the same time most thoroughly also undermines the belief in the authority of the spirit. 361571" I. Human All Too Human: with this title the will to a great separation is signaled, the attempt of an individual to free himself from all kinds of prejudices that speak in favor of human beings and to walk all paths that lead high enough, at least for a moment, to look down on humans. Not to despise the despicable in humans, but instead to question deep down to the ultimate grounds whether even in the highest and the [Page 138] 36 JUNE-JULY 1885 131 best and in everything of which humans so far have been proud, whether in this pride itself and the harmless superficial confidence of its valuations there is not something still left to despise; this not innocuous task was one means among all the means to which a greater, a more comprehensive task compelled me. Does anyone want to walk these paths with me? I advise no one to do so. — But you want to? Then let's go. 36[38] Goethe is an exception: he lived among Germans in a subtle manner sheltered and disguised; Schiller belongs to those Germans who loved the big gleaming words and pomp gestures of virtue (— even his taste for Kantian morality and its absolute command-tone belongs here —) It hurts the Germans to admit to themselves how much they have been the Germans of Kotzebue" (and to a good extent not yet —); and that life-threatening fanatic Sand perhaps only took his revenge in the wrong place, as so often happens. Jans(syen 36[39] If there is anything that accrues to the honor of contemporary Germans it is that they no longer tolerate the big gleaming glittering Schillerian words that their grandfathers — — — 36[40] The small German towns as Kotzebue painted them — and the painting was good — are made in the image of Weimardwellers, at the time of Schiller and Goethe. 36[41] The pettiness and pitifulness of the German soul, its partly hedonistic, partly jealous sitting-in-the-corner, its incarnate "small town atmosphere," to invoke Kotzebue, its "frog-perspective" for all higher things, to use the language of

painters — how painful — — — [Page 139] 132 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 36[42] If intellect, industriousness and capability alone were considered, the Prussian Jews would already be in possession of the higher state offices, especially in the administrative sector: in sum, they would also have the “power” in their hands (just as they already have it — judging by manifold evidence — “in their pockets”). What excludes them from this is their inability to represent power: the Jews even in their fatherland have not been a ruling caste: their eye does not convince, their tongue easily runs too swiftly and trips itself up, their anger does not know the deep honest roaring of a lion, their stomach does not tolerate great feasting and their understanding does not tolerate strong wine — their arms and legs do not permit them any proud affects (often twitching in their hands is I know not what kind of — memory —); and even the manner in which a Jew mounts a horse (or a Jewish musician arrives at his theme — “the Jewish leap” —) is not innocuous and lets us know that the Jews have never been a knightly race. If the Jews are frequently perceived as unfit for the dignity of serving as judges, then what is condemned here is not their morality, but only their inability to represent this morality. Now from this it immediately follows that the Jew of Prussia must be a diminished and atrophied kind of Jew; for in itself the Oriental understands representation incomparably better than, say, a north German: — Delacroix. This degeneration of the Jew is connected to a wrong climate and being neighbors of ugly and oppressed Slavs Hungarians and Germans: among Portuguese and Moors the higher race of Jews is preserved, indeed on the whole the solemnity of tone and a kind of sanctifying of passion has perhaps never on earth been more beautifully portrayed than by certain Jews of the Old Testament: even the Greeks could have learned something from them! 36143] The dangers of the Jewish soul are: 1) it seeks to nest itself parasitically somewhere 2) it knows how to “adapt,” as the [Page 14] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 7 34[28] Superstition: to believe in the being,” in the absolute, in pure spirit, in absolute knowledge, in absolute value, in the thing in itself! These approaches are riddled with a contradictio everywhere. 34129] Skeptical Objections. 34130] Perception on the part of our senses happens to us unconsciously: everything that becomes conscious to us is already processed perceptions 34[31] He makes the great detachment for himself — not because he demands it of others or even sees it as his duty to communicate it to and force it on others. 34132] The great millennia-long ebb in the invention of values 34[33]” The Lawgivers of the Future. 1. Descent. 2. The Most Bound Spirit. 3. The Great Detachment. 4. Suffering from Human Beings. 5. The New Will. 6. The Hammer. 34134] My version of acedia*® — the opposite of that of the monks. I am perturbed about my overly large compassion: I am pleased when my ego is alert and in good spirits.” [Page 140] 36 JUNE-JULY 1885 133 natural scientists say, in this manner they “have become born actors, like the octopus,” which as Theognis sings, borrows its color from the cliff to which it adheres.’ Their talent and even more their tendency and inclination to both seem tremendous; their habit of expending much spirit and persistence on very small gains has left a fateful furrow in their character: so that even the most respectable wholesalers of the Jewish money market cannot bring themselves, if the circumstances warrant, to (not) cold-bloodedly reach for little mesquinen^{TM4} overcharges of the kind that would make a Prussian financier blush. 36[44] The future of German culture rests on the sons of Prussian officers 36[45]”° A. The Jews the oldest and purest race. Beauty of the women. B. The Jews the actors: in a democratic age: reduction of the literary man to the actor C. Problem of merging the European aristocracy or rather the young Prussian nobleman with Jewesses. 36[46] German atheism. the school master culture. German pessimism. 36[47] The dangers of the Jewish soul: parasitism and acting The Jew does not “represent” The school master culture. German pessimism. The hermit: Teutonomania. German music. The literary men. [Page 141] 134 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS The women. Mistrust of modern ideas. German anarchism. 36[48] Hostility toward everything that smacks of literary men and popular enlightenment, especially toward everything that ruins women, deforms women — for spiritual enlightenment is an infallible means of making humans insecure, weaker willed, more dependent and needy of support, in sum of developing the herd animal in human beings: which is why so far all great artists of governing (Confucius in China, the imperium romanum, Napoleon, the papacy at the time when it successfully had power and not only the will to power where the ruling instinct culminated so far, also made use of spiritual enlightenment; at least they allowed it to reign (like the popes of the Renaissance) The self-deception of the masses on this point e.g., in all democracies, is extremely valuable: the diminution and governability of humans is striven for as “progress”! 36[49]”* On German Pessimism. — Dimming, pessimistic coloring necessarily follow as a result of the Enlightenment. Around 1770 one already noticed a decrease in cheerfulness; women believed, with that feminine instinct that always sides with virtue, that immorality was to blame: Galiani hit the mark: he quotes Voltaire’s verse’ — If I now presume to be out in front of Voltaire and even Galiani — who was something much profounder — by a couple of centuries in terms of enlightenment: how far therefore must I have come in terms of dimming! This is also true: and early on I was cautious with a kind of regret of German and Christian narrowness and the logical inconsistency of Schopenhauerian or even Leopardian pessimism and looked for the most principled forms (— Asia —) I do not count E(duard) vlon} H(artmann) among the continuators of pessimism, on the contrary among the “pleasant [Page 142] 36 JUNE-JULY 1885 135 literatures” — — — etc. But in order to bear this extreme pessimism (as it echoes forth from time to time from my Birth of Tragedy) living alone “without

God and morality,” I had to invent a counterpart for myself. Perhaps I know best why only humans laugh: they alone suffer so deeply that they had to invent laughter. The unhappy and melancholy animal is, as is only fair, the most cheerful. 36[50] On the German Lyric Poets, — 36[51] South and East. 36[52] Brahms, no “event,” no exception, no breach in the chain before Wagner, on the contrary one link more, a — — — If one excludes what he occasionally sacrificed so to speak to a hospitable genius of foreign ways and human beings — also sacrifices of piety for great teachers, old and new, included — then he alone is the musician who so far has claim to the characterization “the north German musician” 36[53]° The Germans are nothing yet, but they are becoming something; therefore they still have no culture — therefore they cannot yet have a culture! This is my proposition: let it offend whomever it must: namely whoever has Teutonomania in his head (or on his shield)! — They are nothing yet: that is: they are everything. They are becoming something: that is, they will someday stop being everything. The latter is at bottom only a wish, scarcely still a hope; fortunately a wish according to which one can live, a matter of will, of work, of discipline, of cultivation as well as a matter of unwillingness, of longing, of renunciation, of discontent, even of embitterment: in sum, we Germans want something that before us no one yet has wanted — we want something more! [Page 143] 136 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS That this “German who becomes and not yet is” — deserves something better than today’s German “education,” that all “who are becoming” have to be enraged wherever they perceive a satisfaction in this sphere, a brazen “resting on one’s laurels” or “anointing oneself”: this is my second proposition, concerning which I have also not changed my thinking. 36[54] How a theologian today can have a good conscience with his Christianness is incomprehensible and inaccessible to me; but there is adequate good conscience in him — it seems there must not be much to this “good conscience”! 36[55]* “German.” Questions and Dashes. Thoughts on Discipline and Cultivation. 36[56] Offended pride, annoyance at having loved where one could have despised, an added melancholy over the resulting emptiness and gap, finally the bite of intellectual vanity that said “you let yourself be cheated” — : this was the next experience. But a philosophical human being drives all he has experienced into the universal, all that is individual grows into chains 36[57] The Asiatic h(umans) are a hundred times more magnificent than the European 36[58] The jungle-vegetation “human being” always appears where the struggle for power has been waged longest. The great humans. [Page 144] 36 JUNE-JULY 1885 137 36[59] Even the development of the highest forms of intelligence has been cultivated under unfreedom and counter-pressure. So far we have nothing to thank the “liberal spirit” for. One underestimates what refinement for the spirit has accompanied the agony of conscience of a simultaneously Christian and scientific-logical interpretation of the world. 36[60] “On the Critique of the Modern Soul.” [Page 145] [37 = W I 6a. June-July 1885] 371]! Many a hearty objection could be made to that which I dare to present in this book, certainly from up close, and even more from a distance. I have anticipated one part of these objections myself, thanks to my manifold practice in interrogating and in dueling with myself but unfortunately I have also always answered them in advance: so that up till now the entire burden of my “truths” has rested on me. One will understand that it has been a matter of burdensome truths here; and if there is one faith that makes us blessed, well then, here is a faith that does not do that! But why should things be organized t(o) bring us pleasure? — Even though precisely this time, speaking frankly, I would enjoy the pleasure of being refuted. — And if on the other hand knowledge — — — us, what is knowledge for? — Ultimately perhaps this, too, is only a question of time: in the end we get along even with the devil. And if things are not supposed to be organized to bring us pleasure, who could prevent us from — organizing them to that end? 37[2]” It is bad taste to want to agree with many. At bottom my friend Satis is enough for me: surely you know who that is? Satis sunt mihi pauci, satis est unus, satis est nullus? And in the end this is what remains: the great things are left over and preserved [Page 146] 37 JUNE-JULY 1885 139 for the great, the abysses for the profound, the delicacies and shudders for the refined, and on the whole and in sum, everything rare for the rare. My judgment is my judgment: anyone else does not easily have a right to it. — And you, my dear Mr. Neighbor, you who are just now peeking over my shoulder at my book, you even insist on agreeing with me on this? You look into this book and say Yes to it? Away with you! I absolutely do not want to become suspicious, on account of you, of what I just wrote. For I, too, love truth, like all philosophers: all philosophers so far loved their truths — — 37[3]* I forgot to say that such philosophers are cheerful and that they like to sit in the abyss of a perfectly bright sky: — they need different means to endure life than other people, for they suffer differently: (namely just as much from the profundity of their contempt for humans, as from their love). — The most suffering animal on earth invented for itself —/aughter. 3714] Morality and Physiology. — We consider it a hastiness that precisely human consciousness has been regarded for so long as the highest stage of organic development and as the most amazing of all earthly things, indeed as their blossom and “goal” so to speak. What is more amazing on the contrary is the body: one cannot cease to admire how the human body has become possible: how such a tremendous unity of living beings can grow and for a time exist, each one dependent and subservient and yet in a certain sense on the other hand commanding and acting from its own will — : and this occurs obviously not through consciousness! Compared to this “wonder of wonders” consciousness is just a “tool” and no more — in the same sense that the stomach is a tool for it. The magnificent binding together of the most manifold life, the order and arrangement of the higher and lower activities, the thousand-fold obedience which is not a blind, even less a mechanistic but rather a selecting, [Page 147] 140 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS circumspect, considerate, even resisting obedience — this whole phenomenon “body,” measured by intellectual standards, is as much superior to our consciousness, our “spirit,” our conscious thinking, feeling, willing as algebra is to multiplication tables. The “nerve- and brain-apparatus” for producing thinking, feeling, willing in the first place is not as subtle and “divinely” constructed: on the contrary to me it seems that precisely for this, for thinking, feeling, willing, really no “apparatus” at all is needed, rather that this, this precisely — is “the thing itself.” On the contrary a tremendous synthesis of living beings and intellects such as this, which is called “human being,” will only be able to live when that subtle connecting- and mediating system, and through it lightning-fast communication among all these higher and lower beings are created — and moreover exclusively by living mediators: but this is a moral and not a mechanistic problem! Today we have forbidden ourselves to fantasize about “unity,” about the “soul,” about the “person”: with such hypotheses we only complicate the problem, so much is clear. And even those smallest living beings that constitute our body (more accurately: whose working-together is the best metaphor for that which we call “body” —) are not regarded by us as soul-atoms, but instead as something growing, struggling, self-increasing and again dying out: so that their number changes erratically, and our life like any life is simultaneously a continuous dying. Therefore there are as many “consciousnesses” in a human being as there are beings, in every moment of his existence, that constitute his body. What we usually conceive of as a singular “consciousness,” the intellect, is distinguished precisely by the fact that it remains protected and closed off from the innumerable multiplicity in the experiences of these multiple consciousnesses and, as a consciousness of a higher order, as a ruling multiplicity and aristocracy, it is presented with only a selection of experiences, moreover only those that are simplified and rendered surveyable and comprehensible, hence falsified experiences — so that for its part it can [Page 148] 37 JUNE-JULY 1885 141 continue this process of simplifying and rendering surveyable, hence of falsifying, and can prepare that which we commonly call “a will” — each such act of will presupposes as it were the appointment of a dictator. But that which presents this selection to our intellect, which already simplified, compared, interpreted the experiences in advance, is in any case not this intellect: just as little as it is that which executes the will, which picks up a pale, thin and extremely imprecise value- and power-representation and translates it into living power and precise value-standards. And precisely the same kind of operation that plays out here must continuously play out on all deeper levels in the behavior of all these higher and lower beings toward one another: this same selecting and presenting of experiences, this abstracting and thinking in unison, this willing, this translating back of the always very imprecise willing into precise activity. Using the body as a guide, as I mentioned, we learn that our life is only possible through an interplay of many intelligences of very unequal value and therefore only through a constant thousand-fold obeying and commanding — morally spoken: through the incessant exercise of many virtues. And how could one cease to speak morally! — Prattling in this manner I surrendered myself in unbridled fashion to my didactic streak, for I was blissful to have someone who could tolerate listening to me. And yet, at precisely this point Ariadne could tolerate it no longer — you see, the story took place during my first stay on Naxos — : “but sir,” she said, “you are speaking Pig-German!” — “German,” I answered cheerfully, “simply German! Leave the pig out, my dear goddess! You underestimate the difficulty of saying subtle things in German!” — “Subtle things!” cried Ariadne, appalled: “but that was just positivism! Philosophizing with tusks! Conceptual-mishmash and muck from a hundred philosophies! What is that supposed to mean!” — and here she played impatiently with her famous thread, which once guided her Theseus through the labyrinth. — Thus it came to light that Ariadne was around two millennia behind in her philosophical education. [Page 149] 142 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 3715] In books of aphorisms like mine strictly forbidden lengthy things and thought-chains stand between and behind short aphorisms; and some of it may be questionable enough for Oedipus and his sphinx. I do not write essays: they are for asses and readers of newspapers. Speeches even less. My Unfashionable Observations I aimed as a young person at young people to whom I spoke of my experiences and vows, in order to lure them into my labyrinth — at German youths: but I have been persuaded to believe that German youths have died out. Well then: now I no longer have any reason to be “eloquent” in that former manner; today — I would probably no longer be able to do it. Whoever has sat together days a(nd) nights and year-in, year-out with his soul in the most intimate discord and dialogue, whoever in his cave — it could be a labyrinth a(nd) also a gold mine — turned into a cave-bear or gold digger, whoever like me allowed and allows all kinds of thoughts, second thoughts and questionable matters to run through his head and over his heart, which he would not always communicate, even if he had kindred spirits and boisterous brave comrades around him: even his concepts ultimately acquire their own twilight color, an aroma as much of profundity as of mold; something incommunicable and recalcitrant that chills any curious bystander: — and a hermit-philosophy, even if it were written with a lion’s claw, would still only look like a philosophy of “quotation marks.” 37(6)° In the writings of a hermit one also hears something of the echo of the wasteland, something of whispered tones and the shy looking-around of loneliness: his strongest words and even screams still sound as it were like a new and more dangerous kind of silence, of concealment. 371717 Supposing one were to imagine a philosopher as a great educator, powerful enough to stand on his lonely heights and pull long chains of generations up to him: then one would also [Page 15] 8

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 34135] 1. Abelard wanted to bring reason to ecclesiastical authority: ultimately Descartes found that all authority resides in reason only.” 2. The self-overcoming of reason inner problem of Pascal — for the sake of Christian “faith.” 34[36] The problem of “faith” is actually: whether instinct has more value than reasoning, and why! Beneath the many disputes over “knowledge and faith,” utilitarianism) and intuitionism this question of value estimation is concealed. Socrates naively sided with reason, against instinct. (At bottom though he had indeed followed all moral instincts, only with a false motivation: as if the motives came from reason. Likewise Plato etc.)

Involuntarily Plato sought to demonstrate that reason and instinct want the same. Likewise up till today Kant, Schopenhauer, the English. In “faith” the instinct of obedience toward the highest authority is uppermost, therefore a single instinct. The categorical imperative is a desired instinct, where this instinct and reason are one. 34137] Kant, a subtle mind, a pedantic soul 34[38] NB. I should be forgiven this presumptuous assertion: precisely because I have a higher and deeper, also more scientific conception of woman than the emancipators and emancipatresses have of her, I resist emancipation: I know better where their strength is and say to them: “they know not what they do.”” They are dissolving their instincts! with their strivings of today. [Page 150] 37 JUNE-JULY 1885 143 have to grant him the uncanny prerogatives of the great educator. An educator never says what he himself is thinking, but always only what he thinks about a thing in relation to its use to the one he is educating. He must not be detected in this dissemblance; it is part of his mastery that we believe in his honesty. He must be capable of all means of discipline and castigation: some natures he advances only through the whiplashes of scorn, others, lethargic, indecisive, cowardly, vain, perhaps with exaggerated praise. Such an educator is beyond good and evil; but no one is allowed to know it. 37[8]° It is approaching, irrefutably, hesitatingly, terrible as fate, the great task and question: how should the earth as a whole be governed? And for what should “the human being” as a whole — and no longer a people, a race — be bred and cultivated? The legislative moralities are the major means by which one can shape the human into what a creative and profound will prefers: supposing that such an artist-will of the highest order holds the power in his hands and can assert his creating will over long stretches of time, in the form of legislations, religions and customs. Such humans of great creativity, the truly great human as I understand it, will be sought in vain today and probably for a long time to come: they are missing — : until finally, after much disappointment, one has to begin to understand why they are missing and that there is nothing more hostile standing in the way of their emergence and development for now and for a long time than what today is straightforwardly called “the morality” in Europe: as if no other existed and no other were allowed to exist — that herd-morality referred to earlier, which strives with all its powers for universal green pasture-happiness on earth, namely security, absence of danger, comfort, ease of living and to top it off, “if all goes well,” even hopes to get rid of every kind of shepherd and bellwether. Its two most abundantly preached doctrines are: “equal rights” and “sympathy for all who suffer” [Page 151] 144 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS — and suffering itself is construed by them as something that must absolutely be abolished. That such “ideas” can still be modern sends a bad message about — — — But whoever has thoroughly reflected on where and how the plant human being has so far grown most robustly, has to surmise that this occurred under the reverse conditions: that for this the danger of its situation must grow immensely, its power of invention and dissimulation must struggle to the top under long pressure and compulsion, its life-will must be intensified to the point of unconditional will to power and to super-power, and that danger, harshness, violence, danger in the streets a(nd) in the heart, inequality of rights, stealth, stoicism, tempter-arts, a(nd) devilishness of every kind, in sum, the opposite of all herd-desiderata are essential for the elevation of the type human being. A morality with such inverted aims, that seeks to cultivate humans into the heights, instead of into comfort and mediocrity, a morality with the aim of cultivating a ruling caste — the future rulers of the earth — must, in order to be taught, introduce itself in association with the existing moral code and under its words and appearances; but that for this many transition- and deception-methods have to be invented, and that, because the lifespan of a single human means practically nothing with respect to the execution of such long-term tasks and aims, above all first a new species must be cultivated, in which that specific will, that specific instinct will be guaranteed longevity through many generations: a new ruler-species and caste — this is just as understandable as the long and not easy to articulate et cetera of this thought. To prepare an inversion of values for a specific strong species of human of the highest spirituality and will-power and for this purpose to slowly and cautiously unleash in them a large quantity of reined-in and slandered instincts: whoever reflects on this belongs among us, to the free spirits — to be sure to a newer kind of “free spirit” than previous ones: for the latter desired roughly the opposite. To this group belong, it seems to me, above all the pessimists of Europe, the poets and thinkers of an outraged idealism, insofar as their [Page 152] 37 JUNE-JULY 1885 145 dissatisfaction with existence on the whole also forces them at least logically into dissatisfaction with the current human; likewise certain insatiably ambitious artists who heedlessly and unconditionally fight for the special rights of higher humans and against “the herd animal,” and who, using the seductive methods of art, lull to sleep all herd instincts and herd caution in the more select spirits; thirdly, finally, all those critics and historians by whom the successfully begun discovery of the old world — it is the work of the new Columbus, of the German spirit — is courageously continued — for we are still at the beginning of this conquest. For in the ancient world there ruled indeed a different, a more ruler-oriented morality than today; and the ancient human under the educating sway of his morality was a stronger and deeper human than the human of today: — he alone so far was “the human who turned out well.” However, the seduction that is exerted by antiquity on humans who have turned out well, i.e., on strong and enterprising souls, is even today the finest and most effective of all antidemocratic and antichristian seductions: as it was already at the time of the Renaissance. 37[9]° I see beyond all these national wars, new “empires” and whatever else stands in the foreground: what concerns me — for I see it preparing itself slowly and hesitatingly — this is the One Europe. Among all more comprehensive and profound humans of this century the real total work of their soul was to prepare that new synthesis and to experimentally anticipate “the European” of the future: only in their weaker hours, or when they became old, did they fall back into the national narrowness of their “fatherlands” — then they were “patriots.” I am thinking of people like Napoleon, Goethe, Beethoven, Stendhal, Heinrich Heine, Schopenhauer; perhaps Richard Wagner also belongs here, about whom, a type of German obscurity who turned out well, absolutely nothing can be said without such a “perhaps.” But by way of explanation, standing [Page 153] 146

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS alongside that which stirs and takes shape in such spirits as a need for a new unity or already is a new unity with new needs, is a great economic fact: the small states of Europe, I mean all our current states and “empires,” must in a short time become economically untenable given the absolute drive of big commerce and trade for a final limit, for world commerce and world trade. (Money alone is already forcing Europe to gather itself together into a single power at some time.) But in order to join the struggle for governing the earth with decent prospects — it is plain as day against whom this struggle will be aimed — Europe probably needs to come to a serious “understanding” with England: the colonies of England are needed for that struggle just as much as today’s Germany needs the colonies of Holland for practicing its new mediator and broker role.!° For no one believes anymore that England itself is strong enough to maintain its old role for even fifty years; it will be destroyed by the impossibility of excluding the homines novi from government, and there must be no such change of parties if these long-lasting things are to be — — — today one must first be a soldier in order not to lose one’s credit as a merchant. Enough: in this as in other things the next century will be found in the footsteps of Napoleon, the foremost and most highly anticipatory human being of modern times. For the tasks of the next centuries “public” and parliamentarianism are the least suitable forms of organization. 37 [10]!? I differentiate, among superior humans as well as among peoples, those who want to have the world round, whole and firm — big perhaps, very big but whole and not at all “infinite” — and those who love the clouds: because clouds veil, because clouds make us “intuit.” To the latter, among peoples, belong the Germans; and therefore it is not advisable for a thinker of the opposite disposition to build his cottage among them. The air is too cloudy for him there. German “simplicity,” German faith in the “pure fool”: he always translates that into French [Page 154] 37 JUNE-JULY 1885 147 and calls it /a niaiserie allemande.³ The German “mind”:⁴ by that he literally means what Goethe meant by it: “Indulgence toward weaknesses of others and oneself.” German bad taste: he finds it hair-raising, — I had an opportunity once to point this out in the case of a senile book by Strauss. Seen from abroad, one is allowed to doubt whether Germany can come up now with ten men who are discerning in matters of literary form and have profundity. For profundity is necessary in order to grasp the delicate needs for form generally; only from the depths, from the abyss does one enjoy all the happiness found in bright, confident, colorful, superficial things of all kinds. But the Germans believe they are profound when they feel grave and melancholy: — they sweat when they think, sweating to them is regarded as proof of their “seriousness.” Their spirits are clumsy, the spirit of beer is powerful even in their thoughts — and this they even call their “idealism”! To be sure, the Germans, at least as they themselves believe, have taken precisely this idealism far, “as far as the stars,” and they might be allowed, if only German modesty permitted, to boldly seat themselves beside the Greeks in this regard, as the famous people of “poets and thinkers.” Or, to let this self-confidence speak immodestly for once, and moreover in the verses of a great idealist: “Why praise the Greeks to excess! “They must slink into darkness, “When softly stirs the German muse. “Horace in Flemming simmers, “In Opitz Naso shimmers, “In Greiff the gloom of Seneca.” Leibniz. 3701)” Socialism — as a form of tyranny of the paltriest and stupidest, of the shallow, of the jealous and the three-quarters-actors, thought through to the end — is in fact the ultimate conclusion of modern ideas and their latent anarchism: but in the tepid air of democratic well-being the capacity for coming to conclusions or even coming [Page 155] 148 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS to conclusion withers away. One follows — but one no longer draws conclusions. Therefore socialism on the whole is a hopeless, sour affair: and nothing is more fun to watch than the contradiction between the poisonous and desperate faces made by today’s socialists — and what pitiful crushed emotions are betrayed by their style! — and the harmless little-lamb-happiness of their hopes and desires. In many places in Europe it can lead to occasional coups and attacks on their part: the next century will thoroughly “rumble” here and there in its stomach, and the Paris Commune, which also has its mouthpieces and advocates in Germany (e.g. in the philosophical grimace-maker and swamp-salamander E(u)gen D(ü)hring in Berlin), was possibly only a milder case of indigestion, compared to what is coming. Nevertheless there will always be too many property owners for socialism to be anything more than an attack of sickness: and these property owners are to a man of one belief: “you have to own something to be something.” But this is the oldest and healthiest of all instincts: I would add “you have to want more than you have in order to become more.” For thus rings the doctrine that is preached by life itself to everything that lives: the morality of development. Possessing and wanting to have more, in a word, growth — this is life itself. In the doctrine of socialism a “will to denial of life” is badly concealed; it has to be failed humans or races who think up such a doctrine. Indeed, I wish it would be demonstrated by a few big experiments that in a socialist society life denies itself} cuts off its own roots. The earth is big enough, and human beings are still unexhausted enough, that a practical lesson and demonstratio ad absurdum’? of this kind still has to seem desirable to me, even if it were gained and paid with a tremendous expenditure of human life. Still, even as the restless mole under the soil of a society rolling into stupidity, socialism can be something useful and healing: it delays “peace on earth” and the whole good-nature-izing of the democratic herd animal, it forces Europeans to preserve spirit, namely cunning and caution, to not entirely swear off the manly and warrior virtues, and to maintain a modicum of spirit — of clarity, dryness and coldness of the spirit [Page 156] 37 JUNE-JULY 1885 149 — it protects Europe for the time being from the marasmus femininus” that threatens it. 37 [12] In the main matter I consider the artists to be right more than all philosophers so far: they did not lose the great trail on which life walks, they loved the things “of this world” — they loved their senses. To strive for desensualization: that seems to me a misunderstanding or an illness or a cure, where it is not merely hypocrisy or self-deception. I wish for myself and for all those who live, who are allowed to live — without the anxieties of a Puritan-conscience an ever greater spiritualization and multiplication of the senses; indeed we want to be grateful to the senses for their subtlety, fullness and power, and in exchange offer them the best of the spirit that we have. What do the priestly and metaphysical denunciations of the senses concern us! We no longer need this denunciation: it is a sign of having turned out well when someone clings like Goethe with ever greater joy and heartiness to “the things of the world”: — for that is the way he holds on to the great conception of the human being, that the human being becomes the transfigurer of existence when he learns to transfigure himself.2? — But what are you saying? someone objects. Are not precisely today the worst pessimists among the artists) What do you think for example of Richard Wagner? Is that not a pessimist? — I have to rub my ears: (you are right, I forgot something for a moment.) 37113] Historians today want too much and they all sin against good taste: they force themselves into the souls of humans to whose rank and in whose company they do not belong. What for example does such an agitated sweating plebeian like Michelet have to do with Napoleon! It makes no difference whether he hates or loves him, but because he sweats, he does not belong in his vicinity. What does that mediocre animal, elegant in the [Page 157] 150 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS worst sense of the word, have to do with this same Napoleon! he makes us laugh, the little man, when he measures the great man against Caesar, Hannibal and Frederick with the mien of a wise judge. I value it higher when someone acknowledges even as a historian when the ground is too hot or too holy for his foot; but a historian who “removes his shoes” at the right time, or puts them on and walks away is a rare bird today, in this age of ingenuous shamelessness. The German historians among whom the “historical sense” was invented — now the French are rehearsing it — reveal, each and every one of them, that they do not come from a ruling caste: as knowing ones they are intrusive and show a lack of finer shame. 37[14] I have named my unconscious workers and way-pavers. But where could I seek with a bit of hope for my kind of philosopher himself, at least for my need for new philosophers? Only where a noble way of thinking reigns, one that believes in slavery and in many degrees of bondage as the prerequisite of any higher culture; where a creative way of thinking reigns, which does not set the world’s goal as the happiness of repose, the “Sabbath of all Sabbaths” and honors peace itself as a means to new wars; a way of thinking that prescribes laws for the future, which treats itself and everything of the present harshly and tyrannically for the sake of the future; a heedless, “immoral” way of thinking that wants to cultivate to greatness the good and wicked qualities of humans equally, because it trusts in its strength to deploy both in the right place — in the place where both are essential to one another. But whoever seeks philosophers in this manner today, what prospects does he have to find what he seeks? Is it not probable that he, searching with the best Diogenes-lantern, would run around day and night in vain? Our age has the opposite instincts: above all and in the first place it wants comfort; secondly it wants publicity and that grand noise of actors, that grand boom-boom that corresponds to its fairground-taste; thirdly it wants everyone to [Page 158] 37 JUNE-JULY 1885 II crawl on their belly in deepest subservience before the greatest of all lies — this lie is called “equality of human beings” — and it honors exclusively the virtues that make equal and assign equal rights. But in this way our age fundamentally opposes the emergence of the philosopher as I understand him, even though it believes in all innocence that it promotes him. Indeed, everyone today is lamenting about how bad the philosophers used to have it, jammed between the stake, bad conscience and presumptuous church father wisdom: but the truth is that precisely these circumstances provided for more favorable conditions for the education of a powerful, comprehensive, devious and audaciously daring spirituality than the conditions of contemporary life. Today a different kind of spirit, namely the demagoguespirit, the actor-spirit, perhaps even the beaver- and ant-spirit of scholars has favorable conditions for its emergence. But for superior artists things are already even worse; for do not almost all of them perish from an inner lack of discipline? They are no longer tyrannized from the outside by the absolute value tablets of a church or a court: so they no longer learn to nurture their “inner tyrant,” their will. And what is true of artists is true in a higher and more fateful sense of philosophers. After all, where are the free spirits today? Just show me a free spirit today!?? — Well, let’s not talk too loudly! Solitude today is full of secrets and more solitude than ever. — — Indeed, I learned in the meantime that the free spirit has to be a hermit. 3715]? Another demagogical talent of our time is Richard Wagner: but he belongs in Germany. — Really? Let an opposing estimation have a chance to speak for once. The Parisians may block and bristle against Wagner as much as they want: in the end he belongs more in Paris than to G(ermany), and in any case more in it than in any other capital of Europe. Admittedly, the kind of French who are most closely related to him might have become scarce even there: — I mean those offspring of the romantisme” of the thirties, among whom he wanted to live in [Page 159] 152 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS the most decisive period of his life. There he felt more related to and at home with himself than in Germany, with his tremendous appetite for exotic smells and colors and untested new excesses of the sublime, with his sunless, tortured happiness in the discovery of the ugly and the horrific. What else did these romantics seek, what else did they find and invent‘ besides Richard Wagner? Were they not all intelligently sick like him, violent and unsure of themselves, dominated by literature up to their eyes and ears, most of them even writers, poets, artists of expression at any cost — I make an exception for Delacroix — mediators and collectors of the arts and the senses themselves, jumped-up plebeians who, like Balzac, showed (themselves) to be insatiable in their longing to shine and for fame and incapable of a noble tempo in living and creating — of a lento —? We should just admit it to ourselves: how much Wagnerian there is indeed to this French romanticism! Even that hysterical-erotic feature that Wagner especially loved in woman and set to music is best at home precisely in Paris: just ask the psychiatrists — ; and among the women of Paris, better than anywhere else, there is “appreciation” for the hy pnotizing tricks and laying-on of hands with which our musical magus and Cagliostro compels and persuades his little women to lustful sleep-walking with open eyes and closed minds. The proximity of pathological desires, the ardor of senses gone raving mad, where one’s gaze is deceived in a dangerous way by mists and veils of the supersensual: where does this belong more than in the romanticism of the French soul! Here a magic is at work that will yet inevitably convert even the Parisians to Wagner. — But Wagner is supposed to be the thoroughly German artist: thus it is decreed today in Germany, thus he is venerated in a time that once again elevates boastful Teutomania. This “genuine German” Wagner does not exist at all: I suspect he is the spawn of very dark German youths and virgins who want to glorify themselves with this decree. It is probable enough that something in Wagner might be German: but what? Perhaps only the degree, not the quality of his willing and talents? [Page 16] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 9 34139] Bentham and utilitarianism depend on Helvétius — he is the last great event in morality. In German philosophy (Kant Schopenhauer) it is still “duty” or “instinct of compassion” — the old problems since Socrates (i.e., stoicism or Christianity, aristocracy of the individual or goodness of the herd) 34/40] I need a) someone to watch over my stomach b) someone who can laugh with me and has a boisterous spirit. c) someone who is proud of my company a(nd) “the other” also maintains the proper façon® of respect toward me d) someone who reads to me without dumbing down a book 34[41] Plaire? — the great secret of the French will, and at bottom of herd morality. “To have compassion,” altruism, are the Aypocritical expressions for it.® 34142] NB. So far most artists (including the historians), even some of the greatest, belonged among the servants (whether of classes or princes or women or “masses”), not to mention their dependency on the Church and moral law. Thus Rubens produced portraits of the noble world of his time, but according to the taste it had in mind, not according to Ais standard of beauty — on the whole therefore against his taste. In this van Dyck was nobler: who added to all those whom he painted something of that which he valued most highly in himself: he did not step down, rather up to himself when he “reproduced” something. The slavish subservience of the artist before his public (as Sebastian Bach himself expresses it in immortally offensive words in [Page 160] 37 JUNE-JULY 1885 153 Perhaps only that he made everything stronger, richer, more daring, harsher than any Frenchman of the nineteenth century could make it? That he was more severe toward himself and for the longest part of his life he lived in the German way, on his own initiative as an implacable atheist, antinomist and immoralist? That he created the figure of a very free human being, of Siegfried, who in fact may be too free, too harsh, too cheerful, too unchristian for the Latin taste? — Of course in the end he knew how to make up for even this sin against French romanticism: the late W(agner) in his old age with his Siegfried-caricature, I mean with his Parsifal, accommodated not only Roman taste but downright Roman-Catholic taste: until ultimately he went so far as to genuflect before the cross and bid his farewell with a not ineloquent thirst for “the blood of the redeemer.” Farewell from himself too! For among romantics who have grown old there is an unpleasant rule that at the end of their life they “renounce” and disavow themselves and — cross out — their own life! — Finally let me ask: if that generation of the thirties in its blood and nerves was the heir and even more the victim of those tragic convulsions of the Napoleonic period — Beethoven served as the prelude to this generation in sounds and Byron in words — is it not permitted to think of a similar lineage of the soul for Richard Wagner? He was born in 1813. 37[16] I observe that among those who now travel around in the world, no one likes to see himself regarded as a Frenchman if this is not what he is. To be considered an Englishman appears to be a source of pleasure for some northerners, e.g., the Swedes: the Englishman is proud. The German abroad now enjoys a boost of amazement and respect, compared to earlier times, but he is no pleasure; the Prussian in particular is still awkward in the southern countries of Europe, not because of his pride — for he is not proud — rather because of his immodesty and his bad, harsh, often obtrusive manners. The southern German is clumsy, peasant-like, good-natured and [Page 161] 154 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS yet not trust-inspiring: with him one senses the famous “two souls in one breast.”⁶ 37117”) One cannot think highly enough of women: but that is no reason to think falsely of them. In this one needs to be thoroughly on one’s guard. That they themselves would be in a position to enlighten men about “the eternal feminine” is improbable; perhaps they are too close to themselves for this — and moreover all this enlightening itself — at least up till now — has been a man’s affair and man’s skill. Finally one should reserve a good mistrust for everything that women write about woman: namely in case quite involuntarily a woman, even when she writes, ultimately must not do what — up till now at least — has been eternally feminine: namely “to dress up”! Has one ever conceded profundity to a female mind? And to a female heart — justice? But without profundity and justice — what good is it when women make judgments “about woman”! With love and praise even when one loves and praises oneself certainly the danger of being unjust and shallow is not lessened. Some women may have a good reason for thinking that men do not approach them with praise and love: taken as a whole it seems to me that up till now “woman” has been disrespected mostly by women — and absolutely not by man! 37118] A human being who strives for greatness regards everyone he encounters along the way either as a means or as a delay or as a temporary resting place. His unique and superior graciousness toward fellow human beings is only possible when he is at his height and dominating. Impatience and the feeling that up till now he has been condemned to comedy ruins every relationship for him: this kind of human being knows solitude and what is most poisonous in it. [Page 162] [38 = Mp XVI 1a. Mp XVI 2a. Mp XV 2b. June—July 1885] 3801] A thought in the shape in which it comes is an ambiguous sign that needs interpretation, more precisely, needs an arbitrary narrowing-down and limitation, until finally it becomes unambiguous. It surfaces in me — from where? through what? I do not know. It comes, independent of my willing, usually surrounded and obscured by a throng of feelings, desires, dislikes, also by other thoughts, often enough scarcely distinguishable from a “willing” or “feeling.” One pulls it out of this throng, purifies it, stands it on its own feet, one sees how it stands there, how it walks, everything in an amazing presto’ and yet entirely without the feeling of haste: who does all this — I do not know and am certainly more of a spectator in this than originator of this process. Then one sits in judgment of the thought, one asks: “what does it mean? what can it mean? is it right or wrong?” — one summons the help of other thoughts, one compares it. Thinking proves in this manner to be nearly a kind of practice and act of justice in which there is a judge, an opposing party, even an interrogation of witnesses, to which I am allowed to listen a bit — to be sure only a bit: most of it, it seems, escapes me. — That every thought first comes ambiguously and floating and in itself only as the occasion for the attempt of interpretation or for arbitrary determination, that with all thinking a multiplicity of persons seems to be involved — : this is not at all so easy to observe, we are at bottom trained for the opposite, [Page 163] 156 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS namely not to think of thinking while thinking. The origin of the thought remains hidden; the probability is great that it is only the symptom of a much more comprehensive state; insofar as precisely it comes and no other, that precisely it comes with this greater or lesser clarity, sometimes confident and commanding, sometimes weak and in need of a prop, on the whole always exciting, questioning — for consciousness namely every thought functions like a stimulus — : in all of this something of our total state expresses itself in signs. — The same can be said of every feeling, it does not mean something in itself: when it comes it is first interpreted by us and often ow strangely interpreted! Just think of the urgency of the bowels that is almost “unconscious” to us, of the blood pressure strains of our lower body, of the pathological states of the nervus sympathicus? — and how much is there of which we scarcely have a shimmer of consciousness through our sensorium commune! — In the case of such uncertain feelings of aversion only someone trained in anatomy guesses the correct species and region of causes; but all others, therefore on the whole nearly all people, as long as people have existed, do not seek a physical, but rather a psychical and moral explanation for pains of this kind and foist a false justification on the actual irritations of the body, in that within the vicinity of their unpleasant experiences and tribulations they seize upon a reason to feel as badly as they do. Under torture nearly everyone confesses guilt; with pain whose physical cause one does not know, the tortured one questions himself so long and so inquisitorially until he himself or others are found guilty. — as was done by the Puritan for instance, who habitually gave moral interpretations to a spleen that is associated with an unreasonable life style, namely as the bite of his own conscience. — 38[2] The logical thinking of which logic speaks, a thinking where the thought itself is posited as the cause of new thoughts — is the model of a complete fiction: a thinking of this kind never occurs in reality, but it is applied as a schema of forms and [Page 164] 38 JUNE-JULY 1885 157 filtering apparatus, with the help of which we dilute and simplify thinking's actual, extremely manifold occurrence: so that in this form our thinking becomes comprehensible, noticeable, communicable in signs. Therefore: to regard mental occurrence as if it really corresponded to that regulative scheme of a feigned thinking, this is the trick of falsification by virtue of which something like "knowledge" and "experience" exists. Experience is only possible with the help of memory; memory is only possible by means of an abbreviation of a mental process to a sign. "Knowledge": this is the expression of a new thing through the signs of already "known," already experienced things. —Today of course people even drivel about an empirical origin of logic: but what does not exist in reality, like logical thinking, cannot be derived from reality either, no more than some law of numbers as long as there has not yet been a case in which reality coincided with a mathematical formula. The mathematical formulas are likewise only regulative fictions with which we simplify and adjust real occurrence, for the purpose of practical exploitation, to our standard — to our stupidity —. 38[3] — — — through thinking the ego is posited; but hitherto one believed, like the common people, that "I think" was some kind of immediate certainty, and this "I" was the given cause of thinking, according to whose analogy we understood all remaining causal relationships. However highly accustomed and indispensable that fiction may now be — This alone does not yet prove anything against its fictionality: a belief can be a condition of life and nevertheless be false. 38[4]° "Truth": within my way of thinking this describes not necessarily an opposition to error, but in the fundamental cases only a disposition of different errors to one another: perhaps that the one is older, deeper than the other, perhaps even inextinguishable, insofar as an organic being of our kind could not [Page 165] 158 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS live without it; while other errors do not tyrannize us to this extent as conditions of life, rather, measured against such "tyrants," can be set aside and "refuted." An assumption that is irrefutable — why must it on this account already be true? This proposition probably outrages the logicians, who posit their limits as the limits of things: but I declared war on this logician-optimism long ago. 38[5]° Even now France is still the seat of the most spiritual and sophisticated culture in Europe and the preeminent school of taste: but one has to know where to find this "France of taste." Whoever belongs to it keeps himself well hidden: a dumbeddown and coarsened France wallows in the foreground today — recently at the funeral of Victor H(ugo) it celebrated a veritable orgy of bad taste — they may be few in number, and include people who do not stand on the strongest of legs, some of them fatalists, some pampered (those who have reasons to hide themselves) — they as a whole recognize roughly the following higher spirits as their forefathers and masters. First Stendhal, the last great event of the French spirit, who marched through his undiscovered Europe with a Nap(oleonic) tempo and ultimately found himself alone — horrifyingly alone: for it took two generations to even come close to him. Now he commands, as I said, a commander for the most elite; and whoever is gifted with subtle and daring senses, curious to the point of cynicism, a logician nearly from disgust, riddle guesser and friend of the sphinx like every born European, he will have to follow in his steps. May he also follow him to that place, full of shame for the secrets that great passion has when it stands still! This noblesse of being able to be silent, being able to stand still is his advantage for instance over Michelet and especially over German scholars. — His disciple is Mérimée, a noble withdrawn artist and despiser of those spongy emotions praised by a democratic age as its “noblest emotions,” austere toward himself and full of the harshest demands on his artistic logic, constantly prepared to [Page 166] 38 JUNE-JULY 1885 159 sacrifice small beauties and impulses to a strong will to necessity: — a genuine although not rich soul in a fake and dirty environment, pessimist enough to play along with the comedy without vomiting. — Another disciple of Stendhal is Taine, now the foremost living historian in Europe, a decisive, brave human being even in his despair, whose courage did not fall to pieces any more than did his will power under the fatalistic pressure of knowing, a thinker not diminished either by Condillac with respect to profundity nor Hegel with respect to clarity, rather someone who knew how to learn and for a long time will know how to teach: — the French of succeeding generations will have their spiritual drill sergeant in him. It is he primarily who pushes back the influence of Renan and Sainte-Beuve, who are both insecure and skeptical down to the bottom of their hearts: Renan, a kind of Catholic Schleiermacher, cloying, candy, feigning sensitivity for landscapes and religions: Sainte-Beuve, a burned-out poet who devotes himself to sniffing out souls and all too gladly would like to hide that he has no foothold either in the will or in philosophy, indeed, not surprisingly after both of these, he lacks a genuine solid taste in artibus et litteris.’ In the end one notices in him the intention of even turning this lack into a kind of principle and method of critical neutrality: but his annoyance betrays itself too often, at one point because he in fact was not neutral, but instead really enthused a few times about certain books and human beings — he would like to strike out and lie away these terrible “petit faits” from his life — but then because of the much more unpleasant grand fait? that all great French connoisseurs of humanity also genuinely possessed their own will and character, from Montaigne, Charon, La Rochefoucauld up to Chamfort and Stendhal: — compared to all of them Sainte-Beuve is not without envy and in any case without preference or preunderstanding. — Much more benevolent, one-sided, more able in every sense is the influence of Flaubert: with his preponderance of character that even endured solitude and failure — something extraordinary among French people — he rules at [Page 167] 160

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS the moment in the realm of the aesthetics of the novel and of style — he brought resounding and colorful French to the pinnacle. Of course he too lacks philosophical discipline, like Renan and Sainte-Beuve, likewise a genuine knowledge of scientific procedures: but in him a deep need for analysis and even for scholarliness along with an instinctive pessimism paved the way, oddly perhaps, but strongly enough to provide a model for the current novel writers of France. In fact the new ambition of the most recent school goes back to Flaubert, namely that of displaying themselves in scientific and pessimistic attitudes. — Whatever blossoms now in France by way of poets stands under the influence of Heinrich Heine and Baudelaire, perhaps with the exception of Leconte de Lisle: for in the same manner as Schopenhauer is now already loved and read more in France than in Germany, the cult of Heinrich Heine has relocated to Paris. As concerns the pessimistic Baudelaire, he belongs to those scarcely believable amphibians who are just as German as Parisian; his poetry has something of what in Germany is called Gemiit!® or “endless melody” and sometimes also “caterwauling.””! For the rest Baudelaire was a human being of perhaps ruined but very specific and sharp taste, sure of itself: with this he tyrannizes the insecure of today. Though in his day he was the first prophet and advocate of Delacroix: perhaps today he would be the first “Wagnerian” of Paris. There is much Wagner in Baudelaire. 38[6]!? Victor Hugo, an “ass of a genius” — the expression is from Baudelaire — who always had the courage of his bad taste: with it he knew how to command, he, the son of a Napoleonic general. In his ears he had the requirements of a kind of military rhetoric, he imitated in words the firing of cannons and the bursting of rockets; the French esprit!? appears in him obscured by smoke and din, so to speak, often to the point of naked stupidity. Never has a mortal written such dull, bursting antitheses. At other times he even gives the painter’s visual desires [Page 168] 38 JUNE-JULY 1885 161 mastery over his intellect: he bristles with picturesque insights and often does nothing more than to accurately copy what he sees, what the painter’s hallucination places in front of his eyes. He, the plebeian, who with his strong sensual desires, I mean his ears and eyes, does the will’s bidding even with his intellect — This after all is the basic fact of French romantisme, as a plebeian reaction of taste — : with this he is on the opposite track and wants precisely the inverse of what the poets of a noble culture wanted of themselves, for instance Corneille. For these had their pleasure and ambition in overwhelming their perhaps more strongly natured senses with the concept and in helping a subtle bright spirituality to victory against the brutal demands of colors, sounds and shapes: with which, it seems to me, they were on the trail of the great Greeks, despite how little they might have known about it. Precisely that which today causes us to be displeased about the ancient Greeks and the older French, offending our clumsy sensual and naturalistic taste — was the purpose of their artistic willing, also their triumph: for they fought against and conquered precisely this “sensual rabble” whom our poets, painters and musicians aspire to help to some form of art. Victor Hugo’s political and moral designs correspond to this artistic one: he is shallow and demagogical, on his belly before all big words and gestures, a flatterer of the people who speaks with the voice of an evangelist to all lowly, oppressed, deformed, crippled people and does not have a whiff of what discipline and honesty of the spirit are, what intellectual conscience is — on the whole an unconscious actor, like nearly all artists of the democratic movement. His genius affects the masses as does an alcoholic drink that simultaneously makes one drunk and stupid. — The same species of sympathies and antipathies and something similar by way of talent were possessed by another advocate of the people, the historian Michelet, only in place of painter’s eyes an admirable capacity to reproduce states of mind within himself, in the manner of musicians: — today in obscure G(ermany) we would therefore refer to him as a human being of compassion. [Page 169] 162

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS This “compassion” in any case is something obtrusive; in his interactions and even in his veneration of past human beings there is much immodesty, indeed it sometimes seems to me as if he takes to his emotional work with a zeal that requires him to remove his coat. His eyes do not see into the depths: all easily “inspired” spirits were superficial so far. He is too excited for me: justice is just as inaccessible to him as that graciousness that only flows from the highest superiority. At a certain elevation of excitement he is overcome each time by an attack of the tribunes, he also knows from his own experience the rabble’s predatory fits of rage. It sufficiently characterizes the ignobility of his morality that Napoleon as well as Montaigne is foreign to him.”

It is unusual that even he, the industrious straightlaced scholar, richly shares in the sexually lascivious curiosity of his race: and the older he got, the more this kind of curiosity grew. — Finally, democratic and therefore likewise thespian is the talent of George Sand: she is eloquent in that wicked manner whereby her style, a colorful, unbridled exaggerating female style, runs away with her emotions every half page — not the opposite, as much as she wishes that people believe the opposite of her. Indeed, people believed much too much in her feeling: whereas she was rich in that cold skill of the actor who knows how to spare his nerves and makes everyone believe the opposite. One should concede that she has a great talent for narrating; but she ruined everything and forever with her heated female coquetry of showing herself only in men’s roles that did not suit precisely her height — her spirit was short-legged — : so that her books were taken seriously only for a brief time and already today have fallen into the realm of involuntarily comical literature. And if it was not only coquetry but cleverness as well that drove her to always drape herself in men’s problems and masculine appurtenances, including pants and cigars: ultimately the very female problem and misfortune of her life nevertheless leaps into view, namely that she needed too many men and that even in these demands her senses and her spirit were divided. What could she do about the fact that whenever [Page 17] IO UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS the dedication to his High Mass”) is perhaps harder to recognize in music, but it is lodged all the deeper and more thoroughly in it. If I were to communicate my observations on this, one would not be able to tolerate listening to me. 34[43]° NB. The slow emergence and rise of the middle and lower classes (including the lower kind of spirit and body), which precluded abundantly already before the French Revolution and in any case would have moved forward without revolution, on the whole then the preponderance of the herd over all shepherds and bellwethers brings with it 1) A dimming of the spirit: The coexistence of a stoic and frivolous appearance of happiness as it belongs to noble cultures decreases: much suffering is allowed to be seen and heard which earlier was tolerated and concealed. 2) moral hypocrisy, a manner of wanting to distinguish oneself morally, but through herd virtues compassion welfare good deeds, which tend not to be acknowledged and respected outside the herd capacity 3) the real great quantity of compassion and shared joy, enjoyment of large-scale socializing as all herds have it — “common purpose,” “fatherland,” everything in which the individual does not come into consideration 34/44] In Goethe’s judgment Diderot showed himself to be truly German (Saint Ogan, p. 248)?! in everything that the French reproached. But the Neapolitans according to Galiani* also accepted his taste completely. 34145] Baudelaire, of German taste if ever a Parisian could have it, perceives things like a German when he does not tolerate Victor Hugo and calls him an “ass of a genius.” 3 [Page 170] 38 JUNE-JULY 1885 163 her spirit found pleasure in men, they were too sickly to satisfy the needs of her senses? Hence the eternal problem of two lovers at the same time and an eternal coercion of female modesty to deceive about this circumstance and to pretend that entirely different, much more general, much more impersonal problems stood in the foreground for her. For instance the problem of marriage: but what did she care about marriage! 38[7]”° People everywhere now are making an effort to divert attention from the actual great influence Kant exerted on German philosophy — and especially to wisely sidestep the value he attributed to himself. Kant was above all and chiefly proud of his table of categories, saying with this table in his hands: “this is the most difficult task that could ever be undertaken for the benefit of metaphysics”!® (let us make sure we understand this “could be”!) — he was proud of having discovered a new faculty in human beings, the faculty for synthetic judgments a priori. It does not concern us here how greatly he deceived himself about this: but German philosophy, as it has been admired and as it has influenced people throughout Europe for a hundred years, depended on this pride and on the rivalry of the younger generation to possibly discover something even prouder — and in any case new faculties! It has so far constituted the actual fame of German philosophy that through it people were taught to believe in a kind of “intuitive and instinctive comprehension of truth”; and Schopenhauer too, as much as he scorned Fichte, Hegel and Schelling, was at bottom on the same course when he discovered in an old, well-known faculty, the will, that it had a new faculty — namely to be the very “thing in itself” This required one to reach in boldly indeed, and not spare one’s fingers, right into the “essence”! Bad enough that this essence turned out to be unpleasant, and, as a result of burned fingers, pessimism and denial of the will appeared to be absolutely necessary for living! But this fate of Schopenhauer is an incident that remained [Page 171] 164 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS without influence for the overall significance of German philosophy, for its higher “effect”: in the main namely it signified throughout Europe the jubilating reaction against the rationalism of Descartes and against the skepticism of the English, in favor of the “intuitive,” “instinctive,” and everything “good, true and beautiful.” One thought the way to knowledge was henceforth abbreviated, one could get directly to the heart of “things,” one hoped “to save labor”: and all the happiness that noble idlers, the virtuous, dreamers, mystics, artists, threefourths-Christians, political obscurantists and metaphysical concept-spiders are capable of perceiving accrued to the honor of Germans. The good reputation of Germans was suddenly manufactured: by their philosophers! — I hope people still know that in fact the Germans in Europe had a bad reputation? That people took them to have servile and pitiful qualities, an inability to have “character,” a famous servant-soul? All of a sudden, however, they learned to say: “the Germans are profound, the Germans are virtuous — just read their philosophers”! In the last analysis it was the suppressed and long obstructed piety of the Germans that finally exploded in their philosophy, unclear and uncertain, to be sure, like all things German, namely now in pantheistic vapors, as in Hegel and Schelling, as gnosis, now mystically and life-negating, as in Schopenhauer: in the main however a Christian piety, and not a pagan one — toward which Goethe and before him Spinoza had shown so much good will. 38[8]7 The will. — In every willing there is a plurality of sensations, namely the sensation of the state away from which, the sensation of the state toward which, the sensation itself of this “away” and “toward,” the sensation of duration, finally then an accompanying sensation in the muscles that comes into play through a kind of habit as soon as we “will,” even without our having to move our arms and legs. Secondly therefore, just as sensation and in fact many kinds of sensations are to be [Page 172] 38 JUNE-JULY 1885 165 recognized as ingredients of the will, so too thinking: in every act of will there is a commanding thought — and we had better not believe that this thought can be separated from the “willing” as if will would still be left over. Thirdly the will is not only a complex of sensation and thinking, but above all an affect: and specifically that affect of command. What we call

“freedom of the will” is essentially the affect of superiority with respect to the one who must obey: “I am free, he must obey” — this consciousness lies in every will, and likewise that straining of attention, that clear gaze that fixes on one thing exclusively, that unconditional valuation “now this is essential and nothing else,” that inner certainty that something will be obeyed, as all this belongs to the disposition of the commander. Someone who wills — commands something in himself that obeys or which he believes obeys. But now let us observe what is the most wondrous thing about the “will,” about this very complicated thing for which the people have only one word: insofar as in this case we are simultaneously the commanders and the obeyers, and as obeyers we know the sensations of resisting, pushing, pressing, moving, which usually begin immediately after the act of willing; and insofar on the other hand as we have a habit of disregarding and deceiving ourselves about this duality by virtue of the synthetic concept “I,” a whole chain of erroneous conclusions and consequently of false valuations has attached itself to willing: — to such an extent that the willing individual believes in good faith that his will itself is the actual and sufficient mobile? for the entire action. And because in most cases by far there has only been willing where the effect of command, of obedience, therefore action could be expected, the appearance has translated into sensation, as if there were a necessity of effect there: enough, someone who wills believes with a considerable degree of certainty that will and action are somehow one — he attributes the success of executing the will to the will itself and in doing so enjoys an increase in that feeling of power that comes with all commanding. “Freedom of the will”: that is the word for [Page 173] 166 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS that very mixed state of the one who wills, who commands and simultaneously as the executor also enjoys the triumph of superiority over obstacles, but thinks to himself that it is his will alone that really overcomes the obstacles: — he takes the pleasurable sensations of the executing successful tool — the useful will and sub-will — and adds them to his pleasurable sensation as commander. — This interwoven nest of sensations, states and false assumptions, which is described by the people with one word and as one thing because it is suddenly and all “at once” there and belongs among the most frequent, consequently the “best known” experiences: the will as I have described it here — can we believe that it has never before been described? That this clumsy prejudice of the people so far has rightfully existed untested in every philosophy? That there was no difference of opinion among philosophers regarding what “willing” is, because they all believed that precisely here one had an immediate certainty, a fundamental fact, here opining was not at all in order? And that all logicians still teach the trinity “thinking, feeling, willing” as if “willing” included no feeling and thinking? — After all of this Schopenhauer’s major blunder seems less crazy and arbitrary, when he took the will as the best-known thing in the world, indeed as the actual and solely known thing: he simply took over a tremendous prejudice of all previous philosophers, a popular prejudice, and as philosophers generally do, exaggerated it. — 38[9] There is no small danger in extraordinary spirits that at some time they will learn to strive for the horrific pleasures of destroying, of ruining, of slowly ruining: namely when they are absolutely denied the creative deed, perhaps through a lack of tools or some other mischief of chance. In the economy of such souls there is no longer an either-or; and perhaps they must (corrupt), with the pleasure of a devil and in a subtle protracted manner, precisely what they have loved most up till then. [Page 174] 38 JUNE-JULY 1885 167 38[r] The human being is a form- and rhythm-constructing creature; in nothing is he better practiced and it appears that he takes pleasure in nothing more than in the inventing of shapes. Just observe what our eye immediately becomes occupied with as soon as it no longer gets to see anything: it creates itself something to see. Presumably in the same case our hearing does no differently: it practices. Without the transformation of the world into shapes and rhythms there would be no “sameness” for us, therefore nothing recurring, therefore also no possibility for experience and appropriation, for nourishment. In all perceiving, that is, in the most original appropriation, the essential occurrence is a doing, or better yet: an imposition of forms: — only the superficial speak of “impressions.” Human beings get to know their force here as a resisting and even more as a determining force — rejecting, selecting, forming to suit, arranging into their schemata. There is something active in the fact that we even adopt a stimulus and that we adopt it as such a stimulus. It is characteristic of this activity not only to posit forms, rhythms and series of forms, but also to evaluate the created formation with respect to incorporation or rejection. Thus our world emerges, our entire world: and this world that belongs to us alone, first created by us corresponds to no alleged “actual reality,” no “in-itself of things”: instead, it is itself our sole reality, and “knowledge” turns out to be, regarded in this manner, only a means of nourishment. But we are hard-to-nourish beings and have enemies everywhere and indigestible things, as it were — : this is why human knowledge has become refined and ultimately so proud of its refinement that it does not like to hear it is not a goal, but a means or even a tool of the stomach — if not a kind of stomach itself! — — 38(11)!° The superior philosophical human being, who has solitude around himself, not because he wants to be alone but because [Page 175] 168 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS he é s something that does not find his equal: what dangers and new sufferings are reserved just for him today, when one has unlearned belief in order of rank and consequently does not know how to honor and understand this solitude! Formerly a wise man almost sanctified himself for the conscience of the masses through such stepping-aside — today the hermit sees himself as if surrounded by a cloud of gloomy doubt and suspicions. And not only perhaps on the part of the envious and the pitiful: he has to perceive misjudgment, neglect and superficiality emanating from every benevolence that he experiences, he knows those treacheries of narrow compassion that feels itself to be good and holy when it seeks to “rescue” him from himself, perhaps through more comfortable circumstances, through more orderly, more trustworthy company — indeed, he will have to marvel at the unconscious drive to destruction with which all mediocre of spirit are active against him, and what is more, in the best belief in their right to it! It is necessary for humans of this incomprehensible solitude to wrap themselves skillfully and heartily even in the mantle of external, of spatial solitude: this belongs to their prudence. Even cunning and disguise will be needed today for such a human being to sustain himself, to hold himself up amidst the sweeping, dangerous rapids of the times. For every attempt to endure it in the present, with the present, for every approach to these human beings and goals of today he must do penance as if for an actual sin: and he might marvel at the hidden wisdom of his nature, which always immediately called him back to himself after all such temptations through sickness and wicked accidents.

38[12]”° And do you also know what “the world” is to me? Should I show it to you in my mirror? This world: a colossus of energy, without beginning, without end, a firm, unshakable magnitude of energy that does not get bigger, does not get smaller, that does not expend itself but only transforms itself, as a whole [Page 176] 38 JUNE-JULY 1885 169 unchangeable in size, an economy without expenditures and losses, but likewise without growth, without income, encased by “nothingness” as by its border, nothing blurring, wasted, nothing infinitely extended, but laid into a definite space as a definite force, and not a space that would be “empty” anywhere, rather as force everywhere, as play of forces and waves of forces simultaneously one and “multiple,” increasing itself here and at the same time decreasing itself there, a sea of forces storming and flooding together, eternally transforming, eternally receding, with tremendous years of return, with an ebb and flow of its configurations, from the simplest striving outward into the most complex, from the stillest, most rigid, coldest out into the most glowing, wildest, most self-contradictory, and then returning home again from abundance to the simple, from the play of contradictions returning to the joy of accord, affirming itself even in this sameness of its courses and years, blessing itself as that which must recur eternally, as a becoming that knows no satiety, no tedium, no weariness — : this my Dionysian world of eternal self-creating, of eternal self-destroying, this mystery-world of the doubly voluptuous, this my beyond good and evil, without goal, if a goal does not lie in the happiness of the circle, without will, if a ring does not have good will for itself — do you want a name for this world? A solution for all its riddles? a Light for you too, you hiddenmost, strongest, most intrepid, most midnightly? — This world is the will to power — and nothing else! And you yourselves are also this will to power — and nothing else!”! 38 [13]? When I was younger I worried about just what a philosopher actually is: for I believed I perceived contradictory features in the famous philosophers. Finally it occurred to me that there are two different kinds of philosopher, first those who have to hold on to some great factual legacy of valuations, that is previous valuations and value creations (logical or moral), then those who themselves are legislators of valuations. The former seek to [Page 177] 170 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS master the present or past world by summarizing and abbreviating it through symbols. It is the duty of these researchers to make all previous events and everything that has been valued so far surveyable, thinkable, comprehensible, handy, to overpower the past, to abbreviate everything that is long, indeed time itself, a great and wonderful task. The actual philosophers however are commanders and legislators, they say: it shall be so! they alone determine the where-to and what-for of human beings and in so doing dispose of the preliminary work of the philosophical laborers, those who overpower the past. This second kind of philosopher rarely turns out well; and in fact their situation and danger are tremendous. How often have they purposely blindfolded themselves, in order simply not to have to see anymore the narrow ledge that separates them from abyss and plunge: for instance Plato, when he convinced himself that the good as he wanted it was not Plato’s good, but the good in itself; the eternal treasure that some human being named Plato happened to find along his way! This same will to blindness reigns in a much cruder form in the founders of religion: their “thou shalt” must absolutely not sound like “I want” to their ears — only as the command of a god do they dare to comply with their task, only as “inspiration” is their legislation of values a bearable burden under which their conscience does not shatter. — Now as soon as those two consolations, those of Plato and Mohammed, have fallen away and no thinker can ease his conscience anymore with the hypothesis of a “god” or “eternal values,” the claim of the legislator’s new values rises to a new and never before attained level of terribleness. From now on those hand-picked ones on whom the inkling of such a duty begins to dawn will make the attempt to see whether they might be able to escape it at just “the right time,” as their greatest danger, through some kind of leap to the side: for instance, by convincing themselves that the task has already been solved, or it is unsolvable, or they do not possess the shoulders for such burdens, or they are already overburdened with other more immediate tasks, or even this new distant duty is a seduction [Page 178] 38 JUNE-JULY 1885 II and temptation, a distraction from all duties, a sickness, a kind of madness. Some may indeed succeed in evading it: the trace of such evaders and their bad conscience runs through the whole of history. But for the most part that redeeming hour came for these fateful human beings, that autumn hour of ripeness when they had to do what they did not even “want” to do: — and the deed they previously feared more than anything fell to them easily and unbidden from the tree, as a deed without arbitrariness, almost as a gift. — 38[14] What separates us most thoroughly from all Platonic and Leibnizian ways of thinking is: we do not believe in any eternal concepts, eternal values, eternal forms, eternal souls; and philosophy, insofar as it is science and not legislation, for us means only the broadest extension of the concept “history.” On the basis of etymology and the history of language we take all concepts as having become, many as still becoming; moreover in such a way that the most universal concepts, as the fa/ sest, must also be the oldest. “Being,” “substance,” and “absolute,” “sameness,” “thing” — : thinking invented these schemata, which in fact most thoroughly contradicted the world of becoming, as the first and the oldest, but which appeared from the start to correspond with it, given the dullness and monotony of the incipient, still sub-animal consciousness: every “experience” seemed always to underscore it anew and underscore it entirely alone. Sameness and similarity were admitted ever more rarely with the sharpening of the senses and of attention, with the development and the struggle of the most manifold life: whereas for the lowest beings everything seemed “eternally the same,” “one,” “permanent,” “absolute,” “without qualities.” Eventually the “external world” multiplied itself in this way; but through tremendous stretches of time a thing on earth was considered identical and corresponding with a single characteristic, for example with a certain color. The multiplicity of characteristics of a single thing was admitted only with the greatest [Page 179] 172 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS slowness: we still see a resistance against the multiplicity of predicates in the history of human language. But the longest confusion is that the predicate symbol is posited as equal to the thing itself; and the philosophers, who have best reproduced in themselves precisely the oldest instincts of humanity and also the oldest fears and superstitions (like the superstition of the soul) — one can speak of an atavism par excellence in them — pressed their seal upon this confusion when they taught that precisely the symbols, namely the “ideas” were what truly existed, what was unchanging and all-valid. Whereas in fact, in the perception of a thing, thinking navigates a series of symbols offered to him by memory, and looks for similarities; whereas a human being with a similar symbol posits, grasps, apprehends the thing as “known”: for a long time he simply believed he comprehended it in this manner. Seizing and grasping, appropriating already meant knowing for him, a knowing-to-the-end; for a long time even the words in human language seemed — and today still seem to the common people — to be not symbols but truths with respect to the things they signify. The more refined the senses, the more rigorous the attention, the more manifold the tasks of life became, the harder it was to admit the knowledge of a thing, of a fact, as definitive knowledge, as “truth”; and in the very end, at the point to which our methodical mistrust has driven us today, we no longer give ourselves the right at all to speak of truths in the absolute sense — we have sworn off the belief in the knowability of things just as much as the belief in knowledge. The “thing” is only a fiction, the “thing in itself” even a contradictory unpermitted fiction: but knowing, too, of the absolute and consequently also the relative kind, is likewise only a fiction! With this, the necessity also disappears for positing a something that “knows,” a subject for knowing, some pure “intelligence,” an “absolute spirit”: — this mythology not yet completely given up by Kant, which Plato prepared for Europe in a disastrous manner and which, using the fundamental Christian dogma of “God is a [Page 18] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 II 34[46] If I have something of a unity in me then it certainly does not lie in the conscious ego and in feeling, willing, thinking, but somewhere else: in the preserving, appropriating, distinguishing, surveilling prudence of my entire organism, of which my conscious ego is only a tool. — Feeling willing thinking everywhere reveal only end phenomena whose causes are entirely unknown to us: the succession of these end phenomena as if one resulted from the other is probably only an illusion: in truth the causes might possibly be bound to one another in such a way that the end-causes give me only the impression of logical or psychological binding. 7 deny that a spiritual or psychic phenomenon is the direct cause of another spiritual or psychic phenomenon: even though it appears so. The true world of causes is hidden from us: it is unspeakably more complicated. The intellect and the senses are above all a simplifying apparatus. But our false, miniaturized, logicized world of causes is the world in which we are able to live. We are “knowing” to the extent that we can satisfy our needs. The study of the body offers a sense of the unspeakable complications. If our intellect did not have a few firm forms, then it would be impossible to live. But this proves nothing for the truth of all logical facts. 34147] The underhanded self-deprecation of Socrates, used to render his opponent unsuspecting and safe, so that he lets himself go and blurts straight out what he thinks: a trick of the rabble man! Logic was not at home in Athens. 34148] NB. A bit more brightness of mind and a bit of good will: and one no longer tolerates, for reasons of taste, interpreting his experiences to suit the “glory of God,” I mean seeing everywhere the traces of God’s solicitude, warning, punishment, instruction. Just [Page 180] 38 JUNE-JULY 1885 173 spirit,” threatened all science of the body and therewith also the continued development of the body with death — this mythology has now had its time. 38[15] I have experienced strange things with respect to the effect of my books. Recently I received the letter of an old noble Dutchman” who regards Human, All Too Human as his most faithful life companion; the Birth of Tragedy perhaps produced the greatest sound of happiness in the life of R(ichard) W(agner), he was beside himself, and there are wondrously beautiful things in the Twilight of the Gods that he produced in this state of an unexpected greatest hope. (Back then — — — I would like to know if this book has been understood by anyone: its backgrounds belong to my most personal property. Zarathustra has the value estimations of a couple of millennia against it; I absolutely do not believe that anyone today is in a position to hear the ringing of its overall tone: understanding it also presupposes a kind of philological and more than philological work that no one today would invest in it, out of a lack of time. I myself am very satisfied with the fact that my taste in music and philosophic, which in 1865 (when I was perhaps the only German who, just as Schopenhauer and Wagner) and — — — now belongs to German taste. The choice that people make with respect to my books gives me food for thought. 38[16] the unhesitating use of stop-gaps and of spiritual expenditure and wealth in order to give a weakness here the attribute of strength: what nearly gives Wagnerian style its character — 38[17] Schopenhauer's perversity of mentality and my Birth of Tragedy! [Page 181] 174 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 38 [18] "he could have acted differently" — this viewpoint on the emergence of the sense of justice is falsely applied by Rée.²⁵ 38[19]° In surveying my life, the first trace of philosophical meditation that I can lay my hands on I encounter in a small text from my 13th year: it contains an insight concerning the origin of evil. My assumption was that for a God thinking something and creating something are one and the same. Now I reasoned thus: God thought himself at the time when he created the second person of the divinity: but in order to be able to think himself he first had to think his opposite. Thus in my representation the devil had the exact same age as the son of God, even a clearer origin — and the same descent. Regarding the question of whether it was possible for a God to think his opposite, I finessed this by saying: but everything is possible for him. And secondly: that he did it is a fact, in case the existence of a God-son is a fact, consequently it was also possible for him, — — — 38[20] Without a passionate pleasure in the adventures of knowledge someone will scarcely endure very long in its dangerous realm; and anyone who is too cowardly or too timid for such "dissipations" should in fairness acknowledge making a virtue and a commendation of it, too. But for the stronger spirits, the demand that one should indeed be a human being of passion, but also the master of his passions, also applies with respect to their passion for knowledge. Just as Napoleon, to the astonishment of Talleyrand, allowed his anger to bark and roar at the chosen time and then later, just as suddenly, silenced it, so too the strong spirit must do with his wild dogs: at the chosen time, no matter how urgent the will to truth is in him — it is his wildest dog — he must be able to be the incarnate will to [Page 182] 38 JUNE-JULY 1885 175 untruth, the will to uncertainty, the will to ignorance, above all to foolishness. 38[21] The decline of grace. — Belonging among the symptoms of general uglification as it accompanies an age that increasingly makes the rabble its master, not the least is the growing letting-herself-go of woman and a kind of "return to nature" i.e., to the rabble: even in places where noble and rigorous habits were formerly maintained like a privilege: e.g., at court. One stands amazed before the lack of refinement even in dealings with the most amiable of women: and we help ourselves — — — 38[22] A garden in which even the lattice is gilded has to defend itself not only against thieves and rascals: its worst dangers are presented by its meddlesome admirers, who everywhere would like to break off something and all too gladly take away this or that as a memento. — And do you not notice, you idlers in my garden, that you cannot justify yourselves even next to my herbs and weeds, that they say to your face: be gone, you intruders, you — — — [Page 183] [39 = N VII 2a. Z I 2b. August-September 1885] 39[1]" The Will to Power. Attempt at a New Interpretation of All Events. By Friedrich Nietzsche. 392]? "milky spirit" Like a child encountering other people's public holidays: shyly it stands there — never before has it heard this bell, never before did it see these decorations and festive costumes. Am I then a mirror that becomes cloudy and blind right away because a stranger's breath breathes on me, seethes at me? Why do you want to scrape the down from such things? — Truths that no smile has gilded. 39[3]° Zarathustra 5 (youth as the basic tone) martial in the highest degree [Page 184] 39 AUGUST—SEPTEMBER 1885 177 Onan old fortress the drumming of heralds. (Finale) at night as on the Rialto.4 the rose festival. Zarathustra the godless hermit, the first solitary one who did not pray. Are you strong enough for my truths? Who belongs with me? what is noble? "Are you such?" (as refrain) the order of rank: and you must have everything in you in order to be able to rule, but also under you! Refrain: "a(nd) if you are not able to speak: "we honor them, yet we are of a superior kind" —then you are not of my kind. The rose festival. At night on the bridge. Zarathustra happy about the fact that the struggle of the classes is over and now finally it is time for an order of rank of individuals. Hatred for the democratic leveling-system is only in the foreground: actually he is very glad that this has gone so far. Now he can solve his task. — His teachings so far were directed only at the future ruling caste. These rulers of the earth are now supposed to replace God and create for themselves the profound unconditional confidence of the ruled. First: their new holiness, their renunciation of happiness and pleasure. They give the lowliest the prospect of happiness, not themselves. They redeem the misfits with the doctrine of the "quick death," they offer religions and systems according to the order of rank. 3914] The self-mirroring of the spirit, the creaking of the logical clockwork, the unwinding of the instincts Supposing you had resolved everything into formulas: what would happen then? Are we supposed to /ive with bad conscience? [Page 185] 178 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS I admire the great falsifications and interpretations: they elevate us above the happiness of animals. The overestimation of truthfulness in the circles of the herd animal makes good sense. To not allow oneself to be cheated — and consequently — to not cheat. That the truthful one is of more value than the liar cannot be proved by anything; and supposing that life is based on a consequential being-deceived, then a consequ(ential) liar could achieve highest honors under certain circumstances. That one harms by not “telling the truth” is a naïveté. If the value of life lies in well-believed errors, what is harmful resides in “telling the truth.” 3915] Life in the hereafter gone? — the pointe’ of life has been taken away. 39[6]° Just as the matador fig’ pursues its goals, ruining that which it wants only as a support: so too reason in relation to the philos(ophers). What does every philosophy mean for the life of a human being? Whether as enhancement of the feeling of power: Or as a means of masking an unbearable existence? Behind consciousness the drives are working. 3917] Nourishment property reproduction sexual lust (as a narcotic work (overcoming of oscillations) The sublime human being has the highest value, even when he is quite delicate and fragile, because an abundance of quite difficult and rare things has been cultivated and kept together through many generations.® Primeval forest animals the Romans? 39[8] The deification of the devil — how did this heavenly illusion occur! [Page 186] 39 AUGUST—SEPTEMBER 1885 179 The belief in goodness justice and truth at the bottom of things has something hair-raising about it. The masks of the devil. 3919] The interpretation of nature: we interpret ourselves into it. — the terrible character. 3910}! Zarathustra 1. the beginnings of the differentiation. All “happiness” permitted only as cure or resting. Against the “happy” and “good” and the herd animals. Zarathustra 2. The “se/fovercoming” of the human being. Greatest of all struggles and longest cultivation. As a means the “tempters” are conjured up. Zarathustra 3 on the ring the primeval forest, everything in terrible magnification 39[11] In order not to express the opposite about the essence of the world, one must hold firm that every moment signifies a necessary total-displacement of all changes; but as a thinking and creating thing it must of course compare, consequently also be able to be timeless vis-à-vis its own inner conditions. 3912)“ Chap. Nourishment. Procreation. Adaptation. Traced back to will to power. Heredity. Division of labor. Chap. The juxtaposition of consciousness with that which actually drives and rules. [Page 187] 180 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS Chap. The reversal of the temporal order: also in embryonic growth (organic development reversed, as it is stored in memory: simultaneously the oldest as the strongest in front). Just as the oldest errors constitute the spine, so to speak, to which everything else attaches itself. Chap. The development of the logical 39[13]!° The qualities of the organic being. The development of organic beings. The union of the organic and the inorganic. “Knowledge” in relation to the conditions of life. The “perspectival.” “Laws of nature” as determination of power relations. “Cause and effect” an expression for the necessity and inexorability of this power determination. Freedom of the will and power. Pain and joy in relation to the will to power. “Person” “subject” as deception. A ruled community. Using the body as a guide. Ruling and obeying as expression of the will to power, in the organic. Emergence of the logical. “Rationale.” Against self-mirroring. Mathem(atics). The physical world like the psychical both false, but enduring errors. The artist and the will to power. The impression of neutrality is mesmerizing for herd animals. Palazzo Pitti!? and Phidias. Art depending on morality, for herds or leaders: — — — the refutation of God, actually only the mor(al) God is refuted. Rights and duties. The punishments. Point of departure. Irony toward Descartes: supposing that at the bottom of things there were something deceitful from [Page 188] 39 AUGUST—SEPTEMBER 1885 181 which we derived, what would it help de omnibus dubitare!“ It could be the most beautiful means of deceiving ourselves. Moreover: is it possible? “Will to truth” as “I do not want to be cheated” or “I do not want to cheat” or “I want to convince myself and become firm,” as a form of the will to power. “Will to justice” “Will to beauty” all will to power. “Will to help” on goodness. 39[14])° For the preface. Human comprehension — which is ultimately always an interpretation according to us and our needs — stands in relation to the rank that the human being assumes in the order of all beings. Let it serve as an example, how much the finger knows what the piano player executes with it. It will sense nothing but mechanical processes and logically combine these. Even among humans the lowly exert their power without awareness of what purpose they serve in the big picture. The whole physical causality is interpretable in a hundred ways, according to whether a human or another being interprets it. — For cruder types of human being the Auman kind of goodness or justice or wisdom was verifiable from nature. Inasmuch as finer more spiritual human beings now reject this verifiability, they do it because their concept of goodness justice and wisdom has grown. Atheism is the result of an elevation of the human being: at bottom he has become more bashful, deeper and more modest before the fullness of the whole; he has better understood his order of rank. The farther our knowledge grows, the more the human being perceives himself in his corner. The most shameless and firmest articles of faith that we bear in us stem from the period of our greatest ignorance, e.g., that our will is cause etc. How naively we carry our moral valuations into things, e.g., when we speak of /aws of nature! It might be useful once to conduct [Page 189] 182 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS an experiment of a completely different manner of interpretation: so that through an embittered contradiction we come to understand how very unconsciously our moral canon (preference for truth, law, rationality etc.) reigns in our entire so-c(alled) science. Put popularly: God has been refuted, but not the devil: and all divine functions are also part of his nature: the opposite did not work! He deceives, he creates deceiving intellects He prefers to destroy He ruins insofar as he spurs the highest to ennoblement In the woods: he allows his innocence to be worshipped Ultimately: why do we hate such a being? 39[t]° For the introduction. The great danger is not pessimism (a form of hedonism), the calculating of pleasure and pain,” and whether perhaps human life includes an excess of painful feelings. Instead, the meaninglessness of all events! The moral interpretation has become invalid at the same time as the religious interpretation: this they do not know of course, the superficial! The more impious they are, the more instinctively they cling with their teeth to moral valuations. Schopenhauer as atheist uttered a curse upon anyone who divests the world of its moral significance. In England they strive to associate morality with physics, Mister von Hartmann morality and the irrationality of existence. But the actual great fear is: the world no longer has a meaning To what extent the previous morality has also fallen away with “God”: they mutually supported one another. Now I bring a new interpretation, an “immoral” one, in relation to which our previous morality appears as a special case. Put popularly: God has been refuted, but not the devil. — 39[16] With the foolish and immodest question of whether pleasure or pain is preponderant in the world, one stands in the [Page 19] I UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS as a good philologist (and generally any philologically trained scholar) has an aversion to false textual interpretations (e.g., those of Protestant preachers in their pulpits — which is why the educated classes no longer go to church) —, likewise and not as a result of great “virtue,” “honesty” etc., the counterfeiting of religiously interpreting all experiences offends one’s taste. — 34149] Our pleasure in simplicity, surveyability, regularity, brightness, from which ultimately a German “philosopher” could extract something like a categorical imperative of logic and the beautiful — for this I confess that a strong instinct must be present. It is so strong that it reigns in all our sensual activities and reduces, regulates, assimilates etc. the abundance of real perceptions (the unconscious ones —) and first displays them to our consciousness in this contrived form. This “logical,” this “artistic” something is our continuous activity. What made this force so sovereign? Obvious that without it no living being could live on account of the chaos of impressions. 34150] (I do not see why the organic even had to originate at any point in time — —) 34151] In chemistry is revealed that every substance pushes its force as far as it can, then a third something emerges. The qualities of a child cannot be deduced from the most accurate knowledge of the father and the mother. For they are the effects of the third thing on us, these qualities: but the effects of the first and the effects of the second, i.e., their qualities are impossible to add as “effects of the third” 34152] The chain of causation is concealed from us: and the relationship and the sequence of effects only yields a succession: however [Page 190] 39 AUGUST— SEPTEMBER 1885 183 midst of philosophical dilettantism: such things should be left to yearning poets and little women. On a nearby planet there could be so much happiness and amusement that it would outweigh “the entire misery of humanity”!® ten times over: what do we know! And on the other hand we really only want to be the inheritance of Christian profundity and sensitivity, so that we do not condemn suffering in itself: whoever no longer knows how to use it morally, for the “salvation of the soul,” is supposed to at least accept its aesthetic validity — be it as artist or observer of things. The world, suffering thought away, is unaesthetic in every sense: and perhaps pleasure is only a form and rhythmic variety of the same! I meant to say: perhaps suffering is something of what is essential to all existence. 39[17] One is permitted to hope that the human being will rise so high that the formerly highest things, e.g., the previous belief in God, will seem childlike-childish and touching, indeed that he will once again do as he has done with all myths, namely transform (them into) children’s stories and fairy tales. 39[18] NB. The credibility of the body first is the basis according to which the value of all thinking can be evaluated. Supposing we had thought nothing but things that do not exist! (as e.g., Teichmüller assumes!) etc. The body proves itself less and less to be illusion! Who until now has had reasons to think the body as illusion? The perfect Brahman-worshipper. 39[19] Woman And wherever a woman comes to be conscious of any kind of talent: how much ridiculous self-admiration, how much “goose” is unleashed each time at the same time! [Page 191] 184 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 39[20]” Jew. — I highlight with distinction Siegfried Lipiner, a Polish Jew who knows how to reproduce the most diverse forms of European lyric in the most delicate manner — “nearly genuine,” as a goldsmith would say — 39[21] Hellwald, Natural History of Human Beings. Hermann Miiller on plants. Burmeister 39[22]”^o Zarathustra 4. says to his own: watch out, whoever speaks against suffering, illusion, foolishness — he belongs to the common people, even as a philosopher. How does one best speak to the masses? I do not know, it does not belong to my task. It seems to me that one must make their lives very hard through the demands of strict virtues: otherwise they become lazy and voluptuous, also in their thinking. For the /ower human beings the opposite valuations apply: it is a matter of planting the virtues in them. The absolute commands, terrible tyrants, tear them away from the easy life”! the significance of religions Zarathustra as seducer of youth, the vengeance of the fathers, he commands them to wait. Zarathustra walking on the ramparts of the fortress: — he hears someone preaching absolute pessimism. The city is surrounded. He remains silent. [Page 192] [40 = W I 7a. August-September 1885] 4of] The weary, suffering, fearful mean peace, mean immovability, calm, something similar to deep sleep when they think of the supreme happiness. Much of this has gotten into philosophy. Likewise fear of the uncertain, ambiguous, changeable has brought to favor its opposite, the simple, what remains the same, the predictable, the certain. Another kind of being would bring the opposite conditions to favor. But as I, ten years ago — — — 4ol]’ The Will to Power. Attempt at a New Interpretation of all Events. (Preface on the threatening “meaninglessness.” Problem of pessimism.)

Logic. Physics. Morality. Art. Politics. 40[3]? For whom this interpretation is important. New “philosophers.” There might be someone here and there who loves his independence in a similar way — but we do not crowd together, we do not “long” for one another. [Page 193] 186 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

40[4] We are the heirs of the imperfect bad variety, the longest variety of observing and inferring. Our most thorough and incorporated concepts will probably be the falsest: namely to the extent that we have been able to live with them! But conversely one can ask: would life even be possible at all with a finer observation and a more rigorous cautious process of inference? Even today the practical portion of our life is still experimental in the crudest sense, hit-or-miss: just look at what most people know about nutrition! That the expediency of means in the overall history of organisms has increased (as Spencer believes) is an English-superficial judgment, in relation to the complexity of our aims the stupidity of means has probably stayed the same. 40[5] The increase of stealth in the order of rank of beings (in the inorganic power against power quite crudely, in the organic world cunning etc.) the highest human beings like Caesar Napoleon (Stendhal’s quote about him) likewise the higher races (Italians etc.). Should we not consider it possible that the most thousand-fold slyness belongs in the nature of higher creatures? Naturally the sense of truth (to see what is) would also have to increase, as a means of being able to appear. The actor. Dionysus.

40[6] How impoverished have the philosophers been so far when language, or at least grammar, on the whole that which is their inner “common people” has prompted? them! There are truths in words, at least inklings of truth: this is what they all believe rigidly and firmly: hence the tenacity with which they cling to “subject” “body” “soul” “spirit.” What disaster lies in the single mummified error concealed by the word “abstraction”! As if by omitting, and not on the contrary by underscoring, emphasizing, strengthening, we could give rise to that which is described [Page 194] 40 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 187 in such a manner! Just as every image, every form emerges in us and becomes possible, through coarsening! 40[7] Just as the emergence of arithmetic had to be preceded by a long practice and preschooling in seeing the same, in wanting to take things as the same, in positing identical cases and in “counting,” so likewise logical inference. Judgment is originally more than the belief “this and that is true,” rather “thus and such is precisely how I want it to be true!” The drive to assimilation, that organic basic function on which all growth is based, also adapts internally what it appropriates from its vicinity: the will to power functions in this comprising of the new under the forms of what is old, previously experienced, still alive in memory: and then we call it — “comprehending”!

40[8] The concept “individual” “person” contains a great relief for naturalistic thinking: which above all feels good when doing multiplication tables. In fact prejudices are found there: but unfortunately we do not have words to describe what really exists, namely the degrees of intensity on the way to the individual, to the “person.” Two derive from one, one from two: this can be clearly seen in the procreation and propagation of the lowest organisms; mathematics is constantly contradicted in real events, counter/ived, if the expression is permitted. I once used the expression “many mortal souls”: ‘just as everyone has the stuff for many personas. 40[9] There are schematic minds, those who hold a thought-complex to be truer if it can be sketched into previously drafted schemata or categorical tables. There are countless self-deceptions in this area: nearly all great “systems” belong here. But the basic prejudice is: that order, surveyability, the systematic must cling to the true being of things, and conversely disorder, the chaotic, the unpredictable [Page 195] 188

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS come to the fore only in a false or imperfectly known world — in sum are errors — : — which is a moral prejudice, drawn from the fact that the truthful confidence-inspiring human being tends to be a man of order, of maxims, and on the whole something predictable and pedantic. Now it is however quite unverifiable that the in-itself of things comports with this recipe of a model bureaucrat. 40[10] — Descartes is not radical enough for me. With his craving for certainty and “I do not want to be deceived” one needed (to) ask “why not?” In sum, moral prejudices (or utilitarian justifications) in favor of certainty against appearance and uncertainty. It is in this context that I look at the philosophers, from the Vedanta philos(ophy) to the present: why this hatred for the untrue, evil, painful etc.? — For the preface. First take care of the mor(al) valuations! — For the “categorical imperative” it takes an imperator! 40[t] — The children of innocence who believe in the “subject” predicate and object, the grammar believers who have not yet heard of our apple of knowledge! 40[12] Teichmüller p. 25° “it is a conclusion when we declare so-called things as being, thus we must therefore know in advance which nature (terminus medius®) the being (terminus major’) possesses, in order to be able to agree with or dispute this concept of things” Against which I say: “think we know in advance.” “Logical laws” in Spir I p. 768 defined as “universal principles of affirmations about objects i.e., an inner necessity to believe something about objects.” My basic ideas: “the absolute” is a regulative fiction that cannot be ascribed any existence, existence does not belong to the necessary qualities of the absolute. Likewise “being,” “substance” [Page 196] 40 AUGUST — SEPTEMBER 1885 189 — all things that should not be drawn from experience, but in fact due to an erroneous interpretation of experience are drawn from it. The previous interpretations all had a certain meaning for life — preserving, making it bearable, or alienating, refining, Concluding J} probably even separating out what is sickly Chapter and bringing it to dying out my new interpretation gives the future philosophers as rulers of the earth the necessary uninhibitedness. 1. Not so much “refuted” as incompatible with what we now chiefly consider “true” and believe: to this extent the religious and moral interpretation is impossible for us. 40[13]? Logic is bound to the condition: supposing there are identical cases. In fact, so that thinking and inferring can logically take place, this condition must first be feigned as fulfilled. This means: the will to logical truth can only enact itself after a fundamental falsification of all events has been undertaken. From which it follows that here a drive reigns that is capable of both means, first the falsification and then the execution of a single point of view: logic does not stem from the will to truth. 40[14] One could say, the complexity of ways (e.g., of a plant to come to fertilization) would be an argument against intentionality: for here an ingenious spirit would have to be thought, who chooses detours that are too big, clever with respect to the way, stupid regarding precisely the choice of this way — hence a contradictory kind of spirit. But against this interpretation I would point to our human experience: we must exploit this accidental and disrupting element and adopt it into each of our [Page 197] 190 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS drafts, so that everything we execute bears the same character, of a spirit that executes its plan despite many obstacles, therefore with many crooked lines. Let us think of this case translated into tremendous proportions: then the seeming stupidity of the course of the world, the character of wastefulness, of useless sacrifices would perhaps be only an observation from the corner, a perspectival observation for small beings such as we are. In consideration of the fact that we do not know the purposes, it is childish to criticize the means on the basis of their rationality. What is certain is that they are not precisely “humane.” 40[15]!° Judgment, this is the belief: “this and this is so.” Therefore judgment harbors the admission of having encountered an identical case: it presupposes comparison therefore, with the help of memory. The judgment does not succeed in making it appear that an identical case is there. Instead, it believes it perceives such a case; it works under the assumption that identical cases exist generally. Now what do we call that function that is much older, and must be working earlier, that equalizes and assimilates cases that in themselves are dissimilar? What do we call that second one which, based on the first one etc. “What arouses the same sensations is the same”: but what do we call that which makes sensations the same, “takes” them to be the same? —There could be no judgments at all if kind of equalization were not practiced first within the sensations: memory is only possible with a constant underscoring of the already accustomed, experienced — — Before there is judging the process of assimilation must already have been done: therefore here, too, an intellectual activity (is) present, that does not fall under consciousness, as with pain resulting from a wound. Probably there is an inner event corresponding to all organic functions, hence an assimilating, secreting, growing etc. Essential, proceed from the body and use it as a guide. It is the much richer phenomenon that allows for clearer observation. Belief in the body is better established than belief in the spirit. [Page 198] 40 AUGUST—SEPTEMBER 1885 191 “No matter how strongly a thing may be believed: there is no criterion of truth in it.” But what is truth? Perhaps a kind of belief that has become a condition of life? Then of course strength would be a criterion. E.g., with respect to causality. 40[16]}! What then does all recent philosophy do at bottom? it makes, secretly or openly, an assassination attempt on the old concept of the soul — that is, on the foundation of Christianity, on the “I”: it is antichristian in the most subtle sense. Formerly one believed unconditionally in grammar: one said: “I” is condition, “think” is predicate. One tried with an admirable tenacity to see if one could escape from this net — whether first of all the opposite might not be true: “think” condition — and “T” conditioned, as a synthesis that embarks on thinking. Kant wanted at bottom to prove that the subject could not be proven from the standpoint of the subject, nor the object either. The possibility of an illusory existence of the “subject” is dawning: an idea that has already been on earth once, as in the Vedanta-philosophy. If one wants a new, albeit very provisional expression for it, then read (The Birth of Tragedy) 40[17] Coarsening as a basic means of allowing return, identical cases to appear; thus before anything was “thought” something must have already been made up, the forming sense is more original than the “thinking” one 40[18] On morality. We behave in accordance with the rank order to which we belong: even if we do not know it, even less are able to demonstrate it to others. An imperative “behave according to the rank order to which you belong” is nonsensical: because we would have to know 1) ourselves 2) that order, neither of which is the case — — and 3) because it is superfluous to command something that happens anyway. Rank order: not only in relation to our [Page 199] 192 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS neighbors, rather in certain cases to posterity, likewise to the inhabitants of other planets; for we do not know whether anyone is there who compares us with themselves. — All that is imperatival in morality addresses itself to the multiplicity of masks that we wear in ourselves, and it wants us to display this and not that, hence change our appearance. “Improvement” is: to display something of that which the good humans like — nothing more! 40[19] And as concerns descendants: one has to decide in a clever and timely way — aut libri aut liberi? 40[20]!3 Apart from the governesses who even today still believe in grammar as veritas aeterna! and consequently as subject predicate and object, no one is so innocent today as to still posit the subject “I” as the condition of “think” in the manner of Descartes; instead, through the skeptical movement of recent philosophy assuming the reverse has become more credible to us, namely thinking as cause and condition of “subject” and “object,” well as of “substance” and of “matter”: which is perhaps only the reverse kind of error.” This much is certain: — we have let go of the “soul” and consequently also the “world soul,” the ‘things in themselves’ as well (as) a world-beginning, a “first cause.” Thinking is not for us a means of “knowing,” but of describing occurrence, of ordering, of making things handy for our use: this is how we think today about thinking: tomorrow perhaps differently. We do not properly comprehend anymore how “comprehending” is supposed to be necessary, still less how it is supposed to have emerged: and though we (already) constantly get into the plight of having to help ourselves with language and the habits of the popular understanding, still the appearance of constant self-contradiction does not yet testify against the justification of our doubt. Also we are not so easily satisfied anymore with respect to “direct certainty”: we do not even find “reality” and “appearance” to be opposite, rather we would speak of [Page 2] Stanford University Press Stanford, California Translated from Friedrich Nietzsche, Sämtliche Werke: Kritische Studienausgabe, ed. Giorgio Colli and Mazzino Montinari, in 15 vols. This book corresponds to Vol. 11, pp. 423-710, and Vol. 12, pp. 9-184. Critical edition of Friedrich Nietzsche’s Sämtliche Werke and unpublished writings based on the original manuscripts. © Walter de Gruyter & Co., Berlin and New York, for the German Edition © Adelphi Edizioni, Milan, for the Italian Edition © Editions Gallimard, Paris, for the French Edition © Hakusuisha Publishing Comp., Tokyo, for the Japanese Edition © 2020 by the Board of Trustees of the Leland Stanford Junior University for the English Edition and associated apparatus. All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system without the prior written permission of Stanford University Press. Printed in the United States of America on acid-free, archival-quality paper CIP data appears at the end of the book. [Page 20] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 3 regular this may be, we do not comprehend it as necessary. — Yet we can consecutively determine different series of such successions: e.g., in piano playing the succession of struck keys, the succession of struck strings, the succession of sounding notes. 34153] Critique of the instinct of causality. The belief that an action happens on the basis of a motive was instinctively, gradually generalized at the time when everything that happened was imagined in the manner of conscious living beings. “Every occurrence happens on the basis of a motive: the causa finalis is the causa efficiens” — This belief is erroneous: purpose, motive are means to make the occurrence palpably practicable to us. — The generalization was likewise erroneous and illogical. No purpose. No will. 34154] The inverted order of time. The “external world” acts upon us: the effect is telegraphed to the brain, where it is arranged, shaped and traced back to its cause: then the cause is projected and only now does the fact enter our consciousness. T.e., “the world of appearance” first appears like a cause after “it” has acted and the effect has been processed. Le., we constantly invert the order of what is happening. — Whereas “T” see, it already sees something else. The situation is like that of pain. 34155] The belief in the senses. Is a fundamental fact of our intellect, which receives from them the raw material that it interprets. This relationship to the raw material offered by the senses is, morally speaking, not accompanied by the intention to truth, but instead purely by a will to overpowering, assimilation, nourishment. Our constant functions are absolutely egoistical, [Page 200] 40 AUGUST — SEPTEMBER 1885 193 degrees of being — and perhaps even more preferably of degrees of appearance — and that “direct certainty” e.g., of the fact that we think and that consequently thinking has reality we would still sour with the doubt of what degree this being has; whether perhaps as “ideas of God” we are indeed real, but fleeting and illusory like rainbows. Supposing that in the nature of things there were something deceptive silly something fraudulent, then the very best will de omnibus dubitare® in the manner of Descartes would not guard us from the traps of this nature; and precisely that Cartesian method could be a major trick to thoroughly fool us and take us for fools. Indeed, already insofar as we would actually have reality, in the opinion of Descartes, we as reality would have to share somehow in that fraudulent deceptive ground of things and its grounding-will: — enough, “I do not want to be deceived” could be the method of a deeper more subtle more thorough will, that wanted precisely the reverse: namely to deceive itself. In summa:” it is to be doubted whether “the subject” can prove itself — for this it would simply have to have a firm point outside and that is lacking! 40[21]’8 Point of departure from the body and from physiology: why? — We gain the right idea of the nature of our subject-unity, namely as regents at the head of a community, not as “souls” or “vital forces,” likewise of the dependence of these regents on the ruled and of the conditions of rank order and division of labor as enablement of individuals and the whole simultaneously. Likewise how living unities constantly emerge and die and how eternity is not part of the “subject”; likewise that struggle also expresses itself in obeying and commanding and a fluid determination of power limits is part of life. The certain ignorance in which the regent is kept regarding the individual arrangements and even disturbances of the community belongs to the conditions under which ruling can take place. In brief, we gain an appreciation for not-knowing, too, for seeing on the [Page 201] 194 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS whole and coarsely, for simplifying and falsifying, for the perspectival. But the most important thing is: that we understand the ruler and his subjects as identical in kind, all of them feeling, willing, thinking — and that we also learn to infer a corresponding subjective invisible life wherever we see or detect movement in the body. Movement is a symbolism for the eye; it signifies that something has been felt, willed, thought. — Direct questioning of the subject about the subject, and all self mirroring of the spirit has its dangers in the fact that for its activity it could be useful and important to falsely interpret itself. This is why we ask the body and reject the testimony of the sharpened senses: if you wish, we look into whether the subordinates themselves are capable of establishing contact with us. 40[22] NB. “Something is thought: consequently there exists something that thinks” — this is what Descartes’s argumentation amounts to — but it is not the reality of a thought that Descartes wanted. He wanted to get beyond “imagination” to a substance that thinks and imagines. 40[23] Let us be more careful than Descartes, who got caught up in the trap of words. Cogito’ is only a word to be sure: but it means something manifold: many a thing is manifold, and we grab at it crudely believing full well that it is one thing. In that famous cogito there is 1) it thinks 2) and I believe that it is I who is thinking here, 3) but even assuming that this second point remains hanging, as a matter of faith, then also that first “it thinks” contains another belief: namely, that “thinking” is an activity for which a subject, at least an “it” must be thought: — and the ergo sum?? means nothing more than this! But this is the belief in grammar, here “things” and their “activities” are already posited, and we are far away from direct”! certainty. Let us therefore leave that problematic “it” out and let [Page 202] 40 AUGUST — SEPTEMBER 1885 195 us say cogitatur as fact without articles of faith mixed in: thus we deceive ourselves again, for the passive form also includes articles of faith and not only “facts”: in summa, precisely the facts of the case cannot be set forth nakedly, “believing” and “presuming” are harbored in the cogito of cogitat? and cogitatur: who will guarantee that with ergo we do not extract something out of this believing and presuming and that what remains: something is believed, therefore something is believed — a false form of deduction! Ultimately one would have to know what “being” is in order to extract a sum from the cogito, one would likewise already have to know; what knowing is: one proceeds from faith in logic — in the ergo above all! — and not only from the setting forth of a fact! — Is “certainty” possible in knowing? is direct certainty not perhaps a contradictio in adjecto? What is knowing in relation to being? But for someone who brings already finished articles of faith to all these questions, the Cartesian cautiousness no longer has any meaning at all: it comes much too late. Before the question of “being” the question of the value of logic would have to be decided. 40[24]” One should not embellish and tidy up the naïveté of D(escartes), as e.g., Spir does. Consciousness is directly certain to itself: the existence of thinking cannot be denied, nor doubted, for this very denial or this doubt are themselves conditions of thinking or of consciousness, their own existence therefore proves what they deny, and consequently they are deprived of any significance.” Spir I, 26. “Something is thought,” therefore something is, namely “thinking.” Was this the meaning of Descartes? Teichmüller p- 5 and 40 there are passages. “Something that is directly certain to itself” is nonsense. Supposing e.g., God thought through us, and our thoughts, insofar as we felt ourselves as cause, were an illusion, then the existence of the thoughts would not be denied or doubted, but certainly the ergo sum. Otherwise he would [Page 203] 196 UNPUBLISHED

FRAGMENTS have to have said: ergo est. — There are no direct certainties: cogito, ergo sum presupposes that one knows what “thinking” is and secondly what “being” is: therefore, if the est (sum) were true, it would be a certainty on the basis of two correct judgments, with the added certainty that one has a right generally to the conclusion, to ergo —therefore in any case no “direct” c(ertainty). Namely: in cogito is harbored not only some kind of event, which is simply acknowledged — this is nonsense! — but a judgment that it is this and that event, and whoever e.g., did not know how to distinguish between thinking feeling and willing could not establish the event at all. And in sum or est is still harbored such a conceptual imprecision that not even fit?° or “it is done” are refuted. “Something is happening there” could be substituted for “there is something there, there exists something, there is something.” 40[25] The belief in the direct certainty of thinking is one more belief, and no certainty! We moderns are all opponents of Descartes and resist his dogmatic carelessness in doubting. “Doubting must be done better than Descartes!” We find the opposite, the countermovement against the absolute authority of the goddess “reason” wherever there are profounder human beings. Fanatical logicians managed to convince us that the world is a deception; and that only in thinking the path to “being,” to the “absolute” is given. By contrast I take pleasure in the world éf it is supposed to be deception; and among more complete h(umans) there has always been ridicule about the common sense of the most sensible. 40[26]7 Apparently contradictory the 2 qualities that distinguish modern Europeans: the individualistic and the demand for equal rights. I finally understand this. Namely the individual is an extremely vulnerable vanity: — the latter demands, with its awareness of how quickly it suffers, that every other is regarded as equal to it, that it is only inter pares.” Therewith a social race is characterized in which in fact the talents and [Page 204] 40 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 197 strengths do not vary considerably. Pride, which wants solitude and few appreciators, is completely beyond comprehension; the very “great” successes exist only through masses, indeed one scarcely comprehends that a mass-success is really always a small success: because pulchrum est paucorum hominum”? — All the moralities know nothing of the “rank order” of human beings; the law teachers nothing of the community-conscience. The individual-principle rejects the truly great human beings and among those who are roughly equal it demands the most subtle eye and the fastest recognition of a talent; and because everyone has something in the way of talents, in such late and civilized cultures, and accordingly can expect to win back his share of honors, today therefore an emphasizing of the small merits is taking place as never before: — it gives the age a patina of unlimited fairness. Its unfairness consists of a rage without bounds not against the tyrants and demagogues, also in the arts, but against the noe h(umans) who despise the praise of the many. The demand for equal rights

(e.g., to be allowed to sit in judgment over everything and everyone) is anti-aristocratic. Likewise foreign to it is the vanished individual, the submerging into a large type, the will-to-be-a-nonperson: in which the distinction and the ambition of many superior human beings formerly consisted (among them the greatest poets); or “city existence” as in Greece; Jesuitism, Prussian officer corps and bureaucracy; or being a disciple and continuator of great masters: for which unsocial conditions and the lack of petty vanity are necessary 40[27] Just as mathematics and mechanics for long periods were regarded as sciences with absolute validity and only now the suspicion dares to unveil itself that they are nothing more and nothing less than applied logic based on the specific unverifiable assumption that there are “identical cases” —but logic itself a consequential hieroglyphics on the basis of the executed assumption (that there are identical cases) — : so too [Page 205] 198 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS the word formerly qualified as the knowledge of a thing, and even now the grammatical functions are the best-believed things, against which one cannot sufficiently guard oneself. It is possible that the same kind of human being who later thought up Vedanta-philosophies, thousands of years earlier probably thought up a philosophical language on the basis of imper(fect) languages, not, as they believed, as hieroglyphics, but as “knowledge of the world” itself: but whatever “this is” may have been postulated so far, a later and subtler age has discovered again and again that it is nothing more than “this means.” Even today most philos(ophers) do not have even an inkling of the actual critique of concepts or (as I once described it) a real “history of the emergence of thinking.” One should uncover and reevaluate the valuations that lie around logic: e.g., “the certain is of more value than the uncertain” “thinking is our highest function”; likewise the optimism in the logical, the triumphal awareness in every inference, the imperatival in judgment, the innocence in the belief in the comprehensibility of the concept.*? 40[28] There must have been thinking long before there were eyes: “lines and shapes” therefore are not given from the beginning, rather, thinking has occurred for the longest time based on sensations of touch: but this, not supported by the eye, teaches degrees of pressure sensation, not yet shapes. Hence prior to the practice of understanding the world as moved shapes lies the period in which it was “grasped” as changeable and degree-differential pressure sensation. There is no doubt that thinking can occur in images, in sounds: but also in pressure sensations. The comparison with respect to strength and direction and sequence, memory etc. 40[29]?! We must relearn with respect to memory: here lurks the major seduction of assuming a “soul,” which timelessly reproduces, [Page 206] 40 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 199 recognizes etc. But what is experienced’? continues to live “in » en C ns . . memory’; that it “comes” is beyond my control, for this the will is inactive, as in the coming of any thought. Something happens of which I become aware: now something similar comes —who calls it? awakens it? 40[30] The great danger inheres in the assumption that there is direct knowing (therefore “knowing” in the strict sense generally!) Teichmüller p. 35.3 40[31] This would have to be something, not subject, not object, not energy, not material, not spirit, not soul: — but someone will tell me that something of this kind would have to look like the spitting image of a hallucination? I believe this myself: and bad if it did not do that! Indeed: it must also look like the spitting image of everything else that there is and that could be, and not only of the hallucination! It must have the great family feature by which everything recognizes itself as related to it — — 40[32] Supposing you were to ask: “Did the tree already look green 50,000 years ago?” then I would answer: “perhaps not yet: perhaps back then there were only the two main contrasts of valeurs, darker and lighter masses: — and gradually colors evolved from them. 40[33] Before logic, which operates everywhere with equations, equating, assimilating must have reigned: and it continues to reign, and logical thinking is itself an ongoing means of assimilation, of wanting-to-see identical cases. 40[34] Our “memory,” whatever it might be, may serve us as a metaphor for describing something important with it: in the [Page 207] 200

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS development of every organic being a prodigy of memory for its overall prehistory reveals itself, to the extent organic beings have a prehistory — and to be sure a reproducing memory that reproduces the earliest and longest-embodied forms sooner than the recently experienced: reaches back in this manner and does not go step by step, as one would have to assume, with a regressus” from the most recent to the most-distantly experienced, rather precisely the opposite way round it leaves aside for the time being everything more recent and freshly imprinted. Here an amazing arbitrariness exists: — Even the “soul,” which is usually called upon to help in all philosophical predicaments, is incapable of helping here: at least not the individualsoul, but a soul-continuum that reigned in the entire process of a certain organic series. Then again: because not everything is reproduced, but only basic forms, then in every memory a subsuming thinking, simplifying, reducing must constantly take place: enough, something analogous to what we describe as “logic” from the standpoint of our consciousness. — And how far might this reproduction go of the previously experienced? Certainly also as far as the reproduction of trains of feeling and thought. But how do (we) regard the “innate ideas” that Locke called into question?*

There is certainly much more true than only this, that ideas are innate, assuming one does not underscore the act of birth in the word “innate.” 40[35] The universal mendacity of human beings about themselves, the moral interpreting of what they do and want, would be despicable if it were not also something very funny: and it really would require spectators — so interesting is the spectacle! Not by the kind of gods Epicurus imagined! But by Homeric gods: as distant and near to humans and watching them as Galiani perhaps stood in relation to his cats and monkeys: — thus related a bit to humans, but of a higher species! [Page 208] 40 AUGUST — SEPTEMBER 1885 201 40[36] Mathematical physicists cannot use the particle-atom for their science: consequently they construct themselves a forcepoints-world with which one can reckon. Exactly the same, on a crude scale, has been done by humans and all organic creatures: namely they positioned, thought, and fictionalized the world to suit themselves for so long that they were able to use it, until they were able to “reckon” with it. 40[37] Should it not suffice for us to think of “force” as a unity in which willing sensing and thinking are still mixed and undifferentiated? And the organic beings as approaches to separation, so that all the organic functions are still together in that unity, thus self-regulation, assimilation, nourishment, excretion, metabolism? Ultimately nothing is given as “real” except thinking and sensing and drives: is it not permitted to attempt whether this given does not suffice to construct the world? I do not mean as appearance: but precisely as real as our willing feeling thinking are — but as a more primitive form of them. In the end the question is this: whether we acknowledge the will really as effecting? If we do this, then naturally it can only have effect on something that is of its kind: and not on “materials.” Either one must interpret all effect as illusion (for we have formed our idea of cause and effect only according to the model of our will as cause!) and then nothing at all is comprehensible: or one must attempt to think all effects as being of the same kind, like acts of will, hence make the hypothesis as to whether all mechanical events, insofar as there is a force in them, are not simply force of will. — “Mortal souls” with resp. {ect} to the impossibility of transferring the numerical relationship to these things. Against the individual. “Counting” is only a simplification, like all concepts. Namely: wherever something should be thought purely [Page 209] 202 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS arithmetical, quality is calculated away. Likewise in everything logical, where the identity of caes is the assumption, therefore the actual spec(ial) character of each event is simply thought away (the new, not to be understood from the conditions of emergence — or r(esp(ectively) included.) 40[38] What it boils down to is properly characterizing the unity in which thinking willing and feeling and all affects are combined: obviously the intellect is only a tool, but in whose hands? Certainly the affects: and these are a multiplicity behind which it is not necessary to posit a unity: it suffices to construe it as a regency. — That the organs have everywhere taken shape, as is shown by morphological development, may also certainly be used as a metaphor for the intellectual: so that something “new” is to be construed always only through the separation of a single force from a synthetic force. Thinking itself is the kind of action that takes apart what is actually One. Everywhere is the appearance that there are countable multiplicities, already in thinking as well. There is nothing “added” in reality, nothing “divided,” a thing half and half is not equal to the whole. 40[39] Physicists are now of one mind with all metaphysicians that we live in a world of deception: fortunate that one no longer needs to settle up with a God on this issue, about whose “truthfulness” one could come to odd ideas. The perspectival nature of the world goes as deep as our “understanding” of the world reaches today; and I would dare to apply it even where human beings generally should in fairness be allowed to look away from understanding — I mean where metaphysicians (posit) the realm of the seeming certain-to-itself, understandable-to-itself, a(nd) in thinking. That number is a perspectival form, as well as time and space, that we no more harbor “one soul” in a breast than “two souls,”³ that “individuals” like [Page 21] 14 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS Machiavellian, unscrupulous, subtle. Commanding and obeying driven to the highest extreme, and in order that there can be complete “obedience,” the individual organ has much freedom. The error of believing in purposes. Will — a superfluous assumption. The inverted order of time. Critique of the belief in causality. The belief in the senses, as the fundamental fact of our being. The central-force — must not be essentially different from that which it rules. The history of emergence does not explain qualities. The latter must already be known. Historical explanation is reduction to a succession to which we are accustomed: by analogy. 34156] The mechanistic explanation of the world is an ideal: to explain as much as possible with as little as possible, i.e., to put it in formulas. Still needed: the denial of empty space; to think space as defined and limited; just like the world as eternally repeating itself. 34157] How a people’s character, a “people’s soul” emerges provides information about the emergence of the individual soul. First a series of activities is forced upon a people, as conditions of existence, it grows accustomed to them, they become firmer and establish themselves more deeply. Peoples who experience great transformations and end up under new conditions show a new grouping of their strengths: this and that emerges and gets the upper hand because it is now more necessary for existence, e.g., the practical, sober sense of today’s Germans. All character is first role. The “personality” of philosophers — at bottom persona. [Page 210] 40 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 203 material “atoms” can no longer be maintained, except for the daily-domestic use of thinking, and (have) fled into a nothingness (or into a “formula”), that nothing living and dead can be added together, that both concepts are false, that there are not three faculties of the soul, that “subject” and “object” “activum and passivum” “cause and effect” “means and purpose” are always only perspectival forms, in summa that the soul, substance, number, time, space, ground, purpose —stand and fall together. But supposing now that we are not so foolish as to value truth, in this case the x, higher than appearance, supposing we have resolved to /ive — then we do not want to be dissatisfied with this seemingness of things and only firmly embrace that no one pauses at any kind of ulterior motives in the representation of this perspectivity: — which in fact has happened so far to nearly all philosophers, for they all had ulterior motives and loved their “truths” — Indeed: here we have to throw open the problem of truthfulness: supposing we live as a result of error, what then can the “will to truth” be? Would it not have to be a “will to death”? — Would the striving of philosophers and scientific people perhaps be a symptom of degenerating dying-out life, a kind of life-weariness of life itself? Quaeritur: and here one could really become contemplative. 40[40] Skepticism Toward the Skeptics. — What happiness a delicate dawn gives to things! How all of life glows with beautiful appearances! So far it was the great falsifications and explanations that raised us up above the happiness of animals — into the human! And conversely: what so far has the creaking of the logical clockwork, the self-reflection of the intellect, the unwinding of the instincts brought with it? Supposing you had reduced everything to formulas and your faith to degrees of probability: because you could not live according to them, what? are you supposed to live with bad conscience? And once human beings perceive their belief in goodness justice and truth in the ground of things as hair-raising falsification: how [Page 211] 204 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS are they themselves supposed to feel, insofar as they (are) indeed part and parcel of this world? As something hair-raising, false: — — — 40/41] There are no direct sensations Spir 2 p. 56.° no direct pain feelings no direct thoughts If there were a direct knowing, then one could not speak, like J. S. Mill, of the “relativity of knowing.” 40[42]! The assumption of a single subject is perhaps not necessary; perhaps it is equally permissible to assume a multiplicity of subjects, whose working together and struggle underlie our thinking and generally our consciousness? A kind of aristocracy of “cells” in which ruling resides? Certainly of pares,? who together are accustomed to ruling and know how to command? My hypotheses: The subject as multiplicity pain as intellectual and dependent on the judgment “harmful”: projected effect always “unconscious”: the inferred and imagined “cause” is projected, follows after time. pleasure as a kind of pain. the single force that exists is of the same kind as the will’s, a commanding of other subjects, who change themselves accordingly. the constant transitoriness and fleetingness of the subject, “mortal soul” number as perspectival form. 40[43]° Within a herd, every community, therefore inter pares, the overestimation of truthfulness makes good sense. Not to let oneself be deceived — and consequently, as personal morality, not to [Page 212] 40 AUGUST — SEPTEMBER 1885 205 practice deception oneself! A mutual obligation among equals! It is to the outside that danger and caution demand us to be on guard against deception: as a psychological precondition for this also inside. Distrust as the source of truthfulness. 40[44] Supposing the world were false, life were understandable only on the ground of delusion, under the protection of delusion, based on delusion: what then would “live according to nature” mean? Could the exhortation not be precisely: “be a deceiver”? Indeed, how could one prevent oneself deceiving? We err about ourselves and are incomprehensible to ourselves: how much more are we this for our “neighbors”! But they do not believe themselves to be deceived by us — and it is with that in mind that all dealings with mutual rights and obligations are based. — That deceiving is not part of my intention, admitted! But looked at more closely: I also do nothing to enlighten my neighbors about the fact that they deceive themselves about me. I do not prevent their error, I do not fight it, I let it happen — : in this sense I am indeed the deceiver in the end on purpose. But I also behave exactly the same toward myself: self-knowledge does not belong among the feelings of obligation; even if I seek to know myself, it happens for reasons of utility or a more refined curiosity — but not out of the will to truthfulness. — That the truthful one is more valuable than the liar in the economy of humanity would still have to be proven. The very great and powerful were deceivers so far: their task demanded it of them. Assuming it turned out that living and getting ahead were only possible on the basis of a consistent and lengthy period of being deceived: then the consistent deceivers could achieve highest honors as ones who condition life and promote life. That one harms by not telling the truth is the belief of the naive, a kind of frog-perspective of morality. If life and the value of life rest on well-believed errors, then precisely the truth-teller, the truth-willer could be the harmful one (as the unwinder of illusions). [Page 213] 206 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 40[45]4 The Philosopher of the Future. Thoughts on Discipline and Cultivation.“ 40[46] NB. Our distant future determination reigns over us, even if we do not yet have an eye open for it; for long periods of time we experience only riddles. Our choice of people and things, our selection of events, the pushing away of what is most pleasant, often of what is most revered — it frightens us, as if here and there chance, a random act were bursting out of us like a volcano: but it is the higher reason of our future task. Seen forwards everything that happens to us might seem like only the unanimity of chance and nonsense: seen backwards I for my part am no longer able to find anything of either of them in my life. 40[47] Descent. What is noble? The emergence of the nobility. The imitating talents as in Voltaire. ‘The great separation. The seven solitudes. The will to power. 40[48]° On the Order of Rank. Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future. Book One: Cultivation and Discipline. Book Two: The Great Separation. Book Three: The Seven Solitudes. Overcoming Morality. Book Four: The Will to Power. 40[49] Let us be suspicious of all seeming “simultaneity”! Time fragments insert themselves here, which can only be called small [Page 214] 40 AUGUST—SEPTEMBER 1885 207 according to a crude standard, e.g., our human standard of time; but in abnormal circumstances, e.g., as hashish smokers or in a moment of mortal danger, even we humans have a sense of how in one second of our pocket watch a thousand thoughts can be thought, a thousand experiences experienced. When I open my eyes the visible world stands there, apparently immediately: but in the meantime something tremendous has happened, multifarious things have occurred: — first second third: but here the ph(ysiologists) should speak! 40[50]” Herewith under the not undangerous title “The Will to Power” a new philosophy or, spoken more clearly, the attempt at a new interpretation of all events, should have its say: as is fair only provisionally and as an attempt, only in preparation and questioningly, only “as prelude” to an earnestness for which initiated and chosen ears are required, as goes without saying, incidentally — or at least should go without saying — for everything that a ph(ilosopher) says publicly. But today, thanks to the superficial and presumptuous spirit of an age that believes in the “equality of all rights,” it has gotten to the point that one absolutely no longer — — — For every philosopher should have the virtues of an educator to the extent that before he undertakes to convince, he must first know how to persuade. Indeed, before proving anything the seducer has to undermine and shock, before any commanding and leading he must first ascertain the extent to which he also knows how to seduce. 40[51] Concepts are something that lives, consequently also something now growing, now receding: many concepts have died a miserable death. As a metaphor they would probably have to be described as cells, with a cell nucleus and a surrounding body that is not firm and — — — [Page 215] 208 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 40[52] There are fateful words that seem to express a knowledge and in truth prevent a knowledge; to them belongs the word “appearances.” Let these propositions I have borrowed from various modern philosophers reveal what chaos these “appearances” can perpetrate. against the word “appearances.” 40[53] NB. Appearance® as I understand it is the actual and single reality of things — that which first merits all existing predicates and which relatively speaking is best described with all, therefore even the most opposing predicates. But with this word nothing more can be expressed than its inaccessibility for logical procedures and distinctions: therefore “appearance” as opposed to “logical truth” — but which itself is only possible in an imaginary world. Thus I do not posit “appearance” in opposition to “reality” but conversely take appearance as the reality that resists transformation into an imaginary “truthworld.” A specific name for this reality would be “the will to power,” namely described from the inside and not from the standpoint of its incomprehensible fluid protean nature. 40[54] The deliberateness of actions is nothing decisive in morality (belongs to the myopic individualistic tendency). “End” and “means” in relation to the entire species from which they grow are only symptomatic, ambiguous in themselves and nearly incomprehensible. Animals and plants show their moral character according to the life conditions in which they are placed. What is decisive lies only behind “deliberateness.” One will never be allowed to isolate the individual: “Here, one must say, is a growth with such a prehistory.” 40155] Nature’s conformance to law is a false humanitarian interpretation. What is at stake is an absolute determination of power [Page 216] 40 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 209 relationships, the whole brutality, without the alleviation brought along by the anticipation of the future, caution and cunning and prudence, in brief by the intellect in organic life. The absolute momentariness of the will to power reigns; in the human being (and already in the cell) this determination is a process that continually displaces itself in the growth of all participants — a struggle, assuming that one understands this word broadly and deeply enough still to understand the relationship of the ruler to the ruled as one of wrestling, and the relationship of the obeyer to the ruler as one of resisting. 40[56] 1. On Noble and Common Morality. “The ethical”: a type of human being is supposed to be preserved. Noble morality. What is human is supposed to be preserved to some kind of degree: common morality. 2. The intentionality of actions. 3. Evil in the virtues. 4. The bad drives and their utility. 40[57] NB! But is something at rest really happier than everything in motion? Is the immutable really and necessarily more valuable than a thing that changes? And if someone contradicts himself thousands of times and walks many paths and wears many masks and finds in himself no end and (no) final line on the horizon: is it more probable that such a man experiences less of the “truth” than a virtuous stoic who has placed himself on his spot once and for all, like a pillar and with the hard hide of a pillar? But these kinds of prejudices have sat at the threshold to all philosophy so far: and especially the one that certainty is better than uncertainty and open seas, and that appearance is what a philosopher has to fight as his actual enemy. [Page 217] 210 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 40[58] There is little importance now in people knowing what I really wanted back then from Richard Wagner (although the reader of my Birth of Tragedy will not be in the dark about that), indeed, that I, through a longing of this kind, definitely proved in the most thorough manner how seriously I erred about him and his talent. Enough, that my error — including my belief in a shared and compatible destiny — does dishonor neither to him nor me and, in any case, was no small refreshment and boon to us both at the time, as two men isolated in very different ways. The moment came when I sensed to what extent I had wanted much too much with respect to Richard Wagner: and, somewhat later, the even worse moment when he my — — — 40[s]” Conclusion of “In Relations with Others” Preface and Prequestion: “what are free spirits?” (1) “Through its health, a soul in which dwells the wisdom of the world must make even the body healthy”: thus says Montaigne,”? and today I gladly say my Yes to that, as someone who has experience in this sphere. “There can be nothing more cheerful, more alert, I would almost have said more fun than the world and its wisdom”: thus likewise I speak with Montaigne — but under what pale and horrific masks did wisdom pass me by at that time! Enough, I was afraid of it often enough and did not like being alone with it like that — — — and embarked, alone and in silence, but with a tenacious “will to wisdom” and to the south — on wandering. Back then I privately called myself a “free spirit,” or “Prince Vogelfrei”™! and if anyone had asked me: where is your home anyway, I would have answered him “maybe beyond good and evil, otherwise nowhere.” But I insisted firmly that I had no wandering comrades: then one day I cast my fishing line in search of other [Page 218] 40 AUGUST — SEPTEMBER 1885 211 “free spirits” — with precisely this book, to which I have already given the title “A Book for Free Spirits.” Today of course — what does one not learn after all in ten years! — I scarcely know any more whether I am seeking companions and “wandering comrades.” For in the meantime I learned what few now understand, to bear solitude, “understand” — solitude, and today I would place it right there among the essential characteristics of a “free spirit” that he would rather walk alone, rather fly alone, indeed, if he happened to have sick legs, rather crawl alone. Solitude kills if it does not heal: this is true; solitude is part of a wicked and dangerous art of healing. But it is certain that when it heals it also sets up a human being in a healthier and more self-affirming way than a human being could ever stand in society, or a tree in its woods: solitude tests most thoroughly, more than any illness itself, whether someone is born and destined for fe — or for death, like most people. Enough, I first learned from solitude how to think to the end the complementary concepts “free spirit” and “health.” 2. We “free spirits” live apart and here and there on earth — this cannot be changed; we are few — and this is fair. It belongs to our pride to think that our kind is a rare and unusual kind; and we do not crowd together, we probably do not even “long” for each other. To be sure: if we happen to meet once, like today, then there is a celebration! When we use the word “happiness” in the sense of our philosophy, then we are not thinking above all like the weary, fearful and suffering among the philosophers of external peace, of painlessness, immobility, undisturbedness, of a “Sabbath of Sabbaths,” of something that might resemble deep sleep in value. On the contrary, our world is the uncertain, the changing, capable of transforming, ambiguous, a dangerous world! certainly more than the simple world that always stays the same, predictable, fixed, to which philosophers so far have given highest honors, as heirs of the herd instinct and herd valuations. Known in many lands of the spirit and driven about etc. [Page 219] 212 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 3. Have these words described you? Or have they only concealed you in a new way? I do not know: but you tell me in any case that you think I have erred in using this name? That the name “free spirit” has been anticipated? That it misleads? That people will mistake us on the basis of this name? — But why, among us, my friends, why indeed should we not mislead? What does it matter that people mistake us? Will we therefore mistake ourselves? And in the end: would it perhaps not be worse if — —? Well then, I understand you: you absolutely want another, a new name! “Out of pride” you tell me: the best argument on which to base any stupidity. Thus I will start over again: now open your ears to my novelties! — But here you interrupt me, you free spirits. “Enough, Enough! I hear you shouting and laughing — we cannot take it any more! Oh you horrific fool! You virtuous traitor and slanderer! Do you want to ruin our reputation throughout the world? Blacken our good name? Saddle us with nicknames that eat their way into not only our skin? Be quiet, you disturber of the conscience’s peace! And why, on a bright sunny day, these gloomy grimaces, these gurgling noises, this whole raven-black music? If you speak truths: there are no feet that could dance to these truths, therefore they are no truths for us. Ecce nostrum veritatis sigillum? And here is lawn and soft ground: what would be better than to swiftly chase away your mopey thoughts and make ourselves a good day after your ‘night’? But someone has to strike up the tune for us! And first let’s get rid of all these storm clouds! It is high time that a rainbow stretched itself again over the land, some colorful beautiful bridge of lies upon which only spirits, very free, very airy merry spirits can walk! And lastly and firstly: have you no milk to drink? You yourself have made us thirsty for your milk!” — “As much as you want, my friends. There you see my herd leaping, all my tender sunny sheltered lambs and rams: [Page 22] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 15 34158] Numbers are our major means for making the world manageable. We comprehend as far as we can count, i.e., as far as a constancy can be perceived. 34[59]” The course of philos(ophy) has so far been impeded most by moral ulterior motives. 34[60] Even within our world of the senses, if only we sharpen or think of it sharpened, a world arises that has a quite different effect on our feeling 34[61] The prejudice of causality the prejudice of will the prejudice of purpose the prejudice of personality Knowledge: a false concept i.e., a concept we have no right to propose. Abolition 1) of will 2) of purposes as “why” and “by what means” 3) consequently also of causality (which derives from both) 34[62]° “How are synthetic judgments a priori possible?” — “dy means of a faculty for them” was the famous Kantian answer, which gave such satisfaction to many. 34163] The most useful concepts have survived: however falsely they may have originated. [Page 220] 40 AUGUST -SEPTEMBER 1885 213 and here standing waiting for you already is a whole pail full of milk, a pail full of freshly milked truths, still warm enough to make you warm again. Incipit: °? ‘Human All Too Human: Good Milk for Free Spirits.’ Do you want to drink some? It is lovely to be silent together — — —* 40[60] Artist-pessimism. — There are very different kinds of artists. If Richard Wagner must be a pessimist, then he is forced into it by his aversion to himself, the worm of manifold self-contempt, the necessity of intoxicants, including his art, in order to tolerate life at all, and again disgust behind the intoxication, added to all this the consciousness of thespianism, the pressure of unfreedom from which everyone suffers who must disguise himself because he cannot tolerate himself naked — on the other hand his insatiable hunger for praise and noise, because such comedians must always have their belief in themselves bestowed first from the outside and only for moments at a time: — they are not in the least free to renounce praise and noise! But what help are even the most blissful moments of vanitatum vanitas, what help is all incense, all self-deification! Immediately afterwards the old grief stirs anew! and above all the storms of passion, or the intemperance masked as passion, in the end an inner weak hesitating voice will always sound forth once more, a sentencing voice: — Such artists involuntarily and unavoidably glorify their “non-ego” in their art, and everything that constitutes the extreme opposite of themselves: those therefore, in the case of Wagner, all extravagant virtues, e.g., absolute loyalty or absolute chastity or the simplicity of a child or ascetic self-sacrifices: so that up to a certain point one would have a right to be suspicious of the character of every artist who always glorifies precisely only extravagant virtues: for that way he wants to get free of himself and he denies himself! But let us be satisfied with this even so! In the end such an artist for all his will to world denial [Page 221] 214 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS actually praises and extols something that is possible in this world: art can be nothing other than world-affirmation! — And my objection, my friends, was no objection. Therefore my friend: one will have noticed from his judgment, even if one does not agree with it, that he loved Wagner very much: for an opponent never takes his subject so profoundly as he does. There is no doubt that insofar as he suffers from Wagner, he also suffers with Wagner. 40[61]*° For the Plan. Our intellect, our will, likewise our sensations are dependent on our valuations: these correspond to our drives and their conditions of existence. Our drives are reducible to the will to power. The will to power is the last factum to which we are able to get down. Our intellect a tool Our will Our feelings of malaise > { already dependent on valuations Our sensations 40[62] The embellishing style of historiography of Ranke, his pussy-footing, in all those passages where what is needed is to record a terrible nonsense of chance as such; his belief in an immanent finger of God as it were, that occasionally pushes and shifts something in the clockwork: for he no longer dares, the super-anxious one, to regard him either as clockwork or as the cause of the clockwork 40[63]” Preface to “Mixed Opinions and Maxims” What kind of human might that be who takes joy in such notations? — Allow me to quickly paint my picture of this kind [Page 222] 40 AUGUST — SEPTEMBER 1885 215 on the nearest best wall: here, on the pages of my “preface.” The last thing I want to do is lay claim to a characterization, a single word for it, even though there might be such a thing: — perhaps someone who sees my picture will find the word himself — the “right word”! This kind of human protects the artist and philosopher but does not mistake himself for them. They are idle, they have the reasonableness for *otium® 40164]? For a long time

I tried as hard as I could to see a kind of Cagl(iostro) in R. W(agner): one must forgive me this far from innocuous idea, which at least was not inspired by hatred or by revulsion, but by the charm that this incomparable human being exerted on me: add to this that according to my observations the real “geniuses,” the genuine ones of the highest order, all do not “charm” in this manner, so that “genius” alone did not seem to me to suffice as an explanation for that mysterious influence. 40[65]° Preface Whoever has the desires of a high and selective soul will at all times be in great danger: but today it is extraordinary. Thrown into a noisy, rabble-like age with which he does not want to eat from the same bowl, he could easily perish of hunger and thirst, or, in the event he finally “digs in” after all, of disgust. Such a human being must be helped at the right time by a pair of strokes of fortune that somehow manage to balance out whatever harm may have befallen him through an unsatisfied, yearning and isolated youth: for instance that a rigorous occupation is found for him, in whose service he temporarily becomes estranged from himself and his illness, and has to live totally and completely according only to the demands of a brave spirituality. Or that he opens his ears to a ph(ilosopher) who leads him away from everything timely and time-flattering back to [Page 223] 216 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS “more enduring” goals than the present, yet without damaging his pupil’s sense of respect through an excess of denial: that he becomes a friend of good music and even better of good musicians themselves — a great solace (for the good musicians are all hermits and “outside of time”) and a good antidote against an all-too-martial a(nd) wrathful inclination that likes to pounce on the human beings and things of today. It happened late — I was already beyond my twenties in years — when I realized what I was still entirely lacking: namely justice. “What is justice? And is it possible? And should it not be possible, how then would life be bearable?” — this is what I asked myself relentlessly. Wherever I dug in myself, it alarmed me deeply to find only passions, only corner-perspectives, only the unscrupulousness of those who were already lacking the preconditions for justice: but where was the presence of mind? — namely presence of mind from comprehensive insight. The only things I admitted to myself were courage and a certain hardness, which are the fruits of a long self-mastery. In fact it already took courage and hardness to admit so much to myself and moreover so late. Enough, I found reasons and ever better reasons to distrust my praise as well as my blame and to laugh about the judicial dignity that I had presumed for. myself: indeed I finally forbade myself, with shame, any right to Yes and No; at the same time a sudden and intense curiosity awakened for the unknown world in me — in brief, I resolved to go into a hard and long new school and as far as possible away from my corner. Perhaps justice itself would meet up with me for once along the way! Thus began for me a period of wandering. What was really happening to me back then? I did not understand myself, but the stimulus was like a command. It seems that our distant future determination disposes over us; for a long time we experience only riddles. Our selection of events, what we seize and suddenly crave, the pushing away of what is most pleasant, often of what is most revered: it frightens us as if here and there chance, a random, mad act were [Page 224] 40 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 217 bursting out of us like a volcano. But it is only the higher reason and caution of our future task. The long sentence of my life wants perhaps — thus I asked myself restlessly — to be read backwards? Forwards, there is no doubt of this, at that time I read only “words without meaning.” A great, ever greater separation, a voluntary going-abroad, an “alienation,” cooling off, sobering up — this alone, nothing more was my desire in those years. I tested everything to which my heart had generally attached itself up to that point, I turned around the best and most beloved things and looked at their other sides, I did the opposite with everything on which the human art of slander and defamation had so far been practiced most subtly. Back then I walked around many things that had so far remained foreign to me with a sparing, even loving curiosity, I learned to perceive our time and everything “modern” — more fairly. On the whole it might have been an uncanny and wicked game; — I was often ill because of it. That separation comes suddenly like an earthquake: the young soul has to see what is happening to it. At the same time it is an illness that can destroy human beings: this first outbreak of strength and will to self-determination; and much more pathological are the first peculiar and wild experiments of the spirit to henceforth shift the world into place on one’s own. But my decision remained standing; and, even ill, I put the best face on my “games” and maliciously defended myself against every conclusion in which illness or loneliness or the exhaustion of wandering could have played a part. “Forward,” I said to myself, “tomorrow you will be healthy, today it suffices for you to feign health.” Back then I gained mastery over everything “pessimistic” in me; the will to health itself, the play-acting of health was my cure. What I perceived and wanted as “health” at the time is expressed comprehensibly and treacherously enough in these sentences (p. 37 of the first edition“): “a stable, mild, and basically cheerful soul, a mood that does not need to be on guard against pranks and sudden outbursts and whose expressions have no grumbling in their [Page 225] 218 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS tone, nor any sullenness — those familiar, burdensome traits of old dogs and people who have been on a chain for a long time” — and “as the most desirable condition that free, fearless hovering above people, customs, laws, and traditional appraisals of things.” — Indeed a kind of bird freedom and bird panorama, something of curiosity and contempt at the same time, whose like is familiar to anyone who surveys a tremendous multifariousness without being involved. — “A free spirit” — (this) cool word does a person good in any condition, it nearly warms; a human being has become the opposite of those who worry about things that do not concern them; the free spirit — was concerned purely about things that no longer “worry” him. It is of no use that it immediately becomes a hard nut that must be cracked here: — the superior human being, the exceptional human being must, unless he — — — Back then the personal result of all that was (Human, All Too Human, p. 31) as I described it, logical world-denial: namely the judgment that the world that concerns us at all is false. “It is not the world as thing in itself” — this is void, void of meaning and worthy of Homeric laughter! — “but the world as error that is so rich in meaning, deep, and wonderful, bearing happiness and unhappiness in its lap”:^{o*} thus I decreed at the time — . The “overcoming of metaphysics,” “which requires the greatest possible exertion of human presence of mind” (p. 23)[%] I regarded as achieved: and at the same time I posed myself the challenge of maintaining a great grateful meaning for these overcome metaphysics, insofar as “the greatest advancement of humanity” derived from them. But in the background stood the will to a much broader curiosity, indeed to a tremendous experiment: the thought dawned in me as to whether all values did not permit themselves to be reversed, and the question always came back: “what do all human valuations mean anyway? What do they reveal about the conditions of life — your life, and furthermore of human life, ultimately of all life generally? — [Page 226] 40 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 219 40[66]4 Draft for 2) of the preface: whoever has not experienced similar things does not belong here. A book of preparation. One must write a preface not only to invite, but to scare away. “Our highest insights must and should etc. To avoid being mistaken,[@] I added many things in order to enhance the state to which back then I : it is a necessary transition-state for a few human beings. — Now I could say some things more comprehensibly. Rejection of “freethinkers.” Against the scabies anarchistica.[@] It is a book through which natures that are destined to rule a(nd) lead the way under certain circumstances should be brought to terrible conclusions, to reflection regarding the discipline toward themselves, the kind of superiority and accessibility to many ways of thinking (flexibility) and that tremendous health that even does not want to do without illness for a higher purpose. That discipline and self-mastery of the spirit that is just as much a flexibility of the heart as an art of the mask: that inner comprehensiveness and pampering that permits the walking of paths to many and opposing ways of thinking, without our running the danger of getting lost in or falling in love with them; that tremendous health that even does not want to do without illness, that excess of plastic healing imitating restoring powers 6 40[67]^o” It was at that time that I first developed an eye for history: Ranke. Ignorance in the natural sciences and medicine makes our historians into modest advocates of facta:^{@*} as if for us . c . D» . (9 something good “came of it” after all, some little “finger of God” at least. 40[68]” No. 1 of H. All Too H: The Sphinx. — Conclusion of section I: the new Oedipus. [Page 227] 220

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 40[69] Our “spirit” including feelings and sensations is a tool that is at the service of a many-headed and multifaceted master: this master is our valuations. But our valuations reveal something of what our /ife-conditions are (for the least part the conditions of the person, to a greater extent those of the species “human being,” and to the greatest and widest extent the conditions under which /ife generally is possible). 40[70]”o “German.” Questions and Dashes.”! German Pessimism German Romanticism. The Rediscoverers of the Greeks. German Anarchism. The Dangers of the Jewish Soul. The Literati. Women. Hermits. The Demagogues in Art. German Style. German Music. The South The East (two souths: Venice and Provence) The “Enlightenment” and Modern Ideas. The School Master Culture. Wagnerianism. The Europeans. The German Spirit. The Jews Voila un homme. “Profundity.” The Christian European. 72 [Page 228] [41 = W I 5. August-September 1885] 4i] Sils-Maria end of August 1885 Friedrich Nietzsche, Collected Writings. Early Works. The Birth of Tragedy. Unfashionable Observations. Address on Homer. Human, All Too Human: A Book for Free Spirits. “Between Ourselves”: Mixed Opinions and Maxims. Dawn: Thoughts on the Presumptions of Morality Gai Saber: Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future. Thus Spoke Zarathustra: A Book for All and None. Noon and Eternity: Bequest of a Soothsayer. “Exultabit Solitudo et florebit quasi lilium.” Isaiah. iz}? New Unfashionable Observation. — 1. In our youth we admire and despise like a fool and probably bring forth our tenderest and highest feelings for the interpretation of people and things that do not belong to us, as little as we belong to them. Youth itself is something falsifying and deceiving. It seems that the reverence and the anger suited to youth are unwilling to rest at all until they have “falsified” people and [Page 229] 222 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS things in such a way that it can unleash its emotions on them. Later on, when we have become stronger, deeper, also more truthful, we are startled to discover how little we had our eyes open at the time, when we sacrificed at these altars. We are angered at not having seen all that is vain, exaggerated, fake, varnished, thespian in our beloved idols — we are angered on account of this self-blinding, as if it had been a dishonest blindness. In this transition we take vengeance on ourselves through distrust; we are on guard against our enthusiastic feelings — indeed we feel even “a good conscience” to be a danger, like a self-veiling and weariness of one’s own honesty. One decade later again: and we understand that all this too still — was youth, — 2. — Wha I myself once, in my “young years,” wrote about Schopenhauer and Richard Wagner, and not so much wrote as painted — perhaps in an all too daring super-exuberant and super-youthful æl fresco? — that is what I want least to scrutinize today with an eye toward “true” and “false.” But supposing I had erred back then: my error at least accrues to the dishonor neither of those mentioned, nor of myself! It çs something to err thus; it is also something to seduce precisely me to error in this manner. In any case it was also an invaluable boon to me, back then when I decided to paint “the philosopher” and “the artist” and my own “categorical imperative” so to speak — to be able to paint my new colors not entirely onto the unreal but as it were on sketched-out figures. Without my knowing it, I spoke only for myself, indeed at bottom only about myself. Meanwhile: Everything that I experienced at the time, those are typical experiences for a certain kind of human being, which in order to be expressed — — — And whoever reads those writings with a young and fiery soul will perhaps guess the solemn oaths with which I bound myself for my life at the time — with which I resolved myself to my life: may he be one of those few who is allowed to resolve himself to a similar life and to similar oaths! [Page 23] 16 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 34164] In the first book shatter the belief in the truth: truthfulness is useful, but only in a small quantity, above all for those who do not have to answer for anything. Likewise respect for philosophers. 34[65] The general coarsening of the European spirit, a certain clumsy straight-forwardness that likes to hear itself praised as straightness, honesty or good science:?” this belongs to the dominance of thinking of the democratic zeitgeist and its humid air: more specifically — it is the effect of reading newspapers. People want convenience or intoxication when they read: by far the majority of what is read is newspaper or newspaper-like. Just look at our revues, our scholarly journals: everyone who writes there speaks as if before “informal company” and lets himself go, or rather sit, in his armchair. — Someone has it rough there if he places the most value on ulterior motives and loves the dashes in his books more than everything that is articulated. — Freedom of the press will drive style to ruin and ultimately the spirit too: Galiani knew this already a hundred years ago. — “Freedom of thought” drives thinkers to ruin.’ — Between hell and heaven, and in the danger of persecution, exile, eternal damnation and the disapproving glances of kings and ladies the spirit had grown supple and daring: alas, what is the “spirit” becoming these days! 34[66] Always ironice:*° it is a precious sensation to watch such a truthful thinker. But it is even more pleasant to discover that this is all foreground, and that at bottom he wants something else and wants it in a very daring manner. I believe this was the magic of Socrates: he had a soul and behind it another and behind it another. In the first Xenophon slumbered, in the second Plato and in the third Plato once more, but Plato with [Page 230] 41 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 223 3. There came a point in time when I secretly began to laugh about Richard Wagner, back then when he embarked on his last role and appeared before his beloved Germans with the gestures of a miracle man, salvation preacher, prophet, indeed even philosopher. And because I had not yet stopped loving him, my own laughter bit into my heart: as belongs to the story of anyone who becomes independent of his teacher and finally finds his own way. In this period arose the lively essay that follows below, from which, it seems to me, even today many a young German can profit: — I myself, in my current frame of mind, would wish to have said everything more patiently, also more cordially and considerately. In the meantime I guessed all too much about the painful and horrific tragedy that lies hidden behind the life of such a human being as was Richard Wagner. 4. Richard Wagner has without any doubt Germans etc. 5. But the musician Richard Wagner? — “Richard Wagner and No End”: this is the watchword today. But with that we friends of music are at the end of our patience. For so long we have had to grin and bear the Wagnermania, and with the help of all virtues and kinds of aesthetic we have encouraged and exhorted ourselves throughout a very long rainy day: “how beautiful is even this nasty weather! How many charms lie concealed in the wrinkles of the thunderstorm! How subtly the rain plays the ‘endless melody’! How incomparably the lightning flashes in the midst of long gray gloom! And especially the thunder: how beautiful is the chromatics of the thunder!” But finally, finally we also want to see the clear sky again and at least have the beautiful evening that we deserve after such a virtuous, but so wicked day! — Really? The evening? Is it really “becoming night” already? Is even our best art, music, beginning to nod now? My friends, here is someone who no longer believes in it! It is by no means time for the evening! And Wagner signified neither [Page 231] 224 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS the day nor the night of our art — but only a dangerous interval, an exception and a question mark that put our conscience to the test! We still learned to say No! at the right time: any righteous and profound musician says No to Wagner today and to himself insofar as he still “wagnerizes” — and to be sure the more thoroughly if precisely he was schooled by Wagner, learned from him. 6. Of course it may be all the worse for the musicians who are less skilled, also for those who crave money and honor: precisely for them there are exquisite seductions in Wagner’s manner of making music. For it is easy to compose with Wagnerian methods and tricks, it may also be, given the demagogic craving of today’s artists for excitement of the “masses,” more lucrative, namely “more full of effects,” “more overpowering,” “more striking,” “more gripping” and however else the treacherous favorite words of the theater rabble and the dilettantish fanatics put it. But ultimately, what do noise and the enthusiasm of the “masses” mean in matters of art! Good music never has a “public”: — it is and can never be “public,” it belongs to the most exquisite, it should always and only — speaking in metaphors — exist for the “chamber!” “Masses” can sense the one who knows best how to flatter them, in their way they are grateful for all demagogic talents and return it in kind to the best of their abilities. (How “masses” are able to thank, with what “spirit” and “taste,” for this the death of Victor Hugo provided edifying testimony: in all the centuries of France together, has there been so much France-demeaning nonsense printed and spoken as on this occasion? But also at the burial of Richard Wagner the flatteries of gratitude spiraled as high as this “pious” wish: “Redemption to the Redeemer!”® —) NB. There is no doubt that W(agnerian) art today has an effect on the masses: that it can do that — should this not constitute a testimonial about this very art? For three good things in art “masses” have never had a sense, for nobility, for logic and for beauty — pulchrum est paucorum hominum’ — : not to speak of an even better thing, of grand style, to which so far even the [Page 232] 41 AUGUST—SEPTEMBER 1885 225 most highly evolved artists of modern times were allowed to say neither Yes nor No: — they have not had a right to it yet, they felt distant and ashamed before it, and this shame was in fact precisely their highest height! Wagner stands farthest from grand style: the excessive and heroically ostentatious aspects of his artistic methods stand in direct contrast to grand style; and likewise the tenderly seductive, the manifoldly charming, the restless, uncertain, suspenseful, momentary, mysteriously effusive, the whole “supersensual” masquerade of sick senses, and whatever else might be called “Wagnerian” in the typical sense. And nonetheless, despite his most thorough inability for it: Wagner leers at the grand style, he who is incapable of even ordinary, proper, genuine /ogic! He knows this well enough, he recognized it early on: but immediately he set about, with the ruthless actoradroitness that constitutes his mastery, interpreting his deficiency as an advantage. In the illogical, semi-logical there is much that is seductive: — this is what Wagner thoroughly divined — : namely for Germans with whom obscurity is perceived as “profundity.” He was denied the manliness and rigor of a logical development: but he found “something more full of effect”! “Music,” he taught, “is only ever a means, the end is drama.” Drama? No, the gesture!? — thus at least Wagner personally understood it. Above all and first the gripping gesture! Something that knocks you down and makes you shudder! Who cares about “sufficient reason”! A kind of ambiguity even in the rhythmic phrasing likewise belongs among his favorite artistic methods, a kind of drunkenness and sleepwalking that no longer knows how to “infer” and unleashes a dangerous will to blind following and giving in. Just look at our women when they are “wagnetized”:!° what “unfreedom of the will”! What fatalism in their extinguishing gaze! What letting-go, what submission! Perhaps they even intuit that in this condition of the “unhinged” will they possess one more charm for some kind of men?: what more reason for their worship of their Cagliostro and miracle man! With the actual “maenads” of Wagner-worship one can even confidently 8 [Page 233] 226 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS diagnose hysteria and illness; something or another is not in order with their sexuality; or children are lacking, or in the most bearable case, men. 7. As concerns the youths who pay homage to Wagner, generally speaking they are musically bad. (One of the best even once said to me ingenuously “I understand nothing at all about music, but Wagner unites everything good that exists today — he is an anti-Semite, vegetarian and abhors vivisection”) Wagnerian youths, in many respects a very refreshing and noble kind of youth — revere in Wagner roughly the same thing that the passionate disciples of Victor Hugo around 1828 revered in their idol: above all the master of big words and gestures, the advocate of all swelling emotions, all sublime instincts, then the daring innovator and shackle-breaker in battle with and in opposition to older stricter, perhaps more restrictive artistic schooling, the opener of new portals, new vistas, new distances, new depths and heights, finally, and not least: these German youths revere in Wagner his commanding nature, the ability to noisily command, to stand on himself alone, to answer to himself alone, to obstinately say Yes to himself, and always in the name of the “chosen people,” the Germans! — in brief, they revere what is tribunal and demagogic in Wagner. Such enthusiastic youths of course still see nothing of the bad, indeed abominable taste of this whole “selfstaging” of Wagner’s: youth simply Aas the right to bad taste — it is their right. But if one wants to learn where the innocence and the unhesitating readiness of youths can be led and seduced by an old drifting pied piper, then just cast a glance at that literary swamp from which ultimately the now aged master loves to sing with his “boys” (is “sing” the right word?) I mean the infamous Bayreuther Blatter.” That is really a swamp: Presumption, Teutonification and conceptual chaos all mixed in the gloomiest way, poured over with an intolerable sugar of “sweetest” compassion, and in between that already mentioned inclination for green vegetables and that purposeful [Page 234] 41 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 227 anointing and sentimentality for the sake of animals, close beside the unvarnished genuine and thorough hatred for science and generally the scorn and defiling of everything that stands or stood in Wagner’s way — how the nobler nature of Mendelsohn, the purer nature of Schumann stood in the way of his influence! — along with a prudent squinting for new reinforcements, an “accommodation” in the direction of powerful parties, for instance the completely impure playing and ogling with Christian symbols — Wagner, the old atheist, antinomian and immoralist, even at one point unctuously invokes the “blood of the Redeemer”! — on the whole the impudence of an old high priest enveloped by thick smoke, who discloses his obscure emotions like revelations about every conceivable realm of thought that is inaccessible and forbidden precisely to him; and all this in a German, a real swamp-German of obscurity and exaggeration such as perhaps not even the most “German”-hostile disciples of Hegel had achieved! 8. Perhaps only now can it be made clear where Wagner belongs: namely zot in the great series of the authentic and the genuine of the highest order, not at this Olympic “court of courts.” Rather, Wagner is due an entirely different rank and an entirely different honor — and in fact, not a small and mean one: Wagner is one of those three actor-geniuses of art from whom the mob in this century — and it is after all the “century of the mob!” — practically learned its concept of “artist” in the first place: I mean those three odd and dangerous human beings, Paganini, Liszt, Wagner, dubiously positioned in the middle between “God” and “ape,” who were predestined just as much for “imitation” as for invention, for creating in the art of imitation itself, and whose instincts divined everything that can be discovered and amplified for the purpose of performance, expression, effect, sorcery, seduction. As demonic mediators and art-interpreters they became — and are today the masters of all artists of interpretation generally: everyone in these circles learned [Page 235] 228 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS from them; — this is why the seat and likewise the origin of the actual “Wagner-cult” must be sought among actors and practicing itinerant musicians of all kinds. But apart from these circles, to whom we must concede every right to their belief and superstition,!* and with respect to the total appearance of those three actor-geniuses and their most secret and universal meaning I personally cannot get beyond raising the same question again and again: what is it in those three that seemingly expresses itself as new, is it perhaps only the old and eternal “Cagliostro” after all, only newly costumed, newly staged, “set to music,” set to religion — as it might best correspond with the taste of the new century — the century of the mob, as mentioned? Therefore no longer like the last Cagliostro as the seducer of a noble and exhausted culture, but instead —as demagogical Cagliostro? — And our music, with whose help people are being “bewitched” here: — what, I beg and ask you, does our German) m(us)ic mean! 9. — This date Wagner, at bottom a broken and conquered human being, but one who could not abandon his great playacting, this Wagner who in the end even spoke of the “thrills” that he knew how to extract from the Protestant holy communion while at the same time he stretched out his hands to everything Roman with his Parsifal music: this flatterer of all German vanities, obscurities and presumptions who offered himself everywhere — this late Wagner is supposed to be the ultimate and highest pinnacle of our music and the expression of the finally achieved synthesis of the “German soul,” the German himself? — It was in summer 1876 that I recanted this faith; and therewith began that movement of the German conscience of which today ever more serious, ever more distinct signs are becoming visible — and the decline of Wagnermania! 4il]? There is only nobility of birth, nobility of blood. (I am not speaking here of the little word “von” and the Gothaische Kalender: [Page 236] 41 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 229 interpolation for asses.) Where people speak of “aristocrats of the spirit,” usually grounds are not lacking for hiding something; it is a well-known favorite term among ambitious Jews. For spirit alone does not ennoble; on the contrary something is first required that ennobles the spirit. — What then is required for this? The blood. aila” German philosophy as a whole — Leibniz, Kant, Hegel, Schopenhauer, to name the great ones — is the most thorough kind of

Romanticism and homesickness that has ever existed: the longing for the best there ever was. One is no longer at home anywhere, ultimately one longs to return to where one can somehow be at home, because only there does one wish to be at home: and that is the Greek world! But precisely to that place all bridges are broken — except the rainbows of concepts! And they lead everywhere, to all homelands and “fatherlands” there have been for Greek-souls! Indeed: One must be very subtle, very light, very thin to step across these bridges! But what happiness lies already in this will to spirituality, almost to ghostliness! How distant one is here from “pressure and thrust,” from the mechanistic silliness of the natural sciences, from the fairground din of “modern ideas”! People want to return to the Greeks through the church fathers, from the north to the south, from the formulas to the forms; they still enjoy the outcome of antiquity, Christianity, as an entrance to antiquity, as a good piece of the old world itself, as a gleaming mosaic of ancient concepts and ancient valuations. Arabesques, flourishes, Rococo of scholastic abstractions — still better, namely finer and thinner, than the peasant- and rabble-reality of the European north, still a protest of higher spirituality against the peasant war and rabble-insurrection that has become master of spiritual taste in the north of Europe and that had its ringleader in the great “unspiritual man,” in Martin Luther: — In this sense German philosophy is a piece of counter-Reformation, even Renaissance, at least will to Renaissance, will, to continue in the discovery of antiquity, in the excavation of ancient philosophy, above all of [Page 237] 230 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS the pre-Socratics — of the best-buried of all Greek temples! Perhaps a few centuries later one will judge that all German philosophizing has its genuine dignity in being a step-by-step reclamation of antiquity’s soil, and that every claim to “originality” sounds petty and ridiculous in relation to that higher claim of the Germans to have newly tied the bond that seemed torn, the bond with the Greeks, hitherto the most highly constituted type of “human.” Today we are again approaching all those fundamental forms of interpreting the world that the Greek spirit in Anaximander, Heraclitus, Parmenides, Empedocles, Democritus and Anaxagoras invented — we are becoming more Greek from day to day, at first, as is only fair, in concepts and valuations, as graecofying’ ghosts, so to speak: but someday, hopefully also with our body! Herein lies (and has ever lain) my hope for the German character! 41[5] One opens a female book: — and soon one sighs “another failed cook!” 41[6]” Only the very rarest and most highly evolved individuals achieve the highest and most illustrious human joys in which existence celebrates its own transfiguration, as is only fair: and even these only after they themselves and their ancestors have lived a long and preparatory life aimed at this goal, and without even knowing about this goal. Then an overflowing wealth of manifold forces and simultaneously the most agile power of “willing freely” and masterful commanding dwell lovingly together in a single human being, the spirit is then just as indigenous and at home in the senses as the senses are at home and indigenous in the spirit; and everything that plays out only in the spirit must also trigger a subtle extraordinary happiness and play in the senses. And likewise in reverse! — consider this reversal in the example of Hafiz; even Goethe, however faintly it shows in him, provides an inkling of this occurrence. It is [Page 238] 41 AUGUST — SEPTEMBER 1885 231 probable that with such perfect and well-evolved human beings ultimately the most sensual tasks are transfigured by a symbolfrenzy of the highest spirituality; they perceive in themselves a kind of deification of the body and they are furthest from the ascetic-philosophy of the proposition “God is a spirit”: whereby it clearly turns out that the ascetic is “the failed human being” who pronounces only a something in itself good, and precisely the judging and condemning something — and pronounces it “God.” From that pinnacle of joy where human beings feel themselves totally and utterly to be a deified form and selfjustification of nature, down to the joy of healthy peasants and healthy semi-human animals: to this entire long tremendous light- and color-scale of happiness the Greeks gave, not without the grateful shudders of someone who is initiated into a mystery, not without great caution and pious silence — the divine name: Dionysus. — What now do all modern humans, the children of a fragmented multifarious sick odd mother know of the scope of Greek happiness, what could they know about it! From where would the slaves of “modern ideas” even take their right to Dionysian festivals! 41[7]” When the Greek body and Greek soul “blossomed,” and not to be sure in conditions of pathological effusion and madness, that mysterious symbol emerged of the highest worldaffirmation and transfiguration of existence attained so far on earth. Here a standard is given according to which everything that has grown since is found to be too brief, too poor, too narrow: — merely pronounce the word “Dionysus” before the best modern names and things, before Goethe, perhaps, or before Beethoven, or before Shakespeare, or before Raphael: and all at once we feel our best things and moments judged. Dionysus is a judge! — Have I been understood? — There is no doubt that the Greeks attempted to interpret the ultimate mysteries “of the fate of the soul” and everything they knew about the education and purification, above all about the unbudgeable rank order [Page 239] 232 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS and value-inequality from human to human, from their Dionysian experiences: here for all things Greek is the great depth, the great silence — one does not know the Greeks as long as the hidden underground entrance still lies here blocked by rubble. Obtrusive scholar-eyes will never see anything of these things, however much scholarship still has to be applied in the service of that excavation — ; precisely here even the noble zeal of such friends of antiquity as Goethe and Winckelmann has something forbidden, almost immodest. Wait and prepare oneself; wait for new sources to open up, prepare oneself in isolation for strange faces and voices; wash one's soul ever cleaner of the fairground dust and noise of this age; overcome everything Christian through something supra-Christian and not only cast it off — for the Christian doctrine was the counterdoctrine to the Dionysian — ; rediscover the south in oneself and spread out above oneself a bright gleaming mysterious southern sky; reconquer one's southern health and the hidden might of the soul; step by step become more comprehensive, more supranational, more European, more supra-European, more eastern, finally more Greek — for the Greek" was the first great bond and synthesis of everything eastern — : and therewith the very beginning of the European soul, the discovery of our "new world": — whoever lives under such imperatives, who knows what he can encounter some day? Perhaps even — a new day! 4i(8)]° In my early years I declared war on the conditions of German education and dutifully wielded my sword against them: there is no alternative. Away with the women, with the masculine women and sissies too! they know nothing about war and wail themselves half dead over a single drop of shed blood. People have reproached me for earlier having "killed" the aged David Strauss? I will probably have still other human lives on my conscience — but such are the fortunes of war. A thing that is ripe for dying: why artificially nurse, spare and coddle [Page 24] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 17 his own second soul. Plato himself is a man of many back parts and foregrounds.*° 34[67]"! NB. Our age is in its most essential instincts skeptical: nearly all subtler scholars and artists are, even if they do not like to admit it to themselves. Pessimism, of No-saying(.) is only easier for the convenience of the spirit: our humid age with its democratic air is above all convenient. Where the spirit is more delicate it says: "I do not know"; and "I no longer trust myself or anyone" and "I no longer know which way to turn," and "hoping — that is a phrase for the mendacious or for demagogic orators and artists." Skepticism — is the expression of a certain physiological condition as it necessarily arises in a major interbreeding of many races: the many inherited valuations are at war with each other, disrupt each other in their growth. The force that is lost most here is the will: therefore great fear of responsibility, because no one can vouch for himself. Hiding under communities, "one hand covers the other" they say there. Thus a herd-species gets developed: and whoever has a strong commanding and daring will definitely achieves supremacy in such times. 34[68]? There are complaints about how bad philosophers have had it so far: the truth is that at all times the conditions for the education of a powerful crafty daring implacable spirit were more favorable than today. Today the demagogue spirit and also the scholar spirit have favorable conditions. But just look at our artists: whether nearly all of them are not perishing from lack of discipline. They are no longer tyrannized, so they no longer learn to tyrannize themselves either. When was woman as insignificant as today! Everyone is getting weaker because everyone wants to have it convenient.

— I have gone through the harshest school of physical pain: and the consciousness of having kept myself intact despite it, and silently — — [Page 240] 41 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 233 such a thing? But nothing in the conditions of German education deserves to be spared: that is “ripe.” 4i[9]”

Preface Whoever has the desires of a high and selective soul and only rarely finds Ais table set, Ais nourishment ready, is in no small danger today. Thrown into a noisy, rabble-like age with which he does not want to eat from the same bowl, he could easily perish of hunger and thirst, or, in the event he finally “digs in” after all — of nausea. This was the danger of my youth, an unsatisfied, yearning, solitary youth; and the danger reached its peak when I realized one day which kind of dishes I had ultimately consumed and where the impetuous hunger and thirst of my soul had lured me. It was in summer 1876. At that time, enraged by nausea, I pushed away all the tables at which I had eaten up till then, and I promised myself that I would rather live accidentally and meagerly, rather on grass and weeds and roaming about like an animal, rather not live at all anymore than share my meals with the “theater folk” and the “higher trick riders of the spirit” — I used such harsh expressions back then: — for I seemed to have ended up among sheer Cagliostro and ingenuine people, and I was angry and raging at the fact that I had loved where I should have despised. After I finally became calmer, although definitely not more equitable and conciliatory, I slowly and without rudeness freed myself from my previous “company” and began wandering — sick, sick for many long years. A great, ever greater separation — for philosophical people like to pursue the particular into the universal — a voluntary “alienation” was my sole refreshment in that time: I tested everything to which my heart had generally attached itself up to that point, I turned around the best and most beloved things and looked at their other sides, I did the opposite with everything on which the human art of slander and defamation had so far been practiced most subtly. [Page 241] 236 UNPUBLISHED

FRAGMENTS it and make it stronger, more evil and deeper than it is.” — “Stronger, more evil and deeper?” I asked, startled. “Yes,” he said once more, “stronger, more evil and deeper: also more beautiful” — and at that the god smiled as if he had just uttered a charming compliment. Here we also see immediately: this deity is lacking not only shame — ; and there are generally good reasons to conjecture that in some matters all the gods could learn from us human beings. We are more humane.” And herewith we have arrived and are at the right place: namely at the end. For by now one will have abundantly grasped what it is supposed to be called: Human, All Too Human. And why this book is “a book for free spirits.” 2. What the words Human, All Too Human in this title are supposed to mean I have already made clear — at least for those who have subtle ears. But what in all the world was I thinking back then by “free spirits,” to whom I cast the fishhooks of my book? It seems I desired —company?

41(10)?4 — — — Therefore I cannot sufficiently praise the three fortunate events of my life that at the right time balanced out how I had come to harm through an unsatisfied, yearning and solitary youth. The first was that in my early youth I found a respectable and scholarly occupation that allowed me to make myself at home in the proximity of the Greeks: if one will excuse me this immodest but clear expression. In this manner off to the side and entertained in the best way, I could not easily bring myself to (get) vehemently angry about anything that happens today. In addition to this I was devoted to a philosopher who knew how to valiantly oppose everything in the present, yet without eradicating respect in his pupil through an excess of denial. Finally, ever since I was a child I have been a lover of music and at all times a personal friend of good musicians: all of this together resulted in my having little reason to concern myself about contemporary [Page 242] 41 AUGUST—SEPTEMBER 1885 235 here! Forward, wanderer! There are many seas and lands left for you: who knows whom you must still encounter?" In order to gratefully confess it then: at that time, when I began to study the rule known as "human being," I encountered and my path was crossed by strange and not undangerous spirits, including even very free spirits — and above all one, and this one repeatedly, none other than the god Dionysus himself: — the same one to whom I once, in much younger years, had made a reverential and innocent sacrifice. Perhaps I will once again find enough leisure and quiet to tell my friends everything that I retained from the philosophy of the god Dionysus: in undertones, as is only fair — since we are dealing with many secret things, and much that is uncanny."* But that Dionysus is a philosopher and that gods therefore also philosophize seems to me at least to be an important circumstance worthy of the most cautious communication, which has nothing against it except perhaps that it is not revealed at the right time: for these days people do not like to believe in gods. Perhaps, too, I will have to go further in the frankness of my narrative than is always endearing to the strict habits of my friends' ears. Certainly the god in question went further in our conversations and was always out ahead of me by several steps: he /oves to go far! Indeed, if it were permitted to ascribe beautiful, solemn names of splendor and virtue to him, in keeping with human custom, I would have to greatly extol his explorer and discoverer courage, his honesty, truthfulness and love of wisdom. But such a god does not know what to do with all this venerable junk and splendor. "Keep this," he would say, "for yourself instead and for your kind and whoever else needs it! Z — have no reason to cover my nakedness." As one sees, this kind of deity and philosopher is lacking in shame. Thus he said right away in his first conversation with me: "under certain circumstances I love the human being" — and with this he was alluding to Ariadne —: "it is a pleasant inventive animal without peers on earth, it can even find its way in any labyrinths. I often think about how I can advance [Page 243] 234

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS It was a wicked game: I was often ill because of it — but my resolve stood firm. I “broke my venerating heart” itself and even looked at its broken pieces and their reverse sides — not without all kinds of new joy and curiosity: for one is cruel to the same degree that one is capable of love. Finally I arrived, step by step, at the last challenge of my inner hardness: I put on the best face for my wicked game, laughed at all “pessimism” in me and maliciously defended myself against every conclusion in which illness and loneliness could have played a part: “forward,” I said to myself, “someday you will be healthy, today it suffices for you to feign health! The will to health is already the very best cure!” Then I opened my eyes for the first time — and immediately saw many things and many colors of things, as they are never allowed to be seen by fearful loafers and spirits who are worried about themselves, and have always stayed home. A kind of bird freedom, a kind of bird panorama, a kind of mixture of curiosity and contempt as possessed by anyone who surveys a tremendous multifariousness without being involved — that finally was the newly achieved state with which I persisted for a long time. “A free spirit” and nothing more: thus I felt, thus I called myself at the time; and really I had become the opposite of those who worry about things that do not concern them; the free spirit — I was concerned purely about things that no longer — “worried me.” These were the years of recovery: multifarious years full of colorful and painfully magic events, of which the healthy, the stocky of spirit are permitted to grasp and smell just as little as the sickly, the condemned, those predestined for death and not for life. Back then I had not yet found “myself”: but I was bravely underway to “myself” and tested a thousand things and people I passed along the way, as to whether they belonged to “me” or at least knew something about “me.” What surprises there were! What horrors! What brief little nooks of happiness! What resting in the sun! What tendernesses! And again and again this harsh inner voice that commanded: “away from [Page 244] 41 AUGUST — SEPTEMBER 1885 237 human beings: — for the good musicians are all hermits and outside of time. I was already beyond my twenties when I discovered that I was lacking knowledge of human beings. Is it probable that someone could become a connoisseur of human beings by directing his thoughts neither to honors, nor high office, nor money, nor women, and spending the longest periods of every day by himself? Here there would be ample occasion for mocking if it were not contrary to good taste for the author of a book to abuse its preface for the purpose of mocking himself. Enough, I found reasons, and ever more and better reasons to mistrust my praise as well as my blame; at the same time a vehement and sudden curiosity for “the human being awakened in me: in sum, I resolved to enter a hard and long school. 41(11)” “Thinking” in its primitive state (pre-organic) is the imposing of shapes, as in crystal. — In our thinking the essential element is the ordering of new material into old schemata

(= Procrustean bed), the making-same of what is new. 41[12]26 Conclusion of I. I see new philosophers coming up. If I know you, my friends, you free spirits, then these “coming ones,” beautiful proud birds are flying among you too! — I — — — 41(13)?” — — — But as concerns the above quoted imperative of the German instinct, that commands: “Admit no more Jews! And keep the doors barred to the east!” — then the circumspect calculation of the German Jews themselves should counsel them toward a similar “border-regulation”: their task of growing into the German nature and achieving a more German type of expression and gesture, ultimately of “soul” — for this [Page 245] 238 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS is the pathway, from the outside to the inside, from “appearance” to “reality” — should not be pushed back again and again into the insoluble by the horrific and despicable ugliness of newly immigrating Polish and Russian, Hungarian and Galician Jews. Here is the point where the Jews also for their part have to act, namely “to set borders” for themselves: — the single and last point in which Jewish and German advantage could still balance out to a common advantage: but of course it is time, indeed the highest time! 41(14)”* So far there has been no German culture either. It is no objection to this proposition that there have been great hermits in Germany — Goethe e.g.,; for these had their own culture. But all around them in particular, as around mighty defiant randomly strewn boulders, lay the rest of German nature as their opposite, namely as a soft marshy unstable ground on which every foreign step and stride made its “impression” and created “forms”: “German education” was a thing without character, a nearly limitless elasticity. als)” — I publicly laughed to death a miserable presumptuous moldy book, with which “German education” had become infatuated — well now, on earth one can make a still more dangerous use of one’s laughter! Perhaps in doing this I accidentally “killed” an old man, the old venerable David Strauss, virum optime meritum??? — that’s what people lead me to believe. But such are the fortunes of war; and I want in good conscience to have yet other human lives “on my conscience”! Only away with the women, with the masculine wailing-women and sissies too! They know nothing about war-craft and wail themselves half dead over every “lack of mercy.” In order for something else to begin, here one must first make an end: I certainly hope that here — I have been — understood? But nothing in “German education” deserves to [Page 246] 41 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 239 be spared anymore: here one must not spare oneself and finally make an end — or something else cannot begin at all 41(16)?! The Germans are deep. the Christian European. the German spirit that unhesitating enthusiast. the demagogues in art. On the Decline of Wagnerianism. How little the German style the Jews Ranke, the embellishing advocate of the fact [Page 247] [42 = Mp XVII 2a. August-September 1885] 4201] The Mirror. An Opportunity for Self-Reflection for Europeans. Latent anarchism. Varieties and causes of world-defamation. II The Germans. Thoughts on discipline and cultivation. Ulterior motives of logic. The embarrassment of the physicists. II What are “free spirits”? The demagogues in art. The eternal feminine. Morality in Europe. The discipline of willing. On the order of rank. Christ and Dionysus. The historian. I The philosophers of the future. The decline of cheerfulness. On solitude. South and east. A word for musicians. World-interpretation, not world-explanation. (Literature and actor culture.) The “late Wagner.” — [Page 248] 42 AUGUST —SEPTEMBER 1885 241 The genuinely royal calling of the philosopher (according to the expression of Alcuin the Anglo-Saxon): prava corrigere et recta corroborare et sancta sublimare. Attempt at a Critique of the Modern Soul. 42[2] Atheism and its causes. Latent atheism. Nationalism and the global economy. On the order of rank and equality. Moral skepticism World defamation and the decrease of cheerfulness North south Music The philosophers The historians The demagogues in art. Woman. The discipline of willing. Nourishment. Reading and literature press. 42[3]*° Human, All Too Human. I Metaphysica If the world had a goal then it must have been reached Using the body as a guide Whoever has pursued the history of any single science What we experience in dream What {separates} us from all Platonic and Leibnizian ways of thinking The human being is a form- and rhythm-constructing creature A thought is in the shape in which it comes “How are synthetic judgments a priori What distinguishes me most thoroughly from the metaphysicians, [Page 249] 242 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS Truth: this describes within The logical thinking, of which logic speaks There are truths that are best {}° by mediocre minds Conclusion: In what strange simplification! The new Oedipus. Appearance, as I understand it. Human, All Too Human II Section Moralia “Our highest insights must — and should — like follies, indeed like crimes” “Insofar as at all times, as long as humans have existed, herds also” “Moralities are the main method” “One is still offended, if someone, “The old theological problem of faith and of knowledge” “Crudeness. — Words are musical notes for concepts” “Nothing more miserable than moralistic literature etc.” “The will. — In each will there is a plurality “The diversity of human beings is revealed not only in the diversity of their tablets of good” “At bottom morality is inimically disposed toward science” Human, All Too Human. Religiosa. “The human soul and its limits” “The philosophers will also {use} religions” “In the Jewish Old Testament — ” “The English, dark, sensual” Conclusion “On the highest and most illustrious human joys” Human, All Too Human. 4 Art On the whole I agree more with the artists: pessimism. Conclusion: Against R. Wagner. On the decline of Wagnerianism. — How little the German style {corresponds} with the sound Human, All Too Human. 5. Higher Culture. German philosophy as romanticism [Page 25] 18 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 34[69] The subtlest minds of the previous century, Hume and Galiani, all entrusted with service to the state: likewise Stendhal Tocqueville. 34[70] Hume challenges (to use Kant's words*3) reason to account for and answer with what right it thinks to itself: that something could be constituted in such a way that, when it is posited, something different therefore must necessarily also be posited, for that is what the concept of cause says. He proved irrefutably that it is entirely impossible for reason to think such a connection a priori and from concepts etc. — But the folly was in asking for reasons for the right to the justification. He did the very deed that he wanted to test.4 34[71] The Jie of the educator e.g., in Kant's categorical imperative. "Could God be a deceiver after all, despite Descartes?" 34[72] NB. Truthful, morally rigorous and ugly belong together: Christianity sensed this well. A beautiful human being can be neither truthful, nor kind, only as an exception. 34173] What separates us from Kant just as from Plato and Leibniz: we believe only in becoming, also in matters of spirit, we are historical through and through. This is the great reversal. Lamarck and Hegel — Darwin is only an aftereffect. The manner of thinking of Heraclitus and Empedocles has risen again. Even Kant did not overcome the contradictio in adjecto "pure spirit": but we did. 34[74]° The human horizon. Philosophers can be perceived as those who make the most extreme effort to test how far humanity can [Page 250] 42 AUGUST — SEPTEMBER 1885 243 People call the Germans profound. Wagner and Paris Even today the finest culture is Victor Hugo "The demagogues of culture Kant's influence in Europe Supposing one were to think of a philosopher as a great educator On conviction and justice (penultimate) In Relations with Others. When the philosophers {mingle} with the homines' Human, All Too Human. Woman and child. The greater sensuality One cannot think highly enough of women The decline of grace. — Human, All Too Human. State. Socialism is the ultimate Over all these national wars, new empires There is a nobility of blood That unhesitating enthusiast The Germans, {compared} to their Germanic ancestors The German Jews. — The good Europeans. The Germans have not yet been anything, for they are becoming something Human, All Too Human. By oneself alone. — The danger with extraordinary spirits A person who strives for greatness — That many speak of things with respect to which — The hermit, the higher philosophical human being. I followed by: "Freethinker" Third to last II "the free spirit" and solitude III 2 (At the end) The strong spirit IV Conclusion: In Genoa: Oh my friends, do you understand this "Nevertheless"? — — [Page 251] 244 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 42[4]° 1 The knowing one 2 Beyond what is good and evil? 3 New fables of God 4 Man and woman 5 Friend, Enemy and solitude 42[5]° Alone or in twos — 6, 13, 14, 24, 36, 48 Victims — 19, 18 Contempt for woman — 20, I, 17, 23, 37 Not too many words — 22, 15 Child man woman — 28 The creators — 29, 30 Against self-knowledge — 38, 45 In order to be loved — 46 Purposes — 57 Herd — 62 Marriage — 60, 53, 18, 17 Devil God — 47 Time and future — 76, 102 42[6]°! P. 1. There is no common-good: — this word contradicts itself, for whatever can be common must always be of common value therefore not be good. 1 Dogmatists. Plato and the “pure spirit.” the magnificent tension through the dogmatists. Skeptics. The commanders rare. In the end the most mediocre rule in philosophy! Where does the will still exist? 3 The critics: Does German philosophy belong in the critical or the skeptical movement? Kant. No, it is a countermovement, at N [Page 252] 42 AUGUST — SEPTEMBER 1885 245 bottom a theological one. “without a passionate enjoyment.” 4 The English and philosophy, entirely unsuited for the moralistic “hunt.” The French. Richard Wagner. 5 Herd-morality. Christianity makes small (the) Old Testament. Socialism. Free thinkers. “Enlightenment” 6 The philosopher as the experimenter of new possibilities the value of immorality for upbringing. his cruelty his solitude. Teichm(iiller) 7 My antecedents. On my Unfashionable Observations a word about pessimism. a word about artists: the Dionysian. the shaping of the soul of Europe. significance of the Greeks, their discovery the historical sense 8 The Dionysian. 42[7]!? — the spitting image of my hallucinations — did the trees already look green 50 thousand years ago? — prior to logic, temporally speaking, lies the production of identical cases, assimilation — memory in the organic sequence — “innate” ideas — hypocrisy would be eliminated if it were not funny to look at. Not gods according to Epicurus, but according to Homer: or like Galiani — the mathematicians who continue deducing until the atom becomes useful to them! But h(umans) have always done it this way, in a cruder form. What does reality matter before it is useful for our house! [Page 253] 246 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 42[8]!° Yes, the philosophy of right! This is a science which, like all moral sciences, is not even in diapers yet! E.g., the oldest meaning of punishment has yet to be recognized, not even among jurists who imagine themselves to be freethinking — it is completely unknown: and as long as jurisprudence fails to establish itself on new ground, namely in history and comparative studies of peoples, it will remain trapped in dreary battles between thoroughly false abstractions that fancy themselves these days to be “philosophy of right” and that are completely derived from the contemporary h(uman being). Yet this contemporary h(uman being) is such a convoluted web, even in regard to its leg(al) valuations, that it allows for the most varied interpretations. [Page 254] [43 = Z I 2c. Autumn 1885] 431]! Draft. The first problem is: how deeply does the “will to truth” go into things? If one were to measure the entire value of ignorance connected with the means for preservation of life, likewise the value of simplifications generally and the value of regulative fictions, e.g., of the logical kind, if one were to consider above all the value of interpretations, and to what extent it is a matter not of “it is” but “it means” — — — then one arrives at this solution: the “will to truth” develops in the service of the “will to power”: on close scrutiny its actual task is helping a certain kind of untruth to victory and to duration, taking a coherent whole of falsifications as the basis for the preservation of a certain kind of life. Problem: how deep down does the will to goodness go into the heart of things. One sees the opposite of this everywhere, in plants and animals: Indifference or harshness or cruelty. “Justice” “punishment.” The development of cruelty. Solution: Sympathy only exists in social constructs (to which the human body belongs, whose living individual beings sympathize with one another) as the consequence of the fact that one greater whole wants to preserve itself against another whole, and again because in the overall economy of the world, where there is no possibility of perishing and loss, goodness would (be) a superfluous principle. [Page 255] 248 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS Problem: how deeply reason reaches into the ground of things. According to a critique of ends and means (— no factual relationship, but always one that only gets interpreted into it), the character of squandering, of derangement is normal (in the) overall economy. “Intelligence” appears as a specific form of unreason, nearly as its most malicious caricature. Problem: how far does the “will to beauty” reach. Ruthless development of forms: the most beautiful are only the strongest: as the triumphant they maintain themselves firmly, and take pleasure in their type, reproduction. (Plato’s belief that even philosophy is a kind of sublime sexual and reproductive drive.) Hence the things that we have so far valued most highly: as the “true,” “good,” “reasonable,” “beautiful,” prove to be isolated cases of the converse powers — I point my finger at this tremendous perspectival falsification, by virtue of which the species human being asserts itself. It is its condition of life that it enjoys itself this way (the human being takes joy in the means of its preservation: and they include that the human being does not want to let itself be deceived, that humans mutually help each other, (are) prepared to understand one another; that on the whole the successful types know how to live at the expense of the failed). In all of this the will to power expresses itself, with its unhesitating readiness to seize the means of deception: a malicious pleasure is conceivable, that a god senses when looking at a human being admiring itself. Therefore: the will to power. Consequence: if this idea is hostile to us, why do we give in to it? Bring on the beautiful phantoms! Let us be deceivers and embellishers of humanity! Fact, what actually a philosopher is. 43[2]? Misunderstanding of logic: it explains nothing, on the contrary Misunderstanding of historical development: succession is a description Superficiality of our causality-sense. [Page 256] 43 AUTUMN 1885 249 “Knowledge” — to what extent impossible in a world of becoming? The organic world represents a perspectival sphere. Knowability of the world — in itself an immodesty for human beings. Dissolution of the instincts — transformation into formulas and formula human beings. Against naturalism and mechanism. The “calculability” of the world, whether it is desirable? with this even the creative act would be “calculable”? Mechanics a kind of ideal, as regulative method — nothing more.

Mockery of the idealists who believe “truth” to be where they feel “good” or “elevated.” Classical: Renan, quoted by Bourget. Denial of empty space and reduction of mechanics to tyranny of the eye and touch. Denial of the actio in distans.> Against pressure and thrust. The shape of the world as cause of its cycle process. Not sphere! Force continual. Against Laplace-Kant. Battle of the atoms, as of individuals, but with a certain difference in strength from two atoms one will form, and from two individuals one. Likewise inversely from one two will form if the inner state brings about a disgregation of the power-center. — Therefore against the absolute concept “atom” and “individual”! The atom fights for its duration, but other atoms attack it in order to increase their strength. Both processes: that of disintegration and that of compression to be understood as effects of the will to power. Down to its tiniest fragments it has the will to compress. But it is forced, in order to compress itself anywhere, to dilute itself at another spot etc. Planetary bodies and atoms only different in magnitude, but same laws. [Page 257] 250 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 43[3] The Germans, in whose Germanic ancestors no Tacitus was able to praise the spirit, or even only a pleasure in spirituality, perhaps an argute loqui“ in addition have done everything possible throughout many centuries to make themselves stupid; and a malicious God who was hostile to Germans — possibly in fear of their predestined atheism and twilight of the gods? — ruled over them and endowed them exclusively with the inclinations that a people uses to shut the doors to even the arrival of the spirit: e.g., by commanding them to sweat in overheated beds, to crouch in stuffy narrow rooms, to choose as their favorite foods nothing but undigestible dishes like dumplings and heavy fatty broths, above all to drink until they fell down: so that going to sleep and being drunk were for a long time neighboring concepts of a German mind. One is almost tempted to believe that, if there were something like “German spirit” after all, it was only made possible through de-Germanification, I mean through mixing with foreign blood. Who keeps a ledger of everything that the Slavs or the Celts or the Jews are owed for the spiritualization of Germany! But the blood-mixing itself may have been most important, in that it planted different instincts in the same p(erson) and not always only “two but instead twenty souls” in a single breast,’ that tremendous bloodcorruption of the race, which has no equal in Europe and has made of the German an all-comprehending, all-sympathizing and accommodating people of the middle, of mediation — a ferment-race in whom henceforth “no thing is impossible.” If one checks the history of the German soul, one grasps(, how) these inwardly imbalanced, multifaceted, multifarious h(uman beings) became outwardly weak, servile, comfortable, clumsy, inwardly a playground of spiritual temptations and struggles: how finally at least a kind of stirring peasant- and preacher-spirit sprang up (Luther is the most beautiful example of this, he who waged the peasant war of the spirit against the “superior human beings” of the Renaissance —), how this peasant- and preacherspirit later transformed itself into the aggressive, cutting and [Page 258] 43 AUTUMN 1885 251 biting citizen- and critic-spirit — Lessing is again the most beautiful example of this, he who waged a “citizens’ war,” the war of the German bourgeois against the aristocratic spirit of French culture: Lessing against Corneille, Lessing the advocate of Diderot): until finally our last double-type of the ever-developing spirit, Goethe and Hegel, manifested the all-encompassing boa constrictor “spirit in itself” and its ferment-nature, the cosmoand theo-political all-accessibility of the German, the superiority of his abstractions, the clever suppleness of his accommodating historicizing: its last and most noble variation, that of a mandarin-esque superiority and “beyondness” — — — — all of Europe sank to its knees in admiration of it — — of course to the same extent the complete lack of limits, of measure in the Greek sense, of any sense of “style,” of a genuine content — I mean of new valuations, value-creations. Nonetheless: compared to this last great European remarkable event, this “German spirit,” the “German empire” that is being taken so seriously at the moment is no object of serious interest, at least in the eyes of a philosopher. Why in all the world a new empire if it does not rest on a new idea, or at least on a new stupidity? But once again this old stupidity — equal political rights, representation of the people, parliamentarianism, newspapers as the foundation of a state — once again the idiocy-producing European sickness of constant politicizing expanded to one more great people: what new things would a ph(ilosopher) have to learn here — or even to despise! — [Page 259] [44 = Mp XVII 2b. Autumn 1885] 44lr] The chapters. On Interpretation. On the Order of Rank. The Paths to the Saint. The Eternal Recurrence. The Superstition of the Critical Philosophers. Critique of Pascal: he already has the Christian-moral interpretations in the nature of human beings and thinks he grasps the “facts.” Sainte-Beuve too. 44[2] Nothing has happened since Pascal, the German philosophers do not come into consideration compared to him. 44[3] The Germans have no prose that rings and leaps. 44[4] The classical prose of the French of 1648: what has to come together. 44[5] The absence of moral) cultivation; h(umans) have been allowed to grow. Perhaps the h(umans) of Port-Royal are like artificial gardens. [Page 26] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 19 elevate itself, Plato especially: how far its force reaches. But they do it as individuals; perhaps the instinct of the Caesar(s), the founders of states etc. was greater, those who think about how far humanity can be driven in terms of development and under “favorable conditions.” But they did not sufficiently understand what “favorable conditions” are. Big question: where so far the plant “human being”? has grown most magnificently. For this the comparative study of history is necessary. 34[75] It is remarkable how the Stoics and almost all philosophers have no gaze for the distance. And then once more the stupidity of the socialists who always represent only the needs of the herd. 34[76] To put the mechanistic idea first as the regulative principle of method. Not as the best proven worldview, but as the one which makes necessary the greatest severity and rigor and does the most to set aside all sentimentality. Simultaneously a test of physical and psychic prosperity: failed weak-willed races are destroyed by it, through sensuality or through melancholy or, like the Indians, through both. 34177] Great praise of Christianity as the genuine erd religion. 34[78] Noon and Eternity. 1. Free for “true” and “untrue” 2. free for “good” and “evil” 3. free for “beautiful” and “ugly” 4. the superior human being as the mightier, and the attempts so far: “it is the right time.” 5. the hammer — a danger on which human beings can be smashed [Page 260] 44 AUTUMN 1885 253 Authority is lacking. Moderation within calm horizons is lacking; — infinity has been made into a kind of drunkenness. Subtlety in judgment is lacking. A chaos of contradictory valuations rules. 44(6) What is this then, this struggle of the Christian “against nature”? We will certainly not let ourselves be deceived by his words and interpretations! It is nature against something that is nature. For many fear, disgust for some, a certain spirituality for others, love for an ideal without flesh and desire, for the highest types an “extract of nature” — the latter want to be like their ideal. It goes without saying that humiliation instead of a sense of self, fearful caution of desires, separation from the ordinary duties (whereby a higher sense of rank is again created) the stirring up of a constant struggle for tremendous things, the habit of emotional effusion — it all composes one type: in it irritability of an atrophying body predominates, but nervousness and its inspiration are interpreted otherwise. The taste of this kind of character focuses 1) on hair-splitting 2) on the flowery 3) on extreme emotions. — The natural inclinations do indeed satisfy themselves, but under a new form of interpretation e.g., as “justification before God,” “feeling of redemption in grace” (— every undeniable feeling of well-being is interpreted this way! —) pride, lust etc. — General problem: what becomes of the human being who slanders the natural in himself and renounces and stunts it in practice? In fact the Christian proves to be an exaggerated form of self-mastery: in order to control his desires, he appears to need to annihilate or crucify them. —* The Epicurean kind of Christian and the Stoic kind — to the former belongs Francois de Sales, to the latter Pascal Triumph of Epicurus — but precisely this kind of human being is hard to understand and must be poorly understood. The Stoic kind (which needs to fight and consequently unduly treasures the value of the fighter —) always slanders the “Epicurean”! [Page 261] 254 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 4417] Graeco-Roman antiquity needed a tyrannical and exaggerating morality of anti-nature; the Teutons likewise, in a different respect. Our contemporary kind of human being actually dispenses with rigor and strict discipline; the danger in this is not great because this kind of human being is weaker than earlier kinds and on the other hand because the unconscious disciplinarians (like industriousness, ambition to get ahead, bourgeois respectability) function very inhibitably and hold one in check. — But ow people from the age of Pascal had to be held together! Superfluous Christianity: where no extreme means are necessary anymore! There everything becomes false, and every word, every Christian perspective a tartuffery and cajoling. 44[8] The New Japan. I read with much malice of ulterior motives what a German anarchist {means} by the notion “free society” — — — “Free society” — all features as grotesque word- and colorfinery of a small kind of herd animal. “Justice” and the morality of equal rights — the tartuffery of moral predicates. “the press,” its idealization. “the abolition of the worker” “the pre-Aryan race is breaking through”: and generally the oldest kinds of society the decline of woman the Jews as ruling race. Noble and vulgar culture. the scholar overestimated: and a triumphing more loving and masterful fullness of heart — how I saw all of this, perhaps without love, but surely also without scorn, and what probably causes amazement therefore — with the curiosity of a child that stands before the most colorful and ornamental of all peep shows. — — — [Page 262] 44 AUTUMN 1885 255 44lo]? Consider how all suffering forces a h(uman being) back upon himself, damage, supposing it makes smarter certainly to the same degree also makes worse (narrow, petty, suspicious, loveless — — — For their number is always small: but the others, the suffering, have nothing that heals them to that degree from the negative consequences of much suffering and — — — [Page 263] asi) 4s(2)! asis)? [45 = W I 6b. Autumn 1885] Discipline of the Heart. Prince Vogelfrei Songs and Thoughts. By Friedrich Nietzsche. Dedication and Closing Refrain? Songs and Thoughts Of Prince Vogelfrei By Friedrich Nietzsche. Misfortune overtakes the fugitive — whether As golden grief of the impoverished hand, As sadness of the eternally bestowing: Misfortune captures the fugitive — whether [Page 264] 45 AUTUMN 1885 257 Unconcerned and not mindful of himself He tossed the pearls away That forces the conquered down That turns every pride to tears: Dishonest constellation, You tossed the pearls into the sand — The sea gulped them in its throat! What does life owe the squanderer 45[6] How one gets beyond self-destruction. The harpies. Breaking free. For the history of the “free spirit.” Description of the free spirits. 2) cheerfulness 3) masks 4) nobility. the woman question Artist-pessimism. 4s(71° Day is fading, joy and light turn yellowy, The noon hour is far. How much longer? Then come the moon and stars And wind and frost: no lingering for me, Like fruit that a breeze breaks from the tree [Page 265] Prefatory Note by Mazzino Montinari to KSA Volume 12 Volumes 12 and 13 of the Kritische Studienausgabe {CW 16 [in part], 17, and 18} together contain Nietzsche’s unpublished fragments from autumn 1885 to the beginning of January 1889. The fragments are preserved in twenty-two handwritten manuscripts, more specifically fifteen larger booklets, three notebooks, and four folders. The principles according to which the publication of Nietzsche’s unpublished fragments proceed can be found in the prefatory note to CW 10, part of which is reproduced in the following six paragraphs. The fragments from the Nachlass are published according to strictly chronological principles; the editors have refrained from any systematic arrangement. Accordingly, the manuscripts are published in the sequence corresponding to their date of origin. Every single page of a manuscript is reproduced either according to the arrangement of the pages made by Nietzsche himself or according to the sequence of pages that can be deduced with certainty on the basis of his transcriptional habits (e.g., his habit of writing in booklets from back to front). If both of these indications are lacking, then the archival numeration of the pages is taken as valid. The principle that the manuscripts are published individually is subordinated to the temporal sequence when a manuscript contains layers from different times; in this case the individual layers are published separately. The orthography and punctuation of [Page 266] PREFATORY NOTE TO VOLUME I 259 the manuscripts are maintained in principle; unavoidable editorial interventions are indicated in the apparatus of KSA {and translated in this volume}. The consecutive numbering of the manuscripts or of their layers derives from the editors; it is begun anew within each chronological section for the corresponding groups of Nachlass fragments. Every manuscript or every layer of a manuscript is supplied with a number corresponding to the chronological sequence; the fragments within a manuscript or within the layer of a manuscript are likewise numbered consecutively, so that next to the number indicating the manuscript or the layer of a manuscript is found another number in square brackets that indicates the sequence of the fragments as this can be determined in each case. Words underlined by Nietzsche only once are printed in italics; ones underlined twice or more are printed in bold. Angle brackets () indicate supplements by the editors. Square brackets [] indicate titles in the Nachlass text that are provided by the editors. {Curly brackets { } indicate supplements by the translator or CW editors.} The following symbols are also used in the Nachlass text: [—] an illegible word; [— —] two illegible words; [— — —] three or more illegible words; — — — incomplete sentence; [+] lacuna in the manuscript. The classifications for Nietzsche's manuscripts introduced by Hans-Joachim Mette have been retained.!! Let the following be noted with respect to volumes 12 and 13 of KSA {volumes 16, 17, and 18 of CW}: these volumes take on a special meaning because — through their complete and manuscript-faithful reproduction of all fragments, drafts, plans, and titles from autumn 1885 until the end of Nietzsche's productivity in the beginning of 1889 — they constitute the foundation for a conclusive solution to the much-discussed problem of 1. Cf. Sachlicher Vorbericht zur Gesamtausgabe der Werke Friedrich Nietzsches, 1:xxxi —cxxvi, of the interrupted complete historical critical edition (Munich: Beck, 1933—40). [Page 267] 260 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS Nietzsche's alleged philosophical main work with the title The Will to Power. Read in their chronological sequence, the fragments yield a precise, almost seamless representation of his productivity and his literary intentions from autumn 1885 to the beginning of January 1889. They clearly reveal that and why the compilation of The Will to Power arranged by Peter Gast and Elisabeth Férster-Nietzsche, included in previously published editions of Nietzsche, is editorially untenable and objectively questionable in the extreme. The commentary (KSA 14 [pp. 383 — 400, {translated in CW}]) will explain this in detail and prove that and how Nietzsche changed his literary plans in the course of the years, until finally at the end of August 1888 he dispensed entirely with the publication of a work under the title The Will to Power: Attempt at a Revaluation of All Values. It is the achievement of Karl Schlechta to have elevated to a principal editorial requirement the publication of the unpublished notes in chronological sequence.” Yet it is precisely this requirement that he did not fulfill in his edition of Nietzsche’s unpublished notes from the so-called revaluation period, because he merely published the exact same material of the traditional Will to Power in a (seeming) chronological sequence. In other words: Schlechta unintentionally validated the content of the selection of Peter Gast and Elisabeth Férster-Nietzsche from the mass of unpublished fragments from the 1880s. 2. Cf. Friedrich Nietzsche, Werke in drei Banden (Munich{: Carl Hanser,} 1954-56), 3:1393ff. [Page 268] [1 = N VII 2b. Autumn 1885—Spring 1886] [x]! Really I should have around me a circle of deep and tender human beings who would protect me somewhat from myself and would also know how to cheer me up: because for someone who thinks such things as I must think, the danger is always very near that he will destroy himself. 1[2]? Let no one believe that a person lands accidentally and on both feet one day in such a robust state of the soul as seen in the testimony or metaphor of the dance song that was just concluded. Before one learns to dance in this manner one must have first learned thoroughly to walk and run, and even to stand on one’s own legs is something for which, it seems to me, only a few are ever predestined. In the period when one first dares to go forth on his own limbs and without leading-strings and railings, in the periods of the first youthful strength and all the charms of one’s own spring time, one is most endangered and often walks timidly, hesitatingly, like an escapee, like an exile, with a trembling conscience and with a bizarre mistrust of his path: — when the youthful freedom of the spirit is like a wine [Page 269] 262 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS [3] The Mirror. Lack of a dominating way of thinking. The actors. Gleba.4 The new shamelessness (that of the mediocre, e.g., the English, also of women who write) The will to prejudice (nations, parties etc. Latent Buddhism. The lack of solitude (and consequently of good company) Alcohol, book and music and other stimulants. The philosophers of the future. The ruling caste and anarchism. The curious difficulties of the unusual one who is disturbed by his plebeian modesty. Lack of character-upbringing. Lack of higher monasteries Gradual restriction of people's rights. [4] — The doctrine of opposites (good, evil etc.) has value as an educational standard, because it makes people take sides. —the most powerful, and dangerous passions of humanity, from which it is most easily ruined, have been outlawed so thoroughly that the most powerful human beings themselves have become impossible or would have to feel themselves to be evil, to be “harmful and forbidden.” This loss is great, but so far it has been necessary: now that a quantum of counterforces has been cultivated through temporary suppression of those passions (of lust to rule, joy in transformation and deception) their unleashing is again possible: they will no longer have their old wildness. We allow ourselves tame barbarism: just look at our artists and politicians? —The synthesis of opposites and counter-drives a sign of the total strength of a human being: how much can it control? —A new concept of holiness: Plato's naiveté — no longer the opposite of those drives branded heretical in the foreground [Page 27] 20 UNPUBLISHED

FRAGMENTS 34[79] Kant believed, with his table of categories in hand, “this is the most difficult task that could ever be undertaken for the benefit of metaphysics.”^{oo} — we had better not misunderstand where he placed his pride. 34[80] Crudeness and delicatessen! at the same time in Petronius, in Horace too: what I like best. It belongs to Greek taste. Homer was too crude for the people around La Rochefoucauld, they could not enjoy the trivial. They held on to a certain high perception among themselves, as now many Germans, and despise(d) themselves if perhaps a pleasure in the lower spheres stir(red) in them. Aristophanes is the opposite: nihil human'? — is ancient. 34[81] To place at the top: the instincts also have become, they prove not(hing) for the supersensual, not even for what is animal, not even for what is typically human. That the spirit has become and is still becoming, that among countless kinds of concluding and judging somehow the one most familiar to us now is most useful to us and has been inherited because the individuals who think in this manner had better chances: that nothing about “true” and “untrue” is proven by this, — — — 34[82]” — Anti-Kant. “Faculty, instinct, heredity, habit” today whoever seeks to explain something using such words must be modest and moreover poorly trained. But it raged at the end of the previous century. Galiani explained everything on the basis of habits and instincts.^{o4} Hume explained the sense of causality on the basis of habit; Kant said with great calm: “it is a faculty.”[®] Everyone was happy, especially as he had also discovered a [Page 270] I]

AUTUMN I—SPRING 1886 263 —To be demonstrated, to what extent the Greek religion was higher than the Jewish-Christian. The latter triumphed because the Greek religion itself had degenerated (had regressed).^o Goal: the sanctification of the most powerful terrible and best-discredited forces, or to say it old-fashionedly: the deification of the devil [5] — I measure according to how far a human being, a people can unleash the most terrible drives in himself and turn them to his salvation, without perishing from them: on the contrary for his fruitfulness in deeds and works — the interpretation of all mishaps as effects of unreconciled spirits is what has so far driven the great masses to religious cults. Even the higher moral life, that of the saint, has been invented only as one of the means of satisfying unreconciled spirits. — the interpretation of our experiences as providential hints of a kindly, educating divinity, even of our mishaps: — Development of the fatherly concept of God, proceeding from the patriarchal family. — the absolute corruption of humanity, the unfreedom for goodness and consequently the interpretation of all our actions with the interpretation of bad conscience: finally mercy. Miracleact. Sudden reversal. Paul, Augustine, Luther — the barbarization of Christianity by the Teutons: the intermediate beings, and the abundance of cults of atonement, in brief the pre-Christian standpoint returns. Likewise the composition-system. — Luther restores the basic logic of Christianity, the impossibility of morality and consequently of self-satisfaction, the necessity of mercy and consequently of miracles and also predestination. At bottom an admission of being overcome and an outbreak of self-contempt. [Page 271] 264 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS — “it is impossible to pay one’s debts,” outbreaks of salvation craving and the cults and mysteries. “It is impossible to rid oneself of sins” Outbreak of the Christianity of Paul Augustine and Luther. Formerly the occasion to become religious was external misfortune; later the inner feeling of misfortune, being unredeemed, fear, uncertainty. What appears to distinguish Christ and Buddha: it appears to be inner happiness that would make them religious 1[6] — the feeling of belonging to the higher order of rank is dominating in the moral feeling: it is the self-testimony of the higher caste whose actions and conditions afterwards pass again as the sign for a disposition with which one belongs in that caste or should belong in it — 1[7]’ — at first the moral feeling is developed with respect to human beings (classes above all!), only later is it translated to actions and character traits. The pathos of distance is in the innermost ground of that feeling. 1[8] — the unknowing state of human beings and their nonreflecting make for the fact that individual attribution is only made later on. One feels oneself too unfree, unspiritual, swept away by sudden drives, to think of oneself in any other way than with respect to nature: in us, too, demons are active. i[9]8 — Human, all too human. One cannot reflect on morality without involuntarily becoming morally occupied and indicating one’s morality. Thus I worked at the time on that refinement of morality that already perceives “reward” and “punishment” as “immoral” and no longer knows how to interpret the concept “justice” as “affectionate understanding,’ at bottom approval. In this perhaps there is weakness, perhaps dissipation, perhaps also — — [Page 272] 1 AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 265 1[10]? — “punishment” develops in the narrowest space, as reaction of the powerful, of the lord of the house, as expression of his wrath toward the disrespect of his command and prohibition. — Before the morality of custom (whose canon wants “everything traditional should be honored”) stands the morality of the ruling person (whose canon wants that “the commander alone should be honored”) The pathos of distance, the feeling of rank differentiation lies at the ultimate bottom of all morality. 1i] — “Soul” ultimately as “concept of the subject” 11[12] — If things are unknown, then so too is the human being. Whar’s the use of praising and blaming here! 1(13] — I do not grasp how one can be a theologian. I do not wish to think ill of such human beings, who are not after all just knowledge-machines [14] — Every action of which a human being is not capable is misunderstood by him. It is distinguishing to always be misunderstood with one’s actions. Then it is also necessary and no excuse for becoming embittered. [15] — It is not unselfish when I prefer to reflect upon causality instead of the lawsuit against my publisher;® my gain and my enjoyment lie in the direction of knowledge, precisely there my tension, restlessness, passion have been active longest. 1[16] Thoughts are actions [Page 273] 266 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1[17] — how we have relearned in fifty years! The whole of Romanticism with its belief in the “folk” has been refuted! No Homeric writing as folk-poetry! No deification of the great powers of nature! No inference from linguistic-affinity to racial-affinity! No “intellectual intuition”!! of the supersensual! No truth veiled in religion! 1[18] — The problem of truthfulness is entirely new. I am amazed: In this we regard such natures as Bismarck as guilty out of negligence, those like Richard Wagner out of lack of modesty, we would condemn Plato with his pia fraus,!? Kant on account of the deduction of his categorical imperative, whereas faith certainly did not come to him on this path 1[19] — Finally doubt also turns against itself: doubt about doubt. And the question of the justification of truthfulness and its scope stands there — 1[20] — All our conscious motives are surface phenomena: behind them stands the struggle of our drives and conditions, the struggle for power.’? 1[21] — That this melody sounds beautiful is not imparted to children by authority a(nd) instruction; no more so than the pleasant feeling at the sight of an honorable human being. Valuations are innate, despite Locke!, inherited; to be sure, they develop more strongly and beautifully when the people who protect and love us at the same time share the same valuations. What agony for a child to always posit his good and evil in contrast to his mother and to be scorned and despised wherever he venerates! [Page 274] 1 AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 267 1[22] — How manifold is that which we perceive as moral feeling: in it are veneration, fear, being touched as if by something holy and mysterious, in it speaks something that commands, that takes itself to be more important than we are; something that elevates, enflames or makes us calm and deep. Our moral feeling is a synthesis, a simultaneous-resounding of all dominating and subservient feelings that reigned in the history of our ancestors 1[23] — To the credit of the present. Health is promoted, ascetic world-renouncing ways of thinking (with their will to sickness) scarcely comprehended. Everything possible is valid and allowed to be valid and acknowledged, moist mild air in which every kind of plant grows. It is paradise for all petty luxurious vegetation 1[24] — Soul and breath and existence equated to esse. What lives is being: there is no further being. r[25]° — “The good people are all weak: they are good because they are not strong enough to be evil” said the Latuka chief Comorro to Baker.° 1[26]!” gin is Arabic and means spiritus? (= g’inn) 1 [27] “For the faint-hearted there is no misfortune” one says in Russian” 1[28] — all movements are to be understood as gestures, as a kind of language through which forces understand one another. In the [Page 275] 268 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS inorganic world misunderstanding is lacking, communication appears perfect. In the organic world error begins. “Things” “substances” properties, activ-“ities” — all this should not be carried into the inorganic world! They are the specific errors by virtue of which organisms live. Problem of the possibility of “error”? The contrast is not “false” and “true,” but “abbreviations of the signs” as opposed to the signs themselves. What is essential is: the formation of forms that represent many movements, the invention of signs for entire varieties of signs. — all movements are signs of an inner occurrence; and every inner occurrence expresses itself in such changes of forms. Thinking is not yet inner occurrence itself, but likewise only a sign language for the power equalization of affects.”! 1[29] — the anthropomorphizing of nature — interpretation according to us. [30] A. Psychological point of departure: — our thinking and valuations are only an expression for cravings that reign behind them. — the cravings become more and more specialized: their unity is the will to power (to apply the expression of the strongest of all drives that has so far directed all organic development) — Reduction of all organic basic functions to the will to power — question, whether it is not likewise the mobile? in the inorganic world? For in the mechanistic worldinterpretation a mobile is still needed. — “law of nature”: as a formula for the unconditional production of power-relations and degrees. — mechanical motion is only a means of expression of an inner occurrence. — “cause and effect” [Page 276] I AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 269 1[31] — struggle as the means of equilibrium 1[32]4 — the assumption of atoms is only a consequence of the concept of subject and substance: somewhere there must be “a thing” from which the activity proceeds. The atom is the last descendant of the concept of the soul. 1[33]” — the most terrible and thorough yearning of humanity, its drive for power — one calls this drive “freedom” — must be held in check for the longest time. This is why ethics to date, with its unconscious instincts of education and cultivation, has been intent upon keeping the greed for power in check: it disparages the tyrannical individual and underscores the herdpower instinct with its glorification of communal welfare and love of the fatherland. 1[34] — According to nature the strengths of humankind should develop in such a sequence that the undangerous ones are developed (praised, approved) first off, that conversely the strongest ones remain slandered and branded longest as heretics. 1[35]”° The Will to Power. Attempt at a New Interpretation of all Events. By Friedrich Nietzsche. 1[36] the world of thought only a second degree of the world of appearance — [Page 277] 270 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1[37] — movements are not “effected” by a “cause”: that would be the old soul-concept once more! — they are the will itself, but not entirely and completely! 1[38] NB. The belief in causality goes back to the belief that it is I who effects, to the division of the “soul” from its activity. Therefore an ancient superstition! 1[39] The tracing back of an effect to a cause is: back to a subject. All changes are regarded as produced by subjects. 1[40] — the current stage of morality demands a) no punishment! 2) no reward — 3) no servility 4) no pia fraus! no retaliation! 1[41] — we no longer bear the sight of them, consequently we do away with slaves 1[42]” It is a favorite expression of the indolent and those without conscience tout comprendre cest tout pardonner??? it is also a stupidity. Oh if one always had to wait first for the “comprendre”: it seems to me that one would then too seldom arrive at forgiving! And in the end, why should one forgive precisely if one had understood? Supposing I understood completely and thoroughly why this proposition bothers me, should I therefore not be allowed to cross it out? — There are enough cases where one crosses out a person because one has understood him. [Page 278] I AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 271 [43] — the concept “change” already posits the subject in advance, the soul as substance 1[44] — the offense that one takes at the doctrine “of the unfreedom of will” is this: it seems as though it were claiming “you do what you do not voluntarily but involuntarily i.e., forcibly.” Now everyone knows how someone feels when he does something involuntarily. Thus the teaching that accompanies that doctrine seems to be: everything that you do you do involuntarily therefore reluctantly, “against your will” — and this one does not admit because one does many things gladly, even specifically many “moral things.” Thus one understands “unfree will” as “compelled by a foreign will”: as if the claim were: “everything that you do you do compelled by a foreign will.” Your obedience to your own will is not called compulsion: for there is pleasure in it. That you command yourself, that is called: “freedom of will” 1[45] Sapientia victrix? Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future.’ 1[46] Religions live for the longest time without being mixed with morality: morality-free. Consider what any religion really wants — it is still palpable even today: what one wants from it is not redemption from distress, but above all redemption from the fear of distress. All distress is considered to be the consequence of the evil, hostile reigning of spirits: all distress that afflicts someone is of course not “deserved,” but it raises the thought through which a spirit might be irritated at us; the human being trembles before unknown roaming ungracious monsters and wishes to render them gracious. In so doing he examines his behavior: [Page 279] 272 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS and if there are any means at all to render friendly certain spirits that he knows, then he will ask himself whether he has really done everything that he could have done in this regard. As a courtier examines his own behavior toward the ruler when he has perceived an ungracious mood in him: — he looks for some omission etc. “Sin” is originally that whereby some spirit could be sorely offended, some omission, a — — — : there one must again make something good. — Only insofar as a spirit, a divinity also expressly sets forth certain moral commandments as means to please and serve him, does the moral valuation enter into “sin” as well: or rather: only then can an offense against a moral commandment be perceived as “sin,” as something that separates from God, insults him and also has dangers and distress from him in its wake. 1[47] Cleverness, caution and provision (in contrast to indolence and to living in the moment) — now one nearly means to debase an action if one names these motives. But what has it cost to cultivate these traits! To regard cleverness as virtue — is still Greek! Likewise then sobriety and “presence of mind” in contrast to acting from violent impulses, to “naïveté” of acting. 1[48] Absolute devotion (in religion) as reflex of slavish devotion or of the feminine (— the eternal-feminine*! is idealized slave sense) 1[49] Measuring the moral value of an action according to its intent: presupposes that the intent really is the cause of the action — which actually means regarding the intent as a perfect knowledge as “thing in itself.” In the end it is only the consciousness a(nd) the interpretation of a state (of malaise, desire etc.) [Page 28] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 21 moral faculty. Here lay the magic of his philosophy: the young theologians of the Tübingen Seminary’c went into the bushes — they all searched for “faculties.” And what didn’t they find! Schelling christened it “intellectual intuition,” a faculty for the “supersensual.” Schopenhauer believed he had found the same thing and more, namely “the thing in itself” in an already sufficiently respected faculty, in the will. In England there arose the instinctivists and intuitionists of morality. It was the old subject of faith and knowledge, a kind of “formal faith” that laid claim to some content. This story essentially concerns the theologians. In secret Leibniz comes alive again, and behind Leibniz — Plato. Concepts as G&vapyoung” etc. This initially skeptical movement is indeed directed against skepticism, it takes pleasure in subservience 3483] NB. The most annoying quality of the writings of obscure, poorly trained and unphilological spirits is not even their inadequate capacity for inference and the unsteady, wobbly gait of their logic. It is the unsteadiness of the concepts themselves, for which they make use of words: these people have only shapeless floating splotches of concepts in their heads. — But the good author is distinguished not only by the strength and concision of his sentence structure: but one notices, one smells, if one is a man of subtle nostrils, that such a writer constantly compels himself and practices first to establish his concepts in a rigorous manner and make them firmer, thus to connect unequivocal concepts with his words: and, until this is done, he will not write! — Moreover there is some charm also in the uncertain, twilight, half-light: this perhaps was Hegel's effect on foreigners mostly through his art of speaking like a drunkard of the most sober and cold things. In the great realm of intoxications this was really one of the rarest ever invented — and quite uniquely a matter of German ingenuity! For wherever Germans and German "virtues" have penetrated, we have also brought along and transported the lust and desire for crude and refined [Page 280] I AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 273 [50] — states and desires are supposed to be described with language: therefore concepts are signs for recognizing. The aim at logic is not in it: logical thinking is a dissolution. But each thing that we "comprehend," each state is a synthesis that one does not "comprehend," but can indeed describe: and even this only insofar as one recognizes a certain similarity to what has been. "Unscientific" indeed is every inner spiritual action, also every thinking. [51] Thinkers of humble or dishonest lineage falsely understand the lust to rule, also the drive to distinction: they relegate both to vanity, as if it were a matter of standing there respected, feared or adored in the opinion of other human beings. [52] Measured according to scientific standards, the value of each moral value judgment of humans over humans is very meager: there is a groping and fumbling and much delusion and ignorance in every word. [53] These are separate tasks: 1) to grasp and determine the current (and in a limited cultural sphere) dominating kind of moral assessment of humans and actions 2) the entire morality codex of a period is a symptom e.g., as a means of self-admiration or dissatisfaction or tartuffery: secondly therefore, in addition to determining the current character of morality, the meaning and interpretation of this character still needs to be given. For in itself it is ambiguous. 3) to explain the emergence of this manner of judgment that is dominating right now [Page 281] 274 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 4) to give a critique of it or to ask: how strong is it? what does it affect? what becomes of humankind (or of Europe) under its sway? Which powers does it promote, which does it suppress? Does it make us healthier, sicker, braver, subtler, more art-needy etc.? Here already it is presupposed that there is no eternal morality: this should be accepted as proven. As little as there is an eternal kind of judgment about nourishment. But new is the criticism, the question: is "good" really "good"? And what use perhaps is had by what is now neglected and maligned? Distances in time have to be considered. [54] The character of the absolute will to power is present in the entire realm of life. If we have a right to deny consciousness, then hardly the right to deny the driving affects, e.g., in a rain forest. (consciousness always contains a double mirroring — there is nothing direct —) [55] Fundamental question: how deep does the ethical go? Does it belong only to what is learned? Is it a form of expression? All profounder human beings are of one mind in this — it enters the consciousness of Luther Augustine Paul — that our morality and its events do not correspond to our conscious will — in sum, that the explanation from purpose-intentions does not suffice. [56]? Remaining objective, hard, firm, strict in asserting an idea — this is still best accomplished by artists; but if people are needed for this (like teachers, politicians etc.) then the calm and coolness and hardness quickly go away. In natures such as Caesar and Napoleon one can intuit something of a “disinter [Page 282] 1] AUTUMN I—SPRING 1886 275 ested” laboring on one’s marble, regardless of any possible sacrifice of human beings. The future of the highest human beings lies on this path: to bear the greatest responsibility and not collapse under it. —Until now inspirational deceptions were almost always needed in order not to lose faith in one’s right and one’s hand. 1[57] Transformations of the will to power, its elaborations, its specializations — to be represented as parallel to morphological development! 1[58] From the standpoint of each of our fundamental drives there is a different perspectival assessment of all events and experiences. Each of these drives feels itself hindered, or promoted, flattered with respect to every other: each has its own law of development (its high and low, its tempo etc.) — and the latter is dying out when the former rises. The human being as a multiplicity of “wills to power”: each with a multiplicity of means of expression and forms. The individual alleged “passions” (e.g., human beings are cruel) are only fictive unities insofar as that which enters into consciousness as homogeneous on the part of the different fundamental drives is synthetically fictionalized to form a “being” or “faculty,” a passion. In the same manner therefore as the “soul” itself is an expression for all phenomena of consciousness: but which we interpret as the cause of all these phenomena (“self-consciousness” is fictive!) [59] Everything material is a kind of motion symptom for an unknown event: everything conscious and felt on the other hand is symptom of unknown — — — . The world that can be known to us from these two sides could have yet many [Page 283] 276 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS other symptoms. No necessary relationship exists between spirit and material, as if they somehow exhausted the forms of depiction and solely represented them. Movements are symptoms, thoughts are likewise symptoms: desires are verifiably behind both, and the fundamental desire is the will to power. — “Spirit in itself” is nothing, just as “movement in itself” is nothing*? 1[60] It is nearly comical that our philosophers demand that philosophy must begin with a critique of the knowledge faculty: is it not very improbable that the organ of knowledge can “critique” itself when one has become suspicious of the previous results of knowledge? The reduction of philosophy to a “will to a theory of knowledge” is comical. As if certainty could be found in this manner! — 1[61] Everything that enters into consciousness is the last link of a chain, an ending. That one thought would directly be the cause of another thought is only illusory. The actual connected events play (themselves) out beneath our consciousness: the appearing series and sequence of feelings thoughts etc. are symptoms of what actually happens! — Beneath every thought an affect is hidden. Every thought, every feeling, every will is not born from one specific drive, but it is an overall state, an entire surface of the entire consciousness and results from the momentary power-determination of all the drives that constitute us — therefore of the currently ruling drive as well as the one that obeys or resists it. The next thought is a sign of how the overall power-situation has shifted in the meantime. 1[62] “Will” — a false reification.³⁴ [Page 284] | AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 277 1[63] — How Goethe will look at some point later on! how insecure, how drifting! And his “Faust” — what an incidental and temporal, and insufficiently necessary and durable problem! A degeneration of the knowledgeable one, a sick person, nothing more! In no way the tragedy of the knowledgeable one himself! Not even of the “free spirit.” 1[64] love of humanity. Justice. cruelty. reward and punishment. } everything has already had its self-satisfaction. pro and contra reasonableness. order of rank. slavery (devotion) all praising and blaming is perspectival from the standpoint of a will to power. “innate ideas” the soul, the thing — false. Likewise “the spirit” 1[65]*^o Chapter on interpretation reification the afterlife of bygone ideals (e.g., slave sense in Augustine) 1[66] The love of humanity of the Christian, which makes no distinctions, is only possible in the continuous beholding of God, in relation to which the order of rank between human and human is growing disappearingly tiny, and the human itself generally is becoming so insignificant that relative sizes are no longer of interest: as from atop a high mountain big and small become ant-like and similar. — One should not overlook this [Page 285] 278 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS underestimation of the human being generally, which lies in the Christian feeling of love for humanity: “you are my brother, I already know how you feel, no matter who you are — namely bad!” etc. In fact such a Christian is an extremely obtrusive and immodest sort. Conversely: if we let God go, then we are lacking a type of being that is higher than the human: and our eye becomes refined for the differences of this “highest being.” 1[67] — I am mistrustful of the contemplative, self-contained,^{o*o} fortunate among the philosophers — what is lacking there is the shaping force and the subtlety in honesty that admits to itself lack as a force 1[68] The transformation of morally depraved into morally revered — and vice versa. 1[69] — some select an absolute obligation from within and at times make one up, others want to prove it and thus plant with it at the same time — 1[70]*^o — how immodest humans appear with their religions, even if they are groveling before God, like the saintly

Augustine! What obtrusiveness! This fatherly or grandfatherly principle in the background! 1[71] — Among mortals so far morality has been regarded as the most serious thing there is: this has been good for the moralists, for whom among gods — and perhaps also among human beings — no small laughter is waiting: in the long run one never [Page 286] 1] AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 279 bears the dignity of an instructor unpunished. To “instruct” humans, to “improve” humans — the presumption of such an undertaking 1[72] That the cat human being always lands on its four feet, I meant to say on its single leg “ego,” is only a symptom of its psychological “unity,” better “union”: no reason to believe in a “psychic unity.” [73] — Morality is a part of the theory of affects: how far do the affects reach into the heart of existence? 1[74] If there were an “in itself” at all, what then would be the “In itself” of a thought? 1[75] Thoughts are the signs of a game and struggle of affects: they are always connected to their hidden roots 1[76] Whoever measures the value of an action according to the intention from which it occurs, does so meaning the conscious intention: but in all actions there is much unconscious intentionality; and what appears in the foreground as “will” and “purpose” is manifoldly explicable and in itself only a symptom. “A pronounced, pronounceable intention” is an explication, an interpretation that can be false; moreover an arbitrary simplification and falsification etc [77] The calculation of pleasure as a possible consequence of an action and the pleasure associated with an action itself, as the [Page 287] 280 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS triggering of a pent-up and stored-up force: what sort of effort has it already cost to keep these two pleasures separated! It is laughable! Just as the amenity of life — and d/iss are confused for moral drunkenness and self-adoration. 1[78] With human knowledge morality too has refined itself a) instead of sin as a transgression against God “injustice toward myself” b) instead of praying and the longing for wondrous help — c) instead of the interpretation of experience as reward and punishment — d) instead of hostility toward every kind of plight and unrest and strife — e) instead of the obtrusive equalizing love of humanity of the Christian — 1[79] The greatest sincerity and conviction about the value of one’s own work achieves nothing: likewise my doubting underestimation cannot touch its value. This is how it is with all actions: however moral I may seem to myself with an intention, in itself here (nothing) is decided about the value of the intention and even less about the value of the action. The entire descent of an action would have to be known, and not only the little piece of it that falls into consciousness (the so-called intention) But this would be like demanding absolute knowledge — 1[80] To what extent an overcoming of the moral human being is possible: we no longer measure the value of an action by its consequences we also no longer measure it by its intention [Page 288] 1 AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 281 1[81] As little as we still pray and raise up our hands will we someday need slander and defamation in order to treat certain drives in us as enemies; and likewise our power, that forces us to destroy humans and institutions, can do this someday without our personally having to succumb to emotions of outrage and disgust: to destroy with a divine eye and unperturbedly! Beginning with the annihilation of human beings who feel themselves to be good! experimentum crucis?' 1[82]? Beyond Good and Evil Attempt at an Overcoming of Morality. By Friedrich Nietzsche. 1[83] The religious interpretation overcome. Morality belongs in the theory of affects (only a means for their taming, whereas others should be cultivated. 1[84] The Overcoming of Morality. So far the human being has preserved itself meagerly, in that it has maliciously treated and slandered the drives that are most dangerous to it and likewise in a servile manner has flattered those that preserve it. The gaining of new powers and lands a) the will to untruth b) the will to cruelty c) the will to lust d) the will to power [Page 289] 282 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1[85] aimed at the understanding of the external world and communicating to it, the intellect and senses must be superficial. Complete emptiness of logic — 1[86] "Division of labor, memory, exercise, habit, instinct, heredity, faculty, force" — all words with which we explain nothing, but certainly describe and indicate. 1[87]*! The "ego" (which is not one with the unified governing of our nature!) is after all only a conceptual synthesis — therefore there is absolutely no acting from "egoism" 1[88] — that some conscious or unconscious calculation of pleasure that one has as a result of acting (whether in the action or later), is really the cause of the action, is a hypothesis!!! 1[89] We belong to the character of the world, there is no doubt! We have no access to it other than through us: everything that is lofty and lowly in us must be understood as necessarily belonging to its nature! 1[90] NB. We want to honestly admit to ourselves our inclinations and disinclinations and resist decorating them from moral paint pots. Thus certainly we will no longer interpret our plight as our "struggle with God and the devil"! Let us be naturalistic and concede a good right even to that which we must fight, in ourselves and outside ourselves! [9x] Through the division of labor the senses are nearly detached from thinking and judging: whereas earlier this lay in them, [Page 29] 22 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS types of alcohol. — Perhaps even the captivating power of our German music belongs here. 34[84] NB. What Plato and at bottom all post-Socratics did: that was a certain legislation of concepts: — they firmly established for themselves and their disciples "this and that should be thought and sensed with this word": — therewith they freed themselves most definitively from their time and environment. This is one of the kinds of subtle disgust with which superior, more demanding natures rise up against the obscure crowd and their conceptual chaos: 34[85] What is this tremendous power that for 2 thousand years has made fools of philosophers and toppled the reason of the reasonable? That instinct, that belief as it is demanded by Christianity: this is the herd instinct itself, the herd belief of the animal “human,” the herd longing for complete subservience to an authority — (the same thing that Kant christened the “categorical imperative” out of German herd instinct.) In fact it is the greatest relief and boon to endangered vacillating tender weak herd animals to get someone who commands absolutely, a bellwether: it is their first condition of life.⁹⁸ The Brahmins knew this relief well, likewise the Jesuits, in nearly all monasteries the basic tendency is this: to finally rid oneself of the eternal agitation that commanding oneself brings with it. This instinct for faith is also the genuine feminine instinct; and when women find one implacable teacher who wants obedience and subservience from them, or even only one artist who shows woman in the attitude of her “perfection,” as an adoring worshipping devoted creature, as victim, like e.g., R{ichard) Wagner), then they are “beside themselves” for joy: namely sated and satisfied before herself in her ultimate instinct. — In a weaker form one sees this in the French, who as the most [Page 290] I] AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 283 undifferentiated. Still earlier the desires and the senses must have been one. 1[92] All struggle — all events are a struggle — needs duration. What we call “cause” and “effect” leaves out the struggle and consequently does not correspond to the events. It is consistent to deny time in causes a(nd) effects.⁹⁹ 4 1[93]° Let us free ourselves from a bit of the superstition that so far has been routine with respect to philosophers. 1[94] The New Enlightenment. Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future. By Friedrich Nietzsche. x[95]° Free Spirits and Other Philosophers. Beyond Good and Evil. r[96]*° Moralism Morality. 1197] On the confusion of cause and symptom Desire and aversion are the oldest symptoms of all value judgments: but not causes of value judgments! Therefore: desire and aversion belong like the moral and aesthetic judgments under one category. 1[98] Words remain: people believe, even the concepts referred to by them! [Page 291] 284 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1[99] We are lacking many concepts for expressing relationships: how quickly we are ready with “master and servant” “father and child” etc.! 1[100] Basic misunderstanding: one person interprets every other according to himself; therefore misunderstanding of many virtues and affects that correspond to a higher kind. Even the same person understands himself falsely when in lower moments he looks back on his high festive times. “Selfdebasement” “humility” rhor] Oh, do you know the mute tenderness with which the evil and terrible human being dwells on that moment when he once — or still — was “different”! No one sees virtue so seductively, so much woman and child. 1[102] In the purest spring a single drop of dirt is enough — 1[103] The hand that wanted to reach out for a prayer, the mouth prepared to sigh — here the free spirit has his overcoming, but also his damming up. One day the dam will be overrun by wild waters — 1[104] Many of the more refined want calm, peace from their affects — they strive for objectivity, neutrality, they are satisfied to be left over as spectators — and as critical spectators with a curious and bold superiority. Others want calm on the outside, undangerousness of life — they would like not to be envied and not attacked — and prefer to give “everyone his right” — call it “righteousness” and love of humanity etc. For the chapter: “Virtues as Disguise.” [Page 292] | AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 285 1[105] The loss in all specializations: the synthetic nature is the higher. Now all organic life is already a specialization; the inorganic world that stands behind it is the greatest synthesis of forces and therefore the highest and most venerable. — Error, perspectival limitation are lacking there. 1[106] Artists: inspired, sensual, childish, now overly suspicious, now overly trusting 1[107] — Are you someone who as thinker is loyal to his proposition, not like a pettifogger, but like a soldier to his orders? There is disloyalty not only against persons. 1[108] — Compassion in someone who has happiness and courage enough to be able even to stand aside and /ook aside, like an Epicurean god. 1[109]” The Mirror. Philosophy of Forbidden Knowledge. By Friedrich Nietzsche. 1[110]® God has been refuted, not the devil. For clear-sighted and suspicious eyes that know how to gaze deeply enough into the backgrounds the spectacle of events is proof neither of truthfulness nor fatherly concern or superior reasonableness; neither something noble nor something pure and trustworthy. [Page 293] 286 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1111] Northern unnaturalness. everything coated with silvery mists, one can only arrive at feeling good artificially,” art there is a kind of avoidance of oneself. Oh, this pale pleasure, this October light on all pleasures! Northern artificiality 1[112] The Tempter. By Friedrich Nietzsche. 1[113] Harmlessness of our critical philosophers, who do not notice that skepticism — — — : they believe, if one first tests the tool before applying it, namely the capacity for knowledge — — — . This is even worse than wanting to test a match before one wants to use it. It is the match that wants to test itself to see if it burns 1[114] The absolute necessity of all events contains nothing of a compulsion: whoever has thoroughly acknowledged and empathized this stands high in knowledge. From his belief no forgiving and pardoning results — I cross out a sentence that does not turn out well, just as I acknowledge the necessity by virtue of which I failed at it, for the noise of a wagon disturbed me — thus we cross out actions, and in some cases human beings, because they did not turn out well. “To comprehend everything”? — that would mean suspending all perspectival relations, that would mean comprehending nothing, misjudging the nature of knowing. [Page 294] | AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 287 1[115]}>! The interpretive character of all events. There is no event in itself. What happens is a group of appearances selected and summarized by an interpreting being. 1116] Fear has been further developed into the sense of honor, envy into fairness (“to each his own” and even “equal rights”) obtrusiveness of the isolated and endangered into loyalty — — — 1[117] the melancholy of the spirit that stays in place wherever it happens to end up, the indolence that does not want to learn anew, the good-natured subservience to a power and joy in serving, the moist-warm brooding over thoughts, desires — all German — origin of loyalty and faith. 1[118]°2 The splitting of a protoplasm in 2 occurs when its power no longer suffices to control the appropriated possession: reproduction is the result of an impotence.” Where the males search for females out of hunger and are absorbed by them, reproduction is the result of a hunger.>4 1[119] The absolutely identical process, but the higher interpretation of the process!! The mechanistic sameness” of force, but the increase of the feeling of power! “The second time” —but there is no “second time.” The absolute lack of effect of the inner feeling of power as causality — — — 1[120]°° The same text allows innumerable interpretations: there is no “correct” interpretation. [Page 295] 288 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1[21]°” Gai saber. Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future. 1. Free Spirits and other Philosophers. 2. World-Interpretation, not World-Explanation. 3. Beyond Good and Evil. 4. The Mirror. An Opportunity for Self-Mirroring for Europeans. 5. The Philosophy of the Future. 1[122]>8 Overcoming of Affects? No, if it is supposed to mean their weakening and annihilation. Rather taking them into service: to which may belong tyrannizing them for a long time (not only as individuals, but as community, race etc.) Finally one restores to them ever more confidently their freedom: they love us like good servants and go willingly wherever our best wants to go. 1[123]°? Happiness and self-contentedness of the Lazzaroni® or “bliss” in “beautiful souls” a(nd) consumptive bodies a(nd) Herrnhuter Pietists®! prove nothing with respect to the order of rank of human beings. As a greater educator, one would have to mercilessly flog a race of such “blessed humans” into misfortune: the danger of diminution, of relaxation is immediately there: against Spinozistic or Epicurean happiness and against all relaxation in contemplative states. But if virtue is the means to such happiness, well, then one must also become master over virtue 1[124] How do the perspective sphere and error emerge? Insofar as, by virtue of an organic being, not a being as such, but instead struggle itself wants to preserve itself, wants to grow and wants to be conscious of itself. [Page 296] I AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 289 That which we call “consciousness” and “spirit” is only a means and tool by virtue (of which) not a subject, but 4 struggle wants to preserve itself. The human being is proof of what enormous forces can be set in motion by a small being of manifold content (or by a perennial struggle concentrated on many small beings) Beings that play with stars 1[125]°2 — To transform the belief “it is thus and such” into the will “thus and (such) it shall be.” 1[126]° — The Paths to the Saint. Conclusion of “The Will to Power.” 1[127]°4 — there must be those who sanctify all their actions, not only eating and drinking: and not only in memory of them, or in becoming one with them, but always anew and in a new manner this world should be transfigured. 1[128] — what is essential about an organic being is a new interpretation of events, the perspectival inner multiplicity, which itself is an event. 1[129]® — the saints as the strongest humans (through self-overcoming, freedom, loyalty etc. 1[130]®° — to deny merit, but to do that which is above all praise, indeed above all understanding [Page 297] 290 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS [131] The Will to Power. 1[132] — a great human being who feels a right to sacrifice humans as a general sacrifices humans; not in the service of an “idea” but because he wants to rule. 1[133] — less and less physical strength is necessary: with cleverness one lets machines work, the human being becomes more powerful and more spiritual. [134] — why it is necessary today occasionally to speak crudely and act crudely. Something subtle and kept secret is no longer understood, not even by those who are related to us. That of which one does not speak loudly or shout, that does not exist: pain, privation, task, the long duty and the great overcoming — No one sees and smells anything of this. Cheerfulness is construed as a sign of lack of profundity: that it can be the bliss after all too severe tension, who knows that? — One goes around with actors and tries very hard to respect even there. But no one understands to what extent it is hard and painful for me to go around with actors. Or with a phlegmatic sensualist who has enough spirit to — 1[135] — I have charged the Germans with philistinism and being comfortable: but this /etting-oneself-go is European and “contemporary,” not only in morality and art. 1136] — not to allow oneself that a virtue is made of curiosity and of the zeal of research, a “will to truth.” The scholars of Port [Page 298] I AUTUMN 1885-SPRING 1886 291 Royal knew this and took this more rigorously. But we have allowed all our inclinations to go to seed and afterwards we also want to have the beautiful name of virtues for them. But virtue belongs to the productions of stronger and more evil ages: it is a privilege of aristocrats. 1[137] I wonder about the most acknowledged things of morality —and other philosophers, like Schopenhauer, have only paused before the “wonders” in morality. 1[138]68 Discords and dialogues 1[139] Artists begin to value and overvalue their works when they cease to have respect for themselves. Their raging demand for fame often veils a sad secret. The work does not belong to their rule, they feel it as their exception. — Perhaps they also want that their works intercede for them as advocacy, perhaps that others deceive them about themselves. Finally: perhaps they want noise in themselves, in order no longer to “hear” themselves. 1[140] “God wants my best when he visited sorrow upon me” — It is your responsibility to interpret this to your best: it meant no more even for religious people. 1[141] Beyond Yes and No. Questions and Question Marks for Questionable Ones. [Page 299] 292 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1[142] We know better than we admit to ourselves that W(agner) is poor, that a thought rarely comes to him, that he himself is most startled, delighted, bowled over by his appearance and for an overly long time has not tired of stroking and decorating these wonders of thought. He is too grateful and does not know the cold affability of the rich, even less their tender disgust, the weariness of those who do nothing but bestow — like Mozart, like Rossini: only the superabundant fountains leap and dance. 1[143]® “We Lizards of Happiness? Thoughts of a Grateful One.”? 1[144]” The Last Virtue. A Morality for Moralists [145]? — this last virtue, our virtue is called: honesty. In all other respects we are only the heirs and perhaps the squanderers of virtues that are not gathered and hoarded by us 1[146] A moralist: by which I mean etc. Question and objection: has there ever been a m(oralist)? — Perhaps no, perhaps yes; in any case from now on there should be only such m(oralists). 1[147] Let us flee, my friends, from what is boring, from the overcast sky, from the waddle-geese, from the honorable woman, from the spinsters who write and “lay” books — is life not too short to bore ourselves? [Page 3] Contents A NOTE ON THIS EDITION Ix

Unpublished Fragments (Spring 1885—Spring 1886) Notebook 34 = N VII 1
 April-June 1885 Notebook 35 = W I 3a. May-July 1885 Notebook 36 = W I 4.
 June-July 1885 Notebook 37 = W I 6a. June-July 1885 Notebook 38 = Mp XVI
 1a. Mp XVI 2a. Mp XV 2b. June-July 1885 Notebook 39 = N VII 2a. Z I 2b.
 August-September 1885 Notebook 40 = W I 7a. August-September 1885
 Notebook 41 = W I 5. August-September 1885 Notebook 42 = Mp XVII 2a.
 August-September 1885 Notebook 43 = Z I 2c. Autumn 1885 Notebook 44 = Mp
 XVII 2b. Autumn 1885 Notebook 45 = W I 6b. Autumn 1885 176 240 247 [Page 30] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 23 good-natured Europeans are also the most herdlike: they only feel good when they are allowed by their esprit? “to obey unconditionally” for once: as in the presence of Napoleon. Or also in the presence of “the ideas of the French Revolution” — or also in the presence of Victor Hugo (who throughout his whole long life always adorned this most beautiful of all herd instincts with beautiful words and coats of pomp in the name of freedom). — When Christianity came along antiquity was inwardly torn back and forth by opposites of valuations (as a result of the physiological conditioning of the nonsensical equality concept civis romanus or by that nonsensical state expansion of the imperium romanum®) and Christianity provided the great relief. 34[86] Words are acoustical signs for concepts: but concepts are more or less definite groups of recurring sensations that arrive together. In order to understand one another it does not yet suffice that people use the same words:
 one must also use the same words for the same species of inner experience — and this one must have in common. This is why representatives of a single people understand each other better: or, when human beings have lived together for a long time under similar conditions of climate, activities, needs, then a certain variety of experiences that are most closely understood by them all gains the upper hand: the result is a quick comprehension of one another. And marriage and inheritance are again the result of it. It is the need to convey one’s needs quickly and easily that binds human beings most firmly to one another. On the other hand nothing holds a friendship, a love affair together when it is discovered that one means something different with words. Which groups of sensations are in the foreground is determined by valuations: but valuations are the result of our innermost needs. — This is said to explain why it is difficult to understand writings like mine: the inner experiences, valuations and needs are [Page 300]] AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 293 1[148] “The World as Will and Representation” — translated back into the narrow and personal, into Schopenhauerian: “The world as sex-drive and contemplativeness.” 1[149] The German empire is distant to me, and there is no reason for me to be friend or foe with respect to a thing that lies so distant to me. 1[150] So far we have been so well behaved toward women. Woe, the time will come when in order to interact with a woman one must first always hit her in the mouth. 1[r]7? The Paths to the Saint. What are Strong Spirits? On Herd-Animal Morality 1[152] New Dangers and New Securities A Book for Strong Spirits. x(153)”4 NB. Against Aryan and Semitic. Where races are mixed, the source of great culture. [154] What is Noble? Thoughts on Order of Rank. 1[155] What are we waiting for anyway? Is it not for a great herald and trumpet-noise! What happiness lies in loud sounds! There [Page 301] 294 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS is a silence that suffocates: we have been hearkening”® too long already. 1[156] Whoever has the greatest gifts to give, searches for those who understand how to take — he searches perhaps in vain? In the end he throws away his gift? That kind of thing belongs to the secret history and despair of the richest souls: it is perhaps the most misunderstood and melancholy of all misfortunes on earth. [157] That moral judgment, insofar as it represents itself in concepts, looks narrow, clumsy, wretched, almost ridiculous measured against the subtlety of the same judgment insofar as it represents itself in actions, in selecting, rejecting, shuddering, loving, hesitating, doubting, in every touch of human to human. 1[158] how the hearty mediocrity in Germany today feels good, namely feels related with the music of their Brahms — : how the fine and insecure greyhounds of the Parisian spirit today sniff around their Renan with a lusty flattery — i[159] The value of monarchs on the rise! 1[160]’7 How treacherous are all parties! — they bring to light something about their leaders that perhaps has been hidden by them under a bushel with great skill 1[161] Perhaps everyone has his standard for what is regarded as “superficial” by him: well then, I have my own — a crude, simplistic standard for my use at home, as it fits my hand — may others have a right to more ticklish, fine-tongued instruments! [Page 302] I AUTUMN I—SPRING 1886 295 Whoever feels suffering to be an argument against life, I regard to be superficial, along with our pessimists; likewise whoever sees a goal in well-being. 1[162]78 The orgiastic soul. — I have seen him: his eyes at least — they are by turns deep still, then green and slippery honey-eyes his halcyonic smiling

the sky looked on bloody and cruelly the orgiastic soul of woman I have seen him: his halcyonic smiling, his honey-eyes, in turn deep and veiled, then green, slippery, a trembling surface, slippery, sleepy, trembling, tarrying, the sea wells up in his eyes 1[163]”° 1. Caesar among pirates 2. On the bridge. 3. The wedding. — and suddenly, while the sky falls darkly 4. Ariadne. 1[164] This music — Dionysian after all? dance? cheerfulness? the tempter? the religious flood? beneath Plato’s pillow Ar(istophanes)? 1[165]®° our street musicians and h(umans) of a dishonest burial — they are the closest kin of witches, they have their Blocksbergs*®! 1[166] the mystical nature, soiled by vices and foaming [Page 303] 296 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1[167]8? the goodly and pure spring that is never again able to get over a drop of garbage that fell into it, until in the end it is yellow and poisoned through and through: — the corrupted angels 1[168] “We Immoralists.” 1169] “Hail to thee, if you know what you do; but if you do not know it, then you are under the law and under the law’s curse” Jesus of Nazareth. 1[170] Industriousness, as a mark of an ignoble kind of human (which, as is self-evident, therefore is still an estimable and indispensable kind of human — explanatory note for asses!) in our age would like — — — [171] compared to Rabelais and that exuberant power of the senses whose characteristic he is, — — — 1[172] Raphael without hands the monasteries and hermitages of culture this music is not sincere “As little state as possible”® — the anti-national powers For someone for whom “objectivity” “contemplativeness” is already the highest state, like Schopenhauer — he does not know enough the fortune of finding® an unbroken naive egoism the tartuffery of the Germans! the old woman represented as the emanation of their sense of duty — I heard it with my own ears. [Page 304] I AUTUMN 1885-SPRING 1886 297 The screaming and scribbling of ugly girls — the decreasing influence of woman. the new Melusine® As much militaristics as possible, the kings who are fired upon — the sacrificing of the bivouac, without door and window the loaded revolver “the cause of every action an act of consciousness,” a knowing! Consequently the bad actions only errors etc. The famous words “forgive them?” their” the universalization “tout comprendre”®® — superficial words “the great ambiguous one and tempter” 1173] a cold reluctant lake, on which no delight ripples 1174” not yet one hour among my kind, with everything I do and try the secret worm “you have other things to do!” tortured by children geese and dwarves, nightmare — only such types are around him, against whom he can neither retaliate nor give instruction — — — 1[175] pampered consciences 1[176] the little sorrow 1177] Of a great human being. His descendants say of him: “since then things climbed higher and higher.” — But they understand nothing of this ordeal of climbing; a great human being is pushed, pressed, crowded, tortured-up into Ais height. [Page 305] 298 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1[178]°° This is a problem of race as I understand it: for as concerns that clumsy drivell about Aryan — — — [179] The Jesuitism of mediocrity that seeks to break or weaken the extraordinary and tense human being like a bow that is dangerous to it, with compassion and comfortable out-stretched hands as well as with poisoning of his necessary solitude and with secretive pollution of his faith — : which has its triumph when it can say “that one has finally become like one of us”: this domineering Jesuitism that is the driving force in the entire democratic movement will, everywhere, quite removed from politics and the questions of nourishment a(nd) — — — 1[180] Mozart the flower of the German baroque — 1[181] Inspiration. — 1[182] It is difficult to be understood. He should have heartfelt gratitude for even the good will to a bit of subtlety of interpretation: on good days one demands nothing more at all. One should concede to one’s friends an abundant space”! for misunderstandings. It seems to me better to be misunderstood than not understood: there is something insulting in being understood. To be understood? You really know what that means? — Comprendre c’est égal.* It flatters more to be misunderstood than not understood: one remains cold toward the incomprehensible, and coldness offends. [Page 306] I AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 299 1[183] Alas, this is the sea: and this bird is supposed to build its nest here? On those days when the sea becomes still and — — — 1[184] On the greed of the spirit: where, as with avarice, the means become the end. Insatiability. Today one loves everything that is fatalistically tremendous: so too the spirit. 1[185]”? The Discipline of the Spirit. Thoughts on the Intellectual Conscience. The avarice and insatiability of the spirit: — its tremendous, fatalistic, nocturnally roaming, pitiless, predatory and cunning qualities. 1[186]?4 The Scholar. What is Truth? On the Spirit's Lack of Discipline. The Demagogic in our Arts. Master and Slave Morality. Morality and Physiology. Piety. On the History of the Free Spirit. We Immoralists. The Noble Soul. The Mask. [Page 307] 300 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1[187]” L What is Truth? 2. On the Natural History of the Scholar. 3. The Mask 4. On the Noble Soul. 5. We Immoralists. 6. Herd Morality. 7. On the Demagoguery of the Arts. 8. Piety. 9. The Good Europeans. 10. The Philosophers of the Future. Skeptics. Free Spirits. Strong Spirits. Tempter. Dionysus. 1[188]?° First Part: our courage Second part: our compassion Third Part: our insight Fourth part: our solitude [189] 1. Morality and Knowledge. 2. Morality and Religion 3. Morality and Art. 4. “We Europeans.” 5. What is Noble? Inspiration [Page 308] 1 AUTUMN I—SPRING 1886 301 1[190] Among those who have freed themselves of religion I find human beings of many kinds and ranks. There are the intemperate, who have allowed themselves to be persuaded by their senses (because their senses no longer tolerated the compulsion and accusation of the religious ideal) — and who like to avail themselves of reason a(nd) of taste as their advocates, as if they could no longer tolerate the unreasonable, the distasteful aspects of religion: — what suits this kind of human being is antireligious hatred, malice and sardonic laughter, but likewise in well-concealed moments a yearning shame, an inner subservience to the valuations of the renounced ideal. Alienated from the Church by sensuality, when they return to it they venerate the ideal of desensualization, as the religious “ideal in itself”: — a source of many and difficult errors. There are the more spiritual, less feeling, drier, also more conscientious human beings who from the ground up are incapable of believing in an ideal at all, and who know how to find their greatest strength and self-respect only in subtle nay-saying and critical disintegrating: they are freed because there is nothing in them that could have firmly bound; they free because — — — phases — loss, desolation, including in the feeling of disloyalty a(nd) ingratitude, breaking free, all outweighed by an irrefutable bitter certainty the feeling of respectful consideration and a shy earnestness (with great kindness toward the A(omines) religiosi’) the feeling of superior a(nd) kindly cheerfulness toward all religions mixed with a slight disdain for the impurity of the intellectual conscience, which still allows many to be religious, or a scarcely concealed amazement that it is possible to “believe” 1191] NB. Ultimately the whole of a Greek city was indeed more valuable than an individual! it is still preserved for us! — as [Page 309] 302 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS certainly as the body is more valuable than some organ. Learning to obey, 1000 times in the body the highest sacrifice! 1[192] more cleanly washed and more cleanly clothed skillful gymnasts with a lock on their “loose snouts,” training themselves for silence, also for a dignified self-control in Venere” (and not, as so often, debauched and botched from boyhood on): may we soon see them “Europeanized” in this direction 1[193] I love the magnificent frolicsomeness of a young predator that gracefully plays, and in playing tears to pieces r[194]!0° Modern pessimism is an expression of the uselessness of the modern world — not of the world and of existence. 1[195] It seems more and more to me that we are not superficial and not good-natured enough to help with this Junker fatherland-mania of the Brandenburg March!” and to sing along with its hatred-snorthing stupefaction-slogan “Deutschland Deutschland über Alles.”!° 1[196]!3 — one has to sink down to the old Wagner and his Bayreuther Blatter to encounter a similar swamp of presumption, obscurity and Teutomania as are the Addresses to the G(erman) N«ation).’4 1197] The old Romantics fall down and one day, one knows not how, they are stretched out on the ground before the cross: that also happened to Richard Wagner. To be one of those witnessing the degeneration of such a human being belongs to [Page 31] 24 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS different in me. For years I have interacted with people and taken my resignation and courtesy so far as to never speak of things that were in my heart. Indeed I have lived with people almost exclusively so. — 34[87] We imagine to ourselves that the commanding, supreme thing lies in our consciousness. Ultimately we have a double brain: our capacity to will, to feel and to think something of our willing, feeling, thinking ourselves is what we summarize with the word “consciousness.” 34[88] NB. Those law-giving and tyrannical spirits who are in a position to firmly establish a concept, firmly maintain it, people with this spiritual strength of will who know how to ossify for a long time and nearly eternalize the most fluid of things, the spirit, are commanding human beings in the highest sense: they say “I want to know this and that was seen, I want it precisely thus, I want it for this and only for this.” This kind of law-giving human being necessarily exerted the strongest influence in all ages: we have them to thank for all typical elaborations of the human being: they are the sculptors — and the rest (“most” people) in this case —) compared to them are only clay. 34[89] The most firmly established movements of our intellect, our law-like gymnastics e.g., in representations of space and time, or in the need for “justification”: this philosophical habitus of the human intellect is our actual potency: therefore such that in many intellectual things we can no longer do otherwise: which is called psychological necessity. This has become: and to believe our space, our time, our causality instinct is something that has meaning even apart from mankind is well-nigh a childishness. [Page 310] 1 AUTUMN I—SPRING 1886 303 the most painful things I have experienced: — that one did not perceive it as painful in G(ermany) was a strong impulse for me to mistrust even more that spirit that now rules in G(ermany). 1[198]!05 Buatschleli batscheli bim bim bim Buatscheli batscheli bim!!06 1[199] To seize happiness and strangle, suffocate, choke it with one’s embrace: — the melancholy of such experiences — otherwise it would flee and slip away? 1[200] How much someone withstands of truth: How much someone takes upon himself to answer for: How much someone takes upon himself to provide and to protect: Simplicity — and what the colorful taste of artists reveals: 1[20] Middle Class Morality. 1[202] There is something ineducable at bottom: a granite of factum,}’ of predetermined decision in measure and proportion to us and likewise a right to certain problems, a branded stamping of them on our names. The attempt to conform, the agony of solitude, the longing for a community: this can express itself in a thinker in such a way that he subtracts precisely the most personal and valuable from his individual case and, by generalizing, also coarsens.^{oo} In this manner it is possible that the entire articulated philosophy [Page 311] 304 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS of a remarkable human being is not really his philosophy, but precisely that of his environment, from which he deviates as a human being, paratypically. The extent to which modesty, a lack of courageous “I am” becomes fateful in a thinker. “The type is more interesting than the individual and exceptional case”: in this way the scientism of taste can bring someone not to have the requisite sympathy and caution for himself. And finally: style, literature, the toss and fall of words — how all this falsifies and ruins what is personal! Mistrust of writing, tyranny of the vanity of writing well:

which is formal dress anyway and also conceals us. Taste is inimical to the original! an old story. e that communicates: and style that is only a sign, “in Style that t d style that ly a sig memoriam.” Dead style a masquerade; in others lively style. Depersonalization. 1[203] Against an enemy there is no better antidote than a second enemy: for a single enemy — — — [204]! All too much upon myself, since when? almost from childhood on. My philology was only an eagerly seized-on escape: I cannot deceive myself about it, the Leipzig diaries spoke too plainly. — And no companion! — Careless in trusting? But a hermit always has too much supply of that stored up, likewise of course also of mistrust. 1[205] The deepest misunderstanding of religion, “evil human beings have no religion.” 1[206]!!° Russian music: how is it that — — — [Page 312] I AUTUMN 1885— SPRING 1886 305 1[207] The extreme purity of the atmosphere into which I placed him, and which allows me things — — — 1[208] I have become less capable of resisting phys(ical) pain: and now when days come with the old attacks, then the pain immediately transforms into a psychic torture with which I can compare nothing 1[209] The loftiness and goodness of one’s nature are also given away to one’s work: afterwards drought or mud. — 1[210] How good conscience and well-being free us from deep problems! rlr] Beyond good and evil: that takes effort. I translate as if into a foreign language, I am not always certain of having found the meaning. Everything a bit too crude for my liking. 1[212] On brown, yellow, green purple carpets comes 1[213] We early risers, who for the — — — 1[214] Opposite, there are truths that make one vomit, materia peccans,¹ that one wants to be rid of at any cost: one gets rid of them by communicating them 1[215]!9 To look upon the plight of the masses with ironic melancholy: they want something that we are capable of — oh! [Page 313] 306 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1[216] I have never profaned the holy name of love. 1[217] well-rested forces 1[218] if genuine in his objectivity, in his cheerful totality, he is false and deliberate in his affects, artificial and cunning in grasping the details, even in the senses 1[219] NB How during the decrease of life force one sinks down to contemplativeness and to objectivity: a poet can feel it (Sainte-Beuve! !*) 1[220] The tremendous enjoying of human beings and of society in the age of L(ouis) XIV had the effect that people were bored in nature and felt desolated. Desolate nature was the most painful, the high mountains. The Précieuses! wanted to bring spirit, at least esprit into love. Symptom of a tremendous enjoyment in the spirit (in the bright, distinguishing one, as in the time of the Persian wars) The most artificial forms (Ronsard, even the Scandinavians) cause the greatest joy in very juicy and forceful sensual natures: it is their self-overcoming. Also the most artificial morality. Our human beings want to be hard, fatalistic, destroyers of illusions — desire of weak and tender human beings who relish!!6 the formless, barbaric, form-destroying (e.g., “endless” melody — Raffinement”” of German composers) Pessimism and brutality as stimuli of our precious ones!!⁸ 1[221] Cataline — a romantic next to Caesar, modo celer modo lentus ingressus! [Page 314] I AUTUMN I—SPRING 1886 307 1[222] Freedom of conscience is only useful and possible during great despotism — a symptom of atomization 1[223]!20 NB The last virtue. We are the squanderers of the virtues that our forefathers gathered and, thanks to them, with respect to their long austerity and thriftiness, it may be a good long time that we (behave) like the rich and exuberant heirs. 1[224] gloomy or frolicsome, a spirit who in everything he imagines took revenge for something that he had done (or for not having done something) — who did not understand happiness without cruelty. 1[225] Here, where the peninsula runs into the sea 1[226]!! Whoever does not enjoy watching oafs dance should not read German books. I just watched a German oaf dance: Eugen Dithring, to the tune of the anarchist motto “ni dieu, ni maître??? 1[227] With most people even today their prudence is still the most genuine thing they have: and only those rare ones who know, who feel how they have grown up in the twilight of an aging culture — — — 1[228] I do not understand what the lay-people see in Richard} Wagner): perhaps he arouses their romantic feelings and all the shudder and tickle of the infinite and of romantic mysticism — we musicians are enchanted and seduced [Page 315] 308 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1[229]!23 Halcyon speeches. — Caesar among pirates — The hour when the sun is down — To love humanity for the sake of God — For those whose laughter is golden. Grateful for being misunderstood — At the golden grill. We lizards of happiness —! Among children and dwarves. On the bridge. On the old fort. The spa. The greatest event — Always disguised. otium Poverty, sickness — and the noble human being the slow eye “One’s equals” — against intimacy Being able to keep silent Slow to reconcile, slow to anger To take all formality under protection. Women. — Dance, folly, little jewelry boxes the tempter. On bloodlines. The mask. 24 I [23 o] 125 Halcyon Songs. x[231]!26 Ariadne. [Page 316] I AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 309 1[232]!27 The Problem of Order of Rank. Provisional Thoughts and Dashes!²⁸ by Friedrich Nietzsche. 1[233] NB. Harm makes us prudent, says the rabble: — To the extent it makes us prudent, it also makes us bad. But how often harm makes us stupid! 1[234] The extent to which a craft physically and spiritually deforms: likewise scientism in itself, likewise earning money, likewise every art: — the specialist is necessary, but belongs in the class of tools. [235] It is very interesting for once to see humans without reins and limits: nearly all superior humans (like artists) fall back into some kind of subordination, be it Christianity or fatherlandishness. 1[236]!29 If this is not an age of decline and of diminishing vitality with much melancholy, then at least it is one of thoughtless, arbitrary experimentation: — and it is probable that from its superabundance of failed experiments an overall impression of something like decline will arise: and perhaps the thing itself, actual decline. [Page 317] 310

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 1[237]!3° The problem of order of rank. The problem of discipline and cultivation. The discipline of the will. The discipline of obeying. NB. The discipline of commanding. The subtlety of differentiation. Education that excludes specialization. 1[238]!3! The deep necessity of the task that reigns over all individual destinies of every human being, in that a task becomes embodied and “comes into the world” — at the midpoint of life I comprehend what the problem of order of rank required by way of preparations, in order to finally rise up within me: — how I had to experience the most manifold states of happiness and distress in soul and in body, losing nothing, tasting everything and testing it to the bottom, purifying and sifting out everything accidental. 1[239] Every morality that dominated anywhere was always the discipline and cultivation of a specific type of human being, assuming that the outcome would be primarily this type, indeed exclusively: in sum, always assuming a type. Every morality believes that with intention and compulsion one can change (“improve”) much in human beings: — it takes the growing resemblance to the standard type as “improvement” (it has absolutely no other concept of it —). 1[2.40]!22 On naiveté. Reflection can still be a sign of n(aiveté). “Naive egoism.” [Page 318] 1] AUTUMN 1885—SPRING 1886 311 1[241] the well-being of one’s “neighbor” is more worthy of striving for 1) if well-being is worth striving for 2) if the kind of well-being is clearly established, because there are those that contradict and impede themselves as goals, 3) if already a value of persons is firmly established and it is clear that “the neighbor” has higher value than I . — The pleasant enthusiastic sentiments??? of devotion etc. must be mercilessly criticized; in themselves they still contain, by virtue of the drop of pleasantness and enthusiasm in them, no argument for, but only a seduction to it. 1[242] Knowledge of human beings: it depends on what one grasps, feels as “experience”; most need a clumsy particularity of the event and hundredfold repetition, and a few require blows with a club in order to get to the bottom of an experience and notice it 1[243] The barbarization of Christianity by the Germans 1[244] Science as a mean to education. Practiced for itself just another barbarism, a barbarizing skill 1[245]!4 Iti vuttakam”° (Thus spoke (the saint) 1[246] do not cheat do not compromise despise such obscurity as Bismarck and Wagner 1[247] How human beings were sick from God and alienated themselves from the human being. [Page 319] [2 = W 18. Autumn 1885—Autumn 1886] 2i)! There is a noble and dangerous carelessness that provides a deep inference and insight: the carelessness of the superabundant soul that has never bothered with friends but knows only hospitality, only ever exercises and knows how to exercise hospitality — heart and house open to everyone who wants to step inside, be they beggars or cripples or kings. This is genuine affability: whoever has it has a hundred “friends,” but probably no friend. 2b] This magnificent spirit, now self-sufficient and well defended and closed off against attacks: — you are angered by his fortress and secrecy and yet peek curiously through the golden latticework with which he has fenced off his kingdom? — curious and seduced: for an unknown indistinct fragrance blows upon you maliciously and speaks vaguely of secluded gardens and delights. 2(3)? We are in the midst of the dangerous carnival of nationality-madness, where all finer reason has slunk to the side and the vanity of the scruffest nook-peoples cries out for the rights of special existence and self-glorification — how (can) one today [Page 32] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 25 34[90] I am hostile 1) toward desensualization: it stems from the Jews, from Plato, who was ruined by Egyptians and Pythagoreans (and these by Buddhists) We have the Provencal spirit that remained pagan, I mean “not Germanic,” to thank for the spiritualization of the amor of sexual love: whereas antiquity had brought things only as far as a spiritualization of pederasty. 2) toward all doctrines that focus on an end, a calm, a “Sabbath of all Sabbaths.” Such ways of thinking characterize seething, suffering, often also dying races, e.g., such verses as are in R(ichard) Wagner's) “Nibelungs.” 8 34[91] “Habit”: this means something different in a slavishly minded person than in a noble one. 34[92] What we owe the Christian church 1) a spiritualization of cruelty: the idea of hell, tortures and heretic trials, the auto-da-fés are indeed a major advancement over the magnificent but semi-idiotic slaughter in the Roman arenas. Much spirit, much ulterior motive has gotten into cruelty. — It has invented many pleasures. 2) it has made the European spirit subtle and flexible through its “intolerance.” One sees immediately how in our democratic age, with freedom of the press, thought is getting clumsy. The Germans invented gunpowder — hats off! But they canceled it out: they invented the printing press.⁹⁴ The ancient polis was of a very similar mind. The Roman Empire, on the other hand, allowed great freedom in faith and nonfaith: more than any empire allows today: the result was immediately the greatest possible degeneration of civilization and crudening of the spirit. — How good Leibniz and Abelard, Montaigne, Descartes and Pascal look! It is a pleasure to see the supple daring of such [Page 320] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 313 begrudge the Poles, the noblest variety of the Slavic world, entertaining hopes and — — — they tell me that G(ermany) has the great word to say in this regard. ala] Halcyon Interruptions. For Recovering from “Thus Spoke Zarathustra” Dedicated to his Friends by Friedrich Nietzsche 2[5] The exclusive interest that is lavished today in Germany on questions of power, trade and commerce and — last but not least — on “living well,” the rise of parliamentary nonsense, of newspaper reading and of the literati-like chiming in of everyone about everything, the admiration for a statesman who knows and cares just as much about philosophy as a peasant or a fraternity student and thinks he is making his bold ruthless politics of the moment “more acceptable” to German taste (or conscience —) through an antiquated glossing over with royalism and Christianity — : all of this has its origin in the uncanny and multiply alluring year 1815. At that time suddenly night descended on the German spirit that up till then had experienced a long cheerful day: the “fatherland,” the border, the soil, the ancestor — all kinds of narrow-mindedness suddenly began to assert their rights. Back then reaction and anxiety, fear of the German spirit awakened in the upper classes, and consequently in the lower classes liberalism and revolutionism and the whole political fever — one understands this “consequently.” Since then — since it began to politicize — Germany lost its spiritual leadership of Europe: and now mediocre Englishmen) succeed in {making} the G(ermans) — — — [Page 321] 314 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 2[6] The last two centuries. — It was not until the 17th and 18th centuries that Germany brought its most authentic art, music, to the peak: one may forgive an occasionally melancholy observer if he is capable of recognizing German music of the nineteenth century as only a gleaming manifold and scholarly form of decline. Likewise in the plastic arts it has shown in the same oft-maligned century a wasteful joy and strength: German baroque style in churches and palaces belongs as the closest relative to our music — a(nd) in the sphere of the visual it builds the same genre of bewitchments and seductions that our music is for a different sense. Between Leibniz and Schopenhauer (born 1788) Germany thought through its entire circle of original thoughts, therefore likewise within those centuries: — and even this philosophy, with its powdered wig and conceptual cobweb, its suppleness, its melancholy, its mysterious infinity and mysticism belongs to our music and is a kind of baroque in the sphere of philosophy. 217] The spirit® that we comprehend — we do not resemble it: we are superior to it! 2[8]” What is still young and stands on weak legs always lets out the loudest cry: for it still falls down too often. For example “patriotism” in today’s Europe, “love of the fatherland,” which is only a child: — one should not take the little crybaby too seriously! 2[9]° To my friends. This book, which knew how to find its readers in a broad expanse of countries and peoples and must know some kind of art through which even coy and obstinate ears can be seduced: [Page 322] 2 AUTUMN I—AUTUMN 1886 315 precisely this book has remained most incomprehensible to my closer friends: — when it appeared, it was to them a shock and a question mark and it laid down a long alienation between them and me. In fact, the state from which it arose had enough of the enigmatic and the contradictory to it: at the time I was simultaneously very happy and very suffering — thanks to a great victory over myself that I had come away with, one of those dangerous victories by which one usually is destroyed. One day — it was in summer 1876 — a sudden contempt and insight came to me: and from then on I went mercilessly beyond all the beautiful wishful things on which my youth had bestowed its heart 2[10]° Nationalities-madness and fatherland-buffoonery are without magic for me: “Deutschland, Deutschland über Alles”! is painful to my ears, at bottom because I want and wish more from the Germans than — . Their first statesman, in whose mind a solid foundation of royalism and Christianity coexists with a ruthless politics of the moment, who is no more touched by philosophy than a peasant or a fraternity student, piques my ironic curiosity. It even seems useful to me that there are a few Germans who have remained indifferent toward the G(erman) E(mpire): not even as spectators but as those who look away. Where then do they look? There are more important things, compared to which these questions are only foreground questions: e.g., the growing ascendancy of the democratic man and the consequent stultification of Europe and diminution of the European human being. 2[11]!! The Intellectual Conscience. Attempt at a Critique of More Spiritual Human Beings. The philosopher. The free spirit. The artist. The religious human being. The scholar. The noble human being. Dionysus. [Page 323] 316 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 2[12]? Inter pares: a phrase that intoxicates — it includes so much happiness and unhappiness for the one who was alone his whole life; who met no one who belonged to him, though he searched in many ways; who in relations with others always had to be the man of benevolent and cheerful disguise, of the sought-after and often found resemblance, and who knows from all too long experience that ability to grin and bear it that people call “affability” — occasionally to be sure also those dangerous heart-rending outbreaks of all suppressed misfortune, all unsuffocated desires, all pent-up torrents of love grown wild — the sudden madness of that hour when the lonely one embraces someone or other and treats him as a friend and a godsend” and a precious gift, only to push him away with disgust an hour later — henceforth disgusted with himself, as if sullied, as if debased, as if estranged from himself, as if sick from his own company — . 2[13]”° This is my suspicion that returns again and again, my worry that never goes to sleep in me, my question that no one hears or wants to hear, my sphinx, next to which there is not only one abyss: — I believe we are deceiving ourselves today about the things we Europeans love most, and a cruel (or not even cruel, only indifferent and childish) goblin is playing with our heart and its enthusiasm, just as perhaps he has already played with everything else that lived and loved — : I believe that what we are accustomed to honoring in Europe today as “humaneness,” “morality,” “humanity,” “sympathy,” “justice” may indeed have their foreground-value as a weakening and mitigation of certain dangerous and powerful basic drives, but in the long run they are nevertheless nothing more than the diminution of the entire type “human being” — its conclusive mediocritization, if one will permit me a desperate word in a desperate situation; I believe the commedia umana® for an » [Page 324] 2 AUTUMN I—AUTUMN 1886 317 Epicurean spectator-god would have to consist in the fact that humans, by virtue of their growing morality, fancy that they elevate themselves in all innocence and vanity above animals to the rank of “gods” and to extraterrestrial destinies, but in truth they are sinking, that is, through the cultivation of all the virtues on the basis of which a herd thrives, and through suppression of those other and opposite virtues, which provide the origin for a new higher stronger masterful species, they are developing only the herd animal in humans and perhaps thereby determining the animal “human being” — for so far the human being was the as yet “undetermined animal” —; I believe that the great forward-driving and relentless democratic movement of Europe — that which calls itself “progress” — and likewise even its preparation and moral prefiguration, Christianity — at bottom signifies only the tremendous instinctive overall conspiracy of the herd against all that is shepherd, beast of prey, hermit and Caesar, in favor of the preservation and raising up of all the weak, oppressed, underprivileged, mediocre, semi-misfits, as a protracted slave rebellion against every kind of master, secretive at first then increasingly more self-conscious, ultimately against even the concept “master,” as a life and death war against every morality that springs from the womb and consciousness of a higher stronger masterful kind of human being, as mentioned above — such a one that requires slavery in some form and under some name as its foundation and condition; I believe, finally, that every enhancement so far in the type human being was the work of an aristocratic society that believed in a long ladder of order of rank and value-difference between one person and another and required slavery: indeed without the pathos of distance as it grows out of the ingrained difference between classes, out of the constant looking at and looking down of the ruling caste on subordinates and instruments and out of its likewise constant exercise of commanding, of keeping down and keeping apart, neither could that other more mysterious pathos emerge at all, that craving in the soul for [Page 325] 318 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS every new expansion of distance, the development of ever higher, rarer, more remote, more widespread and comprehensive states, in brief, the “self-overcoming of humanity,” to use a moral formula in a supra-moral sense. One question comes to me again and again, a tempting and wicked question perhaps: let it be whispered in the ears of those who have a right to such questionable questions, the strongest souls of today who also have themselves best under control: would it not be time, the more the type “herd-animal” is now being developed in Europe, to attempt a fundamental artificial and conscious cultivation of the opposing type and its virtues? And would it not be a kind of goal, redemption and justification for the democratic movement itself if someone came along who used it — by finally adding to its new and sublime configuration of slavery, which one day will represent the culmination of European democracy, that higher order of masterful and Caesarian spirits that now also — requires this new slavery? For new vistas heretofore impossible, for their own vistas? For their own tasks?!” 2[14] Our four cardinal virtues: courage, sympathy, insight and solitude — they would be unbearable to one another if they were not fraternized with a cheerful and mischievous vice called “courtesy.” — 2[15] Cruelty can be the alleviation of tense and proud souls, of those who are accustomed to constantly practicing hardships on themselves; it has become a celebration for them to finally do harm for once, to see suffering — all warlike races are cruel; cruelty can, conversely, also be a kind of saturnalia of oppressed and weak-willed beings, of slaves, of women of the harem, a small tickle of power — there is a cruelty of evil and also a cruelty of bad and negligible souls. [Page 326] 2 AUTUMN 1885—

AUTUMN 1886 319 2[16]’8 What is noble? Belief in order of rank. Work (about artists, scholars etc.) Cheerfulness (symptom of turning out well).! Master morality and herd morality. 2[17] The writings in question, painstakingly and patiently interrogated, may be used as a means to perhaps gain access to an understanding of a still higher and more difficult type than is even (the) type of the free spirit: — no other way leads to the understanding of — — * Writings from the youth of the same author. The Birth of Tragedy. 1st edition 1872. 2nd ed. Unfashionable Observations 1873—76. 2[18] A god of love could one day say, bored by his virtue: “let’s have a try for once at devilishness!” — and behold, a new origin of evil! From boredom and virtue! — — 2[19]’° “Paradise is under the shadow of swords” — also a symbolon?! and motto by which souls of noble and warlike lineage reveal and divine one another. — 2[20]’2 “Eagles pounce straight-on.” The nobility of the soul is not least recognized by the magnificent and proud stupidity with which it attacks — “straight-on.” 2[21] There is also a squandering of our passions and desires, namely in the modest and petit bourgeois way in which we [Page 327] 320 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS satisfy them: — which ruins our taste, but even more our respect and fear of ourselves. Temporary asceticism is the means to dam them — to give them dangerousness and grand style — — 2[22] With respect to what fruitful spirits require uppermost and undermost, in order to not suffer from the worms of their conscience — namely “lay eggs, cackle, brood eggs” and so forth with or without grace — they may justifiably, as Stendhal and Balzac have done — prescribe a diet of abstinence. And at least one must not doubt that the nuptial bed can be more disastrous for precisely the “genius” than concubinage and libertinage. — Also in many other respects—for example, as concerns “descendants” — one must occasionally take counsel with oneself and resolve: aut liberi aut libri.” 2[23] Reflected long about that point of origin of religious genius and consequently also of “metaphysical need,” the “religious neurosis” — reluctantly mindful of that expression famous and even proverbial in France, that reveals so much about the “health” of the French mind: “/e génie est une neurose?” — 2[24]” — And to say it again: the beast in us wants to be ied to — morality is a white lie. 2[25]’° “You seem to be up to something wicked,” I once said to the god Dionysus: “namely driving human beings to ruin?” — “Perhaps,” replied the god, “but in such a way that I get something out of it for myself” — “What then?” I asked, curious. — “Who then? you should be asking.” Thus spoke Dionysus and he grew silent, in the way that is his own, namely seductively. — You should have seen him then! It was spring, and all the trees were in their early sap. [Page 328] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 321 2[26]?” Beyond Good and Evil. Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future. By Friedrich Nietzsche. 2[27]° Beyond Good and Evil. All Sorts of Things to Ponder for Halcyon Spirits. By Friedrich Nietzsche. 2[28]°? My tolerably radical question mark for all your penal legislation is this: given that the punishments are supposed to hurt in proportion to the magnitude of the crime — and that’s how you all want it at bottom! well, then they would have to be measured for each criminal proportionate to his sensitivity for pain — that is, there should be a pre-existing determination of punishment for an offense, a penal code ought not to exist at all? But, considering that it would not be easy to determine the scale of pleasure and displeasure in a criminal, then in praxi? one would surely have to dispense with punishing? What a loss! Right? Consequently — — 2[29] Music does not reveal the essence of the world and its “will,” as Schopenhauer claimed (who deceived himself about music as he did about compassion, and for the same reason — he knew them both too little from experience —): music reveals [Page 329] 322 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS only the esteemed musicians! And they themselves do not know it! — And how good, perhaps, that they do not know it! — 2[30]* Our Virtues. All Sorts of Questions and Questionable Matters for Subtler Consciences. By Friedrich Nietzsche. Our Virtues. Hints for a Morality of the Future. By Friedrich Nietzsche. On the Strength of the Soul. On Honesty. On Cheerfulness. On the Will to Solitude. “What is Noble?” 2[32]3 The Philosophers of the Future. A Speech. 1. Is such a greatness possible today? — 2. But perhaps tomorrow, perhaps the day after tomorrow. — I see new ph(ilosophers) coming up etc. 2[33] There is a misunderstanding of cheerfulness that cannot be put to rest: but whoever shares it may ultimately be satisfied [Page 33] 26 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS spirits, for which we have the church to thank. — The intellectual pressure of the church is essentially the inflexible rigidity by virtue of which concepts and values are treated as fixed, as aeternae. Dante provides us with a singular pleasure in this: one need in no way be limited under an absolute regime. If there were limits, then they were stretched around a tremendous space, thanks to Plato: and within them one could move very freely, like Bach within the forms of counterpoint. — Baco{n} and Shakespeare almost repulse us if we have thoroughly learned to taste this “freedom under the law.” Likewise the most recent music compared to Bach and Handel. 34193] As Frederick the Great constantly ridicules the “féminisme in the regency of his neighbor states, so Bismarck “parliamentarianism”: it is a new means to do what one wants. 66 34194] The sight of today’s European gives me a great deal of hope: what is taking shape here is a daring ruling race, across the breadth of an extremely intelligent herd mass. It is imminent that the movements for absorption® of the latter no longer stand alone in the foreground. 34[95]°

Against false idealism, where the best natures of the world alienate themselves through exaggerated subtlety. What a shame that the whole of southern Europe has been deprived of its inheritance of that subdued sensuality, by the abstinence of the clergy! And that such Shelleys, Hélderlins, Leopardis are destroyed is fair, I do not regard such people very highly at all. It amuses me to think of the revenge that the rough naturalness of nature takes on this kind of human being e.g., when I hear that L(eopardi) engaged in on(anism) when young, was later impotent. [Page 330] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 323 with it as it is. —

We who flee to happiness — : we who need every kind of south and unruly fullness of sun and position ourselves at that point on the street where life, like a drunken parade of grotesque masks — like something that makes us lose our minds — tumbles past; we who demand of happiness precisely that it makes us “lose our minds”: does it not seem that we have a knowledge that we fear? With which we do not want to be alone? A knowledge before whose pressure we tremble, before whose whispering we blanch? This stiff-necked turning away from sad spectacles, this plugging and hardening of our ears to all suffering, this brave, mocking superficiality, this willful Epicureanism of the heart that wants to have nothing warm and whole and worships the mask as its final divinity and redemptress: this scorn against the melancholic of taste, in whom we always detect a lack of profundity — is not all of this only hatred of life? It seems we know ourselves as all too brittle, perhaps even as shattered and incurable; it seems we fear this hand of life, that it must shatter us, and we flee into its appearance, into its falseness, its surface and colorful deceptiveness; it seems we are cheerful because we are tremendously sad. We are serious, we know the abyss: that is why we resist all that is serious. — — — we smile to ourselves about the melancholics of taste — oh we even envy them, as we mock them! — for we are not happy enough to be able to allow ourselves their delicate sadness. We must flee even the shadow of sadness: our hell and darkness is always too near to us. We have a knowledge that we fear, with which we do not want to be alone; we have a belief before whose pressure we tremble, before whose whispering we blanch — the nonbelievers seem blessed to us. We turn away from the sad spectacles, we plug our ears against whatever suffers, compassion would immediately shatter us if we did know how (to) harden ourselves. Stay boldly at our side, mocking recklessness: cool us, wind, that has sped over [Page 331] 324 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS glaciers: we want to take nothing more to heart, we want to pray to the mask There is something in us that easily shatters: we fear the shattering childish hands? we avoid chance and rescue ourselves — — — 2[34] I loved and honored Richard Wagner more than anyone else; and if in the end he had not had the bad taste — or the sad need — to make common cause with a quality of “spirits” that were impossible to me, with his followers, the Wagnerians, then I would have had no reason to bid him farewell already in his lifetime: him, the deepest and boldest, also the most misunderstood of all who are hard to understand today, whose acquaintance has advanced my knowledge more than any other acquaintance I have made. Let me say at the beginning what belongs at the beginning, that his cause and my cause did not want to be confused, and that it took a good bit of self-overcoming before I adequately learned to separate “his” and “mine” in the proper measure. That I came to my senses about the extraordinary problem of the actor — a problem that probably is more distant from me than any other, for a reason that is hard to articulate — that I discovered and recognized the actor at the bottom of every artist, that which is typically artistic, for that I needed to come into contact with that (man) — and it seems to me that I think more highly a(nd) more lowly of both than an earlier philos(opher)³⁴ — The improvement of the theater concerns me little, its “churchification” even less; the actual Wagnerian music does not sufficiently belong to me — I would be able to dispense with them for my happiness and for my health (quod erat demonstrandum et demonstratum®). What was most foreign to me in him, the Teutonomania and semi-churchiness of his last years — — — [Page 332] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 325 2135] A new way of thinking — which is always a new way of measuring and presupposes the presence of a new standard, a new sensation-scale — feels itself to be in contradiction with old ways of thinking and constantly says, while resisting them, “that is false.” Examined more closely such a “that is false” really only means “I do not feel anything of myself in that,” “it’s of no interest to me,” “I do not comprehend how you are not able to feel as I do” 2[36] On detachment. On hardening. On the mask. On the order of rank. European and super-European. 2137] One always has something more necessary to do than to get married: Heavens, this is what’s always happened to me! 2[38]°° Beyond Good and Evil. Hints at a Morality of the Strongest. 2[39] Mask and Communication. 2[40] The philosophers of the future. On the natural history of the free spirit. Our virtues. Peoples and fatherlands. Defeminization. homo religiosus.>’ [Page 333] 326 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 2[41] On the Natural History of the Superior Human. Thoughts of an Educator. 1. The philosophers of yore. 2. Artists and poets. 3. The religious genius. 4. We virtuous ones. 5. Woman. 6. Scholars. 7. The “tempters.” 8. Peoples and fatherlands. 9. Wisdom of the mask. 10. Moral Psychology. Proverbs and dashes.? What is noble? Appendix. Songs of Prince Vogelfrei. 2[42]° Beyond Good and Evil. Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future. With an appendix: Songs and Arrows of Prince Vogelfrei. By Friedrich Nietzsche. 2143] On the Natural History of the Superior Human. Dashes“? of a Psychologist. 1. The philosopher. 2. The free spirit. 3. The religious genius. 4. On moral psychology 5. What is noble? [Page 334] 2 AUTUMN 1885-AUTUMN 1886 327 6. Peoples and fatherlands. 7. Woman in herself. 8. Scholars. 9. We virtuous ones. 10. Wisdom and mask. 11. The coming ones. 12. Proverbs of a laconic one. Appendix: Songs and Arrows of Prince Vogelfrei. 2[44] Preface. 1. What was the philosopher? 2. On the natural history of the free spirit. 3. Monologue of a psychologist. 4. Woman in herself. 5. The religious genius. 6. We scholars. 7. We virtuous ones. 8. What is noble? 9. Peoples and fatherlands. 10. The masks. 11. The tempters. Dionysus. Appendix: — — — Table of contents. 2[45] Nothing of the advocate:? no man of the party; suspicious of that which is called “conviction”; unbelieving toward unbelief; — — — 2[46] On the Natural History of the Superior Human. Thoughts of an Idler. By Friedrich Nietzsche. [Page 335] 328 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS Beyond Good and Evil. Monologues of a Psychologist. With an appendix: Songs and Arrows of Prince Vogelfrei. By Friedrich Nietzsche. Appendix: Songs and Arrows of Prince Vogelfrei. 1. To the mistral. 2. To Goethe. 3. To certain eulogists. 4. Sils-Maria. 5. Hermit’s noon. 6. Toward new seas. 7. “The Pigeons of San Marco” 8. Inscription above the house door. 9. The genuine German. 10. Parsifal music. 11. To Spinoza. 12. Rimus remedium.* 13. Fool in despair. 14. Aftersong. 6 2[48] Woman is so little satisfied with herself that she would rather permit herself to be beaten than — [Page 336] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 329 2[49] In most loves there is someone who plays and someone who lets himself be played with: Amor is above all a little theatre director. 2[50]” Contents: Preface. 1. On the prejudices of philosophers. 2. The free spirit. 3. The religious genius. The religious character. 4. Woman in herself. Proverbs and Interludes. 5. On the natural history of morality. 6. We scholars. “Carcasse, tu trembles? Tu 7. Our virtues. tremblerais bien davantage, 8. Peoples and fatherlands si tu savais, où je te mène? 9. Masks. Turenne*® 10. What is noble? Appendix: Songs and Arrows of Prince Vogelfrei. ais} Monologues of a Psychologist On the Natural history of the superior human.” By Friedrich Nietzsche What is noble?>! 2[52]”? Proverbs and Monologues. With a Rhymed Addition. By Friedrich Nietzsche. [Page 337] 330 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 2[53}°? Beyond Good and Evil Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future. Introduction. First Book: on the prejudices of philosophers. Second Book: hints of a moral-psycholo(gist) Third Book: we Europeans. An opportunity for self-mirroring. also)” Beyond Good and Evil. By Friedrich Nietzsche. alss}” Penultimate chapter Alcuin the Anglo-Saxon, who characterized the royal profession of the philosopher thus: prava corrigere, et recta corroborare, et sancta sublimare.°° 2[56] Corruption of the strong natural human being in the compulsion of the civilized cities (— ends up in the leprous parts, learns bad conscience there) 2[57]°” From now on there will be favorable preconditions for more comprehensive ruling structures, the like of which have never existed. And this is not even the most important thing; the emergence of international racial federations has been made possible, which set themselves the task of cultivating a rulerrace, the future “rulers of the earth”; — a new, tremendous aristocracy built upon the harshest self-legislation, in which the will of philosophical brutes and artist-tyrants will be given [Page 338] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 331 millennia of longevity: — a superior kind of human being that thanks to its preponderance of willing, knowing, wealth and influence, makes use of democratic Europe as its most pliable and flexible tool for taking the destinies of the earth in hand, for shaping “the human being” itself as an artist would. Enough, the time is coming when people will relearn what politics is. 2[58] I believe we are lacking political passion: we would endure with honors under a demo(cratic) sky just as well as under an abs(olutist) sky. 2[59] For 1 But finally: why must one speak of what will come so loudly and with such wrath! Let us look at it more coolly, distantly, cleverly, from on high, let us say it as it is allowed to be said among us, so secretly that everyone misses it — that everyone misses us... Let it be called a continuation.® 2[60] What? Drama is the end, music is always only the means? That may be W(agner)’s theory: his practice was opposed to it: the (dramatic) attitude” is the end, the music always only a means to an attitude (to its elucidation, strengthening, internalization —) 2[61]6? The development of the mechanistic-atomistic way of thinking is still not aware of its necessary goal even today; — this is my impression, after scrutinizing its followers for a long time. It will conclude with the creation of a system of signs: it will dispense with explanations, it will give up the concept “cause and effect.” [Page 339] 332 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 2[62]% Not to want to deceive — and not to want to be deceived: this is something fundamentally different as inclination and will, but one tendency like the other is accustomed to using the word “philosophy,” be it as ornament or concealment or out of misunderstanding. 2[63]° The physiologists should stop and think before positing the drive for self-preservation as the cardinal drive of an organic being: something that lives wants above all to discharge its strength: “preservation” is only one of the consequences of this. — Beware of superfluous teleological principles! And that is where the whole concept of “self-preservation” belongs. 2[64]% Every Philoctetes knows that without his bow and his arrows Troy will not be conquered. 2[65] In media vita. Monologues of a Psychologist. By Friedrich Nietzsche. 2[66]%° — For the preface. — Perhaps a continuation: the artistphilosopher (hitherto scientism, position on religion and politics mentioned): higher concept of art. Whether a human being can position himself so far from other human beings that he is capable of shaping them? (Practice exercises: 1) the one who shapes himself, the hermit 2) the artist so far, as the small completer, on a material® (nol) — to this belongs the series of rank of the superior humans, which must be represented. [Page 34] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885

27 34196]”° NB. A great human being, a human being whom nature built up and invented in grand style, what is that? First: in his entire activity he has a long logic which due to its length is hard to survey, and consequently is misleading, an ability to stretch his will across great expanses of his life and to despise and throw away everything petty in himself, even if among them are the most beautiful “divine” things in the world. Second: he is colder, harder, more unscrupulous and without fear of “opinion”; he lacks the virtues associated with “respect” and being respected, in generally everything that belongs to the “virtue of the herd.” If he cannot /ead, then he goes alone; it then happens that he grunts at many things he encounters along the way. 3) he does not want a “sympathetic” heart, but servants, tools, in his interaction with people he is always out to make something of them. He knows himself to be uncommunicable: he finds it tasteless when he becomes “familiar”; and usually when someone considers him to be so he is not. When he is not talking to himself he has his mask. He would rather lie than tell the truth: it requires more spirit and will. There is a solitude in him, as something unreachable for praise and blame, as a jurisdiction of one’s own, which has no higher court above it. 34197] What I like to perceive in Germans is their Mephistopheles nature: but, to tell the truth, one must have a higher concept of the G(erman) M(ephistopheles) than Goethe, (who) found it necessary to diminish his M(ephistopheles) in order to magnify his “inner Faust.” The true German Mephistopheles is much more dangerous, bolder, more evil, more crafty and therefore more candid: consider the inwardness of Frederick the Great. Or of that much greater Frederick, of that Hohenstaufen Frederick 2. — The genuine German Mephistopheles climbs over the Alps, believes that everything there belongs to Aim. This is why he thrives as Winckelmann thrived, as Mozart. He regards Faust [Page 340] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 333 — One Chapter: Music. — On the theory of “intoxication” (itemization, e.g., worship of petits faits®®) — German and French and Italian music. (Our politically lowest periods the most fruitful: —) the Slavs? — the cultural-historical ballet: — has conquered the opera. — an error, that what was created by Wagner) is a form — it is a formlessness. The possibility of a dramatic structure has yet to be found. Actor-music and musician-music — The rhythmic. Expression at any cost. — in praise of “Carmen” — in praise of H. Schütz (and “Liszt-Verein”® —) — whorish instrumentation — in praise of Mendelssohn: an element of Goethe in him, and nowhere else! just as another element of Goethe came to perfection in Rahel!”° a third in H. Heine’! For the chapter “free spirit.” — 1) I do not want to “glorify” him: a word in favor of the bound spirits. 2) the depravity of the intellect: the proof from pleasure (“it makes me happy, therefore it is true”) Here the vanity of the “me” to be underscored. For the chapter “our virtues”: 3) new form of morality: loyalty oaths in federations regarding what one wants to do and not do, quite specific renunciation of many things. Tests, to determine whether ripe for this.” — For the chapter “religious genius.” 1) mystery, the exemplary history of a soul (“Drama” — means?) 2) the interpretability of events, belief in “meaning” is maintained thanks to religion — 3) to what extent the higher soul grows and flourishes at the expense of the lower? 4) what has been refuted is the morality of Christianity as essential in the destinies of the world-soul: — yet the will to introduce it and to make it dominant has not yet been abolished. — In the end the latter could only be a [Page 341] 334 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS don-quixoticism anyway: — but this would be no reason to think dismissively of it! 5) to what extent religious genius is a degeneration of the artistic: — the shaping force. 6) to what extent only the artist-conscience provides freedom from “true” and “untrue.” Unconditional “faith” to be transformed into unconditional will — — 7) religious literature, the concept “sacred book.” for “our virtues.” Whatever we can unleash our scientism upon, we no longer take hard and seriously: a kind of immorality. For the chapter “natural history of morality.” Corruption, what is that? E.g., of the natur(al) strong human being who comes into the cities. E.g., of the Fr(en)ch aristocrats, before the French Revolution. For the chapter “Man and Woman.” The triumph of man over woman wherever culture begins. NB: magister liberalium artium et hilaritatum.” NB. I have grabbed something by the horns — only I doubt whether it was a steer —” 4 2[67] “P “subject” as horizon-line. Reversal of the perspectival gaze. 2[68]” Using the body as a guide. The self-dividing protoplasma. $\frac{1}{2} + \frac{1}{2}$ not = 1, but = 2. (Therewith) the belief in soul monads is invalidated. Self preservation only as one of the consequences of selfexpansion. of one’s “self”? 2[69]’° Mechanical force is known to us only as a sensation of resistance: and the latter is only sensually interpreted with pressure and thrust, not explained. [Page 342] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 335 What kind of compulsion is it that a stronger soul exerts on a weaker? — And it would be possible that the apparent “disobedience” toward the higher soul was based on not understanding its will. e.g., a boulder does not let itself be commanded. But what is needed is precisely a slow differentiation of degree and rank: only the most closely related can understand one another and consequently there can be obedience here. Whether possible to comprehend all motions as signs of a psychic event? Natural science as a symptomatology — It is perhaps wrong, because the life-forms are very small (cells e.g.), now to seek even smaller units, “force-points” etc.? The pre-stage of ruling structures Devotion to the person (father, forefather, prince, priest, God) as alleviation of morality. 2[70]” Beyond Good and Evil — Problem of the lawgiver. Using the body as a guide. Mechanism and life. The will to power. — Interpretation, not knowledge. On doctrine of method. The eternal recurrence. — The artist. Culture and its substructure. — We godless ones. — Music and culture. — On great and small politics. “Mystery.” The good and the just. The vow-makers. — On the history of pessimism. — Education. [Page 343] 336 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 2[778 On “Zarathustra” Calina: brownish red, everything too sharp from close up. Highest summer. Ghostly Sipo Matador.®° And who says that we do not want this? What music and seduction! There is nothing there that did not poison, lure, corrode, overthrow, revalue! I The decisive moment: The order of rank. 1) Smash the good and just! 2) The eternal recurrence. Noon and Eternity. Book of the Prophet. 2[72]" Noon and Eternity. By F. N. I The festival of the dead. Zarathustra discovers a tremendous festival: II The new order of rank: III On the rulers of the earth. IV On the ring of recurrence. [Page 344] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 337 2[73] The titles of 10 new books: (spring 1886.) Thoughts concerning the Ancient Greeks. By Friedrich Nietzsche. How in becoming everything degenerates and becomes unnatural. The degeneration of the Renaissance — of philology Example of the immoral basic conditions of a higher culture, of an elevation of the human being. The Will to Power. Attempt at a New World-Interpretation.® The Artists. Ulterior Motives of a Psychologist By Friedrich Nietzsche. We Godless Ones By Friedrich Nietzsche Noon and Eternity.*4 By Friedrich Nietzsche Beyond Good and Evil. Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future.® By Friedrich Nietzsche. Gai Saber. Songs of Prince Vogelfrei.®° By Friedrich Nietzsche. [Page 345] 338 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS Music. By Friedrich Nietzsche Experiences of a Literary Scribe. °° By Friedrich Nietzsche. On the History of Modern Dimming.®® By Friedrich Nietzsche. 2[74]° The Will to Power. 1. Physiology of Order of Rank. 2. The Great Noon. 3. Discipline and Cultivation. 4. The Eternal Recurrence. 2[75]° The Eternal Recurrence. Book of new festivals and prophecies. The Eternal Recurrence. Sacred dances and vows. Noon and Eternity. Sacred dances of the recurrsers. 2[76]" (28) On the Order of Rank: For I. On the Physiology of Power. Aristocracy in the body, the majority of the rulers (struggle of the tissues? Slavery and the division of labor: the higher ty pe only possible through the suppression of a lower type to a mere function [Page 346] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 339 Pleasure and pain not opposite. The feeling of power. Nourishment only a consequence of insatiable appropriation, of the will to power. Reproduction, decay setting in with the impotence of the ruling cells to organize what has been appropriated." It is the shaping force that always wants to have a new supply of “material” (still more “force”). The masterpiece of the construction of an organism from the egg. “Mechanistic conception”: wants nothing but quantities: but force lies in quality: mechanistics therefore can only describe, not explain processes. “Purpose.” One should proceed from the “sagacity” of plants. Concept of “perfection”: not only greater complexity, but greater power (— need not be only greater mass —) Conclusion regarding the development of humanity: perfection consists in the production of the most powerful individuals, who wield the greatest masses as their tool (and indeed as the most intelligent and flexible tool)? Artists as the small shapers. The pedantry of “educators” by comparison Punishment: the up-holding™ of a higher type. Isolation. Wrong lessons from history. Because something high did not turn out well or was abused (like the aristocracy) does not mean it is refuted! 277] The appearance of the empty and the full, of the firm and the loose, of the resting and the moved and of the equal and the unequal. (absolute space the oldest appearance has been made into metaphysics. (substance) — : the human-animalistic security-value standards are in there. [Page 347] 340

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS Our concepts are inspired by our neediness. The positing of opposites corresponds with indolence (one differentiation that suffices for nourishment, security etc. is regarded as “true”) — simplex veritas! — Thought from indolence. Our values are interpreted into things. So is there a meaning in the in-itself?? Is not meaning necessarily but relational-meaning and perspective? All meaning is will to power (all relational-meanings can be dissolved in it.) A thing = its properties = but these like everything that concerns us about this thing: a unity, under which we summarize those relations that come into question for us. At bottom the changes that we have perceived in ourselves (— except those that we do not perceive e.g., its electricity). In sum: Object is the sum of experienced inhibitions of which we have become aware. A property therefore always expresses something of “useful” or “harmful” for us. Colors e.g., — each one corresponds to a degree of pleasure or displeasure and each degree of pleasure and displeasure is the result of valuations about “useful” and “not useful.” — Disgust. 2[78]* Themata. Interpretation, not explanation. Reduction of logical value judgments to moral and political (value of security, of peace, of laziness (“least energy”) etc. The problem of the artist, his morality (lies, shamelessness, inventiveness for what he lacks). The slandering of immoral drives: regarded in consequence a denial of life. The absolute and where the ideal features come from that are attributed to it. Punishment as a means of cultivating. [Page 348] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 341 Gravitation interpretable in many ways: like everything allegedly “factual.” The predicate expresses an effect that is produced upon us (or could be) not the effect in itself; the sum of predicates is summarized into a single word. Error, that the subject is supposed to be causa. — Mythology of the subject-concept. (“lightning” flashes — doubling — the effect objectifies. Mythology of the causality-concept. Separation of “effecting” and “agent” fundamentally wrong. The appearance of what remains unchanged, now as before — — Our European culture — toward what does it hurry, as opposed to the Buddhistic dissolution in Asia? Religion, essentially doctrine of order of rank, even attempt at a cosmic order of rank and power. weakness lies, dissimulation stupidity lust to rule to what extent idealizing? curiosity greed cruelty 2[79] My writings are very well defended: whoever reaches for them and ends up over-reaching as someone who has no right to such books — he immediately makes himself ridiculous — a little fit of rage drives him to pour out his innermost and his most ridiculous: and who wouldn't know what kinds of things always come out here! Little literary women as they tend to be, with pathological sexual organs and with ink stains on their fingers — The inability to see the new and the original: the clumsy fingers that do not know how to grasp a nuance, the stiff earnestness that stumbles over a word and falls down: the shortsightedness that intensifies to blindness before the tremendous realm of distant landscapes [Page 349] 342 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Have I ever complained about my fate, about being read too little and understood so poorly? But for how many may something extraordinary be created anyway! — Do you think that God created the world for the sake of humans? 2[80]? For the introduction. The gloomy solitude and dreariness of the campagna Romana,^o ° patience in uncertainty Every book as a conquest, good decision — tempo lento! — — until the end dramatically coiled, ultimately catastrophe and sudden redemption. 2[81]!020 (15) It is only a matter of strength: have all the pathological features of the century, but balance them in a superabundant plastic restorative force. The strong human being: description 2[82]!°4 Beyond Good and Evil. Second and Final Part Preface. Interpretation, not explanation. There are no factual findings, everything is fluid, ungraspable, retreating; what is most durable is still our opinions. Attaching meaning — in most cases a new interpretation over an old interpretation that has become incomprehensible, that itself is now only sign.!!% On the physiology of power. A consideration according to which the human being feels his strongest drives and his ideals (and his good conscience) as identical. We godless ones. What are artists? Justice and lawgiving. On the history of modern dimming. [Page 35] 28 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS and Hamlet's caricatures invented for ridicule, likewise Luther. Goethe had good German moments in which he laughed inwardly about all that. But then he himself fell back into the humid moods. The astonishment of Napoleon when he saw a German poet and — found a man! He had expected to find a German poet!"! — The German is extensive: a second soul has built itself onto the first, there are caves, corridors, he can appear superficial, frankness and decency belong to the skills of the German. — "Good-natured and devious" is an impossibility in other p(eople); but just try living for a time among Swabians! — 34[98] An age of democracy propels the actor to the heights, in Athens, likewise as today. R(ichard) W(agner) has so far surpassed everyone in this, and awakened a high concept of the actor, which can be awe-inspiring. Music, poetry, religion, culture, books, family, fatherland, social life — all art for the time being, that is to say stage attitude! 34[99] Pig-German! Excuse me! Newspaper-German! Here (I) read Friedrich Albert Lange, a good horse whom one should even recommend to German youths in the absence of better horses: but he writes for example: "The cult of reality binds itself with the praise of the present. What is ideal has no course; whatever cannot legitimize itself through the natural sciences and historically is condemned to decline.”? Why do we learn Latin and Greek in German schools anyway: if we do not even learn to be disgusted by such a filthy mishmash! And what enthusiasm precisely the real German spoilers have aroused, formerly Hegel, more recently Richard Wagner, most recently Eugen Diihring! 34[100] It is terrifying to think that my thoughts on woman could drive some lady writer to the vengeful idea of having children [Page 350] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 343 Acting. On the good and the just. Rank and order of rank. To the mistral. A dance song. Beyond good and evil as brightening for a few as deepest dimming for many. On the history of modern dimming. Psychology of the artist. On acting. The problem of the lawgiver. Danger in music. Interpretation, not knowledge. The good and the just. On great and small politics. We godless ones. To the Mistral. Dance Song. In 30 pages. 2 folios. (Preface: what my writings have in common) Interpretation, not explanation. On the physiology of power. On acting On the history of modern dimming We godless ones. The good and the just. On order of rank. Justice and lawgiving. Artists 2[83]!°° (7) The human being regards himself as cause, as doer — everything that happens relates predicatively to some subject In every judgment resides the entire full profound belief in subject and predicate or in cause and effect; and this latter [Page 351] 344 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS belief (namely as the claim that every effect is activity and that every activity presupposes an actor)!” is even only an individual case of the former, so that what remains is the belief as basic belief: subjects exist. I observe something and look for a reason for it: originally this means: I am looking for an intention in it and above all for one that has intentions, for a subject, a doer: — formerly one saw purposes in a// events, all events were a doing. This is our oldest habit. Do animals have it too? Are they not, as living beings, also dependent on interpretation according to themselves? — The question “why?” is always a question about the causa finalis,” about a “what for?” We have nothing of a “meaning of the causa efficiens”)© here Hume is right, habit (but not only that of the individual!) leads us to expect that a certain frequently observed process follows on another: nothing more! What gives us our extraordinary firmness in the belief in causality is not the great habit of succession of events, but our inability to interpret an event as anything but an event from intentions. It is the belief in what lives and thinks as uniquely effective — in the will, intention — that all events are a doing, that all doing presupposes a doer, it is the belief in the “subject.” Shouldn’t this belief in the subject- and predicateconcept be a big s(tupidity)? Question: is intention the cause of an event? Or is that illusion too? Is it not the event itself?! “Attracting” and “repelling” in a purely mechanical sense is a complete fiction: a word. Without an intention we cannot conceive an attracting: i.e., without an intention. — The will to master a thing or to resist its power and push it back — that “we understand”: that would be an interpretation that we could use. Briefly: the psychological necessity for a belief in causality lies in the inconceivability of an event without intentions: which naturally says nothing about truth or untruth (justification of such a belief). The belief in causae!!! falls with the belief in téAn!? (against Spinoza and his causalism).!!% [Page 352] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 345 2[84]!!4115 (30) Judging is our oldest belief, our most habituated holding-true or holding-untrue of something. In judgment is found our oldest belief, in all judging there is a holding-true or a holding-untrue, an affirming or denying, a certainty that something is so and not otherwise, a belief that we have really “known” something here — what is believed as true in all judging? What are predicate? — We have taken changes in ourselves not as such, but as an “in itself” that is foreign to us, that we only “perceive”: and we have posited them not as an event, but as a being, as “property” — and we have added the invention to which they stick. ž.e., we have posited effect as effecting and the effecting as being. But even in this formulation the concept “effect” is arbitrary: for of those changes that occur in us and of which we believe ourselves definitely not to be the cause, we infer only that they must be effects: according to the conclusion: “to every change belongs an author;” — But this conclusion is already mythology: it separates the effecting and the effect. When I say “the lightning flashes,” then I have posited the flashing once as activity and the other time as subject: hence I have supposed a being beneath the event, which is not one with the event, but on the contrary remains, is, and does not “become.” — To posit the event as effect: and the effect as being: this is the double error, or interpretation, of which we make ourselves guilty. Therefore e.g., “the lightning flashes” — : “flashing” is a state in us: but we do not take it as effect on us, and say: “something flashing” as an “in itself” and seek an author for it, the “lightning.” 2[85]11617 (32) The properties of a thing are effects on other “things”: if one thinks away other “things,” then a thing has no properties i.e., there is no thing without other things i.e., there is no “thing in itself” [Page 353] 346 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 2[86]!!8119 (30) Only what can knowledge be? — “Interpretation,” not “explanation.” 21871” (32) All unity is only unity as organization and interplay: no different than a human community is a unity: therefore opposite of atomistic anarchy; hence a ruling-structure that signifies One, but is not one.!?”! One would have to know what being is, in order to decide whether this and that is real (e.g., “the facts of consciousness”); likewise what certainty is, what knowledge is and so forth. — But since we do not know this, then a critique of the faculty of knowledge is nonsensical: how is the tool supposed to be able to critique itself, if it can use only itself for critiquing? It cannot even define itself !!? If all unity is unity only as organization? but the “thing” in which we believe is only added as an invention to different predicates as ferment. When a thing “effects,” then this means: we comprehend as cause all remaining properties that otherwise are still present here and are momentarily latent, so that now a single property appears: i.e., we take the sum of its properties — x as cause of the property x: which is entirely stupid and crazy!!”³ “The subject” or the “thing” 2[88]!24 (33) A force that we cannot imagine (like the so-called purely mechanical force of attraction and repulsion) is an empty word and should not have any rights of citizenship in science: which wants to make the world imaginable to us, nothing more!!” All events from intentions are reducible to the intention of increase of power.)^{*o} [Page 354] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 347 2[89]!27 Illusion that something és known where we have a mathematical formula for events: it has only been characterized, described: nothing more! 2[90]128129 (31) Equality and similarity. 1) the cruder organ sees much apparent equality 2) the mind wants equality i.e., to subsume a sensory impression under an existing series: just as it assimilates the inorganic to itself. On the understanding of logic::: the will to equality is the will to power. — the belief that something is so and so, the essence of judgment, is the consequence of a will that it shall be as much as possible equal. 2[ox]!30131 (30) If our “ego” is for us the sole being according to which we make or understand all being: very good! then the doubt is very well justified whether here a perspectival illusion does not exist — the apparent unity in which everything closes together as in a line of a horizon. Using the body as a guide reveals a tremendous multiplicity; it is methodologically permissible to use the better-studiable richer phenomenon as a guide for understanding the poorer. Finally: supposing everything is becoming, then knowledge is only possible on the basis of the belief in being. [Page 355] 348 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 2[92]! Sense perceptions projected “outward”: “inward” and “outward” — there the body commands — ? — the same equalizing and ordering force that reigns in germ plasm also reigns in the incorporating of the external world: our sense perceptions are already the result of this assimilation and equating with respect to the whole past in us; they do not follow immediately upon the “impression” — 2[93]}33134 (34) To what extent dialectic and faith in reason still rest on moral prejudices. With Plato we are as erstwhile inhabitants of an intelligible world of the good still in possession of a legacy of that period: divine dialectic, as deriving from the good, leads to all things good. (— therefore “leads back” as it were —) Even Descartes had a concept of how in a Christian-moral fundamental way of thinking, which believes in a good God as creator of things, only the truthfulness of God vouches for our sensory judgments. Aside from a religious sanction and vouching for our senses and rationality — where are we supposed to have gotten our right to trust existence! That thinking is supposed to be a measure of the real — that what cannot be thought és not — is a clumsy non plus ultra!” of a moralistic blind confidence (in an essential truth-principle at the basis of things), in itself an insane assertion that is contradicted in every moment by our experience. We can actually think nothing at all, insofar as it is... 2[94] We are bad enough at observing the emergence of a judgment of quality Reduction of qualities to value judgments. 2[95]!°° Our perceptions as we understand them: i.e., the sum of all those perceptions whose realization was useful and essential to [Page 356] 2 AUTUMN I—AUTUMN 1886 349 us and to the entire organic process before us: therefore not all perceptions generally (e.g., not the electrical) This means: we have senses only for a selection of perceptions — those that must have been of consequence to us for our survival. Consciousness exists to the extent that consciousness is useful. There is no doubt that all sensory perceptions are completely permeated with value judgments (useful harmful — consequently pleasant or unpleasant) The individual color simultaneously expresses a value for us (although we seldom admit this to ourselves, or only after long exclusive exposure to the same color (e.g., prisoners in prison or insane people)) This is why insects react differently to different colors: some love them e.g. ants. 2[96]!°° Irony toward those who believe Christianity has been overcome by the modern natural sciences. The Christian value judgments are absolutely not overcome by them. “Christ on the cross” is the most sublime symbol — still. — 2[97]!°8 Health and sickness: one should be cautious! The standard remains the efflorescence of the body, the pouncing force, courage and merriness of the spirit — but, naturally also, how much sickness it can take upon itself (and) overcome — make healthy again. That which would ruin more delicate human beings belongs to the stimulants of great health. 2[98]!39!40 (35) Poverty, humility and chastity — dangerous and slanderous ideals, but, like poisons, in the case of certain illnesses, useful remedies e.g., in the Roman imperial age. All ideals are dangerous because they debase and stigmatize the actual, all are poisons, but as occasional remedies indispensable [Page 357] 350 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 2[99]!*) How has the entire organic process behaved toward the rest of nature? — There its basic will reveals itself. 2[100]!42 The Will to Power. Attempt at a Revaluation of all Values. In four Books. First Book: the danger of dangers (description of nihilism) (as the necessary consequence of previous valuations) Second Book: critique of values (of logic etc. Third Book: the problem of the lawgiver (including the history of solitude) How must human beings be constituted who make inverse valuations? — Human beings who have all the properties of the modern soul but are strong enough to transform them into sheer health.!43 Fourth Book: the hammer their means to their task. —“4 Sils-Maria, summer 1886 Tremendous powers are unleashed: but contradicting themselves the unleashed forces are mutually annihilating themselves the unleashed forces are to be newly bound, so that they do not mutually annihilate each other and our eyes have to be opened to the real increase in power! [Page 358] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 351 Everywhere highlight the disharmony between the ideal and its individual conditions (e.g., honesty among Christians, who are constantly compelled to lying) For Book 2. In democratic communities, where everyone is a specialist, what is lacking is the What for? For whom? the class in which all the thousandfold atrophying of all individuals (to functions) acquires meaning. The development of sensuality cruelty mim ok to the sum of folly ged culture. lust to rule etc. On The danger in all previous ideals Critique of Indian and Chinese way of thinking, likewise Christian (as preparations for a nihilistic one —) The danger of dangers: Everything has no meaning. (2) The hammer: a teaching that achieves a selection of those fittest for life through unleashing of the most death-crazed pessimism 2[101] The inference from the work to the creator: the terrible question of whether fullness or renunciation, the madness of renouncing pushes to creation: the sudden eye for the fact that every romantic ideal is a self-escape, a self-contempt and self condemnation of the one who invents it. [Page 359] 352 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS Ultimately it is a matter of strength: this entire romantic art could be rechanneled entirely into the antiromantic by a super-rich and mighty-willed artist or — to use my formula — into the Dionysian, just as in the hands of the strongest every kind of pessimism and nihilism becomes only one more hammer and tool with which one mounts a new pair of wings on oneself. I recognized with a single glance that Wagner had reached his goal, to be sure, but only as Napoleon had reached his Moscow — at every stage so much had been lost, irretrievably lost, that precisely at the end of the whole march and apparently in the moment of triumph, his fate was already decided. Fateful the verses of Briin(n)hilde — thus Napoleon came to Moscow (R. Wagner to Bayreuth —) To not ally oneself with any sickly powers who are conquered from the start — If I had trusted myself more: the Wagner(ian) inability to walk (even more to dance —and without dance there is for me no recreation and bliss) was always difficult for me. The demand for complete passions is revealing: whoever is capable of them demands the magic of the opposite i.e., of skepticism. Those who are believers through and through have their occasional benefit and recreation in skepticism. Wagner speaking about the delights that he knew how to coax from the Christian Holy Communion: this was decisive for me, I regarded him as conquered. — Add to this that a suspicion arose in me, whether he did not consider it useful for the purpose of his repatriation to Germany, to play the role somewhat of Christian and neoconvert: this suspicion damaged him with me even more than my annoyance at having placed my hopes on an aging romantic whose knees were already weary enough to fall down before the cross. [Page 36] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 29 after she has already tortured herself and the world sufficiently with her books! 34 [101] “When a woman wants to have children, she usually does not let the little children come to her, but the men!”” said an old midwife. 34[102]”4 — We should pay attention to whether what the Germans call their literature does not for the best part hark back to their pastors' sons. — Now from the start in this origin of German prose lies the probability that the solemn, dignified, s/ow, grave genres have been cultivated best: that allegro or even presto will be missing. The extraordinary vivaciousness of a style, like il principe (quite apart from the seriousness of its task), the brevity strength, a kind of joy in the thronging of difficult thoughts, gives an echo of Florentine eloquence, namely of advocates. In Voltaire too the advocate's skill is first rate, advocate's tempo. The fastest tempo I found in a writer is in Petronius: he runs like a swift wind and consequently is not lascivious: he is too funny for that. 34[103]” The Germans. Suspicions and Desires by F. N. 34[104]” NB. The only Germans of whom I am speaking here, are something young and becoming: I separate them from the Germans of the Reformation and the Th(irty Years) War and do not wish to participate in the historical falsification that ignores this chasm: as if nothing had happened back then. That something like the decline of an earlier race was going on with them in the [Page 360] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 353 2[102]!45 Belief in the body is more fundamental than belief in the soul: the latter has emerged from the aporias of unscientific observation of the body (something that leaves it. Belief in the truth of dreams —) 2[103] Mistrust of self observation. That a thought is the cause of a thought cannot be determined. On the table of our consciousness a sequence of thoughts appears, as if one thought were the cause of the following. In fact we do not see the struggle that plays out beneath the table. — — 2l o 4] 146 With Plato as with someone of super-irritable sensuality and fanaticism the charm of concepts was so great that he involuntarily honored and deified concepts as an ideal form. Dialecticdrunkenness, as the awareness of exerting a mastery over oneself by using it — as a tool of the power will. 2[105]! 4” Pressure and stress something unspeakably late, derivative, unoriginal. They already presuppose something that holds together and is able to pressure and stress! But from where would it hold together? 2[106] The significance of German philosophy (Hegel): to think up a pantheism in which evil, error and suffering are not perceived as arguments against divinity. This grandiose initiative has been misused by the existing powers (state etc.), as if the rationality of whatever happened to rule at the time was thereby sanctioned. Schopenhauer by contrast appears as the obstinate moral human being who finally becomes a world-denier in order to [Page 361] 354 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS be right about his moral(istic) estimation. Finally becomes a “mystic.” I myself have attempted an aesthetic justification: how is the ugliness of the world possible? — I took the will to beauty, to persisting in the same forms, as a temporary means of preservation and healing; but fundamentally the eternally creative as that which must eternally destroy seemed to me bound to pain. The ugly is the form of observation of things under the will to posit a meaning, a new meaning into what has become meaningless: the accumulated force that compels the creator to feel previous things as untenable, misshapen, worthy of renunciation, as ugly? —!48 The deception of Apollo: the eternity of the beautiful form; the aristocratic law-giving “thus it shall always be!” Dionysus: sensuality and cruelty. Transitoriness could be interpreted as enjoyment of the begetting and destroying force, as constant creation.” 2[107]!5° NB. Religions perish from the belief in morality: the Christian-moral God is not sustainable: consequently “atheism” — as if there could be no other kind of gods. Likewise culture perishes from the belief in morality: for when the necessary conditions from which it alone grows are discovered, then one no longer wants it: Buddhism. 2[108]>! That the value of the world lies in our interpretation (— that perhaps somewhere yet other interpretations than merely human ones are possible —) that the interpretations so far are perspectival valuations by virtue of which we sustain ourselves in life, that is in the will to power, for the growth of power, that every elevation of human beings brings with it the overcoming of narrower interpretations, that every achieved strengthening [Page 362] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 355 and expansion of power opens up new perspectives and means believing in new horizons — this runs through my writings. The world that concerns us is false i.e., is not a fact, but a fiction and a rounding based on a meager sum of observations; it is “in flux,” as something becoming, as a falseness that is ever-shifting, that never approaches truth: for — there is no “truth.” 2[109]’ The “meaninglessness of events”: belief in it is the result of an insight into the falseness of interpretations so far, a generalization of discouragement and weakness — not a necessary belief. Immodesty of human beings: where they do not see meaning, they deny it! 2[110]’53 On “The Birth of Tragedy.” “Being” as the invention of the one who suffers from becoming. A book constructed exclusively from experiences about aesthetic pleasure and displeasure, with an artistic metaphysics in the background. At the same time a confession of a romantic, finally a work of youth full of youthful courage and melancholy. The one who suffers most longs most profoundly for beauty — he begets it. Psychological basic experiences: with the name “Apollonian” is designated that enchanted tarrying before an invented and dreamed world, before the world of beautiful appearance as a redemption from becoming: baptized with the name of Dionysus, on the other hand, is becoming apprehended actively, subjectively empathized, out of raging lust of the creator who simultaneously knows the wrath of the destroyer. Antagonism of these two experiences and the desires on which they are based: the former wants appearance eternally, before it the human being becomes still, wishless, smooth as the sea, healed, in agreement with himself and all existence: the second desire pushes toward becoming, to the lust of making becoming i.e., of creating and annihilating. [Page 363] 356 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS Becoming, perceived and interpreted from the inside, would be the incessant creating of an insatiable, super-rich, infinitely tensed and pressured being, of a god who conquers the agony of being only through constant transformation and change: — appearance as his temporary redemption, achieved in every moment; the world as the resulting sequence of divine visions and redemptions in appearance. — This artistic metaphysics faces up to the one-sided observation of Schopenhauer, which knows how to appreciate art only from the standpoint of the receiver, not from the standpoint of the artist: because it brings with it liberation and redemption in the enjoyment of the notreal, as opposed to reality (the experience of someone who suffers from and despairs over himself and his reality) — redemption in form and its eternity (as Plato may have also experienced it: except that concepts already permitted him to enjoy the triumph of his all too irritable and suffering sensibility) This is set against the second fact, art from the experience of the artist, above all the musician: the torture of having to create, as Dionysian drive. Tragic art, rich in both experiences, is characterized as the reconciliation of Apollo and Dionysus: appearance is granted the deepest significance, through Dionysus: and yet this appearance is denied and denied with pleasure. This is aimed at Schopenhauer's teaching of resignation as tragic worldview. Against Wagner's theory that music is the means and drama is the end. A longing for tragic myth (for "religion" and indeed pessimistic religion) (as for an isolating cloche in which growing thrives) Mistrust of science: even though its momentary alleviating optimism is strongly perceived. "Cheerfulness of the theoretical human being. Profound aversion to Christianity: why? The degeneration of the German character is imputed to it. Only aesthetically is there a justification of the world. Thorough suspicion of morality (it belongs in the world of appearance). [Page 364] 2 AUTUMN I—AUTUMN 1886 357 Happiness in existence is only possible as happiness in appearance Happiness in becoming is only possible in the annihilation of the real of "existence," of beautiful appearance, in the pessimistic destruction of illusion. in the annihilation of even the most beautiful appearance Dionysian happiness reaches its pinnacle. 2[111] The problem of the meaning of art: why art? How did the most vitally robust and best-formed human beings the Greeks relate to art? Fact: tragedy belongs to their richest period of strength — why? Second fact: the need for beauty; likewise for logicizing the world belong to their decadence Interpretation of both facts: — — — Erroneous practical application to the present: I interpreted pessimism as the consequence of higher strength and fullness of life, which can allow itself the luxury of the tragic. Likewise I interpreted German music as the expression of a Dionysian superabundance and originality i.e., 1) I overestimated the German character 2) I did not understand the sources of modern dimming 3) I lacked the cultural-historical understanding of the origin of modern music and its essential romanticism. Aside from this erroneous practical application the problem persists: how would a music be, if it were not of romantic origin — but of a Dionysian instead? 2[112]4 a romantic is an artist who is made creative by the great displeasure in himself — who looks away and looks back from himself and his contemporaries [Page 365] 358 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 2[113]55 I began with a metaphysical hypothesis about the meaning of music: but what underlay it was a psychological experience to which I was not yet able to impute a sufficiently historical explanation. The transference of music into the metaphysical was an act of reverence and gratitude; at bottom all religious persons so far have done this with their experience. — Then came the other side: the undeniably harmful and destructive effect of precisely this venerated music on me — and therewith also the end of its religious veneration. Here too my eyes were opened to the modern need for music (which appears simultaneously in history with the increasing need for narcotics) Even the “Artwork of the Future” seemed to me like a raffinement” of the need for stimulation and narcotization whereby all the senses want to settle their account at the same time, including the idealistic, religious, hypermoral nonsense — as an overall-excitation of the entire nervous machinery. The nature of Romanticism dawned on me: the lack of a fruitful kind of human being has become reproductive here. At the same time the thespianism of means, the fakeness and borrowedness of all individual elements, the lack of probity of artistic education, the abysmal falseness of this most modern art: which essentially must be theater-art. The psychological impossibility of these alleged hero- and god-souls, which are simultaneously nervous, brutal and refined like the most modern of Parisian painters and poets. — Enough, I relegated this art to modern “barbarism.” — All this says nothing about the Dionysian. In the period of greatest fullness and health tragedy appears, but also in the period of nervous exhaustion and overstimulation. Contrasting interpretation. — With Wagner it is characteristic that he already gave the Ring of the Nibelung a nihilistic (calm- and end-craving) conclusion. 20114} The artwork where it appears without artist e.g., as body, as organization (Prussian officer corps, Jesuit order). To what [Page 366] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 359 extent the artist is only a pre-stage.!°* What is the meaning of “subject” — ? The world as an artwork that gives birth to itself — —!° Is art a consequence of our dissatisfaction with reality? Or an expression of gratitude about savored happiness? In the first case Romanticism, in the second halo and dithyramb (in brief apotheosis-art): Raphael belongs here too, only he had the falseness of deifying the appearance of the Christian world interpretation. He was grateful for existence where it did not manifest itself as specifically Christian. With the moralistic) interpretation the world is unbearable. Christianity was the attempt to “overcome” the world with it: that is to negate it. — In praxi!® such an attack of insanity — of an insane arrogance of human beings in the face of the world — led (to) dimming, shrinking, impoverishing of the human being: only the most mediocre and innocuous type, the herdtype of human being, profited from this, was advanced by this, if you will... Homer as apotheosis-artist; Rubens too. Music has not yet had one. The idealization of the great desecrator (the sense for his greatness) is Greek; the deprecating, slandering, rendering despicable of the sinner, is Jewish a(nd) Christian.!

2[116] That self-knowledge that is modesty — for we are not our own work — but that is also gratitude to the same exact extent — for we “turned out well” — 2117] Psychology of the scientific need. Art from gratitude or dissatisfaction. [Page 367] 360 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS The moral world-interpretation ends in world negation (critique of Christianity). Antagonism between “improvement” and strengthening of the type human being. Infinite interpretability of the world: every interpretation a symptom of growth or of decline.!

The previous attempts to overcome the moral God (pantheism Hegel etc.) Unity (monism) a need of inertia; the plurality of interpretation a sign of strength. Not to want to dispute the world’s unsettling and enigmatic character!! 2[118] i (I. Nihilism in all its signs is at the door. © \ II. Unavoidable, in the event that one does not understand its prerequisites. These are the valuations (not the social facts: which all act alternately pessimistic and optimistic only through a specific interpretation) 2. III. Genesis of valuations, as critique of the same. The inverse ones. Their psychology. V. The hammer: as the teaching that leads to decision. < 1. The danger of dangers. 2. Critique of morality. 3. We inverse ones. 4. The hammer. 2[119] “How far does art reach into the inside of the world? And are there still artistic forces aside from the ‘artist’?” This question was, as one knows, my point of departure: and I said yes to the second question; and to the first “the world itself is nothing but art.” The absolute will to knowledge, to truth and wisdom seemed to me in such a world of appearance to be a sacrilege against (the) metaphysical basic will, as anti-nature: and in fair [Page 368] 2 AUTUMN I—AUTUMN 1886 361 ness (the) sharp point of “wisdom” turns itself against the wise man. The anti-naturalness of wisdom reveals itself in its hostility to art: wanting to know where appearance is precisely redemption — what a reversal, what an instinct for nothingness! 2[120] All cults establish a unique experience, the coming together with a god, an “act of salvation” in some sense; and they repeatedly reproduce it. The legend of place as the origin of a drama: where poetry plays the god. 2[121]!64165 (38) Histronics The colorful motley of the modern human being and its allure. Essentially hiding place and satiety. The literary man. The politician (in the “nationalist swindle”) Histronics in the arts lack of probity in preparatory training and schooling (Fromentin) the romantics (lack of philosophy and science and excess of literature) the novelists (Walter Scott, but also the Nibelung-monstrosities with their most nervous music) the lyricists “Scientism” Virtuosos (Jews) the populist ideals as overcome but not yet visible to the people: the saint, the wise man, the prophet 2[122]!66167 (37) On the history of modern dimming. The state-nomads (officials etc.): without “homeland” — The decline of the family. [Page 369] 362 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS “The good human being” as symptom of exhaustion. Justice as will to power (cultivation) Lasciviousness and neurosis. Black music; — whither invigorating music? The anarchist. Misanthropy. Disgust. Deepest distinction: whether hunger or superabundance becomes creative? The former begets the ideals of romanticism. northern unnaturalness. the need for alcoholic beverages in the “plight” of workers philosophical nihilism. 2[123] Christians must believe in the truthfulness of God: here unfortunately they also get the belief in the Bible and in its “natural science” in the bargain; they absolutely may not admit to any relative truth (or said more plainly,). Christianity will shatter from the absolute character of its morality. — Science has awakened doubt in the truthfulness of the Christian God: from this doubt Christianity will die (Pascal’s deus absconditus®), afr}’® 1. Birth of Tragedy. Artists metaphysics. 2. Unfashionable The cultural philistine. Disgust.!”° Observations. Life and history — basic problem. The philosophical hermit. “Education.” The artist-hermit. What is to be learned in W(agner). 3. Human, All The free spirit. Too Human. 4. Mixed Opinions The pessimist of the intellect. and Maxims. (7) Causality. “Why am I thus and such? The senseless thought of thinking oneself free to choose one’s existence, even one’s [Page 37] 30 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 16th century is difficult to deny: this appearance of discouragement, of cowardice, of extreme old age, of the Chinese pigtail, to speak metaphorically — on the whole that must have been the result of a terrible corruption of the blood considering that the manly men went off and away into foreign lands and died or were ruined in foreign lands. On the other hand at that time an involuntary mixing with remotely related races took place: the fornication of war was disastrous beyond measure according to all descriptions. Here and there of course there were still remnants of a stronger race: e.g., the musician Handel, our most beautiful type of man in the realm of art, is proof of that: or, to name a woman — Professor Gottsched’s wife, who with complete justification held the scepter for a good long time over German professors — just look at the portraits of those two! Some regions purified themselves more quickly and on the whole returned to health, e.g., Hannover Westphalia Holstein — there still to this day sits a sturdy peasantlike and phlegmatic race. — The worst off were surely the German nobility: it was damaged most profoundly. Whatever of it remained at home suffered from alcoholism, what went away and came back, from syphilis. To this day it has spoken only little in spiritual matters; and even as concerns Bismarck, his great grandmother came from the Leipzig professor class. — 34[105]° The German — not to mention the idiotic Teutonizing of youths who even today still prattle about “Teutonic virtues” — his mystical nature. There has never yet been a German culture: there were hermits who knew how to disguise themselves with astonishing skill, in the midst of the crudest barbarism. 34[106]! The German writing style. Mephistopheles. [Page 370] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 363 being thus and such. Background: the demand that there must be a being that would have prevented a self-despising creature such as I am from emerging. To fee/ oneself as the counter-argument to God — 5. Wanderer and Solitude, as problem. Shadow. 6. Dawn. Morality as a sum of prejudices 7. Joyful Science. Scorn of European moralistics. Outlook toward an overcoming of morality. How would a human have to be constituted, who lived beyond? Zarathustra) — — — Seven Prefaces. An Addendum to Seven Publications. 2[125]'7 On the history of pessimism. Modern dimming. Histrionics. 2[126]'72 For 2) Critique of the highest values. On the history of slandering. How ideals are made. Culture (and “humanization”: antagonistic) Morality as instinct of shame, as disguise, mask, fundamentally benevolent interpretation (37) Mix in judgments about the pessimists! The Indians Pessimism (as instinct) and the will to pessimism: major contrast [Page 371] 364 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS The pessimist of the intellect. (the former tracking the illogical, The pessimist of sensibility the latter the painful. all these standards are only such for moral reasons or, like Plato, ový!” also feared as value-revaluator and seductress A. What is truth? B. Justice. C. On the history of empathy. D. The “good human.” E. The “superior human.” F. The artist. (36) What is truth? (inertia, the hypothesis with which satisfaction emerges, least use of intellectual strength etc.)!”4 2[127]75176 Q) Nihilism is at the door: where does this most uncanny of guests come from? — L 1. Point of departure: it is an error to point to “social distress” or “physiological degenerations” or even to corruption as cause of nihilism. These still permit quite different interpretations. Rather, nihilism lies in a quite specific interpretation: in the Christian-moral(istic). It is the most honest, most empathetic period. Distress, psychic, physical, intellectual distress is in itself not capable in the least of producing nihilism, i.e., the radical rejection of value, meaning, desirability 2. The destruction of Christianity — from its morality (which cannot be superseded —) which turns against the Christian God (the sense of truthfulness, highly developed by Christianity, gets nausea from the falseness and mendaciousness of all Christian interpretation of the world and history. Backlash from “God is the truth” to the fanatical belief “all is false.” Buddhism of deed... [Page 372] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 365 3. Skepticism of morality is decisive. The destruction of the moralistic) interpretation of the world that no longer has any sanction after it tried to flee into a beyond: ends in nihilism, “everything has no meaning” (the unfeasibility of a single interpretation of the world to which tremendous energy has been dedicated — arouses suspicion as to whether al interpretations of the world are not false —) Buddhistic trait, longing for nothingness. (Indian Buddhism does not have a fundamental moral development to it, therefore in its case nihilism is only unconquered morality: existence as punishment, existence equated with error, hence error as punishment — a moral valuation) The philosophical attempts to overcome the “moral God” (Hegel, pantheism). Overcoming of the populist ideals: the wise man. The saint. The poet. Antagonism of “true” and “beautiful” and “good” — — 4. Against “meaninglessness” on the one hand, against moral value judgments on the other hand: to what extent all science and philosophy so far have stood under moral judgments? and whether we do not incur the hostility of science in the bargain? Or anti-scientism? Critique of Spinozism. Christian value judgments residual everywhere in the socialist and positivist systems. A critique of Christian morality is lacking. 5. the nihilistic consequences of contemporary natural science (alongside its attempts to escape into the beyond). Ultimately a self-disintegration results from its activity, a turning against itse/f an anti-scientism. — Since Copernicus human beings have been rolling out of the center into the x

6. The nihilistic consequences of the political and nationaleconomic way of thinking where all “principles” eventually turn into histrionics: the whiff of mediocrity, wretchedness, insincerity etc. Nationalism, anarchism etc. Punishment. The redeeming class and human being are lacking, the justifier — 7. the nihilistic consequences of history and of the “practical historians” i.e., the romantics. The position of art: absolute [Page 373] 366 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS unoriginality of its position in the modern world. Its dimming. Goethe’s alleged Olympian status. 8. Art and the preparation of nihilism: Romanticism (Wagner’s Nibelungen conclusion.) 2[128]!77178 I. I. Fundamental contradiction in civilization and the elevation of the human being. It is the time of the great noon, of the most terrible brightening: my kind of pessimism: — great point of departure. Moral(istic) valuations as a history of lying and the art of slander in the service of a will to power (of the herd-will) that revolts against the stronger human beings III. The conditions of all elevations of culture (of the enabling of a selection at the expense of a crowd) are the conditions of all growth. IV. The ambiguity of the world as question of strength, which observes all things under the perspective of its growth. The moral Christian value judgments as slave-revolt and slavemendacity (against the aristocratic values of the ancient world) How far does art reach down into the nature of strength? 2[129] 179 The Eternal Recurrence. Zarathustran Dances and Processions. Part One: God’s Death Festival. By Friedrich Nietzsche. 1. God’s death festival. 2. At the great noon. 3. “Where is the hand for this hammer?” 4. We Oath-Takers. [Page 374] 2 AUTUMN I—AUTUMN 1886 367 I. The plague city. He is warned, he is not afraid and goes inside, disguised. All kinds of pessimism parade by. The prophet interprets every parade. The mania for the different, the mania for No, finally the mania for nothingness follow one another. In the end Zarathustra gives the explanation: God is dead, this is the cause of the greatest danger? what? it could also be the cause of the greatest courage! II. The appearance of the friends. The enjoyment of the perfect by those who are going under: People departing. The accounting of friends. Processions. The decisive time, the great noon. The great gratitude- and death-sacrifice to the dead God. III. The new task. The death of God, for the The means to the task. prophet the most terrible event, The friends abandon him. is the happiest and most hopeful event for Zarathustra. Zarathustra dies. IV. We oath-takers 2[130]!8° The phenomenon “artist” is still the most easily transparent: — from there look to the basic instincts of power, of nature etc.! Also of religion and morality! “play,” the useless, as the ideal of the one who is bristling with strength, as “childish.” The “childishness” of God, nats naitwv'®! 2[131]!82 Plan of the first book. What is dawning is the contrast between the world that we venerate, and the world that we live, that we — are. What remains [Page 375] 368 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS is to do away either with our venerations or with ourselves. The latter is nihilism. Preponderance of the north over the south.'® I. The nihilism that is approaching, theoretical and practical. Erroneous derivation of the same. (Pessimism, its types: preludes of nihilism, even though not necessary.) . Christianity perishing from its morality. “God is truth.” “God is love” “the just God.” — The greatest event — “God is dead” — only dully felt. The German attempt to transform Christianity) into a gnosis has broken out into deepest mistrust: what is “untruthful” in it is perceived most strongly (against Schelling e.g.) . Morality, henceforth without sanction, does not know how to maintain itself anymore. One finally lets the moral interpretation drop — (Emotions everywhere still full of after-notes of the Christian value judgment —) . But value so far rested on moral judgments, above all the value of philosophy! (“of the will to truth” —) the populist ideals “the wise man” “the prophet”!4 “the saint” have lapsed . Nihilistic trait in the natural sciences. (“meaninglessness” —) Causalism, mechanism. “Conformity to law” an interlude, a residue. . Likewise in politics: what is lacking is belief in one’s rights, innocence, what reigns is telling lies, pandering to the moment . Likewise in the national economy: the abolition of slavery: lack of a redeeming class, of a justifier — Rise of anarchism. “Education?” . Likewise in history: fatalism, Darwinism, thelastattempts to interpolate interpretations of reason and divinity fail. Sentimentality for the past; one should not bear biography! — (phenomenalism here too: character as mask, there are no facts) [Page 376] 2 AUTUMN I— AUTUMN 1886 369 9. Likewise in art: romanticism and its backlash (aversion to romantic ideals and lies) the pure “artists” (indifferent toward content) The latter, moral, as the sense of greater truthfulness, but pessimistic (Father-confessor-psychology and puritan-psychology, two forms of psychological romanticism: but also its backlash, the attempt to position oneself purely artistically in relation to “human beings” — even here the inverse valuation is not yet dared!)® 10. The entire European system of human striving feels itself partly “meaningless,” partly “immoral.” Probability of a new Buddhism. The highest danger. “How do truthfulness, love, justice relate to the real world?” Not at all! — The signs European nihilism. Its cause: the devaluation of previous values. The obscure word “pessimism”: people who find themselves to be badly off and people who find themselves to be too well off — both have been p?06

The immutable sequence of certain phenomena does not prove a “law,” but instead a power relationship between 2 or more forces. To say: “but precisely this relationship stays the same!” means nothing other than: “one and the same force cannot also be another force.” —What is at stake is not a succession — but an interpenetration, a process in which the individual successive moments do not condition one another as causes and effects... The separation of the “doing” from the “doer,” the event from a (something) that makes the event, the process from a something that is not process but enduring, substance, thing, body, soul etc. — the attempt to comprehend events as a kind of shifting and place-changing of “what is,” of what remains: this old mythology established the belief in “cause and effect” after it had found a solid form in ling(uistic) grammatical) functions. —?°” a[140]2%8

Against the two claims “the same can only be known by the same” and “the same can only be known by the unsame” — about which already in antiquity there had been a centurieslong battle — today we can object, from the point of view of a more rigorous and more cautious concept of knowing: there can be no knowing at all — and this precisely because the same [Page 381] 374 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS cannot know the same, just as little as the same can be known by the unsame. — 2(141] These divisions of doing and doer, of doing and suffering, of being and becoming, of cause and of effect even the belief in changes posits in advance the belief in something that “is changed.” Reason is the philosophy of appearance 2[142]209-210 (30) the “regularity” of succession is only a symbolic expression, as if here a rule were being followed: no fact. Likewise “conformity to law.” We find a formula in order to express an ever-recurring kind of result: in doing so we have not discovered a “law,” still less a force that is the cause of the recurrence of results. That something always happens thus and (such) is interpreted here as if a being always acted thus and such as a result of obedience to a law or a law giver: whereas, aside from the “law,” it would have the freedom to act differently. But precisely that thus-and-not-otherwise could stem from the being itself, that did not behave thus and such only with regard to a law, but as constituted thus and such. This means only: something cannot also be something else, cannot do now this now that, is neither free nor unfree, but precisely thus and such. The error lies in the fictional insertion of a subject 21143)” Supposing the world possessed a single quantum of force, then it is plain that every power-shift in any place would condition the whole system — therefore along with the causality succeeding one another would be a dependence next to and with one another. [Page 382] 2 AUTUMN

1885—AUTUMN 1886 375 2[144]2!2-213 (40) Supposing even that a counter-proof to the Christian faith could not be produced, Pascal considered it prudent in the highest sense to be a Christian given the fearful possibility that it could nevertheless be true. Today as a sign of how much Christianity has lost in terms of fearfulness, one finds those othe(r) attempts at its justification, namely that even if it were an error one would still have the great advantage and pleasure of this error one's whole life long: it seems therefore that this faith should be maintained precisely for the sake of its calming effects — hence not out of fear of a threatening possibility, but rather out of fear of a life that loses its charm. This hedonistic turn, proof derived from pleasure, is a symptom of decline: it replaces proof derived from strength, from that which is devastating in the Christian idea, from fear. In fact in this reinterpretation Christianity approaches exhaustion: one makes do with an opiate Christianity, because one has neither the strength to want to search, to fight, to dare, to stand alone nor for Pascalism, for dee(p) brooding self-contempt, for faith in human unworthiness, for the anxiety of the “possibly-damned.” But a Christianity that above all is supposed to calm sick nerves has no need at all of that fearful solution of a “God on the cross”: which is why everywhere in Europe Buddhism is silently making progress. 2[145]?”4 The interpretation of an event as either doing or suffering — therefore every doing a suffering — says: every single change, a becoming different presupposes an author and someone on whom “change” is made. 2[146] A perfect analogy can be drawn between the simplifying and compressing of countless experiences to general principles [Page 383] 376 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS and the becoming of the sperm cell that bears within it the entire abbreviated past: and likewise in the artistic forming from fertile basic thoughts up to a “system” and the becoming of an organism as a thinking-out and thinking-forth, as a remembering-back of an entire previous life, of realizing-back, incorporation. In brief: visible organic life and invisible creative psychic controlling and thinking contain a parallelism: in the “artwork” one can demonstrate these two sides most clearly as parallel. — The extent to which thinking, inferring and everything logical can be seen as exterior: as symptom of much more inward and more basic events? 2[147]215216 (30) “end” and “means” as interpretation { (wot as facts) “cause and effect” as interpretation 4 all in the sense of a “subject and object” as interpretation | will to power “doing and suffering” (“thing in itself” and “appearance”) as interpretation and to what extent perhaps necessary interpretations? (as “preserving”) 2i 48)?!” The will to power interprets. in the formation of an organ interpretation is at stake; it demarcates, determines degrees, power differentials. Mere power differentials could not perceive themselves as such: a growth-willing something must be there, that interprets every other growth-willing something in terms of its value. Jn this similar — — In truth interpretation is a means itself of becoming master over something. (The organic process presupposes constant interpreting. 2[149]718 A “thing in itself” just as wrong as a “meaning in itself,” “a significance in itself.” There are no “facts in themselves,” rather a meaning must always be inserted first, so that there can be “ facts” [Page 384] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 377 The “what is that?” is a positing-of-meaning from the point of view of something else. “Essence,” “essentiality” is something perspectival and already presupposes a multiplicity. What underlies here is always “what is that for me?” (for us, for everything that lives etc.) A thing would be described only when all beings had asked and received an answer to their “what is that?” about it. Suppose a single being with its own relations and perspectives to all things were missing: and the thing would still not be “defined.” 2[150]?” In brief, the essence of a thing is also only an opinion of the “thing.” Or rather: the concept “that counts as” is the real “that is,” the only “that is.” 21512 One is not allowed to ask “then who is interpreting?” rather interpretation itself, as a form of the will to power, has existence (but not as a “being,” but instead as a process, a becoming) as an affect. 2i 52]°7! The emergence of “things” is entirely the work of the representing, thinking, willing, inventing ones. The concept “thing” itself just as well as all properties. — Even “the subject” is such a creation, a “thing,” like all others: a simplification in order to describe the force that posits, invents, thinks as such, in contrast to all individual positing, inventing, thinking itself. Therefore the capacity described in contrast to all that is individual: at bottom activity summarized with respect to all expected activity (activity and the probability of similar activity) 2153]??? NB. From the world known to us the humanitarian God cannot be proven: today you can be compelled and driven this far — but what conclusion do you draw from this? Either he is [Page 385] 378 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS not provable to us: skepticism of knowledge. But all of you fear the conclusion: “from the world known to us an entirely different god would be provable, one who at least is not humanitarian” — — and, that means, i.e., you hold on tightly to your God and invent for him a world that is not known to us. 211541” (36) Against the scientific prejudice. — The greatest fable is the one about knowledge. One wants to know how the things in themselves are constituted: but behold, there are no things in themselves! But supposing even that there were an in-itself, an unconditioned, then precisely for that reason it could not be known! Something unconditioned cannot be known: otherwise it would precisely not be unconditioned! But knowing is always “positing-oneself-in-conditionto-something” — — ; such a “knowing one” desires that what he wants to know does not concern him; and that this same thing should not concern anyone at all; whereby first a contradiction occurs, in wanting-to-know and in the demand that it should not concern him (why then know at all!) and second, because something that does not concern anyone does not at all exist, therefore also cannot be known. — Knowing means “to posit oneself in condition to something”: to feel oneself conditioned by something and between us — — it is therefore in any case a determining describing making conscious of conditions (not a fathoming of essences, things, “in-themselves”) ?4 aftss]225226 Deep aversion to resting once and for all in some overall-view of the world; magic of the opposing ways of thinking; not letting oneself be deprived of the charm of the enigmatic character. [Page 386] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 379 2[156] For the chapter “artists” (as molders, value-assigners, appropriators) Our languages as after-notes of the oldest appropriations of things, by rulers and thinkers alike — — : running alongside every coined word was the command “thus shall the thing be named from now on!” 21577 Shouldn’t all quantities be signs of qualities? The greater power corresponds to a different consciousness, feeling, desire, to a different perspectival gaze; growth itself is a desire to be more; out of a quale??? grows a desire for a more of quantum; in a purely quantitative world everything would be dead, rigid, unmoved. — The reduction of all qualities to quantities is nonsense: what results is that one and the other stand together, an analogy — 2[158]2? Psychological history of the concept “subject.” The body, the thing, the “whole” constructed by the eye trigger the differentiation of a doing from a doer; the doer, the cause of the doing, ever more subtly comprehended, in the end left the “subject” behind. 2[159]?° Has a force ever been demonstrated? No, instead effects, translated into a completely foreign language. But the regularity of succession has spoiled us so much that we are not surprised by its oddness?>! 2[160] Today, when what matters is to give this book, which lies open, but nevertheless demands its key, an entrance a preface, it should be the first to say why I feared a preface back then. [Page 387] 380 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 2[161]222233 (41) For the Preface. Deeply mistrustful of epistemological dogmas, (I) loved to look out of now this, now that window, I was wary of committing (myself) to them, regarded them as harmful — and ultimately: is it probable that a tool can criticize its own suitability?? — What I paid attention to instead was that never has an epistemological skepticism or dogma arisen without ulterior motives — that it has a second rank value as soon as one considers what at bottom forced one to this position: even the very will to certainty, when it is not the will “I only want to live” — — — Basic insight: Kant as well as Hegel as well as Schopenhauer — the skeptical-epochal position as well as the historical and the pessimistic are of moral origin. I saw no one who would have dared a critique of moral value feelings: and I soon turned my back on the meager attempts to arrive at a history of the emergence of these feelings (as among the English and German Darwinists). — How does one explain Spinoza’s position, his renunciation and rejection of moral value judgments? (Was it one consequence of a theodicy?) 2[162]?34 One notices in my earlier writings a good will to unlocked horizons, a certain prudent caution before convictions, a mistrust of the enchantments and dupings of conscience that accompany every strong belief; one might see in this in part the wariness of the burned child, of the deceived idealist — more essential to me seems the Epicurean instinct (of a friend of riddles —) who does not want to permit himself to take cheaply the enigmatic character of things, most essential finally an aesthetic aversion toward the big virtuous unconditional words, a taste that defends itself against all quadrangular opposites, desires a good portion of uncertainty in things and takes away the opposites: — as a friend of intermediary colors, shadows, afternoon lights and infinite seas. [Page 388] 2 AUTUMN 1885 —AUTUMN 1886 381 2[163] Customary errors of moral-historians: 1. they show that among different peoples there are different moral valuations and conclude from this that they are nonbinding generally. — Or they assert some arbitrary consensus of peoples, at least of the civilized, in certain matters of morality and conclude from it that it is binding for us! Both are equally naive. 2. they criticize the opinions of a people concerning its morality (concerning the morality's descent, sanction, reasonableness etc.) and believe they have criticized a morality itself, which has been overgrown with the weeds of this unreason. 3. they themselves stand under the rule of a morality without knowing it and at bottom do nothing more than assure the triumph of their belief in it — their grounds only prove their own will that this and that be believed, that this and that should be absolutely true. There isn't much to the moral-historians so far: they themselves usually stand under the command of a morality and at bottom do nothing more than generate its propaganda. Their usual error is that they criticize the foolish opinions of a people concerning its morality (also concerning its descent, sanction, reasonableness) and believe that precisely in doing so they have criticized the morality itself, which has been overgrown with the weeds of this unreason. But the value of a rule "thou shalt" is independent of the opinion people have of it, just as certainly as the value of a medication is independent of whether I think scientifically or like an old woman about medicine Or on the other hand they assert some arbitrary consensus of peoples, at least of the tamed peoples concerning certain matters of morality and conclude from this its absolute binding nature, even for you and me: which are both equally big naivetés — [Page 389] 382 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 2[164]?35 A spirit strengthened by wars and victories, for whom conquest, adventure, danger, pain have even become a requirement; a habit of sharp high air, of winter wanderings, of ice and mountains in every sense; a kind of sublime malice and final mischief of revenge, for there is revenge in it, revenge on life itself when someone who suffers greatly takes life under his protection. This book, which might need not only one preface, is difficult to understand for many reasons, not due to a lack of skill of its author, even less due to his bad will, but (due to) the final mischief of someone who suffers greatly, who constantly makes fun of an ideal believed in by the people, whom he perhaps has reached in this condition. — And perhaps I have a right to have my say about these conditions, because I have not merely watched them. I have no doubt: at that time what I lived beyond, with an ironic self-superiority, was the condition of the wise man as the people imagine him: the gentle infertility and self-satisfaction of the wise man as the people imagine him, the remoteness and beyond of the “pure-knowing one,” the whole sublime onanism of a spirit who has lost the good will to deeds, to begetting, to creating in every sense. Who shares with me in feeling the wondrous happiness of that period in which this book emerged! The sublime malice of a soul who — — — My taste of today takes pleasure in something else: the human being of great love and of great contempt, who is driven out of all “remoteness” and “beyond” straight into the world by his overflowing strength, who is forced by solitude to create beings for himself who are like him — a human being with the will to a terrible responsibility, forged to his problem What is perhaps most difficult to understand in this difficult to understand book, which needs not only one preface, is the irony of the contrast between its theme, a disintegration and unwinding of moral values — and its tone, that of the highest [Page 39] 32 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS 34 [111] 4 The Germans should cultivate a ruling caste: I confess that there are qualities inherent in Jews that are indispensable to their serving as an ingredient in a race that is supposed to practice world politics. The sense for money has to be learned, inherited and inherited a thousand fold: even now the Jew is a match for the American. 34[112] I point out something new: certainly for such a democratic nature there is the danger of barbarians, but one sees them only in the depths. There is also a different kind of barbarian, they come from the heights: a kind of conquering and ruling nature that looks for a material that they can shape. Prometheus was such a barbarian. — 34[113] Not a people of “professional politicians,” of newspaper readers! 34[114]° — — — The smallness and pitifulness of the German soul was and is not at all a result of a plurality of small states: it is well known that people in much smaller states have been proud and selfaggrandizing and it is not large states in themselves that make the soul more free and manly. When the slavish imperative “you should and must kneel!” commands in someone’s soul an involuntary bowing of the neck before honorary titles, medals, favorable glances from the top down, in an “empire” he will only bow deeper and lick the dust before his great sovereign more fervently than he did before the smaller one: there is no doubting this. — It can still be seen today in the lower classes of the Italians that aristocratic self-confidence and manly discipline and certainty of themselves belongs to the longest history of their city and has been modeled best for them; a poor gondolier in Venice is still a better figure than a real privy councilor in Berlin, and ultimately even a better man: this is palpable. Just ask the women about it. [Page 390] 2 AUTUMN I—AUTUMN 1886 383 mildest wisest serenity, in which the greatly suffering one, the one who turns away from life delights as in his final mischief. 2[165]*3° (41) For the Preface of “Dawn” An attempt to think about morality without standing under its spell, mistrustful of being duped by its beautiful gestures and glances A world that we can revere, that corresponds to our worshipping drive — that continuously proves itself — through guidance of the particular and the universal — : this the Christian viewpoint from which we all stem. Through a growth in acuity, mistrust, scientism (also through a more highly cultivated instinct of truthfulness, therefore again under Christian influences) this interpretation has become increasingly disallowed to us. Most subtle way out: Kantian criticism. The intellect disputed its own right to interpretation in this sense as well as to rejection of interpretation in this sense. One satisfied oneself with filling the gap with a more of trust and faith, with a sacrificing of all verifiability of one’s faith, with an incomprehensible and superior “ideal” (God). The Hegelian way out, following Plato, a piece of Romanticism and reaction, simultaneously the symptom of the historical sense, of a new force: the “spirit” itself is the self-disclosing and self-realizing ideal, in “process,” in “becoming” an ever more of this ideal reveals itself; in which we believe — therefore the ideal realizes itself, faith directs itself toward the future, in which it can worship according to its noble requirements. In brief, 1) God is unknowable and unverifiable to us — deeper meaning of the epistemological movement 2) God is verifiable, but as something becoming, and we belong to it, precisely with our push for what is ideal — deeper meaning of the historicizing movement [Page 391] 384

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS But the same historical sense, transferring over to natural history, has — — — It is obvious: the critique is never shifted to the ideal itself, but only to the problem where its opposition comes from, why it has not yet been reached or why it is not verifiable in matters small and great. The ideal of the wise man to what extent fundamentally moralistic so far? — — — It makes the biggest difference: whether one feels this distress as distress as a result of passion, as a result of craving or whether one barely reaches it as problem using the pinnacle of thought and a certain strength of historical imagination . . . Apart from religious-philosophical observation we find the same phenomenon: utilitarianism (socialism, democratism) criticizes the descent of moral valuations, but it believes in them, just like the Christian. (Naïveté, as if morality would remain if the sanctioning God were missing. The “beyond” absolutely essential if the belief in morality is to be maintained.) Basic problem: where does this omnipotence of faith come from? Of faith in morality? (— which also betrays itself in the fact that even the basic conditions of life are falsely interpreted in favor of morality: despite knowledge of the animal world and the plant world. “self-preservation,” Darwinistic perspective on reconciliation of altruistic and egoistic principles.?°” (critique of egoism, e.g., Laroche-foucauld) My attempt to understand moral judgments as symptoms and sign languages in which processes of physiological flourishing or failing, likewise the consciousness of preservation- and growth-conditions are betrayed: a manner of interpretation with the value of astrology. Prejudices prompted by instincts (of races, communities, of different stages like youth or dotage etc.) Applied to the specifically Christian-European morality: our moral judgments are signs of decline, of unbelief in /ifé, a preparation of pessimism. [Page 392] 2 AUTUMN I —AUTUMN 1886 385 What does it mean that we have interpreted a contradiction into existence? — Decisive importance: behind all other valuations those moral valuations stand commanding. Supposing they fall away, by what do we measure then? And then what is the value of knowledge etc. etc.??? My main pro position: there are no moral phenomena, but only a moralistic) interpretation of these phenomena. This interpretation itself is of extra-moral origin.)*8 2[166]?39 Preface to the “Joyful Science” A diversion before a great undertaking for which one now finally feels strength returning to himself: as Buddha devoted himself for 10 days to world(ly) pleasures when he had found his main proposition. General mockery of all moralizing of today. Preparation for Zarathustra’s naive-ironic position on all holy things (naive form of superiority: playing with the holy) (42) Concerning the misunderstanding of “cheerfulness.” Temporary redemption from protracted tension, the exuberance, the saturnalia of a spirit who consecrates and prepares himself for protracted and terrible resolutions. The “fool” in the form of “science,” This book requires perhaps not only one preface: people have understood nothing at all about its “joyful science.” Even about the title — — — People have understood nothing at all about this “joyful science”; not even its title, about whose Provençal meaning at least many scholars — — — The triumphant condition from which this book emerged is hard to comprehend — but I myself had emerged from a condition. [Page 393] 386 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS the consciousness of aversion to everything that lay behind me, paired with a sublime will to gratitude even for my “behind me,” which was not too distant from the feeling of the right to a long revenge a piece of gray ice-cold senility switched on at the most unjust point of life, the tyranny of pain outdone by the tyranny of pride that rejects the consequences of pain, solitude as self-defense against a pathologically clairvoyant misanthropy and therefore still loved and enjoyed as redemption, on the other hand a longing for what is most bitter sour and harmful in knowledge It belongs to the things that I will not forget that people congratulated me on this book more honestly than on any other, they even let me know how healthy such a way of thinking was Nothing offends as deeply as letting people notice the height and severity of one’s own demands on oneself. Nothing offends as deeply, nothing sets people apart so thoroughly as letting people notice something of the height a(nd) severity with which one treats oneself: oh how accommodating and lovely everyone shows themselves to be toward us as soon as we do as everyone does and “let ourselves go” as everyone does! It belongs to the things that I will not forget that people expressed more congratulations to me for this book of the “gai saber” than for all the others put together: suddenly they were reconciled with me, they showed themselves to be accommodating and lovely once more, everyone saw in it a recovery, return, homecoming, soul-searching — namely as a return to “everyone.” Aside from a few scholars whose vanity took offense at the word “science” (— they let me know, Perhaps this is “joyful” [Page 394] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 387 but certainly not “science” —) everyone took this book as a return to “everyone” and for its sake showed themselves to be accommodating and lovely toward me: and I figured out after the fact how nothing offends most deeply, and most thoroughly against us — — — NB Perhaps we could also lend an ear in conclusion to a few exuberant songs in which a poet makes fun of the poets and their beautiful lyrical feelings. NB!! Zarathustra, who in a holy manner counters all holy things with courage and mockery and goes his way with innocence to the most forbidden, evil things — — — 2[167] Denial of causality. In order not to make everything responsible for anything and to hold short the thread on which something hangs. “Chance” really exists. 2[168]24] Tendency of moral evolution. Everyone desires that no other theory and estimation of things should gain validity except for the one from which he himself benefits. Basic tendency consequently of the weak and the mediocre of all times to make the strong weaker, to pull them down: chief means the moral judgment. The behavior of the stronger toward the weaker is stigmatized; the higher conditions of the strong get bad labels. The struggle of the many against the few, of the ordinary against the rare, of the weak against the strong — one of its most subtle interruptions is that the chosen refined more demanding presented themselves as the weak and rejected the cruder means of power — 2[169]?42243 (34) It could appear as if I had evaded the question of certainty. The opposite is true: but while I asked about the criterion of [Page 395] 388 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS certainty I tested to determine in the first place according to which scales things have been weighed so far — and whether the question of certainty itself were not already a dependent question, a question of the second rank. 2[170]244245 (44) What is lacking is the knowledge and consciousness of which turn-arounds moral judgment has already gone through, and how actually several times already in the most fundamental sense “evil” has been rebaptized “good.” To one of these shifts I have with the antithesis “morality of customs” and — — — Conscience has also switched spheres: there used to be a sting of conscience of the herd To what extent even our conscience, with its apparent personal responsibility is in fact still herd-conscience. 2[171]46 (43) The sting of conscience like all resentments is missing in a great fullness of strength. (Mirabeau, B. Cellini, Cardanus). 2[172]24” “Being” — we have no other idea of it than “living? — Therefore how can something dead “be”? 20173] On Zart pour l'art cf. Doudan Pensées? p. 10 how the cult of colors depraves Scherer VIII?” p. 292. 21174] One rediscovers in things nothing other than what one previously oneself put into them: this childish game, of which I do not wish to think poorly, calls itself “science”? On the [Page 396] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 389 contrary: let us continue with both, both require our good cheer — some of us to rediscover, the others — we others! — to put things in! — ultimately a human being rediscovers in things nothing other than what he himself put into them: rediscovery calls itself science, putting things in — art, religion, love, pride. In both, even if they should be childish games, — — — a [r]251-252.253 (45) NB. Against the theory of the influence of milieu and of external causes: the inner force is infinitely superior; much that looks like influence from without is only its adaptation from the inside out. The very same milieu's can be oppositely interpreted and exploited: there are no facts. — A genius is not explained from such conditions of origin — 2[176] What constitutes the strong human being of the 20th century: — 2177] (46) Populist ideals e.g., Francis of Assisi: denial of the soul hierarchy, before God all equal. 2[178]255 It does good to take “right” and “wrong” etc. in a certain narrow bourgeois sense, like “do right and fear no one”: i.e., to do one's duty according to a certain crude scheme within which a community exists. 2117916 Preface Proceeding from an idea of life (that is not a wanting-to-preserve-oneself but a wanting-to-grow) I took a glance at the [Page 397] 390 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS basic instinct of our political intellectual social movement of Europe. On what have I possibly contributed ideas? 1) that behind the most fundamental differences of philosophies stands a certain equality of confession: the unconscious guidance by moral ulterior intentions, better: by popular ideals; — that consequently the moral problem is more radical than the epistemological 2) that at some time a reversed look is necessary in order to bring into the light the prejudice of morality and of all popular ideals: for which every kind of “free spirit” — i.e., immoral ones — can be used. 3) that Christianity, as a plebian ideal, aims with its morality at damaging the stronger more highly constituted manly types and favors a herdlike human being: that its morality is a precursor of the democratic way of thinking 4) that science goes forward in league with the equality movement, is democracy, that all virtues of the scholar reject order of rank 5) that democratic Europe is heading only for a sublime cultivation of slavery, that must be commanded by a strong race in order to tolerate itself 6) that an aristocracy only emerges under harsh prolonged pressure (mastery over the earth) 2[180]?” Perhaps there are a couple of human beings in Europe, even in Germany, who are able to reach the problem of this book, and not only with their curiosity, not only with the feelers of a pampered intellect, of their divining power of imagination and imitation, even of their “historical sense,” but instead

with the passion of the abstinent: whose soul has enough elevation to understand my conception of the “free spirit” as a means of expression, as a subtlety, if you will, as a modesty: they will not complain about my obscurity. [Page 398] 2
 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 391 There are many things against which I have not found it necessary to speak out: it goes without saying that the “literary man” is repugnant to me, that all political parties of today are repugnant to me, that a socialist is treated not only with pity by me. The two noblest forms of human being whom I encountered in the flesh (were) the perfect Christian — I count it an honor to stem from a family that took its Christianity seriously in every sense — and the perfect artist of the romantic ideal, which I found to be deep below the Christian level: it is plain as day that when one has turned his back on these forms, because they do not satisfy, then one does not easily find satisfaction in another kind of human being of today — to this extent I am condemned to solitude, even though I can very well imagine a kind of human being in whom I would have pleasure. My patient and lenient disgust with the self-sufficiency of our metropolises, which adorn themselves with culture, of our scholars — — — 2[181]258 (42) The irony of Plato, with which an overly large tenderness of feelings and of the senses, a vulnerability of the heart knew how to protect itself, at least to conceal itself, that Olympian nature of Goethe, who composed verses about his sufferings in order to be rid of them, likewise Stendhal, Mérimée?5? — 2[182]260.261 (10) In order for something to last that is longer than the individual, therefore in order for a work to last that perhaps an individual has created: for this all possible kinds of limitation, of onesidedness etc. must be imposed on the individual. By what means? Love honor gratitude toward the person who created the work are a help: or that our forefathers fought for it: or that my descendants are only guaranteed if I guarantee that work (e.g., the mOAtc?“”). Morality is essentially the means [Page 399] 392
 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS to bring something to duration over and beyond individuals, or rather by an enslavement of individuals. It is self-evident that the perspective from below to above will yield entirely different expressions than the one from above to below. A power-complex: how is it preserved? By the fact that many generations sacrifice themselves to it, i.e., — — — 2[183]° For the Introduction For anyone who has lived together with a big question mark as if with his destiny and whose days and nights were consumed by purely solitary dialogues and decisions, the opinions of strangers about the same problem are a kind of noise against which he defends himself and covers his ears: moreover, something obtrusive inappropriate and shameless so to speak, on the part of those who, as he believes, have no right to such a problem: because they did not find it. They are the hours of mistrust toward himself, of mistrust toward his own right and prerogative where the hermit-like loving one — for that is a philosopher — demands to hear everything that is said and not said about his problem; perhaps in doing so he divines that the world is full of jealous loving ones like him, and that everything loud, clamorous, public, the whole foreground of politics, routine, annual fair, “time” seems to be invented only so that everything that is hermit and philosopher in us today can hide behind it — as in its ownmost solitude; all occupied with one thing, in love with one thing, jealous of one thing, precisely of Ais problem. “There is nothing else at all being thought today where thinking even gets done” — he finally says to himself; “everything turns on this question mark; what seemed reserved for me is being wooed by the entire age: at bottom nothing else is happening at all; I myself — but what do I matter!” [Page 4] viii CONTENTS Prefatory Note by Mazzino Montinari to KSA Volume 12 258 Notebook 1 = N VII 2b. Autumn 1885—Spring 1886 261 Notebook 2 = W I 8. Autumn 1885—Autumn 1886 312 Notebook 3 = W I 7b. W 13b. Mp XVI 2b. Mp XVI ib. Beginning 1886—Spring 1886 403 Notebook 4 = D 18. Mp XV 2c. Mp XVII 3a. Mp XVI 1b. Beginning 1886—Spring 1886 408 Reference Matter NOTES 47 COLLI AFTERWORD 465 TRANSLATOR’S AFTERWORD 473 INDEX OF PERSONS 529 SUBJECT INDEX 545 [Page 40] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 33 34[115]*” The Servant’s Soul. The Corruption of the Blood. Moral Tartuffery. The “Mind.”°8 Lack of Clarity The Vacillators. Conjecture on the Southern Lands. Ugliness The Hinter-Soul. The Dependence on France. The German Professor and the Officer. The niaiserie allemande.®° The German Writing Style. The Hermit. The “Eternal Feminine” in the German Man. Intoxication and Music. The “Historical Sense.” The Actor. Convenience (Philistines) and War. The Philosophers. Pessimism. (Comparison with France). More herd animal than ever — but there are favorable conditions for individuals as well. 34 [116] What is most admirable about Kant is that he got over his Leibnizian seduction and retained the best of the previous century, sensualism.*° 34[117] NB. Schopenhauer, in his youth seduced by the romantics and diverted from his best instincts, was at bottom a Voltairean in body and soul, and really a child of the previous century — for the rest however led beyond French taste by the Greeks and by Goethe —and above all — not a theologian! The “immutability [Page 400] 2 AUTUMN 1885—AUTUMN 1886 393 2[18 42% (47) I come late to the awareness of how far moralistic skepticism has gone: how do I recognize myself? Determinism: we are not responsible for our natures Phenomenalism: we know nothing about a “thing in itself” My problem: What damage so far has humankind had from morals as well as from its morality? Damage to the spirit etc.? my disgust with the wise man as a spectator my higher concept “artist” 2[185]?°° (47) “We Immoralists” real critique of the moral ideal — of the good human being, of the saint, of the wise man — of the slandering of so-called evil properties — what meaning do the different moral interpretations have? — what is the danger of the interpretation that is dominant in Europe now? — what is the standard according to which measuring can be done? (“will to power”) 2[186] Do not believe that I will challenge you to the same risk! Or even to the same solitude. For whoever goes his own way encounters no one: “one’s own ways” are like that. No one comes to “help” him in this, and he must deal himself with everything that buffets him by way of danger, chance, malice and bad weather. He happens to have his way for himself, and also his occasional annoyance with his harsh inexorable “for himself”: to which it belongs for instance that even his good friends do not always see and know where he really goes, [Page 401] 394 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS where he really wants to go — and at times ask themselves: what? is he going at all? does he have — a way? ... — Insofar as I am here making an attempt to give a hint about the way I have come to those who so far have remained sympathetic to me — despite everything — it behooves me to reveal first the paths on which people have occasionally searched and even believed to have found me. People have a tendency to mistake me: I admit it; likewise that it would be of great service to me if someone else were to defend and define me against these mistakings. But, as I said, I must come to my own aid: why does one go “one’s own way”? antimetaphysical, antiromantic, artistic, pessimistic, skeptical, historical An artistic world view an antimetaphysical — yes, but an artistic one —?° a pessimistic-Buddhistic — a skeptical — a scientific — not posit(istic) 2[187] — placatumque nitet diffuso lumine coelum?® — 2[188]° that the history (of) all ph(enomena) of morality could be simplified to the extent that Schopenhauer believed — namely such that compassion is to be discovered as the root of every moral(alistic) impulse so far — this degree of absurdity and naiveté could be achieved only by a thinker who was bereft of all historical instinct and had eluded in the most astonishing manner even that strong schooling in history that the Germans from Herder to Hegel had undergone. 2[189]?°° The inquiry into the descent of our valuations and tablets of good does not in the least coincide with their criticism, as is so [Page 402] 2 AUTUMN I—AUTUMN 1886 395 often believed: even though the insight into some pudenda origo?” brings with it for our emotions a decline in value of whatever thing originated thus and prepares a critical mood and attitude toward the same. 2[190]272273 (47) what are our valuations and even our moral tablets worth? What comes out of their rule? For whom? With respect to what? — Answer: for life. But what is life? Here then a new more definite version of the concept “life” is needed: my formula for it is: life is will to power. what does valuating mean in itself? does it point back or down to another metaphysical world? As Kant still believed (who is prior to the great historical movement) In sum: where did it emerge? Or did it not “emerge”? Answer: moral valuating is an interpretation,’ a way of interpreting.” The interpretation itself is a symptom of certain physiological conditions, likewise of a certain spiritual level of ruling judgments. Who interprets? — Our affects. 2[191] My assertion: that one must subject moral valuations themselves to a critique. That one must call a halt to the moral emotional impulse with the question: why? That this demand for a “Why?”, for a critique or morals, is precisely our current form of morality itself, as a sublime sense of honesty. That our honesty, our will not to deceive ourselves must prove itself: “why not?” — In what forum? The will not (to) allow oneself to be deceived is of different origin, a caution against being overpowered, exploitation, a self-defense instinct of life. These are my demands of you — they may sound harsh enough to your ears —: that you should subject moral valuations themselves to a critique. That you should call a halt to the moral emotional impulse that here demands submission [Page 403] 396 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS and zot criticism with the question: “why submission?” That you should regard this demand for a “Why?”, for a critique of morality, precisely as your current form of morality itself, as the most sublime kind of righteousness, which does honor to you and your age.””° 2[192] the feeling: thou shalt!, one’s disquiet in being violated — question: “who is giving orders here? Whose disfavor do we fear here?” 2[193]277278 (7) Our bad habit of taking a mnemonic device, an abbreviating formula as essence, finally as cause e.g., to say of lightning: “it flashes.” Or even the little word “I.” To posit a kind of perspective in seeing again as the cause of seeing itself: that was the trick in the invention of the ‘subject,’ of the “I”! 2[194]272280 Stendhal: “Combien de lieues ne ferais-je pas a pied, et a combien de jours de prison ne me soumettrais-je pas pour entendre Don Juan ou le Matrimonio segreto: et je ne sais pour quelle autre chose je ferais cet effort??? At the time he was 56 years old. 2[195]282283 (41) Hegel: his popular side the theory of war and of great men. Right is with the victor: he represents the progress of humankind. Attempt to prove the rule of morality using history. Kant: detached from us, invisible, real, a realm of moral values Hegel: a verifiable development, the becoming-visible of the moral realm [Page 404] 2 AUTUMN I—AUTUMN 1886 397 We do not want to be deceived either in the Kantian or the Hegelian manner: — we no longer believe, like them, in morality, and consequently nor do we have any philosophies to found so that morality remains justified. Criticism as well as historicism do not have their charm for us in this — well, what charm then do they have? 2[196] We homeless ones — yes! But we want to exploit the advantages of our situation and, far from perishing of it, let ourselves benefit from the open air and powerful fullness of light. 2[197] Nonbelievers and godless ones, yes! — but without that bitterness and passion of one who tears himself away and fabricates a faith, a purpose, often a martyrdom from his non-faith: we have simmered and grown cold in the realization that in the world things are absolutely not divine, indeed they are not even compatible with a rational, merciful, humane standard; we know it, the world in which we live is immoral, undivine, inhuman — for far too long we have interpreted it in the sense of our reverence. The world is not worth that which we have believed: and the last thread of solace that was spun by Schopenhauer we have ourselves torn: that precisely this is the meaning of the whole of history, that it figures out its own meaninglessness and grows sick of itself. This growing-sick-of-existence, this will to no-longer-willing, this shattering of our personal will, our personal well-being, self (lessness) (as an expression of this inverted willing) — this and nothing else Schopenhauer wanted to see honored with the higher honors: he called it morality, he decreed that all selfless action — — — he believed he ensured the value even of art by interpreting the indifferent states that it creates as preparations for that total detachment and satiety of disgust. — but would we really be pessimists with respect to the sight of an immoral world? No, because we do not believe in [Page 405] 398 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS morality — — we believe that mercy, right, compassion a(nd) lawfulness are by far overvalued, that their opposite has been slandered, that in both, in exaggeration and slander, in the entire application of the moralistic ideal and standard there has been a tremendous danger for humans. Nor should we forget the good byproduct: the refinement?^{*4} of interpretation, of moral(istic) vivisection, the sting of conscience has elevated the Jalseness of humans in the extreme and made them intelligent. In itself a religion has nothing to do with morality: but the two descendants of the Jewish religion) are both essentially moral religions, those that issue precepts about how people should live and create an audience for their demands by means of reward and punishments.⁷° 2[198] the era of Bismarck (the era of German dumbing-down) in such swampy terrain thrive, as is only fair, also the genuine swamp plants, e.g., the a(nty-Semite) 2[199] — to be nationalistic in the sense and to the degree that is now demanded by public opinion, would seem to me, to us more spiritual humans, to be not only a matter of bad taste: but a dishonesty, an arbitrary anesthetizing of our better science and conscience 2[200] Likewise we are no longer Christians: we have grown apart from Christianity, not because we lived too distant from it, but because we lived too close to it, even more because we grew out of it — it is our stricter and more pampered piety itself that forbids us today from still being Christians — 2[201] When I once wrote the word “unfashionable” on my books, how much youth, inexperience, isolation expresses itself in this [Page 406] 2 AUTUMN I—AUTUMN 1886 399 word! Today I comprehend that with this kind of lament enthusiasm and dissatisfaction I actually belonged to the most modern of moderns. 2[202]?°° Kant: the mere idea of a possible science that one seeks to nourish in many different ways, up to the point where the single footpath, quite overgrown with sensuality, is removed” — 2[203]287 And even today the philosophers unknowingly give the strongest evidence for how far this authority of morality reaches. With all their will to independence, with their habits or principles of doubt, even with their vice of contradiction, of innovation at any cost, of haughtiness of every height — what becomes of them as soon as they reflect on “thou shalt” and “thou shalt not”? Immediately there is nothing more modest on earth: the Circe morality just breathed on them and enchanted them! All these proud and solitary wanderers! — Now all at once they are lambs, now they want to be the herd. At first the whole lot of them wants to have their “thou shalt” and “thou shalt not” in common with everyone — first sign of abandoned independence. And what is their criterion of a moral precept? They are all of one mind: their universal validity, their focus away from the person. This I call “herd.” Thereupon, of course, they part ways: for each one wants to be of service to m(orality) with its best energy. Most of them resort to “grounding morality,” as they say, namely wedding and uniting it to reason, if possible to the point of unity; the more subtle ones on the contrary find the token and prerogative of their rank, their rank that is superior to reason, in the ungroundability of morality; others will want to deduce it historically (perhaps with the Darwinists, who invented the home remedy for bad historians, “first utility and compulsion, then habit, finally instinct, even pleasure”), still others refute these deductions and deny in general any historical deductability of [Page 407] 400 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS morality, and this likewise to the honor of their rank, their high species and calling: but all are of one mind in the main thing “morality is here, morality is given!”, they all believe, honestly, unconsciously, unflinchingly in the value of that which they call morality, that is, they stand under its authority. Yes! The value of morality! Is it permissible that here someone speaks up who has doubts about precisely this value? And is also concerned only in this respect about its deduction, deductability, psychological possibility and impossibility? 2[204]?88 Book Five. We Contrarians. Our new “freedom” Against the popular ideal human beings How far do art and falsity go into the essence of being? Why we are no longer Christians. Why we are antinationalistic. Pessimism and Dionysianism. Our mistrust of logic Lart pour l'art? The limitedness of all teleology. Against the causality-fatalism. Against the theory of milieu: mask and character. On the concept “phenomenalism.” Against romanticism. Concept of slavery i.e., of making into tools Misunderstanding of cheerfulness.” What the order of rank does. Critique of modern philosophy: erroneous point of departure, as if “facts of consciousness” existed — and no phenomenalism in introspection”! 2[205]?2 There is no egoism at all that stays within itself and does not overreach — consequently that “permissible,” “morally indifferent” e(goism) of which you speak does not exist at all. [Page 408] 2 AUTUMN I—AUTUMN 1886 401 One promotes ones ego constantly at “the expense of another”; life always lives at the expense of other life. — Whoever does not comprehend this has not yet taken the first personal step toward honesty. 2[206]2932% (48) What a feeling of freedom there is in perceiving as we freed spirits perceive, that we are not harnessed into a system of “purposes”! Likewise that the concepts “reward” and “punishment”

do not reside in the essence of existence! Likewise, that the good and the evil deed are called good and evil not in themselves, but only under the perspective of the preservation tendencies of certain kinds of human communities! Likewise that our accounts of pleasure and pain have no cosmic, let alone a metaphysical meaning! — That pessimism that opts to put the pleasure and displeasure of existence itself on the scales, with its arbitrary imprisonment in the pre-Copernican prison and field of vision, would (be) something backwards and back-sliding, if it were not merely a bad joke of a Berliner (the pessimism) of E(duard) von Hartmann 2[207] 9%26 Beginning Conclusion. To what extent this self-annihilation of morality is still a part of its own force. We Europeans have in us the blood of those who have died for their faith; we have taken morality as terrible and serious and there is nothing that we have not at some time sacrificed to it. On the other hand: our spiritual subtlety has been achieved essentially through conscience-vivisection. We do not yet know the Where to? toward which we are driven, now that we have detached ourselves in this manner from our old soil. But this very soil cultivated in us the strength that now drives us out into the distance, into adventure (by which we) are thrust out into the boundless, unexplored, undiscovered — we [Page 409] 402 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS have no choice, we must be conquerors once we no longer have a country where we are at home, where we could “subsist.” No, you know this better, my friends! The hidden Yes in you is stronger than all the No’s and Maybe’s from which you and your times are sick and addicted; and if you must ship out, you emigrants, then a faith compels you to do so — — 2[208] the not-finishings with Christianity 2[209] It is a point of honor for my friends to be active on behalf of my name, reputation and worldly security and to build me a fortress where I am preserved from being crudely misjudged: I personally do not want to lift a finger for this anymore 2[210] The perfect functional certainty of the regulating instincts [Page 41] 34 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS of character,” in plain language perhaps laziness, and on the other hand his faith in the infallibility of genius (in plain language perhaps vanity) prompted him to prematurely pronounce holy the “sin of his youth,” I mean his metaphysics of the will; and to no longer “develop” himself. A h(uman being) of his talent and inner discordia?! had the substance for five “better” systems in his head, and one ever truer and falsier than the other. 34[118] We do not understand a “causal” relationship, but we see that a factum, in order to be established, (should) comprehend several facta” in itself. Our analysis sets up a succession. The numbers that are generated by this mean nothing for the relationship of those phenomena among themselves, but could lead astray: because humanity is fixed in some instincts, a similarity of numerical ratios is yielded with respect to him. 34[119] Do our thoughts stand in a causal direct relationship to others? Or is their logical connection an illusion? I mean a result of the fact that the instigating events of each of these thoughts stand in a relationship that presents itself to us as “conclusion” and the like. They are purely final links? — Or is there a direct effect of a thought on another? A “causing” here at least? 34[120] The world of appearance “empty illusion and deception,” the need for causality that produces connections between appearances likewise “empty illusion and deception” — with this moral condemnation of the deceptive and the illusory voices itself. One has to get beyond this. There are no things in themselves, also no absolute knowing, the perspectival, deceiving character belongs to existence.” [Page 410] [3 = WI 7b. Wb. Mp XVI 2b. Mp XVI 1b. Beginning 1886—Spring 1886] On the Natural History of the Free Spirit. On the Natural History of the Free Spirit. Thoughts and Dashes by Friedrich Nietzsche. 313] Dedication and Final Verse.” “To him who makes all heavens bright And causes all the seas to roar — ” 314) The Will to Power. Omen of a Philosophy of the Future. By Friedrich Nietzsche. 3s] Misunderstanding of the lust to rule. Cheerfulness as redemption. [Page 411] 404 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS Dance. Mockery of “divine” — symptom of convalescence. The demand for “solid facts” — epistemology how much pessimism there is in it! Creating Z(arathustra) as one’s opponent 316]? Love of the fatherland is something young in Europe and it still stands on weak legs: it falls down easily! One should not let oneself be deceived by the clamor it makes: little children scream the loudest. 317] “Stupid to the point of holiness” they say in Russia.° 318)” Toward New Seas. All Sorts of Questions and Questionable Matters. for Good Europeans. By Friedrich Nietzsche. Beyond Good and Evil. Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future. First Book: Morality and Knowledge. Second Book: Morality and Religion. Third Book: Morality and Art. Fourth Book: Our Virtues. Fifth Book: On the Order of Rank. [Page 412] 3 BEGINNING 1886—SPRING 1886 405 3[10]? Our Virtues. All Manner of Questions for the Questionable. By Friedrich Nietzsche. 3[11]° Human, All Too Human. A Book for Free Spirits. New Sequel. And if this book is a mirror and consequently an opportunity for self-mirroring: well, you good Europeans, what do h sake ee: : as you think of our vanity? Does it like to see itself — “in the mirror”? — 312] From the natural history of the free spirit.”’ The philosophy of the future. Scientific laborers. Artists. On the philosophy of the superior human. On the dimming of Europe.!” 3[13] It is this solitude that we guard when we speak of the religious organization of humankind: — and perhaps nothing distinguishes us so distinctly from the herd animals and equality apostles mistakenly called “free spirits”: — all of whom could not bear solitude. Religion conceived as the continuation and deepening of fundamental political theory, which is always the theory of unequal rights, of the necessity of a social structure with High and Low, with commanders and obeyers: to us [Page 413] 406 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS religion means the theory of the difference in rank of souls, of the cultivation and possibility of higher souls at the expense of the lower. 3[14] The world is not worth that which we have believed: we have figured it out. The pessimist even lets us know that precisely this is the remaining value that it holds for us, namely that we can figure it out — and that it is not worth that which we believed. In this manner the world would be a means of spoiling the world for oneself, of “deworliding” oneself in the best possible manner; an absurdity that is finally starting to comprehend itself after mis(er)able detours, a somewhat long-winded comedy of errors that shamefully loses itself in nothingness 3L] There remains enough to object to in a long invalidism; I am least inclined to agree with a Christian moralist that it improves a h{uman), namely if he is afflicted with protracted pains that one (observes) with cold presence of mind — neither that Oriental mute deaf self-dissolving, self-surrendering nor that over-exciting of the power of will and of bravery that {displays} pride, scorn to such an enemy as is pain — — — In the midst of long agonies, burned as it were with green wood and without the benefit that fever, faintings — — — 3[16] Manzoni Stifter (G. Keller) 3[17]° “Maledetto colui — che contrista un spirito immortal Manzoni (Act II of Conte di Carmagnola) [Page 414] 3 BEGINNING 1886—SPRING 1886 407 3[18]!° gangasrotogati “flowing like the current of the Ganges” = presto® kurmagati “moving like the tortoise” = lento” mandeikagati “moving like the frog” = staccato®” 3[19] We philosophers of the beyond — of beyond good and evil, if I may!, who in truth are shrewd interpreters and diviners — we whose fate it was as spectators of European things to be placed before a mysterious and unread text: which reveals itself to us more and more — what a chore we have in remaining silent and keeping our mouths shut, while ever more and rarer things crowd up in us and pile up in us and yearn for light, air, freedom, words! But the word — — — [Page 415] [4 = D 18. Mp XV 2c. Mp XVII 3a. Mp XVI 1b. Beginning 1886—Spring 1886] 4i] A philosopher: what a modest creature if he really stays true to his name! — which does not characterize a “friend of wisdom,” forgive an old philologist! but only “someone who likes wise men.” Therefore if you want there to be philosophers in the Greek sense and meaning of the word, first bring on your “wise men”! — But it seems to me, my friends, that we ultimately love the unwise men more than the wise, supposing even there were any wise men —? And perhaps there, right there lies more wisdom? What? Should even the wise themselves — seen from up close, perhaps — not be “philosophers”? But “philosophers”?!. Friends of folly, good company for itinerant musicians and foolish folk? And not for — themselves? — 4[2] On the problem of the mask. “Une croyance presque instinctive chez moi, cest que tout homme puissant ment, quand il parle, et a plus forte raison, quand il écrit”? Stendhal, Vie de Napoléon, Préface p. XV. 4b] “Je sais, quel est le pouvoir des hommes,” said Napoleon on St. Helena; “les plus grands ne peuvent exiger d’être aimés”? — Let us immediately add what can be suspected for all too good [Page 416] 4

BEGINNING I-SPRING 1886 409 reasons: they do not even demand it of themselves — and they also do not love themselves! 4 414] “You seem to be up to something wicked, one could believe you wanted to drive human beings to ruin?” — I once said to the god Dionysus. “Perhaps,” replied the god, “but in such a way that they get something out of it for themselves.” — “What then?” I asked, curious. — “Who then? you should be asking.” Thus spoke Dionysus and he grew silent, in the way that is his own, namely seductively. — You should have seen him then! It was spring, and all the trees were in their early sap. 41s] There is a part of the night of which a hermit will say: “listen, now time is stopping!” In all night watches, especially if one finds oneself on unusual nocturnal travels and wanderings, one has with respect to this part of night (I mean the hours from one to three) an odd astonished feeling, a kind of “much too short!” or “much too long!”, in sum, the impression of a time-anomaly. Could it be that in those hours, as people who are awake for a change, we have to do penance for the fact that we usually find ourselves in the time-chaos of the dream world at that time? Enough, at night from one to three we “have no clock in our heads.” To me it seems that this is precisely what the ancients expressed with “intempestiva nocte” and “Ἐν &weovuxti”> (Aeschylus), thus “there in the night where time does not exist”; and I also etymologically use this thought to explain to myself an obscure word of Homer for describing the deepest stillest part of the night, even if the translators believe they have reproduced it with “time of the night milking”: — where in the whole wide world were people ever stupid enough to milk the cows at night between one and three! — But to whom do you tell your night thoughts anyway? — [Page 417] 410 UNPUBLISHED

FRAGMENTS 4{6}° (In) marriages in the bourgeois sense of the word, mind you in the most respectable sense of the word “marriage,” it is not at all a matter of love, just as little as it is a matter of money — no institution can be made out of love —: rather, it is a matter of the social permission granted to two persons for their mutual sexual gratification, under conditions, as is self-evident, but those that have the interest of society in mind. It is plain as day that among the prerequisites that will belong to such a contract are a degree of pleasure on the part of the participants and very much good will — will to patience, compatibility, caring for one another; but one should not misuse the word love for this! For two lovers in the complete and strong sense of the word sexual gratification is simply not essential and really only a symbol, for one party, as mentioned, a symbol of unconditional submission, for the other a symbol of consent to it, a sign of taking possession. — In a marriage in the aristocratic, old-aristocratic sense of the word it is a matter of the breeding of a race (does aristocracy still exist today? Quaeritur) — thus of maintaining a fixed, specific type of ruling human being: man and woman were sacrificed to this point of view. It is self-evident that for this love was not the first requirement, on the contrary! and not even that measure of good will for one another that conditions the good bourgeois marriage. The interest of a family was primarily decisive, and beyond it — the class. We would shiver a bit at the coldness, severity and calculating clarity of such a noble concept of marriage as reigned in every healthy aristocracy, in ancient Athens as still in the Europe of the eighteenth century, we warm-blooded animals with our delicate hearts, we “moderns”! This is precisely why love as passion, according to the broad understanding of the word, was invented for the aristocratic world and in it — there, where precisely the compulsion, the privation were greatest . . . [Page 418] 4 BEGINNING I— SPRING 1886 All 4(7)$ — “Illness makes people better”: this famous assertion that one encounters throughout all centuries, indeed from the mouths of the wise just as from the mouths and maws of the people, gives us something to think about. One is tempted to ask for once, with respect to its validity: is there perhaps a causal bond between morality and illness generally? The “improvement of human beings” regarded on the whole, for example the undeniable softening humanizing good-naturing of the European within the last millennium — is it perhaps the consequence of a long mysterious-uncanny? suffering and failing, privation, atrophy? Has “illness” “made” the European “better”? Or asked differently: is our morality — our modern tender morality in Europe — which one may compare with the morality of the Chinese — the expression of a physiological regression? . . . For one would not be able to deny that every place in history where “the human being” has shown himself in the special magnificence and power of his type immediately assumes a sudden, dangerous, eruptive character in which humanity was badly off; and perhaps in those cases where it seems to be otherwise there was simply a lack of courage or subtlety to practice psychology to the depths and to extract the universal principle there as well: “the healthier, stronger, richer, more fruitful, more enterprising a human being feels, the more ‘immoral’ (he) also becomes.” A painful thought! on which one should absolutely not dwell! But supposing one were to run forward with it for a brief little moment, how astonishedly one gazes into the future there! Then what would have been purchased more dearly than precisely that which we are promoting with all our strength — the humanization, the “improvement,” the growing “civilization”!® of the human being? Nothing would be more costly than virtue: for in the end it would have the earth as hospital: and “everyone the nurse of everyone” would be wisdom’s last verdict.!! To be sure: then one would also have that long sought-after “peace on earth”! But also so little “delight in one another”!?’ So little [Page 419] 412 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS beauty, exuberance, daring, danger! So few “works,” for whose sake it would still be worth it to live on earth! Oh! and no “deeds” at all anymore! All great works and deeds that have remained standing and were not washed away by the waves of time — were they not all in the deepest sense of the word great immoralities? ..

4[8] That the mere strength of a belief guarantees nothing at all with respect to its truth, indeed is even capable of slowly, slowly spinning forth a fat stupidity from the most reasonable of things: this is our genuine European insight — in it, if in anything, we have become experienced, burned, shrewd, wise, through much damage, as it seems . . . “Belief makes blessed”: good! Sometimes at least! But under all circumstances belief makes stupid, even in the rarer case when it is not, when from the start it is a clever belief. Every long-held belief finally becomes stupid, that means, expressed with the clarity of our modern psychologists, its reasons sink “into the unconscious,” they disappear in it — henceforth it no longer rests on reasons, but on affects (that is in the event that it needs help, it lets the affects fight for it and no longer the reasons). Assuming one could ascertain what is the best-believed, longest-held, least controversial, most honest belief there is among human beings, one would be permitted to speculate with a high degree of probability that it was at the same time also the profoundest, most stupid, “most unconscious” belief, best defended against reasons, and abandoned by reasons for the longest time. — Admittedly; but what is this belief? — Oh you curious ones! But now that I have let myself open for riddle-solving I want to be humane and quickly provide you with an answer and a solution — they won’t be easily anticipated from me. The human being is above all a judging animal; but in judgment lies our oldest and most constant belief, in all judging there is a fundamental holding-true of things and an asserting, a certainty that something is so and not otherwise, that here [Page 42] 34 APRIL-JUNE 1885 35 34 [121]”⁴ That my appreciation or condemnation of a person does not give another person a right to the same appreciation or condemnation: — unless he is equal to me and of the same rank. The opposite manner of thinking is that of newspapers: that the appreciation of people and things is something “in itself,” for which anyone is allowed to reach as if for his property. Here is simply the assumption that all are of equal rank. — Being truthful is a distinction 34[122] That something that originated is not known when one knows its origin?’ (father and mother): but instead that one must already know it in order to discover something “related” in the conditions of origin — and that mostly this is an illusion: — for in truth the recognition of the paternal and maternal element in the child is possible only in an aggregate, and involuntarily we seek, in order to explain, to comprehend something new only as an aggregate, an ordering-together i.e., the analysis refers not to the real origin, but to a fake “mechanistic” ordering-together and addition that did not happen at all. The explainer takes the facts as more stupid and simpler than they are. 34[123] That a human being is a multiplicity of forces that stand in an order of rank, so that there are commanders, but that the commander must also create everything that serves the preservation of the obeyers, such that he is conditioned by their existence. All these living beings must be of a related kind, otherwise they could not serve and obey one another so: the commanders” in some sense must also be obeyers, and in more subtle cases the role between them must change temporarily, and he who otherwise commands must obey for once. The concept “individual”? is false. These beings do not exist at all [Page 420] 4 BEGINNING I—SPRING 1886 413 the human being has really “known”: what is it that in every judgment is unconsciously believed to be true? — That we have a right to differentiate between subject and predicate, between cause and effect — that is our strongest belief; indeed at bottom even the belief in cause and effect, in conditio and *conditionatum*TM is only an individual case of the first and universal belief, our primal belief in subject and predicate (namely as the claim that every effect is an action and that every conditioned thing presupposes a conditioner, every action a doer, in sum, a subject) Should this belief in the subject- and predicate-concept not (be a big stupidity?) 41]*

Afterlude. — But here you interrupt me, you free spirits. “Enough! Enough!” I hear you shouting and laughing, “we cannot take it anymore! Oh this horrific tempter and disturber of the conscience’s peace! Do you want to ruin our reputation throughout the world? Blacken our good name? Saddle us with nicknames that eat their way into not only our skin? — And why, on a bright sunny day, these gloomy ghosts, these moral gurgling noises, this whole tragic raven-black music? If you speak truths: there are no feet that could dance to such truths, therefore not by a long shot are they truths for us! Ecce nostrum veritatis sigillum! And here there is lawn and soft ground: what would be better than to swiftly chase away your mopey thoughts and make ourselves a good day after your night? It is finally time that a rainbow stretched itself again over this land, and that someone gave us gentle crazy songs to hear and milk to drink: — we all are thirsty again for a pious, heartfelt-silly and milky way of thinking.” — My friends, I see that you are losing my patience — and who is telling you that I have not already waited a long time for that? But I am at your disposal; and I also have what you need. Do you not see there my herds leaping, all my tender sunny sheltered thoughtlambs and thought-rams? And here standing waiting for you [Page 421] 414 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS already is a whole pail full of milk; but once you have drunk — for you are all thirsting for virtue, I see it — then there will be no lack of songs as you wish them! To start with a dancing song for the merriest legs and hearts: and truly, whoever sings it does honor to One who deserves honor, one of the freest of free spirits, who makes all heavens bright again and causes all the seas to roar. — [Page 422] Reference Matter [Page 424] Notes The following symbols are used throughout the text and notes:

~ a — we et Italics Bold NL Deletion by Nietzsche Addition by Nietzsche Addition by the translators Addition by the editors (Colli and Montinari) Unfinished or incomplete sentence or thought Underlined once by Nietzsche Underlined twice or more by Nietzsche Books in Nietzsche’s personal library Variants and editions of Nietzsche’s works are referred to by the following abbreviations: CW The Complete Works of Friedrich Nietzsche Briefwechsel: Kritische Gesamtausgabe Werke: Kritische Gesamtausgabe Werke: Kritische Studienausgabe Twenty-volume 1894 Leipzig edition of Nietzsche's works (Großoktav-Ausgabe) Preliminary draft Printer's manuscript (clean final copy of handwritten MS) [Page 425] 418 NOTES Sd Second draft Se Subsequent emendation Titles of Nietzsche's works are referred to by the following abbreviations: AC The Antichrist BGE Beyond Good and Evil BT The Birth of Tragedy D Dawn DD Dionysus Dithyrambs DS David Strauss the Confessor and the Writer EH Ecce Homo GM On the Genealogy of Morality HAH Human, All Too Human AL On the Utility and Liability of History for Life JS The Joyful Science MM Mixed Opinions and Maxims NCW Nietzsche Contra Wagner SE Schopenhauer as Educator TI Twilight of the Idols UO Unfashionable Observations WA The Wagner Case WB Richard Wagner in Bayreuth WP The Will to Power WS The Wanderer and His Shadow Z Thus Spoke Zarathustra Editorial Note to Volume 16 Unless another volume in the CW is cited, all cross-references to fragments in the notes are references to fragments in this volume. In cases where a cross-reference to a fragment is followed by a number (e.g., 41[2] 1), this indicates that the reference is to the sentence or paragraph numbered 1 in fragment 41[2]. [Page 426] NOTES TO PAGES I-3 419 In cases where the format of a fragment in this volume differs significantly from the format of the fragment as it appears in KSA, we have chosen to follow as closely as possible the format of the fragment as it appears in Nietzsche's handwritten notebooks. ALAN D. SCHRIFT [34 =N VII 1] 1. Cf. 34[1]; 35184]; 36[6]. 2. Gai saber.] "Gay science." {The Old Provençal term for the art of the troubadours.} 3. {Cf CW 15, 26[426] and the corresponding note.} 4. Cf. 41[2] 15 41[9]. 5. On BT. 6. {Cf. Stendhal, Correspondance inédites: Précédée d'une introduction par Prosper Mérimée ("Unpublished correspondence: Preceded with an introduction by Prosper Mérimée") (Paris: Michel Lévy Frères, 1855), I: 167; cf. Hippolyte Taine, Geschichte der englischen Literatur ("History of English literature"), German edition by L. Katscher und G. Gerth, vol. 3: Die Neuzeit der englischen Literatur ("The modern age of English literature") (Leipzig: Ernst Julius Günther Nachf., 1880), 136.} 7. Cf. 3401]. 8. niaiserie] "silliness" 9. "femininisme"] "feminism" {N here uses his French neologism femininisme to render his own German neologism femininismus, which he preferred to the more standard feminismus.} 10. {Cf. Blaise Pascal, Pascal's Gedanken, Fragmente und Briefe ("Pascal's thoughts, fragments, and letters"), German trans. by C. F. Schwartz (Leipzig: Wigand, 1865), 1:193, NL: "Lustravit lampade terras. Das Wetter und meine Stimmung haben wenig Berührungspunkte. Meine Stimmung hängt ganz und gar nicht von der Witterung ab. Ich habe meine Nebel und mein schönes Wetter in meinem Innern." ("He has illumined the earth with a lamp. The weather and my mood have little connection. My mood does not depend entirely on the weather. I have my foggy and my fine weather within me.”)} [Page 427] 420 NOTES TO PAGES 3—7 u. milieu] {Taine’s use of the expression race, milieu et moment was familiar to N, who corresponded with Taine and spoke highly of him (cf. BGE 254; GM III 19).} 12. {Cf. BGE 247} 13. WP 133 adds in the text the following supplement, provided by Peter Gast, to Galiani’s quote: “La prévoyance est la cause des guerres actuelles de l’Europe. {Gast omits the following line from Galiani’s quote: “Parce qu’on prévoit que la maison d’Autriche s’agrandira; que les Américains, dans quelques siècles d’ici, que les Anglais, les Français, les Espagnols, dans cent ans, feront ou ne feront pas certaines choses, on commence par s’égorger à l’instant.”} Si Pon voulait se donner la peine de rien prévoir, tout le monde serait tranquille, et je ne crois pas qu’on serait plus malheureux parce qu’on ne ferait pas la guerre.” {“Foresight is the cause of Europe’s present wars. Because we predict that the House of Austria will expand; that the Americans, in a few centuries hence, the English, the French, the Spanish, in a hundred years, will or will not do certain things, we begin by immediately cutting each other’s throats. If one would take pains to foresee nothing, the whole world would be tranquil, and I do not believe that one would be worse off for not waging war.”} {Ferdinando Galiani, Lettres de l’Abbé Galiani à Madame d’Epinay, Voltaire, Diderot, Grimm, le Baron d’Holbach, Morellet, Suart, D’Alembert, Marmontel, la Vicomtesse de Belsunce, etc., vol. 2 (Paris: G. Charpentier, 1881), 323.} 14. {Cf. WP 133.} Cf. CW 15, 32[12]; CW 18, 13[5]. 15. {Cf. BGE 254. 16. Beyle} {Marie-Henri Beyle, pseudonym of Stendhal.} 17. Allusion to Gustave Flaubert {author of Salammbé (1862), which N here misspells, and The Temptation of Saint Anthony (1874)}. 18. pro pudor!] “for shame!” 19. Cf. CW 15, 26[467]. 20. the being] das Seiende 21. Cf. 34[201, 207]. 22. acedia] {a state of restlessness and inability either to work or to pray} [Page 428] NOTES TO PAGES 7-18 421 23. {Cf. Lefebvre Saint-Ogan, Essai sur l’influence française: Deuxième édition (“Essay on the influence of the French: Second edition”) (Paris: Cerf, 1885), 18-19. NL.} 24. {Cf. ibid., 49.} 25. “they... do.”] Cf. Luke 23:34. 26. façon] “manner” 27. Plaire] “to please” {Underlined by N.} 28. {Cf. Saint-Ogan, 178.} 29. High Mass] {Also known as the Mass in B minor.} 30. {Cf. WP Go. Cf. Saint-Ogan, 248-50.} 31. Cf. ibid., 248. Goethe’s judgment in Dichtung und Wahrheit, pt. 3, bk. 11. {Cf. Goethes Werke, bd. IX, ed. Erich Trunz (Hamburg: Christian Wegner Verlag, 1955), 487.} 32. Galiani] Cf. Saint-Ogan, 194. 33. Cf. 38[6]; Baudelaire’s judgment about Victor Hugo in Charles-Augustin Saint-Beuve, Les Cahiers suivis de quelques pages de littérature antique (“The notebooks followed by some pages of ancient literature”) (Paris: Alphonse Lemerre, 1876), 36, NL. 34. causa finalis . . . causa efficiens] “final cause . . . efficient cause” 35. {WP 413} 36. Cf. BGE 11; 38[7]. {Cf. Kant’s introduction to the 2nd ed. of Critique of Pure Reason, trans. Allen Wood (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), 146.} 37. good science] Wissenschaftlichkeit 38. ulterior motives... to ruin.] {"Uterior motives" = Hintergedanken; "dashes" = Gedankenstriche; "freedom of thought" = Freiheit des Gedankens; "thinkers" = Denker. N uses combinations of nouns based on denken, "to think."} 39. ironice] "ironically" {Underlined by N.} 40. back parts and foregrounds] Hintertheilen und Vorder griinden 41. Cf. BGE 208. 42. Cf. 37[14]. 43. Kant's words] Cf. Kritik der reinen Vernunft, Ak.-Ausgabe II: 496 {Critique of Pure Reason, 225, 654}. 4. {Cf. Maximilian Drossbach, Ueber die scheinbaren und die 'in blichen Ursachen des Geschehens in der Welt ("On the Apparent and real causes of events in the world") (Halle: Pfeffer, 1884), 2. NL.} [Page 429] 422 NOTES TO PAGES 18-26 45. contradictio in adjecto] "contradiction in terms" 46. {WP 973.} 47. the plant "human being") {Cf. note to 34[146].} 48. Cf. 34[145]. 49. Cf. BGE 11; 38[7]. 50. {Kant says this in the preface to Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysics; cf. Friedrich Albert Lange, Geschichte des Materialismus und Kritik seiner Bedeutung in der Gegenwart ("History of materialism and critique of its significance in the present") (Iserlohn: Baedeker, 1882), 396. NL.} 51. delicatessen] "delicacy," "tact" {Underlined by N.} 52. nihil humani] "nothing of the human" {Cf. Terence, "Homo sum, humani nihil a me alienum puto" ("I am human, and think nothing of the human is alien to me"), which appears in his play Heauton Timorumenos (The Self-Tormentor; 163 BCE).} 53. Cf. BGE 11; 38[7]. 54. {Cf. Galiani, Lettres de Abbé Galiani à Madame d'Epinay, 279.} 55. {Cf. Drossbach, 8—9.} 56. Tübingen Seminary] {Seminary in Tübingen attended by Hegel, Hölderlin, Schelling.} 57. avdpvnots] "anamnesis" 58. {Cf. Francis Galton, Inquiries into Human Faculty and Its Development (London: Macmillan, 1883), 73-74.} 59. esprit] "spirit" 60. civis romanus . . . imperium romanum] "citizen of Rome... Roman empire" 61. Cf. BGE 268. 62. amor] "love" {Underlined by N.} 63. "Nibelungs"] {Richard Wagner's cycle of four operas, collectively called Der Ring des Nibelungen (The Ring of the Nibelung), consisting of Das Rheingold (The Rhine Gold), Die Walküre (The Valkyrie), Siegfried, and Götterdämmerung (Twilight of the Gods). These operas premiered as a cycle at the first Bayreuth Festival of 1876 and are often referred to as The Ring, less often as The Nibelungs.} 64. The Germans... press.] {Cf. BGE preface.} 65. aeternae] "eternal" [Page 43] 36 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS in isolation: the center of gravity is something changeable; the constant producing of cells etc. yields a constant change in the number of these beings. And by adding nothing at all is accomplished. Our arithmetic is something too crude for this relationship and only an individual arithmetic. 34[124] The logic of our conscious thinking is only a crude and simplified form of that thinking which is required by our organism, indeed by its individual organs. A simultaneous thinking e.g., is needed, of which we scarcely have an inkling. Perhaps an artist of language: the reckoning back with the heaviness and lightness of syllables, the reckoning ahead, simultaneously the analogy-seeking of the weight of the thought with the tonal or the physiological or larynx conditions happen simultaneously — but of course not as conscious. Our causality feeling is something quite crude and isolated compared to the real causal feelings of our organism. In particular the “before” and “after” are a great naïveté. Lastly: we must first gain everything for consciousness, a temporal sense, a spatial sense, causal sense: after it had existed much more richly for a long time without consciousness. And of course a certain most simple plain reduced form: our conscious willing, feeling, thinking is in the service of a much more comprehensive willing feeling and thinking. — Really? We are constantly still growing, our temporal-spatial sense etc. is still developing. 34] Nothing can be prophesied, but with a certain enhancement of the type human being a new force can reveal itself, of which we knew nothing so far. (Namely a synthesis of opposites?) 34[126]”⁸ The sigh of Kleist over ultimate unknowability — °° [Page 430] NOTES TO PAGES 26—33 423 66. “féminisme”] “feminism” {Cf. note 9 above.} 67. WP 955. 68. absorption] Bindung; WP 955 erroneously printed this as Bildung {“education,” “cultivation’}. 69. Cf. CW 18, 15[34]. 70. {WP 962.} 71. The astonishment... poet!] Cf. BGE 209. 72. N is quoting from Lange, Geschichte des Materialismus, {820}. 73. let the... but the men’] {Let the little children come to Me”; Matthew 19:14.} 74. Cf. BGE 28 and 247. 75. allegro] “lively” 76. presto] “rapid” 77. il principe] {Machiavelli’s The Prince} 78. Cf. 35[80], 36[55]; for this planned book: 34[104—6, 114-15, 138, 145, 154, 157, 221, 227-28]. 79. To 3403]. 80. To 34[103]. 81. To 34[103]; cf 34[102, 97]. 82. Epicureisme] “Epicureanism” 3. homines novi] “new men” {In ancient Rome, the first man in a family to serve in the senate.} 84. To 34[103]; cf. 36[45]. 85. {WP 900.} : 86. To 34[103], in the manuscript attached to Pd for BGE 244. 87. To 34[103] {cf. 36[46—47]; 40170]; 41[16]; 42[1-3, 6]}. 88. The “Mind.”] Das “Gemiith.” {Cf. Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, Maximen und Reflexionen, in Goethe’s sämtliche Werke in vierzig Bänden (“Goethe’s collected works in forty volumes”), vol. 3 (Stuttgart: J. G. Cotta, 1853), 196. NL.} 89. niaiserie allemande] “German silliness” {Cf. Prosper Mérimée, Lettres a une inconnue (“Letters to an Unknown [Jenny Dacquin]”), vol. 1 (Paris: Michel Lévy Frères, 1874), 328, where Mérimée uses this phrase in a reference to Goethe. Schopenhauer uses the phrase “Deutscher [German] Niaiserie” in reference to Hegel’s philosophy in Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung, vol. 1 (Leipzig: Brockhaus, 1873), 508; translated by Judith Norman, Alistair Welchman, and [ee] [Page 431] 424 NOTES TO PAGES 33—42 Christopher Janaway as The World as Will and Representation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010), 456.} 90. {Cf. Gustav Teichmüller, Die wirkliche und die scheinbare Welt: Neue Grundlegung der Metaphysik {The real and the apparent world: New groundwork of metaphysic”} (Breslau: Koebner, 1882), 139.} 91. discordia] “discord,” “chaos” 92. facta] “facts” 93. {Cf. Drossbach, Ueber die scheinbaren und die wirklichen Ursachen des Geschehens in der Welt, 10.3 94. {Cf. BGE 43.} 95. origin] Entstehung {Here and elsewhere in this fragment.} 96. commanders] Dienenden {N actually wrote “the servants in some sense must also be obeyers,” but clearly it was his intention to juxtapose servants with commanders, not servants with obeyers, since the latter are the same. The ones who exchange roles are commanders and obeyers.} 97. “individual”] “Individuum” 98. Cf. Heinrich von Kleist to Wilhelmine and Ulrike {Wilhemine von Zenge (1780—1852) was Kleist’s fiancée, Ulrike (1774-1849) his half-sister}, 22-23 March 1801, quoted by N in SE 2 {CW 2, 188}. 99. unknowability] {Heinrich von Kleist was distressed throughout his brief and tumultuous career by his understanding of the Kantian treatment of knowledge; his characters (prose, drama) frequently function on the basis of desperate faith in the absence of knowledge.} 100. Cf. 34[188]. 1o. Intelligence] Geistigkeit 102. {Cf. Drossbach, Ueber die scheinbaren und die wirklichen Ursachen des Geschehens in der Welt, 10.} 103. “perceiving”] wahrnehmen {“to perceive,” consisting of wahr (true) and nehmen (to take)} 104. New Zarathustra plan; cf. 35[71-75]. 105. perished] unter gieng 106. Cf. 34[78]; 35139-41, 71-75]; 34[191]. 107. Cf. BGE 44. 108. plant “human being”) According to Vittorio Alfieri’s statement: “La pianta uomo nasce più robusta qui che altrove” {“The [Page 432] NOTES TO PAGES 42—48 425 plant human being is born more robust here [in Italy] than anywhere else”}, quoted in Stendhal, Rome, Naples et Florence (Paris: Michel Lévy Frères,} 1854), 383, NL; the quote is underlined by N. 109. Cf. BGE 4s. uo. Cf. CW 18, 11[296], 18[3]; BGE 254}. 111. blue flower] {The blue flower (die blaue Blume) is symbolic of Romanticism and is featured as the object of the mysterious quest of Heinrich von Ofterdingen, the titular hero of Novalis’s (Friedrich von Hardenberg) Romantic novel.} 112. The Parisians] {Heinrich Heine lived in exile in Paris, supported by a stipend from the French government. His writings and those of other “Young Germans” were banned in Germany. Cf. Edmond and Jules de Goncourt, Idées et sensations (Paris: Charpentier, 1877), 219: “L’esprit le plus parisien qu’ait eu la France est l’esprit français des étrangers: de Galiani, du prince de Ligne, d’Henri Heine.” (“The most Parisian spirit in France has been the French spirit of foreigners: Galiani, the Prince of Ligne, Heinrich Heine.”) NL.} 113. Cf. 34[159-60]. 114. To 34[155]. uş. Cf. BGE 209. 116. homines religiosi] “religious men” u. {Cf. BGE 15.} 118. reductio ad absurdum] “reduction to absurdity” ug. Cf. 34[155]. 120. The... Prerogatives.] Das Recht der Vorrechte. 121. {Cf WP 75.} 122. virtù) “strength” {from Latin vir, “man”} 123. {Cf WP 75.} 124. someone presented himself] trat man selber auf {from auftreten “to appear,” to “present itself”} 125. kick!] Tritt! {“kick,” derived from treten, “to kick,” and by wordplay from vertreten, “to represent”} 126. The two... democracy.] {Cf. BGE preface.} 127. {WP 762.} 128. Cf. 35[78]; 42[1]. 129. peintre-poète] “painter-poet” [Page 433] 426 NOTES TO PAGES 48-55 130. Coriolan overture] {The Coriolan Overture was composed by Ludwig van Beethoven in 1807 for Heinrich Joseph von Collin’s 1804 tragedy Coriolan.} 131. The expression expression] Die Ausdruck expression {N underlines “Ausdruck”; the second mention is French in the original.} 132. liberum “nego”] “I freely ‘deny’”; perhaps based on Liberum veto, “I freely forbid” or “free veto.” {The liberum veto was a parliamentary device in the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth (1648-1764) that gave any member of the legislature the right to call an end to the session and nullify any legislation that had been passed during the session.} 133. {Cf Drossbach, Ueber die scheinbaren und die wirklichen Ursachen des Geschehens in der Welt, 9. Cf. BGE 4.} 134. Nux et Crux] “nut and cross” 135. the “people”] das “Volk” 136. bonhomie] “good-naturedness” 137. {Cf. Galton, Inquiries into Human Faculty and Its Development, 72} 138. Moralities... customs.] {WP 144.} 139. the plant human being] Cf. note 108 above. 140. kind] Art, “kind,” or possibly “species” 141. {WP 753.} 142. {WP 961.} 143. Cf. BGE 295; 41]. 144. nakedness] {Cf. Genesis 3:7.} 145. Cf. 34[181, 213]. 146. Cf. Matthew 7:14. 147. how are live children . . . slumber] {N here and in the remainder of this fragment parodies Kant by invoking the Critique of Pure Reason (“How are synthetic judgments a priori possible?”) and the Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysics (where he credits David Hume for interrupting his “dogmatic slumber”).} 148. the god] On the “Philosophy of Dionysus,” cf. 3.4[181]. 149. Cf. BGE 1; 34[79]. 150. “random willing”] Willelei 151. {Cf. Friedrich Schiller, “Die Künstler” (“The Artists”), in Sämtliche Werke: Erstes Bändchen (Stuttgart: J. G. Cotta, 1822), 179. NL.} [Page 434] NOTES TO PAGES 55-64 427 152. Cf. 34[129]. 153. comme une neurose] “like a neurosis” 154. bonté] “kindness” 155. Cf. 34[188, 129]. 156. Science and Conscience.] Wissen und Gewissen. 157. To 34[t]. 158. Knowing] das Wissen 159. Felix Fallax.] “Happy Deceiver.” 160. {Cf. WP 409.} 161. contradictio in adjecto] “contradiction in terms” 162. satis... nullus.] “Few suffice for me, one suffices for me, none at all suffices for me.” {Seneca, Epistulae morales ad Lucilium, bk. 1, letter 7.} 163. uévno’ dscvoteiv] “remember not to trust” {Part of a line from the Greek comic playwright Epicharmus, quoted by Polybius and by Cicero in his Letters to Atticus (1.19); also attributed to Epicharmus in Lucian’s Hermotimus; cf. Kaibel fragment 250.} 164. To 34[145]. 165. the children . . . come.] {Cf. the conclusion of Z, where Zarathustra has signs that “his children” are near.} 166. theswarm comes] {Cf. the conclusion of Z, where a swarm of doves, along with the lion, symbolize the imminent arrival of Zarathustra’s children.} 167. Cf. 34[33, 191, 207]. 168. To 34[20]; cf. 35[72]. 169. da capo] “play it again,” “encore” 170. Cf. 35[49]. 171. little treatise] = WB 172. Bayreuther Blätter] {Journal of the Wagner society and festival established in Bayreuth. See p. 433, note 11.) 173. Cf. 34[212, 209]. 174. Century of fairs] Jahrmarkts-Jahrhundert 175. Cf. 34[33, 201]. 176. Cf. 34[206, 212]. 177. fairgrounds-taste] Jahbrmarkts-Geschmack 178. in the age of fairs] Cf. 34[206, 209]. 179. Cf. 34[1, 182]; 35[84]; 36[1, 6]; 34194]; CW 15, 30[t]; 34[202, 201]. D [Page 435] 428 NOTES TO PAGES 64—69 180. Reich-foolishness] Reichs-Narrheit {folly or foolishness concerning the (Second) Reich} 181. eg., ... case] {Cf. William Henry Rolph, Biologische Probleme: Zugleich als Versuch zur Entwicklung einer rationellen Ethik (“Biological problems: At the same time an attempt at a rational ethics”) (Leipzig: Engelmann, 1884), 148: “Ich selbst fasse die Parthenogenese (. . .) als eine ganz allgemeine Erscheinung auf, dagegen aber eigentlich die sexuelle Fortpflanzung als eine exceptionelle.” (“I myself interpret parthenogenesis . . . as an entirely general phenomenon, conversely, however, sexual reproduction actually as an exceptional one.”) NL.} 182. that at bottom . . . female] {Cf. Rolph, Biologische Probleme, 159: “Aus meiner Auffassung geht also hervor, dass ich die Männchen theoretisch als eine durch mindere Ernährung hervorgebrachte Form von Weibchen betrachte” (“Hence it follows from my interpretation that I regard the males theoretically as a form of females produced by insufficient nourishment”).} 183. origin... origin] Entstehung . . . Entstehung 184. that all organs . . . what is there.] {Cf. Karl Semper, Die natürlichen Existenzbedingungen der Thiere (“Animals natural conditions of existence”) (Leipzig: Brockhaus, 1880), vol. 1, esp. 18-19. NL.} 185. {Cf. BGE 264.} 186. Cf. BGE 209; 35[43]. 187. {WP 109.} 188. master] {Wagner liked to be called “Meister.”} 189. {WP 540.} 190. Cf. 34[181]; BGE 295. 191. “stupid to the point of sanctity] {Cf. Ivan Turgenev, “Sonderlinge,” trans. Wilhelm Lange, in Vom fels zum Meer: Spemanns's Illustrierte Zeitschrift für das Deutsche Haus, vol. 1, October 1881 through March 1882 (Stuttgart: Spemann, 1881), 235.} 192. Cf. BGE 228. 193. neminem ... juva] “Harm no one, rather help everyone to the extent that you can” (cf. BGE 186; the Latin phrase is from Arthur Schopenhauer, The Two Fundamental Problems of Ethics, trans. and ed. Christopher Janaway (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2009), 140.) [Page 436] NOTES TO PAGES 70-77 429 194. “prithee”] “Bitte” {Bitte means a request but is also the word used to say “please”; beten = to pray; Gebet = prayer; bitten = to request.} 195. “sent”] Schicksal = “fate”; geschickt = “sent” 196. right and righteousness] Recht und Gerechtigkeit 197. causae efficientes] “efficient causes” 198. causae finales] “final causes” 199. “Cognition”] “Erkennen” 200. know] wissen 201. Tarpeian Rock’] {The Tarpeian Rock is a cliff on the Capitoline Hill of Rome, from which criminals were hurled to their death.} 202. {Cf. Honoré Gabriel Riquetti, comte de Mirabeau, Oeuvres de Mirabeau, vol. 8: Discours et opinions, bk. 2 (Paris: Brissot-Thivars, 1825), 186: “Je navais pas besoin de cette leçon pour savoir qu il est peu de distance du Capitole à la roche Tarpéienne” (“I did not need this lesson to know that it is a short distance from the Capitol to the Tarpeian Rock”).} 203. “discern”... know] “erkennen” . . . wissen 204. made-up] erdichteten, i.e., fictionalized, made up 205. Our... error] {Cf. Drossbach, Ueber die scheinbaren und die wirklichen Ursachen des Geschehens in der Welt, 10.} 206. Cf. 34[182]. 207. acting] wirkende 208. {Cf WP 493.} 209. Fragment about Richard Wagner. 210. Thoughts on BT, UO, HAH, Z. 211. {This and the following two fragments were written by N on a letter he received from Paul Lanzky, dated 1 June 1885, KGB III:4, 28.} 212. Cf. 34[256]. 213. {In the Nachbericht to KGW VII, 4/2, 70-73, thirteen additional fragments (34[260—272]) are added to Notebook 34 that do not appear in KSA. Parts of two of these, 34[260] and 34[264], were included in WP} 214. the two... ideals] {WP 1061. 215. contradictio (in adjecto)] “contradiction in terms” [Page 437] 430 NOTES TO PAGES 77—92 216. By morality... being] {WP 256.} 217. The criterion... power] {WP 534.} 218. niaiserie allemande] “German silliness” {Cf. note 89 above} [35 = W I 3a] i Cf. BGE 224. 2. {Cf. BGE 229.} 3. knowing] Wissen 4. Thoughts and Dashes] Gedanken und Gedankenstriche] {Literally, “thoughts and thought dashes” — N’s favorite punctuation mark is the dash, used to break off a thought for aposiopetic effect, similar to his use of ellipsis. Cf. the conclusion of 35[7] above.} 5. {WP 132.} 6. “Socialism”] N’s English. 7. disciplina voluntatis] “discipline of the will” 8. {WP 956; cf. BGE 200.} 9. Cf. 35[8, 9]. 10. 1. organic... assimilating etc.] {Cf. WP 658.} u. {Cf WP 967.3 Numbered according to CW, s[so]. 12. Cf. BGE 205. 13. {Cf. BGE 212.} 14. indifferentism] N’s English. 15. Cf. 34[182]; CW 14, 24[248]. 16. {Cf. WP 899.} 17. {Cf. WP 899.} 18. {WP 263.} 19. {Cf. WP 424.} 20. arrangement] N’s French. 21. {Cf WP 424} 22. Numbered according to CW, 5[so]. 23. “equal rights”... equal demands’) {Cf. William Henry Rolph, Biologische Probleme: Zugleich als Versuch einer rationellen Ethik, 2nd ed. (“Biological problems: At the same time an attempt at a rational ethics”) (Leipzig: Engelmann, 1884), 27: “Diese Ansicht aber ist eine Irrlehre, denn statt des Satzes: Gleiches [Page 438] NOTES TO PAGES 92-94 431 Recht für Alle, substituiert sie jenen anderen: Gleichen Anspruch für Alle.” (“But this view is a false doctrine, for instead of the proposition: Equal rights for all, it substitutes that other: Equal demands for all.” This sentence underlined by N. NL.} 24. cant] N’s English. 25. comfort] N’s English. 26. fashion] N’s English. 27. N refers here to Eduard von Hartmann, Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins: Prolegomena zu jeder zukünftigen Ethik (“Phenomenology of ethical consciousness: Prolegomena to any future ethics”) (Berlin: C. Duncker, 1879). NL. 28. Added according to Peter Gast: Über den Ursprung der moralischen Empfindungen (Chemnitz: Schmeitzner, 1877). NL. {Paul Rée, The Origin of the Moral Sensations, trans. and ed. by Robin Small in Paul Rée, Basic Writings (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2003.} 29. {Cf. Stendhal, Correspondance inédite: Précédée d’une introduction par Prosper Mérimée (“Unpublished correspondence: Preceded with an introduction by Prosper Mérimée”) (Paris: Michel Lévy Frères, 1855), 2:87: “Pour être bon philosophe, il faut être sec, clair, sans illusion.” (“To be a good philosopher, one must be dry, clear, without illusion.”) 30. Cf. Jean-Marie Guyau, Esquisse d’une morale sans obligation ni sanction (“Outline of a morality without obligation or penalty”) (Paris: Alcan, 1885). NL. 31. “petits faits”] “little facts” 32.

Appendix C

The Will to Power

Translated by Walter Kaufmann & R.J. Hollingdale

Book One — Two: (Part 1)

2 (Spring-Fall 1887)¹ What does nihilism mean? That the highest values devalue themselves. The aim is lacking; “why?” finds no answer. 3 (Spring-Fall 1887)² Radical nihilism is the conviction of an absolute untenability of existence when it comes to the highest values one recognizes; plus the realization that we lack the least right to posit a beyond or an in-itself of things that might be “divine” or morality incarnate. This realization is a consequence of the cultivation of “truthfulness”—thus itself a consequence of the faith in morality. 4 (June 10, 1887)³ What were the advantages of the Christian moral hypothesis? It granted man an absolute value, as opposed to his smallness and accidental occurrence in the flux of becoming and passing away. It served the advocates of God insofar as it conceded to the world, in spite of suffering and evil, the character of perfection—including “freedom”: evil appeared full of meaning. It posited that man had a knowledge of absolute values and thus adequate knowledge precisely regarding what is most important. It prevented man from despising himself as man, from taking sides against life; from despairing of knowledge: it was a means of preservation. In sum: morality was the great antidote against practical and theoretical nihilism. 5 (June 10, 1887)⁴ But among the forces cultivated by morality was truthfulness: this eventually turned against morality, discovered its teleology, its partial perspective—and now the recognition of this inveterate mendaciousness that one despairs of shedding becomes a stimulant. Now we discover in ourselves needs implanted by centuries of moral interpretation—needs that now appear to us as needs for untruth; on the other hand, the value for which we endure life seems to hinge on these needs. This antagonism—not to esteem what we know, and not to be allowed any longer to esteem the lies we should like to tell ourselves—results in a process of dissolution.

6 (Spring-Fall 1887)

This is the antinomy: Insofar as we believe in morality we pass sentence on existence.

7 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The supreme values in whose service man should live, especially when they were very hard on him and exacted a high price—these social values were erected over man to strengthen their voice, as if they were commands of God, as “reality,” as the “true” world, as a hope and future world. Now that the shabby origin of these values is becoming clear, the universe seems to have lost value, seems “meaningless”—but that is only a transitional stage. 8 (1883-1888) The nihilistic consequence (the belief in valuelessness) as a consequence of moral valuation: everything egoistic has come to disgust us (even though we realize the impossibility of the un-egoistic); what is necessary has come to disgust us (even though we realize the impossibility of any liberum arbitrium or “intelligible freedom”). We see that we cannot reach the sphere in which we have placed our values; but this does not by any means confer any value on that other sphere in which we live: on the contrary, we are weary because we have lost the main stimulus. “In vain so far!”

9 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Pessimism as a preliminary form of nihilism.

10 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Pessimism as strength—in what? in the energy of its logic, as anarchism and nihilism, as analytic. Pessimism as decline—in what? as growing effeteness, as a sort of cosmopolitan fingering, as “tout comprendre”⁶ and historicism. The critical tension: the extremes appear and become predominant.

11 (Spring-Fall 1887, rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

The logic of pessimism down to ultimate nihilism: what is at work in it? The idea of valuelessness, meaninglessness: to what extent moral valuations hide behind all other high values. Conclusion: Moral value judgments are ways of passing sentence, negations; morality is a way of turning one's back on the will to existence. Problem: But what is morality?

12 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Decline of Cosmological Values (A) Nihilism as a psychological state will have to be reached, first, when we have sought a “meaning” in all events that is not there: so the seeker eventually becomes discouraged. Nihilism, then, is the recognition of the long waste of strength, the agony of the “in vain,” insecurity, the lack of any opportunity to recover and to regain composure—being ashamed in front of oneself, as if one had deceived oneself all too long.— This meaning could have been: the “fulfillment” of some highest ethical canon in all events, the moral world order; or the growth of love and harmony in the intercourse of beings; or the gradual approximation of a state of universal happiness; or even the development toward a state of universal annihilation—any goal at least constitutes some meaning. What all these notions have in common is that something is to be achieved through the process—and now one realizes that becoming aims at nothing and achieves nothing.— Thus, disappointment regarding an alleged aim of becoming as a cause of nihilism: whether regarding a specific aim or, universalized, the realization that all previous hypotheses about aims that concern the whole “evolution” are inadequate (man no longer the collaborator, let alone the center, of becoming). Nihilism as a psychological state is reached, secondly, when one has posited a totality, a systematization, indeed any organization in all events, and underneath all events, and a soul that longs to admire and revere has wallowed in the idea of some supreme form of domination and administration (—if the soul be that of a logician, complete consistency and real dialectic are quite sufficient to reconcile it to everything). Some sort of unity, some form of “monism”: this faith suffices to give man a deep feeling of standing in the context of, and being dependent on, some whole that is infinitely superior to him, and he sees himself as a mode of the deity.— “The well-being of the universal demands the devotion of the individual”—but behold, there is no such universal! At bottom, man has lost the faith in his own value when no infinitely valuable whole works through him; i.e., he conceived such a whole in order to be able to believe in his own value. Nihilism as psychological state has yet a third and last form. Given these two insights, that becoming has no goal and that underneath all becoming there is no grand unity in which the individual could immerse himself completely as in an element of supreme value, an escape remains: to pass sentence on this whole world of becoming as a deception and to invent a world beyond it, a true world. But as soon as man finds out how that world is fabricated solely from psychological needs, and how he has absolutely no right to it, the last form of nihilism comes into being: it includes disbelief in any metaphysical world and forbids itself any belief in a true world.⁷ Having reached this standpoint, one grants the reality of becoming as the only reality, forbids oneself every kind of clandestine access to afterworlds and false divinities—but cannot endure this world though one does not want to deny it. What has happened, at bottom? The feeling of valuelessness was reached with the realization that the overall character of existence may not be interpreted by means of the concept of “aim,” the concept of “unity,” or the concept of “truth.” Existence has no goal or end; any comprehensive unity in the plurality of events is lacking: the character of existence is not “true,” is false. One simply lacks any reason for convincing oneself that there is a true world. Briefly: the categories “aim,” “unity,” “being” which we used to project some value into the world—we pull out again; so the world looks valueless. (B) Suppose we realize how the world may no longer be interpreted in terms of these three categories, and that the world begins to become valueless for us after this insight: then we have to ask about the sources of our faith in these three categories. Let us try if it is not possible to give up our faith in them. Once we have devaluated these three categories, the demonstration that they cannot be applied to the universe is no longer any reason for devaluating the universe. Conclusion: The faith in the categories of reason is the cause of nihilism. We have measured the value of the world according to categories that refer to a purely fictitious world. Final conclusion: All the values by means of which we have tried so far to render the world estimable for ourselves and which then proved inapplicable and therefore devaluated the world—all these values are, psychologically considered, the results of certain perspectives of utility, designed to maintain and increase human constructs of domination—and they have been falsely projected into the essence of things. What we find here is still the hyperbolic naiveté of man: positing himself as the meaning and measure of the value of things. 13 (Spring-Fall 1887)⁸ Nihilism represents a pathological transitional stage (what is pathological is the tremendous generalization, the inference that there is no meaning at all): whether the productive forces are not yet strong enough, or whether decadence still hesitates and has not yet invented its remedies. Presupposition of this hypothesis: that there is no truth, that there is no absolute nature of things nor a “thing-in-itself.” This, too, is merely nihilism—even the most extreme nihilism. It places the value of things precisely in the lack of any reality corresponding to these values and in their being merely a symptom of strength on the part of the value-posers, a simplification for the sake of life.

14 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Values and their changes are related to increases in the power of those positing the values. The measure of unbelief, of permitted “freedom of the spirit” as an expression of an increase in power. “Nihilism” an ideal of the highest degree of powerfulness of the spirit, the over-richest life—partly destructive, partly ironic.

15 (Spring-Fall 1887)

What is a belief? How does it originate? Every belief is a considering-something-true. The most extreme form of nihilism would be the view that every belief, every considering-something-true, is necessarily false because there simply is no true world. Thus: a perspectival appearance whose origin lies in us (in so far as we continually need a narrower, abbreviated, simplified world). —That it is the measure of strength to what extent we can admit to ourselves, without perishing, the merely apparent character, the necessity of lies. To this extent, nihilism, as the denial of a truthful world, of being, might be a divine way of thinking.

16 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

If we are “disappointed,” it is at least not regarding life: rather we are now facing up to all kinds of “desiderata.” With scornful wrath we contemplate what are called “ideals”; we despise ourselves only because there are moments when we cannot subdue that absurd impulse that is called “idealism.” The influence of too much coddling is stronger than the wrath of the disappointed.

17 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. 1888)

To what extent Schopenhauer's nihilism still follows from the same ideal that created Christian theism.— One felt so certain about the highest desiderata, the highest values, the highest perfection that the philosophers assumed this as an absolute certainty, as if it were a priori: "God" at the apex as a given truth. "To become as God," "to be absorbed into God"—for thousands of years these were the most naive and convincing desiderata (but what convinces is not necessarily true—it is merely convincing; a note for asses). One has unlearned the habit of conceding to this posited ideal the reality of a person; one has become atheistic. But has the ideal itself been renounced?— At bottom, the last metaphysicians still seek in it true "reality," the "thing-in-itself" compared to which everything else is merely apparent. It is their dogma that our apparent world, being so plainly not the expression of this ideal, cannot be "true"—and that, at bottom, it does not even lead us back to that metaphysical world as its cause. The unconditional, representing that highest perfection, cannot possibly be the ground of all that is conditional. Schopenhauer wanted it otherwise and therefore had to conceive of this metaphysical ground as the opposite of the ideal—as "evil, blind will": that way it could be that "which appears," that which reveals itself in the world of appearances. But even so he did not renounce the absoluteness of the ideal—he sneaked by.— (Kant considered the hypothesis of "intelligible freedom" necessary in order to acquit the ens perfectum of responsibility for the world's being such-and-such—in short, to account for evil and ills: a scandalous bit of logic for a philosopher.—) 18 (1883-1888) The most universal sign of the modern age: man has lost dignity in his own eyes to an incredible extent. For a long time the center and tragic hero of existence in general; then at least intent on proving himself closely related to the decisive and essentially valuable side of existence—like all metaphysicians who wish to cling to the dignity of man, with their faith that moral values are cardinal values. Those who have abandoned God cling that much more firmly to the faith in morality.¹⁰ 19 (1883-1888) Every purely moral value system (that of Buddhism, for example) ends in nihilism: this to be expected in Europe. One still hopes to get along with a moralism without religious background: but that necessarily leads to nihilism.— In religion the constraint is lacking to consider ourselves as value-positing.

20 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The nihilistic question “for what?” is rooted in the old habit of supposing that the goal must be put up, given, demanded from outside—by some superhuman authority. Having unlearned faith in that, one still follows the old habit and seeks another authority that can speak unconditionally and command goals and tasks. The authority of conscience now steps up front (the more emancipated one is from theology, the more imperativistic morality becomes) to compensate for the loss of a personal authority. Or the authority of reason. Or the social instinct (the herd). Or history with an immanent spirit and a goal within, so one can entrust oneself to it. One wants to get around the will, the willing of a goal, the risk of positing a goal for oneself; one wants to rid oneself of the responsibility (one would accept fatalism). Finally, happiness—and, with a touch of Tartuffe, the happiness of the greatest number. One says to oneself: a definite goal is not necessary at all, cannot possibly be anticipated. Just now when the greatest strength of will would be necessary, it is weakest and least confident. Absolute mistrust regarding the organizing strength of the will for the whole.¹¹

21 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. 1888)

The perfect nihilist.— The nihilist's eye idealizes in the direction of ugliness and is unfaithful to his memories: it allows them to drop, lose their leaves; it does not guard them against the corpse-like pallor that weakness pours out over what is distant and gone. And what he does not do for himself, he also does not do for the whole past of mankind: he lets it drop. 22 (Spring-Fall 1887)¹² Nihilism. It is ambiguous: A. Nihilism as a sign of increased power of the spirit: as active nihilism. B. Nihilism as decline and recession of the power of the spirit: as passive nihilism. 23 (Spring-Fall 1887)¹³ Nihilism as a normal condition. It can be a sign of strength: the spirit may have grown so strong that previous goals ("convictions," articles of faith) have become incommensurate (for a faith generally expresses the constraint of conditions of existence, submission to the authority of circumstances under which one flourishes, grows, gains power). Or a sign of the lack of strength to posit for oneself, productively, a goal, a why, a faith. It reaches its maximum of relative strength as a violent force of destruction—as active nihilism. Its opposite: the weary nihilism that no longer attacks; its most famous form, Buddhism; a passive nihilism, a sign of weakness. The strength of the spirit may be worn out, exhausted, so that previous goals and values have become incommensurate and no longer are believed; so that the synthesis of values and goals (on which every strong culture rests) dissolves and the individual values war against each other: disintegration—and whatever refreshes, heals, calms, numbs emerges into the foreground in various disguises, religious or moral, or political, or aesthetic, etc.

24 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Nihilism does not only contemplate the “in vain!” nor is it merely the belief that everything deserves to perish: one helps to destroy.— This is, if you will, illogical; but the nihilist does not believe that one needs to be logical.— It is the condition of strong spirits and wills, and these do not find it possible to stop with the No of “judgment”: their nature demands the No of the deed. The reduction to nothing by judgment is seconded by the reduction to nothing by hand.

25 (Spring-Fall 1887)

On the genesis of the nihilist.— It is only late that one musters the courage for what one really knows.¹⁴ That I have hitherto been a thorough-going nihilist, I have admitted to myself only recently: the energy and radicalism with which I advanced as a nihilist deceived me about this basic fact. When one moves toward a goal it seems impossible that “goal-lessness as such” is the principle of our faith.

26 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The pessimism of active energy: the question “for what?” after a terrible struggle, even victory. That something is a hundred times more important than the question of whether we feel well or not: basic instinct of all strong natures—and consequently also whether others feel well or not. In sum, that we have a goal for which one does not hesitate to offer human sacrifices, to risk every danger, to take upon oneself whatever is bad and worst: the great passion.

27 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Causes of nihilism: 1. The higher species is lacking, i.e., those whose inexhaustible fertility and power keep up the faith in man. (One should recall what one owes to Napoleon: almost all of the higher hopes of this century.) All attempts to think up higher types failed (“romanticism”; the artist, the philosopher; against Carlyle’s attempt to ascribe to them the highest moral values). The resistance to higher types as a result. Decline and insecurity of all higher types. The fight against the genius (“folk poetry,” etc.). Pity for the lowly and suffering as a measure for the height of a soul. The philosopher is lacking who interprets the deed and does not merely transpose it.

28 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Main proposition. How complete nihilism is the necessary consequence of the ideals entertained hitherto.¹⁵ Incomplete nihilism; its forms: we live in the midst of it. Attempts to escape nihilism without reevaluating our values so far: they produce the opposite, make the problem more acute. 29 (1883-1888) The ways of self-narcotization.—¹⁶ Deep down: not knowing whither. Emptiness. Attempt to get over it by intoxication: intoxication as music; intoxication as cruelty in the tragic enjoyment of the destruction of the noblest; intoxication as blind enthusiasm for single human beings or ages (as hatred, etc.).— Attempt to work blindly as an instrument of science: opening one's eyes to the many small enjoyments; e.g., also in the quest of knowledge (modesty toward oneself); resignation to generalizing about oneself, a pathos; mysticism, the voluptuous enjoyment of eternal emptiness; art "for its own sake" ("le fait") and "pure knowledge" as narcotic states of disgust with oneself; some kind or other of continual work, or of some stupid little fanaticism; a medley of all means, sickness owing to general immoderation (debauchery kills enjoyment). Weakness of the will as a result. Extreme pride and the humiliation of petty weakness felt in contrast.

30 (Nov. 1887-March 1888; rev. 1888)

The time has come when we have to pay for having been Christians for two thousand years: we are losing the center of gravity by virtue of which we lived; we are lost for a while. Abruptly we plunge into the opposite valuations, with all the energy that such an extreme overvaluation of man has generated in man. Now everything is false through and through, mere “words chaotic, weak, or extravagant: a. one attempts a kind of this-worldly solution, but in the same sense—that of the eventual triumph of truth, love, and justice (socialism: “equality of the person”); b. one also tries to hold on to the moral ideal (with the pre-eminence of what is un-egoistic, self-denial, negation of the will); c. one tries to hold on even to the “beyond”—even if only as some antilogical “x”—but one immediately interprets it in such a way that some sort of old-fashioned metaphysical comfort can be derived from it; d. one tries to find in events an old-fashioned divine governance—an order of things that rewards, punishes, educates, and betters; e. one still believes in good and evil and experiences the triumph of the good and the annihilation of evil as a task (that is English; typical case: the flathead John Stuart Mill); f. contempt for what is “natural,” for desire, for the ego: attempt to understand even the highest spirituality and art as the consequence of depersonalization and as désintéressement; g. the church is still permitted to obtrude into all important experiences and main points of individual life to hallow them and give them a higher meaning: we still have the “Christian state,” “Christian marriage”—17 31 (1884) There have been more thoughtful and thought-addicted ages than ours: ages, e.g., like that in which the Buddha appeared, when after centuries of quarrels among sects the people themselves were as deeply lost in the ravines of philosophic doctrines as European nations were at times in the subtleties of religious dogmas. Surely, one should not let “literature” and the press seduce us to think well of the “spirit” of our time: the existence of millions of spiritists and a Christianity that goes in for gymnastics of that gruesome ugliness that characterizes all English inventions are more instructive. European pessimism is still in its early stages—bears witness against itself: it still lacks that tremendous, yearning rigidity of expression in which the Nothing is reflected, once found in India; it is still far too contrived and too little “organic”—too much a pessimism of scholars and poets: I mean, much of it is excogitated and invented, is “created” and not a “cause.”

32 (Summer-Fall 1888)

Critique of pessimism to date.— Resistance to eudaemonistic considerations as the last reduction to the question: what does it mean? The reduction of growing gloom.— Our pessimism: the world does not have the value we thought it had. Our faith itself has so increased our desire for knowledge that today we have to say this. Initial result: it seems worth less; that is how it is experienced initially. It is only in this sense that we are pessimists; i.e., in our determination to admit this revaluation to ourselves without any reservation, and to stop telling ourselves tales—lies—the old way. That is precisely how we find the pathos that impels us to seek new values. In sum: the world might be far more valuable than we used to believe; we must see through the naïveté of our ideals, and while we thought that we accorded it the highest interpretation, we may not even have given our human existence a moderately fair value. What has been deified? The value instincts in the community (that which made possible its continued existence). What has been slandered? That which set apart the higher men from the lower, the desires that create clefts.

33 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Causes of the advent of pessimism: that the most powerful desires of life that have the most future have hitherto been slandered, so a curse weighs on life; that the growing courage and integrity and the bolder mistrust that now characterize man comprehend that these instincts are inseparable from life, and one therefore turns against life; that only the most mediocre, who have no feeling at all for this conflict, flourish while the higher kind miscarries and, as a product of degeneration, invites antipathy—that the mediocre, on the other hand, when they pose as the goal and meaning, arouse indignation (that nobody is able any more to answer any “for what?”); that diminution, sensitivity to pain, restlessness, haste, and hustling grow continually—that it becomes easier and easier to recognize this whole commotion, this so-called “civilization,” and that the individual, faced with this tremendous machinery, loses courage and submits. 34 (1835-1886) Modern pessimism is an expression of the uselessness of the modern world—not of the world of existence.

35 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The “predominance of suffering over pleasure” or the opposite (hedonism): these two doctrines are already signposts to nihilism. For in both of these cases no ultimate meaning is posited except the appearance of pleasure or displeasure. But that is how a kind of man speaks that no longer dares to posit a will, a purpose, a meaning: for any healthier kind of man the value of life is certainly not measured by the standard of these trifles. And suffering might predominate, and in spite of that a powerful will might exist, a Yes to life, a need for this predominance. “Life is not worthwhile”; “resignation”; “why the tears?”—a weakly and sentimental way of thinking. “Un monstre gai vaut mieux qu’un sentimental ennuyeux”¹⁸

36 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The philosophical nihilist is convinced that all that happens is meaningless and in vain; and that there ought not to be anything meaningless and in vain. But whence this: there ought not to be? From where does one get this “meaning,” this standard?—At bottom, the nihilist thinks that the sight of such a bleak, useless existence makes a philosopher feel dissatisfied, bleak, desperate. Such an insight goes against our finer sensibility as philosophers. It amounts to the absurd valuation: to have any right to be, the character of existence would have to give the philosopher pleasure.— Now it is easy to see that pleasure and displeasure can only be means in the course of events: the question remains whether we are at all able to see the “meaning,” the “aim,” whether the question of meaninglessness or its opposite is not insoluble for us.—

37 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The development of pessimism into nihilism.— Denaturalization of values. Scholasticism of values. Detached and idealistic, values, instead of dominating and guiding action, turn against action and condemn it. Opposites replace natural degrees and ranks. Hatred against the order of rank. Opposites suit a plebeian age because easier to comprehend. The repudiated world versus an artificially built “true, valuable” one.— Finally: one discovers of what material one has built the “true world”: and now all one has left is the repudiated world, and one adds this supreme disappointment to the reasons why it deserves to be repudiated. At this point nihilism is reached: all one has left are the values that pass judgment— nothing else. Here the problem of strength and weakness originates: The weak perish of it; those who are stronger destroy what does not perish; those who are strongest overcome the values that pass judgment. In sum this constitutes the tragic age. 38 (1883-1888) Recently much mischief has been done with an accidental and in every way unsuitable word: everywhere “pessimism” is discussed, and the question is debated whether pessimism or optimism is right, as if there must be answers to that. One fails to see, although it could hardly be more obvious, that pessimism is not a problem but a symptom, that the name should be replaced by “nihilism,” that the question whether not-to-be is better than to be is itself a disease, a sign of decline, an idiosyncrasy. The nihilistic movement is merely the expression of physiological decadence.

39 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

To be comprehended: That every kind of decay and sickness has continually helped to form overall value judgments; that decadence has actually gained predominance in the value judgments that have become accepted; that we not only have to fight against the consequences of all present misery of degeneration, but that all previous decadence is still residual, i.e., survives. Such a total aberration of mankind from its basic instincts, such a total decadence of value judgments—that is the question mark par excellence, the real riddle that the animal “man” poses for the philosopher.

40 (March-June 1888)

The concept of decadence.— Waste, decay, elimination need not be condemned: they are necessary consequences of life, of the growth of life. The phenomenon of decadence is as necessary as any increase and advance of life: one is in no position to abolish it. Reason demands, on the contrary, that we do justice to it. It is a disgrace for all socialist systematizers that they suppose there could be circumstances—social combinations—in which vice, disease, prostitution, distress would no longer grow.— But that means condemning life.— A society is not free to remain young. And even at the height of its strength it has to form refuse and waste materials. The more energetically and boldly it advances, the richer it will be in failures and deformities, the closer to decline.— Age is not abolished by means of institutions. Neither is disease. Nor vice.

41 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Basic insight regarding the nature of decadence: its supposed causes are its consequences. This changes the whole perspective of moral problems. The whole moral struggle against vice, luxury, crime, even disease, appears a naïveté and superfluous: there is no “improvement” (against repentance). Decadence itself is nothing to be fought: it is absolutely necessary and belongs to every age and every people. What should be fought vigorously is the contagion of the healthy parts of the organism. Is this being done? The opposite is done. Precisely that is attempted in the name of humanity. —How are the supreme values held so far, related to this basic biological question? Philosophy, religion, morality, art, etc. (The cure: eg., militarism, beginning with Napoleon who considered civilization his natural enemy.)¹⁹

42 (March-June 1888)

First principle: The supposed causes of degeneration are its consequences. But the supposed remedies of degeneration are also mere palliatives against some of its effects: the “cured” are merely one type of the degenerates. Consequences of decadence: vice—the addiction to vice; sickness—sickliness; crime—criminality; celibacy—sterility; hystericism—weakness of the will; alcoholism; pessimism; anarchism; libertinism (also of the spirit). The slanderers, underminers, doubters, destroyers.

43 (March-June 1888)

On the concept of decadence. Skepticism is a consequence of decadence, as is libertinism of the spirit. The corruption of morals is a consequence of decadence (weakness of the will, need for strong stimuli). Attempted cures, psychological and moral, do not change the course of decadence, do not arrest it, are physiologically naught: Insight into the great nullity of these presumptuous “reactions”; they are forms of narcotization against certain terrible consequences; they do not eliminate the morbid element; often they are heroic attempts to annul the man of decadence and to realize the minimum of his harmfulness. Nihilism is no cause but merely the logical result of decadence. The “good” and “bad” man are merely two types of decadence: in all basic phenomena they agree. The social question is a consequence of decadence. Sickesses, especially those affecting nerves and head, are signs that the defensive strength of the strong natures is lacking; precisely this is suggested by irritability, so pleasure and displeasure become foreground problems. 44 (Spring-Summer 1888)²⁰ Most general types of decadence: Believing one chooses remedies, one chooses in fact that which hastens exhaustion; Christianity is an example (to name the greatest example of such an aberration of the instincts); “progress” is another instance.— One loses one’s power of resistance against stimuli—and comes to be at the mercy of accidents: one coarsens and enlarges one’s experiences tremendously —“depersonalization,” disintegration of the will; example: one whole type of morality, the altruistic one which talks much of pity—and is distinguished by the weakness of the personality, so that it is sounded, too,²¹ and like an over-stimulated string vibrates continually—an extreme irritability.— One confuses cause and effect: one fails to understand decadence as a physiological condition and mistakes its consequences for the real cause of the indisposition; example: all of religious morality.— One longs for a condition in which one no longer suffers: life is actually experienced as the ground of ills; one esteems unconscious states, without feeling, (sleep, fainting) as incomparably more valuable than conscious ones;²² from this a method—

45 (March-June 1888)

On the hygiene of the “weak.”— Everything done in weakness fails. Moral: do nothing. Only there is the hitch that precisely the strength to suspend activity, not to react, is sickest of all under the influence of weakness: one never reacts more quickly and blindly than when one should not react at all.— A strong nature manifests itself by waiting and postponing any reaction:²³ it is as much characterized by a certain adiaphoria as weakness is by an involuntary countermovement and the suddenness and inevitability of “action.”— The will is weak— and the prescription to avoid stupidities would be to have a strong will and to do nothing.— Contradictio.— A kind of self-destruction; the instinct of preservation is compromised.— The weak harm themselves.— That is the type of decadence.— In fact, we find a tremendous amount of reflection about practices that would lead to impassability. The instinct is on the right track insofar as doing nothing is more expedient than doing something — All the practices of the orders, the solitary philosophers, the fakirs are inspired by the right value standard that a certain kind of man cannot benefit himself more than by preventing himself as much as possible from acting.— Means of relief: absolute obedience, machinelike activity, avoidance of people and things that would demand instant decisions and actions.

46 (March-June 1888)

Weakness of the will: that is a metaphor that can prove misleading. For there is no will, and consequently neither a strong nor a weak will.²⁵ The multitude and disgregation of impulses and the lack of any systematic order among them result in a “weak will”; their coordination under a single predominant impulse results in a “strong will”: in the first case it is the oscillation and the lack of gravity; in the latter, the precision and clarity of the direction.

47 (March-June 1888)

What is inherited is not the sickness but sickliness: the lack of strength to resist the danger of infections, etc., the broken resistance; morally speaking, resignation and meekness in face of the enemy. I have asked myself if all the supreme values of previous philosophy, morality, and religion could not be compared to the values of the weakened, the mentally ill, and neurasthenics: in a milder form, they represent the same ills.— It is the value of all morbid states that they show us under a magnifying glass certain states that are normal—but not easily visible when normal.— Health and sickness are not essentially different, as the ancient physicians and some practitioners even today suppose. One must not make of them distinct principles or entities that fight over the living organism and turn it into their arena. That is silly nonsense and chatter that is no good any longer. In fact, there are only differences in degree between these two kinds of existence: the exaggeration, the disproportion, the nonharmony of the normal phenomena constitute the pathological state (Claude Bernard). Just as “evil” can be considered as exaggeration, disharmony, disproportion, “the good” may be a protective diet against the danger of exaggeration, disharmony, and disproportion. Hereditary weakness as the dominant feeling: cause of the supreme values. N.B. One wants weakness: why? Usually because one is necessarily weak. —Weakness as a task: weakening the desires, the feelings of pleasure and displeasure, the will to power, to a sense of pride, to want to have and have more; weakening as meekness; weakening as faith; weakening as aversion and shame in the face of everything natural, as negation of life, as sickness and habitual weakness—weakening as the renunciation of revenge, of resistance, of enmity and wrath. The error in treatment: one does not want to fight weakness with a système fortifiant,²⁶ but rather with a kind of justification and moralization; i.e., with an interpretation.— —Two totally different states confounded: e.g., the calm of strength, which is essentially forbearance from reaction (type of the gods whom nothing moves)—and the calm of exhaustion, rigidity to the point of anesthesia. All philosophic-ascetic procedures aim at the second, but really intend the former—for they attribute predicates to the attained state as if a divine state had been attained.

48 (March-June 1888)

The most dangerous misunderstanding.— One concept apparently permits no confusion or ambiguity: that of exhaustion. Exhaustion can be acquired or inherited—in any case it changes the aspect of things, the value of things.— As opposed to those who, from the fullness they represent and feel, involuntarily give to things and see them fuller, more powerful, and pregnant with future—who at least are able to bestow something—the exhausted diminish and botch all they see—they impoverish the value: they are harmful.— About this no mistake seems possible: yet history contains the gruesome fact that the exhausted have always been mistaken for the fullest—and the fullest for the most harmful. Those poor in life, the weak, impoverish life; those rich in life, the strong, enrich it. The first are parasites of life; the second give presents to it.— How is it possible to confound these two? When the exhausted appeared with the gesture of the highest activity and energy (when degeneration effected an excess of spiritual and nervous discharge), they were mistaken for the rich. They excited fear.— The cult of the fool is always the cult of those rich in life, the powerful. The fanatic, the possessed, the religious epileptic, all eccentrics have been experienced as the highest types of power: as divine. This kind of strength that excites fear was considered preeminently divine: here was the origin of authority; here one interpreted, heard, sought wisdom.— This led to the development, almost everywhere, of a will to “deify,” i.e., a will to the typical degeneration of spirit, body, and nerves: an attempt to find the way to this higher level of being. To make oneself sick, mad, to provoke the symptoms of derangement and ruin—that was taken for becoming stronger, more superhuman, more terrible, wiser.²⁷ One thought that in this way one became so rich in power that one could give from one’s fullness. Wherever one adored one sought one who could give. Here the experience of intoxication proved misleading. This increases the feeling of power in the highest degree—therefore, naively judged, power itself. On the highest rung of power one placed the most intoxicated, the ecstatic. (—There are two sources of intoxication: the over-great fullness of life and a state of pathological nourishment of the brain.)²⁸

49 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Acquired, not inherited, exhaustion: (1) Inadequate nourishment, often from ignorance about nourishment; e.g., among scholars. (2) Erotic precociousness: the curse in particular of French youth, above all in Paris, who emerge into the world from their lycées botched and soiled and never free themselves again from the chain of contemptible inclinations, ironical and disdainful toward themselves—galley slaves with all refinements (incidentally, in most cases already a symptom of the decadence of race and family, like all hypersensitivity; also the contagion of the milieu—to let oneself be determined by one's environment is decadent). (3) Alcoholism—not the instinct but the habit, the stupid imitation, the cowardly or vain assimilation to a dominant regime: What a blessing a Jew is among Germans! How much dullness, how blond the head, how blue the eye; the lack of esprit in face, word, posture; the lazy stretching-oneself, the German need for a good rest—not prompted by overwork but by the disgusting stimulation and overstimulation through alcoholica.— 50 (1888) Theory of exhaustion.— Vice, the mentally ill (resp., the artists—), the criminals, the anarchists—these are not the oppressed classes but the scum of previous society of all classes.— Realizing that all our classes are permeated by these elements, we understand that modern society is no “society,” no “body,” but a sick conglomerate of chandalas—a society that no longer has the strength to excrete. To what extent sickliness, owing to the symbiosis of centuries, goes much deeper:

51 (March-June 1888)

The state of corruption.— To understand how all forms of corruption belong together, without forgetting the Christian corruption (Pascal as type) as well as the socialist-communist corruption (a consequence of the Christian—from the point of view of the natural sciences, the socialists' conception of the highest society is the lowest in the order of rank); also the “beyond” corruption: as if outside the actual world, that of becoming, there were another world of being. Here no terms are permissible: here one has to eradicate, annihilate, wage war; everywhere the Christian-nihilistic value standard still has to be pulled up and fought under every mask; e.g., in present-day sociology, in present-day music, in present-day pessimism (all of them forms of the Christian value ideal). Either the one is true or the other: true here means elevating the type of man. The priest, the shepherd of souls, as objectionable forms of existence. All of education to date, helpless, untenable, without center of gravity, stained by the contradiction of values.

52 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Nature is not immoral when it has no pity for the degenerate: on the contrary, the growth of physiological and moral ills among mankind is the consequence of a pathological and unnatural morality. The sensibility of the majority of men is pathological and unnatural. Why is it that mankind is corrupt morally and physiologically?— The body perishes when an organ is altered. The right of altruism cannot be derived from physiology; nor can the right to help and to an equality of lots: these are prizes for the degenerate and underprivileged. There is no solidarity in a society in which there are sterile, unproductive, and destructive elements—which, incidentally, will have descendants even more degenerate than they are themselves.

53 (March-June 1888)

Even the ideals of science can be deeply, yet completely unconsciously influenced by decadence: our entire sociology is proof of that. The objection to it is that from experience it knows only the form of the decay of society, and inevitably it takes its own instincts of decay for the norms of sociological judgment. In these norms the life that is declining in present-day Europe formulates its social ideals: one cannot tell them from the ideals of old races that have outlived themselves.— The herd instinct, then—a power that has now become sovereign—is something totally different from the instinct of an aristocratic society: and the value of the units determines the significance of the sum.— Our entire sociology simply does not know any other instinct than that of the herd, i.e., that of the sum of zeroes—where every zero has “equal rights,” where it is virtuous to be zero.— The valuation that is today applied to the different forms of society is entirely identical with that which assigns a higher value to peace than to war: but this judgment is antibiological, is itself a fruit of the decadence of life.— Life is a consequence of war, society itself a means to war.— As a biologist, Mr. Herbert Spencer is a decadent; as a moralist, too (he considers the triumph of altruism a desideratum! ! !).29

54 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

It is my good fortune that after whole millennia of error and confusion I have rediscovered the way that leads to a Yes and a No. I teach the No to all that makes weak—that exhausts. I teach the Yes to all that strengthens, that stores up strength, that justifies the feeling of strength. So far one has taught neither the one nor the other: virtue has been taught, mortification of the self, pity, even the negation of life. All these are the values of the exhausted. Prolonged reflection on the physiology of exhaustion forced me to ask to what extent the judgments of the exhausted had penetrated the world of values. My result was as surprising as possible, even for me who was at home in many a strange world: I found that all of the supreme value judgments—all that have come to dominate mankind, at least that part that has become tame—can be derived from the judgments of the exhausted. Under the holiest names I pulled up destructive tendencies; one has called God what weakens, teaches weakness, infects with weakness.— I found that the “good man” is one of the forms in which decadence affirms itself. That virtue of which Schopenhauer still taught that it is the supreme, the only virtue, and the basis of all virtues—precisely pity I recognized as more dangerous than any vice. To cross as a matter of principle selection in the species and its purification of refuse—that has so far been called virtue par excellence.— One should respect fatality—that fatality that says to the weak: perish!— One has called it God—that one resisted fatality, that one corrupted mankind and made it rot.— One should not use the name of God in vain.— The race is corrupted—not by its vices but by its ignorance; it is corrupted because it did not recognize exhaustion as exhaustion: mistakes about physiological states are the source of all ills.— Virtue is our greatest misunderstanding. Problem: How did the exhausted come to make the laws about values? Put differently: How did those come to power who are the last?— How did the instinct of the human animal come to stand on its head?—30 55 (June 10, 1887)³¹ Extreme positions are not succeeded by moderate ones but by extreme positions of the opposite kind. Thus the belief in the absolute immorality of nature, in aim- and meaninglessness, is the psychologically necessary affect once the belief in God and an essentially moral order becomes untenable. Nihilism appears at that point, not that the displeasure at existence has become greater than before but because one has come to mistrust any “meaning” in suffering, indeed in existence. One interpretation has collapsed; but because it was considered the interpretation it now seems as if there were no meaning at all in existence, as if everything were in vain. * That this “in vain” constitutes the character of present-day nihilism remains to be shown. The mistrust of our previous valuations grows until it becomes the question: “Are not all ‘values’ lures that draw out the comedy without bringing it closer to a solution?” Duration “in vain,” without end or aim, is the most paralyzing idea, particularly when one understands that one is being fooled and yet lacks the power not to be fooled. * Let us think this thought in its most terrible form: existence as it is, without meaning or aim, yet recurring inevitably without any finale of nothingness: “the eternal recurrence.”³² This is the most extreme form of nihilism: the nothing (the “meaningless”), eternally! The European form of Buddhism: the energy of knowledge and strength compels this belief. It is the most scientific of all possible hypotheses. We deny end goals: if existence had one it would have to have been reached. * So one understands that an antithesis to pantheism is attempted here: for “everything perfect, divine, eternal” also compels a faith in the “eternal recurrence.” Question: does morality make impossible this pantheistic affirmation of all things, too? At bottom, it is only the moral god that has been overcome. Does it make sense to conceive a god “beyond good and evil”? Would a pantheism in this sense be possible? Can we remove the idea of a goal from the process and then affirm the process in spite of this?— This would be the case if something were attained at every moment within this process—and always the same. Spinoza reached such an affirmative position in so far as every moment has a logical necessity, and with his basic instinct, which was logical, he felt a sense of triumph that the world should be constituted that way. * But his case is only a single case. Every basic character trait that is encountered at the bottom of every event, that finds expression in every event, would have to lead every individual who experienced it as his own basic character trait to welcome every moment of universal existence with a sense of triumph. The crucial point would be that one experienced this basic character trait in oneself as good, valuable—with pleasure. * It was morality that protected life against despair and the leap into nothing, among men and classes who were violated and oppressed by men: for it is the experience of being powerless against men, not against nature, that generates the most desperate embitterment against existence. Morality treated the violent despots, the doers of violence, the “masters” in general as the enemies against whom the common man must be protected, which means first of all encouraged and strengthened. Morality consequently taught men to hate and despise most profoundly what is the basic character trait of those who rule: their will to power. To abolish, deny, and dissolve this morality—that would mean looking at the best-hated drive with an opposite feeling and valuation. If the suffering and oppressed lost the faith that they have the right to despise the will to power, they would enter the phase of hopeless despair. This would be the case if this trait were essential to life and it could be shown that even in this will to morality this very “will to power” were hidden, and even this hatred and contempt were still a will to power. The oppressed would come to see that they were on the same plain with the oppressors, without prerogative, without higher rank. * Rather the opposite! There is nothing to life that has value, except the degree of power—assuming that life itself is the will to power. Morality guarded the underprivileged against nihilism by assigning to each an infinite value, a metaphysical value, and by placing each in an order that did not agree with the worldly order of rank and power: it taught resignation, meekness, etc. Supposing that the faith in this morality would perish, then the underprivileged would no longer have their comfort—and they would perish. * This perishing takes the form of self-destruction—the instinctive selection of that which must destroy. Symptoms of this self-destruction of the underprivileged: self-vivisection, poisoning, intoxication, romanticism, above all the instinctive need for actions that turn the powerful into mortal enemies (as it were, one breeds one's own hangmen); the will to destruction as the will of a still deeper instinct, the instinct of self-destruction, the will for nothingness. * Nihilism as a symptom that the underprivileged have no comfort left; that they destroy in order to be destroyed; that without morality they no longer have any reason to “resign themselves”—that they place themselves on the plain of the opposite principle and also want power by compelling the powerful to become their hangmen. This is the European form of Buddhism—doing No after all existence has lost its “meaning.” * It is not that “distress” has grown: on the contrary. “God, morality, resignation,” were remedies on terribly low rungs of misery: active nihilism appears in relatively much more favorable conditions. The feeling that morality has been overcome presupposes a fair degree of spiritual culture, and this in turn that one is relatively well off. A certain spiritual weariness that, owing to the long fight of philosophical opinions, has reached the most hopeless skepticism regarding all philosophy, is another sign of the by no means low position of these nihilists. Consider the situation in which the Buddha appeared. The doctrine of the eternal recurrence would have scholarly presuppositions (as did the Buddha's doctrine; e.g., the concept of causality, etc.). * What does “underprivileged” mean? Above all, physiologically—no longer politically. The unhealthiest kind of man in Europe (in all classes) furnishes the soil for this nihilism: they will experience the belief in the eternal recurrence as a curse, struck by which one no longer shrinks from any action; not to be extinguished passively but to extinguish everything that is so aim- and meaningless, although this is a mere convulsion, a blind rage at the insight that everything has been for eternities—even this moment of nihilism and lust for destruction.—It is the value of such a crisis that it purifies, that it pushes together related elements to perish of each other, that it assigns common tasks to men who have opposite ways of thinking—and it also brings to light the weaker and less secure among them and thus promotes an order of rank according to strength, from the point of view of health: those who command are recognized as those who command, those who obey as those who obey. Of course, outside every existing social order. * Who will prove to be the strongest in the course of this? The most moderate; those who do not require any extreme articles of faith; those who not only concede but love a fair amount of accidents and nonsense; those who can think of man with a considerable reduction of his value without becoming small and weak on that account: those richest in health who are equal to most misfortunes and therefore not so afraid of misfortunes—human beings who are sure of their power and represent the attained strength of humanity with conscious pride. * How would such a human being even think of the eternal recurrence?

56 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Periods of European Nihilism The period of unclarity, of all kinds of tentative men who would conserve the old without letting go of the new. The period of clarity: one understands that the old and the new are basically opposite, the old values born of declining and the new ones of ascending life—that all the old ideals are hostile to life (born of decadence and agents of decadence, even if in the magnificent Sunday clothes of morality). We understand the old and are far from strong enough for something new. The period of the three great affects: contempt, pity, destruction. The period of catastrophe: the advent of a doctrine that sifts men—driving the weak to decisions, and the strong as well— “Nihilism as a normal condition Nihilism: the aim is lacking; ‘why?’ finds no answer What does nihilism mean? That the highest values devalue themselves. “It is ambiguous: “A. Nihilism as a sign of increased power of the spirit: active nihilism. “It can be a sign of strength:...” (See Podach Ein Blick in Notizbücher Nietzsches, Heidelberg, Wolfgang Rothe, 1963, pp 205 f. In Schlechta’s edition the note appears in four parts, in the same sequence as in the standard editions: 2, 13, 22, and 23. For further discussion of Podach and Schlechta see Kaufmann, “Nietzsche in the Light of his Suppressed Manuscripts,” in Journal of the History of Philosophy, October 1964 (II 2), pp. 205-225. “with the same amount of energy with which we used to be Christians—with which the absurd exaggeration of the Christian...” This sentence breaks off, but a few other phrases follow: “(1) the immortal soul”; the eternal value of the ‘person’— (2) the solution, the judgment the evaluation in the ‘beyond’— (3) moral values as the supreme values, the ‘salvation of the soul’ as one’s cardinal interest— (4) ‘sin,’ ‘earthly,’ ‘flesh,’ ‘appetites’ stigmatized as ‘world’ ” 18 “A gay monster is worth more than a sentimental bore.” Cf. section 91 below. 21 “Sodass sie mitklingt”: Cf. Rilke’s famous “Liebes-Lied” (1907), reprinted with translation in Walter Kaufmann, Twenty German Poets; also, Thus Spoke Zarathustra IV (pity as Zarathustra’s great temptation), in Portable Nietzsche. 26 A method that strengthens. According to 1911, pp 498 f, this note is superscribed “A Preface” and has the appearance of a quick draft—and “a few paragraphs that did not fit well into the context had to be omitted” The original version of the second paragraph read: “Vice is whatever weakens—whatever exhausts” And the next paragraph: “Conversely, I call good whatever makes strong, whatever stores.” And the following passages were omitted by the original editor: “I have to teach first of all that crime, celibacy, and sickness are consequences of exhaustion. [Nietzsche himself, of course, was celibate and far from well.] “Plunging down—negating life—that, too, was supposed to be experienced as a kind of sunrise transfiguration, deification. “I want to make the concept of ‘progress’ more precise and am afraid that toward that end I have to fly in the face of modern ideas (but I am comforted by the fact that they really have no faces but only masks). “Diseased limbs should be amputated: the first moral of society. “A correction of the instincts: their detachment from ignorance— “I despise those who demand of society that it ought to protect itself from those who would harm it. That is not enough by a long shot. Society is a body in which no member may be diseased without endangering the whole. A diseased member that corrupts [the reading of this word is not certain] has to be amputated: I shall name the amputable types of society.” II. HISTORY OF EUROPEAN NIHILISM 57 (1884) My friends, it was hard for us when we were young: we suffered youth itself like a serious sickness. That is due to the time into which we have been thrown—a time of extensive inner decay and disintegration, a time that with all its weaknesses, and even with its best strength, opposes the spirit of youth. Disintegration characterizes this time, and thus uncertainty: nothing stands firmly on its feet or on a hard faith in itself; one lives for tomorrow, as the day after tomorrow is dubious.³⁴ Everything on our way is slippery and dangerous, and the ice that still supports us has become thin: all of us feel the warm, uncanny breath of the thawing wind;³⁵ where we still walk, soon no one will be able to walk. 58 (1885-1888) If this is not an age of decay and declining vitality, it is at least one of headlong and arbitrary experimentation:—and it is probable that a superabundance of bungled experiments should create an overall impression as of decay—and perhaps even decay itself. 59 (1885-1886) Toward a History of the Modern Eclipse The state nomads (civil servants, etc.): without home. The decline of the family. The “good man” as a symptom of exhaustion. Justice as will to power (breeding). Lasciviousness and neurosis. Black music: whither refreshing music? The anarchist. Contempt for man, nausea. Deepest difference: whether hunger or overabundance becomes creative? The former generates the ideals of romanticism.³⁷ Nordic unnaturalness. The need for alcoholica: the “distress” of the workers. Philosophical nihilism. 60 (1885) The slow emergence and rise of the middle and lower classes (including the lower kind of spirit and body), of which one finds many preludes before the French Revolution—and it would have taken place without the Revolution, too—on the whole, then, the predominance of the herd over all shepherds and bellwethers—involves eclipse of the spirit (the fusion of a Stoic and a frivolous appearance of happiness, characteristic of noble cultures, decreases; one lets much suffering be seen and heard that one formerly bore and hid); moral hypocrisy (a way of wishing to distinguish oneself not by means of morality, but by means of the herd virtues: pity, consideration, moderation, which are not recognized and honored outside the herd ability); a really great amount of shared suffering (pity) and joy (the pleasure in large-scale associations found in all herd animals—“community spirit,” “Fatherland,” everything in which the individual does not count).

61 (Summer-Fall 1883)

Our time, with its aspiration to remedy and prevent accidental distresses and to wage preventive war against disagreeable possibilities, is a time of the poor. Our “rich”—are poorest of all. The true purpose of all riches is forgotten.

62 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Critique of modern man (his moralistic mendaciousness):³⁸ —the “good man” corrupted and seduced by bad institutions (tyrants and priests); —reason as authority; —history as overcoming of errors; —the future as progress; —the Christian state (“the Lord of hosts”); —the Christian sex impulse (or marriage); —the kingdom of “justice” (the cult of “humanity”); —“freedom.” The romantic pose of modern man: —the noble man (Byron, Victor Hugo, George Sand); —noble indignation; —consecration through passion (as true “nature”); —siding with the oppressed and underprivileged: motto of the historians and novelists; —the Stoics of duty; —selflessness as art and knowledge; —altruism as the most mendacious form of egoism (utilitarianism), most sentimental egoism. All this is eighteenth century. What, on the other hand, has not been inherited from it: insouciance, cheerfulness, elegance, brightness of the spirit. The tempo of the spirit has changed; the enjoyment of refinement and clarity of the spirit has given place to the enjoyment of color, harmony, mass, reality, etc. Sensualism in matters of the spirit. In short, it is the eighteenth century of Rousseau.

63 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

On the whole, a tremendous quantum of humaneness has been attained in present-day mankind. That this is not felt generally is itself a proof: we have become so sensitive concerning small states of distress that we unjustly ignore what has been attained. Here one must make allowance for the existence of much decadence, and seen with such eyes our world has to look wretched and miserable. But such eyes have at all times seen the same things: a certain overirritation even of the moral feelings; the quantum of embitterment and eclipse that pessimism carries into judgments: these two together account for the predominance of the opposite notion, that our morality is in a bad way. The fact of credit, of worldwide trade, of the means of transportation—here a tremendous mild trust in man finds expression.— Another contributing factor is the emancipation of science from moral and religious purposes: a very good sign that, however, is usually misunderstood. In my own way I attempt a justification of history.

64 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The second Buddhism. The nihilistic catastrophe that finishes Indian culture.— Early signs of it: The immense increase of pity. Spiritual weariness. The reduction of problems to questions of pleasure and displeasure. The war glory that provokes a counterstroke. Just as national demarcation provokes a countermovement, the most cordial “fraternity.” The impossibility for religion to go on working with dogmas and fables.

65 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

What is attacked deep down today is the instinct and the will of tradition: all institutions that owe their origins to this instinct violate the taste of the modern spirit.— At bottom, nothing is thought and done without the purpose of eradicating this sense for tradition. One considers tradition a fatality; one studies it, recognizes it (as “heredity”), but one does not want it. The tensing of a will over long temporal distances, the selection of the states and valuations that allow one to dispose of future centuries—precisely this is antimodern in the highest degree. Which goes to show that it is the disorganizing principles that give our age its character.

66 (Spring-Fall 1887)

“Be simple!”—for us complicated and elusive triers of the reins a demand that is a simple stupidity.— Be natural! But how if one happens to be “unnatural”? 67 (1884) The former means for obtaining homogeneous, enduring characters for long generations: unalienable landed property, honoring the old (origin of the belief in gods and heroes as ancestors). Now the breaking up of landed property belongs to the opposite tendency: newspapers (in place of daily prayers), railway, telegraph. Centralization of a tremendous number of different interests in a single soul, which for that reason must be very strong and protean.

68 (March-June 1888)

Why everything turns into histrionics.— Modern man lacks: the sure instinct (consequence of a long homogeneous form of activity of one kind of man); the inability to achieve anything perfect is merely a consequence of this: as an individual one can never make up for lost schooling. That which creates a morality, a code of laws: the profound instinct that only automatism makes possible perfection in life and creation. But now we have reached the opposite point; indeed, we wanted to reach it: the most extreme consciousness, man's ability to see through himself and history. With this we are practically as far as possible from perfection in being, doing, and willing: our desire, even our will for knowledge is a symptom of a tremendous decadence. We strive for the opposite of that which strong races, strong natures want—understanding is an ending.— That science is possible in this sense that is cultivated today is proof that all elementary instincts, life's instincts of self-defense and protection, no longer function. We no longer collect, we squander the capital of our ancestors, even in the way in which we seek knowledge.— 69 (1885-1886)39 Nihilistic Trait a. In the natural sciences ("meaninglessness"); causalism, mechanism. "Lawfulness" an entr'acte, a residue. b. Ditto in politics: one lacks the faith in one's right, innocence; mendaciousness rules and serving the moment. c. Ditto in economics: the abolition of slavery. The lack of a redeeming class, one that justifies—advent of anarchism. "Education"? d. Ditto in history: fatalism, Darwinism; the final attempts to read reason and divinity into it fail. Sentimentality in face of the past; one could not endure a biography!— (Here, too, phenomenism: character as a mask; there are no facts.) e. Ditto in art: romanticism and its counterstroke (aversion against romantic ideals and lies). The latter, moral as a sense of greater truthfulness, but pessimistic. Pure "artists" (indifferent toward content). (Father-confessor psychology and puritan psychology, two forms of psychological romanticism: but even its counterproposal, the attempt to adopt a purely artistic attitude toward man—even there the opposite valuation is not yet ventured!) 70 (1885-1886) Against the doctrine of the influence of the milieu and external causes: the force within is infinitely superior; much that looks like external influence is merely its adaptation from within. The very same milieus can be interpreted and exploited in opposite ways: there are no facts.— A genius is not explained in terms of such conditions of his origin.40

71 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

“Modernity” in the perspective of the metaphor of nourishment and digestion.—Sensibility immensely more irritable (—dressed up moralistically: the increase in pity—); the abundance of disparate impressions greater than ever: cosmopolitanism in foods, literatures, newspapers, forms, tastes, even landscapes. The tempo of this influx prestissimo; the impressions erase each other; one instinctively resists taking in anything, taking anything deeply, to “digest” anything; a weakening of the power to digest results from this. A kind of adaptation to this flood of impressions takes place: men unlearn spontaneous action, they merely react to stimuli from outside. They spend their strength partly in assimilating things, partly in defense, partly in opposition. Profound weakening of spontaneity: the historian, critic, analyst, the interpreter, the observer, the collector, the reader—all of them reactive talents—all science! Artificial change of one’s nature into a “mirror”; interested but, as it were, merely epidermically interested; a coolness on principle, a balance, a fixed low temperature closely underneath the thin surface on which warmth, movement, “tempest,” and the play of waves are encountered. Opposition of external mobility and a certain deep heaviness and weariness.

72 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Where does our modern world belong—to exhaustion or ascent?— Its manifoldness and unrest conditioned by the attainment of the highest level of consciousness.

73 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Overwork, curiosity and sympathy—our modern vices.

74 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Toward a characterization of “modernity.”— Overabundant development of intermediary forms; atrophy of types; traditions break off, schools; the overlordship of the instincts (prepared philosophically: the unconscious worth more) after the will power, the willing of end and means, has been weakened. 75 (1885) An able craftsman or scholar cuts a fine figure when he takes pride in his art and looks on life content and satisfied. But nothing looks more wretched than when a shoemaker or schoolmaster gives us to understand with a suffering mien that he was really born for something better. There is nothing better than what is good— and good is having some ability and using that to create, Tüchtigkeit or virtù in the Italian Renaissance sense. Today, in our time when the state has an absurdly fat stomach, there are in all fields and departments, in addition to the real workers, also “representatives”; e g, besides the scholars also scribblers, besides the suffering classes also garrulous, boastful ne’er-do-wells who “represent” this suffering, not to speak of the professional politicians who are well off while “representing” distress with powerful lungs before a parliament Our modern life is extremely expensive owing to the large number of intermediaries; in an ancient city, on the other hand, and, echoing that, also in many cities in Spain and Italy, one appeared oneself and would have given a hoot to such modern representatives and intermediaries—or a kick!

76 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The predominance of dealers and intermediaries in spiritual matters, too: the scribbler, the “representative,” the historian (who fuses past and present), the exotician and cosmopolitan, the intermediaries between science and philosophy, the semitheologians. 77 (1883-1888) Nothing to date has nauseated me more than the parasites of the spirit: in our unhealthy Europe one already finds them everywhere—and they have the best conscience in the world. Perhaps a little dim, a little air pessimiste, but in the main voracious, dirty, dirtying, creeping in, nestling, thievish, scurvy—and as innocent as all little sinners and microbes They live off the fact that other people have spirit and squander it: they know that it is of the very essence of the rich spirit to squander itself carelessly, without petty caution, from day to day.— For the spirit is a bad householder and pays no heed to how everybody lives and feeds on it. 78 (1885-1886) Histrionics The colorfulness of modern man and its charm. Essentially concealment and satiety. The scribbler. The politician (in “the nationalist swindle”). Histrionics in the arts: lack of probity in prior training and schooling (Fromentin),⁴¹ the romantics (lack of philosophy and science and superabundance of literature); the novelists (Walter Scott, but also the Nibelungen monsters along with the most nervous music); the lyric poets. Being “scientific.” Virtuosos (Jews). Popular ideals overcome, but not yet in the eyes of the people: the saint, the sage, the prophet.

79 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The modern spirit's lack of discipline, dressed up in all sorts of moral fashions.
— The showy words are: tolerance (for “the incapacity for Yes and No”); la largeur de sympathie (= one-third indifference, one-third curiosity, one-third pathological irritability); “objectivity” (lack of personality, lack of will, incapacity for “love”); “freedom” versus rules (romanticism); “truth” versus forgery and lies (naturalism); being “scientific” (the “document humain”: in other words, the novel of colportage and addition in place of composition); “passion” meaning disorder and immoderation; “depth” meaning confusion, the profuse chaos of symbols.

80 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Toward a critique of the big words — I am full of suspicion and malice against what they call “ideals”: this is my pessimism, to have recognized how the “higher feelings” are a source of misfortune and man’s loss of value. One is deceived every time one expects “progress” from an ideal; every time so far the victory of the ideal has meant a retrograde movement. Christianity, the revolution, the abolition of slavery, equal rights, philanthropy, love of peace, justice, truth: all these big words have value only in a fight, as flags: not as realities but as showy words for something quite different (indeed, opposite!).⁴³ 81 (1883-1888) One knows the kind of human being who has fallen in love with the motto, tout comprendre c’est tout pardonner.⁴⁴ It is the weak, it is above all the disappointed: if there is something to be forgiven in all, perhaps there is also something to be despised in all. It is the philosophy of disappointment that wraps itself so humanely in pity and looks sweet. These are romantics whose faith flew the coop: now they at least want to watch how everything passes and goes. They call it l’art pour l’art, “objectivity,” etc.

82 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Chief symptoms of pessimism: the dîners chez Magny;⁴⁵ Russian pessimism (Tolstoy, Dostoevsky); aesthetic pessimism, l'art pour l'art, "description" (romantic and antiromantic pessimism); epistemological pessimism (Schopenhauer, phenomenism); anarchistic pessimism; the "religion of pity," Buddhistic premovement; cultural pessimism (exoticism, cosmopolitanism); moralistic pessimism: I myself.

83 (Spring-Fall 1887)

“Without the Christian faith,” Pascal thought, “you, no less than nature and history, will become for yourselves un monstre et un chaos.” This prophecy we have fulfilled, after the feeble-optimistic eighteenth century had prettified and rationalized man. Schopenhauer and Pascal.— In an important sense, Schopenhauer is the first to take up again the movement of Pascal: un monstre et un chaos, consequently something to be negated.— History, nature, man himself. “Our inability to know the truth is the consequence of our corruption, our moral decay”; thus Pascal. And thus, at bottom, Schopenhauer. “The deeper the corruption of reason, the more necessary the doctrine of salvation”—or, in Schopenhauer’s terms, negation.

84 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Schopenhauer as throwback (state before the revolution): Pity, sensuality, art, weakness of the will, Catholicism of spiritual cravings—that is good eighteenth century au fond.⁴⁶ Schopenhauer's basic misunderstanding of the will (as if craving, instinct, drive were the essence of will) is typical: lowering the value of the will to the point of making a real mistake. Also hatred against willing; attempt to see something higher, indeed that which is higher and valuable, in willing no more, in "being a subject without aim and purpose" (in the "pure subject free of will"). Great symptom of the exhaustion or the weakness of the will: for the will is precisely that which treats cravings as their master and appoints to them their way and measure.⁴⁷

85 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The unworthy attempt has been made to see Wagner and Schopenhauer as types of mental illness: one would gain an incomparably more essential insight by making more precise scientifically the type of decadence both represent. 86 (1888) Your Henrik Ibsen has become very clear to me. For all his robust idealism and “will to truth” he did not dare to liberate himself from the illusionism of morality that speaks of “freedom” without wishing to admit to itself what freedom is: the second stage in the metamorphosis of the “will to power”—for those who lack freedom. On the first stage one demands justice from those who are in power. On the second, one speaks of “freedom”—that is, one wants to get away from those in power. On the third, one speaks of “equal rights”—that is, as long as one has not yet gained superiority one wants to prevent one’s competitors from growing in power.

87 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Decline of Protestantism: understood as a halfway house both theoretically and historically. Actual superiority of Catholicism; the feeling of Protestantism extinguished to such an extent that the strongest anti-Protestant movements are no longer experienced as such (for example, Wagner's Parsifal). All of the higher regions of the spirit in France are Catholic in their instincts; Bismarck realizes that Protestantism simply doesn't exist any more.

88 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Protestantism, that spiritually unclean and boring form of decadence in which Christianity has been able so far to preserve itself in the mediocre north: valuable for knowledge as something complex and a halfway house, in so far as it brought together in the same heads experiences of different orders and origins.

89 (March-June 1888)

How did the German spirit transform Christianity!— And to stick to Protestantism: how much beer there is in Protestant Christianity! Can one even imagine a spiritually staler, lazier, more comfortably relaxed form of the Christian faith than that of the average Protestant in Germany?⁴⁹ That's what I call a modest version of Christianity! A homoeopathy of Christianity is what I call it. One reminds me that today we also encounter an immodest Protestantism—that of the court chaplains and anti-Semitic speculators: but nobody has claimed yet that any “spirit” whatever “moved” on the faces of these waters.— That is merely a more indecent form of Christianity, by no means more sensible.

90 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Progress.— Let us not be deceived! Time marches forward; we'd like to believe that everything that is in it also marches forward—that the development is one that moves forward. The most level-headed are led astray by this illusion. But the nineteenth century does not represent progress over the sixteenth; and the German spirit of 1888 represents a regress from the German spirit of 1788. "Mankind" does not advance, it does not even exist. The overall aspect is that of a tremendous experimental laboratory in which a few successes are scored, scattered throughout all ages, while there are untold failures, and all order, logic, union, and obligingness are lacking. How can we fail to recognize that the ascent of Christianity is a movement of decadence?— That the German Reformation is a recrudescence of Christian barbarism?— That the Revolution destroyed the instinct for a grand organization of society? Man represents no progress over the animal: the civilized tenderfoot is an abortion compared to the Arab and Corsican; the Chinese is a more successful type, namely more durable, than the European. 91 (1885) On German Pessimism The eclipse, the pessimistic coloring, comes necessarily in the wake of the Enlightenment. Around 1770 the decline of cheerfulness began to be noticed; women, with that feminine instinct which always sides with virtue, supposed that immorality was the cause. Galiani hit the nail on the head: he cites Voltaire's verse: Un monstre gai vaut mieux Qu'un sentimental ennuyeux.⁵³ When I believe now that I am a few centuries ahead in Enlightenment not only of Voltaire but even of Galiani, who was far pro-founder—how far must I have got in the increase of darkness!⁵⁴ And this is really the case, and I bewared in time, with some sort of regret, of the German and Christian narrowness and inconsequence of pessimism à la Schopenhauer or, worse, Leopardi, and sought out the most quintessential forms (Asia).⁵⁵ But in order to endure this type of extreme pessimism (it can be perceived here and there in my Birth of Tragedy) and to live alone "without God and morality" I had to invent a counterpart for myself. Perhaps I know best why man alone laughs: he alone suffers so deeply that he had to invent laughter. The unhappiest and most melancholy animal is, as fitting, the most cheerful. 92 (1883-1888) Regarding German culture, I have always had the feeling of decline. This fact, that I first became acquainted with a type in decline, has often made me unfair to the whole phenomenon of European culture. The Germans always come after the others, much later: they are carrying something in the depths; e.g.,— Dependence on other countries; e.g., Kant—Rousseau, Sensualists, Hume, Swedenborg. Schopenhauer—Indians and romanticism, Voltaire. Wagner— French cult of the gruesome and of grand opera, Paris and the flight into primeval states (marriage with the sister). —The law of the latecomers (province to Paris, Germany to France). Why the Germans of all people discovered the Greek spirit (the more one develops a drive, the more attractive does it become to plunge for once into its opposite). Music is swan song.⁵⁶

93 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Renaissance and Reformation.— What does the Renaissance prove? That the reign of the individual has to be brief. The squandering is too great; the very possibility of collecting and capitalizing is lacking; and exhaustion follows immediately. These are times when everything is spent, when the very strength is spent with which one collects, capitalizes, and piles riches upon riches.— Even the opponents of such movements are forced into an absurd waste of energy; they, too, soon become exhausted, spent, desolate. In the Reformation we possess a wild and vulgar counterpart to the Italian Renaissance, born of related impulses; only in the retarded north, which had remained coarse, they had to don a religious disguise; for there the concept of the higher life had not yet detached itself from that of the religious life. Through the Reformation, too, the individual sought freedom; “everybody his own priest” is also a mere formula of libertinage. In truth, one word was enough—“evangelical freedom”—and all instincts that had reason to remain hidden broke out like wild dogs, the most brutal requirements suddenly acquired the courage to face themselves, and everything seemed justified.— One was careful not to understand what liberty one had really meant at bottom; one shut one’s eyes before oneself.— But shutting one’s eyes and moistening one’s lips with enthusiastic orations did not prevent one’s hands from grasping whatever could be grabbed, and the belly became the god of the “free evangel,” and all the cravings of revenge and envy satisfied themselves with insatiable rage.— This took a while; then exhaustion set in, just as it had in the south of Europe—and here, too, a vulgar kind of exhaustion, a general ruere in servitium.⁵⁷— The indecent century of Germany arrived.— 94 (1884) Chivalry as the conquered position of power: its gradual breaking up (and in part transition into what is more spread out, bourgeois). In La Rochefoucauld we find a consciousness of the true motive springs of noblesse of the mind—and a view of these motive springs that is darkened by Christianity. The French Revolution as the continuation of Christianity. Rousseau is the seducer: he again unfetters woman who is henceforth represented in an ever more interesting manner—as suffering. Then the slaves and Mrs. Beecher-Stowe. Then the poor and the workers. Then the vice addicts and the sick—all this is moved into the foreground (even to develop sympathy for the genius one no longer knows any other way for the past five hundred years than to represent him as the bearer of great suffering!). Next come the curse on voluptuousness (Baudelaire and Schopenhauer); the most decided conviction that the lust to rule is the greatest vice;⁵⁸ the perfect certainty that morality and disinterestedness are identical concepts and that the “happiness of all” is a goal worth striving for (i.e., the kingdom of heaven of Christ). We are well along on the way: the kingdom of heaven of the poor in spirit has begun.— Intermediary stages: the bourgeois (a parvenu on account of money) and the worker (on account of the machine).

Comparison of Greek culture and that of the French in the age of Louis XIV.
Decided faith in oneself. A leisure class whose members make things difficult for themselves and exercise much self-overcoming. The power of form, the will to give form to oneself. "Happiness" admitted as a goal. Much strength and energy behind the emphasis on forms. The delight in looking at a life that seems so easy.
— To the French, the Greeks looked like children.

95 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The Three Centuries Their different sensibilities are best expressed thus:

Aristocratism: Descartes, rule of reason, testimony of the sovereignty of the will;

Feminism: Rousseau, rule of feeling, testimony of the sovereignty of the senses, mendacious; Animalism: Schopenhauer, rule of craving, testimony of the sovereignty of animality, more honest but gloomy. The seventeenth century is aristocratic, imposes order, looks down haughtily upon the animalic, is severe against the heart, not cozy, without sentiment, “un-German,” averse to what is burlesque and what is natural, inclined to generalizations and sovereign confronted with the past—for it believes in itself. Much beast of prey au fond, much ascetic habit to remain master. The century of strong will; also of strong passion. The eighteenth century is dominated by woman, given to enthusiasm, full of esprit, shallow, but with a spirit in the service of what is desirable, of the heart, libertine in the enjoyment of what is most spiritual, and undermines all authorities; intoxicated, cheerful, clear, humane, false before itself, much canaille au fond, sociable.— The nineteenth century is more animalic and subterranean, uglier, more realistic and vulgar, and precisely for that reason “better,” “more honest,” more submissive before every kind of “reality,” truer; but weak in will, but sad and full of dark cravings, but fatalistic. Not full of awe and reverence for either “reason” or “heart”; deeply convinced of the rule of cravings (Schopenhauer spoke of “will”; but nothing is more characteristic of his philosophy than the absence of all genuine willing). Even morality reduced to one instinct (“pity”). Auguste Comte is a continuation of the eighteenth century (domination of coeur over la tête, sensualism in the theory of knowledge, altruistic enthusiasm). That science has become sovereign to such a degree proves how the nineteenth century has rid itself of the domination of ideals. A certain frugality of desire makes possible our scientific curiosity and severity—which is our kind of virtue.— Romanticism is an echo of the eighteenth century;

a kind of piled-high desire for its enthusiasm in the grand style (as a matter of fact, a good deal of histrionics and self-deception: one wanted to represent strong natures and grand passions). The nineteenth century looks instinctively for theories that seem to justify its fatalistic submission to matters of fact. Already Hegel’s success against “sentimentality” and romantic idealism was due to his fatalistic way of thinking, to his faith in the greater reason on the side of the victorious, to his justification of the actual “state” (in place of “mankind,” etc.).

— Schopenhauer: we are something stupid and, at best, even something that cancels itself.⁵⁹ Success of determinism, of the genealogical derivation of obligations that had formerly been considered absolute, the doctrine of milieu and adaptation, the reduction of will to reflexes, the denial of the will as an “efficient cause”; finally—a real rechristening: one sees so little will that the word becomes free to designate something else. Further theories: the doctrine of objectivity—"will-less" contemplation—as the only road to truth; also to beauty (—also the faith in the "genius" to justify a right to submission); mechanism, the calculable rigidity of the mechanical process; the alleged "naturalism," elimination of the choosing, judging, interpreting subject as a principle— Kant, with his "practical reason" and his moral fanaticism is wholly eighteenth century; still entirely outside the historical movement; without any eye for the actuality of his time, e.g., Revolution; untouched by Greek philosophy; fanciful visionary of the concept of duty; sensualist with the backdrop of the pampering of dogmatism.— The movement back to Kant in our century is a movement back to the eighteenth century: one wants to regain a right to the old ideals and the old enthusiasm—for that reason an epistemology that "sets boundaries," which means that it permits one to posit as one may see fit a beyond of reason.— Hegel's way of thinking is not far different from Goethe's: one needs only to listen to Goethe about Spinoza. Will to deify the universe and life in order to find repose and happiness in contemplation and in getting to the bottom of things; Hegel seeks reason everywhere—before reason one may submit and acquiesce. In Goethe a kind of almost joyous and trusting fatalism that does not revolt, that does not flag, that seeks to form a totality out of himself, in the faith that only in the totality everything redeems itself and appears good and justified.⁶⁰

96 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Period of the Enlightenment—followed by the period of sentimentality. To what extent Schopenhauer belongs to “sentimentality” (Hegel to spirituality).⁶¹

97 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The seventeenth century suffers of man as of a sum of contradictions (“l’amas de contradictions” that we are); it seeks to discover, order, excavate man—while the eighteenth century seeks to forget what is known of man’s nature in order to assimilate him to its utopia. “Superficial, tender, humane”—enthusiastic about “man”—The seventeenth century seeks to erase the tracks of the individual to make the work look as similar to life as possible. The eighteenth uses the work in an attempt to arouse interest in the author. The seventeenth century seeks in art—art, a piece of culture; the eighteenth uses art to make propaganda for reforms of a social and political nature. “Utopia,” the “ideal man,” the deification of nature, the vanity of posing, the subordination to propaganda for social goals, charlatanism—these are our gifts from the eighteenth century. The style of the seventeenth century: propre, exact et libre. The strong individual, self-sufficient or zealously occupied before God—and this modern obtrusiveness of authors who all but leap out at you—these furnish some contrast. “To perform”—compare that with the scholars of Port-Royal. Alfieri had a sense for grand style. Hatred of the burlesque (undignified), lack of a sense for nature belong to the seventeenth century.

98 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Against Rousseau.— Unfortunately, man is no longer evil enough; Rousseau's opponents who say "man is a beast of prey" are unfortunately wrong. Not the corruption of man but the extent to which he has become tender and moralized is his curse.⁶³ Precisely in the sphere that Rousseau fought most violently one could find the relatively still strong and well-turned-out type of man (those in whom the grand affects were still unbroken: will to power, will to enjoyment, will and capacity to command). The man of the eighteenth century has to be compared with the man of the Renaissance (also with the man of the seventeenth century in France), so that one feels what is at stake: Rousseau is a symptom of self self-contempt and heated vanity—both signs that the domineering will is lacking: he moralizes and, as a man of rancor, seeks the cause of his wretchedness in the ruling classes.

99 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Against Rousseau.⁶⁴— The state of nature is terrible, man is a beast of prey; our civilization represents a tremendous triumph over this beast-of-prey nature: thus argued Voltaire. He felt the mitigation, the subtleties, the spiritual joys of the civilized state; he despised narrowmindedness, also in the form of virtue, and the lack of delicatessen, also among ascetics and monks. The moral reprehensibility of man seemed to preoccupy Rousseau; with the words “unjust” and “cruel” one can best stir up the instincts of the oppressed who otherwise smart under the ban of the vetitum and disfavor, so their conscience advises them against rebellious cravings. Such emancipators seek one thing above all: to give their party the grand accents and poses of the higher nature.

100 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Rousseau: the rule based on feeling; nature as the source of justice; man perfects himself to the extent to which he approaches nature (according to Voltaire, to the extent to which he moves away from nature). The very same epochs are for one ages of the progress of humanity; for the other, times when injustice and inequality grow worse. Voltaire still comprehended umanità in the Renaissance sense; also virtù (as “high culture”); he fights for the cause of the “honnêtes gens” and “de la bonne compagnie,”⁶⁵ the cause of taste, of science, of the arts, of progress itself and civilization. The fight began around 1760: the citizen of Geneva and le seigneur de Ferney.⁶⁶ Only from that moment on Voltaire becomes the man of his century, the philosopher, the representative of tolerance and unbelief (till then merely un bel esprit).⁶⁷ Envy and hatred of Rousseau’s success impelled him forward, “to the heights.” Pour “la canaille” un dieu remunerateur et vengeur—Voltaire. Critique of both points of view in regard to the value of civilization. The social invention is for Voltaire the most beautiful there is: there is no higher goal than to maintain and perfect it; precisely this is honnêteté,⁶⁹ to respect social conventions; virtue as obedience to certain necessary “prejudices” in favor of the preservation of “society.” Missionary of culture, aristocrat, representative of the victorious, ruling classes and their valuations. But Rousseau remained a plebeian, also as homme de lettres;⁷⁰ that was unheard of; his impudent contempt of all that was not he himself. What was sick in Rousseau was admired and imitated most. (Lord Byron related to him; also worked himself up into sublime poses and into vindictive rancor; sign of “meanness”; later attained balance through Venice and comprehended what produces more ease and well-being—l’insouciance.)⁷¹ Rousseau is proud in regard to what he is, in spite of his origins; but he is beside himself when one reminds him of it.—Rousseau, beyond a doubt, mentally disturbed; in Voltaire an uncommon health and light touch. The rancor of the sick; the periods of his insanity also those of his contempt of man and his mistrust. The defense of providence by Rousseau (against the pessimism of Voltaire): he needed God in order to be able to cast a curse upon society and civilization; everything had to be good in itself because God had created it; only man has corrupted men. The “good man” as the natural man was pure fantasy; but with the dogma of God’s authorship it seemed probable and well-founded. Romanticism à la Rousseau: passion (“the sovereign right of passion”); “naturalness”; the fascination of madness (folly included in greatness); the absurd vanity of the weak man; the rancor of the mob as judge (“for a hundred years now, a sick man has been accepted as a leader in politics”).⁷²

101 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Kant: makes the epistemological skepticism of the English possible for Germans: by enlisting for it the sympathy of the moral and religious needs of the Germans; just as the later philosophers of the Academy used skepticism for the same reason, as a preparation for Platonism (vide Augustin); and as Pascal used even moralistic skepticism in order to excite the need for faith (“to justify it”); by scholastically involuting and curlicueing it and thus making it acceptable for the German taste regarding scientific form (for Locke and Hume in themselves were too bright, too clear, i.e., judged according to German value instincts, “too superficial”—) Kant: inferior in his psychology and knowledge of human nature; way off when it comes to great historical values (French Revolution); a moral fanatic à la Rousseau; a subterranean Christianity in his values; a dogmatist through and through, but ponderously sick of this inclination, to such an extent that he wished to tyrannize it, but also weary right away of skepticism; not yet touched by the slightest breath of cosmopolitan taste and the beauty of antiquity—a delayer and mediator, nothing original (just as Leibniz mediated and built a bridge between mechanism and spiritualism, as Goethe did between the taste of the eighteenth century and that of the “historical sense” (which is essentially a sense for the exotic), as German music did between French and Italian music, as Charlemagne did between imperium Romanum and nationalism—delayers par excellence.)⁷³

102 (Spring-Fall 1887)

In how far the Christian centuries with their pessimism were stronger centuries than the eighteenth century—like the tragic era of the Greeks. The nineteenth century vis-à-vis the eighteenth century. In what respects heir—in what respects a regression (poorer in “spirit” and taste)—in what respects progress (darker,⁷⁴ more realistic, stronger). 103 (1883-1888)⁷⁵ What does it mean that we have such a feeling for the campagna Romana? And for high mountain ranges? What is the meaning of our nationalism?⁷⁶ Chateaubriand in 1803, in a letter to M. de Fontanes, gives the first impression of the campagna Romana. President de Brosses says of the campagna Romana. “il fallait que Romulus fût ivre, quand il songea à bâtir une ville dans un terrain aussi laid.”⁷⁷ Delacroix, too, did not like Rome, it frightened him. He was enthusiastic about Venice, like Shakespeare, like Byron, like George Sand. This aversion to Rome also in Theoph. Gautier—and in Rich. Wagner. Lamartine has found language for Sorrent and Posilipp. Victor Hugo was enthusiastic about Spain, “parce que aucune autre nation n’a moins emprunté à l’antiquité, parce qu’elle n’a subi aucune influence classique.”⁷⁸

104 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The two great tentative ones, made to overcome the eighteenth century: Napoleon, by awakening again the man, the soldier, and the great fight for power—conceiving Europe as a political unit; Goethe, by imagining a European culture that would harvest the full inheritance of attained humanity. German culture of this century arouses mistrust—in music this full, redeeming and binding element of Goethe is lacking—The Austrians have remained German only by virtue of their music.⁷⁹ 105 (1883-1888) The preponderance of music in the romantics of 1839 and 1840. Delacroix. Ingres, a passionate musician (cult of Gluck, Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart), said to his students in Rome, “si je pouvais vous rendre tous musiciens, vous y gagneriez comme peintres”;⁸⁰ also Horace Vernet, with a special passion for Don Giovanni (as Mendelssohn testifies, 1831); also Stendhal, who said of himself: Combien de lieues ne ferais-je pas à pied, et à combien de jours de prison ne me soumettrais-je pas pour entendre Don Juan ou le Matrimonio segreto et je ne sais pour quelle autre chose je ferais cet effort.⁸¹ At that time he was 56. Borrowed forms; e g, Brahms as typical “epigone”; Mendelssohn’s educated Protestantism, ditto (an earlier “soul” is recaptured poetically—) —moral and poetical substitutions in Wagner, one art as stopgap for deficiencies in the others —the “historical sense,” inspiration from poetry and ancient sagas —that typical transformation of which G. Flaubert offers the clearest example among the French and Richard Wagner among the Germans, in which the romantic faith in love and the future is transformed into the desire for the nothing, 1830 into 1850.

106 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Why does German music culminate in the period of German romanticism? Why is Goethe missing in German music? How much Schiller—more precisely, how much “Thekla”⁸²—there is in Beethoven! Schumann has in himself Eichendorff, Uhland, Heine, Hoffmann, Tieck. Richard Wagner has Freischütz,⁸³ Hoffmann, Grimm, the romantic saga, the mystical Catholicism of instinct, symbolism, the “libertinism of passion” (Rousseau’s intent). The Flying Dutchman tastes of France, where le ténébreux was the type of the seducer in 1830. Cult of music, of the revolutionary romanticism of form. Wagner sums up romanticism, German as well as French— 107 (1888) Estimated merely for his value for Germany and German culture, Richard Wagner remains a great question mark, perhaps a German misfortune, in any case a destiny: but what does it matter? Isn’t he very much more than merely a German event? It even seems to me that there is no place where he belongs less than Germany: nothing was prepared for him there; his whole type remains simply strange among Germans, odd, uncomprehended, incomprehensible. But one is careful not to admit this to oneself: for that one is too kindly, too square,⁸⁵ too German. “Credo quia absurdus est”:⁸⁶ that is what the German spirit wants and also wanted in this case—and so it believes for the present whatever Wagner wanted people to believe about him. The German spirit has at all times lacked subtlety and divination in psychologicis. Today, under the high pressure of fatherlandism and self-admiration, it is visibly thickening and becoming coarser: how should it be capable of coping with the problem of Wagner!— 108 (1885) So far, the Germans are nothing, but they will become something; thus they have no culture yet—thus they cannot have any culture yet. That is my proposition: let those who cannot help it take offense.— So far they are nothing: that means, they are all sorts of things. They will become something: that means, they will stop some day being all sorts of things. The latter is at bottom a mere wish, scarcely a hope; fortunately, a wish on which one can live, a matter of will, of work, of discipline, of breeding, as well as a matter of annoyance,⁸⁷ of desire, of missing something, of discomfort, even of embitterment—in brief, we Germans desire something from ourselves that has not yet been desired from us—we desire something more! That this “German as he is not yet” deserves something better than today’s German “Bildung”;⁸⁸ that all who are “in the process of becoming” must be furious when they perceive some satisfaction in this area, an impertinent “retiring on one’s laurels” or “self-congratulation”: that is my second proposition on which I also have not yet changed my mind. 109 (1885) Principle: There is an element of decay in everything that characterizes modern man: but close beside this sickness stand signs of an untested force and powerfulness of the soul. The same reasons that produce the increasing smallness of man drive the stronger and rarer individuals up to greatness.⁸⁹

110 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Overall insight: the ambiguous character of our modern world—the very same symptoms could point to decline and to strength. And the signs of strength, of the attainment of majority, could be misconstrued as weakness on the basis of traditional (residual) negative emotional valuations. In brief, our feelings, as feelings about values, are not up to date. To generalize: feelings about values are always behind the times; they express conditions of preservation and growth that belong to times long gone by; they resist new conditions of existence with which they cannot cope and which they necessarily misunderstand: thus they inhibit and arouse suspicion against what is new.—

111 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The problem of the nineteenth century. Whether its strong and weak sides belong together? Whether it is all of one piece? Whether the diverseness of its ideals and their mutual inconsistency are due to a higher aim: as something higher?— For it could be the precondition of greatness to grow to such an extent in violent tension. Dissatisfaction, nihilism could be a good sign.

112 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Overall insight.—Actually, every major growth is accompanied by a tremendous crumbling and passing away: suffering, the symptoms of decline belong in the times of tremendous advances; every fruitful and powerful movement of humanity has also created at the same time a nihilistic movement. It could be the sign of a crucial and most essential growth, of the transition to new conditions of existence, that the most extreme form of pessimism, genuine nihilism, would come into the world. This I have comprehended. 113 (1883-1888) (A) To begin with a full and cordial tribute to contemporary humanity: not to be deceived by appearances—this type of humanity is less striking but gives far better warranties of duration; its tempo is slower, but the beat is much richer. Health is increasing, the actual conditions for a strong body get recognized and are slowly created, “asceticism” ironice.⁹⁰ One shrinks from extremes; a certain confidence in the “right road”;⁹¹ no enthusing; temporary acclimatization to narrower values (like “fatherland,” like “scholarship,” etc.). Still, this whole picture would remain ambiguous: it could be an ascending but also a descending movement of life. (B) Faith in “progress”—in the lower spheres of intelligence it appears as ascending life; but this is self-deception; in the higher spheres of intelligence as descending life. Description of the symptoms. Unity of point of view: uncertainty about standards of value. Fear of a general “in vain.” Nihilism. 114 (June 10, 1887)⁹² Actually, we have no longer such need of an antidote to the first nihilism: life in our Europe is no longer that uncertain, capricious, absurd. Such a tremendous increase in the value of man, the value of trouble, etc., is not so needful now; we can take a significant decrease of this value, we may concede much absurdity and caprice: the power man has attained now permits a demotion of the means of breeding of which the moral interpretation was the strongest. “God” ’ is far too extreme a hypothesis.

115 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

If anything signifies our humanization—a genuine and actual progress—it is the fact that we no longer require excessive oppositions, indeed no opposites at all—we may love the senses, we have spiritualized and made them artistic in every degree; we have a right to all those things which were most maligned until now.

93

116 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The inversion of the order of rank.— The pious counterfeiters, the priests, among us become chandalas—they replace the charlatans, quacks, counterfeiters, and wizards; we consider them corrupters of the will, great slanderers of life on which they wish to revenge themselves, rebels among the underprivileged. We have turned the caste of servants, the Sudras, into our middle class, our “Volk” [“people”], those who make political decisions.⁹⁴ On the other hand, the chandala of former times is at the top: foremost, those who blaspheme God, the immoralists, the nomads of every type, the artists, Jews, musicians—at bottom, all disreputable classes of men— We have raised ourselves to the level of honorable thoughts; even more, we determine honor on earth, “nobility”— All of us are today advocates of life.— We immoralists are today the strongest power: the other great powers need us—we construe the world in our image— We have transferred the concept of the “chandala” to the priests, teachers of a beyond, and the Christian society that is grown together with them, as well as all who are of the same origin, the pessimists, nihilists, romantics of pity, criminals, vice addicts— the whole sphere in which the concept of “God” is imagined as a savior— We are proud of no longer having to be liars, slanderers, men who cast suspicion on life—⁹⁵ 117 (Spring-Fall 1887)⁹⁶ Progress of the nineteenth century against the eighteenth (—at bottom we good Europeans wage a war against the eighteenth century—): “Return to nature” understood more and more decisively in the opposite sense from Rousseau’s. Away from idyl and opera! more and more decisively anti-idealistic, more concrete, more fearless, industrious, moderate, suspicious against sudden changes, antirevolutionary; more and more decisively the question concerning the health of the body is put ahead of that of “the soul”: the latter being understood as a state consequent upon the former, and the former at the very least as a precondition of the health of the soul. 118 (1883-1888) If anything at all has been achieved, it is a more innocuous relation to the senses, a more joyous, benevolent, Goethean attitude toward sensuality; also a prouder feeling regarding the search for knowledge, so that the “pure fool”⁹⁷ is not given much credit.

119 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. 1888)

We who are “objective.”— It is not “pity” that opens the gates to the most distant and strange types of being and culture to us, but rather our accessibility and lack of partiality that does not empathize with or share suffering but on the contrary takes delight in a hundred things that formerly led people to suffer (feel outraged or deeply moved, or prompted hostile and cold looks—). Suffering in all its nuances has become interesting for us: in this respect we are certainly not fuller of pity, even when we are shaken by the sight of suffering and moved to tears: we do not by any means for that reason feel like helping. In this voluntary desire to contemplate all sorts of distress and transgressions we have become stronger and more vigorous than the eighteenth century was; it is a proof of our increase in vigor (we have come closer to the seventeenth and sixteenth centuries—). But it is a profound misunderstanding to construe our “romanticism” as a proof that our “souls” have become “more beautiful”— We desire strong sensations as all coarser ages and social strata do.— This should be distinguished from the needs of those with weak nerves and the decadents: they have a need for pepper, even for cruelty— All of us seek states in which bourgeois morality no longer has any say, and priestly morality even less (—every book to which some of the air of pastors and theologians still clings gives us the impression of a pitiable niaiserie and poverty.— “Good society” consists of those whom at bottom nothing interests except what is forbidden in bourgeois society and gives a bad reputation: the same applies to books, music, politics, and the estimation of woman.

120 (Spring-Fall 1887)

How man has become more natural in the nineteenth century (the eighteenth century is that of elegance, refinement, and sentiments généreux).— Not “return to nature”—for there has never yet been a natural humanity. The scholasticism of un- and antinatural values is the rule, is the beginning; man reaches nature only after a long struggle—he never “returns”— Nature: i.e., daring to be immoral like nature. We are coarser, more direct, full of irony against generous feelings even when we succumb to them. More natural is our first society, that of the rich, the leisure class: they hunt each other, love between the sexes is a kind of sport in which marriage furnishes an obstacle and a provocation; they amuse themselves and live for pleasure; they esteem physical advantages above all, are curious and bold. More natural is our attitude to the search for knowledge: we possess libertinage of the spirit in all innocence, we hate pompous and hieratical manners, we delight in what is most forbidden, we should hardly know any longer of any interest of knowledge if the way to it were paved with boredom. More natural is our attitude toward morality. Principles have become ridiculous; nobody permits himself any longer to speak without irony of his “duty.” But a helpful, benevolent disposition is esteemed (morality is found in an instinct, and the rest is spurned.¹⁰¹ In addition a few concepts of points of honor—). More natural is our position in politics: we see problems of power, of one quantum of power against another. We do not believe in any right that is not supported by the power of enforcement: we feel all rights to be conquests. More natural is our estimation of great human beings and great things: we consider passion a privilege, we consider nothing great unless it includes a great crime; we conceive all being-great as a placing-oneself-outside as far as morality is concerned. More natural is our attitude toward nature: we no longer love it on account of its “innocence,” “reason,” or “beauty”; we have made it nicely “devilish” and “dumb.” But instead of despising it on that account, we have felt more closely related to it ever since, more at home in it. It does not aspire to virtue, and for that we respect nature. More natural is our attitude toward art: we do not demand beautiful illusory lies from it, etc.; brutal positivism reigns, recognizing facts without becoming excited. In summa: there are signs that the European of the nineteenth century is less ashamed of his instincts; he has taken a goodly step toward admitting to himself his unconditional naturalness, i.e., his immorality, without becoming embittered—on the contrary, strong enough to endure only this sight. This sounds to some ears as if corruption had progressed— and it is certain that man has not come close to that “nature” of which Rousseau speaks but has progressed another step in civilization, which Rousseau abhorred. We have become stronger: we have again come closer to the seventeenth century, especially to the taste of its end (Dancourt, Lesage, Regnard).¹⁰² 121 (1888)

Culture contra civilization.¹⁰³— The high points of culture and civilization do not coincide: one should not be deceived about the abysmal antagonism of culture and civilization. The great moments of culture were always, morally speaking, times of corruption; and conversely, the periods when the taming of the human animal (“civilization”) was desired and enforced were times of intolerance against the boldest and most spiritual natures. Civilization has aims different from those of culture—perhaps they are even opposite—

122 (January-Fall 1888)

What I warn against: the instincts of decadence should not be confused with humaneness;¹⁰⁴ the means of civilization, which lead to disintegration and necessarily to decadence, should not be confused with culture; the libertinage, the principle of “laissez aller,” should not be confused with the will to power (— which is the counterprinciple).

123 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The unfinished problems I pose anew: the problem of civilization, the fight between Rousseau and Voltaire around 1760. Man becomes more profound, mistrustful, “immoral,” stronger, more confident of himself—and to this extent “more natural”: this is “progress.”— At the same time, in accordance with a kind of division of labor, the strata that have become more evil are separated from those that have become milder and tamer—so that the overall fact is not noticed immediately.— It is characteristic of strength, of the self-control and fascination of strength, that these stronger strata possess the art of making others experience their progress in evil as something higher. It is characteristic of every “progress” that the strengthened elements are reinterpreted as “good.”

124 (Spring-Fall 1887)

To give men back the courage to their natural drives— To check their self-underestimation (not that of man as an individual but that of man as nature—)— To remove antitheses from things after comprehending that we have projected them there— To remove the idiosyncrasies of society from existence (guilt, punishment, justice, honesty, freedom, love, etc.)— Progress toward “naturalness”: in all political questions, also in the relations of parties, even of commercial, workers’, and employers’ parties, questions of power are at stake —“what one can do,” and only after that what one ought to do.¹⁰⁵ 125 (1885)¹⁰⁶ Socialism—as the logical conclusion of the tyranny of the least and the dumbest, i.e., those who are superficial, envious, and three-quarters actors—is indeed entailed by “modern ideas” and their latent anarchism; but in the tepid air of democratic well-being the capacity to reach conclusions, or to finish, weakens. One follows—but one no longer sees what follows. Therefore socialism is on the whole a hopeless and sour affair; and nothing offers a more amusing spectacle than the contrast between the poisonous and desperate faces cut by today’s socialists—and to what wretched and pinched feelings their style bears witness!—and the harmless lambs’ happiness of their hopes and desiderata. Nevertheless, in many places in Europe they may yet bring off occasional coups and attacks: there will be deep “rumblings” in the stomach of the next century, and the Paris commune, which has its apologists and advocates in Germany, too, was perhaps no more than a minor indigestion compared to what is coming. But there will always be too many who have possessions for socialism to signify more than an attack of sickness—and those who have possessions are of one mind on one article of faith: “one must possess something in order to be something.” But this is the oldest and healthiest of all instincts: I should add, “one must want to have more than one has in order to become more.” For this is the doctrine preached by life itself to all that has life: the morality of development. To have and to want to have more—growth, in one word—that is life itself. In the doctrine of socialism there is hidden, rather badly, a “will to negate life”; the human beings or races that think up such a doctrine must be bungled. Indeed, I should wish that a few great experiments might prove that in a socialist society life negates itself, cuts off its own roots. The earth is large enough and man still sufficiently unexhausted; hence such a practical instruction and demonstratio ad absurdum would not strike me as undesirable, even if it were gained and paid for with a tremendous expenditure of human lives. In any case, even as a restless mole under the soil of a society that wallows in stupidity, socialism will be able to be something useful and therapeutic: it delays “peace on earth” and the total mollification of the democratic herd animal; it forces the Europeans to retain spirit, namely cunning and cautious care, not to abjure manly and warlike virtues altogether, and to retain some remnant of spirit, of clarity, sobriety, and coldness of the spirit— it protects Europe for the time being from the marasmus femininus that threatens it.

126 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The most favorable inhibitions and remedies of modernity: 1. universal military service with real wars in which the time for joking is past; 2. national bigotry (simplifies, concentrates); 3. improved nutrition (meat); 4. increasing cleanliness and healthfulness of domiciles; 5. hegemony of physiology over theology, moralism, economics, and politics; 6. military severity in the demand for and handling of one's "obligations" (one does not praise any more—). 127 (1884) I am glad about the military development of Europe; also of the internal states of anarchy: the time of repose and Chinese ossification, which Galiani predicted for this century, is over. Personal manly virtù,¹⁰⁸ virtù of the body,¹⁰⁹ is regaining value, estimation becomes more physical, nutrition meatier. Beautiful men are again becoming possible. Pallid hypocrisy (with mandarins at the top, as Comte dreamed) is over. The barbarian in each of us is affirmed; also the wild beast. Precisely for that reason philosophers have a future.— Kant is a scarecrow, some day!¹¹⁰ 128 (1884) I have as yet found no reason for discouragement. Whoever has preserved, and bred in himself, a strong will, together with an ample spirit, has more favorable opportunities than ever. For the trainability of men has become very great in this democratic Europe; men who learn easily and adapt themselves easily are the rule: the herd animal, even highly intelligent, has been prepared. Whoever can command finds those who must obey: I am thinking, e.g., of Napoleon and Bismarck. The rivalry with strong and unintelligent wills, which is the greatest obstacle, is small. Who doesn't topple these "objective" gentlemen with weak wills, like Ranke or Renan! 129 (1885) Spiritual enlightenment is an infallible means for making men unsure, weaker in will, so they are more in need of company and support—in short, for developing the herd animal in man. Therefore all great artists of government so far (Confucius in China, the imperium Romanum, Napoleon, the papacy at the time when it took an interest in power and not merely in the world), in the places where the dominant instincts have culminated so far, also employed spiritual enlightenment—at least let it have its way (like the popes of the Renaissance). The self-deception of the mass concerning this point, e.g., in every democracy, is extremely valuable: making men smaller and more governable is desired as "progress"! 130 (1883-1888) The highest equity and mildness as a state of weakening (the New Testament and the original Christian community—apparent as complete bêtise in the Englishmen, Darwin and Wallace). Your equity, you higher natures, impels you toward suffrage universel, etc.; your "humanity," toward mildness confronted with crime and stupidity. In the long run you thus make stupidity and the unscrupulous victorious: comfort and stupidity—the mean. Externally: age of tremendous wars, upheavals, explosions. Internally: ever greater weakness of man, events as excitants. The Parisian as the European extreme. Consequences: (1) barbarians

(at first, of course, below the form of culture so far [e.g., Dühring]); (2) sovereign individuals (where masses of barbarian force are crossed with a lack of all restraint regarding whatever has been). Age of the greatest stupidity, brutality, and the masses, and of the highest individuals. 131 (1884) Innumerable individuals of a higher type now perish: but whoever gets away is strong as the devil. Similar to the situation at the time of the Renaissance. 132 (1885) Good Europeans that we are—what distinguishes us above the men of fatherlands?—First, we are atheists and immoralists, but for the present we support the religions and moralities of the herd instinct: for these prepare a type of man that must one day fall into our hands, that must desire our hands. Beyond good and evil—but we demand that herd morality should be held sacred unconditionally. We hold in reserve many types of philosophy which need to be taught: possibly, the pessimistic type, as a hammer; a European Buddhism might perhaps be indispensable. We probably support the development and maturing of democratic institutions: they enhance weakness of the will: in socialism we see a thorn that protects against comfortableness. Position toward peoples. Our preferences; we pay attention to the results of interbreeding. Apart, wealthy, strong: irony at the expense of the “press” and its culture. Worry lest scholars become journalistic. We feel contemptuous of every kind of culture that is compatible with reading, not to speak of writing for, newspapers. We take our accidental positions (like Goethe, Stendhal), our experiences, as foreground and stress them to deceive about our depths. We ourselves are waiting and beware of staking our hearts on them. They serve us as hostels for a night, which a wanderer needs and accepts—we beware of settling down. We are ahead of our fellow men in possessing a disciplina voluntatis. All strength applied to development of strength of the will, an art that permits us to wear masks, an art of understanding beyond the affects (also to think in a “supra-European” way, at times). Preparation for becoming the legislators of the future, the masters of the earth, at least our children. Basic concern with marriages. 133 (1885) The twentieth century.—Abbé Galiani once said: La prévoyance est la cause des guerres actuelles de l’Europe. Si Von voulait se donner la peine de ne rien prévoir, tout le monde serait tranquille, et je ne crois pas qu’on serait plus malheureux parce qu’on ne ferait pas la guerre. 114 Since I do not by any means share the unwarlike views of my friend Galiani, I am not afraid of predicting a few things and thus, possibly, of conjuring up the cause of wars. A tremendous stock-taking after the most terrible earthquake: with new questions. 134 (1885-1886) This is the time of the great noon, of the most terrible clearing up: my type of pessimism—great point of departure. I. Basic contradiction in civilization and the enhancement of man. II. Moral valuations as a history of lies and the art of slander in the service of a will to power (the herd will that rebels against the human beings who are stronger). III. The conditions of every enhancement of culture (making possible a selection at the expense of a mass) are the conditions of all growth. IV. The multiple ambiguity of the world as a question of strength that sees all things in the perspective of its growth. Moral-Christian value judgments as slaves' rebellion and slaves' mendaciousness (against the aristocratic values of the ancient world). How far does art reach down into the essence of strength?¹¹⁸ The Will to Power Attempt at a Revaluation of all Values. (In four books) FIRST BOOK: The danger of dangers (presentation of nihilism as the necessary consequence of our valuations so far). Tremendous forces have been unleashed; but they conflict with each other; they annihilate each other. In a democratic commonwealth, where everybody is a specialist, the what-for? and for-whom? are lacking. The class [Stand] in which the thousandfold atrophy of all individuals (into mere functions) acquires meaning. SECOND BOOK: Critique of values (logic, etc). Everywhere the disharmony between the ideal and its individual conditions (e.g., honesty among Christians who are continually forced to lie). THIRD BOOK: The problem of the legislator (including the history of solitude) The forces that have been unleashed must be harnessed again lest they annihilate each other; eyes have to be opened for the actual increase of strength. FOURTH BOOK: The hammer. What would men have to be like whose valuations are the opposite? Men who have all the traits of the modern soul but are strong enough to transform them into so much health—their means for their task. SILS MARIA. Summer 1886. Plan of the first book What is dawning is the opposition of the world we revere and the world we live and are. So we can abolish either our reverence or ourselves. The latter constitutes nihilism. The advent of nihilism, theoretical and practical Its faulty derivation (pessimism, its kinds: preludes of nihilism, although not necessary). Christianity perishing of its morality. "God is truth"; "God is love"; "the just God."—The greatest event—"God is dead"—perceived dimly. Morality, now without any sanction, no longer knows how to maintain itself. Eventually one drops the moral interpretation (echoes of the Christian value judgments still fill men's feelings). But it was upon moral judgments that value was based so far; above all, the value of philosophy ("of the will to truth"). (The popular ideals—"the sage," "the prophet," "the saint"—have collapsed.) Nihilistic trait in the natural sciences.... [(5) through (9) appear above as (a) through (e).] For the second book Origin and critique of moral valuations These two things don't coincide, as is often supposed (this belief itself is the result of a moral judgment to the effect that "something that has come to be in such and such a way is worth little because its origin is immoral") Standard for determining the value of moral valuations: critique of the words, "Improvement, perfecting, enhancement" The basic fact that has been overlooked: the contradiction between "becoming more moral" and the enhancement and strengthening of the type of man. Homo natura. The "will to power" For the third book The will to power. How those men would have to be constituted who would accomplish this revaluation in themselves. The order of rank as an order of power: war and danger as presuppositions that a rank maintains its conditions The grandiose model: man in nature—the weakest, cleverest being making itself master and subjugating the more stupid elements For the fourth book The greatest struggle: for that a new weapon is needed. The hammer: to conjure up a terrible decision, to confront Europe with the final choice whether its will “wills” its own destruction [Untergang]. Prevention of the decline into mediocrity [Vermittelmässigung]. Rather even destruction [Lieber noch Untergang]! In the preface to Twilight of the Idols, written in 1888 and published in January 1889, the image of the hammer is sublimated: “For once to pose questions here with a hammer, and, perhaps, to hear as a reply that famous hollow sound which speaks of bloated entrails—what a delight for one who has ears even behind his ears, for me, an old psychologist ...” For the dictum, “God is dead,” see The Gay Science, section 125 (Portable Nietzsche, pp. 95 f) and Zarathustra, Prologue (ibid, p. 124); also Kaufmann’s Nietzsche, Chapter 3. Of the men enumerated in the parenthesis, all but the last three are mentioned in The Will to Power (see the Index), and of these all but Gautier are also mentioned in the books Nietzsche himself published In Twilight, “Skirmishes,” whole sections are devoted to Renan (#2) and Sainte Beuve (#3), the brothers Goncourt are characterized in sections 1 and 7; and Flaubert is mentioned often, also in Nietzsche’s other books Practically all of these references are hostile. (For Renan see also my note on Genealogy III, section 26.) Hippolyte Taine, on the other hand, is mentioned favorably in Beyond Good and Evil and in the Genealogy, and Nietzsche corresponded with him. Edmond Henri Adolphe Schérer (1815-89), ordained and appointed to a professorship in the Ecole Evangélique at Geneva in 1843, resigned six years later and gradually abandoned Protestant doctrine. He became a Hegelian, settled in Paris, and made his reputation as a literary critic. Gavarni was the pen name of Sulpice Guillaume Chevalier (1801-66), an outstanding Parisian caricaturist He is said to have initiated the dîners chez Magny, mentioned in the text Ivan Sergeyevich Turgenev (1818-83), the great Russian novelist, is never mentioned in Nietzsche’s books. On January 11, 1888, Brandes had written Nietzsche that he was sending him the proofs of a collection of his essays: “... The essay on Ibsen is relatively the best.... There is a Nordic writer whose works would interest you. Søren Kierkegaard; he lived 1813-1855 and is in my view one of the most profound psychologists of all time....” Nietzsche replied February 19: “... I have decided that during my next trip to Germany I want to study the psychological problem of Kierkegaard . .” Ibsen he did not mention—and he never got around to reading Kierkegaard. On March 7, Brandes wrote Nietzsche: “Ibsen must interest you as a personality Unfortunately he does not have the same stature as a human being that he has as a poet As a mind he has been very dependent on Kierkegaard and is still rather full of theology Bjornson actually became a common lay preacher during his last phase....” And November 23, 1888, Brandes wrote Nietzsche: “Believe me, I make propaganda for you wherever I can. Only last week I seriously urged Henrik Ibsen to study your works There is a way in which you are related to him, too, although very distantly. This oddball is great and strong and unfriendly but nevertheless deserving of love Strindberg will be pleased that you esteem him ...” Nietzsche refers to Ibsen in two other places: in section 747 in The Will to Power and in Ecce Homo, Chapter III, section 5, where he says: “A whole species of malignant ‘idealism’—which, incidentally, is encountered among men, too; for example in Henrik Ibsen, this typical old maid—has the aim of poisoning the good conscience, that which is natural in sexual love.” What Nietzsche had actually read of Ibsen’s works is uncertain His friend Franz Overbeck wrote him on October 14, 1888: “In Munich I have also had a few strange impressions in the theater, and have scarcely ever seen a more skillful German play than The Pillars of Society by Ibsen, by whom I had not known anything before this....” Michael Meyer, the Ibsen scholar and translator, informs me that the only record he has found of any comment on Nietzsche by Ibsen is in an interview printed in the newspaper Ørebladet, November 26, 1900, when Ibsen was 72: “A great thinker has died since we last spoke, Herr Ibsen—Nietzsche. ‘Yes. I wasn’t well acquainted with his work It wasn’t until a few years ago that he really became well known. He had a remarkable talent, but his philosophy prevented him from becoming popular in our democratic age’ Some say that Nietzsche was a spirit who emerged from the dark—a Satan— ‘Satan—no No, Nietzsche wasn’t that’ ” Which isn’t much And according to Meyer, Ibsen often said he had “read little of Kierkegaard and understood less” Nevertheless it is widely taken for granted—and perhaps rightly—that Ibsen’s Brand was profoundly influenced by Kierkegaard and Ibsen’s An Enemy of the People brings to mind Kierkegaard’s paean on “That Individual,” with its refrain “The crowd is untruth” (found, e g, in my Existentialism from Dostoevsky to Sartre, 1956, pp 92-99) And Beyond Good and Evil (1886) contains some very striking parallels to An Enemy of the People (written in 1882), which evidently are not due to any influence of the play on Nietzsche’s book: see my note on section 213 of Beyond Good and Evil, as well as section 4 of my “Translator’s Preface” 49 “Ist eine geistig verdumpftere, faulere, gliederstreckendere Form des Christen-Glaubens noch denkbar, als die eines deutschen Durchschnitts-Protestanten?” Faul can mean “rotten” as well as “lazy”; gliederstreckend means literally “limb-stretching” 53 A gay monster is worth more Than a sentimental bore. Nietzsche omitted the text of this verse, which was inserted in the book by Peter Gast; cf section 35 above. 56 “Musik ist Ausklingen.” 57 “Plunging into servitude.” 67 A wit. 74 Düstere. Above, Verdüsterung has been rendered sometimes as “eclipse.” 86 “I believe because he is absurd” Variation of the famous, “I believe because it is absurd,” usually ascribed to Tertullian. The early editors’ intent in placing this note of 1885 after the preceding note of 1888, by way of concluding a subsection (the subheads have been dropped above), is palpable: one did not wish to conclude with a sharp criticism of Germany and dredged up an older note in which Nietzsche had identified himself with the Germans, at least to some extent. The published statements of his last year speak for themselves: see The Case of Wagner and the chapter on the Germans (p. 505 in Portable Nietzsche) in Twilight of the Idols; also the chapter on The Case of Wagner in Ecce Homo. 98 “Nicht das ‘Mitleid’ ” and “welche gerade nicht ‘mitleidet’”: the German word for pity (Mitleid) means literally “suffering with”—like “compassion” and “sympathy” 101 “Dédaignirt.” I. In the one-volume edition of The Will to Power [1901], the aphorism to which Nietzsche assigned number 80 in W. II 1, 47/48 [the reference is to pp. 47/48 of one of his notebooks], was reproduced as aphorism 36. Weiss [in the two-volume edition of 1911, which—except for the important editorial apparatus at the end of the second volume—is merely a reprint of the second edition of 1906] made two [aphorisms] out of it (117 and 124), although Nietzsche had also listed this aphorism in W II 4 as ‘80: Progress of the growing naturalness of the nineteenth century.’ A juxtaposition of the two versions shows that in 124 in Weiss’s version the paragraph is missing that in the one-volume edition concludes the aphorism: ‘that meanwhile, in the midst of the mechanics of grand politics, the Christian trumpet is still sounded (for example, in bulletins about victories or in the Kaiser’s addresses to the nation), belongs more and more with the things that are becoming impossible; for it offends good taste.’ “Schlechta knows nothing of this, although it would have been useful to him in his reprint. It is equally unknown to him that the editors of The Will to Power of 1901 recorded in their notes (p. 131 [actually, 531]): ‘A short sentence has been omitted here’ Otto Weiss did not mention this. “The unpublished sentence reads: The throat of the crown prince is not one of God’s affairs’ ” This is scarcely an earth-shaking revelation. Indeed, it is of interest mainly as negative evidence: this is offered as one of the two “most important points”—Wichtigstes might also be rendered as “most significant”—that have eluded Podach’s predecessors down to Schlechta. Podach’s second example has already been considered in the footnote to section 2. (See also my article, cited at the end of that note) The “unpublished sentence” was evidently written in 1887, when the crown prince of Germany was suffering from a throat ailment that killed him a hundred days after he succeeded to the imperial throne in 1888. In his correspondence Nietzsche then expressed his respect for him and his disappointment—Friedrich III was a more likable emperor than his son and successor, Wilhelm II. The “unpublished sentence” clearly was not closely related to the contents of either section 117 or section 124 but merely a note Nietzsche had jotted down for himself, and posterity was not cheated by its suppression. It was evidently no more than a reaction to someone who had dragged in God in a way that had irritated Nietzsche. For facsimiles and further discussion see front of book and Appendix. 108 Tüchtigkeit. 113 “E g., Dühring” is found only in 1911, p. 500. 114 “Foresight is the cause of Europe’s present wars. If one would take pains to foresee nothing, the whole world would be tranquil, and I do not believe that one would be worse off for not waging war.” The quotation was inserted by Peter Gast. I. CRITIQUE OF RELIGION

All the beauty and sublimity we have bestowed upon real and imaginary things I will reclaim as the property and product of man: as his fairest apology. Man as poet, as thinker, as God, as love, as power: with what regal liberality he has lavished gifts upon things so as to impoverish himself and make himself feel wretched! His most unselfish act hitherto has been to admire and worship and to know how to conceal from himself that it was he who created what he admired.

—2

135 (March-June 1888)

On the origin of religion.— In the same way as today the uneducated man believes that anger is the cause of his being angry, spirit the cause of his thinking, soul the cause of his feeling—in short, just as there is still thoughtlessly posited a mass of psychological entities that are supposed to be causes—so, at a yet more naive stage, man explained precisely the same phenomena with the aid of psychological personal entities. Those conditions that seemed to him strange, thrilling, overwhelming, he interpreted as obsession and enchantment by the power of a person. (Thus the Christian, the most naive and backward species of man today, traces hope, repose, the feeling of “redemption,” back to psychological inspiration by God: to him, as an essentially suffering and disturbed type, the feeling of happiness, resignation and repose naturally seems strange and in need of explanation.) Among intelligent, strong, and vigorous races it is mainly the epileptic who inspires the conviction that a strange power is here at work; but every related condition of subjection, e.g., that of the inspired man, of the poet, of the great criminal, of passions such as love and revenge, also leads to the invention of extrahuman powers. A condition is made concrete in a person, and when it overtakes us is thought to be effected by that person. In other words: In the psychological concept of God, a condition, in order to appear as effect, is personified as cause. The psychological logic is this: When a man is suddenly and overwhelmingly suffused with the feeling of power—and this is what happens with all great affects—it raises in him a doubt about his own person: he does not dare to think himself the cause of this astonishing feeling—and so he posits a stronger person, a divinity, to account for it. In summa: the origin of religion lies in extreme feelings of power which, because they are strange, take men by surprise: and like a sick man who, feeling one of his limbs uncommonly heavy, comes to the conclusion another man is lying on top of him, the naive homo religiosus divides himself into several persons. Religion is a case of “altération de la personnalité.” A sort of feeling of fear and terror at oneself— But also a feeling of extraordinary happiness and exaltation— Among the sick the feeling of health is sufficient to inspire belief in God, in the nearness of God.

136 (March-June 1888)

Rudimentary psychology of the religious man:— All changes are effects; all effects are effects of will (—the concept “nature,” “law of nature” is lacking); all effects suppose an agent. Rudimentary psychology: one is a cause oneself only when one knows that one has performed an act of will. Result: when man experiences the conditions of power, the imputation is that he is not their cause, that he is not responsible for them they come without being willed, consequently we are not their author: the will that is not free (i.e., the consciousness that we have been changed without having willed it) needs an external will.

Consequence: man has not dared to credit himself with all his strong and surprising impulses—he has conceived them as “passive,” as “suffered,” as things imposed upon him: religion is the product of a doubt concerning the unity of the person, an altération of the personality: in so far as everything great and strong in man has been conceived as superhuman and external, man has belittled himself—he has separated the two sides of himself, one very paltry and weak, one very strong and astonishing, into two spheres, and called the former “man,” the latter “God.” He has continued to think in this way; in the period of the moral idiosyncrasy he did not interpret his exalted and sublime moral states as “willed,” as “work” of the person. The Christian too divides his person into a mean and weak fiction which he calls man, and another which he calls God (redeemer, savior)— Religion has debased the concept “man”; its ultimate consequence is that everything good, great, true is superhuman and bestowed only through an act of grace—

137 (March-June 1888)

One way of raising man from the abasement produced by the subtraction of exalted and strong states as foreign conditions was the family theory. These exalted and strong states could at least be interpreted as the influence of our ancestors; we belonged together, in solidarity; we grow greater in our own eyes when we act according to a norm known to us. Attempt by noble families to square religion with the feeling of their own worth. Poets and seers do the same: they feel proud, honored, and chosen for such an association—they attach great importance to not being considered at all as individuals, but merely as mouthpieces (Homer). Step by step man takes possession of his exalted and proud states, he takes possession of his acts and works. Formerly one believed one was doing oneself an honor by denying responsibility for one's highest acts and attributing them to—God. Absence of free will counted as that which imparted a higher value to an action: a god was conceived as its author.⁴ 138 (1883-1888) Priests are the actors of something superhuman which they have to make easily perceptible, whether it be in the nature of ideals, gods, or saviors: in this they find their calling, for this their instincts serve them; to make everything as believable as possible they have to go as far as possible in posturing and posing; the shrewdness of their actor's art must above all aim at giving them a good conscience, by means of which alone is it possible to carry true conviction.

139 (March-June 1888)

The priest wants to have it understood that he counts as the highest type of man, that he rules—even over those who wield power—that he is indispensable, unassailable—that he is the strongest power in the community, absolutely not to be replaced or undervalued. Means he alone possesses knowledge; he alone possesses virtue; he alone has sovereign lordship over himself; he alone is in a certain sense God and goes back to the divinity; he alone is the intermediary between God and other people; the divinity punishes every opposition to, every thought directed against a priest. Means: truth exists. There is only one way of attaining it: to become a priest. Everything good in society, in nature, in tradition, is to be traced back to the wisdom of the priests. The holy book is their work. The whole of nature is only a fulfillment of the dogmas contained in it. There is no other source of the good than the priests. Every other kind of excellence is of a different order from that of the priest; e.g., that of the warrior. Consequence: if the priest is to be the highest type, then the degrees which lead to his virtues must constitute the degrees of value among men. Study, emancipation from the senses, the non-active, the impassible, absence of affects, the solemn; antithesis: the lowest order of man. The priest has taught one kind of morality: in order that he shall be considered the highest type of man. He conceives an antithetical type: the chandala. To make these contemptible by every means provides a foil to the order of castes.— The priest's extreme fear of sensuality is also conditioned by the insight that this is the most serious threat to the order of castes (that is, to order in general)— Every “more liberal tendency” in puncto puncti throws the marriage laws overboard—

140 (March-June 1888)

The philosopher as a further development of the priestly type:—has the heritage of the priest in his blood; is compelled, even as rival, to struggle for the same ends with the same means as the priest of his time; he aspires to supreme authority. What gives authority when one does not have physical power in one's hands (no army, no weapons of any kind—)? How, in fact, does one gain authority over those who possess physical strength and authority? (They compete with the awe inspired by princes, by the victorious conqueror, by the wise statesman). Only by arousing the belief that they have in their hands a higher, mightier strength—God. Nothing is sufficiently strong: the mediation and service of the priests is needed. They establish themselves as indispensable intermediaries: they need as conditions of their existence: (1) belief in the absolute superiority of their God, belief in their God; (2) that there is no other, no direct access to God. The second demand alone creates the concept “heterodoxy,” the first the concept “unbeliever” (i.e., one who believes in another God—).

1416 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Critique of the holy lie.— That the lie is permitted as a means to pious ends is part of the theory of every priesthood—to what extent it is part of their practice is the object of this inquiry. But philosophers too, as soon as, with priestly ulterior motives, they form the intention of taking in hand the direction of mankind, at once also arrogate to themselves the right to tell lies: Plato before all. The most imposing is the twofold lie developed by the typically Aryan philosophers of the Vedanta: two systems contradictory in all their main features but for educational reasons alternating, supplementary and complementary. The lie of the one is intended to create a condition in which alone the truth of the other can become audible— How far does the pious lie of priests and philosophers go?— One must ask what presuppositions they require for the purpose of education, what dogmas they have to invent to satisfy these presuppositions. First: they must have power, authority, unconditional credibility on their side. Secondly: they must have the whole course of nature in their hands, so that everything that affects the individual seems to be conditioned by their laws. Thirdly: they must also possess a more extensive domain of power whose control eludes the eyes of its subjects: power of punishment in the beyond, in the “after death”—and of course the means of discovering the way to bliss. —They have to set aside the concept of a natural course of events: but since they are clever and thoughtful people they are able to promise a host of effects, conditioned, of course, by prayers or the strict observance of their laws.— They can, moreover, prescribe a host of things that are absolutely reasonable—provided only that they do not point to experience or empiricism as the source of this wisdom, but to revelation or the consequence of “the sternest penances.” The holy lie therefore applies principally: to the purpose of an action (—natural purpose, reason are made to vanish: a moral purpose, the fulfillment of a law, a service to God appears as purpose—): to the consequence of an action (—natural consequence is interpreted as supernatural and, to produce a surer effect, the prospect of other, uncontrollable consequences is held out). In this way a concept of good and evil is created that seems to be altogether divorced from the natural concept “useful,” “harmful,” “life-promoting,” “life-retarding”—in so far as another life is imagined, it can even be directly inimical to the natural concept of good and evil. In this way the famous “conscience” is at last created: an inner voice which does not measure the value of every action with regard to its consequences, but with regard to its intention and the degree to which this intention conforms with the “laws.” The holy lie therefore invented (1) a God who punishes and rewards, who strictly observes the law-book of the priests and is strict about sending them into the world as his mouthpieces and plenipotentiaries; (2) an afterlife in which the great punishment machine is first thought to become effective—to this end the immortality of the soul; (3) conscience in man as the consciousness that good and evil are permanent—that God himself speaks through it when it advises conformity with priestly precepts; (4) morality as denial of all natural processes, as reduction of all events to a morally conditioned event, moral effects (i.e., the idea of punishment and reward) as effects permeating all things, as the sole power, as the creator of all transformation; (5) truth as given, as revealed, as identical with the teaching of the priests: as the condition for all salvation and happiness in this life and the next. In summa: what is the price of moral improvement?— Unhinging of reason, reduction of all motives to fear and hope (punishment and reward); dependence upon a priestly guardianship, upon pedantic formalities which claim to express a divine will; the implanting of a “conscience” which sets a false knowing in place of testing and experiment: as if what should be done and what left undone had already been determined—a kind of castration of the seeking and forward-striving spirit; in summa: the worst mutilation of man that can be imagined presented as the “good man.” In practice, all the reason, the whole heritage of prudence, subtlety, caution which is the presupposition of the priestly canon, is afterwards arbitrarily reduced to a mere mechanism: conformity with the law itself counts as an end, as the highest end, life no longer has any problems; the whole conception of the world is polluted by the idea of punishment; with the object of representing the priestly life as the non plus ultra of perfection, life itself is transformed into a defamation and pollution of life; the concept “God” represents a turning away from life, a critique of life, even a contempt for it; truth is transformed into the priestly lie, the striving for truth into study of the scriptures, into a means of becoming a theologian—

142 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Toward a critique of the law-book of Manu.— The whole book is founded on the holy lie. Was the well-being of mankind the inspiration of this system? Was this species of man, who believes in the interestedness of every action, interested or not in imposing this system? To improve mankind—how is this intention inspired? Where is the concept of improvement derived from? We find a species of man, the priestly, which feels itself to be the norm, the high point and the supreme expression of the type man: this species derives the concept “improvement” from itself. It believes in its own superiority, it wills itself to be superior in fact: the origin of the holy lie is the will to power— Establishment of rule: to this end, the rule of those concepts that place a non plus ultra of power with the priesthood. Power through the lie—in the knowledge that one does not possess it physically, militarily—the lie as a supplement to power, a new concept of “truth.” It is a mistake to suppose an unconscious and naive development here, a kind of self-deception— Fanatics do not invent such carefully thought-out systems of oppression— The most cold-blooded reflection was at work here; the same kind of reflection as a Plato applied when he imagined his “Republic.” “He who wills the end must will the means”—all lawgivers have been clear in their minds regarding this politician’s insight. We possess the classic model in specifically Aryan forms: we may therefore hold the best-endowed and most reflective species of man responsible for the most fundamental lie that has ever been told— That lie has been copied almost everywhere: Aryan influence has corrupted all the world—8

143 (March-June 1888)

A lot is said today about the Semitic spirit of the New Testament: but what is called Semitic is merely priestly—and in the racially purest Aryan law-book, in Manu, this kind of “Semitism,” i.e., the spirit of the priest, is worse than anywhere else. The development of the Jewish priestly state is not original: they learned the pattern in Babylon: the pattern is Aryan. When, later on, the same thing became dominant in a Europe with a preponderance of Germanic blood, this was in accordance with the spirit of the ruling race: a great atavism. The Germanic Middle Ages aimed at a revival of the Aryan order of castes. Mohammedanism in turn learned from Christianity: the employment of the “beyond” as an instrument of punishment. The pattern of an unchanging community with priests at its head—this oldest of the great cultural products of Asia in the realm of organization—was bound to invite reflection and imitation in every respect. Again Plato: but above all the Egyptians. 144 (1885) Moralities and religions are the principal means by which one can make whatever one wishes out of man, provided one possesses a superfluity of creative forces and can assert one’s will over long periods of time—in the form of legislation, religions, and customs.⁹ 145 (1884-1888) What an affirmative Aryan religion, the product of the ruling class, looks like: the law-book of Manu. (The deification of the feeling of power in Brahma: interesting that it arose among the warrior caste and was only transferred to the priests.) What an affirmative Semitic religion, the product of a ruling class, looks like: the law-book of Mohammed, the older parts of the Old Testament. (Mohammedanism, as a religion for men, is deeply contemptuous of the sentimentality and mendaciousness of Christianity—which it feels to be a woman’s religion.) What a negative Semitic religion, the product of an oppressed class, looks like: the New Testament (—in Indian-Aryan terms: a chandala religion). What a negative Aryan religion looks like, grown up among the ruling orders: Buddhism. It is quite in order that we possess no religion of oppressed Aryan races, for that is a contradiction: a master race is either on top or it is destroyed.¹⁰ 146 (1885-1886) In itself, religion has nothing to do with morality: but both descendants of the Jewish religion are essentially moralistic religion —such as offer precepts about how one ought to live, and create a hearing for their demands by rewards and punishments.

147 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Pagan-Christian. The affirmation of the natural, the sense of innocence in the natural, “naturalness,” is pagan. The denial of the natural, the sense of degradation in the natural, unnaturalness, is Christian. Petronius, e.g., was “innocent”: compared with this happy man, a Christian is absolutely without innocence. But since ultimately the Christian status must be merely a natural condition—which, however, dares not conceive itself to be such—“Christian” signifies raising to a principle the counterfeiting of psychological interpretations — 148 (1883-1886) The Christian priest is from the first a mortal enemy of sensuality: no greather antithesis can be imagined than the innocently awed and solemn attitude adopted by, e.g., the most honorable women’s cults of Athens in the presence of the symbols of sex. The act of procreation is the mystery as such in all nonascetic religions: a sort of symbol of perfection and of the mysterious design of the future: rebirth, immortality. 149 (1880-1881) Belief in ourselves is the strongest fetter and the supreme whipping-on—and the strongest wing. Christianity should have made the innocence of man an article of faith—men would have become gods: belief was still possible in those days.¹¹

150 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The great lie in history: as if it was the corruption of paganism which opened the road to Christianity! It was, on the contrary, the weakening and moralization of the man of antiquity! Natural drives had already been reinterpreted as vices!¹² 151 (1885-1886) Religions are destroyed by belief in morality. The Christian moral God is not tenable: hence “atheism”—as if there could be no other kinds of god. Similarly, culture is destroyed by belief in morality. For when one discovers the necessary conditions out of which alone it can grow, one no longer wants it (Buddhism).

152 (March-June 1888)

Physiology of the nihilistic religions. Each and every nihilistic religion: a systematized case history of sickness employing religious-moralistic nomenclature. With pagan cults, it is around the interpretations of the great annual cycles that the cult revolves. With the Christian cult, it is around a cycle of paralytic phenomena that the cult revolves—

153 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

This nihilistic religion gathers together those decadence elements and the like that it finds in antiquity; namely: a. the party of the weak and ill-constituted (the refuse of the antique world: that which it thrust out most forcefully); b. the party of the morally-obsessed and antipagan; c. the party of the politically weary and the indifferent (blasé Romans), those without a country for whom life was emptiness; d. the party of those who were tired of themselves—who were glad to participate in a subterranean conspiracy—

154 (March-June 1888)

Buddha against the “Crucified.” Among the nihilistic religions, one may always clearly distinguish the Christian from the Buddhist. The Buddhist religion is the expression of a fine evening, a perfect sweetness and mildness—it is gratitude toward all that lies behind, and also for what is lacking: bitterness, disillusionment, rancor; finally, a lofty spiritual love; the subtleties of philosophical contradiction are behind it, even from these it is resting: but from these it still derives its spiritual glory and sunset glow. (—Origin in the highest castes—) The Christian movement is a degeneracy movement composed of reject and refuse elements of every kind: it is not the expression of the decline of a race, it is from the first an agglomeration of forms of morbidity crowding together and seeking one another out— It is therefore not national, not racially conditioned; it appeals to the disinherited everywhere; it is founded on a rancor against everything well-constituted and dominant: it needs a symbol that represents a curse on the well-constituted and dominant— It also stands in opposition to every spiritual movement, to all philosophy: it takes the side of idiots and utters a curse on the spirit. Rancor against the gifted, learned, spiritually independent: it detects in them the well-constituted, the masterful.

155 (Spring-Fall 1887)

In Buddhism this thought predominates: “All desires, all that produces affects and blood, draw one toward actions”—only to this extent is one warned against evil. For action—has no meaning, action binds one to existence: but all existence has no meaning. They see in evil a drive toward something illogical: to the affirmation of means to an end one denies. They seek a way of nonexistence and therefore they regard with horror all affective drives. E g., take no revenge! be no one’s enemy!— The hedonism of the weary is here the supreme measure of value. Nothing is further from Buddhism than the Jewish fanaticism of a Paul: nothing would be more repellent to its instincts than this tension, fire, unrest of the religious man, above all that form of sensuality that Christianity has sanctified with the name “love.” Moreover, it is the cultured and even the overspirited orders that find satisfaction in Buddhism: a race satiated and wearied by centuries of philosophical contentions, not, however, beneath all culture, like the classes from which Christianity arose— Emancipation even from good and evil appears to be of the essence of the Buddhist ideal: a refined state beyond morality is conceived that is identical with the state of perfection, in the presupposition that one needs to perform even good actions only for the time being, merely as a means—namely, as a means to emancipation from all actions.

156 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

A nihilistic religion [like Christianity],¹⁴ sprung from and appropriate to a people grown old and tame, having outlived all strong instincts—transferred step by step to another milieu, at length entering into youthful peoples which have not yet lived at all—very curious! The bliss of the close, the fold, the evening preached to barbarians and Germans! How thoroughly all that I first had to be barbarized, Germanized! To those who had dreamed a Valhalla: who found happiness only in war!—A supranational religion preached in a chaos where no nations even existed yet—

157 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The only way to refute priests and religions is this: to show that their errors have ceased to be beneficial—that they rather do harm; in short, that their own “proof of power” no longer holds good— 158 (1888) One should not confuse Christianity as a historical reality with that one root that its name calls to mind: the other roots from which it has grown up have been far more powerful. It is an unexampled misuse of words when such manifestations of decay and abortions as “Christian church,” “Christian faith” and “Christian life” label themselves with that holy name. What did Christ deny? Everything that is today called Christian.

159 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The entire Christian teaching as to what shall be believed, the entire Christian “truth,” is idle falsehood and deception: and precisely the opposite of what inspired the Christian movement in the beginning. Precisely that which is Christian in the ecclesiastical sense is anti-Christian in essence: things and people instead of symbols; history instead of eternal facts; forms, rites, dogmas instead of a way of life. Utter indifference to dogmas, cults, priests, church, theology is Christian. The Christian way of life is no more a fantasy than the Buddhist way of life: it is a means to being happy.

160 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Jesus starts directly with the condition the “Kingdom of Heaven” in the heart, and he does not find the means to it in the observances of the Jewish church; the reality of Judaism itself (its need to preserve itself) he regards as nothing; he is purely inward.— He likewise ignores the entire system of crude formalities governing intercourse with God: he opposes the whole teaching of repentance and atonement; he demonstrates how one must live in order to feel “deified”—and how one will not achieve it through repentance and contrition for one’s sins: “Sin is of no account” is his central judgment. Sin, repentance, forgiveness—none of this belongs here—it is acquired from Judaism, or it is pagan. 161 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)¹⁶ The Kingdom of Heaven is a condition of the heart (—it is said of children “for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven”): Not something “above the earth.” The Kingdom of God does not “come” chronologically-historically, on a certain day in the calendar, something that might be here one day but not the day before: it is an “inward change in the individual,” something that comes at every moment and at every moment has not yet arrived—

162 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The thief on the Cross:— When even the criminal undergoing a painful death declares: “the way this Jesus suffers and dies, without rebelling, without enmity, graciously, resignedly, is the only right way,” he has affirmed the gospel: and with that he is in Paradise—

163 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Neither by deeds nor in your heart should you resist him who harms you. You should admit of no ground for divorcing your wife. You should make no distinction between strangers and neighbors, foreigners and fellow countrymen. You should be angry with no one, you should show contempt to no one. Give alms in secret. You should not want to become rich. You should not swear. You should not judge. You should be reconciled with foes; you should forgive. Do not pray publicly. “Bliss” is not something promised: it is there if you live and act in such and such a way.¹⁷

164 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The entire prophet and miracle-worker attitude, the anger, the calling down of judgment is a dreadful corruption (e.g., Mark 6, 11. And whosoever shall not receive you ... verily I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrha, etc.). The "fig tree" (Matt. 21, 18): Now in the morning as he returned into the city, he hungered. And when he saw a fig tree in the way, he came to it, and found nothing thereon, but leaves only, and said unto it, "Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward forever." And presently the fig tree withered away.¹⁸

165 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

In a quite absurd way, the doctrine of reward and punishment has been crowded in: everything has thereby been ruined. In the same way, the practice of the first ecclesia militans,¹⁹ of the apostle [Paul]²⁰ and his attitude, has been represented in a quite falsifying way as commanded, as predetermined——. The subsequent glorification of the actual life and teaching of the first Christians: as if it had all been prescribed and the prescription merely followed— And as for the fulfillment of prophecies: what a mass of falsification and forgery!

166 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Jesus opposed the commonplace life with a real life, a life in truth: nothing was further from him than the stupid nonsense of an “eternalized Peter,” an eternal personal survival. What he fights against is this exaggerated inflation of the “person”: how can he desire to eternize precisely that? In the same way he fights against hierarchy within the community: he does not promise that reward shall be proportionate to performance: how can he have meant punishment and reward in the beyond!

167 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Christianity: a naive beginning to a Buddhist peace movement in the very seat of resentment—but reversed by Paul into a pagan mystery doctrine, which finally learns to treat with the entire state organization—and wages war, condemns, tortures, swears, hates. Paul starts from the need for a mystery felt by the broad, religiously excited masses: he seeks a sacrifice, a bloody phantasmagoria which will stand up in competition with the images of the mystery cults: God on the cross, blood-drinking, the unio mystica with the “sacrifice.” He seeks to bring the afterlife (the blissful, atoned afterlife of the individual soul) as resurrection into a causal relationship with that sacrifice (after the type of Dionysus, Mithras, Osiris). He needs to bring the concept guilt and atonement into the foreground, not a new way of life (as Jesus himself had demonstrated and lived) but a new cult, a new faith, a faith in a miraculous transformation (“redemption” through faith). He understood what the pagan world had the greatest need of, and from the facts of Christ’s life and death made a quite arbitrary selection, giving everything a new accentuation, shifting the emphasis everywhere—he annulled primitive Christianity as a matter or principle — The attempt to destroy priests and theologians culminated, thanks to Paul, in a new priesthood and theology—in a new ruling order and a church. The attempt to destroy the exaggerated inflation of the “person” culminated in faith in the “eternal person” (in concern for “eternal salvation”—), in the most paradoxical excess of personal egoism. This is the humor of the situation, a tragic humor: Paul re-erected on a grand scale precisely that which Christ had annulled through his way of living. At last, when the church was complete, it sanctioned even the existence of the state.

168 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

—The church is precisely that against which Jesus preached— and against which he taught his disciples to fight—

169 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

A god who died for our sins: redemption through faith; resurrection after death—all these are counterfeits of true Christianity for which that disastrous wrong-headed fellow [Paul]²¹ must be held responsible. The exemplary life consists of love and humility; in a fullness of heart that does not exclude even the lowliest; in a formal repudiation of maintaining one's rights, of self-defense, of victory in the sense of personal triumph; in faith in blessedness here on earth, in spite of distress, opposition and death; in reconciliation; in the absence of anger; not wanting to be rewarded; not being obliged to anyone; the completest spiritual-intellectual independence; a very proud life beneath the will to a life of poverty and service. After the church had let itself be deprived of the entire Christian way of life and had quite specifically sanctioned life under the state, that form of life that Jesus had combatted and condemned, it had to find the meaning of Christianity in something else: in faith in unbelievable things, in the ceremonial of prayers, worship, feasts, etc. The concept "sin," "forgiveness," "reward"—all quite unimportant and virtually excluded from primitive Christianity—now comes into the foreground. An appalling mishmash of Greek philosophy and Judaism; asceticism; continual judging and condemning; order of rank, etc.

170 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Christianity has from the outset transformed the symbolic into crudities: the antithesis “real life” and “false” life: misunderstood as “this life” and “the life to come”; the concept “eternal life,” the antithesis to transient personal life, as “personal immortality”; brotherhood on the basis of sharing food and drink together after the Hebrew-Arabic custom, as “the miracle of transubstantiation”; “resurrection—” understood as entry into “real life,” as a state of “rebirth”; this is made into an historical eventuality which takes place some time or other after death; the teaching that the son of man is the “Son of God,” the living relationship between God and man; this is made into the “second person of the divinity”—the filial relationship to God of every man, even the lowliest, is abolished; salvation through faith (namely, that there is no means of becoming a son of God except by following the way of life taught by Christ) reversed into the faith that one is to believe in some sort of miraculous subtraction of sins, accomplished not through man but through Christ’s deed: With that, “Christ on the cross” had to be interpreted anew. This death in itself was not at all the main thing—it had been only one more sign of how one ought to behave in relation to the authorities and laws of this world: not to defend oneself— That had been the lesson.

171 (March-June 1888)

Toward a psychology of Paul.— The given fact is the death of Jesus. This has to be explained— That an explanation may be true or false has never entered the minds of such people as these: one day a sublime possibility comes into their heads: “this death could mean such and such”—and at once it does mean such and such! A hypothesis is proved true by the sublime impetus it imparts to its originator— “The proof of power”: i.e., an idea is proved true by its effect—(“by their fruits” as the Bible naively says); what inspires must be true—that for which one sheds one’s blood must be true— Here, the sudden feeling of power that an idea arouses in its originator is everywhere accounted proof of its value: —and since one knows no way of honoring an idea other than by calling it true, the first predicate with which it is honored is the predicate “true”— How otherwise could it be so effective? It was imagined by some power: if that power were not real, it could not be effective— The idea is understood to have been inspired: the effect that it exercises possesses something of the violence of a demonic influence— An idea that such a decadent is unable to resist, to which he completely succumbs, is thus “proved” true! ! ! None of these holy epileptics and seers of visions possessed a thousandth part of that integrity in self-criticism with which a philologist today reads a text or proves the truth of an historical event— Compared with us, they are moral cretins—22

172 (Spring-Fall 1887)

That it does not matter whether a thing is true, but only what effect it produces—absolute lack of intellectual integrity. Everything is justified, lies, slander, the most shameless forgery, if it serves to raise the temperature—until one “believes”—A systematic school of the means to seduction to a faith: contempt, on principle, for the spheres from which contradiction might come (—the spheres of reason, philosophy and wisdom, mistrust, caution); a shameless praising and glorification of the doctrine, with constant reference to the fact that it was God who gave it—that the apostle signifies nothing—that nothing here is to be criticized, but only believed, accepted; that it is the most extraordinary grace and favor to receive such a doctrine of redemption; that the deepest gratitude and humility is the condition in which to receive it—The resentment which these lowly-placed persons feel toward everything held in honor is constantly gambled upon: that one represents this doctrine as a counterdoctrine in opposition to the wisdom of the world, to the power of the world, seduces them to it. It convinces the outcast and underprivileged of all kinds; it promises blessedness, advantage, privilege to the most insignificant and humble; it fills poor little foolish heads with an insane conceit, as if they were the meaning and the salt of the earth—All this, I repeat, one cannot sufficiently despise. We shall spare ourselves a critique of the doctrine; it suffices to observe the means it uses to know what it is one is dealing with. It identified with virtue, it shamelessly claimed for itself alone the whole fascinating force of virtue—it identified with the power of paradox and with the need felt by old civilizations for spice and absurdity; it amazed, it enraged, it provoked persecution and mistreatment—It is precisely the same well-pondered baseness with which the Jewish priesthood established its power and the Jewish church was created—One should distinguish: (1) that warmth of the passion “love” (resting on the subterranean basis of a heated sensuality); (2) the absolute ignobility of Christianity: —the continual exaggeration, the verbosity; —the lack of cool spirituality and irony; —the unmilitary nature of all its instincts; —the priestly prejudice against manly pride, against sensuality, the sciences, the arts.²³

173 (Summer-Fall 1888)

Paul: he seeks power in opposition to ruling Judaism—his movement is too weak — Revaluation of the concept “Jew”: the “race” is set aside—: but that means negating what is fundamental. The “martyr,” the “fanatic,” the value of all strong faith— Christianity is the decadent form of the old world sunk into deepest impotence, so that the sickest and unhealthiest elements and desires come to the top. Consequently, in order to create a unity, a resisting power, other instincts had to step into the foreground—in short, a kind of calamity was needed such as that from which the Jews had acquired their instinct for self-preservation— In this regard, the persecutions of the Christians were invaluable—a sense of community in danger, mass-conversion as the only means of putting an end to individual persecution (—consequently he takes as lightly as possible the concept “conversion”—).

174 (Spring-Fall 1887, rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

The Christian-Jewish life: here resentment did not predominate. Only the great persecutions could have developed this passion to this extent—the ardor of love as well as that of hatred. When one sees one's dearest sacrificed for one's faith, one becomes aggressive; we owe the triumph of Christianity to its persecutors. The asceticism in Christianity is not specifically Christian: this is what Schopenhauer misunderstood: it only makes inroads into Christianity wherever asceticism also exists apart from Christianity. Hypochondriac Christianity, the torturing and vivisection of the conscience, is in the same way only characteristic of a certain soil in which Christian values have taken root: it is not Christianity itself. Christianity has absorbed diseases of all kinds from morbid soil: one can only reproach it for its inability to guard against any infection. But that precisely is its essence: Christianity is a type of decadence.

175 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

The reality upon which Christianity could be raised was the little Jewish family of the Diaspora, with its warmth and affection, with its readiness to help and sustain one another—unheard-of and perhaps not understood in the whole Roman Empire—with its concealed pride of the “chosen” disguised as humility, with its innermost denial, untouched by envy, of all that is on top and possesses power and splendor. To have recognized in this a form of power, to have recognized that this blissful condition was communicable, seductive, infectious to pagans also—that was Paul’s genius: to employ this store of latent energy, of prudent happiness for a “Jewish church of freer confession”—the entire Jewish experience and mastery of communal self-preservation under foreign rule, also Jewish propaganda—he divined that as his task. What he lit upon was just this absolutely unpolitical and withdrawn species of little people: their art of asserting themselves and prevailing, cultivated through a number of virtues which constituted virtue in its entirety (“means by which a particular species of man preserves and enhances himself”). The principle of love derives from the little Jewish communities: it is a soul of the more passionate kind that glows here under the ashes of humility and wretchedness: this was neither Greek, nor Indian, nor Germanic. The song in praise of love that Paul composed is nothing Christian, but a Jewish outburst of the eternal flame that is Semitic. If Christianity has done anything essential psychologically, it is that it raised the temperature of the soul among those cooler and nobler races that were then on top; it was the discovery that the most wretched life can become rich and inestimable through a rise in temperature— It goes without saying that such a transference could not take place in respect to the ruling orders: the Jews and Christians had their bad manners against them—and when allied to bad manners, strength and passion of soul are repellent and almost disgusting (—I see these bad manners whenever I read the New Testament). One had to be related through lowliness and want to the type of lowly people who spoke here to feel their attraction— How one reacts to the New Testament is a test of whether one has any classical taste in one’s bones (cf. Tacitus); whoever is not revolted by it, whoever does not honestly and profoundly sense something of foeda superstitio in it, something from which one withdraws one’s hand as if to avoid being soiled, does not know what is classical. One must feel about the “cross” as Goethe did—

176 (March-June 1888)

Reaction of the little people:— Love gives the greatest feeling of power. To grasp to what extent not man in general but a certain species of man speaks here. This is to be exhumed more precisely.²⁷ “We are divine through love, we become ‘children of God’; God loves us and wants nothing whatever from us save love”; this means: no morality, obedience, or activity produces that feeling of power that love produces; one does nothing bad from love, one does much more than one would do from obedience and virtue. Here is the happiness of the herd, the feeling of community in great and small things, the living feeling of unity experienced as the sum of the feeling of life. Being helpful and useful and caring for others continually arouses the feeling of power; visible success, the expression of pleasure underlines the feeling of power; pride is not lacking, in the form of community, the abode of God, the “chosen.” What has in fact happened is that man has again experienced an altération of personality: this time he calls his feeling of love God. One must picture to oneself what the awakening of such a feeling is like: a kind of ecstasy, a strange language, a “gospel”— it was this novelty that forbade him to ascribe love to himself—: he thought God was walking before him and coming alive within him.— “God descends to man,” one’s “neighbor” is transfigured into a god (in so far as he arouses the feeling of love). Jesus is one’s neighbor as soon as he is conceived as godhead, as a cause of the feeling of power.

177 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The faithful are conscious that they are endlessly indebted to Christianity, and therefore conclude that its originator is a personage of the first rank— This conclusion is false, but it is typical of conclusions drawn by worshipers. Objectively considered, it is possible, first, that they are in error about the value of that for which they are indebted to Christianity: convictions prove nothing in favor of that of which one is convinced; in the case of religions they establish rather a suspicion against it— It is possible, secondly, that the debt to Christianity ought not to be ascribed to its founder but to the finished structure, to the whole thing, the church, etc. The concept “originator” is so ambiguous it can even mean the accidental cause of a movement: the figure of the founder has been enlarged in proportion as the church has grown; but precisely this perspective of worship permits the conclusion that at some time or other this founder was something very uncertain and insecure, in the beginning— Consider with what degree of freedom Paul treats, indeed almost juggles with, the problem of the person of Jesus: someone who died, who was seen again after his death, who was delivered over to death by the Jews— A mere “motif”: he then wrote the music to it— A zero in the beginning.²⁸ 178 (1884) The founder of a religion can be insignificant—a match, no more!

179 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

On the psychological problem of Christianity.— The driving force is: resentment, the popular uprising, the revolt of the underprivileged. (It is otherwise with Buddhism: this is not born out of a resentment movement but fights resentment because it leads to action) This peace party grasps that the renunciation of enmity in thought and deed is a condition of distinction and preservation. Herein lies the psychological difficulty that has hampered the understanding of Christianity: the drive that created it forces one to fight against it as a matter of principle. Only as a peace and innocence party has this insurrectionary movement any possibility of success: it must conquer through extreme mildness, sweetness, softness; it grasps this by instinct— Masterstroke: to deny and condemn the drive whose expression one is, continually to display, by word and deed, the antithesis of this drive—

180 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Pretended youth. One is deceiving oneself if one imagines here a naive and youthful people rising up against an ancient culture; superstition has it that the deeper springs of life gushed forth anew in those classes of the lowliest people where Christianity grew and took root: one understands nothing of the psychology of Christianity if one takes it to be the expression of a newly arisen national youthfulness and racial invigoration. On the contrary: it is a typical form of decadence, the moral hypersensitivity and hysteria of a sick mishmash populace grown weary and aimless. The extraordinary company that here gathered around this master-seducer really belongs wholly in a Russian novel: all the neuroses keep a rendezvous in them—the absence of duties, the instinct that everything is really coming to an end, that nothing is worth while any more, contentment in a dolce far niente.²⁹ The power and certainty of the future in the Jewish instinct, its tremendously tough will to exist and to power, lies in its ruling classes: those orders which primitive Christianity raised up are most clearly distinguished by the exhaustion of their instincts. On one hand, one has had enough: on the other, one is content with oneself, in oneself, for oneself.

181 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Christianity as emancipated Judaism (in the same way as a local and racially conditioned nobility at length emancipates itself from these conditions and goes in search of related elements—) As church (community) within the state, as an unpolitical structure; As life, discipline, practice, art of living; As religion of sin (of transgression against God as the only kind of transgression, as the sole cause of suffering in general), with a universal cure for it. There are only sins against God; men shall not judge acts done against men, nor demand a reckoning, except in the name of God. Ditto, all commands (love): everything is associated with God and done to man for God's sake. A higher prudence lies in this (—a very narrow life, as with the Eskimos, is endurable only by the most peaceable and cautious disposition: Jewish-Christian dogma turns against sin in favor of the “sinner”—).

182 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The Jewish priesthood had understood how to present everything which it claimed as a divine precept, as obedience to a command of God—also how to introduce whatever served to preserve Israel and make possible its existence (e.g., a number of works: circumcision, sacrificial cult as the center of national consciousness) not as nature, but as “God.”— This process continued; within Judaism, where the necessity for “works” was not felt (that is to say, as a means of segregation from the outside world), a priestly species of man could be conceived that behaved as the “noble nature” behaves toward the aristocracy; a classless and at the same time spontaneous priestliness of soul, which now, in order to contrast itself sharply with its opposite, attached value not to “works,” but to the “disposition”— Fundamentally it was again the question of making a certain species of soul prevail: as it were, a popular uprising within a priestly people—a pietistic movement from below (sinners, publicans, women, the sick). Jesus of Nazareth was the sign by which they recognized themselves. And again, in order to believe in themselves they need a theological transfiguration: they require nothing less than “the Son of God” to create a faith for themselves— And just as the priesthood had falsified the entire history of Israel, so again the attempt was here made to forge the history of mankind in general, so that Christianity might appear to be its most cardinal event. This movement could have arisen only on the soil of Judaism, whose principal deed was to associate guilt with misfortune and to reduce all guilt to guilt against God: Christianity raised all this to the second power.

183 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The symbolism of Christianity is based on the Jewish, which had already resolved all reality (history, nature) into a holy unnaturalness and unreality—which no longer recognized real history, which was no longer interested in natural consequences—

184 (March-June 1888)

The Jews tried to prevail after they had lost two of their castes, that of the warrior and that of the peasant; in this sense they are the “castrated”: they have the priests—and then immediately the chandala— As is only fair, a break develops among them, a revolt of the chandala: the origin of Christianity. Because they knew the warrior only as their master, they brought into their religion enmity toward the noble, toward the exalted and proud, toward power, toward the ruling orders—: they are pessimists from indignation— Thus they created an important new posture: the priest at the head of the chandala—against the noble orders— Christianity drew the ultimate conclusion of this movement: even in the Jewish priesthood it still sensed caste, the privileged, the noble—it abolished the priest — The Christian is the chandala who repudiates the priest—the chandala who redeems himself— That is why the French Revolution is the daughter and continuation of Christianity—its instincts are against caste, against the noble, against the last privileges——

185 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The “Christian ideal”: staged with Jewish subtlety. The basic psychological drives, its “nature”: the revolt against the ruling spiritual power; attempt to make the virtues through which happiness is possible for the lowliest into the standard ideal of all values—to call it God: the instinct for preservation in the least vital classes; to justify absolute abstention from war and resistance through this ideal—including obedience; love of one another as consequence of love of God.

Artifice: to deny all natural mobilia and to transfer them to the spiritual realm beyond—to exploit virtue and its veneration entirely for one’s own ends, step by step to deny virtue to everything non-Christian.

186 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The profound contempt with which the Christian was treated in the noble areas of classical antiquity is of a kind with the present instinctive aversion to Jews: it is the hatred of the free and self-respecting orders for those who are pushing and who combine timid and awkward gestures with an absurd opinion of their worth. The New Testament is the gospel of a wholly ignoble species of man; their claim to possess more value, indeed to possess all value, actually has something revolting about it—even today.

187 (Spring-Fall 1887)

How little the subject matters! It is the spirit that gives life! What stuffy and sickroom air arises from all that excited chatter about “redemption,” love, blessedness, faith, truth, “eternal life”! Take, on the other hand, a really pagan book, e.g., Petronius, where fundamentally nothing is done, said, desired and valued but what by peevish Christian standards is sin, mortal sin even. And yet how pleasant is the purer air, the superior spirituality of its quicker pace, the liberated and overflowing strength that feels sure of the future! In the entire New Testament there is not one single bouffonnerie: but that fact refutes a book—

188 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The profound unworthiness with which all life outside the Christian life is condemned: they are not content with thinking meanly of their real opponents, they require nothing less than a collective defamation of everything which is not themselves— Arrogance of holiness gets along famously with a base and crafty soul: witness the first Christians. The future: they see they are well paid— Theirs is the most uncleanly kind of spirit there is. The entire life of Christ is so presented as to help to justify the prophecies: he acts in this way in order that they may be justified—

189 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The lying interpretation of the words, gestures and conditions of the dying: fear of death, for example, is systematically confused with fear of the “after death”— 30

190 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The Christians did as the Jews did and put into the mouth of their master and encrusted his life with what they conceived to be a condition of their existence and an innovation. At the same time they restored to him all proverbial wisdom —: in short, they represented their actual life and activity as obedience and thus, as sanctified for their propaganda. What it all depends upon can be gathered from Paul: it is not much. What remains is the elaboration of a type of saint on the basis of what they considered holy. The entire “miraculous doctrine,” including the resurrection, is a consequence of self-glorification by the community, which ascribed to its master in a higher degree whatever it thought itself capable of (it derived its strength from him—).

191 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Christians have never put into practice the acts Jesus prescribed for them, and the impudent chatter about “justification by faith” and its unique and supreme significance is only the consequence of the church’s lack of courage and will to confess the works which Jesus demanded. The Buddhist acts differently from the non-Buddhist; the Christian acts as all the world does and possesses a Christianity of ceremonies and moods. The profound and contemptible mendaciousness of Christianity in Europe—: we really are becoming the contempt of the Arabs, Hindus, Chinese— Listen to the speeches of Germany’s first statesman on what has really occupied Europe for forty years now—listen to the language, the court-chaplain Tartuffery.

192 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

“Faith” or “works”?— But that “works,” the habit of certain works, should engender a certain evaluation and finally a certain disposition is as natural as it is unnatural that mere evaluation should produce “works.” One must practice deeds, not the strengthening of one’s value-feelings; one must first have some ability— The Christian dilettantism of Luther. Faith is a pons asinorum.³¹ The background is a profound conviction on the part of Luther and his kind of their incapacity for Christian works, a personal fact disguised beneath an extreme doubt as to whether activity of all kinds is not sin and the work of the Devil: so that the value of existence resides in single highly tensed conditions of inactivity (prayer, effusion, etc.).— In the last resort he was right: the instincts expressed in all the actions of the Reformers are the most brutal that exist. Only by an absolute turning away from themselves, by absorption in their opposite, only as an illusion (“faith”) was existence endurable to them.

193 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

“What to do in order to believe?”—an absurd question. What is wrong with Christianity is that it refrains from doing all those things that Christ commanded should be done. It is the mean life, but interpreted through the eye of contempt.

194 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Entry into real life—one rescues one's personal life from death by living a common life—

195 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

“Christianity” has become something fundamentally different from what its founder did and desired. It is the great antipagan movement of antiquity, formulated through the employment of the life, teaching and “words” of the founder of Christianity but interpreted in an absolutely arbitrary way after the pattern of fundamentally different needs: translated into the language of every already existing subterranean religion— It is the rise of pessimism (—while Jesus wanted to bring peace and the happiness of lambs) : and moreover the pessimism of the weak, the inferior, the suffering, the oppressed. Its mortal enemy is (1) power in character, spirit and taste; “worldliness”; (2) classical “happiness,” the noble levity and skepticism, the hard pride, the eccentric intemperance and the cool self-sufficiency of the sage, Greek refinement in gesture, word, and form. Its mortal enemy is the Roman just as much as the Greek. Attempt by antipaganism to found and make itself possible philosophically: predilection for the ambiguous figures of the old culture, above all for Plato, that instinctive Semite and anti-Hellene—also for Stoicism, which is essentially the work of Semites (—“dignity” as strictness, law, virtue as greatness, self-responsibility, authority, as supreme sovereignty over one’s own person— this is Semitic. The Stoic is an Arabian sheik wrapped in Greek togas and concepts).³²

196 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Christianity only takes up the fight that had already begun against the classical ideal and the noble religion. In fact, this entire transformation is an adaption to the needs and the level of understanding of the religious masses of that time: those masses which believed in Isis, Mithras, Dionysus, the “Great Mother,” and which desired of a religion: (1) hope of a beyond, (2) the bloody phantasmagoria of the sacrificial animal (the mystery), (3) the redemptive deed, the holy legend, (4) asceticism, world-denial, superstitious “purification,” (5) a hierarchy, a form of community. In short: Christianity accommodated itself to already existing and established antipaganism, to the cults that had been combatted by Epicurus—more precisely, to the religions of the lower masses, the women, the slaves, the non-noble classes. We therefore have the following misunderstandings: the immortality of the person; the presumed other world; the absurdity of the concept of punishment and the concept of sin at the heart of the interpretation of existence; instead of the deification of man his un-deification, the digging of the deepest chasm, which only a miracle, only prostration in deepest self-contempt can bridge; the whole world of corrupt imagination and morbid affects instead of a kindly and simple way of life, instead of a Buddhistic happiness attainable on earth; an ecclesiastical order with priesthood, theology, cult, sacrament; in short, everything that Jesus of Nazareth had combatted; miracles all over, superstition: while the distinguishing mark of Judaism and earliest Christianity is its repugnance to miracles, its relative rationality.

197 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The psychological presupposition: lack of knowledge and culture, ignorance which has forgotten all shame: imagine these impudent saints in Athens; the Jewish instinct of the “chosen”: they claim all the virtues for themselves without further ado, and count the rest of the world their opposites; a profound sign of a vulgar soul; a complete lack of real aims, of real tasks, for which one needs other virtues than those of the bigot—the state took this work from their shoulders: these impudent people nonetheless behaved as if they had no need of the state. “Except ye become as little children—”: oh, how far we are from this psychological naïveté!

198 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The founder of Christianity had to pay for having directed himself to the lowest class of Jewish society and intelligence. They conceived him in the spirit they understood— It is a real disgrace to have concocted a salvation story, a personal God, a personal redeemer, a personal immortality and to have retained all the meanness of the “person” and “history” in a doctrine that contests the reality of all that is personal and historical— The salvation legend in place of the symbolic now-and-always, here and everywhere; the miracle in place of the psychological symbol.

199 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Nothing is less innocent than the New Testament. One knows from what soil it sprang. This people of an inflexible self-will which knew how to prevail after it had lost every natural support and had long since forfeited its right to existence, and to that end had to raise itself up by unnatural, purely imaginary presuppositions (as chosen people, as community of saints, as the people of the promise, as “church”): this people handled the pia fraus with such perfection, such a degree of “good conscience,” that one cannot be sufficiently cautious when it preaches morality. When Jews step forward as innocence itself then the danger is great: one should always have one’s little fund of reason, mistrust, and malice to hand when one reads the New Testament. People of the basest origin, in part rabble, outcasts not only from good but also from respectable society, raised away from even the smell of culture, without discipline, without knowledge, without the remotest suspicion that there is such a thing as conscience in spiritual matters; simply—Jews: with an instinctive ability to create an advantage, a means of seduction out of every superstitious supposition, out of ignorance itself.³⁴

200 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. 1888)

I regard Christianity as the most fatal seductive lie that has yet existed, as the great unholy lie: I draw out the after-growth and sprouting of its ideal from beneath every form of disguise, I reject every compromise position with respect to it—I force a war against it. Petty people’s morality as the measure of things: this is the most disgusting degeneration culture has yet exhibited. And this kind of ideal still hanging over mankind as “God”!!

201 (Spring-Fall 1887)

However modest one may be in one's demand for intellectual cleanliness, one cannot help feeling, when coming into contact with the New Testament, a kind of inexpressible discomfiture: for the unchecked impudence with which the least qualified want to raise their voice on the greatest problems, and even claim to be judges of such things, surpasses all measure. The shameless levity with which the most intractable problems (life, world, God, purpose of life) are spoken of, as if they were not problems at all but simply things that these little bigots knew!

202 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

This was the most fatal kind of megalomania there has ever been on earth: when these lying little abortions of bigots began to lay claim to the words “God,” “Last Judgment,” “truth,” “love,” “wisdom,” “Holy Spirit” and with them made a boundary between themselves and “the world”; when this species of man began to reverse values according to his own image, as if he were the meaning, the salt, the measure, and the standard of all the rest—one should have built madhouses for them and nothing more. That one persecuted them was a piece of ancient folly in the grand manner: that meant taking them too seriously, that meant making something serious out of them. The whole fatality was made possible by the presence in the world already of a similar kind of megalomania, the Jewish (—once the chasm had opened up between the Jews and the Christian-Jews, the Christian-Jews had to employ once more and in an ultimate intensification for their own self-preservation the self-preservative procedures devised by the Jewish instinct—); on the other hand, Greek moral philosophy had already done everything to prepare the way for and to make palatable moral fanaticism even among Greeks and Romans—Plato, the great viaduct of corruption, who first refused to see nature in morality, who had already debased the Greek gods with his concept “good,” who was already marked by Jewish bigotry (—in Egypt?)

203 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

On the denaturing of morality.— These little herd-animal virtues do not by any means lead to “eternal life”: to put them on show in this way, and oneself with them, may be very clever, but to him who keeps his eyes open even here, it remains in spite of all the most ludicrous of all plays. One does not by any means deserve a privileged position on earth and in heaven by attaining perfection as a little, good-natured sheep; one remains at best a little, good-natured, absurd sheep with horns—provided one does not burst with vanity—as the court chaplains do—or provoke scandal by posing as a judge. What a tremendous transfiguration of color here illumines the little virtues—as if they were the reflection of divine qualities! The natural task and utility of every virtue is systematically hushed up; it is of value only with reference to a divine command, a divine model, only with reference to heavenly and spiritual goods. (Magnificent: as if it had to do with “salvation of the soul”: but it was a means of “enduring” things here with as many beautiful feelings as possible.)

204 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

The law, the thoroughly realistic formalization of certain conditions for the self-preservation of a community, forbids certain actions directed to certain ends, namely those that are directed against the community: it does not forbid the disposition that produces these actions—for it needs these actions for other ends, namely against the enemies of the community. Then the moral idealist appears and says: “God beholds the heart: the action itself is nothing; one must exterminate the aggressive disposition that produces it—” Under normal conditions one laughs at this; only in those exceptional instances when a community lives absolutely outside the necessity of waging war for its existence does one lend an ear to such things. One abandons a disposition whose utility is no longer apparent. This was the case, e.g., when Buddha appeared amidst a very peaceable and even spiritually exhausted community. This was also the case with the earliest Christian community (also Jewish community), whose presupposition is the absolutely unpolitical Jewish society. Christianity could grow only in the soil of Judaism, i.e., amidst a people that had already renounced politics and lived a kind of parasitic existence within the Roman order of things. Christianity is a step further on: one is even more free to “emasculate” oneself—circumstances permit it. One drives nature out of morality when one says “Love your enemies”: for then the natural “Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thy enemy” in the law (in instinct) has become meaningless; then this love of one’s neighbor must also find a new basis (as a kind of love of God). Everywhere, God is inserted and utility withdrawn; everywhere the real origin of morality is denied: the veneration of nature, which lies precisely in the recognition of a natural morality, is destroyed at its roots— Whence comes the seductive charm of such an emasculated ideal of man? Why are we not disgusted by it as we are perhaps disgusted by the idea of a castrato?— The answer lies precisely here: the voice of a castrato does not disgust us, despite the cruel mutilation that is its condition: it has grown sweeter— Just because the “male organ” has been amputated from virtue, a feminine note has been brought to the voice of virtue that it did not have before. If we think, on the other hand, of the fearful hardship, danger, and accidents that a life of manly virtue brings with it—the life of a Corsican even today or that of the pagan Arab (which is similar even in its details to the life of the Corsican: their songs might have been written by Corsicans)— we grasp how precisely the most robust kind of man is fascinated and affected by this lustful note of “goodness,” of “purity”— A shepherd’s song—an idyl—the “good man”: these things produce the strongest effect in ages when tragedy walks abroad. * But we have with this also recognized to what extent the “idealist” (—ideal-castrato) also emerges from a quite definite reality and is not merely a fantasist—he has arrived at the knowledge that for his kind of reality such a coarse injunction forbidding definite actions has no meaning (because the very instinct for these actions has been weakened through long lack of practice, of need for practice). The castrator formulates a number of new self-preservative measures for men of a quite definite species: in this he is a realist. His means of legislation are the same as those of the older legislators: the appeal to authority of all kinds, to “God,” the employment of the concept “guilt and punishment”—i.e., he makes use of all the appurtenances of the older ideal, only in a new interpretation, punishment, for example, made more inward (perhaps as the pang of conscience). In practice this species of man goes under as soon as the exceptional conditions of his existence cease—a kind of Tahiti and island happiness, as in the life of the little Jews in the provinces. Their only natural opponent is the soil from which they grew: against this they need to fight, against this they must let the offensive and defensive affects grow again: their opponents are the adherents of the old ideal (—this species of enmity is championed on a grand scale by Paul in relation to Judaism, by Luther in relation to the priestly-ascetic ideal). The mildest form of this opposition is certainly that of the early Buddhists: perhaps no greater amount of work has been expended upon anything than upon the discouragement and weakening of feelings of enmity. The fight against resentment seems to be almost the first duty of the Buddhist: only thus is peace of soul assured. To disengage oneself, but without rancor: that presupposes, to be sure, an astonishingly mild and sweet humanity—saints—* The prudence of moral castrationism.— How can one wage war against the manly affects and valuations? One possesses no means of physical force, one can wage only a war of cunning, sorcery, lies, in short “of the spirit.” First recipe: one claims virtue in general for one’s ideal; one negates the older ideal to the point of presenting it as the antithesis of all ideals. For this one employs an art of defamation. Second recipe: one sets up one’s own type as the measure of value in general; one projects it into things, behind things, behind the fate of things—as God. Third recipe: one sets up the opponent of one’s ideal as the opponent of God; one fabricates for oneself the right to great pathos, to power, to curse and to bless. Fourth recipe: one derives all suffering, all that is uncanny, fearful and fateful in existence from opposition to one’s own ideal:—all suffering is punishment, even in the case of one’s followers (—unless it accompanies a test, etc.). Fifth recipe: one goes so far as to conceive nature as the antithesis of one’s own ideal; one regards it as a great test of patience, as a sort of martyrdom to endure natural conditions for very long; one practices dédain of mien and manners in respect to all “natural things.” Sixth recipe: the victory of unnaturalness, of the castrationist ideal, the victory of the world of the pure, good, sinless, blessed is projected into the future as conclusion, finale, great hope, as the “coming of the kingdom of God.” ——I hope that at this artificial inflation of a small species into the absolute measure of things one is still permitted to laugh?

205 (Spring-Fall 1887)

I do not like at all about that Jesus of Nazareth or his apostle Paul that they put so many ideas into the heads of little people, as if their modest virtues were of any consequence. We have had to pay too dearly for it: for they have brought the more valuable qualities of virtue and man into ill repute; they have set the bad conscience of the noble soul against its self-sufficiency; they have led astray, to the point of self-destruction, the brave, magnanimous, daring, excessive inclinations of the strong soul—

206 (Spring-Fall 1887)

In the New Testament, and specifically in the Gospels, I hear absolutely nothing “divine” speaking: much rather an indirect form of the most abysmal rage for defamation and destruction—one of the most dishonorable forms of hatred. It lacks all knowledge of the qualities of a higher nature. Clumsy abuse of all kinds of philistinism; the entire treasury of proverbs is laid claim to and fully utilized; was it necessary for a god to come in order to say to these publicans etc.— Nothing is more vulgar than this battle against the Pharisees with the aid of an absurd and impractical moral pretence; the people have always taken pleasure in such a tour de force. The reproach of “hypocrisy!” coming from this mouth! Nothing is more vulgar than this kind of treatment of an opponent—a most insidious criterion of nobility or its reverse—

207 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Primitive Christianity is abolition of the state: forbids oaths, war service, courts of justice, self-defense and the defense of any kind of community, the distinction between fellow countrymen and foreigners, and also the differentiation of classes. Christ's example: he does not resist those who are harming him; he does not defend himself; he does more: he "turns the other cheek" (to the question: "Tell us whether thou be the Christ" he answers: "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven"). He forbids his disciples to defend him; he makes it clear that he could get help but will not. Christianity is also abolition of society: it prefers all that society counts of little worth, it grows up among outcasts and the condemned, among lepers of all kinds, "sinners," "publicans," prostitutes, the most stupid folk (the "fishers"); it disdains the rich, the learned, the noble, the virtuous, the "correct"—

208 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The war against the noble and powerful as it is waged in the New Testament is a war after the manner of Reynard the Fox and with the same methods: but always with priestly unction and a decided refusal to recognize one's own cunning.

209 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The gospel: the news that a gateway to happiness stands open for the poor and lowly—that all one has to do is free oneself from the institutions, traditions, guardianship of the upper classes: to this extent the rise of Christianity is nothing more than the typical socialist doctrine. Property, gain, fatherland, rank and status, tribunals, police, state, church, education, art, the army: all are so many hindrances to happiness, errors, snares, works of the devil, upon which the gospel passes judgment—all typical of socialist doctrine. In the background is insurrection, the explosion of a stored-up antipathy towards the “masters,” the instinct for how much happiness could lie, after such long oppression, simply in feeling oneself free— (Usually a sign that the lower orders have been too well treated, their tongues have already tasted a happiness forbidden them— It is not hunger that provokes revolutions, but that the people have acquired an appetite en mangeant—).

210 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Read the New Testament as a book of seduction: virtue is appropriated in the instinct that with it one can capture public opinion—and indeed the most modest virtue, which recognizes the ideal sheep and nothing further (including the shepherd—): a little, sweet, well-meaning, helpful, and enthusiastically cheerful kind of virtue that expects absolutely nothing from the outside—that sets itself altogether apart from “the world.” The most absurd arrogance, as if on one hand the community represented all that is right, and on the other the world all that is false, eternally reprehensible, and rejected, and as if the destiny of mankind revolved about this fact. The most absurd hatred toward everything in power: but without touching it! A kind of inner detachment that outwardly leaves everything as it was (servitude and slavery; to know how to turn everything into a means of serving God and virtue).

211 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Christianity is possible as the most private form of existence; it presupposes a narrow, remote, completely unpolitical society— it belongs in the conventicle. A “Christian state,” “Christian politics,” on the other hand, are a piece of impudence, a lie, like for instance a Christian leadership of an army, which finally treats the “God of Hosts” as if he were chief of staff. The papacy, too, has never been in a position to carry on Christian politics; and when reformers indulge in politics, as Luther did, one sees that they are just as much followers of Machiavelli as any immoralist or tyrant.

212 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Christianity is still possible at any time. It is not tied to any of the impudent dogmas that have adorned themselves with its name: it requires neither the doctrine of a personal God, nor that of sin, nor that of immortality, nor that of redemption, nor that of faith; it has absolutely no need of metaphysics, and even less of asceticism, even less of a Christian “natural science.” Christianity is a way of life, not a system of beliefs. It tell us how to act, not what we ought to believe. Whoever says today: “I will not be a soldier,” “I care nothing for the courts,” “I shall not claim the services of the police,” “I will do nothing that may disturb the peace within me: and if I must suffer on that account, nothing will serve better to maintain my peace than suffering”—he would be a Christian.³⁸

213 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Toward a history of Christianity. Continual change of milieu: Christian doctrine is therefore continually changing its emphasis— Favoring of lowly and little people— The development of caritas— The type “Christian” reassumes step by step everything that it originally negated (in the negation of which it endured—). The Christian becomes citizen, soldier, judge, worker, merchant, scholar, theologian, priest, philosopher, farmer, artist, patriot, politician, “prince”—he takes up again all the activities he has forsworn (—self-defense, judgment, punishment, oath-taking, distinguishing between nation and nation, contempt, wrath—). The whole life of the Christian is at last exactly the life from which Christ preached deliverance— The church is what is as much a symptom of the triumph of the anti-Christian as the modern state, modern nationalism— The church is the barbarization of Christianity.

214 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

These have mastered Christianity: Judaism (Paul); Platonism (Augustine); the mystery cult (doctrine of redemption, emblem of the “cross”); asceticism (—enmity toward “nature,” “reason,” “the senses”—the Orient—).

215 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Christianity as a denaturalization of herd-animal morality: accompanied by absolute misunderstanding and self-deception. Democratization is a more natural form of it, one less mendacious. Datum: the oppressed, the lowly, the great masses of slaves and semi-slaves desire power. First step: they make themselves free—they ransom themselves, in imagination at first, they recognize one another, they prevail. Second step: they enter into battle, they demand recognition, equal rights, “justice.” Third step: they demand privileges (—they draw the representatives of power over to their side). Fourth step: they demand exclusive power, and they get it— In Christianity, three elements must be distinguished: (a) the oppressed of all kinds, (b) the mediocre of all kinds, (c) the discontented and sick of all kinds. With the first element Christianity fights against the political nobility and its ideal; with the second element, against the exceptional and privileged (spiritually, physically—) of all kinds; with the third element, against the natural instinct of the healthy and happy. When a victory is won, the second element steps into the foreground; for then Christianity has persuaded the healthy and happy to its side (as warriors in its cause), likewise the powerful (as interested parties on account of the conquest of the mob)—and now it is the herd instinct, the mediocre nature which is of value from any point of view, which gets its supreme sanction through Christianity. This mediocre nature at last grows so conscious of itself (—acquires courage for itself—) that it arrogates even political power to itself— Democracy is Christianity made natural: a kind of “return to nature” after, on account of its extreme antinaturalness, it could be overcome by the opposite values.— Consequence: the aristocratic ideal henceforth loses its naturalness (“the higher man,” “noble,” “artist,” “passion,” “knowledge,” etc.; romanticism as cult of the exception, the genius, etc.).

216 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

When the “masters” could also become Christians.— It lies in the instinct of a community (family, race, herd, tribe) to feel that the conditions and desires to which it owes its survival are valuable in themselves, e.g., obedience, reciprocity, consideration, moderation, sympathy—consequently to suppress everything that contradicts or stands in the way of them. Likewise, it lies in the instinct of the rulers (be they individuals or classes) to patronize and applaud the virtues that make their subjects useful and submissive (—conditions and affects which may be as different as can be from their own). The herd instinct and the instinct of the rulers agree in praising a certain number of qualities and conditions—but for differing reasons: the former from direct egoism, the latter from indirect egoism. Submission of the master races to Christianity is essentially the consequence of the insight that Christianity is a herd religion, that it teaches obedience: in short, that Christians are easier to rule than non-Christians. With this hint, the pope recommends Christian propaganda to the emperor of China even today. It should be added that the seductive force of the Christian ideal works most strongly perhaps upon such natures as love danger, adventure and opposition—as love all that involves risking themselves while at the same time engendering a non plus ultra of the feeling of power. Consider Saint Teresa, surrounded by the heroic instincts of her brothers:— Christianity here appears as a form of orgy of the will, of strength of will, as a heroic quixotism—

217 (Spring-Fall 1887)

War against the Christian ideal, against the doctrine of “blessedness” and “salvation” as the goal of life, against the supremacy of the simple, the pure in heart, the suffering and unfortunate.⁴⁰ When and where has any man of consequence resembled the Christian ideal—at least in such eyes as a psychologist and student of man must have?—check all of Plutarch’s heroes.

218 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Our pre-eminence: we live in the age of comparison, we can verify as has never been verified before: we are in every way the self-consciousness of history. We enjoy differently, we suffer differently: our instinctive activity is to compare an unheard-of number of things. We understand everything, we experience everything, we no longer have in us any hostile feelings. Although we may harm ourselves by it, our importunate and almost amorous inquisitiveness attacks, unabashed, the most dangerous things— “Everything is good”—it requires an effort for us to deny anything We suffer if we should happen to be so unintelligent as to take sides against anything— Fundamentally, it is we scholars who today best fulfill the teaching of Christ— 219 (1885-1886) Irony against those who believe Christianity has been overcome by the modern natural sciences. Christian value judgments have not by any means been overcome this way. “Christ on the cross” is the most sublime symbol—even today.

220 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The two great nihilistic movements: (a) Buddhism, (b) Christianity. The latter has only now attained to approximately the state of culture in which it can fulfill its original vocation—a level to which it belongs—in which it can show itself pure.

221 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

We have recovered the Christian ideal: it remains to determine its value: What values are negated by it? What does its counterideal comprise?—Pride, pathos of distance, great responsibility, exuberance, splendid animality, the instincts that delight in war and conquest, the deification of passion, of revenge, of cunning, of anger, of voluptuousness, of adventure, of knowledge—; the noble ideal is negated: the beauty, wisdom, power, splendor and dangerousness of the type “man”: the man who fixes goals, the “man of the future” (—here Christianity appears as a logical consequence of Judaism—). Can it be realized?—Yes, under the right climatic conditions, as the Indian ideal was. Work is missing in both.—It detaches the individual from people, state, cultural community, jurisdiction; it rejects education, knowledge, cultivation of good manners, gain, commerce—it lets everything go that comprises the usefulness and value of man—it shuts him off by means of an idiosyncrasy of feeling. Unpolitical, antinational, neither aggressive nor defensive—possible only within the most firmly ordered political and social life, which allows these holy parasites to proliferate at public expense — It is a consequence of the will to pleasure—and to nothing else! “Blessedness” counts as something self-evident, which no longer requires any justification—everything else (how to live and let live) is only a means to an end — But this way of thinking is base: fear of pain, of defilement, of corruption as a sufficient motive for letting everything go— This is a wretched way of thinking — Sign of an exhausted race— One should not let oneself be deceived. (“Become as little children”—. Of related nature: Francis of Assisi, neurotic, epileptic, a visionary, like Jesus.)

222 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The higher man is distinguished from the lower by his fearlessness and his readiness to challenge misfortune: it is a sign of degeneration when eudaemonistic valuations begin to prevail (—physiological fatigue, feebleness of will—). Christianity, with its perspective of “blessedness,” is a mode of thought typical of a suffering and feeble species of man. Abundant strength wants to create, suffer, go under: the Christian salvation-for-bigots is bad music to it, and its hieratic posture an annoyance. 223 (1885-1886) Poverty, humility, and chastity—dangerous and slanderous ideals, but, like poisons in the case of certain illnesses, useful cures, e.g, in the Roman imperial era. All ideals are dangerous: because they debase and brand the actual; all are poisons, but indispensable as temporary cures.

224 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

God created man happy, idle, innocent, and immortal: our actual life is a false, decayed, sinful existence, an existence of punishment—Suffering, struggle, work, death are considered as objections and question marks against life, as something that ought not to last; for which one requires a cure—and has a cure! — From the time of Adam until now, man has been in an abnormal state: God himself has sacrificed his son for the guilt of Adam, in order to put an end to this abnormal state: the natural character of life is a curse; Christ gives back the state of normality to him who believes in him: he makes him happy, idle and innocent. — But the earth has not begun to be fruitful without work; women do not bear children without pain; sickness has not ceased; the most devout believers have just as hard a time of it here as the least devout unbelievers. That man has been freed from death and sin (assertions which permit of no verification)—has been asserted by the church with all the more emphasis. “He is free from sin”—not through his own deed, not through a stern struggle on his part, but ransomed for freedom through the act of redemption—consequently perfect, innocent, paradisiacal—The true life is only a faith (i.e., a self-deception, a madness). The whole of struggling, battling, actual existence, full of splendor and darkness, only a bad, false existence: the task is to be redeemed from it. “Man innocent, idle, immortal, happy”—this conception of “supreme desiderata” must be criticized above all. Why are guilt, work, death, suffering (and, from a Christian viewpoint, knowledge—) contrary to the supreme desiderata?—The lazy Christian concepts “blessedness,” “innocence,” “immortality”—

225 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The eccentric concept of “holiness” is lacking—“God” and “man” have not been torn asunder. “Miracles” are lacking—this sphere simply isn’t there: the only sphere worth consideration is the “spiritual” (i.e., the symbolic-psychological). As decadence: pendant to “epicureanism”—Paradise, as conceived by the Greeks, also only the “garden of Epicurus.” Any task is lacking in such a life:—it desires nothing; a form of the “Epicurean gods;” all reason is lacking to set up any further goals, to have children:— everything has been attained.

226 (March-June 1888)

They despised the body: they left it out of the account: more, they treated it as an enemy. It was their delusion to believe that one could carry a “beautiful soul” about in a cadaverous abortion— To make this conceivable to others they needed to present the concept “beautiful soul” in a different way, to revalue the natural value, until at last a pale, sickly, idiotically fanatical creature was thought to be perfection, “angelic,” transfiguration, higher man.

227 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Ignorance in psychologicis—the Christian has no nervous system—; contempt for, and a deliberate desire to disregard the demands of the body, the discovery of the body; the presupposition that this is in accordance with the higher nature of man, that it must necessarily be good for the soul; the systematic reduction of all bodily feelings to moral values; illness itself conceived as morally conditioned, perhaps as punishment or as testing or also as a state of salvation in which man becomes more perfect than he could be if he were healthy (—Pascal’s idea); under certain circumstances, making oneself sick deliberately. 228 (1883-1888) What, then, is this struggle of the Christian “against nature”? Do not let us be deceived by his words and explanations! It is nature against something that is also nature. With many it is fear, with some disgust, with others a certain spirituality, with the best, love of an ideal without flesh and desires, of an “abstraction from nature”—these try to live up to their ideal. It goes without saying that humility in place of self-reliance, anxious circumspection toward the desires, liberation from normal duties (whereby a higher feeling of rank is re-created), the incitement of a continual war over tremendous things, habituation to effusions of feeling— all this composes a type: in this type the excitability of a degenerate body predominates, but this nervousness and the inspirations it induces are interpreted otherwise. The taste of natures of this kind tends (1) to subtlety, (2) to floweriness, (3) to extreme feelings. Natural inclinations are satisfied, but under a new form of interpretation, e.g., as “justification before God,” “the feeling of redemption through grace” (—every undeniable pleasant feeling is interpreted thus!—), pride, voluptuousness, etc. General problem: what will become of the man who defames the natural, and denies and degrades it in practice? In fact, the Christian proves himself to be an exaggerated form of self-control: in order to restrain his desires he seems to find it necessary to extirpate or crucify them.

229 (March-June 1888)

Through the long succession of millennia, man has not known himself physiologically: he does not know himself even today. To know, e.g., that one has a nervous system (—but no “soul”—) is still the privilege of the best informed. But man is not content not to know in this case. One must be very humane to say “I don’t know that,” to afford ignorance. If he is suffering or in a good mood, he has no doubt that he can find the reason for it if only he looks. So he looks for the reason— In truth, he cannot find the reason, because he does not even suspect where he ought to look for it— What happens?— He takes a consequence of his condition for its cause; e.g., a work undertaken in a good mood (really undertaken because the good mood had provided the courage for it) succeeds: ecco, the work is the reason for the good mood.— In fact, the success was determined by the same thing that determined the good mood—by the happy coordination of physiological forces and systems. He feels ill: and consequently he has not got over some worry, some scruple, some self-criticism.— In truth, the man believes his ill condition is a consequence of his scruple, his “sin,” his “self-criticism”— But the condition of recovery returns, often after a profound exhaustion and prostration. “How is it possible for me to feel so free, so redeemed? It is a miracle; only a god can have performed that.”— Conclusion: “He has forgiven me my sin”— From this there follows a certain practice: to excite feelings of sin, to prepare the way for contrition, one has to reduce the body to a morbid and nervous condition. The method of doing this is well known. As one might expect, there is no suspicion of the causal logic of the case: there is a religious interpretation of the mortification of the flesh, it seems an end in itself, whereas it is only a means of making possible the morbid indigestion of repentance (the “idée fixe” of sin, the hypnotizing of the hen by the chalk line “sin”). The maltreatment of the body prepares the ground for the sequence of “feelings of guilt,” i.e., a general state of suffering that demands an explanation — On the other hand, the method of “redemption” follows in the same way: one provokes all kinds of orgies of feeling by prayers, motions, gestures, oaths— exhaustion follows, often abruptly, often in the form of epilepsy. And—after a condition of deep somnolence comes the appearance of recovery—in religious language: “redemption.”^{40a}

230 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Formerly one considered these conditions and consequences of physiological exhaustion more important than conditions of health and their consequences, because they are rich in the sudden, the fearful, the inexplicable and the incalculable. One was afraid: one postulated here a higher world. Sleep and dream, shadows, the night, natural terrors, have been held responsible for the creation of two worlds: above all, the symptoms of physiological exhaustion should have been considered in this regard. The ancient religions actually disciplined the pious into a condition of exhaustion in which they must experience such things— One believed one had entered a higher order of things where everything ceased to be familiar.— The appearance of a higher power—

231 (March-June 1888)

Sleep as consequence of every exhaustion, exhaustion as consequence of every excessive excitement— The necessity for sleep, the deification and adoration of the very concept “sleep” in all pessimistic religions and philosophies— The exhaustion is in this case a racial exhaustion: sleep, regarded psychologically, is only a symbol of a much deeper and longer compulsion to rest— In practice it is death that works so seductively behind the image of its brother, sleep—

232 (March-June 1888)

The entire Christian training in repentance and redemption can be conceived as a deliberately provoked folie circulaire:⁴¹ but, as one might expect, producible only in predestined, that is, morbidly inclined individuals.

233 (March-June 1888)

Against remorse and the purely psychological treatment of it.— To be unable to have done with an experience is already a sign of decadence. This reopening of old wounds, this wallowing in self-contempt and contrition, is one more illness, out of which no “salvation of the soul” can arise but only a new form of soul sickness— These “states of redemption” in the Christian are mere variations of one and the same diseased state—interpretations of the epileptic crisis by a certain formula supplied, not by science, but by religious delusion. One is good in a sickly manner when one is sick— We now count the greater part of the psychological apparatus with which Christianity operated as forms of hysteria and epilepsy. The entire practice of psychological healing must be put back on to a physiological basis: the “bite” of conscience as such is a hindrance to recovery—one must try to counterbalance it all by new activities, in order to escape from the sickness of self-torture as quickly as possible— One should discredit the purely psychological practice of the church and the sects as harmful to health— One cannot cure an invalid by prayers and the exorcizing of evil spirits: the conditions of “repose” that supervene under the influence of such things are very far from inspiring confidence, in a psychological sense— One is healthy when one can laugh at the earnestness and zeal with which one has been hypnotized by any single detail of our life, when one feels that the “bite” of conscience is like a dog biting on a stone—when one is ashamed of one’s remorse— Previous practice, which was purely religious and psychological, aimed only at a change in the symptoms: it held a man to be cured when he abased himself before the cross and swore to be a good man— But a criminal who with a certain sombre seriousness cleaves to his fate and does not slander his deed after it is done has more health of soul— The criminals among whom Dostoevsky lived in prison were one and all unbroken natures—are they not worth a hundred times more than a “broken” Christian? (—I recommend that the “bite” of conscience be treated with Mitchell’s cure—) 234 (1883-1888) The “bite” of conscience: sign that the character is not equal to the deed. There is such a thing as a “bite” of conscience after good works: the unfamiliar in them, that which raises them out of the old milieu.—43

235 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Against remorse.— I do not like this kind of cowardice toward one's own deeds; one should not leave oneself in the lurch at the onset of unanticipated shame and embarrassment. An extreme pride, rather, is in order. After all, what is the good of it! No deed can be undone by being regretted; no more than by being "forgiven" or "atoned for." One would have to be a theologian to believe in a power that annuls guilt: we immoralists prefer not to believe in "guilt." We hold instead that every action is of identical value at root—and that actions that turn against us may, economically considered, be nonetheless useful, generally desirable actions. In any particular case we will allow that an act could easily have been spared us—but circumstances favored it. Which of us, if favored by circumstance, would not have gone through the entire gamut of crime? One should never say on that account: "You should not have done this or that," but always: "How strange that I should not have done that a hundred times before!" After all, very few actions are typical actions and real epitomes of a personality; and considering how little personality most men have, a man is seldom characterized by a single action. Acts of circumstance, merely epidermal, merely reflexes that respond to a stimulus: long before the depths of our being are touched by it, consulted about it. A rage, a reach, a knife thrust: what of personality is in that?⁴⁵ A deed often brings with it a numbness and lack of freedom: so that the doer is as if spellbound at its recollection and feels as if he were an accessory of it. This spiritual disorder, a form of hypnotism, must be resisted at all cost: a single deed, whatever it may be, is, in comparison with everything one has done, a zero, and may be deducted without falsifying the account. The iniquitous interest that society may have in treating our entire existence from a single point of view, as if its meaning lay in bringing forth one single deed, should not infect the doer himself: unfortunately this happens almost all the time. That stems from the fact that a spiritual disturbance follows every deed with unusual consequences, whether these consequences are good or ill. Observe a lover who has received a promise, or a poet applauded by an audience: so far as torpor intellectualis is concerned, they differ in no way from an anarchist confronted with a search warrant. There are actions which are unworthy of us: actions that, if regarded as typical, would reduce us to a lower class of man. Here one has only to avoid the error of regarding them as typical. There are other kinds of actions of which we are unworthy: exceptions born of a particular abundance of happiness and health, our highest floodtide driven so high for once by a storm, an accident: such actions and "works" are likewise not typical. One should never measure an artist by the standard of his works.

236 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

a. In proportion as Christianity still seems necessary today, man is still savage and fateful— b. From another point of view it is not necessary, but extremely harmful, although enticing and seductive because it corresponds to the morbid character of whole classes, whole types of contemporary humanity—decadents of all kinds, they follow their inclinations when they aspire to Christianity— One must distinguish clearly between a. and b. In case a. Christianity is a cure, at least a means of taming (—under certain circumstances it serves to make sick: which can be useful in breaking savagery and brutality). In case b. it is itself a symptom of sickness, propagates decadence; here it works against a corroborating system of treatment, here it is the invalid's instinct against that which is good for him—

237 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The party of the serious, dignified, reflective: and opposed to them the savage, unclean, incalculable beast—: merely a problem of animal taming—in which the animal tamer must be hard, fearsome and terror-inspiring toward his beasts. All essential demands must be made with a brutal clarity, i e, exaggerated a thousandfold: even the fulfilment of the demand must be represented in a coarsened way, so it may inspire awe, e g, emancipation from the senses on the part of the Brahmins. * The struggle with the canaille and the cattle. If a certain taming and order is to be achieved, the chasm between these purified and reborn people and the remainder must be made as fearful as possible— This chasm increases in the higher castes their self-regard, their faith in that which they represent—hence the chandala. Contempt and an excess of it is perfectly correct psychologically, that is to say, exaggerated a hundredfold, so that it may at least be copied.⁴⁶

238 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The struggle against the brutal instincts is different from the struggle against the sick instincts; to make sick may even be a means of mastering brutality. Christian psychological practice often leads to the conversion of a brute into a sick and consequently tame animal. The struggle against brutal and savage natures must be a struggle using means that affect them: superstitions are indispensable and essential—47

239 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Our age is in a certain sense ripe (that is to say, decadent), as the age of Buddha was— Therefore a Christianity is possible, but without the absurd dogmas (the most repellent abortions of antique hybridism). 240 (1885-1886) Even granted that the Christian faith might not be disprovable, Pascal thinks, nonetheless, that, in view of a fearful possibility that it is true, it is in the highest degree prudent to be a Christian. Today one finds, as a sign of how much Christianity has declined in fearfulness, that other attempt to justify it by saying that even if it were an error, one might yet have during one's life the great advantage and enjoyment of this error:— it therefore seems that this faith ought to be maintained precisely for the sake of its tranquilizing effect—not, therefore, from fear of a threatening possibility, rather from fear of a life that has lost one charm. This hedonistic turn, the proof from pleasure, is a symptom of decline: it replaces the proof from strength, from that which overpowers us in the Christian idea, from fear. In fact, with this reinterpretation Christianity is approaching exhaustion: one is content with an opiate Christianity because one has the strength neither to seek, to struggle, to dare, to wish to stand alone, nor for Pascalism, for this brooding self-contempt, for faith in human unworthiness, for the anguished feeling that one is “perhaps damned.” But a Christianity intended above all to soothe diseased nerves has really no need of that fearful solution of a “God on the cross”: which is why Buddhism is silently gaining ground everywhere in Europe.

241 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The humor of European culture: one holds this to be true but does that. E g., what is the point of the arts of reading and criticism as long as the ecclesiastical interpretation of the Bible, Protestant as well as Catholic, is cultivated as ever?

242 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

One does not consider closely enough how barbarous the concepts are by which we Europeans still live. That men have been capable of believing that “salvation of the soul” depended on a book!— And they tell me this is still believed today. What is the point of scientific education, criticism and hermeneutics if such a lunatic exposition of the Bible as is still cultivated by the church has not yet turned the blush of shame into a permanent skin color?

243 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

To consider: to what extent the fateful belief in divine providence—the most paralyzing belief for hand and reason there has ever been—still exists; to what extent Christian presuppositions and interpretations still live on under the formulas “nature,” “progress,” “perfectibility,” “Darwinism,” under the superstitious belief in a certain relationship between happiness and virtue, unhappiness and guilt. That absurd trust in the course of things, in “life,” in the “instinct of life,” that comfortable resignation that comes from the faith that if everyone only does his duty all will be well—this kind of thing is meaningful only by supposing a direction of things sub specie boni. Even fatalism, the form philosophical sensibility assumes with us today, is a consequence of this long belief in divine dispensation, an unconscious consequence: as if what happens were no responsibility of ours (—as though it were permissible to let things take their course: every individual self only a mode of absolute reality—).

244 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

It is the height of psychological mendaciousness in man to frame according to his own petty standard of what seems good, wise, powerful, valuable, a being that is an origin and “in-itself”—and therewith to abolish in his mind the entire causal process by means of which any kind of goodness, any kind of wisdom, any kind of power exists and possesses value. In short, to posit elements of the most recent and contingent origin as not created but “in-themselves” and perhaps even as the cause of creation in general—Judging from experience, from every instance in which a man has raised himself significantly above the average of humanity, we see that every high degree of power involves freedom from good and evil and from “true” and “false,” and cannot take into account the demands of goodness: we see that the same applies to every high degree of wisdom—goodness is abrogated in it as much as veracity, justice, virtue, and other popular fancies in valuation. Finally, every high degree of goodness itself: is it not patent that it presupposes a spiritual myopia and coarseness? including the inability to distinguish at a distance between true and false, between useful and harmful? not to discuss the fact that a high degree of power in the hands of the highest degree of goodness would lead to the most calamitous consequences (“the abolition of evil”)?—In fact, one needs only to see what tendencies the “God of love” inspires in his believers: they ruin mankind for the sake of the “good.”—In practice, the actual constitution of the world has shown this same God to be the God of the extremest shortsightedness, devilry and impotence: which reveals how much value there is in this conception of him. Knowledge and wisdom in themselves have no value; no more than goodness: one must first be in possession of the goal from which these qualities derive their value or nonvalue—there could be a goal in the light of which great knowledge might represent a great disvalue (if, for instance, a high degree of deception were one of the prerequisites of the enhancement of life; likewise if goodness were perhaps able to paralyze and discourage the springs of the great longing)—Taking our human life as it is, all “truth,” all “goodness,” all “holiness,” all “divinity” in the Christian style has up to now shown itself to be highly dangerous—even now mankind is in danger of perishing through an idealism inimical of life.⁴⁸

245 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Consider the damage all human institutions sustain if a divine and transcendent higher sphere is postulated that must first sanction these institutions. By then growing accustomed to seeing their value in this sanction (e.g., in the case of marriage), one has reduced their natural dignity, in certain circumstances denied it— Nature has been ill-judged to the extent to which one has brought into honor the antinaturalness of a God. “Natural” has come to mean the same as “contemptible,” “bad”— The fatefulness of a belief in God as the reality of the highest moral qualities: all actual values were therewith denied and systematically conceived as non-values. Thus antinaturalness assumed the throne. With relentless logic one arrived at the absolute demand to deny nature.

246 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

In moving the doctrine of selflessness and love into the foreground, Christianity was in no way establishing the interests of the species as of higher value than the interests of the individual. Its real historical effect, the fateful element in its effect, remains, on the contrary, in precisely the enhancement of egoism, of the egoism of the individual, to an extreme (—to the extreme of individual immortality). Through Christianity, the individual was made so important, so absolute, that he could no longer be sacrificed: but the species endures only through human sacrifice— All “souls” became equal before God: but this is precisely the most dangerous of all possible evaluations! If one regards individuals as equal, one calls the species into question, one encourages a way of life that leads to the ruin of the species: Christianity is the counterprinciple to the principle of selection. If the degenerate and sick (“the Christian”) is to be accorded the same value as the healthy (“the pagan”), or even more value, as in Pascal’s judgment concerning sickness and health, then unnaturalness becomes law— This universal love of men is in practice the preference for the suffering, underprivileged, degenerate: it has in fact lowered and weakened the strength, the responsibility, the lofty duty to sacrifice men. All that remains, according to the Christian scheme of values, is to sacrifice oneself: but this residue of human sacrifice that Christianity concedes and even advises has, from the standpoint of general breeding, no meaning at all. The prosperity of the species is unaffected by the self-sacrifice of this or that individual (—whether it be in the monkish and ascetic manner or, with the aid of crosses, pyres, and scaffolds, as “martyrs” of error). The species requires that the ill-constituted, weak, degenerate, perish: but it was precisely to them that Christianity turned as a conserving force; it further enhanced that instinct in the weak, already so powerful, to take care of and preserve themselves and to sustain one another. What is “virtue” and “charity” in Christianity if not just this mutual preservation, this solidarity of the weak, this hampering of selection? What is Christian altruism if not the mass-egoism of the weak, which divines that if all care for one another each individual will be preserved as long as possible?— If one does not feel such a disposition as an extreme immorality, as a crime against life, one belongs with the company of the sick and possesses its instincts oneself— Genuine charity demands sacrifice for the good of the species—it is hard, it is full of self-overcoming, because it needs human sacrifice. And this pseudo humaneness called Christianity wants it established that no one should be sacrificed—

247 (March-June 1888)

Nothing would be more useful or more to be encouraged than a thoroughgoing practical nihilism. As I understand all the phenomena of Christianity and pessimism, they say: "We are ripe for nonexistence; for us it is reasonable not to exist." This language of "reason" is also, in this case, the language of selective nature. What, on the other hand, is to be condemned in the sternest terms is the ambiguous and cowardly compromise of a religion such as Christianity: more precisely, such as the church: which, instead of encouraging death and self-destruction, protects everything ill-constituted and sick and makes it propagate itself— Problem: with what means could one attain to a severe form of really contagious nihilism: such as teaches and practices voluntary death with scientific conscientiousness (—and not a feeble, vegetable existence in expectation of a false afterlife—)? One cannot sufficiently condemn Christianity for having devaluated the value of such a great purifying nihilistic movement, which was perhaps already being formed, through the idea of the immortal private person: likewise through the hope of resurrection: in short, through continual deterrence from the deed of nihilism, which is suicide— It substituted slow suicide: gradually a petty, poor, but durable life; gradually a quite ordinary, bourgeois, mediocre life, etc.

248 (March-June 1888)

Christian moral quackery.— Pity and contempt succeed one another in quick alternation, and occasionally I get enraged, as at the sight of some mean crime. Here error is made a duty—a virtue; blundering is made into an art, the instinct for destruction systematized as “redemption”; here every operation becomes an injury, an amputation even of those organs whose energy is a precondition of any return to health. And the most that is achieved is never healing, but only the substitution of one set of evil symptoms for another— And this dangerous nonsense, this systematized disfiguring and castration of life, is counted holy, inviolable; to live in its service, to be an instrument of this healing art, to be a priest, makes one distinguished, venerable, makes one holy and even inviolable. Only divinity can be the author of this highest healing art: only as revelation can redemption be understood, as an art of grace, as the most undeserved gift granted to the creature. First proposition: health of soul is regarded as sickness, as suspicious— Second proposition: the prerequisites of a strong and flourishing life, strong desires and passions, count as objections to a strong and flourishing life. Third proposition: all that threatens man with danger, all that might master and destroy him, is evil, is reprehensible—is to be torn from his soul by its roots. Fourth proposition: man made harmless to himself and others, weak, prostrated in humility and modesty, conscious of his weakness, the “sinner”—this is the most desirable type, and one that can also be produced with a little surgery to the soul—

249 (Spring-Fall 1887)

What is it I protest against? That one should take this petty, peaceable mediocrity, this equilibrium of a soul that knows nothing of the mighty motivation of great accumulations of strength, for something exalted, possibly even for the measure of man. Bacon of Verulam says: *Infimarum virtutum apud vulgus laus est, mediarum admiratio, supremarum sensus nullus.*⁴⁹ Christianity, however, belongs, as a religion, to the vulgus: it has no feeling for the highest species of virtus.

250 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Let us see what “the true Christian” does with all that which his instinct opposes: —he sullies and suspects the beautiful, the splendid, the rich, the proud, the self-reliant, the knowledgeable, the powerful—in summa, the whole of culture: his object is to deprive it of a good conscience—

251 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Hitherto one has always attacked Christianity not merely in a modest way but in the wrong way. As long as one has not felt Christian morality to be a capital crime against life its defenders have had it all their own way. The question of the mere “truth” of Christianity—whether in regard to the existence of its God or the historicity of the legend of its origin, not to speak of Christian astronomy and natural science—is a matter of secondary importance as long as the question of the value of Christian morality is not considered. Is Christian morality worth anything, or is it a shame and disgrace despite all the holiness of its arts of seduction? The problem of truth can slip away into hiding places of all kinds; and the greatest believers may finally avail themselves of the logic of the greatest unbelievers to create for themselves a right to affirm certain things as irrefutable—namely, as beyond the means of all refutation—(this artifice is today called “Kantian Criticism”).

252 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

One should never forgive Christianity for having destroyed such men as Pascal. One should never cease from combating just this in Christianity: its will to break precisely the strongest and noblest souls. One should never rest as long as this one thing has not been utterly and completely destroyed: the ideal of man invented by Christianity, its demands upon men, its Yes and its No with regard to men. The whole absurd residue of Christian fable, conceptual cobweb-spinning and theology does not concern us; it could be a thousand times more absurd and we would not lift a finger against it. But we do combat the ideal that, with its morbid beauty and feminine seductiveness, with its furtive slanderous eloquence appeals to all the cowardices and vanities of wearied souls—and the strongest have their weary hours—as if all that might, in such states, seem most useful and desirable—trust, guilelessness, modesty, patience, love of one’s fellows, resignation, submission to God, a sort of unharnessing and abdication of one’s whole ego—were also the most useful and desirable as such; as if the petty, modest abortion of a soul, the virtuous average-and-herd man, did not only take precedence over the stronger, more evil, covetous, defiant, prodigal, and therefore a hundred times more imperiled kind of man, but provided nothing less than the ideal, the goal, the measure, the highest desideratum for mankind in general. To erect this ideal was the most sinister temptation ever placed before mankind: for with it, the more strongly constituted exceptions and fortunate cases among men, in whom the will to power and to the growth of the whole type “man” took a step forward, were threatened with destruction; with the values of this ideal, the growth of these higher men, who for the sake of their superior claims and tasks also freely accept a life more full of peril (expressed economically: a rise in the cost of the undertaking in proportion to the decline in the probability of its success) would be attacked at the roots. What is it we combat in Christianity? That it wants to break the strong, that it wants to discourage their courage, exploit their bad hours and their occasional weariness, convert their proud assurance into unease and distress of conscience, that it knows how to poison and sicken the noble instincts until their strength, their will to power turns backward, against itself—until the strong perish through orgies of self-contempt and self-abuse: that gruesome way of perishing of which Pascal provides the most famous example. This section must be taken in the context of the immediately preceding sections and should be compared with the chapters on “The ‘Improvers’ of Mankind” in Twilight (p 501, Portable Nietzsche), and with The Antichrist (p. 565, Portable Nietzsche), both of which were written later. See also my preface to The Antichrist in The Portable Nietzsche and Chapter 10, “The Master-Race,” and Chapter 7, section III, in my Nietzsche. Schlechta, of course, reproduces the text of the standard editions, ignoring 1911, p. 501. 24 I Corinthians 13. The point Nietzsche makes here was utterly revolutionary at that time and constitutes a major contribution to our understanding of Judaism and Christianity, even if the form of expression here is deliberately hyperbolic and paradoxical. For further discussion, see my Nietzsche, Chapter 12, section II. 25 “Abominable superstition.” 40a This discussion of mistaking consequences for causes should be compared with the chapter on “The Four Great Errors” in Twilight. The influence of these passages and others on Sartre’s The Flies is discussed in detail in my essay on “Nietzsche between Homer and Sartre: Five Treatments of the Orestes Story,” in Révue Internationale de Philosophie, 67 (1964.1), especially pp. 65-73. II. CRITIQUE OF MORALITY 253 (1885-1886) For the Preface of The Dawn An attempt to think about morality without falling under its spell, mistrustful of the seductiveness of its beautiful gestures and glances. A world we can revere, that is adequate to our drive to worship—that continually proves itself—by providing guidance in the particular and the general —: this is the Christian viewpoint in which we have all grown up. Through an increase in our acuteness, mistrust, scientificity (also through a more ambitious instinct for veracity, thus under anti-Christian influences), this interpretation has grown more and more impermissible to us. Subtlest way of escape: Kantian Criticism. The intellect disputes its right to make interpretations of this sort as well as to reject interpretations of this sort. One contents oneself with an increase in one’s trust and faith, with a renunciation of all provability in matters of faith, with an inconceivable and superior “ideal” (God) as a stopgap. The Hegelian way out, following Plato, a piece of romanticism and reaction, at the same time a symptom of the historical sense, of a new strength: the “spirit” itself is the “self-revealing and self-realizing ideal”: more and more of this ideal in which we believe manifests itself in the course of its “process,” in “becoming”—: thus the ideal realizes itself; faith is directed into the future when, in accordance with its noble requirements, it can worship. In short, God is unknowable for us and not demonstrable by us (the hidden meaning of the epistemological movement); God is demonstrable but as something in process of becoming, and we are part of it, as witness our impulse toward the ideal (the hidden meaning of the historical movement). Observe: criticism is never directed at the ideal itself, but only at the problem, where the opposition to it originates: why it has not yet been achieved or why it is not demonstrable in small things and in great. * It makes all the difference whether one feels this state of distress as a state of distress from passion, from a yearning, or whether one barely reaches it as a problem after the utmost thought and with a certain force of historical imagination. We discover the same phenomenon outside religion and philosophy: utilitarianism (socialism, democracy) criticizes the origin of moral evaluations, but it believes them just as much as the Christian does. (Naïveté: as if morality could survive when the God who sanctions it is missing! The “beyond” absolutely necessary if faith in morality is to be maintained.) Basic problem: whence this omnipotence of faith? Of faith in morality? (—Which betrays itself in this, too, that even the basic conditions of life are falsely interpreted for the benefit of morality: despite our knowledge of the animal world and the world of plants. “Self-preservation”: the reconciliation of altruistic and egoistic principles in the perspective of Darwinism.) 254 (1885-1886) The inquiry into the origin of our evaluations and tables of the good is in absolutely no way identical with a critique of them, as is so often believed: even though the insight into some pudenda origo certainly brings with it a feeling of a diminution in value of the thing that originated thus and prepares the way to a critical mood and attitude toward it. What are our evaluations and moral tables really worth? What is the outcome of their rule? For whom? in relation to what?— Answer: for life. But what is life? Here we need a new, more definite formulation of the concept “life.” My formula for it is: Life is will to power. What is the meaning of the act of evaluation itself? Does it point back or down to another, metaphysical world? (As Kant still believed, who belongs before the great historical movement.) In short: where did it originate? Or did it not “originate”?— Answer: moral evaluation is an exegesis, a way of interpreting. The exegesis itself is a symptom of certain physiological conditions, likewise of a particular spiritual level of prevalent judgments: Who interprets?— Our affects. 255 (1883-1888) All virtues physiological conditions: particularly the principal organic functions considered as necessary, as good. All virtues are really refined passions and enhanced states. Pity and love of mankind as development of the sexual drive. Justice as development of the drive to revenge. Virtue as pleasure in resistance, will to power. Honor as recognition of the similar and equal-in-power. 256 (1887-1888) I understand by “morality” a system of evaluations that partially coincides with the conditions of a creature’s life.

257 (March-June 1888)

Formerly one said of every morality: "By their fruits ye shall know them." I say of every morality: "It is a fruit by which I recognize the soil from which it sprang." 258 (1885-1886) My attempt to understand moral judgments as symptoms and sign languages which betray the processes of physiological prosperity or failure, likewise the consciousness of the conditions for preservation and growth—a mode of interpretations of the same worth as astrology, prejudices prompted by the instincts (of races, communities, of the various stages of life, as youth or decay, etc.). Applied to the specific Christian-European morality: Our moral judgments are signs of decline, of disbelief in life, a preparation for pessimism. My chief proposition: there are no moral phenomena, there is only a moral interpretation of these phenomena. This interpretation itself is of extra-moral origin.⁵² What does it mean that our interpretation has projected a contradiction into existence?— Of decisive importance: behind all other other evaluations these moral evaluations stand in command. Supposing they were abolished, according to what would we measure then? And then of what value would be knowledge, etc., etc. ? ? ? 259 (1884) Insight: all evaluation is made from a definite perspective: that of the preservation of the individual, a community, a race, a state, a church, a faith, a culture.— Because we forget that valuation is always from a perspective, a single individual contains within him a vast confusion of contradictory valuations and consequently of contradictory drives. This is the expression of the diseased condition in man, in contrast to the animals in which all existing instincts answer to quite definite tasks. This contradictory creature has in his nature, however, a great method of acquiring knowledge: he feels many pros and cons, he raises himself to justice—to comprehension beyond esteeming things good and evil. The wisest man would be the one richest in contradictions, who has, as it were, antennae for all types of men—as well as his great moments of grand harmony—a rare accident even in us! A sort of planetary motion— 260 (1883-1888) "Willing": means willing an end. "An end" includes an evaluation. Whence come evaluations? Is their basis a firm norm, "pleasant" and "painful"? But in countless cases we first make a thing painful by investing it with an evaluation The extent of moral evaluations: they play a part in almost every sense impression. Our world is colored by them. We have invested things with ends and values: therefore we have in us an enormous fund of latent force: but by comparing values it appears that contradictory things have been accounted valuable, that many tables of value have existed (thus nothing is valuable "in itself"). Analysis of individual tables of value revealed that their erection was the erection of the conditions—often erroneous—of existence of a limited group—for its preservation. Observation of contemporary man reveals that we employ very diverse value judgments and that they no longer have any creative force—the basis, “the condition of existence,” is now missing from moral judgment. It is much more superfluous, it is not nearly so painful.— It becomes arbitrary. Chaos. Who creates the goal that stands above mankind and above the individual? Formerly one employed morality for preservation: but nobody wants to preserve any longer, there is nothing to preserve. Therefore an experimental morality: to give oneself a goal. 261 (1883-1888) What is the criterion of a moral action? (1) its disinterestedness, (2) its universal validity, etc. But this is armchair moralizing. One must study peoples to see what the criterion is in every case, and what is expressed by it: a belief that “such a scheme of behavior is one of the first conditions of our existence.” Immoral means “bringing destruction.” Now, all the communities in which these propositions are discovered have perished: certain of these propositions have been reaffirmed again and again because every new community that arose had need of them again; e.g., “Thou shalt not steal.” In ages when it was impossible to demand any feeling for the community (e.g. in the imperium Romanum), the drive was directed to “salvation of soul,” in religious language: or “the greatest happiness,” in philosophical terms. For even the Greek moral philosophers no longer had any feeling for their polis.⁵³ 262 (1888) The necessity of false values.— One can refute a judgment by proving its conditionality: the need to retain it is not thereby removed. False values cannot be eradicated by reasons any more than astigmatism in the eyes of an invalid. One must grasp the need for their existence: they are a consequence of causes which have nothing to do with reasons. 263 (1885) To see and to demonstrate the problem of morality—that seems to me the new principal task. I deny that it has been done in previous moral philosophy.

264 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

How false, how mendacious mankind has always been about the basic facts of its inner world! To close one's eyes to this, to speak and not to speak about that—265 (1885-1888) There is lacking a knowledge and consciousness of the revolutions that have already occurred in moral judgments, and of how fundamentally "evil" has several times been renamed "good." I indicated one of these displacements with the term "morality of custom."⁵⁴ Even conscience has changed its sphere: there used to be a pang of conscience of the herd. 266
(1883-1886) A. Morality as the work of immorality. For moral values to gain dominion they must be assisted by lots of immoral forces and affects. The origin of moral values is the work of immoral affects and considerations. B. Morality as the work of error. C. Morality always contradicts itself. Requital — Veracity, doubt, epoche,⁵⁵ judging.— The "immorality" of belief in morality. The steps: absolute dominion of morality: all biological phenomena measured and judged by moral values. attempt to identify life with morality (symptom of an awakened skepticism: morality must no longer be felt as an antithesis); several means, even a transcendental way. opposition of life and morality: morality judged and condemned from the point of view of life. D. To what extent morality has been detrimental to life: a) to the enjoyment of life, to gratitude towards life, etc., b) to the beautifying, ennobling of life, c) to knowledge of life, d) to the development of life, in so far as it sought to set the highest phenomena of life at variance with itself. E. Counter-reckoning: its usefulness for life. Morality as the principle that preserves the general whole, as a limitation upon its members: "the instrument." Morality as the principle that preserves man from the inner peril of his passions: "the mediocre." Morality as the principle that preserves man from the life-destroying effects of profound misery and atrophy: "the suffering." Morality as the principle that opposes the fearful outbursts of the powerful: "the lowly" 267
(1885-1886) It is a good thing to take "right," "wrong," etc., in a definite, narrow, bourgeois sense, as in "Do right and fear no man": i.e., to do one's duty according to a definite rude scheme within which a community exists. —Let us not think meanly of that which two thousand years of morality have bred in our spirit!

268 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Two types of morality must not be confused: the morality with which the healthy instinct defends itself against incipient decadence—and another morality with which this very decadence defines and justifies itself and leads downwards. The former is usually stoical, hard, tyrannical (—Stoicism itself was such a brake-shoe morality); the latter is enthusiastic, sentimental, full of secrets; it has the women and “beautiful feelings” on its side (—primitive Christianity was such a morality). 269 (1883-1888) To get the whole of moralizing into focus as a phenomenon. Also as a riddle. The phenomena of morality have occupied me like riddles. Today I would know how to answer the question: What does it mean that the welfare of my neighbor ought to possess for me a higher value than my own? but that my neighbor himself ought to assess the value of his welfare differently than I, that is, that he should subordinate it to my welfare? What is the meaning of that “Thou shalt,” which even philosophers regard as “given”? The apparently crazy idea that a man should esteem the actions he performs for another more highly than those he performs for himself, and that this other should likewise, etc. (that one should call good only those actions that a man performs with an eye, not to himself, but to the welfare of another) has a meaning: namely, as the social instinct resting on the valuation that the single individual is of little account, but all individuals together are of very great account provided they constitute a community with a common feeling and a common conscience. Therefore a kind of training in looking in a certain definite direction, the will to a perspective that seeks to make it impossible to see oneself. My idea: goals are lacking and these must be individuals’! We observe how things are everywhere: every individual is sacrificed and serves as a tool. Go into the street and you encounter lots of “ ‘slaves.’ Whither? For what?

270 (Spring-Fall 1887)

How is it possible that a man has respect for himself with regard to moral values alone, that he considers everything else subordinate and of little worth compared with good, evil, improvement, salvation of soul, etc.? e.g., Henri Fréd. Amiel.⁵⁶ What is the meaning of the moral idiosyncrasy?— I mean in a psychological sense, also in a physiological sense; e.g, Pascal. That is, in cases where other great qualities were not lacking; also in the case of Schopenhauer, who obviously valued that which he did not and could not have—is it not the consequence of a merely habitual moral interpretation of actual states of pain and displeasure? is it not a definite kind of sensibility that does not understand the cause of its frequent feelings of displeasure but believes it explains them with moral hypotheses? So that even a transitory feeling of health and strength immediately appears, in the perspective of a “good conscience,” to be illumined by the nearness of God, by the consciousness of redemption?— Thus the man of moral idiosyncrasy has (1) either really acquired his worth through approximating society’s model of virtue: “the good man,” “the righteous”—a highly respectable condition of mediocrity: mediocre in all his abilities but decent, conscientious, solid, respected, trusty; (2) or he believes he has acquired it because he does not know how otherwise to understand all his states—he is unknown to himself, so he interpretes himself in this way.— Morality as the only scheme of interpretation by which man can endure himself—a kind of pride?—

271 (March-June 1888)

The predominance of moral values.— Consequences of this predominance: the corruption of psychology, etc.; the universal fatality which follows from it. What does this predominance mean? What does it point to?— To a certain greater urgency for a definite Yes and No in this field. All kinds of imperatives have been employed to make moral values appear permanent: they have been commanded for the longest time:— they seem instinctive, like inner commands. Moral values reveal themselves to be conditions of the existence of society, in that they are felt to be beyond discussion. The practice, which is to say the utility, of agreement about the highest values has here acquired a kind of sanction. We observe that every means is employed to paralyze reflection and criticism in this field:— look at the attitude of Kant! not to speak of those who reject as immoral all “inquiry” here—

272 (Spring-Fall 1887)

My purpose: to demonstrate the absolute homogeneity of all events and the application of moral distinctions as conditioned by perspective; to demonstrate how everything praised as moral is identical in essence with everything immoral and was made possible, as in every development of morality, with immoral means and for immoral ends—; how, on the other hand, everything decried as immoral is, economically considered, higher and more essential, and how a development toward a greater fullness of life necessarily also demands the advance of immorality. “Truth” the extent to which we permit ourselves to understand this fact. 273 (1883-1888) But don’t worry: for one needs a great deal of morality to be immoral in this subtle way; I will speak in a parable: A physiologist interested in a disease and an invalid who claims to be cured of it do not have identical interests. Let us suppose the disease is morality—for it is a disease—and that we Europeans are the invalids: what subtle torment and difficulties would arise if we Europeans were at the same time inquisitive spectators and physiologists! Would we then really desire to be free of morality? Would we want to be? Quite apart from the question whether we could be. Whether we could be “cured.”—

274 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Whose will to power is morality?— The common factor in the history of Europe since Socrates is the attempt to make moral values dominate over all other values: so that they should be the guide and judge not only of life but also of (1) knowledge, (2) the arts, (3) political and social endeavors. “Improvement” the sole duty, everything else a means to it (or a disturbance, hindrance, danger: consequently to be combatted to the point of annihilation—). A similar movement in China. A similar movement in India. What is the meaning of this will to power on the part of moral values which has developed so tremendously on earth? Answer.— three powers are hidden behind it: (1) the instinct of the herd against the strong and independent; (2) the instinct of the suffering and underprivileged against the fortunate; (3) the instinct of the mediocre against the exceptional.— Enormous advantage possessed by this movement, however much cruelty, falseness, and narrow-mindedness have assisted it (for the history of the struggle of morality with the basic instincts of life is itself the greatest piece of immorality that has yet existed on earth—). 275 (1883-1888) Very few manage to see a problem in that which makes our daily life, that to which we have long since grown accustomed— our eyes are not adjusted to it: this seems to me to be the case especially in regard to our morality. The problem “every man as an object for others” is the occasion of the highest honors: for himself—no! The problem “thou shalt”: an inclination that cannot explain itself, similar to the sexual drive, shall not fall under the general condemnation of the drives; on the contrary, it shall be their evaluation and judge! The problem of “equality,” while we all thirst after distinction: here, on the contrary, we are supposed to make exactly the same demands on ourselves as we make on others. This is so insipid, so obviously crazy: but—it is felt to be holy, of a higher rank, the conflict with reason is hardly noticed. Sacrifice and selflessness as distinguishing, unconditional obedience to morality, and the faith that one is everyone’s equal before it. The neglect and surrender of well-being and life as distinguishing, the complete renunciation of making one’s own evaluations, and the firm desire to see everyone else renounce them too. “The value of an action is determined: everyone is subject to this valuation.” We see: an authority speaks—who speaks? — One may forgive human pride if it sought to make this authority as high as possible in order to feel as little humiliated as possible under it. Therefore—God speaks! One needed God as an unconditional sanction, with no court of appeal, as a “categorical imperator”—: or, if one believed in the authority of reason, one needed a metaphysics of unity, by virtue of which this was logical. Now suppose that belief in God has vanished: the question presents itself anew: “who speaks?”— My answer, taken not from metaphysics but from animal physiology: the herd instinct speaks. It wants to be master: hence its “thou shalt!”— it will allow value to the individual only from the point of view of the whole, for the sake of the whole, it hates those who detach themselves—it turns the hatred of all individuals against them. 276 (1886-1887) The whole of European morality is based upon what is useful to the herd: the affliction of all higher, rarer men lies in this, that everything that distinguishes them enters their consciousness accompanied by a feeling of diminution and discredit. The strong points of contemporary men are the causes of their pessimistic gloom: the mediocre are, like the herd, little troubled with questions and conscience—cheerful. (On the gloominess of the strong: Pascal, Schopenhauer.) The more dangerous a quality seems to the herd, the more thoroughly is it proscribed. 277 (1883-1888) Morality of truthfulness in the herd. “You shall be knowable, express your inner nature by clear and constant signs—otherwise you are dangerous: and if you are evil, your ability to dissimulate is the worst thing for the herd. We despise the secret and unrecognizable.— Consequently you must consider yourself knowable, you may not be concealed from yourself, you may not believe that you change.” Thus: the demand for truthfulness presupposes the knowability and stability of the person. In fact, it is the object of education to create in the herd member a definite faith concerning the nature of man: it first invents this faith and then demands “truthfulness.” 278 (1885) Within a herd, within any community, that is to say inter pares,⁵⁷ the overestimation of truthfulness makes good sense. Not to be deceived—and consequently, as a personal point of morality, not to deceive! a mutual obligation between equals! In dealing with what lies outside, danger and caution demand that one should be on one’s guard against deception: as a psychological preconditioning for this, also in dealing with what lies within. Mistrust as the source of truthfulness. 279 (1883-1888) Toward a critique of the herd virtues.— Inertia operates (1) in trustfulness, since mistrust makes tension, observation, reflection necessary;— (2) in veneration, where the difference in power is great and submission necessary: so as not to fear, an attempt is made to love, esteem, and to interpret the disparity in power as disparity in value: so that the relationship no longer makes one rebellious;— (3) in the sense of truth. What is true? Where an explanation is given which causes us the minimum of spiritual effort (moreover, lying is very exhausting);— (4) in sympathy. It is a relief to count oneself the same as others, to try to feel as they do, to adopt a current feeling: it is something passive compared with the activity that maintains and constantly practices the individual’s right to value judgments (the latter allows of no rest);— (5) in impartiality and coolness of judgment: one shuns the exertion of affects and prefers to stay detached, “objective”;— (6) in integrity: one would rather obey an existing law than create a law oneself, than command oneself and others: the fear of commanding—: better to submit than to react;— (7) in toleration: the fear of exercising rights, of judging.

280 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The instinct of the herd considers the middle and the mean as the highest and most valuable: the place where the majority finds itself; the mode and manner in which it finds itself. It is therefore an opponent of all orders of rank, it sees an ascent from beneath to above as a descent from the majority to the minority. The herd feels the exception, whether it be below or above it, as something opposed and harmful to it. Its artifice with reference to the exceptions above it, the stronger, more powerful, wiser, and more fruitful, is to persuade them to assume the role of guardians, herdsmen, watchmen—to become its first servants:⁵⁸ it has therewith transformed a danger into something useful. Fear ceases in the middle: here one is never alone; here there is little room for misunderstanding; here there is equality; here one's own form of being is not felt as a reproach but as the right form of being; here contentment rules. Mistrust is felt toward the exceptions; to be an exception is experienced as guilt.

281 (March-June 1888)

When, following the instinct of the community, we make prescriptions and forbid ourselves certain actions, we quite reasonably do not forbid a mode of “being,” a “disposition,” but only a certain direction and application of this “being,” this “disposition.” But then the ideologist of virtue, the moralist, comes along and says: “God sees into the heart! What does it matter if you refrain from certain actions: you are no better for that!” Answer: My dear Sir Long-Ears-and-Virtuous, we have no desire whatever to be better, we are very contented with ourselves, all we desire is not to harm one another—and therefore we forbid certain actions when they are directed in a certain way, namely against us, while we cannot sufficiently honor these same actions provided they are directed against enemies of the community—against you, for instance. We educate our children in them; we cultivate them— If we shared that “God-pleasing” radicalism that your holy madness recommends, if we were fools enough to condemn together with those actions the source of them, the “heart,” the “disposition,” that would mean condemning our own existence and with it its supreme prerequisite—a disposition, a heart, a passion we honor with the highest honors. By our decrees, we prevent this disposition from breaking out and expressing itself in an inexpedient way—we are prudent when we make such law for ourselves, we are also moral— Have you no suspicion, however faint, what sacrifice it is costing us, how much taming, self-overcoming, severity toward ourselves it requires? We are vehement in our desires, there are times when we would like to devour each other— But the “sense of community” masters us: please note that this is almost a definition of morality.

282 (Fall 1888)

The weakness of the herd animal produces a morality very similar to that produced by the weakness of the decadent: they understand one another, they form an alliance (—the great decadence religions always count on the support of the herd). In itself, there is nothing sick about the herd animal, it is even invaluable; but, incapable of leading itself, it needs a “shepherd”— the priests understand that— The state is not intimate, not clandestine enough; “directing the conscience” eludes it. And that is how the herd animal has been made sick by the priest?— 283 (1883-1888) Hatred for the privileged in body and soul: revolt of the ugly, ill-constituted souls against the beautiful, proud, joyous. Their means: inculcation of beauty, pride, joy: “there is no merit,” “the danger is tremendous: one should tremble and feel ill,” “naturalness is evil; it is right to oppose nature.” Also “reason.” (The antinatural as the higher). Again it is the priests who exploit this condition and win the “people” over. “The sinner” in whom God has more joy than in the “just man” This is the struggle against “paganism” (the pang of conscience as the means of destroying harmony of soul). The hatred of the average for the exceptional, of the herd for the independent. (Custom as true “morality”⁵⁹) Turning against “egoism”: only the “for another” has value. “We are all equal”;— against lust for dominion, against “dominion” in general;— against privilege;— against sectarians, free spirits, skeptics;— against philosophy (as opposing the tool-and-corner instinct); with philosophers themselves “the categorical imperative,” the essence of morality “universal and general.”

284 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The conditions and desires that are praised:— peaceable, fair, moderate, modest, reverent, considerate, brave, chaste, honest, faithful, devout, straight, trusting, devoted, sympathetic, helpful, conscientious, simple, mild, just, generous, indulgent, obedient, disinterested, unenvious, gracious, industrious— To distinguish: to what extent such qualities are conditioned as means to a definite aim and end (often an “evil” end); or as natural consequences of a dominating affect (e.g. spirituality) or expression of a state of distress, which is to say: as condition of existence (e.g., citizen, slave, woman, etc.). Summa: they are none of them felt to be “good” for their own sake, but from the first according to the standards of “society,” “the herd,” as means to the ends of society and the herd, as necessary to their preservation and advancement, at the same time as the consequence of an actual herd instinct in the individual: thus in the service of an instinct which is fundamentally different from these conditions of virtue. For the herd is, in relation to the outside world, hostile, selfish, unmerciful, full of lust for dominion, mistrust, etc. In the “shepherd” this antagonism becomes patent: he must possess opposite qualities to the herd. Mortal enmity of the herd toward orders of rank: its instinct favors the leveller (Christ) Toward strong individuals (les souverains) it is hostile, unfair, immoderate, immodest, impudent, inconsiderate, cowardly, mendacious, false, unmerciful, underhand, envious, revengeful. 285 (1884) I teach: the herd seeks to preserve one type and defends itself on both sides, against those who have degenerated from it (criminals, etc.) and those who tower above it. The tendency of the herd is directed toward standstill and preservation, there is nothing creative in it. The pleasant feelings with which the good, benevolent, just man inspires us (in contrast to the tension, fear which the great, new man arouses) are our own feelings of personal security and equality: the herd animal thus glorifies the herd nature and then it feels comfortable. This judgment of comfort masks itself with fair words—thus “morality” arises.— But observe the hatred of the herd for the truthful.— 286 (1883-1888) Let one not be deceived about oneself! If one hears within oneself the moral imperative as it is understood by altruism, one belongs to the herd. If one has the opposite feeling, if one feels one’s danger and aberration lies in disinterested and selfless actions, one does not belong to the herd. 287 (1883-1888) My philosophy aims at an ordering of rank: not at an individualistic morality.⁶⁰ The ideas of the herd should rule in the herd—but not reach out beyond it: the leaders of the herd require a fundamentally different valuation for their own actions, as do the independent, or the “beasts of prey,” etc.

288 (March-June 1888)

Morality as an attempt to establish human pride.— The theory of “free will” is antireligious. It seeks to create the right for man to think of himself as cause of his exalted state and actions: it is a form of the growing feeling of pride. Man feels his power, his “happiness,” as they say: there must be “will” behind this state—otherwise it would not be his. Virtue is the attempt to set the fact of willing and having-willed before every exalted and strong feeling of happiness as a necessary antecedent:— if the will to certain actions is regularly present in the consciousness, a feeling of power may be interpreted as its effect.— This is merely a perspective of psychology: always based on the false presupposition that nothing belongs to us that we have not consciously willed. The entire theory of responsibility depends upon the naive psychology that the only cause is will and that one must be aware of having willed in order to believe in oneself as cause. —Comes the countermovement: that of the moral philosophers, still subject to the same prejudice that one is responsible only for what one has willed. The value of man is posited as a moral value: consequently his morality must be a causa prima;⁶¹ consequently there must be a principle in man, a “free will” as causa prima.— The idea behind it is: if man is not causa prima as will, then he is irresponsible—consequently he has no business before the moral tribunal—virtue and vice would be automatic and mechanical— In summa: so that man may respect himself he must be capable of doing evil.

289 (March-June 1888)

Play-acting as a consequence of the morality of “free will.”— It is a step in the development of the feeling of power itself to have caused one’s own exalted states (one’s perfection)—consequently, one immediately concludes, to have willed them— (Critique: All perfect acts are unconscious and no longer subject to will; consciousness is the expression of an imperfect and often morbid state in a person. Personal perfection as conditioned by will, as consciousness, as reasoning with dialectics, is a caricature, a kind of self-contradiction— A degree of consciousness makes perfection impossible— Form of play-acting.)

290 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The moral hypothesis with the object of justifying God was: evil must be voluntary (merely so that the voluntariness of goodness can be believed in), and on the other hand: the object of evil and suffering is salvation. The concept “guilt” as not extending back to the ultimate ground of existence, and the concept “punishment” as an educative benefit, consequently as the act of a good God. Absolute dominion of moral valuation over all others: one did not doubt that God could not be evil and could not do anything harmful, i.e., by “perfection” one meant merely a moral perfection.

291 (March-June 1888)

How false is the idea that the value of an action must depend upon that which preceded it in consciousness!— And morality has been judged according to this, even criminality— The value of an action must be judged by its consequences— say the Utilitarians—: to judge it by its origins implies an impossibility, namely that of knowing its origins But does one know its consequences? For five steps ahead, perhaps. Who can say what an action will stimulate, excite, provoke? As a stimulus? Perhaps as a spark to touch off an explosion?— The Utilitarians are naive— And in any case we must first know what is useful: here too they look only five steps ahead— They have no conception of the grand economy, which cannot do without evil. One does not know the origin, one does not know the consequences — does an action then possess any value at all? The action itself remains: its epiphenomena in consciousness, the Yes and the No that follow its performance: does the value of an action lie in its subjective epiphenomena? (— that would be like assessing the value of the music according to the pleasure or displeasure it gives us—it gives its composer—). Obviously value feelings accompany it, a feeling of power, compulsion, impotence; e g, freedom, ease— put in another way: could one reduce the value of an action to physiological values: whether it is the expression of a complete or an inhibited life?⁶²— It may be that its biological value is expressed in this— If therefore an action can be evaluated neither by its origin, nor by its consequences, nor by its epiphenomena, then its value is “x” unknown—

292 (Spring-Fall 1887)

On the denaturalization of morality. To separate the action from the man; to direct hatred or contempt against the “sin”; to believe there are actions that are good or bad in themselves.⁶³ Restoration of “nature”: an action in itself is perfectly devoid of value: it all depends on who performs it. One and the same “crime” can be in one case the greatest privilege, in another a stigma. In fact, it is the selfishness of the judges which interprets an action, or its performer, in relation to its utility or harmfulness to themselves (—or in relation to its similarity or unlikeness to them).

293 (March-June 1888)

The concept “reprehensible action” presents us with difficulties. Nothing that happened at all can be reprehensible in itself: for one should not want to eliminate it: for everything is so bound up with everything else, that to want to exclude something means to exclude everything. A reprehensible action means: a reprehended world— And then further: in a reprehended world reprehending would also be reprehensible— And the consequence of a way of thinking that reprehended everything would be a way of living that affirmed everything— If becoming is a great ring, then everything is equally valuable, eternal, necessary. — In all correlations of Yes and No, of preference and rejection, love and hate, all that is expressed is a perspective, an interest of certain types of life: in itself, everything that is says Yes.

294 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Critique of subjective value feelings.— The conscience. Formerly one concluded: the conscience reprehends this action; consequently this action is reprehensible. In fact, the conscience reprehends an action because it has been reprehended for a long time. It merely repeats: it creates no values. That which in the past decided to reprehend certain actions was not conscience: but the insight into (or the prejudice against) their consequences— The assent of the conscience, the pleasant feeling of “at peace with oneself,” is of the same order as the pleasure of an artist in his work—it proves nothing at all— Self-contentment is as little a standard for that to which it relates as its absence is an argument against the value of a thing. We do not know nearly enough to be able to measure the value of our actions: in addition, it is impossible for us to be objective about them: even when we reprehend an action, we are not judges but interested parties — If noble agitation accompanies an action, this proves nothing about its value: an artist can go through the highest possible pathos of passion and bring forth something wretched. One should say rather that these agitations are a means of seduction: they lure our eyes, our strength away from criticism, from caution, from suspicion, so that we perpetrate a stupidity—they make us stupid— 295 (1885-1886) We are the heirs of the conscience-vivisection and self-crucifixion of two millennia: in these we have had longest practice, in these lies our mastery perhaps, certainly our subtlety; we have conjoined the natural inclinations and a bad conscience. A reverse attempt would be possible: to conjoin the unnatural inclinations, I mean the inclination for the beyond, for things contrary to sense, reason, nature, in short all previous ideals, which were all world-slandering ideals, with a bad conscience.

296 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The great crimes in psychology: that all displeasure, all misfortune has been falsified with the idea of wrong (guilt). (Pain has been robbed of innocence); that all strong feelings of pleasure (wild spirits, voluptuousness, triumph, pride, audacity, knowledge, self-assurance and happiness as such) have been branded as sinful, as a seduction, as suspicious; that feelings of weakness, inward acts of cowardice, lack of courage for oneself have been overlaid with sanctifying names and taught as being desirable in the highest degree; that everything great in man has been reinterpreted as selflessness, as self-sacrifice for the sake of something else, someone else, that even in the man of knowledge, even in the artist, depersonalization has been presented as the cause of the greatest knowledge and ability; that love has been falsified as surrender (and altruism), while it is an appropriation or a bestowal following from a superabundance of personality. Only the most complete persons can love; the depersonalized, the “objective,” are the worst lovers (—one has only to ask the girls!) This applies also to love of God or of “fatherland”; one must be firmly rooted in oneself. (Egoism as ego-morphism, altruism as alter-ation.⁶⁴ Life as punishment (happiness as temptation); the passions as devilish, confidence in oneself as godless. This whole psychology is a psychology of prevention, a kind of immuring out of fear; on one hand the great masses (the underprivileged and mediocre) seek to defend themselves by means of it against the stronger (—and to destroy them in their development—), on the other all the drives through which they best prosper, sanctified and alone held in honor. Compare the Jewish priesthood.

297 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The vestiges of debasement of nature through moral transcendence: value of selflessness, cult of altruism; belief in repayment within the play of consequences; belief in “goodness,” in “genius” even, as if the one and the other were consequences of selflessness; the continuance of the ecclesiastical sanction of bourgeois life; absolute desire to misunderstand history (as an educative work toward moralization) or pessimism in the face of history (—the latter as much a consequence of the debasement of nature as that pseudo justification, as that not desiring to see that which the pessimist sees—).

298 (Spring-Fall 1887)

“Morality for morality’s sake”—an important step in its denaturalization: it itself appears as the ultimate value. In this phase it has permeated religion: e.g., in Judaism. And there is likewise a phase in which it separates itself again from religion and in which no God is “moral” enough for it: it then prefers the impersonal ideal— This is the case at present. “Art for art’s sake”—this is an equally dangerous principle: therewith one introduces a false antithesis into things—it culminates in a defamation of reality (“idealization” into the ugly). If one severs an ideal from reality one debases the real, one impoverishes it, one defames it. “The beautiful for the sake of the beautiful,” “the true for the sake of the true,” “the good for the sake of the good”—these are three forms of evil eye for the real. —Art, knowledge, morality are means: instead of recognizing in them the aim of enhancing life, one has associated them with the antithesis of life, with “God”—also as the revelation of a higher world which here and there looks down upon us through them— “Beautiful and ugly,” “true and false,” “good and evil”— these distinctions and antagonisms betray certain conditions of existence and enhancement, not only of man but of any kind of firm and enduring complex which separates itself from its adversary. The war that is thus created is the essential element: as a means of separation that strengthens isolation—

299 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Moralistic naturalism: the tracing back of apparently emancipated, supranatural moral values to their “nature”: i.e., to natural immorality, to natural “utility,” etc. I might designate the tendency of these reflections as moralistic naturalism: my task is to translate the apparently emancipated and denatured moral values back into their nature—ie., into their natural “immorality.” —N.B. Comparison with Jewish “holiness” and its natural basis: it is the same with the moral law made sovereign, emancipated from its nature (—to the point of becoming the antithesis of nature—). Steps in the denaturalization of morality (so-called “idealization”): as a way to individual happiness, as a consequence of knowledge, as the categorical imperative, as a way to salvation, as denial of the will to live. (The gradual hostility to life of morality.)

300 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Suppressed and effaced heresy in morality.— Concepts: pagan, master morality, virtù. 301 (1885-1886) My problem: What harm has come to mankind through morals and through its morality? Harm to the spirit, etc.

302 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

If only human values would be put back once and for all into the places in which alone they belong; as loafers' values. Many species of animals have already vanished; if man too should vanish nothing would be lacking in the world One must be sufficient of a philosopher to admire this nothing, too (—Nil admirari).
65

303 (Spring 1888)

Man a little, eccentric species of animal, which—fortunately—has its day; all on earth a mere moment, an incident, an exception without consequences, something of no importance to the general character of the earth; the earth itself, like every star, a hiatus between two nothingnesses, an event without plan, reason, will, self-consciousness, the worst kind of necessity, stupid necessity— Something in us rebels against this view; the serpent vanity says to us: “all that must be false, for it arouses indignation— Could all that not be merely appearance? And man, in spite of all, as Kant says—”

304 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Of the ideal of the moralists.⁶⁶— This treatise deals with the grand politics of virtue. It is intended for the use of those whose interest must lie in learning, not how one becomes virtuous, but how one makes virtuous—how virtue is made to dominate. I even intend to prove that to desire the one—the domination of virtue—one absolutely must not desire the other; one automatically renounces becoming virtuous oneself. This is a great sacrifice; but such a goal is perhaps sufficient reward for such a sacrifice. And for even greater sacrifices!— And some of the most famous moralists have risked as much. For they had already recognized and anticipated the truth, which is in this treatise to be taught for the first time, that one can achieve the domination of virtue only by the same means as those by which one can achieve domination of any kind, in any case not by means of virtue— This treatise, as already stated, deals with the politics of virtue: it posits an ideal of these politics, it describes them as they would have to be, if anything on this earth could be perfect. Now, no philosopher will be in any doubt as to the type of perfection in politics; that is Machiavellianism. But Machiavellianism pur, sans mélange, cru, vert, dans toute sa force, dans toute son âpreté,⁶⁷ is superhuman, divine, transcendental, it will never be achieved by man, at most approximated. Even in this narrower kind of politics, in the politics of virtue, the ideal seems never to have been achieved. Even Plato barely touched it. One discovers, if one has eyes for hidden things, traces in even the most unprejudiced and conscious moralists (and that is indeed the name for such politicians of morality, for every kind of founder of new moral forces) that show that they too have paid their tribute to human weakness. They all aspired, at least when they were weary, to virtue for themselves: first and capital error for a moralist—who must as such be an immoralist in practice. That he must not appear to be so is another matter. Or rather, it is not another matter. such a fundamental self-denial (in moral terms, dissimulation) is part of the canon of the moralist and his most specific duties: without it he will never attain to his kind of perfection. Freedom from morality, also from truth, for the sake of that goal that outweighs every sacrifice: for the sake of the domination of virtue—that is the canon. Moralists need the gestures of virtue, also the gestures of truth; their error begins only when they yield to virtue, when they lose domination over virtue, when they themselves become moral, become true. A great moralist is, among other things, necessarily a great actor; his danger is that his dissimulation may unintentionally become nature, while it is his ideal to keep his esse and his operari in a divine way apart; everything he does must be done sub specie boni— a high, remote, exacting ideal! A divine ideal! And indeed, it is said that the moralist imitates in that no less a model than God himself: God, the greatest of all immoralists in practice, who nonetheless knows how to remain what he is, the good God—

305 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

One cannot establish the domination of virtue by means of virtue itself; with virtue itself one renounces power, loses the will to power. 306 (1883-1886)⁷⁰
The victory of a moral ideal is achieved by the same “immoral” means as every victory: force, lies, slander, injustice.

307 (Spring-Fall 1887)

He who knows how all fame originates will be mistrustful even of the fame virtue enjoys.

308 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Morality is just as “immoral” as any other thing on earth; morality is itself a form of immorality. The great liberation this insight brings. Contradiction is removed from things, the homogeneity of all events is saved—

309 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

There are those who go looking for immorality. When they judge: "This is wrong," they believe one should abolish and change it. I, on the contrary, cannot rest as long as I am not yet clear about the immorality of a thing. When I unearth it I recover my equanimity.

310 (Spring-Fall 1887)

a. The paths to power: to introduce a new virtue under the name of an old one—to excite “interest” in it (“happiness” as its consequence and vice versa)—the art of slandering what stands in its way—to exploit advantages and accidents for its glorification—to turn its followers into fanatics by means of sacrifice and separation;—grand symbolism. b. Power attained: (1) virtue as force; (2) virtue as seduction; (3) virtue as (court) etiquette.

311 (Spring-Fall 1887)

By which means does a virtue come to power?— By exactly the same means as a political party: the slandering, inculcation, undermining of virtues that oppose it and are already in power, by rebaptizing them, by systematic persecution and mockery. Therefore: through sheer “immorality.” What does a desire do with itself to become a virtue?— Rebaptism; systematic denial of its objectives; practice in self-misunderstanding; alliance with existing and recognized virtues; ostentatious hostility against their opponents. Where possible it purchases the protection of sanctifying powers; it intoxicates, it inspires; the tartuffery of idealism; it forms a party which must either conquer with it or perish—it becomes unconscious, naive—

312 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Cruelty has been refined to tragic pity, so that it is denied the name of cruelty. In the same way sexual love has been refined to amour-passion; the slavish disposition to Christian obedience; wretchedness to humility; a pathological condition of the nervus sympathicus, e.g., to pessimism, Pascalism, or Carlylism, etc.

313 (March-June 1888)

It would arouse doubts in us concerning a man if we heard he needed reasons for remaining decent: certainly, we would avoid him. The little word “for” can be compromising in certain cases; one can even refute oneself now and then with a single “for.”⁷¹ Now, if we hear further that such an aspirant to virtue needed bad reasons for remaining respectable, this would be no reason for us to feel an increased respect for him. But he goes further, he comes to us and tells us to our face: “Unbeliever, you are disturbing my morality with your unbelief; as long as you do not believe in my bad reasons, which is to say in God, in a punishment in the beyond, in freedom of will, you hamper my virtue— Moral: unbelievers must be abolished: they hamper the moralization of the masses.”

314 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Our most sacred convictions, the unchanging elements in our supreme values, are judgments of our muscles.

315 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Morality in the valuation of races and classes.— In view of the fact that the affects and fundamental drives in every race and class express something of the conditions of their existence (—at least of the conditions under which they have prevailed for the longest time), to desire that they should be “virtuous” means: that they change their character, shed their skin and blot out their past: means that they should cease to be distinct: means that they should begin to resemble one another in their needs and demands—more clearly that they should perish— The will to a single morality is thereby proved to be a tyranny over other types by that type whom this single morality fits: it is a destruction or a leveling for the sake of the ruling type (whether to render the others no longer fearsome or to render them useful). “Abolition of slavery”—supposedly a tribute to “human dignity,” in fact a destruction of a fundamentally different type (—the undermining of its values and happiness—). The qualities in which an opposing race or class is strong are interpreted as its most evil, worst qualities: for it is with those that it can harm us (—its “virtues” are defamed and rebaptized—). It counts as an objection against a man or people if they harm us: but from their point of view we are desirable, because we are such as one can make use of. The demand for “humanization” (which quite naively believes itself to possess the formula for “what is human?”) is a tartuffery, behind which a quite definite type of man seeks to attain domination: more exactly, a quite definite instinct, the herd instinct — “Human equality”: which is concealed behind the tendency to make men more and more alike. “Interestedness” with reference to communal morality. (Artifice: to transform the great passions of lust for power and possessions into protectors of virtue). To what extent all kinds of businessmen and the avaricious, all who have to give and claim credit, find it necessary to become more and more alike in character and in conception of value: world trade and exchange of every kind extorts and, as it were, buys virtue. The same applies to the state and to every kind of rule by means of officials and soldiers; likewise science, in order to work in security and with economy of its forces.— Likewise the priesthood. — Here, therefore, a communal morality is enforced because it procures an advantage; and to make it victorious, war and force are practiced against immorality—with what “right”? With no right whatever: but in accordance with the instinct for self-preservation. These same classes make use of immorality when it serves their purpose.

316 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The hypocritical show with which all civil institutions are whitewashed, as if they were products of morality—e.g., marriage; work; one's profession; the fatherland; the family; order; law. But since they are one and all founded on the most mediocre type of man, as protection against exceptions and exceptional needs, it is only to be expected that they are full of lies.

317 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

One should defend virtue against the preachers of virtue: they are its worst enemies. For they teach virtue as an ideal for everyone; they take from virtue the charm of rareness, inimitableness, exceptionalness and unaverageness—its aristocratic magic. One should also take a stand against the obdurate idealists who eagerly knock on all vessels and are satisfied when they ring hollow: what naïveté to demand the great and rare and then to establish, with rage and misanthropy, that they are absent!— It is obvious, e g, that a marriage is worth as much as those whom it joins together, i.e., that in general it will be something wretched and inept: no priest, no mayor can make anything else of it. Virtue has all the instincts of the average man against it: it is unprofitable, imprudent, it isolates; it is related to passion and not very accessible to reason; it spoils the character, the head, the mind—according to the standards of mediocre men; it rouses to enmity toward order, toward the lies that are concealed in every order, institution, actuality—it is the worst of vices, if one judges it by its harmful effect upon others. —I recognize virtue in that (1) it does not desire to be recognized; (2) it does not presuppose virtue everywhere, but precisely something else; (3) it does not suffer from the absence of virtue, but on the contrary regards this as the distancing relationship on the basis of which there is something to honor in virtue; it does not communicate itself; (4) it does not propagandize— (5) it permits no one to judge it, because it is always virtue for itself; (6) it does precisely all that is generally forbidden: virtue, as I understand it, is the real vetitum within all herd legislation; (7) in short, it is virtue in the style of the Renaissance, virtù, moraline-free virtue.⁷³

318 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Above all, gentlemen of virtue, you are not our superiors: we should like you to be a little more modest: it is a miserable self-interest and prudence that suggests your virtue to you. And if you had more strength and courage in you, you would not reduce yourselves to virtuous nonentities in this way. You make what you can of yourselves: partly what you must—what your circumstances force you to—partly what gives you pleasure, partly what seems useful to you. But if you do only what is in keeping with your inclinations, or what necessity demands of you, or what is useful to you, then you should neither praise yourselves nor let others praise you!— One is a thoroughly small type of man if one is only virtuous: do not be misled about that! Men who have been in any way notable were never such virtuous asses: their innermost instinct, that of their quantum of power, did not find satisfaction that way: while, with your minimum of power, nothing can seem wiser to you than virtue. But you have numbers on your side; and in so far as you play the tyrant, we shall make war on you—

319 (Spring-Fall 1887)

A virtuous man is a lower species because he is not a “person” but acquires his value by conforming to a pattern of man that is fixed once and for all. He does not possess his value apart: he can be compared, he has his equals, he must not be an individual— Reckon up the qualities of the good man: why do they give us pleasure? Because we have no need to fight against them, because they impose upon us no mistrust, no need for caution, no marshalling of forces and severity: our laziness, good nature, frivolity, have a good time. It is this pleasant feeling in us that we project out of us and bestow upon the good man as a quality, as a value. 320 (1888) Virtue is under certain circumstances merely an honorable form of stupidity: who could be ill-disposed toward it on that account? And this kind of virtue has not been outlived even today. A kind of sturdy peasant simplicity, which, however, is possible in all classes and can be encountered only with respect and a smile, believes even today that everything is in good hands, namely in the “hands of God”; and when it maintains this proposition with the same modest certainty as it would that two and two make four, we others certainly refrain from contradicting. Why disturb this pure foolishness? Why darken it with our worries about man, people, goal, future? And even if we wanted to do it, we could not. They project their own honorable stupidity and goodness into the heart of things (the old God, deus myops,⁷⁴ still lives among them!); we others—we read something else into the heart of things: our own enigmatic nature, our contradictions, our deeper, more painful, more mistrustful wisdom.

321 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

He who finds virtue easy also laughs at it. It is impossible to maintain seriousness in virtue: one attains it and leaps beyond it—whither? into devilry. In the meantime, how intelligent all our wicked tendencies and impulses have become! how much scientific inquisitiveness plagues them! So many fishhooks of knowledge!

322 (Spring-Fall 1887)

—To associate vice so closely with something decidedly painful that at last one flees from vice in order to be rid of that which is associated with it. This is the famous case of Tannhäuser Driven out of patience by Wagnerian music, Tannhäuser can no longer endure it even with Frau Venus: suddenly virtue acquires a charm; a Thuringian virgin increases in value; and, to tell the worst, he even enjoys Wolfram von Eschenbach's tune—

323 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The patrons of virtue.—Avarice, lust to rule, laziness, simplicity, fear: all have an interest in the cause of virtue: that is why it stands so firm.

324 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Virtue is no longer believed in, its power of attraction is gone; to restore it, someone would have to know how to take it to market as an unfamiliar form of adventure and excess. It demands too much extravagance and narrow-mindedness of its believers not to have the conscience against it today. To be sure, precisely that may constitute its new charm for unconscionable and totally unscrupulous people:— it is now what it never was before, a vice.

325 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Virtue is still the most expensive vice: it should remain so! 326 (1883-1888)

Virtues are as dangerous as vices in so far as one lets them rule over one as authorities and laws from without and does not first produce them out of oneself, as one should do, as one's most personal self-defense and necessity, as conditions of precisely our own existence and growth, which we recognize and acknowledge independently of whether other men grow with us under similar or different conditions. This law of the dangerousness of impersonally understood, objective virtue applies also to modesty: many of the choicest spirits perish through it. The morality of modesty is the worst form of softening for those souls for which it makes sense that they should become hard in time.

327 (Spring-Fall 1887)

One should reduce and limit the realm of morality step by step: one should bring to light and honor the names of the instincts that are really at work here after they have been hidden for so long beneath hypocritical names of virtue; out of respect for one's "honesty," which speaks more and more imperiously, one should unlearn the shame that would like to deny and lie away one's natural instincts. It is a measure of strength how far one can divest oneself of virtue; and a height can be imagined where the concept "virtue" is so understood that it sounds like virtù, Renaissance virtue, moraline-free virtue.⁷⁵ But in the meantime—how distant we are from this ideal! The reduction of the domain of morality: a sign of the progress of this ideal. Wherever one has not yet been capable of causal thinking, one has thought morally.

328 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

In the end: what have I achieved? Let us not hide from ourselves this most curious result: I have imparted to virtue a new charm—the charm of something forbidden. It has our subtlest honesty against it, it is spiced “cum grano salis”⁷⁶ of the sting of scientific conscience; it smells old-fashioned and antique, so that at last it lures the refined and makes them inquisitive—in short, it appears as a vice. Only after we have recognized everything as lies and appearance do we regain the right to this fairest of falsehoods, virtue. There is no court of appeal left that could deny it to us: only by exhibiting virtue as a form of immorality do we again justify it—it is classified and compared with reference to its fundamental significance, it is part of the fundamental immorality of all existence—as a form of luxury of the first order, the haughtiest, dearest and rarest form of vice. We have removed its scowl and its cowl, we have rescued it from the importunity of the many, we have taken from it its absurd rigidity, its vacant expression, its stiff false hair, its hieratic muscular system.

329 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. 1888)

Have I thereby harmed virtue?— As little as the anarchists harm princes: only since they have been shot at do they sit securely on their thrones again— For thus has it ever been and always will be: one cannot serve a cause better than by persecuting it and hunting it down— This—is what I have done.⁷⁷ A. Critique of Ideals 330 (1886-1887) To tackle this in such a way as to abolish the word “ideal”: critique of desiderata. 331 (1883-1888) Very few are clear as to what the standpoint of desirability, every “thus it should be but is not” or even “thus it should have been,” comprises: a condemnation of the total course of things. For in this course nothing exists in isolation: the smallest things bear the greatest, upon your little wrongful act stands the entire structure of the future, every critique of the smallest thing also condemns the whole. Now, granted that the moral norm, even as Kant understood it, has never been completely fulfilled and remains suspended over actuality as a kind of beyond without ever falling down into it, then morality would contain a judgment concerning the whole, which, however, still permits the question: whence does it derive the right to this judgment? How does the part come to sit as judge over the whole?— And if this moral judging and dissatisfaction with actuality were in fact, as has been suggested, an ineradicable instinct, might this instinct not be one of the ineradicable stupidities and immodesties of our species?— But in saying this we do that which we censure; the standpoint of desirability, of unauthorized playing-the-judge, is part of the character of the course of things, as is every injustice and imperfection—it is precisely our concept of “perfection” which is never satisfied. Every drive that desires to be satisfied expresses its dissatisfaction with the present state of things: what? is the whole perhaps composed of dissatisfied parts, which all have desiderata in their heads? is the “course of things” perhaps precisely this “away from here? away from actuality!” eternal dissatisfaction itself? is desirability perhaps the driving force itself? is it—deus?⁷⁸ * It seems to me important that one should get rid of the all, the unity, some force, something unconditioned; otherwise one will never cease regarding it as the highest court of appeal and baptizing it “God.” One must shatter the all; unlearn respect for the all; take what we have given to the unknown and the whole and give it back to what is nearest, what is ours. When, e.g., Kant says: “Two things remain forever worthy of reverence” (conclusion of the [Critique of] Practical Reason)—today we should sooner say: “Digestion is more venerable.” The all would always bring the old problems with it— “How is evil possible?” etc. Therefore: there is no all, there is no great sensorium or inventarium or storehouse of force.

332 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

A man as he ought to be: that sounds to us as insipid as “a tree as it ought to be.”⁸⁰ 333 (1883-1888) Ethics: or “philosophy of desirability.”— “Things ought to be different,” “things shall be different”: dissatisfaction would thus be the germ of ethics. One could rescue oneself from it, firstly by selecting states in which one did not have this feeling; secondly by grasping the presumption and stupidity of it: for to desire that something should be different from what it is means to desire that everything should be different—it involves a condemnatory critique of the whole.⁸¹ But life itself is such a desire! To ascertain what is, as it is, seems something unspeakably higher and more serious than any “thus it ought to be,” because the latter, as a piece of human critique and presumption, appears ludicrous from the start. It expresses a need that desires that the structure of the world should correspond with our human well-being; also the will to bring this about as far as possible. On the other hand, it is only this desire “thus it ought to be” that has called forth that other desire to know what is. For the knowledge of what is, is a consequence of that question: “How? is it possible? why precisely so?” Wonder at the disagreement between our desires and the course of the world has led to our learning to know the course of the world. But perhaps the case is different: perhaps that “thus it ought to be” is our desire to overcome the world—

334 (March-June 1888)

Today, when every “man ought to be thus and thus” is spoken with a grain of irony, when we are altogether convinced that, in spite of all, one will become only that which one is (in spite of all: that means education, instruction, milieu, chance, and accident), we have learned to reverse cause and consequence in a curious way in moral matters—nothing perhaps distinguishes us more completely from the old believers in morality. We no longer say, e.g.: “Vice is the cause that a man also goes to ruin physiologically”; and just as little: “A man prospers through virtue, it brings long life and happiness.” Our view is rather that vice and virtue are not causes but only consequences. One becomes a decent man because one is a decent man: i.e., because one was born a capitalist of good instincts and prosperous circumstances— If one comes into the world poor, of parents who have squandered everything and saved nothing, one is “incorrigible,” which means ripe for prison or the madhouse— Today we no longer know how to separate moral and physiological degeneration: the former is merely a symptom-complex of the latter; one is necessarily bad, just as one is necessarily ill— Bad: here the word expresses a certain incapacity associated physiologically with the degenerating type: e.g., weakness of will, insecure and even multiple “personality,” inability to resist reacting to a stimulus and to “control” oneself, constraint before every kind of suggestion from the will of another. Vice is not a cause; vice is a consequence— Vice is a somewhat arbitrarily limited concept designed to express in one word certain consequences of physiological degeneration. A universal proposition such as Christianity teaches—“Man is evil”—would be justified if one were justified in taking the degenerate type as the normal type of man. But perhaps this is an exaggeration. To be sure, the proposition is correct wherever Christianity prospers and stays on top: for that demonstrates a morbid soil, a field for degeneration.

335 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

One cannot have too much respect for man when one sees how well he understands how to fight his way through, to endure, to turn circumstances to his own use, to overthrow his adversaries; but when one looks at his desires he appears the absurdest of animals— It is as if he required a playground of cowardice, laziness, weakness, lusciousness, submissiveness for the recreation of his strong and manly virtues: observe human desiderata, his “ideals.” Desiring man recovers from the eternally valuable in him, from his deeds: he employs nothingness, the absurd, the valueless, the childish for his recovery. The spiritual poverty and lack of inventiveness of this inventive and resourceful animal are terrible. The “ideal” is, as it were, the penalty man pays for the tremendous expenditure he has to meet in all actual and pressing tasks. When reality ceases, dream, weariness, weakness come along: “the ideal” is simply a form of dream, weariness, weakness— The strongest and the most powerless natures become equal when this condition overtakes them: they deify the cessation of work, of war, of passion, of tension, of oppositions, of “reality” in summa—the struggle for knowledge, the exertion of knowledge. “Innocence”: that is their name for the ideal state of stupefaction; “blessedness”: the ideal state of sloth; “love”: the ideal state of the herd animal that no longer wants to have enemies. Therewith one has raised everything that debases and lowers man to an ideal.⁸⁴

336 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Desire magnifies that which one desires; it grows even by not being fulfilled—the greatest ideas are those that have been created by the most violent and protracted desires. The more our desire for a thing grows, the more value we ascribe to that thing:⁸⁵ if “moral values” have become the highest values, this betrays the fact that the moral ideal has been the least fulfilled (—to that extent it represented a “beyond all suffering,” as a means to blessedness). Mankind has embraced, with ever-increasing ardor, nothing but clouds: finally it called its despair, its impotence “God”— 337 (1887-1888) Naiveté in respect of ultimate “desiderata”—while one does not know the “why” of mankind.

338 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

What is the counterfeiting aspect of morality?— It pretends to know something, namely what “good and evil” is. That means wanting to know why mankind is here, its goal, its destiny. That means wanting to know that mankind has a goal, a destiny—

339 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The very obscure and arbitrary idea that mankind has a single task to perform, that it is moving as a whole toward some goal, is still very young. Perhaps we shall be rid of it again before it becomes a “fixed idea”— This mankind is not a whole: it is an inextricable multiplicity of ascending and descending life-processes—it does not have a youth followed by maturity and finally by old age; the strata are twisted and entwined together—and in a few millennia there may still be even younger types of man than we can show today. Decadence, on the other hand, belongs to all epochs of mankind: refuse and decaying matter are found everywhere; it is one of life’s processes to exclude the forms of decline and decay.⁸⁷ * When Christian prejudice was a power, this question did not exist: meaning lay in the salvation of the individual soul; whether mankind could endure for a long or a short time did not come into consideration. The best Christians desired that it should end as soon as possible—concerning that which was needful to the individual there was no doubt— The task of every present individual was the same as for a future individual in any kind of future: value, meaning, domain of values were fixed, unconditional, eternal, one with God— That which deviated from this eternal type was sinful, devilish, condemned— For each soul, the gravitational center of valuation was placed within itself: salvation or damnation! The salvation of the immortal soul! Extremest form of personalization— For every soul there was only one perfecting; only one ideal; only one way to redemption— Extremest form of equality of rights, tied to an optical magnification of one’s own importance to the point of insanity— Nothing but insanely important souls, revolving about themselves with a frightful fear— * No man believes now in this absurd self-inflation: and we have sifted our wisdom through a sieve of contempt. Nevertheless, the optical habit of seeking the value of man in his approach to an ideal man remains undisturbed: fundamentally, one upholds the perspective of personalization as well as equality of rights before the ideal. In summa: one believes one knows what the ultimate desideratum is with regard to the ideal man— This belief, however, is only the consequence of a dreadful deterioration through the Christian ideal: as one at once discovers with every careful examination of the “ideal type.” One believes one knows, first that an approach to one type is desirable; secondly, that one knows what this type is like; thirdly, that every deviation from this type is a regression, an inhibition, a loss of force and power in man— To dream of conditions in which this perfect man will be in the vast majority even our socialists, even the Utilitarians have not gone farther than this — In this way a goal seems to have entered the development of mankind: at any rate, the belief in progress towards the ideal is the only form in which a goal in history is thought of today. In summa: one has transferred the arrival of the “kingdom of God” into the future, on earth, in human form—but fundamentally one has held fast to the belief in the old ideal—

340 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The more concealed forms of the cult of the Christian moral ideal.— The insipid and cowardly concept “nature” devised by nature enthusiasts (—without any instinct for what is fearful, implacable and cynical in even the “most beautiful” aspects), a kind of attempt to read moral Christian “humanity” into nature— Rousseau’s concept of nature, as if “nature” were freedom, goodness, innocence, fairness, justice, an idyl—still a cult of Christian morality fundamentally— Collect together passages to see what the poets really admired in, e g, high mountains, etc.— What Goethe wanted from them—why he admired Spinoza—. Complete ignorance the presupposition for this cult— The insipid and cowardly concept “man” à la Comte and Stuart Mill, perhaps even the object of a cult— It is still the cult of Christian morality under a new name— The freethinkers, e g., Guyau. The insipid and cowardly concept “art” as sympathy with all that suffers and is ill-constituted (even history, e g, Thierry’s) : it is still the cult of the Christian moral ideal. And now, as for the entire socialist ideal. nothing but a clumsy misunderstanding of that Christian moral ideal.

341 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The origin of the ideal. Investigation of the soil in which it grows. a. Proceeding from the “aesthetic” states, in which the world is seen fuller, rounder and more perfect—: the pagan ideal: self-affirmation predominates (one bestows—). The highest type: the classical ideal—as the expression of the well-constitutedness of all the chief instincts. Therein the highest style: the grand style. Expression of the “will to power” itself. The instinct that is most feared dares to acknowledge itself. b. Proceeding from states in which the world is seen emptier, paler, more diluted, in which “spiritualization” and nonsensuality assume the rank of perfection, in which the brutal, the animalic-direct, the proximate are most avoided (—one removes, one chooses—) : the “sage,” the “angel,” priestly = virginal = ignorant, physiological characteristics of idealists of this sort—: the anemic ideal. Under certain circumstances it can be the ideal of those who represent the first ideal, the pagan (thus Goethe sees his “saint” in Spinoza). c. Proceeding from states in which we find the world more absurd, worse, poorer, more deceptive than we suppose or desire can be consistent with embodying the ideal (—one negates, one destroys—) : the projection of the ideal into the antinatural, anti-actual, illogical; the state of him who thus judges (—the “impoverishment” of the world as consequence of suffering: one takes, one no longer gives—) : the antinatural ideal. (The Christian ideal is an intermediate form between the second and third, now with the former, now with the latter predominating.) The three ideals: a. either a strengthening of life (—pagan) or b. a dilution of life (anemic) or c. a denial of life (—antinatural). The state of “deification” is felt: in the greatest abundance—in the most fastidious selectivity—in contempt for and destruction of life.

342 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

a. The consistent type. Here it is grasped that one must not hate even evil, that one must not oppose it, that one must not make war even against oneself; that one should not merely acquiesce in the suffering that such a way of life entails; that one should live entirely in positive feelings; that one should take the side of one's opponent in word and deed; that through a superintention of the peaceable, good-natured, conciliatory, helpful, and loving states one impoverishes the soil in which other states grow—that one requires a perpetual way of living. What is achieved here?—The Buddhist type or the perfect cow. This standpoint is possible only when no moral fanaticism prevails, i.e., when evil is hated, not for its own sake, but only because it opens the way to states that are harmful to us (unrest, work, care, entanglements, dependence). This is the Buddhist standpoint: here sin is not hated, here the concept “sin” is lacking. * b. The inconsistent type. One wages war against evil—one believes that war for the sake of goodness does not have the moral consequences or effect on the character that war otherwise brings with it (and owing to which one detests it as evil). In fact, such a war against evil does much more fundamental harm than any kind of hostility of one person against another; and usually “the person” is reinterpolated as the opponent, at least in imagination (the devil, evil spirits, etc.). A hostile attitude of watching and spying on everything in us that is bad and might have a bad origin ends in a most tormented and anxious constitution: so that “miracles,” reward, ecstasy, transcendent solutions now become desirable—The Christian type: or the perfect bigot. * c. The stoical type. Firmness, self-control, imperturbability, peace as the inflexibility of a protracted will—profound quiet, the defensive state, the fortress, a warrior's mistrustfulness—firmness of principle; the union of will and knowledge; respect for oneself. Hermit type. The perfect “ox.” 343 (1883-1888) An ideal that wants to prevail or assert itself seeks to support itself (a) by a spurious origin, (b) by a pretended relationship with powerful ideals already existing, (c) by the thrill of mystery, as if a power that cannot be questioned spoke through it, (d) by defamation of ideals that oppose it, (e) by a mendacious doctrine of the advantages it brings with it, e.g., happiness, repose of soul, peace or the assistance of a powerful God, etc.—Toward a psychology of the idealist: Carlyle, Schiller, Michelet. If one discovers all the defensive and protective measures by which an ideal maintains itself, is it then refuted? It has employed the means by which all living things live and grow—they are one and all “immoral.” My insight: all the forces and drives by virtue of which life and growth exist lie under the ban of morality: morality as the instinct to deny life. One must destroy morality if one is to liberate life.

344 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Not to know oneself: prudence of the idealist. The idealist: a creature that has good reasons to be in the dark about itself and is prudent enough to be in the dark about these reasons too. 345 (1885-1886) Tendency of moral development.— Everyone desires that no doctrine or valuation of things should come into favor but that through which he himself prospers. The basic tendency of the weak and mediocre of all ages is, consequently, to weaken and pull down the stronger: chief means, the moral judgment. The attitude of the stronger toward the weaker is branded; the higher states of the stronger acquire an evil name. The struggle of the many against the few, the commonplace against the rare, the weak against the strong—one of the subtlest interruptions of this struggle occurs when the choice, subtle, more fastidious present themselves as the weak and repudiate the coarser means of power—

346 (March-June 1888)

The pretended pure drive after knowledge in all philosophers is dictated by their moral “truths”—is only apparently independent— The “moral truths,” “thus one ought to act,” are merely forms of consciousness of a tired instinct “thus and thus one does act among us.” The “ideal” is supposed to restore and strengthen an instinct; it flatters man to be obedient where he is only an automaton.

347 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Morality as a means of seduction.— “Nature is good, for a wise and good God is its cause. Who, then, is responsible for the ‘corruption of mankind’? Its tyrants and seducers, the ruling orders—they must be destroyed”—: Rousseau’s logic (compare Pascal’s logic, which lays the responsibility on original sin). Compare the related logic of Luther. In both cases a pretext is sought to introduce an insatiable thirst for revenge as a moral-religious duty. Hatred for the ruling order seeks to sanctify itself— (the “sinfulness of Israel”: foundation of the power of the priest). Compare the related logic of Paul. It is always God’s cause in which these reactions come forth, the cause of right, of humanity, etc. In the case of Christ, the rejoicing of the people appears as the cause of his execution; an anti-priestly movement from the first. Even in the case of the anti-Semites it is still the same artifice: to visit condemnatory judgments upon one’s opponent and to reserve to oneself the role of retributive justice.

348 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Course of the struggle: the fighter tries to transform his opponent into his antithesis—in imagination naturally. He tries to have faith in himself to such a degree that he may have courage for the “good cause” (as if he were the good cause); as if his opponent were attacking reason, taste, virtue— The belief he needs as the strongest means of defense and attack is a belief in himself, which, however, knows how to misunderstand itself as belief in God:— never to imagine the advantages and utility of victory, but always victory for the sake of victory, as “the victory of God”—. Every little community (even an individual) that finds itself involved in struggle tries to convince itself: “We have good taste, good judgment, and virtue on our side.”— The struggle compels to such an exaggeration of self-esteem—

349 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Whatever kind of bizarre ideal one may follow (e.g., as “Christian” or as “free spirit” or as “immoralist” or as Reichsdeutscher—), one should not demand that it be the ideal: for one therewith takes from it its privileged character. One should have it in order to distinguish oneself, not in order to level oneself. How comes it, this notwithstanding, that most idealists at once propagandize for their ideal, as if they could have no right to the ideal if everyone did not recognize it?— This, e.g., is what all those brave little women do who permit themselves to learn Latin and mathematics. What compels them? The instinct of the herd, I fear, terror of the herd: they fight for the “emancipation of women” because it is under the form of a generous activity, under the banner of “For others,” that they can most prudently forward their own little private separatism. Prudence of idealists to be only missionaries and “representatives” of an ideal: they “transfigure” themselves in the eyes of those who believe in disinterestedness and heroism. Whereas: true heroism consists, in not fighting under the banner of sacrifice, devotion, disinterestedness, but in not fighting at all— “This is what I am; this is what I want:— you can go to hell!”—

350 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Every ideal presupposes love and hate, reverence and contempt. Either the positive feeling is the primum mobile or the negative feeling is. Hate and contempt are, e.g., the primum mobile in all resentment ideals. B. Critique of the “Good Man,” the Saint, etc.

351 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The “good man.” Or: the hemiplegia of virtue.— For every strong and natural species of man, love and hate, gratitude and revenge, good nature and anger, affirmative acts and negative acts, belong together. One is good on condition one also knows how to be evil; one is evil because otherwise one would not understand how to be good. Whence, then, comes the sickness and ideological unnaturalness that rejects this doubleness—that teaches that it is a higher thing to be efficient on only one side? Whence comes the hemiplegia of virtue, the invention of the good man?— The demand is that man should castrate himself of those instincts with which he can be an enemy, can cause harm, can be angry, can demand revenge— This unnaturalness corresponds, then, to that dualistic conception of a merely good and a merely evil creature (God, spirit, man); in the former are summarized all the positive, in the latter all the negative forces, intentions, states.— Such a manner of valuing believes itself to be “idealistic”; it does not doubt that, in the conception of “the good,” it has posited a supreme desideratum. At its peak, it imagines a state in which all that is evil is annulled and in which only good creatures actually remain. It does not even consider it settled that this antithesis of good and evil is conditional on the existence of both; on the contrary, the latter should vanish and the former remain, the one has a right to exist, the other ought not to be there at all— What is it really that desires this?— Much labor has been expended in all ages, and especially in the Christian ages, to reduce mankind to this half-sided efficiency, to the “good”: even today there is no lack of those deformed and weakened by the church for whom this object coincides with “humanization” in general, or with the “will of God,” or with “salvation of the soul” The essential demand here is that mankind should do nothing evil, that it should under no circumstances do harm or desire to do harm. The way to achieve this is: the castration of all possibility of enmity, the unhinging of all the instincts of resentment, “peace of soul” as a chronic disease. This mode of thought, with which a definite type of man is bred, starts from an absurd presupposition: it takes good and evil for realities that contradict one another (not as complementary value concepts, which would be the truth), it advises taking the side of the good, it desires that the good should renounce and oppose the evil down to its ultimate roots—it therewith actually denies life, which has in all its instincts both Yes and No Not that it grasps this: it dreams, on the contrary, that it is getting back to wholeness, to unity, to strength of life: it thinks it will be a state of redemption when the inner anarchy, the unrest between those opposing value drives, is at last put an end to.— Perhaps there has never before been a more dangerous ideology, a greater mischief in psychologicis, than this will to good: one has reared the most repellent type, the unfree man, the bigot; one has taught that only as a bigot is one on the right path to god-hood, only the bigot's way is God's way. And even here, life is still in the right—life, which does not know how to separate Yes from No—: what good is it to hold with all one's strength that war is evil, not to do harm, not to desire to negate! one wages war nonetheless! one cannot do otherwise! The good man who has renounced evil, afflicted, as seems to him desirable, with that hemiplegia of virtue, in no way ceases to wage war, have enemies, say No and act No. The Christian, for example, hates "sin"! Precisely because of his faith in a moral antithesis of good and evil the world has become for him overfull of things that must be hated and eternally combated. "The good man" sees himself as if surrounded by evil, and under the continual onslaught of evil his eye grows keener, he discovers evil in all his dreams and desires; and so he ends, quite reasonably, by considering nature evil, mankind corrupt, goodness an act of grace (that is, as impossible for man). In summa: he denies life, he grasps that when good is the supreme value it condemns life— Therewith he ought to consider his ideology of good and evil as refuted. But one cannot refute an illness. And so he conceives another life!—

352 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The concept of power, whether of a god or of a man, always includes both the ability to help and the ability to harm. Thus it is with the Arabs; thus with the Hebrews. Thus with all strong races. It is a fateful step when one separates the power for the one from the power for the other into a dualism— In this way, morality becomes the poisoner of life—

353 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Toward a critique of the good man.— Integrity, dignity, sense of duty, justice, humanity, honesty, straightness, good conscience— are certain qualities really affirmed and approved for their own sake with these well-sounding words? or is it a case of qualities and states, in themselves of no particular value, being moved into a certain light in which they acquire value? Does the value of these qualities reside in them or in the use and advantage to which they lead (appear to lead, are expected to lead)? Naturally, I do not mean by this an antithesis between ego and alter in the judgment: the question is whether these qualities are supposed to have value on account of their consequences, either for the bearer of these qualities or for the environment, for society, for “humanity”: or whether they have value in themselves— In other words: is it utility that bids one condemn, combat, deny the opposite qualities (—untrustworthiness, falseness, perversity, lack of self-confidence, inhumanity—)? Is the essence of such qualities condemned, or only their consequences?— In other words: would it be desirable that men with these latter qualities should not exist?— In any event, that is what is believed— But here lies the error, the short-sightedness, the narrow-mindedness of nook egoism. Otherwise expressed: would it be desirable to create conditions in which all the advantage would be with the righteous—so that the opposite natures and instincts would be discouraged and slowly die out? This is at bottom a question of taste and of aesthetics: would it be desirable that the “most respectable,” i.e., most tedious, species of man should survive? the square,⁹² the virtuous, the worthies, the good people, the straight, the “oxen”?⁹³ If one imagines the tremendous abundance of the “others” gone, then even the righteous no longer has a right to existence: he is no longer necessary—and here one grasps that it is only coarse utility that has brought such an insufferable virtue into honor. Perhaps desirability lies on precisely the other side: to create conditions in which the “righteous man” is reduced to the modest position of a “useful tool”—as the “ideal herd animal,” at best herdsman: in short, conditions in which he no longer stands among the higher orders which require other qualities.

354 (March-June 1888)

The “good man” as tyrant.— Man has repeated the same mistake over and over again: he has made a means to life into a standard of life; instead of discovering the standard in the highest enhancement of life itself, in the problem of growth and exhaustion, he has employed the means to a quite distinct kind of life to exclude all other forms of life, in short to criticize and select life. I.e., man finally loves the means for their own sake and forgets they are means: so that they enter his consciousness as aims, as standards for aims—i.e., a certain species of man treats the conditions of its existence as conditions which ought to be imposed as a law, as “truth,” “good,” “perfection”: it tyrannizes— It is a form of faith, of instinct, that a species of man fails to perceive its conditionality, its relativity to other species. At least, it seems to be all over for a species of man (people, races) when it becomes tolerant, allows equal rights and no longer thinks of wanting to be master— 355 (1885-1886) “All good people are weak: they are good because they are not strong enough to be evil”⁹⁴—the Latuka chieftain Comorro told Baker. * “The faint-hearted know no misfortune”—says a Russian proverb. 356 (1887-1888) Modest, industrious, benevolent, temperate: is that how you would have men? good men? But to me that seems only the ideal slave, the slave of the future.

357 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The metamorphoses of slavery; its disguise under the cloak of religion; its transfiguration through morality. 358 (1887-1888) The ideal slave (the “good man”).— He who cannot posit himself as a goal, not posit any goals for himself whatever, bestows honor upon selflessness—instinctively. Everything persuades him to this: his prudence, his experience, his vanity. And even faith is a form of selflessness. * Atavism: wonderful feeling to be able to obey unconditionally for once. * Industry, modesty, benevolence, temperance are just so many hindrances to a sovereign disposition, great inventiveness, heroic purposiveness, noble being-for-oneself. * It is not a matter of going ahead (—for then one is at best a herdsman, i.e., the herd’s chief requirement), but of being able to go it alone, of being able to be different.

359 (Spring-Fall 1887)

One must reckon up what had been accumulated as a consequence of the highest moral idealism: how almost all other values had crystallized around the ideal. This proves that it has been desired longest and strongest—that is has not been attained: otherwise it would have disappointed (or would have been followed by a more moderate valuation).⁹⁵ The saint as the most powerful type of man—: it is this idea that has elevated so high the value of moral perfection. One must imagine the whole of knowledge laboring to prove that the moral man is the most powerful, most godlike.— The overcoming of the senses, the desires— everything inspired fear; the antinatural appeared as the supernatural, as something from the beyond— 360 (1883-1888) Francis of Assisi: in love, popular, a poet, combats the order of rank among souls in favor of the lowliest. Denial of the hierarchy of souls—“all equal before God.” The popular ideals: the good man, the selfless man, the saint, the sage, the just man. O Marcus Aurelius!

361 (Spring-Fall 1887)

I have declared war on the anemic Christian ideal (together with what is closely related to it), not with the aim of destroying it but only of putting an end to its tyranny and clearing the way for new ideals, for more robust ideals— The continuance of the Christian ideal is one of the most desirable things there are— even for the sake of the ideals that want to stand beside it and perhaps above it— they must have opponents, strong opponents, if they are to become strong.— Thus we immoralists require the power of morality: our drive of self-preservation wants our opponents to retain their strength—it only wants to become master over them.⁹⁶ C. Disparagement of the So-Called Evil Qualities 362 (1885)

Egoism and its problem! The Christian gloominess in La Rochefoucauld which extracted egoism from everything and thought he had thereby reduced the value of things and of virtues! To counter that, I at first sought to prove that there could not be anything other than egoism—that in men whose ego is weak and thin the power of great love also grows weak—that the greatest lovers are so from the strength of their ego—that love is an expression of egoism, etc. In fact, the false valuation is aimed at the interests: (1) of those who are helped and aided, the herd; (2) it contains a pessimistic mistrustfulness of the basis of life; (3) it would like to deny the most splendid and best-constituted men; fear; (4) it wants to aid the subjected to their rights against their conquerors; (5) it brings with it a universal dishonesty, and precisely among the most valuable men.

363 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Man is an indifferent egoist: even the cleverest thinks his habits more important than his advantage. 364 (1884) Egoism! But no one has yet asked: what kind of ego? On the contrary, everyone unconsciously thinks every ego equal to every other ego. This is the consequence of the slaves' theory of suffrage universal and "equality." 365 (1884) The actions of a higher man are indescribably complex in their motivation: any such word as "pity" says nothing whatever. The most essential thing is the feeling "Who am I? who is the other in relation to me?"—Value judgments are continually at work. 366 (1885-1886) That the history of all phenomena of morality could be simplified in the way Schopenhauer believed—namely, so that pity is to be discovered as the root of all moral impulse hitherto—only a thinker denuded of all historical instinct, and one who had eluded in the strangest way even that strong schooling in history undergone by the Germans from Herder to Hegel, could have attained to this degree of absurdity and naiveté. 367 (1885) My kind of "pity."—This is a feeling for which I find no name adequate: I sense it when I see precious capabilities squandered, e.g., at the sight of Luther: what force and what insipid backwoodsman problems! (at a time when in France the bold and light-hearted skepticism of a Montaigne was already possible!) Or when I see anyone halted, as a result of some stupid accident, at something less than he might have become. Or especially at the idea of the lot of mankind, as when I observe with anguish and contempt the politics of present-day Europe, which is, under all circumstances, also working at the web of the future of all men. Yes, what could not become of "man," if——! This is a kind of "compassion" although there is really no "passion" I share.⁹⁸ 368 (1883-1888) Pity a squandering of feeling, a parasite harmful to moral health,⁹⁹ "it cannot possibly be our duty to increase the evil in the world." If one does good merely out of pity, it is oneself one really does good to, and not the other. Pity does not depend upon maxims but upon affects;¹⁰⁰ it is pathological. The suffering of others infects us, pity is an infection. 369 (1885-1886) No egoism at all exists that remains within itself and does not encroach—consequently, that "allowable," "morally indifferent" egoism of which you speak does not exist at all. "One furthers one's ego always at the expense of others;" "Life always lives at the expense of other life"—he who does not grasp this has not taken even the first step toward honesty with himself.

370 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The “subject” is only a fiction: the ego of which one speaks when one censures egoism does not exist at all. 371 (1885-1886) The “ego”—which is not one with the central government of our nature!—4s, indeed, only a conceptual synthesis—thus there are no actions prompted by “egoism” 372 (1883-1888) As every drive lacks intelligence, the viewpoint of “utility” cannot exist for it. Every drive, in as much as it is active, sacrifices force and other drives: finally it is checked; otherwise it would destroy everything through its excessiveness. Therefore: the “un-egoistic,” self-sacrificing, imprudent, is nothing special—it is common to all the drives—they do not consider the advantage of the whole ego (because they do not consider at all!), they act contrary to our advantage, against the ego: and often for the ego—innocent in both cases!

373 (March-June 1888)

Origin of moral values.¹⁰¹— Egoism is of as much value as the physiological value of him who possesses it. Every individual consists of the whole course of evolution (and not, as morality imagines, only of something that begins at birth). If he represents the ascending course of mankind, then his value is in fact extraordinary; and extreme care may be taken over the preservation and promotion of his development. (It is concern for the future promised him that gives the well-constituted individual such an extraordinary right to egoism.) If he represents the descending course, decay, chronic sickening, then he has little value: and the first demand of fairness is for him to take as little space, force, and sunshine as possible away from the well-constituted. In this case, it is the task of society to suppress egoism (—which sometimes expresses itself in absurd, morbid and rebellious ways), whether it be a question of individuals or of whole decaying and atrophying classes of people. A doctrine and religion of “love,” of suppression of self-affirmation, of patience, endurance, helpfulness, of cooperation in word and deed, can be of the highest value within such classes, even from the point of view of the rulers: for it suppresses feelings of rivalry, of resentment, of envy—the all too natural feelings of the underprivileged—it even deifies a life of slavery, subjection, poverty, sickness, and inferiority for them under the ideal of humility and obedience. This explains why the ruling classes (or races) and individuals have at all times upheld the cult of selflessness, the gospel of the lowly, the “God on the cross.” The preponderance of an altruistic mode of valuation is the consequence of an instinct that one is ill-constituted. The value judgment here is at bottom: “I am not worth much”: a merely physiological value judgment; even more clearly: the feeling of impotence, the absence of the great affirmative feelings of power (in muscles, nerves, ganglia). This value judgment is translated into a moral or a religious judgment, according to the culture of this class (—the predominance of religious and moral judgments is always a sign of a lower culture—) : it seeks to establish itself by relating to spheres in which it recognizes the concept “value” in general. The interpretation by means of which the Christian sinner believes he understands himself is an attempt to justify his lack of power and self-confidence: he would rather consider himself guilty than feel bad for no reason: it is a symptom of decay to require interpretations of this sort at all. In other cases, the underprivileged man seeks the reason not in his “guilt” (as the Christian does), but in society: the socialist, the anarchist, the nihilist—in as much as they find their existence something of which someone must be guilty, they are still the closest relations of the Christian, who also believes he can better endure his sense of sickness and ill-constitutedness by finding someone whom he can make responsible for it. The instinct of revenge and resentment appears here in both cases as a means of enduring, as the instinct of self-preservation: just as is the preference for altruistic theory and practice. Hatred of egoism, whether it be one's own (as with Christians) or another's (as with socialists), is thus revealed as a value judgment under the predominating influence of revenge; on the other hand, as an act of prudence for the self-preservation of the suffering by an enhancement of their feelings of cooperation and solidarity— Finally, even that release of resentment in the judging, rejecting, punishing of egoism (one's own or another's) is also, as already indicated, an instinct of self-preservation on the part of the underprivileged. In summa: the cult of altruism is a specific form of egoism that regularly appears under certain physiological conditions. When the socialist with a fine indignation demands "justice," "right," "equal rights," he is merely acting under the impress of his inadequate culture that cannot explain why he is suffering: on the other hand, he enjoys himself; if he felt better he would refrain from crying out: he would then find pleasure in other things. The same applies to the Christian: he condemns, disparages, curses the "world"—himself not excluded. But that is no reason for taking his clamor seriously. In both cases we are in the presence of invalids who feel better for crying out, for whom defamation is a relief.

374 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Every society has the tendency to reduce its opponents to caricatures—at least in imagination—and, as it were, to starve them. Such a caricature is, e.g., our “criminal.” Within the aristocratic Roman order of values, the Jew was reduced to a caricature. Among artists, the “philistine and bourgeois” become caricatures; among the pious, the godless; among aristocrats, the man of the people. Among immoralists it is the moralist: Plato, for example, becomes a caricature in my hands. 375 (1883-1888) All the drives and powers that morality praises seem to me to be essentially the same as those it defames and rejects: e.g., justice as will to power, will to truth as a tool of the will to power. 376 (1883-1888) Man’s growing inwardness. Inwardness grows as powerful drives that have been denied outward release by the establishment of peace and society seek compensation by turning inward in concert with the imagination. The thirst for enmity, cruelty, revenge, violence turns back, is repressed;102 in the desire for knowledge there is avarice and conquest; in the artist there reappears the repressed power to dissimulate and lie; the drives are transformed into demons whom one fights, etc. 377 (1883-1888) Falsity.— Every sovereign instinct has the others for its tools, retainers, flatterers: it never lets itself be called by its ugly name: and it countenances no praise in which it is not also praised indirectly. All praise and blame in general crystallizes around every sovereign instinct to form a rigorous order and etiquette. This is one of the causes of falsity. Every instinct that struggles for mastery but finds itself under a yoke requires for itself, as strengthening and as support for its self-esteem, all the beautiful names and recognized values: so, as a rule, it ventures forth under the name of the “master” it is combatting and from whom it wants to get free (e.g., the fleshly desires or the desires for power under the dominion of Christian values).— This is the other cause of falsity. Perfect naiveté reigns in both cases: the falsity does not become conscious. It is a sign of a broken instinct when man sees the driving force and its “expression” (“the mask”) as separate things—a sign of self-contradiction, and victorious far less often. Absolute innocence in bearing, word, affect, a “good conscience” in falsity, the certainty with which one grasps the greatest and most splendid words and postures—all this is necessary for victory. In the other case: when one has extreme clearsightedness one needs the genius of the actor and tremendous training in self-control if one is to achieve victory. That is why priests are the most skillful conscious hypocrites; then princes, whom rank and ancestry have endowed with a kind of acting ability. Thirdly, men of society, diplomats. Fourthly, women. Basic idea: falsity seems so profound, so omnisided, the will so clearly opposed to direct self-knowledge and the calling of things by their right names, that it is very highly probable that truth, will to truth is really something else and only a disguise. (The need for faith is the greatest brake-shoe on truthfulness.) 378 (1883-1888) “Thou shalt not lie”: one demands truthfulness. But acknowledgement of the factual (refusal to let oneself be lied to) has been greatest precisely among liars: they have recognized that just this popular “truthfulness” is not a fact. What is said is always too much or too little: the demand that one should denude oneself with every word one says is a piece of naiveté. One says what one thinks, one is “truthful,” only under certain conditions: namely, that one is understood (inter pares),¹⁰⁴ and understood with good will (once again inter pares). One conceals oneself in presence of the unfamiliar: and he who wants to attain something says what he would like to have thought of him, but not what he thinks. (“The powerful always lie.”)

379 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The great nihilistic counterfeiting through artful misuse of moral values: a. Love as depersonalization; also pity. b. Only the most depersonalized intellect (“the philosopher”) knows the truth, “the true being and nature of things.” c. The genius, the great human beings, are great because they do not seek their own advantage: the value of a man increases in proportion as he denies himself. d. Art as the work of the “pure free-willed subject”; misunderstanding of “objectivity.” e. Happiness as the end of life. virtue as means to an end. The pessimistic condemnation of life by Schopenhauer is a moral one. Transference of herd standards into the realm of metaphysics. The “individuum” meaningless, necessitating an origin in the “in-itself” (and an explanation of his existence as an “aberration”); parents only “accidental cause.”— We are paying for the fact that science has not understood the individuum: he comprises the entirety of life hitherto in one development, and is not its result.

380 (Spring-Fall 1887)

decline of a people and corruption;105 rise of a people and virtue; zenith of a people (“its culture”) as consequence of moral elevation. one desires that faith should be the distinguishing mark of the great: but slackness, skepticism, “immorality,” the right to throw off a faith, belong to greatness (Caesar, also Homer, Aristophanes, Leonardo, Goethe). One always suppresses the main thing, their “freedom of will”—

381 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Great lie in history: as if the corruption of the church were the cause of the Reformation! Only pretext and self-deception on the part of the instigators—strong needs were present whose brutality very much required a spiritual cloak.

106

382 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Schopenhauer interpreted high intellectuality as liberation from the will; he did not want to see the freedom from moral prejudice which is part of the emancipation of the great spirit, the typical immorality of the genius; he artfully posited the only thing he held in honor, the moral value of “depersonalization,” as the condition of spiritual activity, of “objective” viewing. “Truth,” even in art, appears after the withdrawal of the will—I see a fundamentally different valuation cutting across all the moral idiosyncrasies: I know nothing of such an absurd distinction between “genius” and the moral and immoral world of the will. The moral man is a lower species than the immoral, a weaker species; indeed—he is a type in regard to morality, but not a type in himself; a copy, a good copy at best—the measure of his value lies outside him. I assess a man by the quantum of power and abundance of his will: not by its enfeeblement and extinction; I regard a philosophy which teaches denial of the will as a teaching of defamation and slander—I assess the power of a will by how much resistance, pain, torture it endures and knows how to turn to its advantage; I do not account the evil and painful character of existence a reproach to it, but hope rather that it will one day be more evil and painful than hitherto—107 The high point of the spirit imagined by Schopenhauer was to attain to the recognition that there is no meaning in anything, in short, to recognize what the good man already instinctively does—He denies the possibility of a higher kind of intellect—he took his insight for a non plus ultra. Here spirituality is placed much lower than goodness; its highest value (e.g., as art) would be to urge and prepare moral conversion: absolute domination of moral values.—Beside Schopenhauer I would characterize Kant: nothing Greek, absolutely antihistorical (his passage on the French Revolution) and a moral fanatic (Goethe’s passage on radical evil). Saintliness was in the background in his case, too. I need a critique of the saint—Hegel’s value. “Passion.”—Shopkeeper’s philosophy of Mr. Spencer; complete absence of an ideal, except that of the mediocre man. Fundamental instinctive principle of all philosophers and historians and psychologists: everything of value in man, art, history, science, religion, technology must be proved to be of moral value, morally conditioned, in aim, means and outcome. Everything understood in the light of the supreme value: e.g., Rousseau’s question concerning civilization: “Does man become better through it?”—an amusing question, since the reverse is obvious and is precisely that which speaks in favor of civilization.

383 (March-June 1888)

Religious morality.— Affect, great desire, the passion for power, love, revenge, possessions—: moralists want to extinguish and uproot them, to “purify” the soul of them. The logic is: the desires often produce great misfortune— consequently they are evil, reprehensible. A man must free himself from them: otherwise he cannot be a good man— This is the same logic as: “if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out.” In the particular case in which that dangerous “innocent from the country,” the founder of Christianity, recommended this practice to his disciples, the case of sexual excitation, the consequence is, unfortunately, not only the loss of an organ but the emasculation of a man’s character— And the same applies to the moralist’s madness that demands, instead of the restraining of the passions, their extirpation. Its conclusion is always: only the castrated man is a good man. Instead of taking into service the great sources of strength, those impetuous torrents of the soul that are so often dangerous and overwhelming, and economizing them, this most shortsighted and pernicious mode of thought, the moral mode of thought, wants to make them dry up.¹⁰⁸ 384 (1885-1886)

Overcoming of the affects?— No, if what is implied is their weakening and extirpation. But putting them into service: which may also mean subjecting them to a protracted tyranny (not only as an individual, but as a community, race, etc.). At last they are confidently granted freedom again: they love us as good servants and go voluntarily wherever our best interests lie.

385 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Moral intolerance is an expression of weakness in a man: he is afraid of his own “immorality,” he must deny his strongest drives because he does not yet know how to employ them. Thus the most fruitful regions of the earth remain uncultivated the longest:— the force is lacking that could here become master—

386 (Spring-Fall 1887)

There are very naive peoples and men who believe that continual fine weather is something desirable: even today they believe, in rebus moralibus,¹⁰⁹ that the “good man,” and nothing but the “good man,” is something desirable—and that the course of human evolution is directed toward the survival of the “good man” only (and that one must bend all one’s efforts in that direction—). This is in the highest degree an uneconomic thought and, as stated, the acme of naiveté, nothing but the expression of the pleasing effect produced by the “good man” (— he arouses no fear, he permits one to relax, he gives what one is able to take).¹¹⁰ From a superior viewpoint one desires the contrary: the ever-increasing dominion of evil, the growing emancipation of man from the narrow and fear-ridden bonds of morality, the increase of force, in order to press the mightiest natural powers—the affects—into service.

387 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The whole conception of an order of rank among the passions: as if the right and normal thing were for one to be guided by reason—with the passions as abnormal, dangerous, semi-animal, and, moreover, so far as their aim is concerned, nothing other than desires for pleasure— Passion is degraded (1) as if it were only in unseemly cases, and not necessarily and always, the motive force; (2) in as much as it has for its object something of no great value, amusement— The misunderstanding of passion and reason, as if the latter were an independent entity and not rather a system of relations between various passions and desires; and as if every passion did not possess its quantum of reason—

388 (Spring-Fall 1887)

How, under the impress of the ascetic morality of depersonalization, it was precisely the affects of love, goodness, pity, even those of justice, magnanimity, heroism, that were necessarily misunderstood:¹¹¹ It is richness in personality, abundance in oneself, overflowing and bestowing, instinctive good health and affirmation of oneself, that produce great sacrifice and great love: it is strong and godlike selfhood from which these affects grow, just as surely as do the desire to become master, encroachment, the inner certainty of having a right to everything. What according to common ideas are opposite dispositions are rather one disposition; and if one is not firm and brave within oneself, one has nothing to bestow and cannot stretch out one's hand to protect and support— How was one able so to transform these instincts that man thought valuable that which was directed against his self? when he sacrificed his self to another self. Oh the psychological wretchedness and mendaciousness that has hitherto laid down the law in the church and in church-infected philosophy! If man is sinful through and through, then he ought only to hate himself. Fundamentally, he would have to treat his fellow men on the same basis as he treats himself; charity needs to be justified—its justification lies in the fact that God has commanded it.— It follows from this, that all the natural instincts of man (the instinct of love, etc.) appear to be forbidden in themselves and only after they have been denied are they restored to their rights on the basis of obedience to God—Pascal, the admirable logician of Christianity, went so far! consider his relations to his sister. “Not to make oneself love”¹¹² seemed Christian to him. 389 (1883-1888) Let us consider the cost of such a moral canon (“an ideal”). (Its enemies are—well? The “egoists.”) The melancholic astuteness in self-disparagement in Europe (Pascal, La Rochefoucauld)—the inner enfeeblement, discouragement, self-vexation of the non-herd animals— the perpetual emphasizing of the qualities of mediocrity as the most valuable (modesty in rank and file, the tool-like nature)— the bad conscience associated with all that is self-glorifying and original; therefore displeasure; therefore the world of the more strongly constituted made gloomy! herd-consciousness transferred to philosophy and religion; also its timorousness. Let us leave aside the psychological impossibility of a purely selfless action!

390 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

My final proposition is: that the actual man represents a much higher value than the “desirable” man of any ideal hitherto; that all “desiderata” with reference to man have been absurd and dangerous excesses through which a single type of man tried to establish his conditions of preservation and growth as a law for all mankind; that every “desideratum” of this kind ever brought into a position of dominance has reduced the value of man, his strength, his certainty of the future; that the nook-intellectuality and poverty of spirit of man is most apparent, even today, when he desires, that man’s ability to posit values has hitherto been too little developed for him to be just, not merely to the “desirable” values, but to the real values of man; that the ideal has hitherto been the actual force for disparaging the world and man, the poisonous vapor over reality, the great seduction to nothingness— D. Critique of the Words: Improvement, Perfecting, Elevation 391 (1885-1886) Standard by which the value of moral evaluation is to be determined. The fundamental fact that has been overlooked: the contradiction between “becoming more moral” and the elevation and strengthening of the type man. Homo natura. The “will to power.”

392 (March-June 1888)

Moral values as illusory values compared with physiological values.

393 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Thought about the most universal subjects is always behind the times: the ultimate “desiderata” for mankind, for example, have never really been grasped as a problem by philosophers. They all naively postulate the “improvement” of man as if an intuition answered for us the question why we ought to “improve.” To what extent is it desirable that man should become more virtuous? or cleverer? or happier? Provided we do not already know the “wherefore” of mankind, such an outlook has no meaning; and if one desires one of these things, who knows, perhaps one is precluded from desiring the others. Is an increase in virtuousness compatible with an increase in cleverness and insight? Dubito;113 only too often I shall have occasion to show the reverse. Has virtuousness as a goal not hitherto been in the most rigorous sense incompatible with being happy? does it not, on the contrary, require misfortune, self-denial and self-mistreatment as a necessary means? And if the deepest insight were the goal, would one not then have to renounce the increase of happiness? and choose danger, adventure, mistrust, seduction as the road to insight?— And if one desires happiness, well, perhaps one has to become one of the “poor in spirit.”

394 (March-June 1888)

The universal deception and cheating in the realm of so-called moral improvement.— We do not believe that a man will become another if he is not that other already; i.e., if he is not, as is often the case, a multiplicity of persons, at least the embryos of persons. In this case, one can bring a different role into the foreground and draw “the former man” back— The aspect is changed, not the essence— That someone ceases to perform certain actions is a mere fatum brutum that permits the most various interpretations. It is not always the case that the habit of a certain act is broken, the ultimate reason for it removed. He who is a criminal through fate and facility unlearns nothing, but learns more and more: and a long abstinence even acts as a tonic to his talent— For society, to be sure, all that is of interest is precisely that someone no longer performs certain actions: to this end it removes him from those conditions in which he can perform certain actions; that is wiser, in any event, than to attempt the impossible, namely, to disrupt the fatality by which he is thus and thus. The church— and in this it has done nothing but succeed and inherit from the philosophy of antiquity— proceeding from a different standard and desiring to save a “soul,” the “eternal destiny” of a soul, first believes in the expiatory power of punishment and then in the obliterating power of forgiveness: both are deceptions of religious prejudice—punishment does not expiate, forgiveness does not extinguish, what is done is not undone. That someone forgets something is certainly not evidence that something has ceased to exist— A deed produces its consequences, within the man and outside the man, regardless of whether it is considered as punished, “expiated,” “forgiven” and “extinguished,” regardless of whether the church has in the meantime promoted the doer to a saint. The church believes in things that do not exist, in “souls;” it believes in effects that do not exist, in divine effects; it believes in states that do not exist, in sin, in redemption, in the salvation of the soul: it stays everywhere on the surface, at signs, gestures, words to which it gives an arbitrary meaning. It possesses a thoroughly thought-out method of psychological counterfeiting. 395 (1887-1888) —“Illness makes men better”: this famous opinion, which one encounters throughout the centuries, in the mouth of the sage as often as in the mouth and maw of the people, makes one wonder. As to whether it is valid, one would like to ask: were morality and illness originally connected, perhaps? The “improvement of man,” regarded as a whole, e.g., the undeniable softening, humanizing, mellowing of the European within the last millennium—is it perhaps the result of long hidden and mysterious suffering and failure, abstinence, stunting? Has “illness” made the European “better”? Or, in other words; is our morality—our modern sensitive European morality, which may be compared with the morality of the Chinese—the expression of a physiological regression?— For one cannot deny that every period in history in which “man” has shown himself in exceptional splendor and power at once assumed an impetuous, dangerous, and eruptive character under which humanity fared ill; and perhaps in those cases in which it seems otherwise, all that was lacking was the courage or subtlety to take psychology into the depths and to find there, too, the universal law: “the healthier, stronger, richer, more fruitful, more enterprising a man feels, the more ‘immoral’ he will be, too.” A painful thought! in which one certainly ought not to indulge! If, however, one goes along with it for just a few moments, how astonishing the future seems then! What would then be paid for more dearly than precisely that which we are promoting with all our strength—the humanizing, the “improvement,” the growing “civilization” of man? Nothing would be more costly than virtue: for one would in the end have turned the earth into a hospital: and ultimate wisdom would be “everyone as everyone else’s nurse.” To be sure, one would then possess that much-desired “peace on earth”! But how little “delight in each other”! How little beauty, high spirits, daring, danger! How few “works” for the sake of which life on earth is worth while! And, alas, no more “deeds” whatever! All great works and deeds that have remained and have not been washed away by the waters of time— were they not all in the profoundest sense immoralities?

396 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The priests—and with them the semi-priests, the philosophers—have at all times called true any teaching whose educative effect was beneficial or seemed beneficial—which “improved.” In this they resemble a naive quack and miracle man of the people, who, because he has used a poison as a cure, denies it is a poison— “By their fruits shall ye know them—namely, our ‘truths’ ”: that has been the reasoning of the priests to this day. With fateful results, they have expended their subtlety to make the “proof of power” (or “from their fruits”) pre-eminent, even decisive, above all other forms of proof. “What makes good must be good; what is good cannot lie”—that is their relentless conclusion—: “what bears good fruit must be true: there is no other criterion of truth”— But if “making better” counts as an argument, then making worse must count as a refutation. One can prove an error to be an error by testing the lives of those who espouse it: a mistake, a vice can refute— This most indecent form of opposition, from behind and below, the doglike form of opposition, has not died out either: the priests, in so far as they are psychologists, have never discovered anything more interesting than to sniff at the secrets of their adversaries—they demonstrate their Christianity by looking about the “world” for filth. Especially with the first men of the world, with the “geniuses”: one will remember how Goethe has been attacked in Germany at all times (Klopstock and Herder were the first to provide a “good example” of this—kind sticks to kind).

397 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

One must be very immoral in order to make morals by deeds— The means of the moralist are the most terrible means that have ever been employed; he who has not the courage for immorality in deeds is fit for anything, but he is not fit to be a moralist. Morality is a menagerie; its presupposition is that iron bars can be more profitable than freedom, even for the prisoners; its other presupposition is that there exist animal-trainers who are not afraid of terrible means—who know how to handle red-hot iron. This frightful species which takes up the fight against the wild animal is called “priest.” * Man, imprisoned in an iron cage of errors, became a caricature of man, sick, wretched, ill-disposed toward himself, full of hatred for the impulses of life, full of mistrust of all that is beautiful and happy in life, a walking picture of misery: this artificial, arbitrary, recent abortion that the priests have pulled up out of their soil, the “sinner”: how shall we be able, in spite of all, to justify this phenomenon? * In order to be fair to morality, we must put two zoological concepts in its place: taming of the beast and breeding of a particular species. The priests have pretended at all times that they want to “improve”— But we others would laugh if an animal-trainer spoke of his “improved” animals. In most cases, the taming of a beast is achieved through the harming of a beast: the moral man, too, is not a better man but only a weaker one. But he is less harmful—115

398 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

What I want to make clear by all the means in my power: a. that there is no worse confusion than the confusion of breeding with taming: which is what has been done— Breeding, as I understand it, is a means of storing up the tremendous forces of mankind so that the generations can build upon the work of their forefathers—not only outwardly, but inwardly, organically growing out of them and becoming something stronger— b. that it is extraordinarily dangerous to believe that mankind as a whole will progress and grow stronger if individuals become flabby, equal, average— Mankind is an abstraction: the goal of breeding, even in the case of a single individual, can only be the stronger man (—the man without breeding is weak, extravagant, unstable—). 399 (1885-1886) These are the demands I make upon you—however ill they may sound to you: that you should undertake a critique of the moral evaluations themselves. That you should call a halt to the moral impulse, which here demands submission and not a critique, with the question: “why submission?” That you should regard this demand for a “wherefore?”, for a critique of morality, as precisely your present form of morality, as the sublimest form of morality, which does honor to you and to your age. That our honesty, our will not to deceive ourselves, must prove itself: why not?— Before what tribunal? The will not to let oneself be deceived is of different origin: a caution against being overpowered, exploited—one of life’s instincts of self-defense.116 400 (1883-1888) The three assertions: The ignoble is the higher (protest of the “common man”); the antinatural is the higher (protest of the underprivileged); the average is the higher (protest of the herd, of the “mediocre”). Thus in the history of morality a will to power finds expression, through which now the slaves and oppressed, now the ill-constituted and those who suffer from themselves, now the mediocre attempt to make those value judgments prevail that are favorable to them. To this extent, the phenomenon of morality is, from a biological standpoint, highly suspicious. Morality has developed hitherto at the expense of: the rulers and their specific instincts, the well-constituted and beautiful natures, those who are in any sense independent and privileged. Morality is therefore an opposition movement against the efforts of nature to achieve a higher type. Its effect is: mistrust of life in general (in so far as its tendencies are considered “immoral”)—hostility toward the senses (in so far as the supreme values are considered to be opposed to the supreme instincts)— degeneration and self-destruction of “higher natures,” because it is precisely in them that the conflict becomes conscious. 401 (March-June 1888) The Values That Have Been on Top Hitherto Morality as the supreme value, in all phases of philosophy (even among the skeptics). Result: this world is good for nothing, there must be a “real world.” What really determines the supreme value here? What is morality really? The instinct of decadence; it is the exhausted and disinherited who in this way take their revenge and play the master— Historical proof: the philosophers always decadents, always in the service of the nihilistic religions. The instinct of decadence which appears as will to power. Introduction of its system of means: absolute immorality of means. General insight: supreme values hitherto are a special case of the will to power; morality itself is a special case of immorality. * Why the Opposing Values Always Succumbed How was this really possible? Question: why did life, physiological well-constitutedness everywhere succumb? Why was there no affirmative philosophy, no affirmative religion?— The historical signs of such movements: the pagan religion. Dionysus versus the “Crucified.” The Renaissance. Art. The strong and the weak: the healthy and the sick; the exception and the rule. There is no doubt who is the stronger— General aspect of history: Is man therefore an exception in the history of life?—Objection to Darwinism. The means the weak employ to keep themselves on top have become instincts, “humanity,” “institutions”— Proof of this dominion in our political instincts, in our social value judgments, in our arts, in our science. * The declining instincts have become master over the ascending instincts— The will to nothingness has become master over the will to life! —Is this true? is there perhaps not a stronger guarantee of life in this victory of the weak and mediocre?—is it perhaps only a means in the total movement of life, a slackening of tempo? a self-defense against something even worse? —Suppose the strong had become master in everything, and even in moral valuation: let us draw the consequences of how they would think about sickness, suffering, sacrifice! Self-contempt on the part of the weak would be the result; they would try to disappear and extinguish themselves. And would this be desirable?—and would we really want a world in which the influence of the weak, their subtlety, consideration, spirituality, pliancy was lacking?— * We have seen two “wills to power” in conflict (in this special case: we had a principle, that of considering right those who hitherto succumbed, and wrong those who hitherto prevailed): we have recognized the “real world” as a “false world” and morality as a form of immorality. We do not say: “The stronger is wrong.” We have grasped what it was that determined supreme value and why it became master over the opposing valuation—: it was stronger numerically. Now let us purify the opposite valuation of the infection and half-measures of the degeneration characteristic of the form in which it is known to us. Restoration of nature: moraline-free.

402 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Morality a useful error; more clearly in the case of the greatest and least prejudiced of its advocates, a lie that is considered necessary. 403 (1886-1887) One may admit the truth to oneself to the point where one is sufficiently elevated no longer to require the disciplinary school of [moral]116 error— When one judges existence morally, it disgusts. One should not invent unreal persons, e.g., one should not say “nature is cruel.” Precisely the insight that no such central responsible being exists is a relief! Evolution of man. a. To gain power over nature and in addition a certain power over oneself. (Morality was needed that man might prevail in his struggle with nature and the “wild animal.”) b. If power has been attained over nature, one can employ this power in the further free development of oneself: will to power as self-elevation and strengthening. 404 (1886-1887) Morality as an illusion of the species, designed to motivate the individual to sacrifice himself to the future: apparently allowing him an infinite value, so that by means of this self-consciousness he should tyrannize over and keep down other sides of his nature and find it hard to be content with himself. Profoundest gratitude for that which morality has achieved hitherto: but now it is only a burden which may become a fatality! Morality itself, in the form of honesty, compels us to deny morality. 405 (1885-1886) End To what an extent the self-destruction of morality is still a part of its own force. We Europeans have in us the blood of those who died for their faith; we have taken morality to be serious and awesome, and there is nothing that we have not in some way sacrificed to it. On the other hand: our spiritual subtlety has essentially been attained through conscience-vivisection. We do not yet know the “wither” toward which we are driven once we have detached ourselves from our old soil. But it was from this same soil that we acquired the force which now drives us forth into the distance, into adventures, thrusting us into the boundless, the untried, the undiscovered—we have no choice left, we have to be conquerors once we no longer have any country in which we are at home, in which we would want to “preserve” things. A concealed Yes drives us that is stronger than all our No’s. Our strength itself will no longer endure us in the old decaying soil: we venture away, we venture ourselves: the world is still rich and undiscovered, and even to perish is better than to become halfhearted and poisonous. Our strength itself drives us to sea, where all suns have hitherto gone down: we know of a new world— In the standard editions these words are omitted, obviously to avoid duplication of the section the German editors placed at the beginning of The Will to Power. Schlechta ignores 1911 (p 503) and reproduces the printed versions, not the text of the MS. Plainly, this is a draft Nietzsche rejected And it should be compared with Twilight, Chapter VII, section 5 (Portable Nietzsche, pp. 509-511), and, e g, section 142 above. Utilized in Twilight, Chapter I, section 36

(Portable Nietzsche, pp. 471-72). 79 “The starry heavens above me and the moral law within me.” 88 A member of the German Reich. 108 A section of the utmost importance for the understanding of Nietzsche’s opposition to Christianity and his contrast of Dionysus and Christ. In the first edition (1901) only the first paragraph was printed (as section 225). In the MS the second paragraph does not follow the first; it appears earlier in the same notebook, preceded by the words: “The same kind of man who wishes us ‘good weather’ also wishes only for ‘good men’ and, quite generally, for good qualities—at least the ever-growing dominion of what is good.” Schlechta ignores 1911, p. 504, and also p. 486, and reprints the text of the standard editions. See also section 881 below. 113 I doubt [it] For the contrast implicit in the last two sentences see also The Gay Science, Book V, section 344, which is discussed at length in my Nietzsche, Chapter 12, section III. III. CRITIQUE OF PHILOSOPHY 406 (1885-1886) Let us get rid of a few superstitions about philosophers that have been common so far! 407 (1884) Philosophers are prejudiced against appearance, change, pain, death, the corporeal, the senses, fate and bondage, the aimless. They believe first in: absolute knowledge, (2) in knowledge for the sake of knowledge, (3) in an association between virtue and happiness, (4) in the comprehensibility of human actions. [They are]118 led by instinctive moral definitions in which former cultural conditions are reflected (more dangerous ones). 408 (1884) What do philosophers lack? (a)119 an historical sense, (b) knowledge of physiology, (c) a goal in the future— The ability to formulate a critique without any irony or moral condemnation. 409 (1885) Philosophers (1) have had from the first a wonderful capacity for the contradictio in adjecto; (2) they have trusted in concepts as completely as they have mistrusted the senses: they have not stopped to consider that concepts and words are our inheritance from ages in which thinking was very modest and unclear. What dawns on philosophers last of all: they must no longer accept concepts as a gift, nor merely purify and polish them, but first make and create them, present them and make them convincing. Hitherto one has generally trusted one’s concepts as if they were a wonderful dowry from some sort of wonderland: but they are, after all, the inheritance from our most remote, most foolish as well as most intelligent ancestors. This piety toward what we find in us is perhaps part of the moral element in knowledge. What is needed above all is an absolute skepticism toward all inherited concepts (of the kind that one philosopher perhaps possessed—Plato, of course—for he taught the reverse). 410 (1885-1886) For the Preface Deeply mistrustful of the dogmas of epistemology, I loved to look now out of this window, now out of that; I guarded against settling down with any of these dogmas, considered them harmful—and finally: is it likely that a tool is able to criticize its own fitness?— What I noticed was rather that no epistemological skepticism or dogmatism had ever arisen free from ulterior motives—that it acquires a value of the second rank as soon as one has considered what it was that compelled the adoption of this point of view. Fundamental insight: Kant as well as Hegel and Schopenhauer—the skeptical-epochistic attitude as well as the historicizing, as well as the pessimistic—have a moral origin. I saw no one who had ventured a critique of moral value feelings: and I soon turned my back on the meagre attempts made to arrive at a description of the origin of these feelings (as by the English and German Darwinists). How can Spinoza's position, his denial and rejection of moral value judgments, be explained? (It was one consequence of his theodicy!)

411 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. 1888)

Morality as supreme devaluation.— Either our world is the work and expression (modus) of God: in which case it must be supremely perfect (Leibniz's conclusion)—and one never doubted that one knew what constituted perfection—in which case evil must be only apparent (Spinoza is more radical, applying this to the concepts good and evil), or must proceed from God's supreme purpose (—perhaps as consequence of a particular mark of favor by God, who allows a choice between good and evil: the privilege of not being an automaton; “freedom” at the risk of making a mistake, of choosing wrongly—e.g., see Simplicius in his commentary on Epictetus). Or our world is imperfect, evil and guilt are actual and determined and absolutely inherent in its nature; in which case it cannot be the real world: in which case knowledge is only the way to a denial of it, for the world is an error which can be known to be an error. This is the opinion of Schopenhauer on the basis of Kantian presuppositions. Pascal is even more desperate: he comprehended that, in that case, even knowledge must be corrupt and falsified—that revelation was needed even to understand that the world ought to be denied. 412 (1883-1888) Because we are used to unconditional authorities we have come to need unconditional authorities:—this need is so strong that, even in a critical age such as Kant's, it showed itself superior to the need for criticism and was, in a certain sense, able to subject the entire work of critical reason and put it to its own uses.— It proved its superiority once again in the following generation, which was necessarily drawn by its historical instinct toward a relativity of all authority, by pressing into its service even the Hegelian philosophy of evolution, history re-baptized philosophy, and presenting history as the progressive self-revelation, self-surpassing of moral ideas. Since Plato, philosophy has been dominated by morality. Even in his predecessors, moral interpretations play a decisive role (with Anaximander, the perishing of all things as punishment for their emancipation from pure being; with Heraclitus, the regularity of phenomena as witness to the moral-legal character of the whole world of becoming). 413 (1885) Ulterior moral motives have hitherto most obstructed the course of philosophy. 414 (Jan.-Fall 1888)¹²¹ In all ages, one has taken “beautiful feelings” for arguments, the “heaving bosom” for the bellows of divinity, convictions for a “criterion of truth,” the need of an opponent for a question mark against wisdom: this falsehood, this counterfeiting, permeates the whole history of philosophy. The skeptics—respectable but rare—excepted, an instinct for intellectual integrity is nowhere evident. At last even Kant tried in all innocence to make this thinkers' corruption scientific by means of the concept “practical reason”: he invented a reason expressly for those cases in which one would not need to bother about reason: namely, when the needs of the heart, when morality, when “duty” speaks. 415 (1885-1886) Hegel: his popular side the doctrine of war and great men. Right is with the victorious: they represent the progress of mankind. Attempt to prove the dominion of morality by means of history. Kant: a realm of moral values, withdrawn from us, invisible, real. Hegel: a demonstrable development, a becoming-visible of the moral realm. Let us not be deceived either in the Kantian or in the Hegelian manner:—we no longer believe in morality, as they did, and consequently we have no need to found a philosophy with the aim of justifying morality. Neither the critical nor the historicist philosophy has any charm for us in this respect:—so what charm has it, then?— 416 (1885-1886) The significance of German philosophy (Hegel): to evolve a pantheism through which evil, error, and suffering are not felt as arguments against divinity. This grandiose project has been misused by the existing powers (state, etc.), as if it sanctioned the rationality of whoever happened to be ruling. Schopenhauer, on the other hand, appears as a stubborn morality-man who, in order to justify his moral valuation, finally becomes a world-denier. Finally a “mystic.” I myself have attempted an aesthetic justification: how is the ugliness of the world possible?— I took the will to beauty, to persist in like forms, for a temporary means of preservation and recuperation: fundamentally, however, the eternally-creative appeared to me to be, as the eternal compulsion to destroy, associated with pain. The ugly is the form things assume when we view them with the will to implant a meaning, a new meaning, into what has become meaningless: the accumulated force which compels the creator to consider all that has been created hitherto as unacceptable, ill-constituted, worthy of being denied, ugly!— 417 (1883-1888) My first solution: Dionysian wisdom. Joy in the destruction of the most noble and at the sight of its progressive ruin: in reality joy in what is coming and lies in the future, which triumphs over existing things, however good. Dionysian: temporary identification with the principle of life (including the voluptuousness of the martyr). My innovations.— Further development of pessimism: intellectual pessimism; critique of morality, disintegration of the last consolation, Knowledge of the signs of decay: veils with illusion every firm action; culture isolates, is unjust and therefore strong. My endeavor to oppose decay and increasing weakness of personality. I sought a new center. Impossibility of this endeavor recognized. Thereupon I advanced further down the road of disintegration—where I found new sources of strength for individuals. We have to be destroyers!—I perceived that the state of disintegration, in which individual natures can perfect themselves as never before—is an image and isolated example of existence in general. To the paralyzing sense of general disintegration and incompleteness I opposed the eternal recurrence. 418 (1883-1888) One seeks a picture of the world in that philosophy in which we feel freest; i.e., in which our most powerful drive feels free to function. This will also be the case with me! 419 (1885) German philosophy as a whole—Leibniz, Kant, Hegel, Schopenhauer, to name the greatest—is the most fundamental form of romanticism and homesickness there has ever been: the longing for the best that ever existed. One is no longer at home anywhere; at last one longs back for that place in which alone one can be at home, because it is the only place in which one would want to be at home: the Greek world! But it is in precisely that direction that all bridges are broken—except the rainbow-bridges of concepts! And these lead everywhere, into all the homes and “fatherlands” that existed for Greek souls! To be sure, one must be very subtle, very light, very thin to step across these bridges! But what happiness there is already in this will to spirituality, to ghostliness almost! How far it takes one from “pressure and stress,” from the mechanistic awkwardness of the natural sciences, from the market hubbub of “modern ideas”! One wants to go back, through the Church Fathers to the Greeks, from the north to the south, from the formulas to the Forms; one still relishes the exit from antiquity, Christianity, as an entrance to it, as in itself a goodly piece of the old world, as a glittering mosaic of ancient concepts and ancient value judgments. Arabesques, flourishes, rococo of scholastic abstractions—still better, that is to say subtler and thinner, than the peasant and mob reality of the European north, still a protest of higher spirituality against the peasants’ war and mob rebellion that has become master of spiritual taste in northern Europe and has found its leader in the great “unspiritual man,” Luther: in this respect, German philosophy is a piece of counter-Reformation, even of Renaissance, at least will to Renaissance, will to go on with the discovery of antiquity, the digging up of ancient philosophy, above all of the pre-Socratics—the most deeply buried of all Greek temples! A few centuries hence, perhaps, one will judge that all German philosophy derives its real dignity from being a gradual reclamation of the soil of antiquity, and that all claims to “originality” must sound petty and ludicrous in relation to that higher claim of the Germans to have joined anew the bond that seemed to be broken, the bond with the Greeks, the hitherto highest type of man. Today we are again getting close to all those fundamental forms of world interpretation devised by the Greek spirit through Anaximander, Heraclitus, Parmenides, Empedocles, Democritus, and Anaxagoras—we are growing more Greek by the day; at first, as is only fair, in concepts and evaluations, as Hellenizing ghosts, as it were: but one day, let us hope, also in our bodies! Herein lies (and has always lain) my hope for the German character! 420 (1884) I do not wish to persuade anyone to philosophy: it is inevitable, it is perhaps also desirable, that the philosopher should be a rare plant. I find nothing more repugnant than didactic praise of philosophy, as one finds it in Seneca, or worse, Cicero. Philosophy has little to do with virtue. Permit me to say that the scholar and scientist,¹²² too, are fundamentally different from the philosopher.—What I desire is that the genuine concept of the philosopher should not utterly perish in Germany. There are so many halfhearted creatures of all kinds in Germany who would be glad to conceal their ill-constitutedness beneath so noble a name. 421 (1884) I have to set up the most difficult ideal of the philosopher. Learning is not enough! The scholar is the herd animal in the realm of knowledge—who inquires because he is ordered to and because others have done so before him.— 422 (1885) Superstition about philosophers: confusion with scholars and scientists. As if values were inherent in things and all one had to do was grasp them! To what extent they study under the direction of given values (their hatred of appearance, the body, etc.). Schopenhauer concerning morality (mockery of utilitarianism). At last, confusion goes so far that one regards Darwinism as philosophy: and now the scholars and scientists dominate. Even Frenchmen like Taine inquire, or think they inquire, without being already in possession of a standard of values. Prostration before “facts,” a kind of cult. In reality, they destroy the existing evaluations. Explanation of this misunderstanding. The man who can command rarely appears: he misinterprets himself. One positively wants to repudiate one’s own authority and assign it to circumstances.— In Germany, the esteem of the critic belongs to the history of awakening manhood. Lessing, etc. (Napoleon on Goethe). As a matter of fact, this movement was again reversed by German romanticism; and the fame of German philosophy depends on that, as if the danger of skepticism had thus been removed and faith could be proved. Both tendencies culminate in Hegel: at bottom, he generalized German criticism and German romanticism—a kind of dialectical fatalism, but in honor of the spirit, in fact with the submission of the philosopher to reality. The critic prepares the way: no more! With Schopenhauer the task of the philosopher dawns: the determination of value; still under the domination of eudaemonism. The ideal of pessimism.

423 (March-June 1888)

Theory and practice.¹²⁴—Fateful distinction, as if there were an actual drive for knowledge that, without regard to questions of usefulness and harm, went blindly for the truth; and then, separate from this, the whole world of practical interests — I tried to show, on the other hand, what instincts have been active behind all these pure theoreticians—how they have all, under the spell of their instincts, gone fatalistically for something that was “truth” for them—for them and only for them. The conflict between different systems, including that between epistemological scruples, is a conflict between quite definite instincts (forms of vitality, decline, classes, races, etc.). The so-called drive for knowledge can be traced back to a drive to appropriate and conquer: the senses, the memory, the instincts, etc. have developed as a consequence of this drive. The quickest possible reduction of the phenomena, economy, the accumulation of the spoils of knowledge (i.e., of world appropriated and made manageable)—Morality is such a curious science because it is in the highest degree practical: so that the position of pure knowledge, scientific integrity, is at once abandoned as soon as the claims of morality must be answered. Morality says: I need many answers—reasons, arguments; scruples can come afterward, or not at all—. “How should one act?”—If one considers that one is dealing with a sovereignly developed type that has “acted” for countless millennia, and in which everything has become instinct, expediency, automatism, fatality, then the urgency of this moral question must actually seem ridiculous. “How should one act?”—Morality has always been a misunderstanding: in reality, a species fated to act in this or that fashion wanted to justify itself, by dictating its norm as the universal norm—“How should one act?” is not a cause but an effect. Morality follows, the ideal comes at the end. —On the other hand, the appearance of moral scruples (in other words: the becoming-conscious of the values by which one acts) betrays a certain sickness; strong ages and peoples do not reflect on their rights, on the principles on which they act, on their instincts and reasons. Becoming-conscious is a sign that real morality, i.e., instinctive certainty in actions, is going to the devil—Every time a new world of consciousness is created, the moralists are a sign of damage, impoverishment, disorganization.—The deeply instinctive are shy of logicizing duties: among them are found Pyrrhonic opponents of dialectics and of knowability in general—A virtue is refuted with a “for”—Thesis: the appearance of moralists belongs to an age in which morality is coming to an end. Thesis: the moralist disintegrates the moral instincts, however much he may suppose himself to be their restorer. Thesis: that which really drives the moralist is not the moral instincts but the instincts of decadence translated into the formulas of morality—(he regards it as corruption when the instincts become uncertain). Thesis: the instincts of decadence, which, through the moralists, want to become master over the instinctive morality of strong races and ages, are the instincts of the weak and underprivileged; the instincts of the exceptions, the solitaires, the abandoned, of the abortus in what is lofty and what is petty. the instincts of those habituated to suffering, who need a noble interpretation of their condition and therefore must know as little as possible about physiology. 424 (1885) The tartuffery of scientific manners.¹²⁶— One must not affect scientific manners where the time has not yet come to be scientific; but even the genuine investigator has to abandon the vanity of affecting a kind of method for which fundamentally the time has not yet come. Just as he must not “falsify” things and thoughts at which he has arrived in another way by imposing on them a false arrangement of deduction and dialectic. Thus Kant falsified in his “morality” his inner psychological tendency; a more recent example is Herbert Spencer’s ethics.— One should not conceal and corrupt the facts of how our thoughts have come to us. The profoundest and least exhausted books will probably always have something of the aphoristic and unexpected character of Pascal’s Pensées. The driving forces and evaluations have long lain below the surface; what comes out is effect. I fight all the tartuffery of false scientific manners: in the demonstration, if it does not correspond to the genesis of thoughts; in the claims to methods that are perhaps not yet possible at a certain stage of science; in the claims to objectivity, to cold impersonality, where, as in the case of all valuations, we describe ourselves and our inner experiences in a couple of words. There are ludicrous forms of vanity, e.g., that of Saint-Beuve, who worried all his life that he had now and then exhibited real warmth and passion either “for” or “against,” and would gladly have lied that fact out of his life.

425 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

“Objectivity” in the philosopher: moral indifference toward oneself, blindness toward good or ill consequences: lack of scruples about using dangerous means; perversity and multiplicity of character considered and exploited as an advantage. My profound indifference toward myself: I desire no advantage from my insights and do not avoid the disadvantages that accompany them.— Here I include what might be called corruption of the character; this perspective is beside the point: I use my character, but try neither to understand nor to change it—the personal calculus of virtue has not entered my head for a moment. It seems to me that one shuts the door on knowledge as soon as one becomes interested in one’s own case—or, worse, the “salvation of one’s soul”!— One must not take one’s morality too seriously and not let oneself be deprived of a modest right to its opposite— A sort of inherited wealth of morality is perhaps presupposed here: one senses that one can squander a lot of it and throw it out the window without really impoverishing oneself. Never to feel tempted to admire “beautiful souls”; always to know oneself their superior. To encounter the monsters of virtue with an inward mockery; déniaiser la vertu—a secret pleasure. To revolve about oneself; no desire to become “better” or in any way “other.” Too interested not to throw the tentacles or nets of every morality out to things—.

426 (March-June 1888)

Toward a psychology of the psychologist. Psychologists as they are possible only beginning with the nineteenth century: no longer those loafers who look a mere three or four steps ahead and are almost content to burrow inside themselves. We psychologists of the future—we have little patience with introspection: we almost take it for a sign of degeneration when an instrument tries “to know itself”: we are instruments of knowledge and would like to possess all the naiveté and precision of an instrument—consequently, we must not analyze ourselves, “know” ourselves. First mark of the self-preservative instinct of the great psychologist: he never seeks himself, he has no eyes for himself, no interest or curiosity in himself— The great egoism of our dominating will requires that we shut our eyes to ourselves—that we must seem to be “impersonal,” “désintéressé” “objective”!—oh, how much we are the opposite of this! Just because we are to an eccentric degree psychologists. We are no Pascals, we are not especially interested in the “salvation of the soul,” in our own happiness, in our own virtue.— We have neither the time nor the curiosity to rotate about ourselves in that way. Considered more deeply, the case is different yet: we mistrust from the heart all navel gazing, because to us self-observation counts as a form of degeneration of the psychological genius, as a question mark against the instinct of the psychologist: just as surely as a painter’s eye is degenerate if it is governed by the will to see for the sake of seeing.

427 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The appearance of the Greek philosophers from Socrates onwards is a symptom of decadence; the anti-Hellenic instincts come to the top— The “Sophist” is still completely Hellenic—including Anaxagoras, Democritus, the great Ionians—but as a transitional form. The polis loses its faith in the uniqueness of its culture, in its right to rule over every other polis— One exchanges cultures, i.e., “the gods”—one thereby loses faith in the sole prerogative of the deus autochthonus. Good and evil of differing origin are mingled: the boundary between good and evil is blurred— This is the “Sophist”— The “philosopher,” on the other hand, is the reaction: he desires the old virtue. He sees the grounds of decay in the decay of institutions, he desires old institutions;—he sees the decay in the decay of authority: he seeks new authorities (travels abroad, into foreign literatures, into exotic religions—); he desires the ideal polis after the concept “polis” has had its day (approximately as the Jews held firm as a “people” after they had fallen into slavery). They are interested in all tyrants: they want to restore virtue by force majeure. Gradually everything genuinely Hellenic is made responsible for the state of decay (and Plato is just as ungrateful to Pericles, Homer, tragedy, rhetoric, as the prophets were to David and Saul). The decline of Greece is understood as an objection to the foundations of Hellenic culture: basic error of philosophers—. Conclusion: the Greek world perishes. Cause: Homer, myth, the ancient morality, etc. The anti-Hellenic development of the philosophers’ value judgment:—the Egyptian (“life after death” as a court of law—); the Semitic (the “dignity of the sage,” the “sheik”);—the Pythagoreans, the subterranean cults, silence, terrorization with a beyond, mathematics; the religious valuation, a kind of traffic with the cosmos;—the priestly, ascetic, transcendental;—dialectic—surely a repellent and pedantic concept splitting already in Plato?— Decline of good taste in spiritual matters: one is already insensitive to the ugliness and noisiness of all direct dialectics. Two decadence movements and extremes run side by side: (a) sensual, charmingly wicked decadence, loving art and show, and (b) gloomy religio-moral pathos, Stoic self-hardening, Platonic slander of the senses, preparation of the soil for Christianity.

428 (March-June 1888)

How far psychologists have been corrupted by the moral idiosyncrasy:—not one of the ancient philosophers had the courage for a theory of the “unfree will” (i.e., for a theory that denies morality);—no one had the courage to define the typical element in pleasure, every sort of pleasure (“happiness”) as the feeling of power: for to take pleasure in power was considered immoral;—no one had the courage to conceive virtue as a consequence of immorality (of a will to power) in the service of the species (or of the race or polis), for the will to power was considered immorality. In the entire evolution of morality, truth never appears: all the conceptual elements employed are fictions; all the psychologica accepted are falsifications; all the forms of logic dragged into this realm of lies are sophistries. What distinguishes moral philosophers themselves is a complete absence of cleanliness and intellectual self-discipline: they take “beautiful feelings” for arguments: they regard their “heaving bosom” as the bellows of divinity—Moral philosophy is the scabrous period in the history of the spirit. The first great example: in the name of morality, under the patronage of morality, an unheard-of wrong was perpetrated, in fact a piece of decadence in every respect. One cannot insist too strongly upon the fact that the great Greek philosophers represent the decadence of every kind of Greek excellence and make it contagious—“Virtue” made completely abstract was the greatest seduction to make oneself abstract: i.e., to detach oneself. It is a very remarkable moment: the Sophists verge upon the first critique of morality, the first insight into morality:—they juxtapose the multiplicity (the geographical relativity) of the moral value judgments;—they let it be known that every morality can be dialectically justified; i.e., they divine that all attempts to give reasons for morality are necessarily sophistical—a proposition later proved on the grand scale by the ancient philosophers, from Plato onwards (down to Kant);—they postulate the first truth that a “morality-in-itself,” a “good-in-itself” do not exist, that it is a swindle to talk of “truth” in this field. Where was intellectual integrity in those days? The Greek culture of the Sophists had developed out of all the Greek instincts; it belongs to the culture of the Periclean age as necessarily as Plato does not: it has its predecessors in Heraclitus, in Democritus, in the scientific types of the old philosophy; it finds expression in, e.g., the high culture of Thucydides. And—it has ultimately shown itself to be right: every advance in epistemological and moral knowledge has reinstated the Sophists—Our contemporary way of thinking is to a great extent Heraclitean, Democritean, and Protagorean: it suffices to say it is Protagorean, because Protagoras represented a synthesis of Heraclitus and Democritus. (Plato: a great Cagliostro—remember how Epicurus judged him,¹³¹ how Timon, the friend of Pyrrho, judged him—Is Plato’s integrity beyond question?— But we know at least that he wanted to have taught as absolute truth what he himself did not regard as even conditionally true: namely, the separate existence and separate immortality of “souls.”)

429 (March-June 1888)

The Sophists are no more than realists: they formulate the values and practices common to everyone on the level of values—they possess the courage of all strong spirits to know their own immorality— Do you suppose perchance that these little Greek free cities, which from rage and envy would have liked to devour each other, were guided by philanthropic and righteous principles? Does one reproach Thucydides for the words he put into the mouths of the Athenian ambassadors when they negotiated with the Melians on the question of destruction or submission? Only complete Tartuffes could possibly have talked of virtue in the midst of this terrible tension—or men living apart, hermits, refugees, and emigrants from reality—people who negated in order to be able to live themselves— The Sophists were Greeks: when Socrates and Plato took up the cause of virtue and justice, they were Jews or I know not what— Grote's tactics in defense of the Sophists are false: he wants to raise them to the rank of men of honor and ensigns of morality—but it was their honor not to indulge in any swindle with big words and virtues—

430 (March-June 1888)

The great rationality of all education in morality has always been that one tried to attain to the certainty of an instinct: so that neither good intentions nor good means had to enter consciousness as such. As the soldier exercises, so should man learn to act. In fact, this unconsciousness belongs to any kind of perfection: even the mathematician employs his combinations unconsciously— What, then, is the significance of the reaction of Socrates, who recommended dialectics as the road to virtue and made mock when morality did not know how to justify itself logically?— As if this were not part of its value—without unconsciousness it is no good— Positing proofs as the presupposition for personal excellence in virtue signified nothing less than the disintegration of Greek instincts. They are themselves types of disintegration, all these great “virtuous men” and word-spinners. In praxi, this means that moral judgments are torn from their conditionality, in which they have grown and alone possess any meaning, from their Greek and Greek-political ground and soil, to be denaturalized under the pretense of sublimation. The great concepts “good” and “just” are severed from the presuppositions to which they belong and, as liberated “ideas,” become objects of dialectic. One looks for truth in them, one takes them for entities or signs of entities: one invents a world where they are at home, where they originate— In summa: the mischief has already reached its climax in Plato— And then one had need to invent the abstractly perfect man as well:—good, just, wise, a dialectician—in short, the scarecrow of the ancient philosopher: a plant removed from all soil; a humanity without any particular regulating instincts; a virtue that “proves” itself with reasons. The perfectly absurd “individuum” in itself! unnaturalness of the first water— In short, the consequence of the denaturalization of moral values was the creation of a degenerate type of man —“the good man,” “the happy man,” “the wise man.”— Socrates represents a moment of the profoundest perversity in the history of values. 431 (1885-1886 and 1888) Socrates.¹³²— This reversal of taste in favor of dialectics is a great question mark. What was it that really happened?— Socrates, the roturier who accomplished it, achieved by means of it victory over a more noble taste, the taste of the nobility:— the mob achieved victory with dialectics. Before Socrates, the dialectical manner was repudiated in good society; one believed it compromised one; youth was warned against it. Why this display of reasons? Why should one demonstrate? Against others one possessed authority. One commanded: that sufficed. Among one’s own, inter pares, one possessed tradition, also an authority: and, finally, one “understood one another”! One simply had no place for dialectic. Besides, one mistrusted such public presentation of one’s arguments. Honest things do not display their reasons in that way. There is something indecent about showing all one’s cards. What can be “demonstrated” is of little worth.— The instinct of all party orators knows, moreover, that dialectics inspire mistrust, that they are very unconvincing. Nothing is easier to expunge than the effect of a dialectician. Dialectics can only be an emergency measure. One must experience an emergency, one must be obliged to extort one’s rights: otherwise one makes no use of dialectics. That is why the Jews were dialecticians, why Reynard the Fox was one, why Socrates was one. One has a merciless weapon in one’s hand. One can tyrannize with it. One compromises when one conquers. One leaves it to one’s victim to prove that he is not an idiot. One makes others furious and helpless, while one remains the embodiment of cool, triumphant reasonableness oneself—one deprives one’s opponent’s intelligence of potency.— The irony of the dialectician is a form of mob revenge: the ferocity of the oppressed finds an outlet in the cold knife-thrust of the syllogism— In Plato, as a man of overexcitable sensuality and enthusiasm, the charm of the concept had grown so strong that he involuntarily honored and deified the concept as an ideal Form. Intoxication by dialectic: as the consciousness of exercising mastery over oneself by means of it—as a tool of the will to power.

432134 (March-June 1888)

The problem of Socrates.— The two antitheses: the tragic disposition, the Socratic disposition—measured according to the law of life. To what extent the Socratic disposition is a phenomenon of decadence: to what extent, however, a robust health and strength is still exhibited in the whole habitus, in the dialectics, efficiency, and self-discipline of the scientific man (—the health of the plebeian; his wickedness, esprit frondeur,¹³⁵ his cunning, his canaille au fond are held in check by shrewdness; “ugly”). Making ugly: self-mockery, dialectical dryness, shrewdness as tyrant in opposition to a “tyrant” (instinct). Everything is exaggerated, eccentric, caricature, in Socrates, a buffo with the instincts of Voltaire. He discover a new form of agon;¹³⁷ he is the first fencing master to the leading circles of Athens; he represents nothing but the highest form of shrewdness: he calls it “virtue” (—he divined it to be deliverance: he was not shrewd from choice, it was de rigueur); to have oneself under control, so as to go into battle with reasons and not with affects (—the cunning of Spinoza—the unravelling of the errors caused by affects);—to discover that one can capture anyone in whom one produces affects, to discover that affects proceed illogically; practice in self-mockery, so as to damage the feeling of rancor at its roots. I try to understand from what partial and idiosyncratic states the Socratic problem derives: his equalization of reason = virtue = happiness. It was with this absurdity of a doctrine of identity that he fascinated: the philosophers of antiquity never again freed themselves from this fascination— Absolute lack of objective interest: hatred for science; the idiosyncrasy of feeling oneself as a problem. Socrates’ acoustic hallucination: morbid element. When the spirit is rich and independent it most resists any preoccupation with morality. How came it that Socrates was a monomaniac in regard to morality?— In emergencies, “practical” philosophy steps at once to the fore. Morality and religion as chief interests are signs of an emergency.

433139 (March-June 1888)

—Shrewdness, clarity, severity and logicity as weapons against the ferocity of the drives. These must be dangerous and threaten destruction: otherwise there would be no sense in developing shrewdness to the point of making it into a tyrant. To make a tyrant of shrewdness:—but for that the drives must be tyrants. This is the problem.— In those days it was a very timely problem. Reason became = virtue = happiness. Solution: The Greek philosophers rest on the same fundamental facts of inner experience as Socrates: five steps from excess, from anarchy, from intemperance—all men of decadence. They need him as a physician: logic as will to power, to self-mastery, to “happiness.” The ferocity and anarchy of the instincts in the case of Socrates is a symptom of decadence. The superfetation of logic and of clarity of reason included. Both are abnormalities, both belong together. Critique. Decadence betrays itself in this preoccupation with “happiness” (i.e., with “salvation of the soul,” i.e., to feel one’s condition as a danger). The fanaticism of its interest in “happiness” indicates the pathological nature of the hidden cause: it was a life-or-death interest. To be reasonable or perish was the alternative before which they all stood. The moralism of the Greek philosophers indicates that they felt themselves to be in danger—

434 (March-June 1888)

Why everything resolved itself into play-acting.— The rudimentary psychology that considered only the conscious motives of men (as causes), that took “consciousness” for an attribute of the soul, that sought a will (i.e., an intention) behind all action: it needed, first, only to answer “Happiness” to the question: What do men want? (one dared not say “Power”: that would have been immoral); —consequently there is in all the actions of men the intention of attaining happiness. Secondly: if man does in fact not achieve happiness, why is it? Because he blunders in respect of the means.— What is unfaillingly the means to happiness? Answer: virtue.— Why virtue?— Because it is supremely rational and because rationality makes it impossible to err in the choice of means: it is as reason that virtue is the way to happiness. Dialectic is the constant occupation of virtue, because it excludes all clouding of the intellect and all affects. In fact, man does not want “happiness.” Pleasure is a feeling of power: if one excludes the affects, then one excludes the states that give the highest feeling of power, consequently of pleasure. The highest rationality is a cold, clear state very far from giving that feeling of happiness that intoxication of any kind brings with it — The philosophers of antiquity combat everything that intoxicates—that impairs the absolute coldness and neutrality of the consciousness— They were consistent with their false presupposition: that consciousness is the exalted, the supreme state, the precondition of perfection—whereas the opposite is true—— To the extent that it is willed, to the extent that it is conscious, there is no perfection in action of any kind. The philosophers of antiquity were the greatest duffers in practice because they condemned themselves to be duffers in theory— In praxi, everything resolved itself into play-acting;—and whoever saw through this, e.g., Pyrrho, judged as everyone did, namely that in goodness and integrity “little people” were far superior to philosophers. All the more profound natures of antiquity were disgusted with the philosophers of virtue: they were looked upon as quarrelsome and play actors. (Judgment on Plato: that of Epicurus,¹⁴⁰ that of Pyrrho). Result: little people are superior to them in their way of living, in patience, in goodness and mutual assistance:—approximately the claim made by Dostoevsky or Tolstoy for his muzhiks: they are more philosophical in practice, they meet the exigencies of life more courageously—

435 (March-June 1888)

Toward a critique of the philosopher.— It is a self-deception of philosophers and moralists to imagine that they escape decadence by opposing it. That is beyond their will; and, however little they acknowledge it, one later discovers that they were among the most powerful promoters of decadence. [Let us take]¹⁴¹ the philosophers of Greece, e.g., Plato. He severed the instincts from the polis, from contest, from military efficiency, from art and beauty, from the mysteries, from belief in tradition and ancestors— He was the seducer of the nobility: he was himself seduced by the roturier Socrates— He negated all the presuppositions of the “noble Greek” of the old stamp, made dialectic an everyday practice, conspired with tyrants, pursued politics of the future and provided the example of the most complete severance of the instincts from the past. He is profound, passionate in everything anti-Hellenic— These great philosophers represent one after the other the typical forms of decadence: the moral-religious idiosyncrasy, anarchism, nihilism (adiaphora),¹⁴² cynicism, obduracy, hedonism, reaction. The question of “happiness,” of “virtue,” of “salvation of the soul” is the expression of physiological contradictoriness in these types of decline: their instincts lack a center of gravity, a purpose. 436 (1885-1886) To what extent dialectic and faith in reason still rest on moral prejudices. With Plato we are, as former inhabitants of an intelligible world of the good, still in possession of a heritage from that time: divine dialectic, as proceeding from the good, leads to all things good (—therefore, as it were, “backwards” —). Even Descartes had a notion of the fact that in a fundamentally Christian-moral mode of thought, which believes in a good God as the creator of things, only God’s veracity guarantees to us the judgments of our senses. Apart from a religious sanction and guarantee of our senses and rationality—where should we derive a right to trust in existence! That thinking is a measure of actuality—that what cannot be thought, is not—is a rude non plus ultra of a moralistic trustfulness (in an essential truth-principle at the bottom of things), in itself a mad assumption, which experience contradicts every moment. We are altogether unable to think anything at all just as it is—

437 (March-June 1888)

The real philosophers of Greece are those before Socrates (—with Socrates something changes). They are all noble persons, setting themselves apart from people and state,¹⁴⁴ traveled, serious to the point of somberness, with a slow glance, no strangers to state affairs and diplomacy. They anticipate all the great conceptions of things: they themselves represent these conceptions, they bring themselves into a system. Nothing gives a higher idea of the Greek spirit than this sudden fruitfulness in types, than this involuntary completeness in the erection of the great possibilities of the philosophical ideal.— I seen only one original figure in those that came after: a late arrival but necessarily the last—the nihilist Pyrrho:—his instinct was opposed to all that had come to the top in the meantime: the Socratics, Plato, the artist's optimism of Heraclitus. (Pyrrho goes back, through Protagoras, to Democritus—). * Sagacious weariness: Pyrrho. To live a lowly life among the lowly. No pride. To live in the common way; to honor and believe what all believe. On guard against science and spirit, also against all that inflates— Simple: indescribably patient, carefree, mild. Apatheia,¹⁴⁶ or rather praôtes.¹⁴⁷ A Buddhist for Greece, grown up amid the tumult of the schools; a latecomer; weary; the protest of weariness against the zeal of the dialecticians; the unbelief of weariness in the importance of all things. He had seen Alexander, he had seen the Indian penitents. To such refined latecomers, everything lowly, everything poor, even everything idiotic is seductive. It has a narcotic effect: it relaxes (Pascal). On the other hand, in the midst of the crowd and confounded with everyone else, they feel a little warmth: these weary people need warmth— To overcome contradiction; no contest; no will to distinction; to deny the Greek instincts. (Pyrrho lived with his sister who was a midwife.) To disguise wisdom so that it no longer distinguishes; to cloak it in poverty and rags; to perform the lowliest offices: to go to market and sell suckling pigs— Sweetness; light; indifference; no virtues that require gestures: to be everyone's equal even in virtue: ultimate self-overcoming, ultimate indifference. Pyrrho, like Epicurus, two forms of Greek decadence: related, in hatred for dialectics and for all theatrical virtues—these two together were in those days called philosophy—; deliberately holding in low esteem that which they loved; choosing common, even despised names for it; representing a state in which one is neither sick nor well, neither alive nor dead— Epicurus more naive, idyllic, grateful; Pyrrho more traveled, experienced, nihilistic— His life was a protest against the great doctrine of identity (happiness = virtue = knowledge). One cannot promote the right way of life through science: wisdom does not make “wise”— The right way of life does not want happiness, turns away from happiness—

438 (Spring 1888)

The struggle against the “old faith” as undertaken by Epicurus was, in a strict sense, a struggle against pre-existing Christianity— a struggle against the old world grown senile and sick, already gloomy, moralized, soured by feelings of guilt. Not the “moral corruption” of antiquity, but precisely its moralization is the prerequisite through which alone Christianity could become master of it. Moral fanaticism (in short: Plato) destroyed paganism, by revaluing its values and poisoning its innocence.— We ought finally to understand that what was then destroyed was higher than what became master!— Christianity has grown out of psychological decay, could only take root in decayed soil.

439 (March-June 1888)

Scientific manners: as training or as instinct.—In the Greek philosophers I see a decline of the instincts: otherwise they could not have blundered so far as to posit the conscious state as more valuable. Intensity of consciousness stands in inverse ratio to ease and speed of cerebral transmission. Among Greek philosophers the reverse opinion about instinct prevailed: which is always a sign of weakened instincts. We must in fact seek perfect life where it has become least conscious (i.e., least aware of its logic, its reasons, its means and intentions, its utility). The return to the facts of bon sens, of the bon homme, of the “little people” of all kinds. The stored-up integrity and shrewdness of generations which are never conscious of their principles and are even a little afraid of principles. The demand for a virtue that reasons is not reasonable— A philosopher is compromised by such a demand.

440 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

When morality—that is to say subtlety, caution, bravery, equity—has been as it were stored up through the practice of a whole succession of generations, then the total force of this accumulated virtue radiates even into that sphere where integrity is most seldom found, into the spiritual sphere. In all becoming-conscious there is expressed a discomfiture of the organism; it has to try something new, nothing is sufficiently adapted for it, there is toil, tension, strain—all this constitutes becoming-conscious—Genius resides in instinct; goodness likewise. One acts perfectly only when one acts instinctively. Even from the viewpoint of morality, all conscious thinking is merely tentative, usually the reverse of morality. Scientific integrity is always ruptured when the thinker begins to reason: try the experiment of putting the wisest men on the most delicate scales by making them talk about morality—“When enough subtlety, bravery, caution, and moderation have been collected through the practice of a long chain of generations, then the instinctive power of such incorporated virtue radiates even into the most spiritual matters—and that phenomenon becomes visible which we call intellectual integrity. This is very rare: among philosophers it is lacking “One can take the scientific manner or, morally speaking the intellectual integrity of a thinker, the subtlety, bravery, caution, and moderation that have become instinct in him and transposed even into the most spiritual matters, and place them on the most delicate scales—by letting him talk about morality: then the most famous philosophers show that their scientific manner is as yet only a conscious affair, a beginning, a ‘good will,’ something laborious—and as soon as their instincts begin to speak, as soon as they moralize, it is all over with the discipline and subtlety of their conscience “The scientific manner—whether mere training and external or the final result of long discipline and moral practice: in the former case it abdicates as soon as the instincts speak (e.g., the religious instincts or those of the concept of duty); in the latter case it replaces these instincts and no longer grants them admission, feeling they represent uncleanness and seductions—” Although omitted in most editions, this version is printed in an appendix in both the Grossoktav edition and the Musarion edition, as #1074. Schlechta omits it. It is included here not only as a matter of principle but also for three additional reasons: (1) it is interesting to see how the editors of the various editions proceeded; (2) it is even more interesting to be able to compare two alternative drafts from Nietzsche’s hand; and (3) parts of this draft compare very favorably with the one included in the text. It could be proved that all conscious thinking would also show a far lower standard of morality than the thinking of the same man when it is directed by his instincts.

441 (March-June 1888)

The struggle against Socrates, Plato, all the Socratic schools, proceeds from the profound instinct that one does not make men better when one represents to them that virtue is demonstrable and asks for reasons— Ultimately, it is the measly fact that the agonal instinct in all these born dialecticians compelled them to glorify their personal ability as the highest quality and to represent all other good things as conditioned by it. The anti-scientific spirit of this entire “philosophy”: it is determined to be in the right.

442 (March-June 1888)

This is extraordinary. We find from the beginning of Greek philosophy onwards a struggle against science with the means of an epistemology or skepticism: and with what object? Always for the good of morality— (Hatred for physicists and physicians.) Socrates, Aristippus, the Megarian school, the Cynics, Epicurus, Pyrrho—a general assault on knowledge for the good of morality— (Hatred for dialectics also.) A problem remains: they approach the Sophists in order to get rid of science. On the other hand, the physicists are all so completely subjected as to take up the schema of truth,¹⁴⁹ of real being, into the fundamentals of their science; e.g., the atom, the four elements (juxtaposition of beings to explain multiplicity and change—). Contempt for objective interest is taught: return to the practical interest, the personal utility of all knowledge— The struggle against science is directed against (1) its pathos (objectivity), (2) its means (i.e., against its utility), (3) its results (as childish). It is the same struggle that is later conducted by the church in the name of piety: the church inherited the entire arsenal of antiquity for its struggle. Epistemology played in this the same role as it did in the case of Kant, in the case of the Indians— One does not want to be troubled by it: one wants one's hands free for one's "course." What were they really defending themselves against? Against Obligation, against legality, against the compulsion to go hand in hand— I believe one calls this freedom— Decadence manifests itself in this: the instinct of solidarity is so degenerate that solidarity is felt as tyranny: they want no authority, no solidarity, no lining up with the rank and file to adopt its ignobly slack pace. They hate the measured step, the tempo of science, they hate the lack of urgency, the perseverance, the indifference to himself of the man of science.

443 (March-June 1888)

Fundamentally, morality is hostile to science: Socrates was so already—and for this reason, that science takes things seriously that have nothing to do with “good” and “evil,” consequently makes the feeling for “good” and “evil” seem less important. For morality demands that the whole man and all his forces should stand in its service: it considers it a squandering on the part of one not rich enough to squander when man concerns himself seriously with plants and stars. This is why scientific procedures rapidly declined in Greece once Socrates had introduced into science the disease of moralizing; the height attained in the disposition of a Democritus, Hippocrates, and Thucydides was not attained a second time.

444 (March-June 1888)

Problem of the philosopher and the man of science.— Influence of age; depressive habits (staying-at-home à la Kant; overwork; insufficient nourishment of the brain; reading). More essentially: whether a tendency toward generalities is not already a symptom of decadence; objectivity as disintegration of the will (—to be able to stand so distant—) This presupposes a great adiaphora in regard to the powerful drives: a kind of isolation, exceptional stance, resistance in regard to the normal drives. Type: desertion of the homeland; further and further afield; increasing exoticism; the old imperatives become dumb—; certainly this continual questioning “whither?” (“happiness”) is a sign of disengagement from forms of organization, of a breaking loose. Problem: whether the man of science is more of a symptom of decadence than the philosophers:—he is not disengaged as a whole, only a part of him is absolutely dedicated to knowledge, trained to one corner and perspective—he needs all the virtues of a strong race and health, great severity, manliness, shrewdness. He is a symptom more of a higher multiplicity of culture than of its weariness. The scholar of decadence is a bad scholar. While the philosopher of decadence has counted, hitherto at least, as the typical philosopher.

445 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Nothing is rarer among philosophers than intellectual integrity: perhaps they say the opposite, perhaps they even believe it. But a condition of their entire occupation is that only certain truths are admitted; they know that which they have to prove; that they are at one over these “truths” is virtually their means of recognizing one another as philosophers. There are, e.g., moral truths. But a faith in morals is not a proof of morality: there are cases—and the case of the philosopher is one—in which such a faith is simply a piece of immorality.

446 (March-June 1888)

What, then, is regressive in the philosopher?— That he teaches that his qualities are the necessary and sole qualities for the attainment of the “highest good” (e.g., dialectic, as with Plato). That he orders men of all kinds gradatim up to his type as the highest. That he despises what is generally esteemed—that he opens up a gulf between priestly values and worldly values. That he knows what is true, what God is, what the goal is, what the way is— The typical philosopher is here an absolute dogmatist;—if he has need of skepticism, it is so as to be able to speak dogmatically about his main interest.

447 (March-June 1888)

The philosopher in opposition to his rivals; e g, in opposition to science: then he becomes a skeptic; then he reserves to himself a form of knowledge that he denies the man of science; then he goes hand in hand with the priest so as not to arouse the suspicion of atheism, materialism; he regards an attack on himself as an attack on morality, virtue, religion, order—he knows how to discredit his opponents as “seducers” and “underminers” : then he goes hand in hand with power. The philosopher in a struggle with other philosophers—he tries to compel them to appear as anarchists, unbelievers, opponents of authority. In summa: in so far as he struggles, he struggles just as a priest does, just as priesthood does. 448 (Manuscript source uncertain)¹⁵² Philosophy defined by Kant as “the science of the limitations of reason”!!

449 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Philosophy as the art of discovering truth: according to Aristotle. Contradicted by the Epicureans, who made use of Aristotle's sensualistic theory of knowledge: they rejected the search for truth with irony; "Philosophy as an art of living"

450 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The three great naiveties: Knowledge as a means to happiness (as if—), as a means to virtue (as if—), as a means to “denial of life”—to the extent that it is a means to disappointment—(as if—) 451 (Manuscript source uncertain)¹⁵³ That there should be a “truth” which one could somehow approach—!

452 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Error and ignorance are fateful.— The view that truth is found and that ignorance and error are at an end is one of the most potent seductions there is. Supposing it is believed, then the will to examination, investigation, caution, experiment is paralyzed: it can even count as criminal, namely as doubt concerning truth— “Truth” is therefore more fateful than error and ignorance, because it cuts off the forces that work toward enlightenment and knowledge. The affect of laziness now takes the side of “truth”— (“thinking is distress, misery!”); as do order, rule, happiness in possessing, pride in wisdom—vanity in summa:—it is more comfortable to obey than to examine; it is more flattering to think “I possess the truth” than to see only darkness around one—above all: it is reassuring, it gives confidence, it alleviates life—it “improves” the character, to the extent that it lessens mistrust. “Peace of soul,” “a quiet conscience”: all inventions made possible only by presupposing that truth has been found.— “By their fruits shall ye know them”— “Truth” is truth, for it makes men better— The process goes on: everything good, all success, is placed to the credit of “truth.” This is the proof of strength:¹⁵⁴ the happiness, the contentment, the well-being of the community, as of the individual, are henceforth understood as the consequence of belief in morality— The converse: ill success is attributed to lack of faith—.

453 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The causes of error lie just as much in the good will [as in the ill will] of man—: in a thousand cases he conceals reality from himself, he falsifies it, so as not to suffer from his good [or ill] will. E.g., God as the director of human destiny: or the interpretation of his own petty destiny as if everything were contrived and sent with a view to the salvation of his soul—this lack of “philology,” which to a more subtle intellect would have to count as uncleanness and counterfeiting, is, on the average, performed under the inspiration of good will. Good will, “noble feelings,” “lofty states” are in the means they employ just as much counterfeiters and deceivers as the affects repudiated by morality and called egoistic: love, hate, revenge. Errors are what mankind has had to pay for most dearly: and, on the whole, it is the errors of “good will” which have harmed it most profoundly. The illusion that makes happy is more pernicious than that which has immediate bad consequences: the latter sharpens and purifies reason and makes it more mistrustful—the former lulls it to sleep.— Beautiful feelings, sublime agitations, are, physiologically speaking, among the narcotics: their misuse has precisely the same consequences as the misuse of any other opiate—neurasthenia— 454 (1888) Error is the most expensive luxury that man can permit himself; and if the error happens to be a physiological error, then it is perilous to life. What, consequently, has man hitherto paid for most dearly? For his “truths”: for they have all been errors in physiologicis—

455 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Psychological confusions:—the demand for belief—confused with the “will to truth” (e.g., in the case of Carlyle).¹⁵⁸ But in the same way, the demand for unbelief has been confused with the “will to truth” (—the need to get free from a belief, for a hundred reasons: to be in the right against some “believers”). What inspires the skeptic? Hatred of the dogmatist—or a need for rest, a weariness, as in the case of Pyrrho. The advantages that one anticipated from truth were advantages resulting from belief in it:—in itself, that is, truth could be altogether painful, harmful, fateful—. One likewise disputed the “truth” only when one promised oneself advantages from one’s victory—e.g., freedom from the ruling powers. The methods of truth were not invented from motives of truth, but from motives of power, of wanting to be superior. How is truth proved? By the feeling of enhanced power—by utility—by indispensability—in short, by advantages (namely, presuppositions concerning what truth ought to be like for us to recognize it). But that is a prejudice: a sign that truth is not involved at all— What, e.g., is the meaning of the “will to truth” in the case of the Goncourts?¹⁶⁰ in the case of the naturalists?— Critique of “objectivity.” Why know: why not rather be deceived?— What one always wanted was faith—and not truth— Faith is created by means antithetical to the methods of research—: they even exclude the latter—.

456 (March-June 1888)

A Certain degree of faith serves us today as an objection to what is believed—even more as a question mark against the spiritual health of the believer.

457 (Jan-Fall 1888)

Martyrs.— In order to combat anything founded on reverence, the attacker must be possessed of a somewhat audacious, relentless, even shameless disposition— Now if one considers that mankind has for millennia sanctified as truths only what was error, that is has even branded any critique of these as a sign of a wicked disposition, then one is bound to confess with regret that a goodly amount of immorality was needed to provide the initiative for aggression, in other words for reason— These immoralists should be forgiven for always having posed as “martyrs to truth”: the truth is that it was not the drive to truth which made them negate, but disintegration, sacrilegious skepticism, pleasure in adventure—. In other cases, it is personal rancor that drives them into the domain of problems—they combat problems in order to be in the right against particular people. But it is revenge above all that science has been able to employ— the revenge of the oppressed, those who had been pushed aside and, in fact, oppressed by the prevailing truth— Truth, that is to say, the scientific method, was grasped and promoted by those who divined in it a weapon of war—an instrument of destruction— To make their opposition honorable, they needed, moreover, an apparatus similar in kind to that used by those they were attacking: —they adopted the concept “truth” just as ostentatiously and unconditionally as their opponents— they became fanatics, at least they posed as such, because no other pose was taken seriously. What remained to be done was accomplished by persecution, passion and the insecurity of the persecuted—hatred grew and consequently the precondition for remaining scientific was diminished. Ultimately, they all wanted to be right in the same absurd fashion as their opponents— The words “conviction,” “faith,” the pride of martyrdom—these are the least favorable states for the advancement of knowledge. The opponents of truth at last reaccepted the entire subjective manner of deciding questions of truth, namely by poses, sacrifices, heroic resolutions—and thus prolonged the dominion of antiscientific methods. As martyrs they compromised their own deed. 458 (March-June 1888)161 Dangerous distinction between “theoretical” and “practical,” e.g., in the case of Kant, but also in the case of the ancients:— they act as if pure spirituality presented them with the problems of knowledge and metaphysics;—they act as if practice must be judged by its own measure, whatever the answer of theory may be. Against the former I direct my psychology of philosophers: their most alienated calculations and their “spirituality” are still only the last pallid impression of a physiological fact; the voluntary is absolutely lacking, everything is instinct, everything has been directed along certain lines from the beginning— Against the latter I ask whether we know of any other method of acting well than always thinking well; the latter is an action, and the former presupposes thought. Have we a different method for judging the value of a way of life from judging the value of a theory: by induction, by comparison?— The naive believe that we are better equipped here, that here we know what is “good”—philosophers repeat it. We conclude that a faith is here at work, nothing more— “One must act; consequently rules of conduct are needed”— said even the skeptics of antiquity. The urgent need for a decision as an argument for considering something true! “One must not act”— said their more consistent brothers, the Buddhists, and conceived a rule of conduct to liberate one from actions— To accommodate oneself, to live as the “common man” lives, to hold right and good what he holds right: this is to submit to the herd instinct One must take one’s courage and severity so far as to feel such a submission as a disgrace. Not to live with two different standards!— Not to separate theory and practice!—

459 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

That nothing formerly held true is true— What was formerly despised as unholy, forbidden, contemptible, fateful—all these flowers grow today along the lovely paths of truth. This entire old morality concerns us no more: there is not a concept in it that still deserves respect. We have outlived it— we are no longer coarse and naive enough to have to let ourselves be deceived in this fashion— In more polite words: we are too virtuous for it— And if truth in the old sense was “truth” only because the old morality affirmed it, had a right to affirm it, then it follows that we no longer have need of any former truths, either— Our criterion of truth is by no means morality: we refute an opinion by showing it to be dependent on morality, to be inspired by noble feelings.

460 (March-June 1888)

All these values are empirical and conditional. But he who believes in them, who reverences them, refuses to recognize just this characteristic of them.

Philosophers believe one and all in these values, and one form their reverence took was the attempt to make a priori truths of them. The falsifying character of reverence— Reverence is the supreme test of integrity: but in the entire history of philosophy there is no intellectual integrity—but only “love of the good”—

The absolute lack of methods of testing the value of these values; secondly: reluctance to test values, to take them as being in any way conditional.— In the case of moral values, all the antiscientific instincts came together with the object of excluding science—

461 (March-June 1888)

Why philosophers are slanderers.— The treacherous and blind hostility of philosophers towards the senses—how much of mob and middle class there is in this hatred! The common people always consider an abuse of which they feel the ill consequences as an objection to that which is abused: all insurrectionary movements aimed against principles, whether political or economic, argue thus, with the idea of representing an abuse as being necessary to, and inherent in, the principle. It is a miserable story: man seeks a principle through which he can despise men—he invents a world so as to be able to slander and bespatter this world: in reality, he reaches every time for nothingness and construes nothingness as “God,” as “truth,” and in any case as judge and condemner of this state of being— If one wants a proof of how profoundly and thoroughly the actually barbarous needs of man seek satisfaction, even when he is tamed and “civilized,” one should take a look at the “leitmotifs” of the entire evolution of philosophy:—a sort of revenge on reality, a malicious destruction of the valuations by which men live, an unsatisfied soul that feels the tamed state as a torture and finds a voluptuous pleasure in a morbid unraveling of all the bonds that tie it to such a state. This section, including the passage just cited, was utilized by Nietzsche in Twilight, Chapters III and IV. The history of philosophy is a secret raging against the preconditions of life, against the value feelings of life, against partisanship in favor of life. Philosophers have never hesitated to affirm a world provided it contradicted this world and furnished them with a pretext for speaking ill of this world. It has been hitherto the grand school of slander; and it has imposed itself to such an extent that today our science, which proclaims itself the advocate of life, has accepted the basic slanderous position and treated this world as apparent, this chain of causes as merely phenomenal. What is it really that hates here? I fear it is still the Circe of philosophers, morality, that has here bewitched them into having to be slanderers forever— They believed in moral “truths,” they found there the supreme values— what else could they do but deny existence more firmly the more they got to know it? — For this existence is immoral— And this life depends upon immoral preconditions: and all morality denies life—. Let us abolish the real world: and to be able to do this we first have to abolish the supreme value hitherto, morality— It suffices to demonstrate that even morality is immoral, in the sense in which immorality has always been condemned. If the tyranny of former values is broken in this way, if we have abolished the “real world,” then a new order of values must follow of its own accord. The apparent world and the world invented by a lie—this is the antithesis. The latter has hitherto been called the “real world,” “truth,” “God.” This is what we have to abolish. Logic of my conception: Morality as supreme value (master over all phases of philosophy, even over the skeptics). Result: this world is good for nothing, it is not the “real world.” What here determines the supreme value? What is morality, really?— The instinct of decadence; it is the exhausted and disinherited who take revenge in this fashion. Historical proof: philosophers are always decadents—in the service of the nihilistic religions. The instinct of decadence which appears as will to power. Proof: the absolute immorality of means throughout the entire history of morality. General insight: the highest values hitherto are a special case of the will to power; morality itself is a special case of immorality.¹⁶³

462 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Fundamental innovations: In place of “moral values,” purely naturalistic values. Naturalization of morality. In place of “sociology,” a theory of the forms of domination. In place of “society,” the culture complex, as my chief interest (as a whole or in its parts). In place of “epistemology,” a perspective theory of affects (to which belongs a hierarchy of the affects; the affects transfigured; their superior order, their “spirituality”). In place of “metaphysics” and religion, the theory of eternal recurrence (this as a means of breeding and selection). 463 (1885) My precursors: Schopenhauer; to what extent I deepened pessimism and by devising its extremest antithesis first really experienced it. Then: the ideal artists, that after-product of the Napoleonic movement. Then: the higher Europeans, predecessors of great politics. Then: the Greeks and their origins. 164 464 (1885) I have named those who were unknowingly my workers and precursors. But where may I look with any kind of hope for my kind of philosopher himself, at the least for my need of new philosophers? 165 In that direction alone where a noble mode of thought is dominant, such as believes in slavery and in many degrees of bondage as the precondition of every higher culture; where a creative mode of thought dominates that does not posit the happiness of repose, the “Sabbath of Sabbaths” as a goal for the world, and honors even in peace the means to new wars; 166 a mode of thought that prescribes laws for the future, that for the sake of the future is harsh and tyrannical towards itself and all things of the present; a reckless, “immoral” mode of thought, which wants to develop both the good and the bad qualities in man to their fullest extent, because it feels it has the strength to put both in their right place—in the place where each needs the other. But he who thus looks for philosophers today, what prospect has he of finding what he is looking for? Is it not likely that, even with the best Diogenes lantern, he will search about in vain all day and all night? The age possesses the reverse instincts; it wants, first and above all, comfort; it wants, in the second place, publicity and that great actors’ hubbub, that great drum banging that appeals to its unfair tastes; it wants, thirdly, that everyone should fall on his face in the profoundest subjection before the greatest of all lies—it is called “equality of men”—and honor exclusively those virtues that level and equalize. But the rise of the philosopher, as I understand him, is therewith rendered altogether impossible, notwithstanding that it is thought in all innocence to be favorable to him. Indeed, all the world bewails today the evil situation of the philosopher in earlier times, hemmed in between the stake, bad conscience, and the arrogant wisdom of the Church Fathers: the truth, however, is that precisely this was a much more favorable condition for the education of a powerful, comprehensive, cunning and audaciously daring spirituality than the conditions of life at present. Today, another kind of spirit, namely the spirit of the demagogue, the spirit of the actor, perhaps also the scholarly beaver- and ant-like spirit, finds conditions favorable. But things are so much the worse even for superior artists: for are they not, almost all of them, perishing from a lack of inner discipline? They are no longer tyrannized over from without by a church's tables of absolute values or those of a court; thus they also no longer learn to develop their "inner tyrants," their will. And what is true of artists is true in a higher and more fateful sense of philosophers. For where are there free spirits today? Show me a free spirit today!

465 (Summer-Fall 1888)

I understand by “freedom of spirit” something quite definite: being a hundred times superior to philosophers and other disciples of “truth” in severity towards oneself, in cleanliness and courage, in the unconditional will to say No where it is dangerous to say No—I treat previous philosophers as contemptible libertines hiding in the cloak of the woman “truth.” 122 “Scholar and scientist”: der wissenschaftliche Mensch. 129 “Of decay”: uncertain reading; MS illegible. I.
THE WILL TO POWER AS KNOWLEDGE

466 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

It is not the victory of science that distinguishes our nineteenth century, but the victory of scientific method over science.

467 (Spring-Fall 1887)

History of scientific method, considered by Auguste Comte as virtually philosophy itself.

468 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The great methodologists: Aristotle, Bacon, Descartes, Auguste Comte.

469 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The most valuable insights are arrived at last; but the most valuable insights are methods. All the methods, all the presuppositions of our contemporary science were for millennia regarded with the profoundest contempt; on their account one was excluded from the society of respectable people—one was considered as an “enemy of God,” as a reviler of the highest ideal, as “possessed.” We have had the whole pathos of mankind against us—our conception of what “truth” should be, what service of truth should be, our objectivity, our method, our silent, cautious, mistrustful ways were considered perfectly contemptible—At bottom, it has been an aesthetic taste that has hindered mankind most it believed in the picturesque effect of truth, it demanded of the man of knowledge that he should produce a powerful effect on the imagination. This looks as if an antithesis has been achieved, a leap made; in reality, the schooling through moral hyperbole prepared the way step by step for that milder of pathos that became incarnate in the scientific character—The conscientiousness in small things, the self-control of the religious man were a preparatory school for the scientific character: above all, the disposition that takes problems seriously, regardless of the personal consequences—470 (1885-1886) Profound aversion to reposing once and for all in any one total view of the world. Fascination of the opposing point of view: refusal to be deprived of the stimulus of the enigmatic. 471 (1885-1886) The presupposition that things are, at bottom, ordered so morally that human reason must be justified—is an ingenuous presupposition and a piece of naiveté, the after-effect of belief in God’s veracity—God understood as the creator of things.—These concepts an inheritance from a former existence in a beyond——472 (1883-1888) Contradiction of the alleged “facts of consciousness.” Observation is a thousand times more difficult, error perhaps a condition of observation in general. 473 (1886-1887) The intellect cannot criticize itself, simply because it cannot be compared with other species of intellect and because its capacity to know would be revealed only in the presence of “true reality,” i.e., because in order to criticize the intellect we should have to be a higher being with “absolute knowledge.” This presupposes that, distinct from every perspective kind of outlook or sensual-spiritual appropriation, something exists, an “in-itself.”—But the psychological derivation of the belief in things forbids us to speak of “things-in-themselves.”

474 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

That a sort of adequate relationship subsists between subject and object, that the object is something that if seen from within would be a subject, is a well-meant invention which, I think, has had its day. The measure of that of which we are in any way conscious is totally dependent upon the coarse utility of its becoming-conscious: how could this nook-perspective of consciousness permit us to assert anything of “subject” and “object” that touched reality!— 475 (1885-1886)

Critique of modern philosophy: erroneous starting point, as if there existed “facts of consciousness”—and no phenomenalism in introspection. 476 (1884)

“Consciousness”—to what extent the idea of an idea, the idea of will, the idea of a feeling (known to ourselves alone) are totally superficial! Our inner world, too, “appearance”!

477 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

I maintain the phenomenality of the inner world, too: everything of which we become conscious is arranged, simplified, schematized, interpreted through and through—the actual process of inner “perception,” the causal connection between thoughts, feelings, desires, between subject and object, are absolutely hidden from us—and are perhaps purely imaginary. The “apparent inner world” is governed by just the same forms and procedures as the “outer” world. We never encounter “facts”: pleasure and displeasure are subsequent and derivative intellectual phenomena— “Causality” eludes us; to suppose a direct causal link between thoughts, as logic does—that is the consequence of the crudest and clumsiest observation. Between two thoughts all kinds of affects play their game: but their motions are too fast, therefore we fail to recognize them, we deny them — “Thinking,” as epistemologists conceive it, simply does not occur: it is a quite arbitrary fiction, arrived at by selecting one element from the process and eliminating all the rest, an artificial arrangement for the purpose of intelligibility — The “spirit,” something that thinks: where possible even “absolute, pure spirit”—this conception is a second derivative of that false introspection which believes in “thinking”: first an act is imagined which simply does not occur, “thinking,” and secondly a subject-substratum in which every act of thinking, and nothing else, has its origin: that is to say, both the deed and the doer are fictions.

478 (March-June 1888)

One must not look for phenomenalism in the wrong place: nothing is more phenomenal (or, more clearly:) nothing is so much deception as this inner world which we observe with the famous “inner sense.” We have believed in the will as cause to such an extent that we have from our personal experience introduced a cause into events in general (i.e., intention a cause of events—). We believe that thoughts as they succeed one another in our minds stand in some kind of causal relation: the logician especially, who actually speaks of nothing but instances which never occur in reality, has grown accustomed to the prejudice that thoughts cause thoughts—. We believe—and even our philosophers still believe—that pleasure and pain are causes of reactions, that the purpose of pleasure and pain is to occasion reactions. For millennia, pleasure and the avoidance of displeasure have been flatly asserted as the motives for every action. Upon reflection, however, we should concede that everything would have taken the same course, according to exactly the same sequence of causes and effects, if these states “pleasure and displeasure” had been absent, and that one is simply deceiving oneself if one thinks they cause anything at all: they are epiphenomena with a quite different object than to evoke reactions; they are themselves effects within the instituted process of reaction. In summa. everything of which we become conscious is a terminal phenomenon, an end—and causes nothing; every successive phenomenon in consciousness is completely atomistic— And we have sought to understand the world through the reverse conception—as if nothing were real and effective but thinking, feeling, willing!—

479 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The phenomenism of the “inner world.” Chronological inversion, so that the cause enters consciousness later than the effect.— We have learned that pain is projected to a part of the body without being situated there—we have learned that sense impressions naively supposed to be conditioned by the outer world are, on the contrary, conditioned by the inner world; that we are always unconscious of the real activity of the outer world— The fragment of outer world of which we are conscious is born after an effect from outside has impressed itself upon us, and is subsequently projected as its “cause”— In the phenomenism of the “inner world” we invert the chronological order of cause and effect. The fundamental fact of “inner experience” is that the cause is imagined after the effect has taken place— The same applies to the succession of thoughts:—we seek the reason for a thought before we are conscious of it; and the reason enters consciousness first, and then its consequence— Our entire dream life is the interpretation of complex feelings with a view to possible causes—and in such way that we are conscious of a condition only when the supposed causal chain associated with it has entered consciousness. The whole of “inner experience” rests upon the fact that a cause for an excitement of the nerve centers is sought and imagined—and that only a cause thus discovered enters consciousness: this cause in no way corresponds to the real cause—it is a groping on the basis of previous “inner experiences,” i.e., of memory. But memory also maintains the habit of the old interpretations, i.e., of erroneous causality—so that the “inner experience” has to contain within it the consequences of all previous false causal fictions. Our “outer world” as we project it every moment is indissolubly tied to the old error of the ground: we interpret it by means of the schematism of “things,” etc. “Inner experience” enters our consciousness only after it has found a language the individual understands—i.e., a translation of a condition into conditions familiar to him—; “to understand” means merely: to be able to express something new in the language of something old and familiar. E.g., “I feel unwell”—such a judgment presupposes a great and late neutrality of the observer—; the simple man always says: this or that makes me feel unwell—he makes up his mind about his feeling unwell only when he has seen a reason for feeling unwell.— I call that a lack of philology; to be able to read off a text as a text without interposing an interpretation is the last-developed form of “inner experience”— perhaps one that is hardly possible—

480 (March-June 1888)

There exists neither “spirit,” nor reason, nor thinking, nor consciousness, nor soul, nor will, nor truth: all are fictions that are of no use. There is no question of “subject and object,” but of a particular species of animal that can prosper only through a certain relative rightness; above all, regularity of its perceptions (so that it can accumulate experience)— Knowledge works as a tool of power. Hence it is plain that it increases with every increase of power— The meaning of “knowledge”: here, as in the case of “good” or “beautiful,” the concept is to be regarded in a strict and narrow anthropocentric and biological sense. In order for a particular species to maintain itself and increase its power, its conception of reality must comprehend enough of the calculable and constant for it to base a scheme of behavior on it. The utility of preservation—not some abstract-theoretical need not to be deceived—stands as the motive behind the development of the organs of knowledge—they develop in such a way that their observations suffice for our preservation. In other words: the measure of the desire for knowledge depends upon the measure to which the will to power grows in a species: a species grasps a certain amount of reality in order to become master of it, in order to press it into service. 481 (1883-1888) Against positivism, which halts at phenomena—“There are only facts”—I would say: No, facts is precisely what there is not, only interpretations. We cannot establish any fact “in itself”: perhaps it is folly to want to do such a thing. “Everything is subjective,” you say; but even this is interpretation. The “subject” is not something given, it is something added and invented and projected behind what there is.— Finally, is it necessary to posit an interpreter behind the interpretation? Even this is invention, hypothesis. In so far as the word “knowledge” has any meaning, the world is knowable; but it is interpretable otherwise, it has no meaning behind it, but countless meanings.— “Perspectivism.” It is our needs that interpret the world; our drives and their For and Against. Every drive is a kind of lust to rule; each one has its perspective that it would like to compel all the other drives to accept as a norm. 482 (1886-1887) We set up a word at the point at which our ignorance begins, at which we can see no further, e.g., the word “I,” the word “do,” the word “suffer”:—these are perhaps the horizon of our knowledge, but not “truths.” 483 (1885) Through thought the ego is posited; but hitherto one believed as ordinary people do, that in “I think” there was something of immediate certainty, and that this “I” was the given cause of thought, from which by analogy we understood all other causal relationships. However habitual and indispensable this fiction may have become by now—that in itself proves nothing against its imaginary origin: a belief can be a condition of life and nonetheless be false.²

484 (Spring-Fall 1887)

“There is thinking: therefore there is something that thinks”: this is the upshot of all Descartes’ argumentation. But that means positing as “true a priori” our belief in the concept of substance— that when there is thought there has to be something “that thinks” is simply a formulation of our grammatical custom that adds a doer to every deed. In short, this is not merely the substantiation of a fact but a logical-metaphysical postulate— Along the lines followed by Descartes one does not come upon something absolutely certain but only upon the fact of a very strong belief. If one reduces the proposition to “There is thinking, therefore there are thoughts,” one has produced a mere tautology: and precisely that which is in question, the “reality of thought,” is not touched upon—that is, in this form the “apparent reality” of thought cannot be denied. But what Descartes desired was that thought should have, not an apparent reality, but a reality in itself.

485 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The concept of substance is a consequence of the concept of the subject: not the reverse! If we relinquish the soul, “the subject,” the precondition for “substance” in general disappears. One acquires degrees of being, one loses that which has being. Critique of “reality”: where does the “more or less real,” the gradation of being in which we believe, lead to?— The degree to which we feel life and power (logic and coherence of experience) gives us our measure of “being,” “reality,” not-appearance. The subject: this is the term for our belief in a unity underlying all the different impulses of the highest feeling of reality: we understand this belief as the effect of one cause—we believe so firmly in our belief that for its sake we imagine “truth,” “reality,” “substantiality” in general. — “The subject” is the fiction that many similar states in us are the effect of one substratum: but it is we who first created the “similarity” of these states; our adjusting them and making them similar is the fact, not their similarity (—which ought rather to be denied—). 486 (1885-1886) One would have to know what being is, in order to decide whether this or that is real (e.g., “the facts of consciousness”); in the same way, what certainty is, what knowledge is, and the like.— But since we do not know this, a critique of the faculty of knowledge is senseless: how should a tool be able to criticize itself when it can use only itself for the critique? It cannot even define itself! 3 487 (1883-1886) Must all philosophy not ultimately bring to light the preconditions upon which the process of reason depends?—our belief in the “ego” as a substance, as the sole reality from which we ascribe reality to things in general? The oldest “realism” at last comes to light: at the same time that the entire religious history of mankind is recognized as the history of the soul superstition. Here we come to a limit: our thinking itself involves this belief (with its distinction of substance, accident; deed, doer, etc.); to let it go means: being no longer able to think. But that a belief, however necessary it may be for the preservation of a species, has nothing to do with truth, one knows from the fact that, e.g., we have to believe in time, space, and motion, without feeling compelled to grant them absolute reality.

488 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Psychological derivation of our belief in reason.— The concept “reality,” “being,” is taken from our feeling of the “subject.” “The subject”: interpreted from within ourselves, so that the ego counts as a substance, as the cause of all deeds, as a doer. The logical-metaphysical postulates, the belief in substance, accident, attribute, etc., derive their convincing force from our habit of regarding all our deeds as consequences of our will—so that the ego, as substance, does not vanish in the multiplicity of change.— But there is no such thing as will.— We have no categories at all that permit us to distinguish a “world in itself” from a “world of appearance.” All our categories of reason are of sensual origin: derived from the empirical world. “The soul,” “the ego”—the history of these concepts shows that here, too, the oldest distinction (“breath,” “life”)— If there is nothing material, there is also nothing immaterial. The concept no longer contains anything. No subject “atoms.” The sphere of a subject constantly growing or decreasing, the center of the system constantly shifting; in cases where it cannot organize the appropriate mass, it breaks into two parts. On the other hand, it can transform a weaker subject into its functionary without destroying it, and to a certain degree form a new unity with it. No “substance,” rather something that in itself strives after greater strength, and that wants to “preserve” itself only indirectly (it wants to surpass itself—). 489 (1886-1887) Everything that enters consciousness as “unity” is already tremendously complex: we always have only a semblance of unity. The phenomenon of the body is the richer, clearer, more tangible phenomenon: to be discussed first, methodologically, without coming to any decision about its ultimate significance. 490 (1885) The assumption of one single subject is perhaps unnecessary; perhaps it is just as permissible to assume a multiplicity of subjects, whose interaction and struggle is the basis of our thought and our consciousness in general? A kind of aristocracy of “cells” in which dominion resides? To be sure, an aristocracy of equals, used to ruling jointly and understanding how to command? My hypotheses: The subject as multiplicity. Pain intellectual and dependent upon the judgment “harmful”: projected. The effect always “unconscious”: the inferred and imagined cause is projected, follows in time. Pleasure is a kind of pain. The only force that exists is of the same kind as that of the will: a commanding of other subjects, which thereupon change. The continual transitoriness and fleetingness of the subject. “Mortal soul.” Number as perspective form. 491 (1885-1886) Belief in the body is more fundamental than belief in the soul: the latter arose from unscientific reflection on [the agonies of] the body (something that leaves it. Belief in the truth of dreams—). 492 (1885) The body and physiology the starting point: why? — We gain the correct idea of the nature of our subject-unity, namely as regents at the head of a communality (not as “souls” or “life forces”), also of the dependence of these regents upon the ruled and of an order of rank and division of labor as the conditions that make possible the whole and its parts. In the same way, how living unities continually arise and die and how the “subject” is not eternal; in the same way, that the struggle expresses itself in obeying and commanding, and that a fluctuating assessment of the limits of power is part of life. The relative ignorance in which the regent is kept concerning individual activities and even disturbances within the communality is among the conditions under which rule can be exercised. In short, we also gain a valuation of not-knowing, of seeing things on a broad scale, of simplification and falsification, of perspectivity. The most important thing, however, is: that we understand that the ruler and his subjects are of the same kind, all feeling, willing, thinking—and that, wherever we see or divine movement in a body, we learn to conclude that there is a subjective, invisible life appertaining to it. Movement is symbolism for the eye; it indicates that something has been felt, willed, thought. The danger of the direct questioning of the subject about the subject and of all self-reflection of the spirit lies in this, that it could be useful and important for one’s activity to interpret oneself falsely. That is why we question the body and reject the evidence of the sharpened senses: we try, if you like, to see whether the inferior parts themselves cannot enter into communication with us. 493 (1885) Truth is the kind of error without which a certain species of life could not live. The value for life is ultimately decisive.⁵ 494 (1885) It is improbable that our “knowledge” should extend further than is strictly necessary for the preservation of life. Morphology shows us how the senses and the nerves, as well as the brain, develop in proportion to the difficulty of finding nourishment. Likewise our love of the beautiful: it also is our shaping will. The two senses stand side-by-side; the sense for the real is the means of acquiring the power to shape things according to our wish. The joy in shaping and reshaping—a primeval joy! We can comprehend only a world that we ourselves have made. 496 (1884) Of the multifariousness of knowledge. To trace one’s own relationship to many other things (or the relationship of kind)—how should that be “knowledge” of other things! The way of knowing and of knowledge is itself already part of the conditions of existence: so that the conclusion that there could be no other kind of intellect (for us) than that which preserves us is precipitate: this actual condition of existence is perhaps only accidental and perhaps in no way necessary. Our apparatus for acquiring knowledge is not designed for “knowledge.” 497 (1884) The most strongly believed a priori “truths” are for me—provisional assumptions; e.g., the law of causality, a very well acquired habit of belief, so much a part of us that not to believe in it would destroy the race. But are they for that reason truths? What a conclusion! As if the preservation of man were a proof of truth! 498 (1884) To what extent even our intellect is a consequence of conditions of existence—: we would not have it if we did not need to have it, and we would not have it as it is if we did not need to have it as it is, if we could live otherwise. 499 (1885) "Thinking" in primitive conditions (pre-organic) is the crystallization of forms, as in the case of crystal.— In our thought, the essential feature is fitting new material into old schemas (= Procrustes' bed), making equal what is new. 500 (1885-1886) Sense perceptions projected "outside": "inside" and "outside"—does the body command here—? The same equalizing and ordering force that rules in the idioplasma, rules also in the incorporation of the outer world: our sense perceptions are already the result of this assimilation and equalization in regard to all the past in us; they do not follow directly upon the "impression"— 501 (1886-1887) All thought, judgment, perception, considered as comparison, has as its precondition a "positing of equality," and earlier still a "making equal." The process of making equal is the same as the process of incorporation of appropriated material in the amoeba. "Memory" late, in so far as here the drive to make equal seems already to have been subdued: differentiation is preserved. Remembering as a process of classification and pigeonholing: who is active? 502 (1885) One must revise one's ideas about memory: here lies the chief temptation to assume a "soul," which, outside time, reproduces, recognizes, etc. But that which is experienced lives on "in the memory"; I cannot help it if it "comes back," the will is inactive in this case, as in the coming of any thought. Something happens of which I become conscious: now something similar comes—who called it? roused it? 503 (1884) The entire apparatus of knowledge is an apparatus for abstraction and simplification—directed not at knowledge but at taking possession of things: "end" and "means" are as remote from its essential nature as are "concepts." With "end" and "means" one takes possession of the process (one invents a process that can be grasped); with "concepts," however, of the "things" that constitute the process. 504 (1883-1888) Consciousness—beginning quite externally, as coordination and becoming conscious of "impressions"—at first at the furthest distance from the biological center of the individual; but a process that deepens and intensifies itself, and continually draws nearer to that center. 505 (1885-1886) Our perceptions, as we understand them: i.e., the sum of all those perceptions the becoming-conscious of which was useful and essential to us and to the entire organic process—therefore not all perceptions in general (e.g., not the electric); this means: we have senses for only a selection of perceptions—those with which we have to concern ourselves in order to preserve ourselves. Consciousness is present only to the extent that consciousness is useful. It cannot be doubted that all sense perceptions are permeated with value judgments (useful and harmful—consequently, pleasant or unpleasant). Each individual color is also for us an expression of value (although we seldom admit it, or do so only after a protracted impression of exclusively the same color; e.g., a prisoner in prison, or a lunatic). Thus insects also react differently to different colors: some like [this color, some that];⁷ e.g., ants. 506 (1884) First images—to explain how images arise in the spirit. Then words, applied to images. Finally concepts, possible only when there are words—the collecting together of many images in something nonvisible but audible (word). The tiny amount of emotion to which the “word” gives rise, as we contemplate similar images for which one word exists—this weak emotion is the common element, the basis of the concept. That weak sensations are regarded as alike, sensed as being the same, is the fundamental fact. Thus confusion of two sensations that are close neighbors, as we take note of these sensations; but who is taking note? Believing is the primal beginning even in every sense impression: a kind of affirmation the first intellectual activity! A “holding-true” in the beginning! Therefore it is to be explained: how “holding-true” arose! What sensation lies behind “true”?

507 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The valuation “I believe that this and that is so” as the essence of “truth.” In valuations are expressed conditions of preservation and growth. All our organs of knowledge and our senses are developed only with regard to conditions of preservation and growth. Trust in reason and its categories, in dialectic, therefore the valuation of logic, proves only their usefulness for life, proved by experience—not that something is true. That a great deal of belief must be present; that judgments may be ventured; that doubt concerning all essential values is lacking—that is the precondition of every living thing and its life. Therefore, what is needed is that something must be held to be true—not that something is true. “The real and the apparent world”—I have traced this antithesis back to value relations. We have projected the conditions of our preservation as predicates of being in general. Because we have to be stable in our beliefs if we are to prosper, we have made the “real” world a world not of change and becoming, but one of being. 508 (1883-1888) Originally a chaos of ideas. The ideas that were consistent with one another remained, the greater number perished—and are perishing. 509 (1883-1888) The earthly kingdom of desires out of which logic grew: the herd instinct in the background. The assumption of similar cases presupposes “similar souls.” For the purpose of mutual agreement and dominion. 510 (1883-1888) On the origin of logic. The fundamental inclination to posit as equal, to see things as equal, is modified, held in check, by consideration of usefulness and harmfulness, by considerations of success: it adapts itself to a milder degree in which it can be satisfied without at the same time denying and endangering life. This whole process corresponds exactly to that external, mechanical process (which is its symbol) by which protoplasm makes what it appropriates equal to itself and fits it into its own forms and files. 511 (1885-1886) Equality and similarity. The coarser organ sees much apparent equality; the spirit wants equality, i.e., to subsume a sense impression into an existing series: in the same way as the body assimilates inorganic matter. Toward an understanding of logic: the will to equality is the will to power—the belief that something is thus and thus (the essence of judgment) is the consequence of a will that as much as possible shall be equal. 512 (1885) Logic is bound to the condition: assume there are identical cases. In fact, to make possible logical thinking and inferences, this condition must first be treated fictitiously as fulfilled. That is: the will to logical truth can be carried through only after a fundamental falsification of all events is assumed. From which it follows that a drive rules here that is capable of employing both means, firstly falsification, then the implementation of its own point of view: logic does not spring from will to truth.

513 (Fall 1886)

The inventive force that invented categories labored in the service of our needs, namely of our need for security, for quick understanding on the basis of signs and sounds, for means of abbreviation:—"substance," "subject," "object," "being," "becoming" have nothing to do with metaphysical truths.— It is the powerful who made the names of things into law, and among the powerful it is the greatest artists in abstraction who created the categories.

514 (March-June 1888)

A morality, a mode of living tried and proved by long experience and testing, at length enters consciousness as a law, as dominating— And therewith the entire group of related values and states enters into it: it becomes venerable, unassailable, holy, true; it is part of its development that its origin should be forgotten— That is a sign it has become master— Exactly the same thing could have happened with the categories of reason: they could have prevailed, after much groping and fumbling, through their relative utility— There came a point when one collected them together, raised them to consciousness as a whole—and when one commanded them, i.e., when they had the effect of a command— From then on, they counted as a priori, as beyond experience, as irrefutable. And yet perhaps they represent nothing more than the expediency of a certain race and species—their utility alone is their “truth”—

515 (March-June 1888)

Not “to know” but to schematize—to impose upon chaos as much regularity and form as our practical needs require. In the formation of reason, logic, the categories, it was need that was authoritative: the need, not to “know,” but to subsume, to schematize, for the purpose of intelligibility and calculation— (The development of reason is adjustment, invention, with the aim of making similar, equal—the same process that every sense impression goes through!) No pre-existing “idea” was here at work, but the utilitarian fact that only when we see things coarsely and made equal do they become calculable and usable to us— Finality in reason is an effect, not a cause: life miscarries with any other kinds of reason, to which there is a continual impulse—it becomes difficult to survey— too unequal— The categories are “truths’ ” only in the sense that they are conditions of life for us: as Euclidean space is a conditional “truth.” (Between ourselves: since no one would maintain that there is any necessity for men to exist, reason, as well as Euclidean space, is a mere idiosyncrasy of a certain species of animal, and one among many—) The subjective compulsion not to contradict here is a biological compulsion: the instinct for the utility of inferring as we do infer is part of us, we almost are this instinct— But what naïveté to extract from this a proof that we are therewith in possession of a “truth in itself”! — Not being able to contradict is proof of an incapacity, not of “truth.”

516 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

We are unable to affirm and to deny one and the same thing: this is a subjective empirical law, not the expression of any “necessity” but only of an inability. If, according to Aristotle, the law of contradiction is the most certain of all principles, if it is the ultimate and most basic, upon which every demonstrative proof rests, if the principle of every axiom lies in it; then one should consider all the more rigorously what presuppositions already lie at the bottom of it. Either it asserts something about actuality, about being, as if one already knew this from another source; that is, as if opposite attributes could not be ascribed to it. Or the proposition means: opposite attributes should not be ascribed to it. In that case, logic would be an imperative, not to know the true, but to posit and arrange a world that shall be called true by us. In short, the question remains open: are the axioms of logic adequate to reality or are they a means and measure for us to create reality, the concept “reality,” for ourselves?—To affirm the former one would, as already said, have to have a previous knowledge of being—which is certainly not the case. The proposition therefore contains no criterion of truth, but an imperative concerning that which should count as true. Supposing there were no self-identical “A”, such as is presupposed by every proposition of logic (and of mathematics), and the “A” were already mere appearance, then logic would have a merely apparent world as its condition. In fact, we believe in this proposition under the influence of ceaseless experience which seems continually to confirm it. The “thing”—that is the real substratum of “A”; our belief in things is the precondition of our belief in logic. The “A” of logic is, like the atom, a reconstruction of the thing—If we do not grasp this, but make of logic a criterion of true being, we are on the way to positing as realities all those hypostases: substance, attribute, object, subject, action, etc.; that is, to conceiving a metaphysical world, that is, a “real world” (—this, however, is the apparent world once more—). The very first acts of thought, affirmation and denial, holding true and holding not true, are, in as much as they presuppose, not only the habit of holdings things true and holding them not true, but a right to do this, already dominated by the belief that we can gain possession of knowledge, that judgments really can hit upon the truth;—in short, logic does not doubt its ability to assert something about the true-in-itself (namely, that it cannot have opposite attributes). Here reigns the coarse sensualistic prejudice that sensations teach us truths about things—that I cannot say at the same time of one and the same thing that it is hard and that it is soft. (The instinctive proof “I cannot have two opposite sensations at the same time”—quite coarse and false.) The conceptual ban on contradiction proceeds from the belief that we are able to form concepts, that the concept not only designates the essence of a thing but comprehends it—In fact, logic (like geometry and arithmetic) applies only to fictitious entities that we have created. Logic is the attempt to comprehend the actual world by means of a scheme of being posited by ourselves; more correctly, to make it formulatable and calculable for us—

517 (Spring-Fall 1887)

In order to think and infer it is necessary to assume beings: logic handles only formulas for what remains the same. That is why this assumption would not be proof of reality: “beings” are part of our perspective. The “ego” as a being (—not affected by becoming and development). The fictitious world of subject, substance, “reason,” etc., is needed—: there is in us a power to order, simplify, falsify, artificially distinguish. “Truth” is the will to be master over the multiplicity of sensations:—to classify phenomena into definite categories. In this we start from a belief in the “in-itself” of things (we take phenomena as real). The character of the world in a state of becoming as incapable of formulation, as “false,” as “self-contradictory.” Knowledge and becoming exclude one another. Consequently, “knowledge” must be something else: there must first of all be a will to make knowable, a kind of becoming must itself create the deception of beings. 518 (1885-1886) If our “ego” is for us the sole being, after the model of which we fashion and understand all being: very well! Then there would be very much room to doubt whether what we have here is not a perspective illusion—an apparent unity that encloses everything like a horizon. The evidence of the body reveals a tremendous multiplicity; it is allowable, for purposes of method, to employ the more easily studied, richer phenomena as evidence for the understanding of the poorer. Finally: supposing everything is becoming, then knowledge is possible only on the basis of belief in being. 519 (1883-1888) If there “is only one being, the ego” and all other “being” is fashioned after its model—if, finally, belief in the “ego” stands or falls with belief in logic, i.e., the metaphysical truth of the categories of reason; if, on the other hand, the ego proves to be something in a state of becoming: then— 520 (1885) Continual transition forbids us to speak of “individuals,” etc; the “number” of beings is itself in flux. We would know nothing of time and motion if we did not, in a coarse fashion, believe we see what is at “rest” beside what is in motion. The same applies to cause and effect, and without the erroneous conception of “empty space” we should certainly not have acquired the conception of space. The principle of identity has behind it the “apparent fact” of things that are the same. A world in a state of becoming could not, in a strict sense, be “comprehended” or “known”; only to the extent that the “comprehending” and “knowing” intellect encounters a coarse, already-created world, fabricated out of mere appearances but become firm to the extent that this kind of appearance has preserved life—only to this extent is there anything like “knowledge”; i.e., a measuring of earlier and later errors by one another.

521 (Spring-Fall 1887)

On “logical semblance”—The concepts “individual” and “species” equally false and merely apparent. “Species” expresses only the fact that an abundance of similar creatures appear at the same time and that the tempo of their further growth and change is for a long time slowed down, so actual small continuations and increases are not very much noticed (—a phase of evolution in which the evolution is not visible, so an equilibrium seems to have been attained, making possible the false notion that a goal has been attained—and that evolution has a goal—). The form counts as something enduring and therefore more valuable; but the form has merely been invented by us; and however often “the same form is attained,” it does not mean that it is the same form—what appears is always something new, and it is only we, who are always comparing, who include the new, to the extent that it is similar to the old, in the unity of the “form.” As if a type should be attained and, as it were, was intended by and inherent in the process of formation. Form, species, law, idea, purpose—in all these cases the same error is made of giving a false reality to a fiction, as if events were in some way obedient to something—an artificial distinction is made in respect of events between that which acts and that toward which the act is directed (but this “which” and this “toward” are only posited in obedience to our metaphysical-logical dogmatism: they are not “facts”). One should not understand this compulsion to construct concepts, species, forms, purposes, laws (“a world of identical cases”) as if they enabled us to fix the real world; but as a compulsion to arrange a world for ourselves in which our existence is made possible:—we thereby create a world which is calculable, simplified, comprehensible, etc., for us. This same compulsion exists in the sense activities that support reason—by simplification, coarsening, emphasizing, and elaborating, upon which all “recognition,” all ability to make oneself intelligible rests. Our needs have made our senses so precise that the “same apparent world” always reappears and has thus acquired the semblance of reality. Our subjective compulsion to believe in logic only reveals that, long before logic itself entered our consciousness, we did nothing but introduce its postulates into events: now we discover them in events—we can no longer do otherwise—and imagine that this compulsion guarantees something connected with “truth.” It is we who created the “thing,” the “identical thing,” subject, attribute, activity, object, substance, form, after we had long pursued the process of making identical, coarse and simple. The world seems logical to us because we have made it logical. 522 (1886-1887) Ultimate solution.—We believe in reason: this, however, is the philosophy of gray concepts. Language depends on the most naive prejudices. Now we read disharmonies and problems into things because we think only in the form of language—and thus believe in the “eternal truth” of “reason” (e.g., subject, attribute, etc.) We cease to think when we refuse to do so under the constraint of language; we barely reach the doubt that sees this limitation as a limitation. Rational thought is interpretation according to a scheme that we cannot throw off.

523 (March-June 1888)

Nothing is more erroneous than to make of psychical and physical phenomena the two faces, the two revelations of one and the same substance. Nothing is explained thereby: the concept “substance” is perfectly useless as an explanation. Consciousness in a subsidiary role, almost indifferent, superfluous, perhaps destined to vanish and give way to a perfect automatism— When we observe only the inner phenomena we may be compared with the deaf-and-dumb, who divine through movements of the lips the words they do not hear. From the phenomena of the inner sense we conclude the existence of invisible and other phenomena that we would apprehend if our means of observation were adequate and that one calls the nerve current. We lack any sensitive organs for this inner world, so we sense a thousandfold complexity as a unity; so we introduce causation where any reason for motion and change remains invisible to us—the sequence of thoughts and feelings is only their becoming-visible in consciousness. That this sequence has anything to do with a causal chain is completely unbelievable: consciousness has never furnished us with an example of cause and effect.

524 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The role of “consciousness.”— It is essential that one should not make a mistake over the role of “consciousness”: it is our relation with the “outer world” that evolved it. On the other hand, the direction or protection and care in respect of the co-ordination of the bodily functions does not enter our consciousness; any more than spiritual accumulation: that a higher court rules over these things cannot be doubted—a kind of directing committee on which the various chief desires make their votes and power felt. “Pleasure,” “displeasure” are hints from this sphere; also the act of will; also ideas. In summa: That which becomes conscious is involved in causal relations which are entirely withheld from us—the sequence of thoughts, feelings, ideas in consciousness does not signify that this sequence is a causal sequence; but apparently it is so, to the highest degree. Upon this appearance we have founded our whole idea of spirit, reason, logic, etc. (—none of these exist: they are fictitious syntheses and unities), and projected these into things and behind things! Usually, one takes consciousness itself as the general sensorium and supreme court; nonetheless, it is only a means of communication: it is evolved through social intercourse and with a view to the interests of social intercourse— “Intercourse” here understood to include the influences of the outer world and the reactions they compel on our side; also our effect upon the outer world. It is not the directing agent, but an organ of the directing agent. 525 (1888) My proposition compressed into a formula that smells of antiquity, Christianity, scholasticism, and other muskiness: in the concept “God as spirit,” God as perfection is negated—

526 (March-June 1888)

Where a certain unity obtains in the grouping of things, one has always posited spirit as the cause of this coordination: for which notion there is no ground whatever. Why should the idea of a complex fact be one of the conditions of this fact? or why should the notion of a complex fact have to precede it as its cause? — We shall be on our guard against explaining purposiveness in terms of spirit: there is no ground whatever for ascribing to spirit the properties of organization and systematization. The nervous system has a much more extensive domain; the world of consciousness is added to it. Consciousness plays no role in the total process of adaptation and systematization. 527 (1886-1887) Physiologists, like philosophers, believe that consciousness increases in value in proportion as it increases in clarity: the clearest consciousness, the most logical and coldest thinking, is supposed to be of the first rank. However—by what measure is this value determined?— In regard to release of will, the most superficial, most simplified thinking is the most useful—it could therefore—etc. (because it leaves few motives over). Precision in action is antagonistic to far-seeing providentiality, the judgments of which are often uncertain: the latter is led by the deeper instinct. 528 (1886-1887) Principal error of psychologists: they regard the indistinct idea as a lower kind of idea than the distinct: but that which removes itself from our consciousness and for that reason becomes obscure can on that account be perfectly clear in itself. Becoming obscure is a matter of perspective of consciousness.

529 (March-June 1888)

Tremendous blunders: the absurd overestimation of consciousness, the transformation of it into a unity, an entity: “spirit,” “soul,” something that feels, thinks, wills— spirit as cause, especially wherever purposiveness, system, coordination appear; consciousness as the highest achievable form, as the supreme kind of being, as “God”; will introduced wherever there are effects; the “real world” as a spiritual world, as accessible through the facts of consciousness; knowledge as uniquely the faculty of consciousness wherever there is knowledge at all. Consequences: every advance lies in an advance in becoming conscious; every regression in becoming unconscious; (—becoming unconscious was considered a falling back to the desires and senses—as becoming animal—) one approaches reality, “real being,” through dialectic; one distances oneself from it through the instincts, senses, mechanism— to resolve man into spirit would mean to make him into God: spirit, will, goodness—all one; all good must proceed from spirituality, must be a fact of consciousness; any advance toward the better can only be an advance in becoming conscious. 530 (1883-1888) In the case of Kant, theological prejudice, his unconscious dogmatism, his moralistic perspective, were dominant, directing, commanding. The proton pseudos:10 how is the fact of knowledge possible? is knowledge a fact at all? what is knowledge? If we do not know what knowledge is, we cannot possibly answer the question whether there is knowledge.— Very well! But if I do not already “know” whether there is knowledge, whether there can be knowledge, I cannot reasonably put the question “what is knowledge?” Kant believes in the fact of knowledge: what he wants is a piece of naïveté: knowledge of knowledge! “Knowledge is judgment!” But judgment is a belief that something is thus and thus! And not knowledge! “All knowledge consists of synthetic judgments” of universal validity (the case is thus and not otherwise in every case), of necessary validity (the opposite of the assertion can never occur). The legitimacy of belief in knowledge is always presupposed: just as the legitimacy of the feelings of conscience-judgments is presupposed. Here moral ontology is the dominant prejudice. The conclusion is therefore: there are assertions that we consider universally valid and necessary; necessity and universal validity cannot be derived from experience; consequently they must be founded, not upon experience, but upon something else, and derive from another source of knowledge! (Kant infers (1) there are assertions which are valid only under a certain condition; (2) this condition is that they derive, not from experience, but from pure reason.) Therefore: the question is, whence do we derive our reasons for believing in the truth of such assertions? No, how our belief is caused! But the origin of a belief, of a strong conviction, is a psychological problem: and a very narrow and limited experience often produces such a belief! It already presupposes that there is not “data a posteriori” but also data a priori, “preceding experience.” Necessity and universal validity could never be given to us by experience: why does that mean that they are present without any experience at all? There are no isolated judgments! An isolated judgment is never “true,” never knowledge; only in the connection and relation of many judgments is there any surety. What distinguishes the true from the false belief? What is knowledge? He “knows” it, that is heavenly! Necessity and universality can never be given by experience! Thus they are independent of experience, prior to all experience! That insight that occurs a priori, therefore independently of all experience, out of sheer reason, is “a pure form of knowledge”! “The basic laws of logic, the law of identity and the law of contradiction, are forms of pure knowledge, because they precede all experience.”— But these are not forms of knowledge at all! they are regulative articles of belief. To establish the a priori character (the pure rationality) of the judgments of mathematics, space must be conceived as a form of pure reason. Hume had declared: “There are no synthetic a priori judgments.” Kant says: But there are! Those of mathematics! And if there are such judgments, perhaps there is also metaphysics, a knowledge of things by pure reason! Mathematics is possible under conditions under which metaphysics is never possible. All human knowledge is either experience or mathematics. A judgment is synthetic; i.e., it connects different ideas. It is a priori; i.e., every connection is a universally valid and necessary one, which can never be given by sense perception but only through pure reason. If there are to be synthetic a priori judgments, then reason must be in a position to make connections: connection is a form. Reason must possess the capacity of giving form. 531 (1885-1886) Judgment is our oldest belief, our most habitual holding-true or holding-untrue, an assertion or denial, a certainty that something is thus and not otherwise, a belief that here we really “know”— what is it that is believed true in all judgments? What are attributes?— We have not regarded change in us as change but as an “in itself” that is foreign to us, that we merely “perceive”: and we have posited it, not as an event, but as a being, as a “quality”—and in addition invented an entity to which it adheres; i.e., we have regarded the effect as something that effects, and this we have regarded as a being. But even in this formulation, the concept “effect” is arbitrary: for those changes that take place in us, and that we firmly believe we have not ourselves caused, we merely infer to be effects, in accordance with the conclusion: “every change must have an author”;—but this conclusion is already mythology: it separates that which effects from the effecting. If I say “lightning flashes,” I have posited the flash once as an activity and a second time as a subject, and thus added to the event a being that is not one with the event but is rather fixed, is, and does not “become.”— To regard an event as an “effecting,” and this as being, that is the double error, or interpretation, of which we are guilty. 532 (1885) Judgment—this is the belief: “This and that are so.” Thus there is in every judgment the avowal of having encountered an “identical case”: it therefore presupposes comparison with the aid of memory. The judgment does not produce the appearance of an identical case. Rather it believes it perceives one: it works under the presupposition that identical cases exist. Now, what is that function that must be much older and must have been at work much earlier, that makes cases identical and similar which are in themselves dissimilar? What is that second function, which on the basis of the first, etc. “Whatever arouses the same sensation is the same”: but what is it that makes sensations the same, “accepts” them as the same? There could be no judgments at all if a kind of equalization were not practiced within sensations: memory is possible only with a continual emphasizing of what is already familiar, experienced.— Before judgment occurs, the process of assimilation must already have taken place; thus here, too, there is an intellectual activity that does not enter consciousness, as pain does as a consequence of a wound. Probably an inner event corresponds to each organic function; hence assimilation, rejection, growth, etc. Essential: to start from the body and employ it as guide. It is the much richer phenomenon, which allows of clearer observation. Belief in the body is better established than belief in the spirit. “No matter how strongly a thing may be believed, strength of belief is no criterion of truth.” But what is truth? Perhaps a kind of belief that has become a condition of life? In that case, to be sure, strength could be a criterion; e.g., in regard to causality.

533 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Logical certainty, transparency, as criterion of truth (“omne illud verum est, quod clare et distincte percipitur.”¹¹—Descartes) : with that, the mechanical hypothesis concerning the world is desired and credible. But this is a crude confusion: like simplex sigillum veri.¹² How does one know that the real nature of things stands in this relation to our intellect?— Could it not be otherwise? that it is the hypothesis that gives the intellect the greatest feeling of power and security, that is most preferred, valued and consequently characterized as true?— The intellect posits its freest and strongest capacity and capability as criterion of the most valuable, consequently of the true— “True”: from the standpoint of feeling—: that which excites the feeling most strongly (“ego”); from the standpoint of thought—: that which gives thought the greatest feeling of strength; from the standpoint of touch, seeing, hearing—: that which calls for the greatest resistance. Thus it is the highest degrees of performance that awaken belief in the “truth,” that is to say reality, of the object. The feeling of strength, of struggle, of resistance convinces us that there is something that is here being resisted. 534 (1887-1888) The criterion of truth resides in the enhancement of the feeling of power. 535 (1885)¹³ “Truth”: this, according to my way of thinking, does not necessarily denote the antithesis of error, but in the most fundamental cases only the posture of various errors in relation to one another. Perhaps one is older, more profound than another, even ineradicable, in so far as an organic entity of our species could not live without it; while other errors do not tyrannize over us in this way as conditions of life, but on the contrary when compared with such “tyrants” can be set aside and “refuted.” An assumption that is irrefutable—why should it for that reason be “true”? This proposition may perhaps outrage logicians, who posit their limitations as the limitations of things: but I long ago declared war on this optimism of logicians.

536 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Everything simple is merely imaginary, is not “true.” But whatever is real, whatever is true, is neither one nor even, reducible to one. 537 (1885-1888) What is truth?—Inertia; that hypothesis which gives rise to contentment; smallest expenditure of spiritual force, etc. 538 (1883-1888) First proposition. The easier mode of thought conquers the harder mode;—as dogma: simplex sigillum veri.—Dico:14 to suppose that clarity proves anything about truth is perfect childishness — Second proposition. The doctrine of being, of things, of all sorts of fixed unities is a hundred times easier than the doctrine of becoming, of development — Third proposition. Logic was intended as facilitation; as a means of expression—not as truth— Later it acquired the effect of truth—

539 (March-June 1888)

Parmenides said, “one cannot think of what is not”;—we are at the other extreme, and say “what can be thought of must certainly be a fiction.”¹⁵ 540 (1885) There are many kinds of eyes. Even the sphinx has eyes— and consequently there are many kinds of “truths,” and consequently there is no truth.

541 (March-June 1888)

Inscriptions for the Door of a Modern Madhouse “What is thought necessarily is morally necessary.” Herbert Spencer. “The ultimate test of the truth of a proposition is the inconceivability of its negation.” Herbert Spencer.¹⁶

542 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

If the character of existence should be false—which would be possible—what would truth, all our truth, be then?—An unconscionable falsification of the false? The false raised to a higher power?—

543 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

In a world that is essentially false, truthfulness would be an antinatural tendency: such a tendency could have meaning only as a means to a higher power of falsehood. In order for a world of the true, of being, to be invented, the truthful man would first have to be created (including the fact that such a man believes himself “truthful”). Simple, transparent, not in contradiction with himself, durable, remaining always the same, without wrinkle, volt, concealment, form: a man of this kind conceives a world of being as “God” in his own image. For truthfulness to be possible, the whole sphere of man must be very clean, small and, respectable; advantage in every sense must be with the truthful man.— Lies, deception, dissimulation must arouse astonishment— 544 (1885-1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888) Increase in “dissimulation” proportionate to the rising order of rank of creatures. It seems to be lacking in the inorganic world— power against power, quite crudely—cunning begins in the organic world; plants are already masters of it. The highest human beings, such as Caesar, Napoleon (Stendhal’s remark on him),¹⁷ also the higher races (Italians), the Greeks (Odysseus); a thousandfold craftiness belongs to the essence of the enhancement of man— Problem of the actor. My Dionysus ideal— The perspective of all organic functions, all the strongest instincts of life: the force in all life that wills error; error as the precondition even of thought. Before there is “thought” there must have been “invention”;¹⁸ the construction of identical cases, of the appearance of sameness, is more primitive than the knowledge of sameness. 545 (1885) I believe in absolute space as the substratum of force: the latter limits and forms. Time eternal. But space and time do not exist in themselves. “Changes” are only appearances (or sense processes for us); if we posit the recurrence of these, however regular, nothing is established thereby except this simple fact, that it has always happened thus. The feeling that post hoc is propter hoc can easily be shown to be a misunderstanding; it is comprehensible. But appearances cannot be “causes”! 546 (1885-1886) The interpretation of an event as either an act or the suffering of an act (—thus every act a suffering) says: every change, every becoming-other, presupposes an author and someone upon whom “change” is effected. 547 (1885-1886) Psychological history of the concept “subject.” The body, the thing, the “whole” construed by the eye, awaken the distinction between a deed and a doer; the doer, the cause of the deed, conceived ever more subtly, finally left behind the “subject.” 548 (1885-1886) Our bad habit of taking a mnemonic, an abbreviative formula, to be an entity, finally as a cause, e.g., to say of lightning “it flashes.” Or the little word “I.” To make a kind of perspective in seeing the cause of seeing: that was what happened in the invention of the “subject,” the “I”! 549 (1885) “Subject,” “object,” “attribute”—these distinctions are fabricated and are now imposed as a schematism upon all the apparent facts.

The fundamental false observation is that I believe it is I who do something, suffer something, “have” something, “have” a quality. 550 (1885-1886) In every judgment there resides the entire, full, profound belief in subject and attribute, or in cause and effect (that is, as the assertion that every effect is an activity and that every activity presupposes an agent); and this latter belief is only a special case of the former, so there remains as the fundamental belief the belief that there are subjects, that everything that happens is related attributively to some subject.¹⁹ I notice something and seek a reason for it; this means originally: I seek an intention in it, and above all someone who has intentions, a subject, a doer: every event a deed—formerly one saw intentions in all events, this is our oldest habit. Do animals also possess it? As living beings, must they not also rely on interpretations based on themselves?— The question “why?” is always a question after the causa finalis,²⁰ after the “what for?” We have no “sense for the causa efficiens”:²¹ here Hume was right; habit (but not only that of the individual!) makes us expect that a certain often-observed occurrence will follow another: nothing more! That which gives the extraordinary firmness to our belief in causality is not the great habit of seeing one occurrence following another but our inability to interpret events otherwise than as events caused by intentions. It is belief in the living and thinking as the only effective force—in will, in intention—it is belief that every event is a deed, that every deed presupposes a doer, it is belief in the “subject.” Is this belief in the concept of subject and attribute not a great stupidity? Question: is intention the cause of an event? Or is that also illusion? Is it not the event itself?

551 (March-June 1888)

Critique of the concept “cause.”²²— We have absolutely no experience of a cause; psychologically considered, we derive the entire concept from the subjective conviction that we are causes, namely, that the arm moves— But that is an error. We separate ourselves, the doers, from the deed, and we make use of this pattern everywhere—we seek a doer for every event. What is it we have done? We have misunderstood the feeling of strength, tension, resistance, a muscular feeling that is already the beginning of the act, as the cause, or we have taken the will to do this or that for a cause because the action follows upon it— cause, i.e.,— There is no such thing as “cause”; some cases in which it seemed to be given us, and in which we have projected it out of ourselves in order to understand an event, have been shown to be self-deceptions. Our “understanding of an event” has consisted in our inventing a subject which was made responsible for something that happens and for how it happens. We have combined our feeling of will, our feeling of “freedom,” our feeling of responsibility and our intention to perform an act, into the concept “cause”: causa efficiens and causa finalis are fundamentally one. We believed that an effect was explained when a condition was detected in which the effect was already inherent. In fact, we invent all causes after the schema of the effect: the latter is known to us— Conversely, we are not in a position to predict of any thing what it will “effect.” The thing, the subject, will, intention—all inherent in the conception “cause.” We search for things in order to explain why something has changed. Even the atom is this kind of super-added “thing” and “primitive subject”— At length we grasp that things—consequently atoms, too— effect nothing: because they do not exist at all—that the concept of causality is completely useless.— A necessary sequence of states does not imply a causal relationship between them (—that would mean making their effective capacity leap from 1 to 2, to 3, to 4, to 5). There are neither causes nor effects. Linguistically we do not know how to rid ourselves of them. But that does not matter. If I think of the muscle apart from its “effects,” I negate it— In summa: an event is neither effected nor does it effect. Causa is a capacity to produce effects that has been super-added to the events— Interpretation by causality a deception— A “thing” is the sum of its effects, synthetically united by a concept, an image. In fact, science has emptied the concept causality of its content and retained it as a formula of an equation, in which it has become at bottom a matter of indifference on which side cause is placed and on which side effect. It is asserted that in two complex states (constellations of force) the quanta of force remain constant. The calculability of an event does not reside in the fact that a rule is adhered to, or that a necessity is obeyed, or that a law of causality has been projected by us into every event: it resides in the recurrence of “identical cases.” There is no such thing as a sense of causality, as Kant thinks. One is surprised, one is disturbed, one desires something familiar to hold on to— As soon as we are shown something old in the new, we are calmed. The supposed instinct for causality is only fear of the unfamiliar and the attempt to discover something familiar in it—a search, not for causes, but for the familiar.

552 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Against determinism and teleology.— From the fact that something ensues regularly and ensues calculably, it does not follow that it ensues necessarily. That a quantum of force determines and conducts itself in every particular case in one way and manner does not make it into an “unfree will.” “Mechanical necessity” is not a fact: it is we who first interpreted it into events. We have interpreted the formulatable character of events as the consequence of a necessity that rules over events. But from the fact that I do a certain thing, it by no means follows that I am compelled to do it. Compulsion in things certainly cannot be demonstrated: the rule proves only that one and the same event is not another event as well. Only because we have introduced subjects, “doers,” into things does it appear that all events are the consequences of compulsion exerted upon subjects—exerted by whom? again by a “doer.” Cause and effect—a dangerous concept so long as one thinks of something that causes and something upon which an effect is produced. a. Necessity is not a fact but an interpretation. * b. When one has grasped that the “subject” is not something that creates effects, but only a fiction, much follows. It is only after the model of the subject that we have invented the reality of things and projected them into the medley of sensations. If we no longer believe in the effective subject, then belief also disappears in effective things, in reciprocation, cause and effect between those phenomena that we call things. There also disappears, of course, the world of effective atoms: the assumption of which always depended on the supposition that one needed subjects. At last, the “thing-in-itself” also disappears, because this is fundamentally the conception of a “subject-in-itself.” But we have grasped that the subject is a fiction. The antithesis “thing-in-itself” and “appearance” is untenable; with that, however, the concept “appearance” also disappears. * c. If we give up the effective subject, we also give up the object upon which effects are produced. Duration, identity with itself, being are inherent neither in that which is called subject nor in that which is called object: they are complexes of events apparently durable in comparison with other complexes—e.g., through the difference in tempo of the event (rest—motion, firm—loose: opposites that do not exist in themselves and that actually express only variations in degree that from a certain perspective appear to be opposites. There are no opposites:23 only from those of logic do we derive the concept of opposites—and falsely transfer it to things). d. If we give up the concept “subject” and “object,” then also the concept “substance”—and as a consequence also the various modifications of it, e.g., “matter,” “spirit,” and other hypothetical entities, “the eternity and immutability of matter,” etc. We have got rid of materiality. * From the standpoint of morality, the world is false. But to the extent that morality itself is a part of this world, morality is false. Will to truth is a making firm, a making true and durable, an abolition of the false character of things, a reinterpretation of it into beings. “Truth” is therefore not something there, that might be found or discovered—but something that must be created and that gives a name to a process, or rather to a will to overcome that has in itself no end—introducing truth, as a processus in infinitum, an active determining—not a becoming-conscious of something that is in itself firm and determined. It is a word for the “will to power.” Life is founded upon the premise of a belief in enduring and regularly recurring things; the more powerful life is, the wider must be the knowable world to which

Appendix C

The Will to Power

Translated by Walter Kaufmann & R.J. Hollingdale

Book Three — Four: (Part 2)

we, as it were, attribute being. Logicizing, rationalizing, systematizing as expedients of life. Man projects his drive to truth, his “goal” in a certain sense, outside himself as a world that has being, as a metaphysical world, as a “thing-in-itself,” as a world already in existence. His needs as creator invent the world upon which he works, anticipate it; this anticipation (this “belief” in truth) is his support. * All events, all motion, all becoming, as a determination of degrees and relations of force, as a struggle— * As soon as we imagine someone who is responsible for our being thus and thus, etc. (God, nature), and therefore attribute to him the intention that we should exist and be happy or wretched, we corrupt for ourselves the innocence of becoming.²⁴ We then have someone who wants to achieve something through us and with us. * The “welfare of the individual” is just as imaginary as the “welfare of the species”: the former is not sacrificed to the latter, species viewed from a distance is just as transient as the individual. “Preservation of the species” is only a consequence of the growth of the species, i.e., the overcoming of the species on the road to a stronger type. * [Theses.—]²⁵ That the apparent “purposiveness” (“that purposiveness which endlessly surpasses all the arts of man”) is merely the consequence of the will to power manifest in all events; that becoming stronger involves an ordering process which looks like a sketchy purposiveness; that apparent ends are not intentional but, as soon as dominion is established over a lesser power and the latter operates as a function of the greater power, an order of rank, of organization is bound to produce the appearance of an order of means and ends. Against apparent “necessity”: —this is only an expression for the fact that a force is not also something else. Against apparent “purposiveness”: —the latter only an expression for an order of spheres of power and their interplay. 553 (1886-1887) The sore spot of Kant’s critical philosophy has gradually become visible even to dull eyes: Kant no longer has a right to his distinction “appearance” and “thing-in-itself”—he had deprived himself of the right to go on distinguishing in this old familiar way, in so far as he rejected as impermissible making inferences from phenomena to a cause of phenomena—in accordance with his conception of causality and its purely intra-phenomenal validity— which conception, on the other hand, already anticipates this distinction, as if the “thing-in-itself” were not only inferred but given. 554 (1885-1886) Causalism.²⁶— It is obvious that things-in-themselves cannot be related to one another as cause and effect, nor can appearance be so related to appearance; from which it follows that in a philosophy that believes in things-in-themselves and appearances the concept “cause and effect” cannot be applied. Kant’s mistakes—In fact, the concept “cause and effect” derives, psychologically speaking, only from a mode of thought that believes that always and everywhere will operates upon will—that believes only in living things and fundamentally only in “souls” (and not in things). Within the mechanistic view of the world (which is logic and its application to space and time), that concept is reduced to the formulas of mathematics—with which, as one must emphasize again and again, nothing is ever comprehended, but rather designated and distorted.²⁷ 555 (1885-1886) Against the scientific prejudice.²⁸— The biggest fable of all is the fable of knowledge. One would like to know what things-in-themselves are; but behold, there are no things-in-themselves! But even supposing there were an in-itself, an unconditioned thing, it would for that very reason be unknowable! Something unconditioned cannot be known; otherwise it would not be unconditioned! Coming to know, however, is always “placing oneself in a conditional relation to something”—one who seeks to know the unconditioned desires that it should not concern him, and that this same something should be of no concern to anyone. This involves a contradiction, first, between wanting to know and the desire that it not concern us (but why know at all, then?) and, secondly, because something that is of no concern to anyone is not at all, and thus cannot be known at all.— Coming to know means “to place oneself in a conditional relation to something”; to feel oneself conditioned by something and oneself to condition it—it is therefore under all circumstances establishing, denoting, and making-conscious of conditions (not forthcoming entities, things, what is “in-itself”). 556 (1885-1886) A “thing-in-itself” just as perverse as a “sense-in-itself,” a “meaning-in-itself.” There are no “facts-in-themselves,” for a sense must always be projected into them before there can be “facts.” The question “what is that?” is an imposition of meaning from some other viewpoint. “Essence,” the “essential nature,” is something perspective and already presupposes a multiplicity. At the bottom of it there always lies “what is that for me?” (for us, for all that lives, etc.) A thing would be defined once all creatures had asked “what is that?” and had answered their question. Supposing one single creature, with its own relationships and perspectives for all things, were missing, then the thing would not yet be “defined.” In short: the essence of a thing is only an opinion about the “thing.” Or rather: “it is considered” is the real “it is,” the sole “this is.” One may not ask: “who then interprets?” for the interpretation itself is a form of the will to power, exists (but not as a “being” but as a process, a becoming) as an affect. The origin of “things” is wholly the work of that which imagines, thinks, wills, feels. The concept “thing” itself just as much as all its qualities.— Even “the subject” is such a created entity, a “thing” like all others: a simplification with the object of defining the force which posits, invents, thinks, as distinct from all individual positing, inventing, thinking as such. Thus a capacity as distinct from all that is individual—fundamentally, action collectively considered with respect to all anticipated actions (action and the probability of similar actions). 557 (1885-1886) The properties of a thing are effects on other “things”: if one removes other “things,” then a thing has no properties, i.e., there is no thing without other things, i.e., there is no “thing-in-itself.”

558 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The “thing-in-itself” nonsensical. If I remove all the relationships, all the “properties,” all the “activities” of a thing, the thing does not remain over; because thingness has only been invented by us owing to the requirements of logic, thus with the aim of defining, communication (to bind together the multiplicity of relationships, properties, activities).

559 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

“Things that have a constitution in themselves”—a dogmatic idea with which one must break absolutely. 560 (Spring-Fall 1887). That things possess a constitution in themselves quite apart from interpretation and subjectivity, is a quite idle hypothesis: it presupposes that interpretation and subjectivity are not essential, that a thing freed from all relationships would still be a thing. Conversely, the apparent objective character of things: could it not be merely a difference of degree within the subjective?—that perhaps that which changes slowly presents itself to us as “objectively” enduring, being, “in-itself”—that the objective is only a false concept of a genus and an antithesis within the subjective? 561 (1885-1886) Suppose all unity were unity only as an organization? But the “thing” in which we believe was only invented as a foundation for the various attributes. If the thing “effects,” that means: we conceive all the other properties which are present and momentarily latent, as the cause of the emergence of one single property; i.e., we take the sum of its properties—“X”—as cause of the property “x”: which is utterly stupid and mad! All unity is unity only as organization and co-operation—just as a human community is a unity—as opposed to an atomistic anarchy, as a pattern of domination that signifies a unity but is not a unity. 562 (1883-1888) “In the development of thought a point had to be reached at which one realized that what one called the properties of things were sensations of the feeling subject: at this point the properties ceased to belong to the thing.” The “thing-in-itself” remained. The distinction between the thing-in-itself and the thing-for-us is based on the older, naive form of perception which granted energy to things; but analysis revealed that even force was only projected into them, and likewise—substance. “The thing affects a subject”? Root of the idea of substance in language, not in beings outside us! The thing-in-itself is no problem at all! Beings will have to be thought of as sensations that are no longer based on something devoid of sensation. In motion, no new content is given to sensation. That which is, cannot contain motion: therefore it is a form of being. N.B. The explanation of an event can be sought firstly: through mental images of the event that precede it (aims); secondly: through mental images that succeed it (the mathematical-physical explanation). One should not confuse the two. Thus: the physical explanation, which is a symbolization of the world by means of sensation and thought, can in itself never account for the origin of sensation and thought; rather physics must construe the world of feeling consistently as lacking feeling and aim—right up to the highest human being. And teleology is only a history of purposes and never physical! 563 (1886-1887) Our “knowing” limits itself to establishing quantities; but we cannot help feeling these differences in quantity as qualities. Quality is a perspective truth for us; not an “in-itself.” Our senses have a definite quantum as a mean within which they function; i.e., we sense bigness and smallness in relation to the conditions of our existence. If we sharpened or blunted our senses tenfold, we should perish; ie, with regard to making possible our existence we sense even relations between magnitudes as qualities. 564 (1885-1886) Might all quantities not be signs of qualities? A greater power implies a different consciousness, feeling, desiring, a different perspective; growth itself is a desire to be more; the desire for an increase in quantum grows from a quale;²⁹ in a purely quantitative world everything would be dead, stiff, motionless.— The reduction of all qualities to quantities is nonsense: what appears is that the one accompanies the other, an analogy—

565 (Fall 1886)

Qualities are insurmountable barriers for us; we cannot help feeling that mere quantitative differences are something fundamentally distinct from quantity, namely that they are qualities which can no longer be reduced to one another. But everything for which the word “knowledge” makes any sense refers to the domain of reckoning, weighing, measuring, to the domain of quantity; while, on the other hand, all our sensations of value (i.e., simply our sensations) adhere precisely to qualities, i.e., to our perspective “truths” which belong to us alone and can by no means be “known”! It is obvious that every creature different from us senses different qualities and consequently lives in a different world from that in which we live. Qualities are an idiosyncrasy peculiar to man; to demand that our human interpretations and values should be universal and perhaps constitutive values is one of the hereditary madneses of human pride.

566 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The “real world,” however one has hitherto conceived it— it has always been the apparent world once again.³⁰

567 (March-June 1888)

The apparent world, i.e., a world viewed according to values; ordered, selected according to values, i.e., in this case according to the viewpoint of utility in regard to the preservation and enhancement of the power of a certain species of animal. The perspective therefore decides the character of the “appearance”! As if a world would still remain over after one deducted the perspective! By doing that one would deduct relativity! Every center of force adopts a perspective toward the entire remainder, i.e., its own particular valuation, mode of action, and mode of resistance. The “apparent world,” therefore, is reduced to a specific mode of action on the world, emanating from a center. Now there is no other mode of action whatever; and the “world” is only a word for the totality of these actions. Reality consists precisely in this particular action and reaction of every individual part toward the whole— No shadow of a right remains to speak here of appearance— The specific mode of reacting is the only mode of reacting; we do not know how many and what kinds of other modes there are. But there is no “other,” no “true,” no essential being—for this would be the expression of a world without action and reaction— The antithesis of the apparent world and the true world is reduced to the antithesis “world” and “nothing.”—

568 (March-June 1888)

Critique of the concept “true and apparent world.”— Of these, the first is a mere fiction, constructed of fictitious entities. “Appearance” itself belongs to reality: it is a form of its being; i.e., in a world where there is no being, a certain calculable world of identical cases must first be created through appearance: a tempo at which observation and comparison are possible, etc. Appearance is an arranged and simplified world, at which our practical instincts have been at work; it is perfectly true for us; that is to say, we live, we are able to live in it: proof of its truth for us— the world, apart from our condition of living in it, the world that we have not reduced to our being, our logic and psychological prejudices, does not exist as a world “in-itself”; it is essentially a world of relationships; under certain conditions it has a differing aspect from every point; its being is essentially different from every point; it presses upon every point, every point resists it—and the sum of these is in every case quite incongruent. The measure of power determines what being possesses the other measure of power; in what form, force, constraint it acts or resists. Our particular case is interesting enough: we have produced a conception in order to be able to live in a world, in order to perceive just enough to endure it—

569 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Our psychological perspective is determined by the following: that communication is necessary, and that for there to be communication something has to be firm, simplified, capable of precision (above all in the [so-called]³² identical case). For it to be communicable, however, it must be experienced as adapted, as “recognizable.” The material of the senses adapted by the understanding, reduced to rough outlines, made similar, subsumed under related matters. Thus the fuzziness and chaos of sense impressions are, as it were, logicized; the world of “phenomena” is the adapted world which we feel to be real. The “reality” lies in the continual recurrence of identical, familiar, related things in their logicized character, in the belief that here we are able to reckon and calculate; the antithesis of this phenomenal world is not “the true world,” but the formless unformulable world of the chaos of sensations—another kind of phenomenal world, a kind “unknowable” for us; questions, what things “in-themselves” may be like, apart from our sense receptivity and the activity of our understanding, must be rebutted with the question: how could we know that things exist? “Thingness” was first created by us. The question is whether there could not be many other ways of creating such an apparent world—and whether this creating, logicizing, adapting, falsifying is not itself the best-guaranteed reality; in short, whether that which “posits things” is not the sole reality; and whether the “effect of the external world upon us” is not also only the result of such active subjects—The other “entities” act upon us; our adapted apparent world is an adaptation and overpowering of their actions; a kind of defensive measure. The subject alone is demonstrable; hypothesis that only subjects exist—that “object” is only a kind of effect produced by a subject upon a subject—a modus of the subject.

570 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

If one is a philosopher as men have always been philosophers, one cannot see what has been and becomes—one sees only what is. But since nothing is, all that was left to the philosopher as his “world” was the imaginary.

571 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

To assert the existence as a whole of things of which we know nothing whatever, precisely because there is an advantage in not being able to know anything of them, was a piece of naïveté of Kant, resulting from needs, mainly moral-metaphysical. 572 (1883-1888) An artist cannot endure reality, he looks away from it, back: he seriously believes that the value of a thing resides in that shadowy residue one derives from colors, form, sound, ideas, he believes that the more subtilized, attenuated, transient a thing or a man is, the more valuable he becomes; the less real, the more valuable. This is Platonism, which, however, involved yet another bold reversal: Plato measured the degree of reality by the degree of value and said: The more “Idea,” the more being. He reversed the concept “reality” and said: “What you take for real is an error, and the nearer we approach the ‘Idea,’ the nearer we approach ‘truth.’ ”— Is this understood? It was the greatest of rebaptisms; and because it has been adopted by Christianity we do not recognize how astonishing it is. Fundamentally, Plato, as the artist he was, preferred appearance to being! lie and invention to truth! the unreal to the actual! But he was so convinced of the value of appearance that he gave it the attributes “being,” “causality” and “goodness,” and “truth,” in short everything men value. The concept of value itself considered as a cause: first insight. The ideal granted all honorific attributes: second insight.

573 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The idea of the “true world” or of “God” as absolutely immaterial, spiritual, good, is an emergency measure necessary while the opposite instincts are still all-powerful— The degree of moderation and humanity attained is exactly reflected in the humanization of the gods: the Greeks of the strongest epoch, who were not afraid of themselves but rejoiced in themselves, brought their gods close to all their own affects—. The spiritualization of the idea of God is therefore far from being a sign of progress: one is heartily conscious of this when considering Goethe—in his case, the vaporization of God into virtue and spirit is felt as being on a coarser level— 574 (1883-1888) Senselessness of all metaphysics as the derivation of the conditioned from the unconditioned. It is in the nature of thinking that it thinks of and invents the unconditioned as an adjunct to the conditioned; just as it thought of and invented the “ego” as an adjunct to the multiplicity of its processes; it measures the world according to magnitudes posited by itself—such fundamental fictions as “the unconditional,” “ends and means,” “things,” “substances,” logical laws, numbers and forms. There would be nothing that could be called knowledge if thought did not first re-form the world in this way into “things,” into what is self-identical. Only because there is thought is there untruth. Thought cannot be derived, any more than sensations can be; but that does not mean that its primordially or “being-in-itself” has been proved! all that is established is that we cannot get beyond it, because we have nothing but thought and sensation. 575 (1885-1886) “Knowledge” is a referring back: in its essence a regressus in infinitum. That which comes to a standstill (at a supposed causa prima, at something unconditioned, etc.) is laziness, weariness— 576 (1883-1888) Psychology of metaphysics: the influence of timidity. That which has been feared the most, the cause of the most powerful suffering (lust to rule, sex, etc.),³³ has been treated by men with the greatest amount of hostility and eliminated from the “true” world. Thus they have eliminated the affects one by one—posited God as the antithesis of evil, that is, placed reality in the negation of the desires and affects (i.e., in nothingness). In the same way, they have hated the irrational, the arbitrary, the accidental (as the causes of immeasurable physical suffering). As a consequence, they negated this element in being-in-itself and conceived it as absolute “rationality” and “purposiveness.” In the same way, they have feared change, transitoriness: this expresses a straitened soul, full of mistrust and evil experiences (the case of Spinoza: an opposite kind of man would account change a stimulus). A creature overloaded and playing with force would call precisely the affects, irrationality, and change good in a eudaemonistic sense, together with their consequences: danger, contrast, perishing, etc.

577 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Against the value of that which remains eternally the same (vide Spinoza's naiveté; Descartes' also), the values of the briefest and most transient, the seductive flash of gold on the belly of the serpent vita—

578 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Moral values even in theory of knowledge: trust in reason—why not mistrust? the “true world” is supposed to be the good world—why? appearance, change, contradiction, struggle devalued as immoral; desire for a world in which these things are missing; the transcendental world invented, in order that a place remains for “moral freedom” (in Kant); dialectic a way to virtue (in Plato and Socrates: evidently because Sophistry counted as the way to immorality); time and space ideal: consequently “unity” in the essence of things; consequently no “sin,” no evil, no imperfection—a justification of God; Epicurus denied the possibility of knowledge, in order to retain moral (or hedonistic) values as the highest values. Augustine, later Pascal (“corrupted reason”), did the same for the benefit of Christian values; Descartes’ contempt for everything that changes; also that of Spinoza. 579 (1883-1888) Psychology of metaphysics.— This world is apparent: consequently there is a true world;—this world is conditional: consequently there is an unconditioned world;—this world is full of contradiction: consequently there is a world free of contradiction;— this world is a world of becoming: consequently there is a world of being;—all false conclusions (blind trust in reason: if A exists, then the opposite concept ? must also exist). It is suffering that inspires these conclusions: fundamentally they are desires that such a world should exist; in the same way, to imagine another, more valuable world is an expression of hatred for a world that makes one suffer: the resentment of metaphysicians against actuality is here creative. Second series of questions: for what is there suffering?—and from this a conclusion is derived concerning the relation of the true world to our apparent, changing, suffering, contradictory world: (1) Suffering as a consequence of error: how is error possible? (2) Suffering as a consequence of guilt: how is guilt possible? (— experiences derived from nature or society universalized and projected to the sphere of “in-itself”). If, however, the conditioned world is causally conditioned by the unconditioned world, then freedom to err and incur guilt must also be conditioned by it: and again one asks, what for?— The world of appearance, becoming, contradiction, suffering, is therefore willed: what for? The error in these conclusions: two opposite concepts are constructed—because one of them corresponds to a reality, the other “must” also correspond to a reality. “Whence should one derive this opposite concept if this were not so?”— Reason is thus a source of revelation concerning being-in-itself. But the origin of these antitheses need not necessarily go back to a supernatural source of reason: it is sufficient to oppose to it the real genesis of the concepts. This derives from the practical sphere, the sphere of utility; hence the strength of the faith it inspires (one would perish if one did not reason according to this mode of reason; but this is no “proof” of what it asserts). The preoccupation with suffering on the part of metaphysicians—is quite naive. “Eternal bliss”: psychological nonsense. Brave and creative men never consider pleasure and pain as ultimate values—they are epiphenomena: one must desire both if one is to achieve anything—. That they see the problem of pleasure and pain in the foreground reveals something weary and sick in metaphysicians and religious people. Even morality is so important to them only because they see in it an essential condition for the abolition of suffering. In the same way, their preoccupation with appearance and error: cause of suffering, superstition that happiness attends truth (confusion: happiness in “certainty,” in “faith”).

580 (Spring-Fall 1887)

To what extent the basic epistemological positions (materialism, idealism) are consequences of evaluations: the source of the supreme feelings of pleasure (“feelings of value”) as decisive also for the problem of reality! —The measure of positive knowledge is quite subsidiary or a matter of indifference: as witness the development of India. The Buddhistic negation of reality in general (appearance = suffering) is perfectly consistent: undemonstrability, inaccessibility, lack of categories not only for a “‘world-in-itself,” but an insight into the erroneous procedures by means of which this whole concept is arrived at. “Absolute reality,” “being-in-itself” a contradiction. In a world of becoming, “reality” is always only a simplification for practical ends, or a deception through the coarseness of organs, or a variation in the tempo of becoming. Logical world-denial and nihilation follow from the fact that we have to oppose non-being with being and that the concept “becoming” is denied. (“Something” becomes.)

581 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Being and becoming.—“Reason,” evolved on a sensualistic basis, on the prejudices of the senses, i.e., in the belief in the truth of the judgments of the senses. “Being” as universalization of the concept “life” (breathing), “having a soul,” “willing, effecting,” “becoming.” The antithesis is: “not to have a soul,” “not to become,” “not to will.” Therefore: “being” is not the antithesis of non-being, appearance, nor even of the dead (for only something that can live can be dead). The “soul,” the “ego” posited as primeval fact, and introduced everywhere where there is any becoming. 582 (1885-1887) Being—we have no idea of it apart from the idea of “living.”— How can anything dead “be”?

583 (March-June 1888)

(A) I observe with astonishment that science has today resigned itself to the apparent world; a real world—whatever it may be like—we certainly have no organ for knowing it. At this point we may ask: by means of what organ of knowledge can we posit even this antithesis?— That a world accessible to our organs is also understood to be dependent upon these organs, that we understand a world as being subjectively conditioned,³⁶ is not to say that an objective world is at all possible. Who compels us to think that subjectivity is real, essential? The “in-itself” is even an absurd conception; a “constitution-in-itself” is nonsense; we possess the concept “being,” “thing,” only as a relational concept— The worst thing is that with the old antithesis “apparent” and “true” the correlative value judgment “lacking in value” and “absolutely valuable” has developed. The apparent world is not counted as a “valuable” world; appearance is supposed to constitute an objection to supreme value. Only a “true” world can be valuable in itself— Prejudice of prejudices! Firstly, it would be possible that the true constitution of things was so hostile to the presuppositions of life, so opposed to them, that we needed appearance in order to be able to live— After all, this is the case in so many situations; e.g. in marriage. Our empirical world would be determined by the instincts of self-preservation even as regards the limits of its knowledge: we would regard as true, good, valuable that which serves the preservation of the species— a. We possess no categories by which we can distinguish a true from an apparent world. (There might only be an apparent world, but not our apparent world.) b. Assuming the true world, it could still be a world less valuable for us; precisely the quantum of illusion might be of a higher rank on account of its value for our preservation. (Unless appearance as such were grounds for condemnation?) c. That a correlation exists between degrees of value and degrees of reality (so that the supreme values also possess the supreme reality) is a metaphysical postulate proceeding from the presupposition that we know the order of rank of values; namely, that this order of rank is a moral order — Only with this presupposition is truth necessarily part of the definition of all the highest values. (B) It is of cardinal importance that one should abolish the true world. It is the great inspirer of doubt and devaluator in respect of the world we are: it has been our most dangerous attempt yet to assassinate life. War on all presuppositions on the basis of which one has invented a true world. Among these is the presupposition that moral values are the supreme values. The supremacy of moral valuation would be refuted if it could be shown to be the consequence of an immoral valuation—as a special case of actual immorality—it would thus reduce itself to an appearance, and as appearance it would cease to have any right as such to condemn appearance. (C) The “will to truth” would then have to be investigated psychologically: it is not a moral force, but a form of the will to power. This would have to be proved by showing that it employs every immoral means: metaphysicians above all—. We are today faced with testing the assertion that moral values are the supreme values. Method in investigation is attained only when all moral prejudices have been overcome:—it represents a victory over morality—

584 (March-June 1888)

The aberration of philosophy is that, instead of seeing in logic and the categories of reason means toward the adjustment of the world for utilitarian ends (basically, toward an expedient falsification), one believed one possessed in them the criterion of truth and reality. The “criterion of truth” was in fact merely the biological utility of such a system of systematic falsification; and since a species of animals knows of nothing more important than its own preservation, one might indeed be permitted to speak here of “truth.” The naïveté was to take an anthropocentric idiosyncrasy as the measure of things, as the rule for determining “real” and “unreal”: in short, to make absolute something conditioned. And behold, suddenly the world fell apart into a “true” world and an “apparent” world: and precisely the world that man’s reason had devised for him to live and settle in was discredited. Instead of employing the forms as a tool for making the world manageable and calculable, the madness of philosophers divined that in these categories is presented the concept of that world to which the one in which man lives does not correspond—The means were misunderstood as measures of value, even as a condemnation of their real intention—The intention was to deceive oneself in a useful way; the means, the invention of formulas and signs by means of which one could reduce the confusing multiplicity to a purposive and manageable schema. But alas! now a moral category was brought into play: no creature wants to deceive itself, no creature may deceive—consequently there is only a will to truth. What is “truth”? The law of contradiction provided the schema: the true world, to which one seeks the way, cannot contradict itself, cannot change, cannot become, has no beginning and no end. This is the greatest error that has ever been committed, the essential fatality of error on earth: one believed one possessed a criterion of reality in the forms of reason—while in fact one possessed them in order to become master of reality, in order to misunderstand reality in a shrewd manner—And behold: now the world became false, and precisely on account of the properties that constitute its reality: change, becoming, multiplicity, opposition, contradiction, war. And then the entire fatality was there: 2. how can one become oneself as much as possible the antithesis of the character of the apparent world? (Concept of the perfect creature as an antithesis to the real creature; more clearly, as the contradiction of life—) The whole tendency of values was toward slander of life; one created a confusion of idealist dogmatism and knowledge in general: so that the opposing party also was always attacking science. The road to science was in this way doubly blocked: once by belief in the “true” world, and again by the opponents of this belief. Natural science, psychology was (1) condemned with regard to its objects, (2) deprived of its innocence—In the actual world, in which everything is bound to and conditioned by everything else, to condemn and think away anything means to condemn and think away everything. The expression “that should not be,” “that should not have been,” is farcical— If one thinks out the consequences, one would ruin the source of life if one wanted to abolish whatever was in some respect harmful or destructive. Physiology teaches us better! —We see how morality (a) poisons the entire conception of the world, (b) cuts off the road to knowledge, to science, (c) disintegrates and undermines all actual instincts (in that it teaches that their roots are immoral). We see at work before us a dreadful tool of decadence that props itself up by the holiest names and attitudes.

585 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Tremendous self-examination: becoming conscious of oneself, not as individuals but as mankind. Let us reflect, let us think back; let us follow the highways and byways! (A) Man seeks “the truth”: a world that is not self-contradictory, not deceptive, does not change, a true world—a world in which one does not suffer; contradiction, deception, change—causes of suffering! He does not doubt that a world as it ought to be exists; he would like to seek out the road to it. (Indian critique: even the “ego” as apparent, as not real) Whence does man here derive the concept reality?— Why is it that he derives suffering from change, deception, contradiction? and why not rather his happiness?— Contempt, hatred for all that perishes, changes, varies— whence comes this valuation of that which remains constant? Obviously, the will to truth is here merely the desire for a world of the constant. The senses deceive, reason corrects the errors; consequently, one concluded, reason is the road to the constant; the least sensual ideas must be closest to the “true world.”— It is from the senses that most misfortunes come—they are deceivers, deluders, destroyers.— Happiness can be guaranteed only by being; change and happiness exclude one another. The highest desire therefore contemplates unity with what has being. This is the formula for: the road to the highest happiness. In summa: the world as it ought to be exists; this world, in which we live, is an error—this world of ours ought not to exist. Belief in what has being is only a consequence: the real primum mobile is disbelief in becoming, mistrust of becoming, the low valuation of all that becomes— What kind of man reflects in this way? An unproductive, suffering kind, a kind weary of life. If we imagine the opposite kind of man, he would not need to believe in what has being; more, he would despise it as dead, tedious, indifferent— The belief that the world as it ought to be is, really exists, is a belief of the unproductive who do not desire to create a world as it ought to be. They posit it as already available, they seek ways and means of reaching it. “Will to truth”— as the impotence of the will to create. The fiction of a world that corresponds to our desires: psychological trick and interpretation with the aim of associating everything we honor and find pleasant with this true world. “Will to truth” at this stage is essentially an art of interpretation: which at least requires the power to interpret. This same species of man, grown one stage poorer, no longer possessing the strength to interpret, to create fictions, produces nihilists. A nihilist is a man who judges of the world as it is that it ought not to be. and of the world as it ought to be that it does not exist.³⁹ According to this view, our existence (action, suffering, willing, feeling) has no meaning: the pathos of “in vain” is the nihilists’ pathos—at the same time, as pathos, an inconsistency on the part of the nihilists. Whoever is incapable of laying his will into things, lacking will and strength, at least lays some meaning into them, i.e., the faith that there is a will in them already.⁴⁰ It is a measure of the degree of strength of will to what extent one can do without meaning in things, to what extent one can endure to live in a meaningless world because one organizes a small portion of it oneself. The philosophical objective outlook can therefore be a sign that will and strength are small. For strength organizes what is close and closest; “men of knowledge,” who desire only to ascertain what is, are those who cannot fix anything as it ought to be. Artists, an intermediary species: they at least fix an image of that which ought to be; they are productive, to the extent that they actually alter and transform; unlike men of knowledge, who leave everything as it is.⁴¹ Connection between philosophers and the pessimistic religions: the same species of man (—they ascribe the highest degree of reality to the most highly valued things—). Connection between philosophers and moral men and their evaluations (—the moral interpretation of the world as meaning: after the decline of the religious meaning—). Overcoming of philosophers through the destruction of the world of being: intermediary period of nihilism: before there is yet present the strength to reverse values and to deify becoming and the apparent world as the only world, and to call them good. (B) Nihilism as a normal phenomenon can be a symptom of increasing strength or of increasing weakness: partly, because the strength to create, to will, has so increased that it no longer requires these total interpretations and introductions of meaning (“present tasks,” the state, etc.); partly because even the creative strength to create meaning has declined and disappointment becomes the dominant condition. The incapability of believing in a “meaning,” “unbelief.” What does science mean in regard to both possibilities? As a sign of strength and self-control, as being able to do without healing, comforting worlds of illusion; as undermining, dissecting, disappointing, weakening. (C) Belief in truth, the need to have a hold on something believed true, psychological reduction apart from all previous value feelings. Fear, laziness. The same way, unbelief: reduction. To what extent it acquires a new value if a true world does not exist (—thus the value feelings that hitherto have been squandered on the world of being, are again set free).

586 (March-June 1888)

The “True” and the “Apparent World” (A) The seductions that proceed from this concept are of three kinds: a. an unknown world:—we are adventurers, inquisitive— that which is known seems to weary us (—the danger of this concept lies in its insinuation that “this” world is known to us—); b. another world, where things are different; something in us calculates, our still submission, our silence, lose their value— perhaps everything will turn out well, we have not hoped in vain—the world where things are different, where we ourselves— who knows?—are different— c. a true world: this is the most amazing trick and attack that has ever been perpetrated upon us; so much has become encrusted in the word “true,” and involuntarily we make a present of all this to the “true world”: the true world must also be a truthful world, one that does not deceive us, does not make fools of us: to believe in it is virtually to be compelled to believe in it (—out of decency, as is the case among people worthy of confidence—). * The concept “the unknown world” insinuates that this world is “known” to us (is tedious—); the concept “another world” insinuates that the world could be otherwise—abolishes necessity and fate (useless to submit oneself—to adapt oneself—); the concept “the true world” insinuates that this world is untruthful, deceptive, dishonest, inauthentic, inessential—and consequently also not a world adapted to our needs (—inadvisable to adapt oneself to it; better to resist it). * We therefore elude “this” world in three ways: a. by our inquisitiveness—as if the more interesting part were elsewhere; b. by our submission—as though it were not necessary to submit oneself—as if this world were not a necessity of the ultimate rank: c. by our sympathy and respect—as if this world did not deserve them, were impure, were not honest with us— In summa. we have revolted in three ways: we have made an “x” into a critique of the “known world.” (B) First step toward sobriety: to grasp to what extent we have been seduced—for things could be exactly the reverse: a. the unknown world could be a stupid and meaner form of existence—and “this” world might be rather enjoyable by comparison; b. the other world, far from taking account of our desires which would find no fulfillment in it, could be among the mass of things that make this world possible for us: to get to know it might be a means of making us contented; c. the true world: but who is it really who tells us that the apparent world must be of less value than the true one? Does our instinct not contradict this judgment? Does man not eternally create a fictitious world for himself because he wants a better world than reality? Above all: how do we arrive at the idea that our world is not the true world?—it could be that the other world is the “apparent” one (in fact the Greeks thought of, e.g., a shadow kingdom, an apparent existence, beside true existence). And finally: what gives us the right to posit, as it were, degrees of reality? This is something different from an unknown world— it is already a wanting to know something of the unknown— The “other,” the “unknown” world—very good! But to say “true world” means “to know something of it”— That is the opposite of the assumption of an “x” world— In summa: the world “x” could be in every sense more tedious, less human, and less worthy than this world. It would be another thing to assert the existence of “x” worlds, i.e., of every possible world besides this one. But this has never been asserted— (B) Problem: why the notion of another world has always been unfavorable for, or critical of “this” world—what does this indicate?— For a people proud of itself, whose life is ascending, always thinks of another kind of being as a lower, less valuable kind of being; it regards the strange, the unknown world as its enemy, as its opposite; it feels no inquisitiveness, it totally rejects the strange— A people would never admit that another people was the “true people.”— It is symptomatic that such a distinction should be at all possible—that one takes this world for the “apparent” one and the other world as “true.” The places of origin of the notion of “another world”: the philosopher, who invents a world of reason, where reason and the logical functions are adequate: this is the origin of the “true” world; the religious man, who invents a “divine world”: this is the origin of the “denaturalized, anti-natural” world; the moral man, who invents a “free world”: this is the origin of the “good, perfect, just, holy” world. What the three places of origin have in common: the psychological blunder, the physiological confusions. By what attributes is the “other world,” as it actually appears in history, distinguished? By the stigmata of philosophical, religious, moral prejudice. The “other world,” as illumined by these facts, as a synonym for nonbeing, nonliving, not wanting to live— General insight: it is the instinct of life-weariness, and not that of life, which has created the “other world.” Consequence: philosophy, religion, and morality are symptoms of decadence.⁴² 587 (1885-1886) It might seem as though I had evaded the question of “certainty.” The opposite is true; but by inquiring after the criterion of certainty I tested the scales upon which men have weighed in general hitherto—and that the question of certainty itself is a dependent question, a question of the second rank. 588 (1883-1886) The question of values is more fundamental than the question of certainty: the latter becomes serious only by presupposing that the value question has already been answered. Being and appearance, psychologically considered, yield no “being-in-itself,” no criterion of “reality,” but only for grades of appearance measured by the strength of the interest we show in an appearance. There is no struggle for existence between ideas and perceptions, but a struggle for dominion: the idea that is overcome is not annihilated, only driven back or subordinated. There is no annihilation in the sphere of spirit—⁴³ 589 (1885-1886) 590 (1885-1886) Our values are interpreted into things. Is there then any meaning in the in-itself? ! Is meaning not necessarily relative meaning and perspective? All meaning is will to power (all relative meaning resolves itself into it). 591 (1885) The desire for “solid facts”—epistemology: how much pessimism there is in it! 592 (1883-1888) The antagonism between the “true world,” as revealed by pessimism, and a world possible for life—here one must test the rights of truth. It is necessary to measure the meaning of all these “ideal drives” against life to grasp what this antagonism really is: the struggle of sickly, despairing life that cleaves to a beyond, with healthier, more stupid and mendacious, richer, less degenerate life. Therefore it is not “truth” in struggle with life but one kind of life in struggle with another.— But it wants to be the higher kind!— Here one must demonstrate the need for an order of rank—that the first problem is the order of rank of different kinds of life. 593 (1885-1886) To transform the belief “it is thus and thus” into the will “it shall become thus and thus.” 594 (1883-1888) Science—this has been hitherto a way of putting an end to the complete confusion in which things exist, by hypotheses that “explain” everything—so it has come from the intellect’s dislike of chaos.— This same dislike seizes me when I consider myself: I should like to form an image of the inner world, too, by means of some schema, and thus triumph over intellectual confusion. Morality has been a simplification of this kind: it taught that men were known, familiar.— Now we have destroyed morality—we have again become completely obscure to ourselves! I know that I know nothing of myself. Physics proves to be a boon for the heart: science (as the way to knowledge) acquires a new charm after morality has been eliminated—and because it is here alone that we find consistency, we have to construct our life so as to preserve it. This yields a sort of practical reflection on the conditions of our existence as men of knowledge. 595 (1884) Our presuppositions: no God: no purpose: finite force. Let us guard against thinking out and prescribing the mode of thought necessary to lesser men! ! 596 (1886-1887) No “moral education” of the human race: but an enforced schooling in [scientific]44 errors is needed, because “truth” disgusts and makes one sick of life—unless man is already irrevocably launched upon his path and has taken his honest insight upon himself with a tragic pride. 597 (1886-1887) The presupposition of scientific work: belief in the unity and perpetuity of scientific work, so the individual may work at any part, however small, confident that his work will not be in vain. There is one great paralysis: to work in vain, to struggle in vain.— * The accumulative epochs, in which force and means of power are discovered that the future will one day make use of; science an intermediary station, at which the more intermediary, more multifarious, more complicated natures find their most natural discharge and satisfaction—all those who should avoid action.

598 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

A philosopher recuperates differently and with different means: he recuperates, e.g., with nihilism. Belief that there is no truth at all, the nihilistic belief, is a great relaxation for one who, as a warrior of knowledge, is ceaselessly fighting ugly truths. For truth is ugly.⁴⁵ 599 (1885-1886) The “meaninglessness of events”: belief in this is the consequence of an insight into the falsity of previous interpretations, a generalization of discouragement and weakness—not a necessary belief. The immodesty of man: to deny meaning where he sees none. 600 (1885-1886) No limit to the ways in which the world can be interpreted; every interpretation a symptom of growth or of decline. Inertia needs unity (monism); plurality of interpretations a sign of strength. Not to desire to deprive the world of its disturbing and enigmatic character! 601 (1885-1886) Against peaceableness and the desire for reconciliation.⁴⁶ The attempt at monism belongs here. 602 (1884) This perspective world, this world for the eye, tongue, and ear, is very false, even if compared for a very much more subtle sense-apparatus. But its intelligibility, comprehensibility, practicability, and beauty begin to cease if we refine our senses; just as beauty ceases when we think about historical processes; the order of purpose is already an illusion. It suffices that the more superficially and coarsely it is conceived, the more valuable, definite, beautiful, and significant the world appears. The deeper one looks, the more our valuations disappear—meaninglessness approaches! We have created the world that possesses values! Knowing this, we know, too, that reverence for truth is already the consequence of an illusion—and that one should value more than truth the force that forms, simplifies, shapes, invents. “Everything is false! Everything is permitted!” Only with a certain obtuseness of vision, a will to simplicity, does the beautiful, the “valuable” appear: in itself, it is I know not what. 603 (1885) That the destruction of an illusion does not produce truth but only one more piece of ignorance, an extension of our “empty space,” an increase of our “desert”⁴⁸— 604⁴⁹ (1885-1886) “Interpretation,” the introduction of meaning—not “explanation” (in most cases a new interpretation over an old interpretation that has become incomprehensible, that is now itself only a sign). There are no facts, everything is in flux, incomprehensible, elusive; what is relatively most enduring is—our opinions.

605 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The ascertaining of “truth” and “untruth,” the ascertaining of facts in general, is fundamentally different from creative positing, from forming, shaping, overcoming, willing, such as is of the essence of philosophy. To introduce a meaning—this task still remains to be done, assuming there is no meaning yet. Thus it is with sounds, but also with the fate of peoples: they are capable of the most different interpretations and direction toward different goals. On a yet higher level is to posit a goal and mold facts according to it; that is, active interpretation and not merely conceptual translation, 606 (1885-1886)

Ultimately, man finds in things nothing but what he himself has imported into them: the finding is called science, the importing—art, religion, love, pride. Even if this should be a piece of childishness, one should carry on with both and be well disposed toward both—some should find; others—we others!—should import!

607 (Spring-Fall 1886)

Science: its two sides: in regard to the individual; in regard to the cultural complex (level); —valuations from one side or the other are mutually antagonistic. 608 (1886-1887) The development of science resolves the “familiar” more and more into the unfamiliar:—it desires, however, the reverse, and proceeds from the instinct to trace the unfamiliar back to the familiar. In summa, science is preparing a sovereign ignorance, a feeling that there is no such thing as “knowing,” that it was a kind of arrogance to dream of it, more, that we no longer have the least notion that warrants our considering “knowledge” even a possibility—that “knowing” itself is a contradictory idea. We translate a primeval mythology and vanity of mankind into the hard fact: “knowledge-in-itself” is as impermissible a concept as is “thing-in-itself,” Seduction by “number and logic,” seduction by “laws.” “Wisdom” as the attempt to get beyond perspective valuations (i.e., beyond the “will to power”): a principle hostile to life and decadent, a symptom as among the Indians, etc., of the weakening of the power of appropriation. 609 (1884) It is not enough that you understand in what ignorance man and beast live; you must also have and acquire the will to ignorance. You need to grasp that without this kind of ignorance life itself would be impossible, that it is a condition under which alone the living thing can preserve itself and prosper: a great, firm dome of ignorance must encompass you. 610 (1884) Science—the transformation of nature into concepts for the purpose of mastering nature—belongs under the rubric “means.” But the purpose and will of man must grow in the same way, the intention in regard to the whole. 611 (1883-1888) We find that the strongest and most constantly employed faculty at all stages of life is thought—even in every act of perceiving and apparent passivity! Evidently, it thus becomes most powerful and demanding, and in the long run it tyrannizes over all other forces. Finally it becomes “passion-in-itself.”

612 (Spring-Fall 1887)

To win back for the man of knowledge the right to great affects! after self-effacement and the cult of “objectivity” have created a false order of rank in this sphere, too. Error reached its peak when Schopenhauer taught: the only way to the “true,” to knowledge, lies precisely in getting free from affects, from will; the intellect liberated from will cannot but see the true, real essence of things. The same error in arte:50 as if everything were beautiful as soon as it is viewed without will.

613 (Fall 1888)

Competition between affects and the dominion of one of the affects over the intellect. 614 (1884) To “humanize” the world, i.e., to feel ourselves more and more masters within it— 615 (1884) Among a higher kind of creatures, knowledge, too, will acquire new forms that are not yet needed. 616 (1885-1886) That the value of the world lies in our interpretation (—that other interpretations than merely human ones are perhaps somewhere possible—); that previous interpretations have been perspective valuations by virtue of which we can survive in life, i.e., in the will to power, for the growth of power; that every elevation of man brings with it the overcoming of narrower interpretations; that every strengthening and increase of power opens up new perspectives and means believing in new horizons—this idea permeates my writings. The world with which we are concerned is false, i.e., is not a fact but a fable and approximation on the basis of a meager sum of observations; it is “in flux,” as something in a state of becoming, as a falsehood always changing but never getting near the truth: for—there is no “truth.” 617 (1883-1885)⁵¹ To impose upon becoming the character of being—that is the supreme will to power. Twofold falsification, on the part of the senses and of the spirit, to preserve a world of that which is, which abides, which is equivalent, etc. That everything recurs is the closest approximation of a world of becoming to a world of being:—high point of the meditation. From the values attributed to being proceed the condemnation of and discontent with becoming, after such a world of being had first been invented. The metamorphoses of what has being (body, God, ideas, laws of nature, formulas, etc.) “Beings” as appearance; reversal of values; appearance was that which conferred value—. Knowledge-in-itself in a world of becoming is impossible; so how is knowledge possible? As error concerning oneself, as will to power, as will to deception. Becoming as invention, willing, self-denial, overcoming of oneself: no subject but an action, a positing, creative, no “causes and effects.” Art as the will to overcome becoming, as “eternalization,” but shortsighted, depending on the perspective: repeating in miniature, as it were, the tendency of the whole. Regarding that which all life reveals as a diminutive formula for the total tendency; hence a new definition of the concept “life” as will to power. Instead of “cause and effect” the mutual struggle of that which becomes, often with the absorption of one’s opponent; the number of becoming elements not constant. Uselessness of old ideals for the interpretation of the totality of events, once one knows the animal origin and utility of these ideals; all, moreover, contradictory to life. Uselessness of the mechanistic theory—it gives the impression of meaninglessness. The entire idealism of mankind hitherto is on the point of changing suddenly into nihilism—into the belief in absolute worthlessness, i.e., meaninglessness. The destruction of ideals, the new desert;

new arts by means of which we can endure it, we amphibians. Presupposition: bravery, patience, no “turning back,” no haste to go forward. (N B. Zarathustra adopts a parodistic attitude toward all former values as a consequence of his abundance.) 8 MS: bedingt (conditioned); printed versions: bedingende (conditioning). The editors took their cue from Kant, not from Nietzsche’s next sentence. 13 MS not in Nietzsche’s hand; evidently dictated. 14 I say. 37 “Rule”: uncertain reading 38 “Madness”: very doubtful conjecture; in the original, two illegible words. Cf. the chapter “On War and Warriors” in Zarathustra, I (Portable Nietzsche, p. 158 ff). And note the deliberate antithesis, especially of the formulation in the text, to the romantic identification of truth and beauty. The quotation comprising the next paragraph should be compared with “Nothing is true, everything is permitted,” in Genealogy III, section 24; see also my notes on that section. 52 A reference to Nietzsche’s doctrine of the eternal recurrence of the same events. Cf. sections 55 and 1,057 ff. II. THE WILL TO POWER IN NATURE 618 (1885) Of all the interpretations of the world attempted hitherto, the mechanistic one seems today to stand victorious in the foreground. It evidently has a good conscience on its side; and no science believes it can achieve progress and success except with the aid of mechanistic procedures. Everyone knows these procedures: one leaves “reason” and “purpose” out of account as far as possible, one shows that, given sufficient time, anything can evolve out of anything else, and one does not conceal a malicious chuckle when “apparent intention” in the fate of a plant or an egg yolk is once again traced back to pressure and stress: in short, one pays heartfelt homage to the principle of the greatest possible stupidity, if a playful expression may be allowed concerning such serious matters. Meanwhile, a presentiment, or anxiety, is to be noted among select spirits involved in this movement, as if the theory had a hole in it that might sooner or later prove to be its final hole: I mean the shrill one through which one whistles in an extreme emergency.⁵⁵ One cannot “explain” pressure and stress themselves, one cannot get free of the actio in distans:⁵⁶—one has lost the belief in being able to explain at all, and admits with a wry expression that description and not explanation is all that is possible, that the dynamic interpretation of the world, with its denial of “empty space” and its little clumps of atoms, will shortly come to dominate physicists; though an inner quality in dynamis—— 619 (1885) The victorious concept “force,” by means of which our physicists have created God and the world, still needs to be completed: an inner will must be ascribed to it, which I designate as “will to power,” i.e., as an insatiable desire to manifest power; or as the employment and exercise of power, as a creative drive, etc. Physicists cannot eradicate “action at a distance” from their principles; nor can they eradicate a repellent force (or an attracting one). There is nothing for it: one is obliged to understand all motion, all “appearances,” all “laws,” only as symptoms of an inner event and to employ man as an analogy to this end. In the case of an animal, it is possible to trace all its drives to the will to power; likewise all the functions of organic life to this one source. 620 (1885-1886) Has a force ever been demonstrated? No, only effects translated into a completely foreign language. We are so used, however, to regularity in succession that its oddity no longer seems odd to us. 621 (1885-1886) A force we cannot imagine is an empty word and should be allowed no rights of citizenship in science; like the so-called purely mechanistic forces of attraction and repulsion, which are intended to make it possible for us to form an image of the world, no more! 622 (1885-1886) Pressure and stress, something unspeakably late, derivative, un-primeval. For they presuppose something that holds together and is able to exert pressure and stress! But how can it hold together?

623 (March-June 1888)

There is nothing unchanging in chemistry: this is only appearance, a mere school prejudice. We have slipped in the unchanging, my physicist friends, deriving it from metaphysics as always. To assert that diamond, graphite, and carbon are identical is to read off the facts naively from the surface. Why? Merely because no loss in substance can be shown on the scales! Very well, they have something in common; but the activity of molecules during the transformation, which we cannot see or weigh, turns one material into something different—with specifically different properties. 624 (1883-1888) Against the physical atom.—To comprehend the world, we have to be able to calculate it; to be able to calculate it, we have to have constant causes; because we find no such constant causes in actuality, we invent them for ourselves—the atoms. This is the origin of atomism. The calculability of the world, the expressibility of all events in formulas—is this really “comprehension”? How much of a piece of music has been understood when that in it which is calculable and can be reduced to formulas has been reckoned up?— And “constant causes,” things, substances, something “unconditioned”; invented—what has one achieved?

625 (March-June 1888)

The mechanistic concept of “motion” is already a translation of the original process into the sign language of sight and touch. The concept “atom,” the distinction between the “‘seat of a driving force and the force itself,” is a sign language derived from our logical-psychical world. We cannot change our means of expression at will: it is possible to understand to what extent they are mere signs. The demand for an adequate mode of expression is senseless: it is of the essence of a language, a means of expression, to express a mere relationship—The concept “truth” is nonsensical. The entire domain of “true-false” applies only to relations, not to an “in-itself”—There is no “essence-in-itself” (it is only relations that constitute an essence—), just as there can be no “knowledge-in-itself.” 626 (1883-1886) “The sensation of force cannot proceed from motion: sensation in general cannot proceed from motion.” “It is only an apparent experience that speaks in favor of this: in a substance (brain), sensations are produced by transmitted motion (stimuli). But produced? Would this prove that the sensation did not exist there at all? so that its appearance would have to be conceived as a creative act on the part of the motion? The sensationless state of this substance is only a hypothesis! it is not experienced!—Sensation is thus a property of substance: there are substances that have sensations.” “Do we discover from certain substances that they have no sensations? No, we only fail to discover that they have any. It is impossible to derive sensation from a substance without sensation.”—Oh what overhastiness! 627 (1885-1886) “Attraction” and “repulsion” in a purely mechanistic sense are complete fictions: a word. We cannot think of an attraction divorced from an intention.—The will to take possession of a thing or to defend oneself against it and repel it—that, we “understand”: that would be an interpretation of which we could make use. In short: the psychological necessity for a belief in causality lies in the inconceivability of an event divorced from intent; by which naturally nothing is said concerning truth or untruth (the justification of such a belief)! The belief in causae falls with the belief in téle (against Spinoza and his causalism). 628 (1885-1886) It is an illusion that something is known when we possess a mathematical formula for an event: it is only designated, described; nothing more! 629 (1883-1888) If I reduce a regular event to a formula, I have foreshortened, facilitated, etc., the description of the whole phenomenon. But I have established no “law,” I have raised the question how it happens that something here repeats itself: that the formula corresponds to a complex of initially unknown forces and discharges of force, is a supposition; it is mythology to think that forces here obey a law, so that, as a consequence of their obedience, we have the same phenomenon each time. 630 (1885) I beware of speaking of chemical “laws”: that savors of morality. It is far rather a question of the absolute establishment of power relationships: the stronger becomes master of the weaker, in so far as the latter cannot assert its degree of independence— here there is no mercy, no forbearance, even less a respect for “laws”! 631 (1885-1886) The unalterable sequence of certain phenomena demonstrates no “law” but a power relationship between two or more forces. To say “But this relationship itself remains constant” is to say no more than “One and the same force cannot also be another force.”— It is a question, not of succession, but of interpenetration, a process in which the individual successive moments are not related to one another as cause and effect— The separation of the “deed” from the “doer,” of the event from someone who produces events, of the process from a something that is not process but enduring, substance, thing, body, soul, etc.—the attempt to comprehend an event as a sort of shifting and place-changing on the part of a “being,” of something constant: this ancient mythology established the belief in “cause and effect” after it had found a firm form in the functions of language and grammar 632 (1885-1886) “Regularity” in succession is only a metaphorical expression, as if a rule were being followed here; not a fact. In the same way “conformity with a law.” We discover a formula by which to express an ever-recurring kind of result: we have therewith discovered no “law,” even less a force that is the cause of the recurrence of a succession of results. That something always happens thus and thus is here interpreted as if a creature always acted thus and thus as a result of obedience to a law or a lawgiver, while it would be free to act otherwise were it not for the “law.” But precisely this thus-and-not-otherwise might be inherent in the creature, which might behave thus and thus, not in response to a law, but because it is constituted thus and thus. All it would mean is: something cannot also be something else, cannot do now this and now something else, is neither free nor unfree but simply thus and thus. The mistake lies in the fictitious insertion of a subject.

633 (March-June 1888)

Two successive states, the one “cause,” the other “effect”: this is false. The first has nothing to effect, the second has been effected by nothing. It is a question of a struggle between two elements of unequal power: a new arrangement of forces is achieved according to the measure of power of each of them. The second condition is something fundamentally different from the first (not its effect): the essential thing is that the factions in struggle emerge with different quanta of power.

634 (March-June 1888)

Critique of the mechanistic theory.— Let us here dismiss the two popular concepts “necessity” and “law”: the former introduces a false constraint into the world, the latter a false freedom. “Things” do not behave regularly, according to a rule: there are no things (—they are fictions invented by us); they behave just as little under the constraint of necessity. There is no obedience here: for that something is as it is, as strong or as weak, is not the consequence of an obedience or a rule or a compulsion— The degree of resistance and the degree of superior power— this is the question in every event: if, for our day-to-day calculations, we know how to express this in formulas and “laws,” so much the better for us! But we have not introduced any “morality” into the world by the fiction that it is obedient—. There is no law: every power draws its ultimate consequence at every moment. Calculability exists precisely because things are unable to be other than they are. A quantum of power is designated by the effect it produces and that which it resists. The adaphorous state is missing, though it is thinkable. It is essentially a will to violate and to defend oneself against violation. Not self-preservation: every atom affects the whole of being—it is thought away if one thinks away this radiation of power-will. That is why I call it a quantum of “will to power”: it expresses the characteristic that cannot be thought out of the mechanistic order without thinking away this order itself. A translation of this world of effect into a visible world—a world for the eyes—is the conception “motion.” This always carries the idea that something is moved—this always supposes, whether as the fiction of a little clump of atom or even as the abstraction of this, the dynamic atom, a thing that produces effects—i.e., we have not got away from the habit into which our senses and language seduce us. Subject, object, a doer added to the doing, the doing separated from that which it does: let us not forget that this is mere semeiotics and nothing real. Mechanistic theory as a theory of motion is already a translation into the sense language of man.⁵⁹

635 (March-June 1888)

We need “unities” in order to be able to reckon: that does not mean we must suppose that such unities exist. We have borrowed the concept of unity from our “ego” concept—our oldest article of faith. If we did not hold ourselves to be unities, we would never have formed the concept “thing.” Now, somewhat late, we are firmly convinced that our conception of the ego does not guarantee any actual unity. In order to sustain the theory of a mechanistic world, therefore, we always have to stipulate to what extent we are employing two fictions: the concept of motion (taken from our sense language) and the concept of the atom (= unity, deriving from our psychical “experience”): the mechanistic theory presupposes a sense prejudice and a psychological prejudice. Mechanistic theory formulates consecutive appearances, and it does so semeiotically, in terms of the senses and of psychology (that all effect is motion; that where there is motion something is moved); it does not touch upon the causal force. The mechanistic world is imagined as only sight and touch imagine a world (as “moved”)—so as to be calculable—thus causal unities are invented, “things” (atoms) whose effect remains constant (—transference of the false concept of subject to the concept of the atom). The following are therefore phenomenal: the injection of the concept of number, the concept of the thing (concept of the subject), the concept of activity (separation of cause from effect), the concept of motion (sight and touch) : our eye and our psychology are still part of it. If we eliminate these additions, no things remain but only dynamic quanta, in a relation of tension to all other dynamic quanta: their essence lies in their relation to all other quanta, in their “effect” upon the same. The will to power not a being, not a becoming, but a pathos—the most elemental fact from which a becoming and effecting first emerge—

636 (March-June 1888)

Physicists believe in a “true world” in their own fashion: a firm systematization of atoms in necessary motion, the same for all beings—so for them the “apparent world” is reduced to the side of universal and universally necessary being which is accessible to every being in its own way (accessible and also already adapted — made “subjective”). But they are in error. The atom they posit is inferred according to the logic of the perspectivism of consciousness—and is therefore itself a subjective fiction. This world picture that they sketch differs in no essential way from the subjective world picture: it is only construed with more extended senses, but with our senses nonetheless— And in any case they left something out of the constellation without knowing it: precisely this necessary perspectivism by virtue of which every center of force—and not only man—construes all the rest of the world from its own viewpoint, i.e., measures, feels, forms, according to its own force— They forgot to include this perspective-setting force in “true being”—in school language: the subject. They think this is “evolved,” added later; but even the chemist needs it: it is being specific, definitely acting and reacting thus and thus, as may be the case. Perspectivism is only a complex form of specificity. My idea is that every specific body strives to become master over all space and to extend its force (—its will to power;) and to thrust back all that resists its extension. But it continually encounters similar efforts on the part of other bodies and ends by coming to an arrangement (“union”) with those of them that are sufficiently related to it: thus they then conspire together for power. And the process goes on— 637 (1885) Even in the domain of the inorganic an atom of force is concerned only with its neighborhood: distant forces balance one another. Here is the kernel of the perspective view and why a living creature is “egoistic” through and through. 638 (1885-1886) Supposing that the world had a certain quantum of force at its disposal, then it is obvious that every displacement of power at any point would affect the whole system—thus together with sequential causality there would be a contiguous and concurrent dependence.

639 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The sole way of maintaining a meaning for the concept “God” would be: God not as the driving force, but God as a maximal state, as an epoch—a point in the evolution of the will to power by means of which further evolution just as much as previous evolution up to him could be explained. Regarded mechanistically, the energy of the totality of becoming remains constant; regarded economically, it rises to a high point and sinks down again in an eternal circle. This “will to power” expresses itself in the interpretation, in the manner in which force is used up; transformation of energy into life, and “life at its highest potency,” thus appears as the goal. The same quantum of energy means different things at different stages of evolution. That which constitutes growth in life is an ever more thrifty and more far-seeing economy, which achieves more and more with less and less force— As an ideal, the principle of the smallest expenditure— That the world is not striving toward a stable condition is the only thing that has been proved. Consequently one must conceive its climactic condition in such a way that it is not a condition of equilibrium— The absolute necessity of similar events occurring in the course of one world, as in all others, is in eternity not a determinism ruling events, but merely the expression of the fact that the impossible is not possible; that a certain force cannot be anything other than this certain force; that it can react to a quantum of resisting force only according to the measure of its strength;— event and necessary event is a tautology. A. The Organic Process 640 (1883-1888) Man thinks of himself as having been present when the organic world originated: what was there to be perceived by sight and touch when this event took place? What can be reduced to figures? What laws are revealed in the motions? Thus: man wants to arrange all events as events accessible to sight and touch, consequently as motions: he wants to find formulas so as to simplify the tremendous quantity of his experiences. Reduction of all events to the level of the man of the senses and the mathematician. It is a question of an inventory of human experiences—under the supposition that man, or rather the human eye and ability to form concepts, are the eternal witness of all things. 641 (1883-1888) A multiplicity of forces, connected by a common mode of nutrition, we call “life.” To this mode of nutrition, as a means of making it possible, belong all so-called feelings, ideas, thoughts; i.e., (1) a resistance to all other forces; (2) an adjustment of the same according to form and rhythm; (3) an estimate in regard to assimilation or excretion. 642 (1885) The connection between the inorganic and the organic must lie in the repelling force exercised by every atom of force. “Life” would be defined as an enduring form of processes of the establishment of force, in which the different contenders grow unequally. To what extent resistance is present even in obedience; individual power is by no means surrendered. In the same way, there is in commanding an admission that the absolute power of the opponent has not been vanquished, incorporated, disintegrated. “Obedience” and “commanding” are forms of struggle. 643 (1885-1886) The will to power interprets (—it is a question of interpretation when an organ is constructed): it defines limits, determines degrees, variations of power. Mere variations of power could not feel themselves to be such: there must be present something that wants to grow and interprets the value of whatever else wants to grow. Equal in that— In fact, interpretation is itself a means of becoming master of something (The organic process constantly presupposes interpretations.) 644 (1883-1888) Greater complexity, sharp differentiation, the contiguity of developed organs and functions with the disappearance of the intermediate members—if that is perfection, then there is a will to power in the organic process by virtue of which dominant, shaping, commanding forces continually extend the bounds of their power and continually simplify within these bounds: the imperative grows. “Spirit” is only a means and tool in the service of higher life, of the enhancement of life; and as for the good, as Plato (and after him Christianity) understood it, it seems to me to be actually a life-endangering, life-calumniating, life-denying principle. 645 (1885) That “heredity,” as something quite unexplained, cannot be employed as an explanation but only to describe and fix a problem. The same applies to “power of adaptation.” Indeed, the morphological presentation, even if it were complete, explains nothing, but only describes a tremendous fact. How an organ can be employed to achieve something is not explained. In these matters, the assumption of causae finales explains as little as the assumption of causae efficientes. The concept of “causa” is only a means of expression, nothing more; a means of description. 646 (7555) There are analogies; e.g., a memory analogous to our memory that reveals itself in heredity and evolution and forms. An inventiveness in the application of tools to new ends analogous to our inventiveness and experimentation, etc. That which we call our “consciousness” is innocent of any of the essential processes of our preservation and our growth; and no head is so subtle that it could construe more than a machine—to which every organic process is far superior. 647 (1883-1888) Against Darwinism— The utility of an organ does not explain its origin; on the contrary! For most of the time during which a property is forming it does not preserve the individual and is of no use to him, least of all in the struggle with external circumstances and enemies. What, after all, is “useful”? One must ask “useful in relation to what?” E.g., that which is useful for the long life of the individual might be unfavorable to its strength and splendor; that which preserves the individual might at the same time arrest and halt its evolution On the other hand, a deficiency, a degeneration, can be of the highest utility in so far as it acts as a stimulant to other organs. In the same way, a state of need can be a condition of existence, in so far as it reduces an individual to that measure of expenditure which holds it together but prevents it from squandering itself.— The individual itself as a struggle between parts (for food, space, etc.) : its evolution tied to the victory or predominance of individual parts, to an atrophy, a “becoming an organ” of other parts. The influence of “external circumstances” is overestimated by Darwin to a ridiculous extent: the essential thing in the life process is precisely the tremendous shaping, form-creating force working from within which utilizes and exploits “external circumstances”— The new forms molded from within are not formed with an end in view; but in the struggle of the parts a new form is not left long without being related to a partial usefulness and then, according to its use, develops itself more and more completely.62 648 (1883-1888) “Useful” in respect of acceleration of the tempo of evolution is a different kind of “useful” from that in respect of the greatest possible stability and durability of that which is evolved. 649 (1883-1888) “Useful” in the sense of Darwinist biology means: proved advantageous in the struggle with others. But it seems to me that the feeling of increase, the feeling of becoming stronger, is itself, quite apart from any usefulness in the struggle, the real progress: only from this feeling does there arise the will to struggle— 650 (1885-1886) Physiologists should think again before positing the “instinct of preservation” as the cardinal drive in an organic creature. A living thing wants above all to discharge its force: “preservation” is only a consequence of this.— Beware of superfluous teleological principles! The entire concept “instinct of preservation” is one of them.

651 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

One cannot ascribe the most basic and primeval activities of protoplasm to a will to self-preservation, for it takes into itself absurdly more than would be required to preserve it; and, above all, it does not thereby “preserve itself,” it falls apart—The drive that rules here has to explain precisely this absence of desire for self-preservation: “hunger” is an interpretation based on far more complicated organisms (—hunger is a specialized and later form of the drive, an expression of a division of labor in the service of a higher drive that rules over it).

652 (March-June 1888)

It is not possible to take hunger as the primum mobile,⁶³ any more than self-preservation. To understand hunger as a consequence of undernourishment means: hunger as the consequence of a will to power that no longer achieves mastery. It is by no means a question of replacing a loss—only later, as a result of the division of labor, after the will to power has learned to take other roads to its satisfaction, is an organism's need to appropriate reduced to hunger, to the need to replace what has been lost.

653 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The false “altruism” of biologists is ridiculous: propagation among amoebas seems to be the throwing off of ballast, a pure advantage. The excretion of useless material. 654 (1885-1886) A protoplasm divides in two when its power is no longer adequate to control what it has appropriated: procreation is the consequence of an impotency. When, from hunger, the males seek out the females and are united with them, procreation is the consequence of a hunger. 655 (1885) The weaker presses to the stronger from a need for nourishment; it wants to get under it, if possible to become one with it. The stronger, on the contrary, drives others away; it does not want to perish in this manner; it grows and in growing it splits itself into two or more parts. The greater the impulse toward unity, the more firmly may one conclude that weakness is present; the greater the impulse towards variety, differentiation, inner decay, the more force is present. The drive to approach—and the drive to thrust something back are the bond, in both the inorganic and the organic world. The entire distinction is a prejudice. The will to power in every combination of forces, defending itself against the stronger, lunging at the weaker, is more correct. N.B.: Processes as “entities.”⁶⁴

656 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The will to power can manifest itself only against resistances; therefore it seeks that which resists it—this is the primeval tendency of the protoplasm when it extends pseudopodia and feels about. Appropriation and assimilation are above all a desire to overwhelm, a forming, shaping and reshaping, until at length that which has been overwhelmed has entirely gone over into the power domain of the aggressor and has increased the same.— If this incorporation is not successful, then the form probably falls to pieces; and the duality appears as a consequence of the will to power: in order not to let go what has been conquered, the will to power divides itself into two wills (in some cases without completely surrendering the connection between its two parts). “Hunger” is only a narrower adaptation after the basic drive for power has won a more spiritual form. 657 (1886-1887) What is “passive”?— To be hindered from moving forward: thus an act of resistance and reaction. What is “active”?—reaching out for power. “Nourishment”—is only derivative; the original phenomenon is: to desire to incorporate everything. “Procreation”—only derivative; originally: where one will was not enough to organize the entire appropriated material, there came into force an opposing will which took in hand the separation; a new center of organization, after a struggle with the original will. “Pleasure”—as a feeling of power (presupposing displeasure). 658 (1885) The organic functions translated back to the basic will, the will to power—and understood as offshoots. The will to power specializes as will to nourishment, to property, to tools, to servants (those who obey) and masters: the body as an example.— The stronger will directs the weaker. There is absolutely no other kind of causality than that of will upon will. Not explained mechanistically. Thinking, feeling, willing in all living beings. What is a pleasure but: an excitation of the feeling of power by an obstacle (even more strongly by rhythmic obstacles and resistances)—so it swells up. Thus all pleasure includes pain.— If the pleasure is to be very great, the pains must be very protracted and the tension of the bow tremendous. The spiritual functions. Will to shape, to assimilate, etc. B. Man 659 (1885) The evidence of the body.— Granted that the “soul” is an attractive and mysterious idea which philosophers have rightly abandoned only with reluctance—perhaps that which they have since learned to put in its place is even more attractive, even more mysterious. The human body, in which the most distant and most recent past of all organic development again becomes living and corporeal, through which and over and beyond which a tremendous inaudible stream seems to flow: the body is a more astonishing idea than the old “soul.” In all ages, there has been more faith in the body, as our most personal possession, our most certain being, in short our ego, than in the spirit (or the “soul,” or the subject, as school language now has it instead of soul). It has never occurred to anyone to regard his stomach as a strange or, say, a divine stomach: but to conceive his ideas as “inspired,” his evaluations as “implanted by a God,” his instincts as activity in a half-light—for this tendency and taste in men there are witnesses from all ages of mankind. Even now there is ample evidence among artists of a sort of wonderment and respectful suspension of judgment when they are faced with the question of the means by which they achieved their best work and from which world the creative idea came to them; when they ask this, they exhibit some-think like innocence and childlike shamefacedness; they hardly dare to say “it came from me, it was my hand that threw the dice.” Conversely, even those philosophers and religious teachers who had the most compelling ground in their logic and piety to consider their bodies a deception (and, indeed, as a deception overcome and done with) could not help acknowledging the foolish fact that the body has not gone away; of which the strangest witnesses are to be found partly in Paul, partly in the Vedanta philosophy. But what, after all, does strength of belief mean? It could still be a very foolish belief!— This should be reflected on: — And after all, if belief in the body is only the result of an inference: supposing it were a false inference, as the idealists assert, is it not a question mark against the spirit itself that it should be the cause of such false inferences? Supposing multiplicity, space and time, and motion (and whatever else may be the presuppositions of a belief in what is bodily) were errors—what mistrust would this arouse against the spirit that had prompted such presuppositions? Let it suffice that, for the present, belief in the body is always a stronger belief than belief in the spirit; and whoever desires to undermine it, also undermines at the same time most thoroughly belief in the authority of the spirit! 660 (1885-1886)

The Body as a Political Structure. The aristocracy in the body, the majority of the rulers (struggle between cells and tissues). Slavery and division of labor: the higher type possible only through the subjugation of the lower, so that it becomes a function. Pleasure and pain not opposites. The feeling of power. “Nourishment” only a consequence of insatiable appropriation, of the will to power. “Procreation,” the crumbling that supervenes when the ruling cells are incapable of organizing that which has been appropriated. It is the shaping force that desires an ever new supply of “material” (more “force”). The masterpiece of the construction of an organism from an egg. “Mechanistic interpretation”: desires nothing but quantities; but force is to be found in quality. Mechanistic theory can therefore only describe processes, not explain them. “Purpose.” One should start from the “sagacity” of plants. Concept of “perfecting”: not only greater complexity, but greater power (—does not have to be merely greater mass—). Inference concerning the evolution of mankind: perfecting consists in the production of the most powerful individuals, who will use the great mass of people as their tools (and indeed the most intelligent and most pliable tools). 661 (1883-1888) Why is all activity, even that of a sense, associated with pleasure?

Because before it an obstacle, a burden existed? Or rather because all doing is an overcoming, a becoming master, and increases the feeling of power?— Pleasure in thinking.— Ultimately, it is not only the feeling of power, but the pleasure in creating and in the thing created; for all activity enters our consciousness as consciousness of a “work.” 662 (1883-1888) Creation—as selection and finishing of the thing selected. (This is the essential thing in every act of will.) 663 (1885-1886) All events that result from intention are reducible to the intention to increase power. 664 (1883-1888) When we do something there arises a feeling of force,⁶⁵ often even before the deed, occasioned by the idea of what is to be done (as at the sight of an enemy or an obstacle to which we feel ourselves equal): it is always an accompanying feeling. We instinctively think that this feeling of force is the cause of the action, that it is “the force.” Our belief in causality is belief in force and its effect; a transference from our experience; and we identify force and the feeling of force.— Force, however, never moves things; the force we feel “does not set the muscles in motion.” “We have no idea, no experience, of such a process.”— “Just as we have no experience of force as the cause of motion, so we have no experience of the necessity of any motion.” Force is supposed to be that which compels! “We experience only that one thing follows upon another.— We have no experience of either compulsion or arbitrariness in the following of one thing upon another.” Causality is created only by thinking compulsion into the process. A certain “comprehension” is the consequence, i.e., we have made the process more human, “more familiar”: the familiar is the familiar habit of human compulsion associated with the feeling of force. 665 (1883-1888) I have the intention of raising my arm: supposing I know as little of the physiology of the human body and the mechanical laws of its motion as the man in the street, what could really be more vague, pale, uncertain than this intention, when compared with what follows upon it? And suppose I am the most astute of mechanics and specially instructed in the formulas applicable here, I should not be able to raise my arm one whit the better or the worse. Our “knowledge” and our “deed” lie in this case coldly apart, as if in two different domains.— On the other hand: Napoleon executed a plan of campaign—what does that mean? Here everything pertaining to the execution of the plan is known, because everything has to be transmitted by command; but here, too, subordinates are presupposed who interpret and apply the general plan to the needs of the moment, measure of force, etc. 666 (1883-1888) From time immemorial we have ascribed the value of an action, a character, an existence, to the intention, the purpose for the sake of which one has acted or lived: this age-old idiosyncrasy finally takes a dangerous turn— provided, that is, that the absence of intention and purpose in events comes more and more to the forefront of consciousness. Thus there seems to be in preparation a universal disvaluation: “Nothing has any meaning”—this melancholy sentence means “All meaning lies in intention, and if intention is altogether lacking, then meaning is altogether lacking, too.” In accordance with this valuation, one was constrained to transfer the value of life to a “life after death,” or to the progressive development of ideas or of mankind or of the people or beyond mankind; but with that one had arrived at a progressus in infinitum of purposes: one was at last constrained to make a place for oneself in the “world process” (perhaps with the dysdaemonistic perspective that it was a process into nothingness). In this regard, “purpose” requires a more vigorous critique: one must understand that an action is never caused by a purpose; that purpose and means are interpretations whereby certain points in an event are emphasized and selected at the expense of other points, which, indeed, form the majority; that every single time something is done with a purpose in view, something fundamentally different and other occurs; that every purposive action is like the supposed purposiveness of the heat the sun gives off: the enormously greater part is squandered; a part hardly worth considering serves a “purpose,” has “meaning”; that a “purpose” and its “means” provide an indescribably imprecise description, which can, indeed, issue commands as a prescription, as a “will,” but which presupposes a system of obedient and trained tools, which in place of indefinite entities posit nothing but fixed magnitudes (i.e., we imagine a system of shrewder but narrower intellects that posit purposes and means, in order to be able to ascribe to our only known “purpose” the role of the “cause of an action,” to which procedure we really have no right: it would mean solving a problem by placing the solution in a world inaccessible to our observation—). Finally: why could “a purpose” not be an epiphenomenon in the series of changes in the activating forces that bring about the purposive action—a pale image sketched in consciousness beforehand that serves to orient us concerning events, even as a symptom of events, not as their cause?— But with this we have criticized the will itself: is it not an illusion to take for a cause that which rises to consciousness as an act of will? Are not all phenomena of consciousness merely terminal phenomena, final links in a chain, but apparently conditioning one another in their succession on one level of consciousness? This could be an illusion— 667 (1883-1888) Science does not ask what drives us to this will: it rather denies that will is exercised, and holds that something quite different occurs—in short, that the belief in “will” and “purpose” is an illusion. It does not inquire after the motives of an action, as if these had been present in consciousness before the action; but it first breaks up the action into a group of mechanistic phenomena and seeks the previous history of this mechanistic motion—but it does not seek it in feeling, sensation, thinking. It can never take the explanation from this quarter: sensation is precisely the material that is to be explained.— Its problem is: to explain the world without taking sensations as causes; for that would mean: considering sensations as the cause of sensations.

Its task is certainly not accomplished Therefore: either no will—the hypothesis of science—or free will. The latter assumption the dominant feeling from which we cannot get loose, even if the scientific hypothesis were proved true. The popular belief in cause and effect is founded on the presupposition that free will is the cause of every effect: it is only from this that we derive the feeling of causality. Thus there is also in it the feeling that every cause is not an effect but always only a cause—if the will is the cause. “Our acts of will are not necessary”—this idea is contained in the concept “will.” What is necessary is the effect following upon the cause—that is what we feel. That our willing, too, is in every case a compulsion is a hypothesis.

668 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

“Willing” is not “desiring,” striving, demanding; it is distinguished from these by the affect of commanding. There is no such thing as “willing,” but only a willing something: one must not remove the aim from the total condition— as epistemologists do. “Willing” as they understand it is as little a reality as “thinking”: it is a pure fiction. It is part of willing that something is commanded (—which naturally does not mean that the will is “effected”). That state of tension by virtue of which a force seeks to discharge itself—is not an example of “willing.”

669 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

“Displeasure” and “pleasure” are the most stupid means imaginable of expressing judgments: which naturally does not mean that the judgments made audible in this manner must be stupid. The abandonment of all substantiation and logicity, a Yes or No in the reduction to a passionate desire to have or a rejection, an imperative abbreviation whose utility is unmistakable: this is pleasure and displeasure. It originates in the central sphere of the intellect; its presupposition is an infinitely speeded-up perception, ordering, subsumption, calculating, inferring: pleasure and displeasure are always terminal phenomena, not “causes.” The decision about what arouses pleasure and what arouses displeasure depends upon the degree of power: something that in relation to a small quantum of power appears dangerous and seems to require the speediest defense, can evoke, given the consciousness of greater power, a voluptuous excitement and a feeling of pleasure. All feelings of pleasure and displeasure presuppose a calculation of utility and harmfulness to the whole; in other words, a sphere where an end (a state) is desired and means for it are selected. Pleasure and displeasure are never “basic facts.” Feelings of pleasure and displeasure are reactions of the will (affects), in which the intellectual center fixes the value of certain changes which have occurred in relation to the value of the whole; at the same time the introduction of counteractions. 670 (1883-1888) The belief in “affects.”—Affects are a construction of the intellect, an invention of causes that do not exist. All general bodily feelings that we do not understand are interpreted intellectually; i.e., a reason is sought in persons, experiences, etc., for why one feels this way or that. Thus something disadvantageous, dangerous, or strange is posited as the cause of our ill humor; in fact, it is added on to ill humor, in order to render our condition comprehensible. Frequent rushes of blood to the brain accompanied by a choking sensation are interpreted as “anger”: persons and things that rouse us to anger are means of relieving our physiological condition. — Subsequently, after long habituation, certain incidents are so regularly associated with certain general feelings that the sight of certain incidents arouses the corresponding feeling and in particular brings with it this congestion of blood, production of semen, etc., through closeness of association. We then say that “the affect is aroused.” Judgments already inhere in “pleasure” and “displeasure”; stimuli are differentiated according to whether or not they further the feeling of power. The belief in willing. To posit a belief as the cause of a mechanistic motion is to believe in miracles. The consistency of science demands that, once we have made the world thinkable by means of little images, we should also make the affects, desires, will, etc., thinkable, i.e., deny them and treat them as errors of the intellect. 671 (1883-1888) Freedom of will or no freedom of will?—There is no such thing as “will”; it is only a simplifying conception of understanding, as is “matter.” All actions must first be made possible mechanically before they are willed. Or: the “purpose” usually comes into the mind only after everything has been prepared for its execution. The end is an “inner” “stimulus”—no more. 672 (1883-1888) The most recent history of an action relates to this action; but further back lies a prehistory which covers a wider field: the individual action is at the same time a part of a much more extensive, later fact. The briefer and the more extended processes are not separated— 673 (1883-1888) Theory of chance. The soul a selective and self-nourishing entity, perpetually extremely shrewd and creative (this creative force is usually overlooked! is conceived only as “passive”). To recognize the active force, the creative force in the chance event:—chance itself is only the clash of creative impulses.

674 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

In the tremendous multiplicity of events within an organism, the part which becomes conscious to us is a mere means: and the little bit of “virtue,” “selflessness,” and similar fictions are refuted radically by the total balance of events. We should study our organism in all its immorality— The animal functions are, as a matter of principle, a million times more important than all our beautiful moods and heights of consciousness: the latter are a surplus, except when they have to serve as tools of those animal functions. The entire conscious life, the spirit along with the soul, the heart, goodness, and virtue—in whose service do they labor? In the service of the greatest possible perfection of the means (means of nourishment, means of enhancement) of the basic animal functions: above all, the enhancement of life. What one used to call “body” and “flesh” is of such unspeakably greater importance: the remainder is a small accessory. The task of spinning on the chain of life, and in such a way that the thread grows ever more powerful—that is the task. But consider how heart, soul, virtue, spirit practically conspire together to subvert this systematic task—as if they were the end in view!— The degeneration of life is conditioned essentially by the extraordinary proneness to error of consciousness: it is held in check by instinct the least of all and therefore blunders the longest and the most thoroughly. To measure whether existence has value according to the pleasant or unpleasant feelings aroused in this consciousness: can one think of a madder extravagance of vanity? For it is only a means—and pleasant or unpleasant feelings are also only means! What is the objective measure of value? Solely the quantum of enhanced and organized power.⁶⁷

675 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

[The value of devaluing.— What I demand is]68 that one should take the doer back into the deed after having conceptually removed the doer and thus emptied the deed; that one should take doing something, the “aim,” the “intention,” the “purpose,” back into the deed after having artificially removed all this and thus emptied the deed. All “purposes,” “aims,” “meaning” are only modes of expression and metamorphoses of one will that is inherent in all events: the will to power. To have purposes, aims, intentions, willing in general, is the same thing as willing to be stronger, willing to grow—and, in addition, willing the means to this. The most universal and basic instinct in all doing and willing has for precisely this reason remained the least known and most hidden, because in praxi we always follow its commandments, because we are this commandment— All valuations are only consequences and narrow perspectives in the service of this one will: valuation itself is only this will to power. A critique of being from the point of view of any one of these values is something absurd and erroneous. Even supposing that a process of decline begins in this way, this process still stands in the service of this will. To appraise being itself! But this appraisal itself is still this being!—and if we say no, we still do what we are. One must comprehend the absurdity of this posture of judging existence, and then try to understand what is really involved in it. It is symptomatic. 676 (1883-1888) On the Origin of Our Evaluations We can analyze our body spatially, and then we gain precisely the same image of it as we have of the stellar system, and the distinction between the organic and inorganic is no longer noticeable. Formerly, one explained the motions of the stars as effects produced by entities conscious of a purpose. One no longer needs this explanation, and in regard to bodily motions and changes, too, one has long since abandoned the belief in an explanation by means of a consciousness that determines purposes. By far the greater number of motions have nothing whatever to do with consciousness; nor with sensation. Sensations and thoughts are something extremely insignificant and rare in relation to the countless number of events that occur every moment. On the other hand, we perceive that a purposiveness rules over the smallest events that is beyond our understanding: planning, selectivity, co-ordination, reparation, etc. In short, we discover an activity that would have to be ascribed to a far higher and more comprehensive intellect than we know of. We learn to think less highly of all that is conscious; we unlearn responsibility for ourselves, since we as conscious, purposive creatures, are only the smallest part of us. Of the numerous influences operating at every moment, e.g., air, electricity, we sense almost nothing; there could well be forces that, although we never sense them, continually influence us. Pleasure and pain are very rare and scarce appearances compared with the countless stimuli that a cell or organ exercises upon another cell or organ. We are in the phase of modesty of consciousness. Ultimately, we understand the conscious ego itself only as a tool in the service of a higher, comprehensive intellect; and then we are able to ask whether all conscious willing, all conscious purposes, all evaluations are not perhaps only means through which something essentially different from what appears in consciousness is to be achieved. We think: it is a question of our pleasure and displeasure—but pleasure and displeasure could be means through which we have to achieve something that lies outside our consciousness.—It must be shown to what extent everything conscious remains on the surface; how an action and the image of an action differ, how little one knows of what precedes an action; how fantastic are our feelings of “freedom of will,” “cause and effect”; how thoughts and images are, like words, only signs of thoughts; the inexplicability of every action; the superficiality of all praise and blame; how essential fiction and conceits are in which we dwell consciously; how all our words refer to fictions (our affects, too), and how the bond between man and man depends on the transmission and elaboration of these fictions; while fundamentally the real bond (through procreation) goes its unknown way. Does this belief in common fictions really change men? Or is the entire realm of ideas and evaluations itself only an expression of unknown changes? Are there really will, purposes, thoughts, values? Is the whole of conscious life perhaps only a reflected image? And even when evaluation seems to determine the nature of a man, fundamentally something quite different is happening! In short: supposing that purposiveness in the work of nature could be explained without the assumption of an ego that posits purposes: could our positing of purposes, our willing, etc, not perhaps be also only a language of signs for something altogether different, namely something that does not will and is unconscious? Only the faintest reflection of that natural expediency in the organic but not different from it? Put briefly: perhaps the entire evolution of the spirit is a question of the body; it is the history of the development of a higher body that emerges into our sensibility. The organic is rising to yet higher levels. Our lust for knowledge of nature is a means through which the body desires to perfect itself. Or rather: hundreds of thousands of experiments are made to change the nourishment, the mode of living and of dwelling of the body; consciousness and evaluations in the body, all kinds of pleasure and displeasure, are signs of these changes and experiments. In the long run, it is not a question of man at all: he is to be overcome. 677 (1883-1888) To What Extent Interpretations of the World are Symptoms of a Ruling Drive The artistic view of the world. to sit down to contemplate life. But any analysis of the aesthetic outlook is lacking its reduction to cruelty, a feeling of security, playing the judge and standing outside, etc. One must examine the artist himself, and his psychology (critique of the drive to play as a release of force, a pleasure in change, in impressing one’s soul on something foreign, the absolute egoism of the artist, etc.) What drives he sublimates. The scientific view of the world: critique of the psychological need for science. The desire to make comprehensible; the desire to make practical, useful, exploitable—to what extent anti-aesthetic. Only value, what can be counted and calculated. How an average type of man seeks to gain the upper hand in this way. Dreadful when history is appropriated in this way—the realm of the superior, of those who judge. What drives they sublime! The religious view of the world: critique of the religious man. He is not necessarily the moral man, but the man of powerful exaltations and deep depressions who interprets the former with gratitude or suspicion and does not derive them from himself (—not the latter either). Essentially the man who feels himself “unfree,” who sublimates his moods, his instincts of subjection. The moral view of the world: The feelings of a social order of rank are projected into the universe: irremovability, law, classification and co-ordination, because they are valued the highest, are also sought in the highest places—above the universe or behind the universe. What is common to all: the ruling drives want to be viewed also as the highest courts of value in general, indeed as creative and ruling powers. It is clear that these drives either oppose or subject each other (join together synthetically or alternate in dominating). Their profound antagonism is so great, however, that where they all seek satisfaction, a man of profound mediocrity must result. 678 (1883-1888) Whether the origin of our apparent “knowledge” is not to be sought solely in older evaluations which have become so much part of us that they belong to our basic constitution? So that what really happens is only that newer needs grapple with the results of the oldest needs? The world seen, felt, interpreted as thus and thus so that organic life may preserve itself in this perspective of interpretation. Man is not only a single individual but one particular line of the total living organic world. That he endures proves that a species of interpretation (even though accretions are still being added) has also endured, that the system of interpretation has not changed. “Adaptation.” Our “dissatisfaction,” our “ideal,” etc., is perhaps the consequence of this incorporated piece of interpretation, of our perspective point of view; perhaps organic life will in the end perish through it—even as the division of labor in organisms is accompanied by a withering and weakening of the parts, and finally leads to the death of the whole. The destruction of organic life, even in its highest form, must follow the same pattern as the destruction of the individual. 679 (1883-1888) Individuation, judged from the standpoint of the theory of descent, demonstrates a continual falling apart of one into two, and also the continual passing away of individuals who carry forward the evolution: by far the greater number die out every time (“the body”). The basic phenomenon: countless individuals sacrificed for the sake of a few, to make them possible.— One must not let oneself be deceived; it is just the same with peoples and races: they constitute the “body” for the production of isolated valuable individuals, who carry on the great process. 680 (1883-1888) Against the theory that the isolated individual has in view the advantage of the species, of his posterity, at the cost of his own advantage: that is only an appearance. The tremendous importance the individual accords to the sexual instinct is not a result of its importance for the species, but arises because procreation is the real achievement of the individual and consequently his highest interest, his highest expression of power (not judged from the consciousness but from the center of the whole individuation). 681 (1883-1888) Basic errors of biologists hitherto: it is not a question of the species but of more powerful individuals. (The many are only a means). Life is not the adaptation of inner circumstances to outer ones, but will to power, which, working from within, incorporates and subdues more and more of that which is “outside.” These biologists carry forward moral evaluations (—the “higher value of altruism,” hostility against the lust to dominate, against war, against what is not useful, against orders of rank and class).

682 (Spring-Fall 1887)

In natural science, the moral depreciation of the ego goes hand in hand with an overestimation of the species. But the species is something just as illusory as the ego: one had made a false distinction. The ego is a hundred times more than merely a unit in the chain of members; it is this chain itself, entirely; and the species is a mere abstraction from the multiplicity of these chains and their partial similarity. That the individual is sacrificed to the species, as has so often been asserted, is certainly not a fact; rather only an example of false interpretation.

683 (March-June 1888)

Formula for the superstitious belief in “progress,” by a famous physiologist of the cerebral activities: “L’animal ne fait jamais de progrès comme espèce. L’homme seul fait de progrès comme espèce.”⁶⁸

684 (March-June 1888)

Anti-Darwin. The domestication of man: what definite value can it have? or has domestication in general any definite value?— There are grounds for denying the latter. The school of Darwin certainly makes a great effort to convince us of the reverse: it wants to show that the effect of domestication can become profound, even fundamental. In the meantime, we stick to our old opinion: up to now, domestication has produced only quite superficial effects—when it has not produced degeneration. And everything that eludes the hand and discipline of man returns almost at once to its natural state. The type remains constant: one cannot “dénaturer la nature.” One counts on the struggle for existence, the death of the weaker creatures and the survival of the most robust and gifted; consequently one imagines a continual growth in perfection. We have convinced ourselves, conversely, that in the struggle for existence chance serves the weak as well as the strong; that cunning often prevails over strength; that the fruitfulness of the species stands in a notable relation to its chances of destruction— One credits natural selection at the same time with the power of slow and endless metamorphosis; one wants to believe that every advantage is inherited and grows stronger and stronger with succeeding generations (whereas heredity is so capricious that—); one observes the fortunate adaptation of certain creatures to very special conditions of life, and one explains that these adaptations result from the influence of the milieu. But one nowhere finds any example of unconscious selection (absolutely not). The most disparate individuals unite with one another, the extremes are submerged in the mass. Everything competes to preserve its type; creatures with exterior markings to protect them from danger do not lose them when they encounter conditions in which they live without danger— When they live in places in which their dress ceases to hide them they do not by any means adapt to the new milieu. One has so exaggerated the selection of the most beautiful that it greatly exceeds the drive to beauty in our own race! In fact, the most beautiful mate with utterly disinherited creatures, and the biggest with the smallest. We almost always see males and females take advantage of any chance encounter, exhibiting no selectivity whatsoever.— Modification through food and climate—but in reality a matter of complete indifference. There are no transitional forms.— Different species derived from one Experience says that one type becomes master again.⁶⁹ One asserts the increasing evolution of creatures. All grounds are lacking. Every type has its limits; beyond these there is no evolution. Up to this point, absolute regularity. Primitive creatures are said to be the ancestors of those now existing. But a look at the fauna and flora of the Tertiary merely permits us to think of an as yet unexplored country that harbors types that do not exist elsewhere, while those existing elsewhere are missing.⁷⁰ * My general view.— First proposition: man as a species is not progressing.

Higher types are indeed attained, but they do not last. The level of the species is not raised. Second proposition: man as a species does not represent any progress compared with any other animal. The whole animal and vegetable kingdom does not evolve from the lower to the higher—but all at the same time, in utter disorder, over and against each other. The richest and most complex forms—for the expression “higher type” means no more than this—perish more easily: only the lowest preserve an apparent indestructibility. The former are achieved only rarely and maintain their superiority with difficulty; the latter are favored by a compromising fruitfulness. Among men, too, the higher types, the lucky strokes of evolution, perish most easily as fortunes change. They are exposed to every kind of decadence: they are extreme, and that almost means decadents. The brief spell of beauty, of genius, of Caesar, is sui generis: such things are not inherited. The type is hereditary; a type is nothing extreme, no “lucky stroke”—This is not due to any special fatality or malevolence of nature, but simply to the concept “higher type”: the higher type represents an incomparably greater complexity—a greater sum of co-ordinated elements: so its disintegration is also incomparably more likely. The “genius” is the sublimest machine there is—consequently the most fragile. Third proposition: the domestication (the “culture”) of man does not go deep—Where it does go deep it at once becomes degeneration (type: the Christian). The “savage” (or, in moral terms, the evil man) is a return to nature—and in a certain sense his recovery, his cure from “culture”—

685 (March-June 1888)

Anti-Darwin.— What surprises me most when I survey the broad destinies of man is that I always see before me the opposite of that which Darwin and his school see or want to see today: selection in favor of the stronger, better-constituted, and the progress of the species. Precisely the opposite is palpable: the elimination of the lucky strokes, the uselessness of the more highly developed types, the inevitable dominion of the average, even the sub-average types. If we are not shown why man should be an exception among creatures, I incline to the prejudice that the school of Darwin has been deluded everywhere. That will to power in which I recognize the ultimate ground and character of all change provides us with the reason why selection is not in favor of the exceptions and lucky strokes: the strongest and most fortunate are weak when opposed by organized herd instincts, by the timidity of the weak, by the vast majority. My general view of the world of values shows that it is not the lucky strokes, the select types, that have the upper hand in the supreme values that are today placed over mankind; rather it is the decadent types—perhaps there is nothing in the world more interesting than this unwelcome spectacle— Strange though it may sound, one always has to defend the strong against the weak; the fortunate against the unfortunate; the healthy against those degenerating and afflicted with hereditary taints. If one translates reality into a morality, this morality is: the mediocre are worth more than the exceptions; the decadent forms more than the mediocre; the will to nothingness has the upper hand over the will to life—and the overall aim is, in Christian, Buddhist, Schopenhauerian terms: “better not to be than to be.” I rebel against the translation of reality into a morality: therefore I abhor Christianity with a deadly hatred, because it created sublime words and gestures to throw over a horrible reality the cloak of justice, virtue, and divinity—I see all philosophers, I see science kneeling before a reality that is the reverse of the struggle for existence as taught by Darwin’s school—that is to say, I see on top and surviving everywhere those who compromise life and the value of life.— The error of the school of Darwin becomes a problem to me: how can one be so blind as to see so badly at this point? That species represent any progress is the most unreasonable assertion in the world: so far they represent one level. That the higher organisms have evolved from the lower has not been demonstrated in a single case. I see how the lower preponderate through their numbers, their shrewdness, their cunning—I do not see how an accidental variation gives an advantage, at least not for so long a period; why an accidental change should grow so strong would be something else needing explanation. I find the “cruelty of nature,” of which so much is said, in another place: she is cruel towards her children of fortune, she spares and protects and loves les humbles, just as—72 In summa: growth in the power of a species is perhaps guaranteed less by a preponderance of its children of fortune, of strong members, than by a preponderance of average and lower types— The latter possess great fruitfulness and duration; with the former comes an increase in danger, rapid wastage, speedy reduction in numbers. 686 (1884) Man hitherto—as it were, an embryo of the man of the future;—all the form-giving forces directed toward the latter are present in the former; and because they are tremendous, the more a present-day individual determines the future, the more he will suffer. This is the profoundest conception of suffering: the form-giving forces are in painful collision.— The isolation of the individual ought not to deceive us: something flows on underneath individuals. That the individual feels himself isolated is itself the most powerful goad in the process towards the most distant goals: his search for his happiness is the means that holds together and moderates the form-giving forces, so they do not destroy themselves.

687 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Superabundant force in spirituality, setting itself new goals; by no means merely commanding and leading on behalf of the lower world or the preservation of the organism, the “individual.” We are more than the individuals: we are the whole chain as well, with the tasks of all the futures of that chain.

688 (March-June 1888)

Unitary conception of psychology— We are accustomed to consider the development of an immense abundance of forms compatible with an origin in unity. [My theory would be:—]73 that the will to power is the primitive form of affect, that all other affects are only developments of it; that it is notably enlightening to posit power in place of individual “happiness” (after which every living thing is supposed to be striving): “there is a striving for power, for an increase of power”;—pleasure is only a symptom of the feeling of power attained, a consciousness of a difference (—there is no striving for pleasure: but pleasure supervenes when that which is being striven for is attained: pleasure is an accompaniment, pleasure is not the motive—); that all driving force is will to power, that there is no other physical, dynamic or psychic force except this. In our science, where the concept of cause and effect is reduced to the relationship of equivalence, with the object of proving that the same quantum of force is present on both sides, the driving force is lacking: we observe only results, and we consider them equivalent in content and force— It is simply a matter of experience that change never ceases: we have not the slightest inherent reason for assuming that one change must follow upon another. On the contrary: a condition once achieved would seem to be obliged to preserve itself if there were not in it a capacity for desiring not to preserve itself— Spinoza’s law of “self-preservation” ought really to put a stop to change: but this law is false, the opposite is true. It can be shown most clearly that every living thing does everything it can not to preserve itself but to become more—

689 (March-June 1888)

Critique of the concept: cause.⁷⁵— From a psychological point of view the concept “cause” is our feeling of power resulting from the so-called act of will—our concept “effect” the superstition that this feeling of power is the motive power itself— A condition that accompanies an event and is itself an effect of the event is projected as the “sufficient reason” for the event;— the relation of tensions in our feeling of power (pleasure as the feeling of power), of a resistance overcome—are they illusions?— If we translate the concept “cause” back to the only sphere known to us, from which we have derived it, we cannot imagine any change that does not involve a will to power. We do not know how to explain a change except as the encroachment of one power upon another power.

Mechanics shows us only the results, and then only in images (motion is a figure of speech). Gravity itself has no mechanistic cause, since it itself is the ground of mechanistic results. The will to accumulate force is special to the phenomena of life, to nourishment, procreation, inheritance—to society, state, custom, authority. Should we not be permitted to assume this will as a motive cause in chemistry, too?—and in the cosmic order? Not merely conservation of energy, but maximal economy in use, so the only reality is the will to grow stronger of every center of force—not self-preservation, but the will to appropriate, dominate, increase, grow stronger. The possibility of science should be proved by a principle of causality?⁷⁶ “From like causes like effects”— “A permanent law governing things”—“An invariable order”?— Because something is calculable, does that mean it is necessary? If something happens thus and not otherwise, that does not imply a “principle,” “law,” “order,” [but the operation of]⁷⁷ quanta of force the essence of which consists in exercising power against other quanta of force. Can we assume a striving for power divorced from a sensation of pleasure and displeasure, i.e., divorced from the feeling of enhanced or diminished power? Is mechanism only a sign language for the internal factual world of struggling and conquering quanta of will? All the presuppositions of mechanistic theory—matter, atom, gravity, pressure and stress—are not “facts-in-themselves” but interpretations with the aid of psychical fictions. Life, as the form of being most familiar to us, is specifically a will to the accumulation of force; all the processes of life depend on this: nothing wants to preserve itself, everything is to be added and accumulated. Life as a special case (hypothesis based upon it applied to the total character of being—) strives after a maximal feeling of power; essentially a striving for more power; striving is nothing other than striving for power; the basic and innermost thing is still this will. (Mechanics is merely the semeiotics of the results.)

690 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

One cannot discover the cause of there being any evolution at all by studying evolution; one should not wish to think of it as “becoming,” even less as having become— The “will to power” cannot have become. 691 (1885-1886) What has been the relation of the total organic process to the rest of nature?— That is where its fundamental will stands revealed.

692 (March-June 1888)

Is “will to power” a kind of “will” or identical with the concept “will”? Is it the same thing as desiring? or commanding? Is it that “will” of which Schopenhauer said it was the “in-itself of things”? My proposition is: that the will of psychology hitherto is an unjustified generalization, that this will does not exist at all, that instead of grasping the idea of the development of one definite will into many forms, one has eliminated the character of the will by subtracting from it its content, its “whither?”—this is in the highest degree the case with Schopenhauer: what he calls “will” is a mere empty word. It is even less a question of a “will to live”; for life is merely a special case of the will to power;—it is quite arbitrary to assert that everything strives to enter into this form of the will to power.

693 (March-June 1888)

If the innermost essence of being is will to power, if pleasure is every increase of power, displeasure every feeling of not being able to resist or dominate; may we not then posit pleasure and displeasure as cardinal facts? Is will possible without these two oscillations of Yes and No?— But who feels pleasure?— But who wants power?— Absurd question, if the essence itself is power-will and consequently feelings of pleasure and displeasure! Nonetheless: opposites, obstacles are needed; therefore, relatively, encroaching units—

694 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The measure of failure and fatality must grow with the resistance a force seeks to master; and as a force can expend itself only on what resists it, there is necessarily an ingredient of displeasure in every action. But this displeasure acts as a lure of life and strengthens the will to power!

695 (March-June 1888)

If pleasure and displeasure relate to the feeling of power, then life must represent a growth in power, so that the difference caused by this growth must enter consciousness— If one level of power were maintained, pleasure would have only lowerings of this level by which to set its standards, only states of displeasure—not states of pleasure— The will to grow is of the essence of pleasure: that power increases, that the difference enters consciousness. From a certain point onwards, in decadence, the opposite difference enters consciousness, the decrease: the memory of former moments of strength depresses present feelings of pleasure—comparison now weakens pleasure.

696 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

It is not the satisfaction of the will that causes pleasure (I want to fight this superficial theory—the absurd psychological counterfeiting of the nearest things —), but rather the will's forward thrust and again and again becoming master over that which stands in its way. The feeling of pleasure lies precisely in the dissatisfaction of the will, in the fact that the will is never satisfied unless it has opponents and resistance.— “The happy man”: a herd ideal.

697 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The normal dissatisfaction of our drives, e g., hunger, the sexual drive, the drive to motion, contains in it absolutely nothing depressing; it works rather as an agitation of the feeling of life, as every rhythm of small, painful stimuli strengthens it, (whatever pessimists may say). This dissatisfaction, instead of making one disgusted with life, is the great stimulus to life. (One could perhaps describe pleasure in general as a rhythm of little unpleasurable stimuli.)

698 (Summer-Fall 1883)

Kant said: “I subscribe entirely to these sentences of Count Verri (Sull’ indole del piacere e del dolore; 1781): Il solo principio motore dell’ uomo è il dolore. Il dolore precede ogni piacere. Il piacere non è un essere positivo.”⁷⁸

699 (March-June 1888)

Pain is something different from pleasure—I mean it is not its opposite. If the essence of “pleasure” has been correctly described as a feeling of more power (hence as a feeling of difference, presupposing a comparison), this does not yet furnish a definition of the essence of “displeasure.” The false opposites in which the people, and consequently language, believes, have always been dangerous hindrances to the advance of truth. There are even cases in which a kind of pleasure is conditioned by a certain rhythmic sequence of little unpleasurable stimuli: in this way a very rapid increase of the feeling of power, the feeling of pleasure, is achieved. This is the case, e.g., in tickling, also the sexual tickling in the act of coitus: here we see displeasure at work as an ingredient of pleasure. It seems, a little hindrance that is overcome and immediately followed by another little hindrance that is again overcome—this game of resistance and victory arouses most strongly that general feeling of superabundant, excessive power that constitutes the essence of pleasure. The opposite, an increase in the sensation of pain through the introduction of little pleasurable stimuli, is lacking; for pleasure and pain are not opposites. Pain is an intellectual occurrence in which a definite judgment is expressed—the judgment “harmful” in which a long experience is summarized. There is no pain as such. It is not being wounded that hurts; but the experience of the bad consequences being wounded can have for the whole organism expresses itself in that profound shock that is called displeasure; (in the case of harmful influences with which former men were unacquainted, e.g., those of new combinations of poisonous chemicals, pain bears no witness—and we are lost). The really specific thing in pain is always the protracted shock, the lingering vibrations of a terrifying choc in the cerebral center of the nervous system:— one does not really suffer from the cause of pain (any sort of injury, for example), but from the protracted disturbance of equilibrium that occurs as a result of the choc. Pain is a sickness of the cerebral nerve centers—pleasure is certainly not a sickness. That pain is the cause of reflex actions has appearance and even the prejudice of philosophers in its favor; but, if one observes it closely, in cases of sudden pain the reflex comes noticeably earlier than the sensation of pain. It would go ill with me if, when I stumbled, I had to wait for the fact to ring the bell of consciousness and for instructions how to act to be telegraphed back. What I notice with the greatest possible clarity is rather that the reflex of my foot follows first to prevent my falling, and then, at a measurable distance in time, the sudden sensation of a kind of painful wave in the front part of my head. Thus one does not react to the pain. Pain is subsequently projected to the wounded place—but the nature of this local pain is nonetheless not an expression of the kind of the local injury; it is a mere place-sign corresponding to the force and pitch of the injury the nerve centers have received. That as a result of this choc the muscular strength of the organism is measurably lowered does not warrant our seeking the essence of pain in a diminution of the feeling of power. To repeat it again, one does not react to pain; displeasure is not a “cause” of action. Pain itself is a reaction, the reflex is another and earlier reaction—both originate in different places— 700 (1883-1888) Intellectual nature of pain: it does not indicate what has been damaged at the moment, but the value of the damage in relation to the individual as a whole. Whether there are pains from which “the species” and not the individual suffers—?

701 (Nov. 1887-March 1883)

“The sum of displeasure outweighs the sum of pleasure; consequently it would be better if the world did not exist”— “The world is something that rationally should not exist because it causes the feeling subject more displeasure than pleasure”—chatter of this sort calls itself pessimism today! Pleasure and displeasure are accidentals, not causes; they are value judgments of the second rank, derived from a ruling value— “useful,” “harmful,” speaking in the form of feelings, and consequently absolutely sketchy and dependent. For with every “useful,” “harmful,” one still has to ask in a hundred different ways: “for what?” I despise this pessimism of sensibility: it is itself a sign of deeply impoverished life.⁷⁹

702 (March-June 1888)

Man does not seek pleasure and does not avoid displeasure: one will realize which famous prejudice I am contradicting. Pleasure and displeasure are mere consequences, mere epiphenomena—what man wants, what every smallest part of a living organism wants, is an increase of power. Pleasure or displeasure follow from the striving after that; driven by that will it seeks resistance, it needs something that opposes it— Displeasure, as an obstacle to its will to power, is therefore a normal fact, the normal ingredient of every organic event; man does not avoid it, he is rather in continual need of it; every victory, every feeling of pleasure, every event, presupposes a resistance overcome. Let us take the simplest case, that of primitive nourishment: the protoplasm extends its pseudopodia in search of something that resists it—not from hunger but from will to power.⁸⁰ Thereupon it attempts to overcome, appropriate, assimilate what it encounters: what one calls “nourishment” is merely a derivative phenomenon, an application of the original will to become stronger. Displeasure thus does not merely not have to result in a diminution of our feeling of power, but in the average case it actually stimulates this feeling of power—the obstacle is the stimulus of this will to power.

703 (March-June 1888)

One has confused displeasure with one kind of displeasure, with exhaustion; the latter does indeed represent a profound diminution and reduction of the will to power, a measurable loss of force. That is to say: there exists (a) displeasure as a means of stimulating the increase of power, and (b) displeasure following an overexpenditure of power; in the first case a stimulus, in the second the result of an excessive stimulation— Inability to resist is characteristic of the latter kind of displeasure: a challenge to that which resists belongs to the former— The only pleasure still felt in the condition of exhaustion is falling asleep; victory is the pleasure in the other case— The great confusion on the part of psychologists consisted in not distinguishing between these two kinds of pleasure—that of falling asleep and that of victory. The exhausted want rest, relaxation, peace, calm—the happiness of the nihilistic religions and philosophies; the rich and living want victory, opponents overcome, the overflow of the feeling of power across wider domains than hitherto All healthy functions of the organism have this need—and the whole organism is such a complex of systems struggling for an increase of the feeling of power——

704 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

How does it happen that the basic articles of faith in psychology are one and all the most arrant misrepresentations and counterfeits? “Man strives after happiness,” e.g.—how much of that is true? In order to understand what “life” is, what kind of striving and tension life is, the formula must apply as well to trees and plants as to animals. “What does a plant strive after?”—but here we have already invented a false unity which does not exist: the fact of a millionfold growth with individual and semi-individual initiatives is concealed and denied if we begin by positing a crude unity “plant.” That the very smallest “individuals” cannot be understood in the sense of a “metaphysical individuality” and atom, that their sphere of power is continually changing—that is the first thing that becomes obvious; but does each of them strive after happiness when it changes in this way?— But all expansion, incorporation, growth means striving against something that resists; motion is essentially tied up with states of displeasure; that which is here the driving force must in any event desire something else if it desires displeasure in this way and continually looks for it.— For what do the trees in a jungle fight each other? For “happiness”?— For power!— Man, become master over the forces of nature, master over his own savagery and licentiousness (the desires have learned to obey and be useful)—man, in comparison with a pre-man—represents a tremendous quantum of power—not an increase in “happiness”! How can one claim that he has striven for happiness? — 705 (1883-1888)⁸² As I say this I see above me, glittering under the stars, the tremendous rat’s tail of errors that has hitherto counted as the highest inspiration of humanity: “All happiness is a consequence of virtue, all virtue is a consequence of free will!” Let us reverse the values: all fitness the result of fortunate organization, all freedom the result of fitness (—freedom here understood as facility in self-direction. Every artist will understand me).

706 (Spring-Fall 1887)

“The value of life.”— Life is a unique case; one must justify all existence and not only life—the justifying principle is one that explains life, too. Life is only a means to something; it is the expression of forms of the growth of power.

707 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

The “conscious world” cannot serve as a starting point for values: need for an “objective” positing of values. In relation to the vastness and multiplicity of collaboration and mutual opposition encountered in the life of every organism, the conscious world of feelings, intentions, and valuations is a small section. We have no right whatever to posit this piece of consciousness as the aim and wherefore of this total phenomenon of life: becoming conscious is obviously only one more means toward the unfolding and extension of the power of life. Therefore it is a piece of naiveté to posit pleasure or spirituality or morality or any other particular of the sphere of consciousness as the highest value—and perhaps even to justify “the world” by means of this. This is my basic objection to all philosophic-moralistic cosmo- and theodicies, to all wherefores and highest values in philosophy and theology hitherto. One kind of means has been misunderstood as an end; conversely, life and the enhancement of its power has been debased to a means. If we wished to postulate a goal adequate to life, it could not coincide with any category of conscious life; it would rather have to explain all of them as a means to itself— The “denial of life” as an aim of life, an aim of evolution! Existence as a great stupidity! Such a lunatic interpretation is only the product of measuring life by aspects of consciousness (pleasure and displeasure, good and evil). Here the means are made to stand against the end—the “unholy,” absurd, above all unpleasant means—: how can an end that employs such means be worth anything! But the mistake is that, instead of looking for a purpose that explains the necessity of such means, we presuppose in advance a goal that actually excludes such means; ie., we take a desideratum in respect of certain means (namely pleasant, rational, and virtuous ones) as a norm, on the basis of which we posit what general purpose would be desirable— The fundamental mistake is simply that, instead of understanding consciousness as a tool and particular aspect of the total life, we posit it as the standard and the condition of life that is of supreme value: it is the erroneous perspective of a parte ad totum—which is why all philosophers are instinctively trying to imagine a total consciousness, a consciousness involved in all life and will, in all that occurs, a “spirit,” “God.” But one has to tell them that precisely this turns life into a monstrosity; that a “God” and total sensorium would altogether be something on account of which life would have to be condemned— Precisely that we have eliminated the total consciousness that posited ends and means, is our great relief—with that we are no longer compelled to be pessimists— Our greatest reproach against existence was the existence of God—

708 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

[On the value of “becoming.”—]85 If the motion of the world aimed at a final state, that state would have been reached. The sole fundamental fact, however, is that it does not aim at a final state; and every philosophy and scientific hypothesis (e.g., mechanistic theory) which necessitates such a final state is refuted by this fundamental fact. I seek a conception of the world that takes this fact into account. Becoming must be explained without recourse to final intentions; becoming must appear justified at every moment (or incapable of being evaluated; which amounts to the same thing); the present must absolutely not be justified by reference to a future, nor the past by reference to the present. “Necessity” not in the shape of an overreaching, dominating total force, or that of a prime mover; even less as a necessary condition for something valuable. To this end it is necessary to deny a total consciousness of becoming, a “God,” to avoid bringing all events under the aegis of a being who feels and knows but does not will: “God” is useless if he does not want anything, and moreover this means positing a summation of displeasure and unlogic which would debase the total value of “becoming.” Fortunately such a summarizing power is missing (—a suffering and all-seeing God, a “total sensorium” and “cosmic spirit”⁸⁶ would be the greatest objection to being). More strictly: one must admit nothing that has being— because then becoming would lose its value and actually appear meaningless and superfluous. Consequently one must ask how the illusion of being could have arisen (was bound to arise); likewise: how all value judgments that rest on the hypothesis that there are beings are disvalued. But here one realizes that this hypothesis of beings is the source of all world-defamation (—the “better world,” the “true world,” the “world beyond,” the “thing-in-itself.”) Becoming does not aim at a final state, does not flow into “being.” Becoming is not a merely apparent state; perhaps the world of beings is mere appearance. Becoming is of equivalent value every moment; the sum of its values always remains the same; in other words, it has no value at all, for anything against which to measure it, and in relation to which the word “value” would have meaning, is lacking. The total value of the world cannot be evaluated; consequently philosophical pessimism belongs among comical things.

709 (Spring-Fall 1887)

That we do not make our “desiderata” judges of being! That we do not also set up terminal forms of evolution (e g., spirit) as another “in-itself” behind evolution!

710 (March-June 1888)

Our knowledge has become scientific to the extent that it is able to employ number and measure. The attempt should be made to see whether a scientific order of values could be constructed simply on a numerical and mensural scale of force— All other “values” are prejudices, naiveties, misunderstandings.— They are everywhere reducible to this numerical and mensural scale of force. The ascent on this scale represents every rise in value; the descent on this scale represents diminution in value. Here one has appearance and prejudice against one. (For moral values are only apparent values compared with physiological values.)

711 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Where the point of view of “value” is inadmissible:— That in the “process of the totality” the labor of man is of no account, because a total process (considered as a system—) does not exist at all; that there is no “totality”; that no evaluation of human existence, of human aims, can be made in regard to something that does not exist; that “necessity,” “causality,” “purposiveness,” are useful unrealities;⁸⁷ that not “increase in consciousness” is the aim, but enhancement of power—and in this enhancement the utility of consciousness is included; the same applies to pleasure and displeasure; that one does not take the means as the supreme measure of value (therefore not states of consciousness, such as pleasure and pain, if becoming conscious itself is only a means—); that the world is not an organism at all, but chaos; that the evolution of “spirituality” is only a means towards the relative duration of the organization; that all “desirability” has no meaning in relation to the total character of being.

712 (Spring-Fall 1887)

“God” as the moment of culmination: existence an eternal deifying and undeifying. But in that not a high point of value, but a high point of power. Absolute exclusion of mechanism and matter: both are only expressions of lower stages, the most despiritualized form of affect (of “will to power”).⁸⁸ Retreat from the high-point in becoming (the highest spiritualization of power on the most slavish ground) to be represented as a consequence of this highest force, which, turning against itself when it no longer has anything left to organize, expends its force on disorganization— a. The ever-increasing conquest of societies and subjection of them by a smaller but more powerful number; b. the ever-increasing conquest of the privileged and stronger and the consequent rise of democracy, and ultimately anarchy of the elements.

713 (March-June 1888)

Value is the highest quantum of power that a man is able to incorporate—a man: not mankind! Mankind is even a means sooner than an end. It is a question of the type: mankind is merely the experimental material, the tremendous surplus of failures: a field of ruins.⁸⁹

714 (Manuscript source uncertain)

Value words are banners raised where a new bliss has been found—a new feeling.

715 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The standpoint of “value” is the standpoint of conditions of preservation and enhancement for complex forms of relative life-duration within the flux of becoming. There are no durable ultimate units, no atoms, no monads: here, too, “beings” are only introduced by us (from perspective grounds of practicality and utility). “Forms of domination”; the sphere of that which is dominated continually growing or periodically increasing and decreasing according to the favorability or unfavorability of circumstances (nourishment—). “Value” is essentially the standpoint for the increase or decrease of these dominating centers (“multiplicities” in any case; but “units” are nowhere present in the nature of becoming).⁹⁰ Linguistic means of expression are useless for expressing “becoming”; it accords with our inevitable need to preserve ourselves to posit a crude world of stability, of “things,” etc. We may venture to speak of atoms and monads in a relative sense; and it is certain that the smallest world is the most durable— There is no will: there are treaty drafts of will that are constantly increasing or losing their power. 55 “Whistling out of the final hole” is a German expression for extreme emergencies. Cf. my note 54 above. 68 “Animals never progress as a species. Only man progresses as a species.” 72 “Just as” is omitted in all editions. These ideas, as well as many of those developed in the following sections, down through 715, are discussed in Chapter 9, “Power versus Pleasure,” of my Nietzsche 75 I have restored the title found in the MS In the printed texts a title devised by Peter Gast has been substituted: “Will to power and causalism.” 83 “The last three lines are crossed out in the MS”: 1911, p. 510. Unless “three” is a misprint (for two), the deletion would begin at the point indicated. 86 “Allgeist.” 87 Nützliche “Scheinbarkeiten” “The world made stupid, as an aim, as a consequence of the will to power which makes the elements as independent of each other as possible. Beauty as a sign of the habituation and pampering [Gewöhnung und Verwöhnung] of the victorious; what is ugly as the expression of many defeats (within the organism). No heredity! The chain as a whole changing—” On the margin of the same page: “ ‘Beautiful’ has a delightful effect on the feeling of pleasure; one need only think of the transfiguring power of ‘love.’ Might not the transfigured and perfect, conversely, mildly excite sensuality, so life has the effect of a pleasant feeling? —” III. THE WILL TO POWER AS SOCIETY AND INDIVIDUAL

716 (March-June 1888)

Basic principle: only individuals feel themselves responsible. Multiplicities are invented in order to do things for which the individual lacks the courage. It is for just this reason that all communalities and societies are a hundred times more upright and instructive about the nature of man than is the individual, who is too weak to have the courage for his own desires— The whole of “altruism” reveals itself as the prudence of the private man: societies are not “altruistic” towards one another— The commandment to love one’s neighbor has never yet been extended to include one’s actual neighbor. That relationship is still governed by the words of Manu: “We must consider all countries that have common borders with us, and their allies, too, as our enemies. For the same reason, we must count all their neighbors as being well-disposed toward us.” The study of society is so invaluable because man as society is much more naive than man as a “unit.” “ ‘Society’ has never regarded virtue as anything but a means to strength, power, and order. How simple and dignified is Manu when he says: “Virtue could scarcely endure by its own strength. Fundamentally it is only the fear of punishment that keeps men within bounds and leaves everyone in peaceful possession of his own.”⁹²

717 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The state organized immorality—internally: as police, penal law, classes, commerce, family; externally: as will to power, to war, to conquest, to revenge. How does it happen that the state will do a host of things that the individual would never countenance?— Through division of responsibility, of command, and of execution. Through the interposition of the virtues of obedience, duty, patriotism, and loyalty. Through upholding pride, severity, strength, hatred, revenge—in short, all typical characteristics that contradict the herd type.

718 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

None of you has the courage to kill a man, or even to whip him, or even to—but the tremendous machine of the state overpowers the individual, so he repudiates responsibility for what he does (obedience, oath, etc.) —Everything a man does in the service of the state is contrary to his nature. —in the same way, everything he learns with a view to future state service is contrary to his nature. This is achieved through division of labor (so that no one any longer possesses the full responsibility) : the lawgiver—and he who enacts the law; the teacher of discipline—and those who have grown hard and severe under discipline.

719 (Spring-Fall 1887)

A division of labor among the affects within society: so individuals and classes produce an incomplete, but for that reason more useful kind of soul. To what extent certain affects have remained almost rudimentary in every type within society (with a view to developing another affect more strongly). Justification of morality: economic (the intention to exploit individual strength to the greatest possible extent to prevent the squandering of everything exceptional); aesthetic (the formation of firm types, together with pleasure in one's own type); political (the art of enduring the tremendous tension between differing degrees of power); physiological (as a pretended high evaluation in favor of the underprivileged or mediocre—for the preservation of the weak). 720 (1886-1887) The most fearful and fundamental desire in man, his drive for power—this drive is called “freedom”— must be held in check the longest. This is why ethics, with its unconscious instinct for education and breeding, has hitherto aimed at holding the desire for power in check: it disparages the tyrannical individual and with its glorification of social welfare and patriotism emphasizes the power-instinct of the herd

721 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Inability to acquire power: its hypocrisy and shrewdness: as obedience (subordination, pride in duty, morality—); as submission, devotion, love (idealization, deification of him who commands as compensation and indirect self-transfiguration); as fatalism, resignation; as “objectivity”; as self-tyranny (Stoicism, asceticism, “emancipation from the self,” “sanctification”); as criticism, pessimism, indignation, torment; as “beautiful soul,” “virtue,” “self-deification,” “detachment,” “unspotted by the world,” etc. (—the insight into an inability to acquire power disguised as dédain). In all this there is expressed the need to exercise some sort of power nonetheless, or to create for oneself the temporary appearance of power—as intoxication. Men who want power for the sake of the happiness power provides: political parties Other men who want power even accompanied by obvious disadvantages and sacrifices in happiness and well-being: the ambitious. Other men who want power merely because it would otherwise fall into other hands upon which they do not want to be dependent. 722 (1886-1887) Critique of “justice” and “equality before the law”: what is really supposed to be abolished through this? Tension, enmity, hatred.— But it is an error to suppose that “happiness” will be increased in this way: Corsicans, e g, enjoy more happiness than Continentals.

723 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Reciprocity, the hidden intention to claim reward: one of the most insidious forms of the diminution of the value of man. It brings with it that “equality” which depreciates the distancing gulf as immoral—

724 (Spring-Fall 1887)

What “useful” means is entirely dependent upon the intention, the wherefore? The intention, the “goal,” is again entirely dependent on the degree of power. Therefore utilitarianism is not a foundation but only a theory of consequences, and absolutely cannot be made obligatory for everyone.

725 (Summer-Fall 1883)

Formerly one had the theory of the state as a calculating utility: now one has the practice as well!— The age of kings is past because the peoples are no longer worthy of them: they do not want to see the symbol of their ideal in kings, but a means for their profit.— That is the whole truth!

726 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Attempt on my part to grasp the absolute rationality of social judgment and evaluation (naturally without the desire to deduce moral conclusions). the degree of psychological falsity and opacity needed to sanctify the affects essential for preservation and enhancement of power (in order to create a good conscience for them). the degree of stupidity needed to maintain the possibility of common rules and valuations (in addition education, supervision of the elements of culture, training). the degree of inquisition, mistrust, and intolerance needed to deal with the exceptions as criminals and to suppress them—to give them a bad conscience, so they suffer their exceptionalness as a disease.

727 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Morality essentially a shield, a means of defense; to this extent a sign of the immature (armored, stoical). The mature man has, above all, weapons: he attacks. Instruments of war transformed into instruments of peace (from scales and armor, feathers and hair).

728 (March-June 1888)

It is part of the concept of the living that it must grow—that it must extend its power and consequently incorporate alien forces. Intoxicated by moral narcotics, one speaks of the right of the individual to defend himself; in the same sense one might also speak of his right to attack: for both—and the second even more than the first—are necessities for every living thing:— aggressive and defensive egoism are not matters of choice, to say nothing of “free will,” but the fatality of life itself. In this case it is all the same whether one has in view an individual or a living body, an aspiring “society.” The right to punish (or the self-defense of society) is at bottom called a “right” owing to a misuse of the word. A right is acquired through treaties—but self-protection and self-defense do not rest on the basis of a treaty. At least a people might just as well designate as a right its need to conquer, its lust for power, whether by means of arms or by trade, commerce and colonization—the right to growth, perhaps. A society that definitely and instinctively gives up war and conquest is in decline: it is ripe for democracy and the rule of shopkeepers— In most cases, to be sure, assurances of peace are merely narcotics.

729 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The maintenance of the military state is the last means of all of acquiring or maintaining the great tradition with regard to the supreme type of man, the strong type. And all concepts that perpetuate enmity and difference in rank between states (e.g., nationalism, protective tariffs) may appear sanctioned in this light. 730 (1885-1886) That something longer-lasting than an individual should endure, that a work should endure which has perhaps been created by an individual: to that end, every possible kind of limitation, one-sidedness, etc., must be imposed upon the individual. By what means? Love, reverence, gratitude toward the person who created the work helps; or that our forefathers fought for it; or that my descendants will be guaranteed only if I guarantee this work (e.g., the polis). Morality is essentially the means of ensuring the duration of something beyond individuals, or rather through an enslavement of the individual. It is obvious that the perspective from below will produce quite different expressions from that from above. A complex of power: how is it maintained? By the fact that many generations sacrifice themselves for it; i.e.,—93

731 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The continuum: “marriage, property, language, tradition, tribe, family, people, state” are continuums of lower and higher orders. Their economy resides in the preponderance of the advantages of uninterrupted work and of multiplicity over the disadvantages: the higher cost of exchange between parts or of making them last. (Multiplication of the effective parts, which, however, often remain unemployed; thus a higher cost of acquisition and a not inconsiderable cost in maintenance.) The advantage resides in the fact that interruptions are avoided and losses that would arise from them are saved. Nothing is more costly than a beginning. “The greater the advantages for existence, the greater the cost of maintenance and production (food and propagation); the greater, too, the danger and probability of perishing before the high point is reached.”

732 (Summer-Fall 1888)

Marriage in the bourgeois sense of the word—I mean, in the most respectable sense of the word “marriage”—is not a matter of love, any more than it is a question of money; no institution can be founded on love. It is a question of society’s granting permission to two people to gratify their sexual desires with one another, under certain conditions, to be sure, but conditions that keep the interests of society in view. It is obvious that a certain attraction between the parties and very much good will—will to patience, compatibility, care for one another—will be among the presuppositions of such a contract; but one should not misuse the word love to describe this! For two lovers in the complete and strong sense of the word sexual gratification is not essential and is really no more than a symbol: for one party, as already said, a symbol of unconditional submission, for the other a symbol of assent to this, a sign of taking possession. In marriage in the aristocratic, old aristocratic sense of the word it was a question of the breeding of a race (is there still an aristocracy today? Quaeritur)—thus of the maintenance of a fixed, definite type of ruling man: man and woman were sacrificed to this point of view. It is obvious that love was not the first consideration here; on the contrary! and not even that measure of mutual good will that is a condition of the good bourgeois marriage. What was decisive was the interest of a family, and beyond that—the class. We would shiver a little at the coldness, severity, and calculating clarity of such a noble concept of marriage as has ruled in every healthy aristocracy, in ancient Athens as in the eighteenth century, we warm-blooded animals with sensitive hearts, we “moderns”! Precisely this is why love as a passion—in the great meaning of the word—was invented for the aristocratic world and in it, where constraint and privation were greatest— 733 (1888) On the future of marriage:—an additional tax (on inheritance), also additional war service for bachelors from a certain age onwards and increasing (within the community); advantages of all kinds for fathers who bring many boys into the world: possibly a plural vote; a medical certificate preceding every marriage and endorsed by the communal authorities, several definite questions must be answered by the couple and by doctors (“family history”); as an antidote to prostitution (or as its ennoblement): marriages for a period, legalized (for years, for months), with guarantees for the children; every marriage warranted and sanctioned by a certain number of trusted men of the community, as a matter of concern to the community.⁹⁶

734 (Summer-Fall 1888)

Also a commandment of the love of man.— There are cases in which a child would be a crime: in the case of chronic invalids and neurasthenics of the third degree. What should one do in such cases?— One might at least try encouraging them to chastity, perhaps with the aid of Parsifal music: Parsifal himself, this typical idiot, had only too many reasons not to propagate himself. The trouble is that a certain inability to “control” oneself (—not to react to stimuli, even to very slight sexual stimuli) is one of the most regular consequences of general exhaustion. One would be mistaken, for example, to think of a Leopardi as chaste. The priest, the moralist play a hopeless game in such cases; it would make more sense to go to a pharmacy. After all, society has a duty here: few more pressing and fundamental demands can be made upon it. Society, as the great trustee of life, is responsible to life itself for every miscarried life—it also has to pay for such lives: consequently it ought to prevent them. In numerous cases, society ought to prevent procreation: to this end, it may hold in readiness, without regard to descent, rank, or spirit, the most rigorous means of constraint, deprivation of freedom, in certain circumstances castration.— The Biblical prohibition “thou shalt not kill!” is a piece of naïveté compared with the seriousness of the prohibition of life to decadents: “thou shalt not procreate!”— Life itself recognizes no solidarity, no “equal rights,” between the healthy and the degenerate parts of an organism: one must excise the latter—or the whole will perish — Sympathy for decadents, equal rights for the ill-constituted—that would be the profoundest immorality, that would be antinature itself as morality!

97 735 (1887; rev. 1888) There are delicate and sickly inclined natures, so-called idealists, who cannot achieve anything better than a crime, cru, vert:98 it is the great justification of their little, pale existences, a payment for a protracted cowardice and mendaciousness, a moment at least of strength: afterwards they perish of it.99

736 (Spring-Fall 1887)

In our civilized world, we learn to know almost only the wretched criminal, crushed by the curse and the contempt of society, mistrustful of himself, often belittling and slandering his deed, a miscarried type of criminal; and we resist the idea that all great human beings have been criminals (only in the grand and not in a miserable style), that crime belongs to greatness (—for that is the experience of those who have tried the reins and of all who have descended deepest into great souls—). To be “free as a bird” from tradition, the conscience of duty—every great human being knows this danger. But he also desires it: he desires a great goal and therefore also the means to it.¹⁰⁰

737 (March-June 1888)

Ages in which one leads men with reward and punishment have a low, still primitive kind of man in view: it is as if they were children— Within our late culture, fatality and degeneration are something that completely abolishes all meaning of reward and punishment— This real determination of action through reward and punishment presupposes young, strong, forceful races. In old races, the impulses are so irresistible that a mere idea is quite powerless;—to be unable to offer resistance where a stimulus is given, but to have to respond to it: this extreme susceptibility of decadents renders such systems of punishment and improvement perfectly meaningless. * The concept “improvement” rests on the presupposition of a normal and strong man, whose individual action must in some way be balanced in order not to lose him [to the community],¹⁰¹ in order not to have him as an enemy.

738 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Effect of a prohibition.— Every power that forbids, that knows how to arouse fear in those to whom something is forbidden, creates a “bad conscience” (that is, the desire for something combined with the consciousness of danger in satisfying it, with the necessity for secrecy, for underhandedness, for caution). Every prohibition worsens the character of those who do not submit to it willingly, but only because they are compelled.

739 (March-June 1888)

“Reward and punishment.”— They stand together, they fall together. Today one does not want to be rewarded, one will not acknowledge the right of anyone to punish— One has put oneself on a war footing: one desires something, one meets with opposition, one can perhaps gain what one wants most reasonably if one gets along—if one draws up a contract. A modern society, in which every individual has drawn up his “contract”—the criminal breaks a contract— That would be a clear concept. But then one could not tolerate within a society anarchists and those who oppose the form of that society or principle—

740 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Crime belongs to the concept “revolt against the social order.” One does not “punish” a rebel; one suppresses him. A rebel can be a miserable and contemptible man; but there is nothing contemptible in a revolt as such—and to be a rebel in view of contemporary society does not in itself lower the value of a man. There are even cases in which one might have to honor a rebel, because he finds something in our society against which war ought to be waged—he awakens us from our slumber. If a criminal perpetrates an individual act against an individual this does not demonstrate that his whole instinct is not in a state of war with the whole order: his deed as a mere symptom. One should reduce the concept “punishment” to the concept: suppression of a revolt, security measures against the suppressed (total or partial imprisonment). But one should not express contempt through punishment: a criminal is in any case a man who risks his life, his honor, his freedom—a man of courage. Neither should one take punishment to be a penance; or as a payment, as if an exchange relationship existed between guilt and punishment—punishment does not purify, for crime does not sully. One should not deprive the criminal of the possibility of making his peace with society; provided he does not belong to the race of criminals. In that case one should make war on him even before he has committed any hostile act (first operation as soon as one has him in one’s power: his castration). One should not hold against the criminal his bad manners or the low level of his intelligence. Nothing is more common than that he should misunderstand himself (for often his rebellious instinct, the rancor of the déclassé, has not reached consciousness, faute le lecture),¹⁰² that he should slander and dishonor his deed under the influence of fear and failure—quite apart from those cases in which, psychologically speaking, the criminal surrenders to an uncomprehended drive and by some subsidiary action ascribes a false motive to his deed (perhaps by a robbery when what he wanted was blood).¹⁰³ One should beware of assessing the value of a man according to a single deed. Napoleon warned against this. For our haut-relief deeds are quite especially insignificant. If men like us have no crime, e.g., murder, on our conscience—why is it? Because a few opportune circumstances were lacking. And if we did it, what would that indicate about our value? In a way one would despise us if one thought we had not the strength to kill a man under certain circumstances. In almost all crimes some qualities also find expression which ought not to be lacking in a man. It was not without justification that Dostoevsky said of the inmates of his Siberian prisons that they formed the strongest and most valuable part of the Russian people.¹⁰⁴ If with us the criminal is an ill-nourished and stunted plant, this is to the dishonor of our social relationships; in the age of the Renaissance the criminal thrived and acquired for himself his own kind of virtue—virtue in the Renaissance style, to be sure, virtù, moraline-free virtue. One can enhance only those men whom one does not treat with contempt; moral contempt causes greater indignity and harm than any crime. 741 (1883-1888) The derogatory element first entered into punishment when certain penalties became associated with contemptible men (e.g., slaves). Those punished most were contemptible men, and at length punishment came to contain something derogatory.

742 (March-June 1888)

In ancient penal law a religious concept was at work: that of the expiatory power of punishment. Punishment purifies: in the modern world it sullies. Punishment is a payment: one is really rid of that for which one was willing to suffer so much. Provided there is a belief in this power of punishment, there follows a profound sense of relief which is really very close to a new health, a restoration. One has not only made one's peace with society again, one has also regained one's self-respect and feels—"pure." Today punishment isolates even more than the crime; the fatality behind a crime has grown so great that it has grown incurable. One emerges from punishment as an enemy of society. From then on, it has one more enemy. Jus talionis can be dictated by the spirit of retribution (i.e., by a kind of moderation of the instinct for revenge); but with Manu, e.g., it is the need to possess an equivalent in order to expiate, in order to be "free" again in a religious sense. 743 (1885-1886) My rather radical question mark set against all modern penal codes is this: if the punishment should hurt in proportion to the magnitude of the crime—and fundamentally that is what all of you want!—you would have to measure the susceptibility to pain of every criminal. Does that not mean: a previously determined punishment for a crime, a penal code, ought not to exist at all? But considering that one would scarcely be able to determine a criminal's degrees of pleasure and displeasure, wouldn't one have to do without punishment in practice? What a loss! Isn't it? Consequently — 744 (1883-1888) Ah, the philosophy of right! A science that, like all moral science, has not even reached the cradle yet! One still misunderstands, e.g., even among jurists who think themselves enlightened, the oldest and most valuable significance of punishment—one does not know it at all; and as long as jurisprudence does not put itself on a new footing, namely on that of comparative history and anthropology, it will persist in the useless struggle between fundamentally false abstractions that today pass for "philosophy of right" and that are all based on contemporary man. This contemporary man, however, is so intricate, also in his legal evaluations, that he permits the most varied interpretations. 745 (1883-1888) An old Chinese said he had heard that when empires were doomed they had many laws.

746 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Schopenhauer wanted rascals to be castrated and silly geese to be shut up in convents: from what point of view would this be desirable? The rascal has this advantage over many other men, that he is not mediocre; and the fool has this advantage over us, that he does not suffer at the sight of mediocrity. It would be more desirable that the gulf should be made wider; so rascality and folly should increase. In this way human nature would be expanded— But, after all, this is dictated by necessity; it does not depend on whether we desire it or not. Folly, rascality increase: that is part of “progress.”

747 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

In contemporary society a great deal of consideration, of tact and forbearance, of good-natured respect for the rights of others, even for the claims of others, is quite widespread; even more, a certain benevolent instinctive estimation of human value in general, which finds expression in trustfulness and credit of all kinds. Respect for man—and not merely for virtuous men—is perhaps what divides us most sharply from a Christian evaluation. It seems to us ironic to a degree when we still hear morals preached; a man lowers himself in our eyes and becomes comical if he preaches morals. This moral liberality is one of the best signs of our age. When we discover cases in which it is noticeably lacking, this strikes us as a kind of sickness (the case of Carlyle in England, the case of Ibsen in Norway, the case of Schopenhauerian[?]106 pessimism[?] throughout Europe[?]). If anything can reconcile us to our age, it is the great amount of immorality it permits itself without thinking any the worse of itself. On the contrary! What constitutes the superiority of culture over unculture? of the Renaissance over the Middle Ages, for example?— One thing alone; the great amount of admitted immorality. From this it follows of necessity what all the heights of human evolution must represent to the eye of the moral fanatic: the non plus ultra of corruption (—consider Savonarola’s judgment of Florence, Plato’s judgment of Periclean Athens, Luther’s[?] judgment[?] of Rome, Rousseau’s judgment of Voltaire’s society, the German judgment contra Goethe).

748 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

A little fresh air! This absurd condition of Europe shall not go on much longer! Is there any idea at all behind this bovine nationalism? What value can there be now, when everything points to wider and more common interests, in encouraging this boorish self-conceit? And this in a state of affairs in which spiritual dependency and disnationalization meet the eye and in which the value and meaning of contemporary culture lie in mutual blending and fertilization!— And the “new Reich” again founded on the most threadbare and despised ideas: equal rights and universal suffrage. The struggle for advantage within a state of affairs that is no good; this culture of big cities, newspapers, feverishness and “pointlessness”—! The economic unification of Europe is coming of necessity— and also, as a reaction, a peace party— A party of peace, without sentimentality, that forbids itself and its children to wage war; forbids recourse to the courts; that provokes struggle, contradiction, persecution against itself: a party of the oppressed, at least for a time; soon the big party. Opposed to feelings of revenge and resentment. A war party, equally principled and severe toward itself, proceeding in the opposite direction—

749107 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

The princes of Europe should consider carefully whether they can do without our support. We immoralists—we are today the only power that needs no allies in order to conquer: thus we are by far the strongest of the strong. We do not even need to tell lies: what other power can dispense with that? A powerful seduction fights on our behalf, the most powerful perhaps that there has ever been—the seduction of truth—“Truth”? Who has forced this word on me? But I repudiate it; but I disdain this proud word: no, we do not need even this; we shall conquer and come to power even without truth. The spell that fights on our behalf, the eye of Venus that charms and blinds even our opponents, is the magic of the extreme, the seduction that everything extreme exercises: we immoralists—we are the most extreme. 750 (1884) The rotted ruling classes have ruined the image of the ruler. The “state” as a court of law is a piece of cowardice, because the great human being is lacking to provide a standard of measurement. Finally, the sense of insecurity grows so great that men cower in the dust before any forceful will that commands. N.B. Scorn for the kings with the virtues of petty virtuous people.¹⁰⁸

751 (March-June 1888)

“The will to power” is so hated in democratic ages that their entire psychology seems directed toward belittling and defaming it. The type of the great ambitious man who thirsts after honor is supposed to be Napoleon! And Caesar! And Alexander!—As if these were not precisely the great despisers of honor! And Helvétius demonstrates to us that men strive after power so as to possess the enjoyments available to the powerful: he understands this striving for power as will to enjoyment! as hedonism! 752 (1884) According to whether a people feels “right, vision, the gift of leadership, etc., belong to the few” or “to the many”—there will be an oligarchic or a democratic government. Monarchy represents the belief in one man who is utterly superior, a leader, savior, demigod. Aristocracy represents the belief in an elite humanity and higher caste. Democracy represents the disbelief in great human beings and an elite society: “Everyone is equal to everyone else.” “At bottom we are one and all self-seeking cattle and mob.” 753 (1885) I am opposed to 1. socialism, because it dreams quite naively of “the good, true, and beautiful” and of “equal rights” (—anarchism also desires the same ideal, but in a more brutal fashion); 2. parliamentary government and the press, because these are the means by which the herd animal becomes master. 754 (1884) The arming of the people—is ultimately the arming of the mob. 755 (1884) How ludicrous I find the socialists, with their nonsensical optimism concerning the “good man,” who is waiting to appear from behind the scenes if only one would abolish the old “order” and set all the “natural drives” free. And the party opposed to them is just as ludicrous, because it does not admit the element of violence in the law, the severity and egoism in every kind of authority. “‘I and my kind’ want to rule and survive; whoever degenerates will be expelled or destroyed”—this is the basic feeling behind every ancient legislation. The idea of a higher kind of man is hated more than monarchs. Anti-aristocratic: that assumes hatred of monarchy only as a mask— 756 (1885-1886) How treacherous all parties are!—they bring to light something about their leaders which the latter have perhaps always taken great care to hide under a bushel. 757 (1884) Modern socialism wants to create the secular counterpart to Jesuitism: everyone a perfect instrument. But the purpose, the wherefore? has not yet been ascertained.

758 (Summer-Fall 1883)

Slavery today: a piece of barbarism! Where are those for whom they work? One must not always expect the contemporaneity of the two complementary castes. Utility and pleasure are slave theories of life: the “blessing of work” is the self-glorification of slaves.— Incapacity for otium.¹⁰⁹

759 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

One has no right to existence or to work, to say nothing of a right to “happiness”: the individual human being is in precisely the same case as the lowest worm.

760 (Fall 1888)

We must think of the masses as unsentimentally as we think of nature: they preserve the species. 761 (1885-1886) To look upon the distress of the masses with an ironic melancholy: they want something we are capable of—ah! 762 (1885) European democracy represents a release of forces only to a very small degree. It is above all a release of laziness, of weariness, of weakness.

763 (Spring-Fall 1887)

From the future of the worker.¹¹⁰— Workers should learn to feel like soldiers. An honorarium, an income, but no pay! No relation between payment and achievement! But the individual, each according to his kind, should be so placed that he can achieve the highest that lies in his power. 764 (1882) The workers shall live one day as the bourgeois do now—but above them, distinguished by their freedom from wants, the higher caste: that is to say, poorer and simpler, but in possession of power. For lower men the reverse valuation obtains; it is a question of implanting “virtues” in them. Absolute commands; terrible means of compulsion; to tear them away from the easy life. The others may obey; and their vanity demands that they appear to be dependent, not on great men, but on “principles.”

765 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

“Redemption from all guilt” One speaks of the “profound injustice” of the social pact; as if the fact that this man is born in favorable circumstances, that in unfavorable ones, were in itself an injustice; or even that it is unjust that this man should be born with these qualities, that man with those. Among the most honest of these opponents of society it is asserted: “we ourselves, with all our bad, sick, criminal qualities, which we admit to, are only the inescapable consequences of a long suppression of the weak by the strong”; they make the ruling classes responsible for their characters. And they threaten, they rage, they curse; they become virtuous from indignation—they do not want to have become bad men, canaille, for nothing. This pose, an invention of the last few decades, is also called pessimism, as I hear; the pessimism of indignation. Here the claim is made to judge history, to divest it of its fatality, to discover responsibility behind it, guilty men in it. For this is the rub: one needs guilty men. The underprivileged, the decadents of all kinds are in revolt on account of themselves and need victims so as not to quench their thirst for destruction by destroying themselves (—which would perhaps be reasonable). To this end, they need an appearance of justice, i.e., a theory through which they can shift the responsibility for their existence, for their being thus and thus, on to some sort of scapegoat. This scapegoat can be God— in Russia there is no lack of such atheists from resentment—or the social order, or education and training, or the Jews, or the nobility, or those who have turned out well in any way. “It is a crime to be born in favorable circumstances; for thus one has disinherited the others, pushed them aside, condemned them to vice, even to work— How can I help it that I am wretched! But somebody must be responsible, otherwise it would be unberable!” In short, the pessimism of indignation invents responsibility in order to create a pleasant feeling for itself—revenge—“Sweeter than honey” old Homer called it. — * That such a theory is no longer rightly understood, that is to say despised, is a consequence of the bit of Christianity that we all still have in our blood; so we are tolerant toward things merely because they smell somewhat Christian from a distance— The socialists appeal to the Christian instincts, that is their most subtle piece of shrewdness. Christianity has accustomed us to the superstitious concept of the “soul,” the “immortal soul,” soul-monads that really are at home somewhere else and have only by chance fallen, as it were into this or that condition, into the “earthly” and become “flesh”; but their essence is not held to be affected, to say nothing of being conditioned, by all this. Social, family, historical circumstances are for the soul only incidental, perhaps embarrassments; in any event, it is not produced by them. With this idea, the individual is made transcendent; as a result, he can attribute a senseless importance to himself. In fact, it was Christianity that first invited the individual to play the judge of everything and everyone; megalomania almost became a duty: one has to enforce eternal rights against everything temporal and conditioned! What of the state! What of society! What of historical laws! What of physiology! What speaks here is something beyond becoming, something unchanging throughout history, something immortal, something divine: a soul! Another Christian concept, no less crazy, has passed even more deeply into the tissue of modernity: the concept of the “equality of souls before God.” This concept furnishes the prototype of all theories of equal rights: mankind was first taught to stammer the proposition of equality in a religious context, and only later was it made into morality: no wonder that man ended by taking it seriously, taking it practically!—that is to say, politically, democratically, socialistically, in the spirit of the pessimism of indignation. * Wherever responsibilities have been sought it was the instinct of revenge that sought. This instinct of revenge has so mastered mankind in the course of millennia that the whole of metaphysics, psychology, conception of history, but above all morality, is impregnated with it. As far as man has thought, he has introduced the bacillus of revenge into things. He has made even God ill with it, he has deprived existence in general of its innocence; namely, by tracing back every state of being thus and thus to a will, an intention, a responsible act. The entire doctrine of the will, this most fateful falsification in psychology hitherto, was essentially invented for the sake of punishment. It was the social utility of punishment that guaranteed this concept its dignity, its power, its truth. The originators of this psychology—the psychology of will—are to be sought in the classes that administered the penal law, above all among the priests at the head of the oldest communality: they wanted to create for themselves a right to take revenge—they wanted to create a right for God to take revenge. To this end, man was conceived of as “free”; to this end, every action had to be conceived of as willed, the origin of every action as conscious. But these sentences refute the old psychology.¹¹¹ Today, when Europe seems to have entered upon the opposite course, when we halcyonians especially are trying with all our might to withdraw, banish, and extinguish the concepts of guilt and punishment from the world, when our most serious endeavor is to purify psychology, morality, history, nature, social institutions and sanctions, and even God of this filth—whom must we recognize as our most natural antagonists? Precisely those apostles of revenge and resentment, those pessimists from indignation par excellence, who make it their mission to sanctify their filth under the name of “indignation.” We others, who desire to restore innocence to becoming, would like to be the missionaries of a cleaner idea: that no one has given man his qualities, neither God, nor society, nor his parents and ancestors, nor he himself—that no one is to blame for him. There is no being that could be held responsible for the fact that anyone exists at all, that anyone is thus and thus, that anyone was born in certain circumstances, in a certain environment.— It is a tremendous restorative that such a being is lacking. We are not the result of an eternal intention, a will, a wish: we are not the product of an attempt to achieve an “ideal of perfection” or an “ideal of happiness” or an “ideal of virtue”—any more than we are a blunder on the part of God that must frighten even him (an idea with which, as is well known, the Old Testament begins).

There is no place, no purpose, no meaning, on which we can shift the responsibility for our being, for our being thus and thus. Above all: no one could do it; one cannot judge, measure, compare the whole, to say nothing of denying it! Why not?— For five reasons, all accessible even to modest intellects; for example, because nothing exists besides the whole— And, to say it again, this is a tremendous restorative; this constitutes the innocence of all existence.112 766 (1886-1887) Basic error: to place the goal in the herd and not in single individuals! The herd is a means, no more! But now one is attempting to understand the herd as an individual and to ascribe to it a higher rank than to the individual—profound misunderstanding! ! ! Also to characterize that which makes herdlike, sympathy, as the more valuable side of our nature! 767 (1883-1888) The individual is something quite new which creates new things, something absolute; all his acts are entirely his own. Ultimately, the individual derives the values of his acts from himself; because he has to interpret in a quite individual way even the words he has inherited. His interpretation of a formula at least is personal, even if he does not create a formula: as an interpreter he is still creative. 768 (1882) The “ego” subdues and kills: it operates like an organic cell: it is a robber and violent. It wants to regenerate itself—pregnancy. It wants to give birth to its god and see all mankind at his feet.

769 (Fall 1888)

Every living thing reaches out as far from itself with its force as it can, and overwhelms what is weaker: thus it takes pleasure in itself. The increasing “humanizing” of this tendency consists in this, that there is an ever subtler sense of how hard it is really to incorporate another: while a crude injury done him certainly demonstrates our power over him, it at the same time estranges his will from us even more—and thus makes him less easy to subjugate.

770 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The degree of resistance that must be continually overcome in order to remain on top is the measure of freedom, whether for individuals or for societies—freedom understood, that is, as positive power, as will to power. According to this concept, the highest form of individual freedom, of sovereignty, would in all probability emerge not five steps from its opposite,¹¹³ where the danger of slavery hangs over existence like a hundred swords of Damocles. Look at history from this viewpoint: the ages in which the “individual” achieves such ripe perfection, i.e., freedom, and the classic type of the sovereign man is attained—oh no! they have never been humane ages! One must have no choice: either on top—or underneath, like a worm, mocked, annihilated, trodden upon. One must oppose tyrants to become a tyrant, i.e., free. It is no small advantage to live under a hundred swords of Damocles: that way one learns to dance, one attains “freedom of movement.” 771 (1883-1888) Man, more than any animal, originally altruistic: hence his slow development (child) and lofty culture; hence, too, his extraordinary, ultimate kind of egoism.—Beasts of prey are much more individual.

772 (Spring-Fall 1880)

[Critique of “selfishness”—]114 The involuntary naiveté of La Rochefoucauld, who thought he was saying something bold, free and paradoxical—in those days “truth” in psychological matters was something that aroused astonishment—

Example: “les grandes âmes ne sont pas celles qui ont moins de passions et plus de vertus que les âmes communes, mais seulement celles qui ont de plus grands desseins.”115— To be sure, John Stuart Mill (who calls Chamfort the nobler and more philosophical La Rouchefoucauld of the eighteenth century—) sees in him only an astute observer of all that in the human breast that derives from “habitual selfishness,” and adds: “a noble spirit will be unable to convince himself of the need to impose upon himself a constant contemplation of commonness and baseness, unless it were to show over what corrupting influences a lofty mind and nobility of character are able to triumph.”

773 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Morphology of self-esteem First viewpoint: to what extent feelings of sympathy and community are the lower, preparatory stage at a time when personal self-esteem and individual initiative in evaluation are not yet possible. Second viewpoint: to what extent the height of collective self-esteem, pride in the distinction of the clan, the feeling of inequality, the aversion to mediation, equality of rights, reconciliation, is a school for individual self-reliance; that is, in so far as it compels the individual to represent the pride of the whole: he has to speak and act with extreme respect for himself in so far as he represents the community in his own person. Also when the individual feels like the instrument and mouthpiece of the deity. Third viewpoint: to what extent these forms of depersonalization in fact give the person a tremendous importance, in so far as higher powers employ him; religious awe before oneself the condition of the prophet and poet. Fourth viewpoint: to what extent responsibility for the whole trains the individual to, and permits him, a broad view, a stern and terrible hand, a circumspection and coolness, a grandeur of bearing and gesture, which he would not permit himself on his own behalf. In summa: collective self-esteem is the great preparatory school for personal sovereignty. The noble class is that which inherits this training. 774 (1883-1888) The disguised forms of the will to power: Desire for freedom, independence, also for equilibrium, peace, co-ordination. Also the hermit, "spiritual freedom." In the lowest form: will to exist at all, "the drive to self-preservation." Enrollment, so as to satisfy the will to power in a larger whole: submission, making oneself indispensable and useful to those in power; love, as a secret path to the heart of the more powerful—so as to dominate him. The sense of duty, conscience, the imaginary consolation of outranking those who actually possess power; the recognition of an order of rank that permits judgment even of the more powerful; self-condemnation; the invention of new tables of value (Jews: classical example).

775 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Praise and gratitude as will to power.¹¹⁶— Praise and gratitude on the occasions of harvest, good weather, victory, marriage, peace:—all these festivals require a subject upon which the feeling can be discharged. One desires that all good things that happen to one should have been done to one: one desires a doer. The same applies to works of art. one is not satisfied with them alone: one praises the doer. What, then is praise? A sort of restoration of balance in respect of benefits received, a giving in return, a demonstration of our power—for those who praise affirm, judge, evaluate, pass sentence: they claim the right of being able to affirm, of being able to dispense honors. A heightened feeling of happiness and life is also a heightened feeling of power: it is from this that man praises (—from this that he invents and seeks a doer, a “subject”—). Gratitude as virtuous revenge: most strenuously demanded and practiced where equality and pride must both be upheld, where revenge is practiced best.

776 (Spring-Fall 1887)

On the “Machiavellianism” of Power The will to power appears a. among the oppressed, among slaves of all kinds, as will to “freedom”: merely getting free seems to be the goal (religiomorally: “responsible to one’s own conscience alone”; “evangelical freedom,” etc.); b. among a stronger kind of man, getting ready for power, as will to overpower; if it is at first unsuccessful, then it limits itself to the will to “justice,” i.e., to the same measure of rights as the ruling type possesses; c. among the strongest, richest, most independent, most courageous, as “love of mankind,” of “the people,” of the gospel, of truth, God; as sympathy; “self-sacrifice,” etc.; as overpowering, bearing away with oneself, taking into one’s service, as instinctive self-involvement with a great quantum of power to which one is able to give direction: the hero, the prophet, the Caesar, the savior, the shepherd; (—sexual love, too, belongs here: it desires to overpower, to take possession, and it appears as self-surrender. Fundamentally it is only love of one’s “instrument,” of one’s “steed”—the conviction that this or that belongs to one because one is in a position to use it). “Freedom,” “justice,” and “love”!!!

777 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Love.— Look into it; women's love and sympathy—is there anything more egoistic?—And if they sacrifice themselves, their honor, their reputation, to whom do they sacrifice themselves? To the man? Or is it not rather to an unbridled urge?— These desires are just as selfish even if they please others and implant gratitude— To what extent this sort of hyperfetation of one valuation can sanctify everything else!!

778 (March-June 1888)

“Senses,” “passions.”— Fear of the senses, of the desires, of the passions, when it goes so far as to counsel us against them, is already a symptom of weakness: extreme measures always indicate abnormal conditions. What is lacking, or crumbling, here is the strength to restrain an impulse: if one’s instinct is to have to succumb, i.e., to have to react, then one does well to avoid the opportunities (“seductions”) for it. A “stimulation of the senses” is a seduction only for those whose system is too easily moved and influenced: in the opposite case, that of a system of great slowness and severity, strong stimuli are needed to set the functions going. Excess is a reproach only against those who have no right to it; and almost all the passions have been brought into ill repute on account of those who were not sufficiently strong to employ them—. One must understand that the same objections can be made to the passions as are made to sickness: nonetheless—we cannot do without sickness, and even less without the passions. We need the abnormal, we give life a tremendous choc by these great sicknesses. In detail, the following must be distinguished: the dominating passion, which even brings with it the supremest form of health; here the co-ordination of the inner systems and their operation in the service of one end is best achieved—but this is almost the definition of health! the antagonism of the passions; two, three, a multiplicity of “souls in one breast”:¹¹⁷ very unhealthy, inner ruin, disintegration, betraying and increasing and inner conflict and anarchism— unless one passion at last becomes master. Return to health— juxtaposition without antagonism or collaboration: often periodic, and then, as soon as an order has been established, also healthy. The most interesting men, the chameleons, belong here; they are not in contradiction with themselves, they are happy and secure, but they do not develop—their differing states lie juxtaposed, even if they are separated sevenfold. They change, they do not become.

779 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The quantity of the aim in its effect on the perspective of evaluation: the great criminal and the small one. The quantity of the aim that is wanted is also decisive for him who wills— whether he respects himself or feels dejected and miserable. — Then the degree of spirituality in the means in its effect on the perspective of evaluation. How different the philosophical innovator, experimenter and man of violence appears from the robber, barbarian and adventurer!— Appearance of “disinterestedness.” Finally, noble manners, bearing, courage, self-confidence— how they alter the valuation of that which is attained in this way! * Perspective of evaluation: Influence of the quantity (great, small) of the aim. Influence of the spirituality of the means. Influence of manners during the act. Influence of success or failure. Influence of the opposing forces and their value. Influence of that which is permitted and forbidden.

780 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The artifices for making possible actions, measures, affects that, from an individual standpoint, are no longer “allowable”—nor “in good taste”: that art “makes them tasteful to us” that allows us to enter such “estranged” worlds. historians show in what way they are right and reasonable; travels; exoticism; psychology; penal codes; madhouse; criminals; sociology; “impersonality” (so that, as media of a collective, we permit ourselves these affects and actions—council of judges, jury, citizen, soldier, cabinet minister, prince, association, “critic”—) gives us the feeling we are making a sacrifice—

781 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Preoccupation with itself and its “eternal salvation” is not the expression of a rich and self-confident type; for that type does not give a damn about its salvation—it has no such interest in happiness of any kind; it is force, deed, desire—it imposes itself upon things, it lays violent hands on things. Christianity is a romantic hypochondria of those whose legs are shaky. Wherever the hedonistic perspective comes into the foreground one may infer suffering and a type that represents a failure.

782 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The “growing autonomy of the individual”: these Parisian philosophers such as Fouillée speak of this; they ought to take a look at the race moutonnaire to which they belong! Open your eyes, you sociologists of the future! The individual has grown strong under opposite conditions; what you describe is the most extreme weakening and impoverishment of mankind; you even desire it and employ to that end the whole mendacious apparatus of the old ideal! you are so constituted that you actually regard your herd-animal needs as an ideal! A complete lack of psychological integrity! 783 (1885) The modern European is characterized by two apparently opposite traits: individualism and the demand for equal rights; that I have at last come to understand. For the individual is an extremely vulnerable piece of vanity: conscious of how easily it suffers, this vanity demands that every other shall count as its equal, that it should be only inter pares. In this way a social race is characterized in which talents and powers do not diverge very much. The pride that desires solitude and few admirers is quite beyond comprehension; a really “great” success is possible only through the masses, indeed one hardly grasps the fact any more that a success with the masses is always really a petty success: because pulchrum est paucorum hominum.¹¹⁹ All moralities know nothing of an “order of rank” among men; teachers of law nothing of a communal conscience. The principle of the individual rejects very great human beings and demands, among men approximately equal, the subtlest eye and the speediest recognition of a talent; and because everyone has some kind of talent in such late and civilized cultures—and therefore can expect to receive back his share of honor—there is more flattering of modest merits today than ever before: it gives the age a veneer of boundless fairness. Its unfairness consists in a boundless rage, not against tyrants and public flatterers even in the arts, but against noble men, who despise the praise of the many. The demand for equal rights (i.e., to be allowed to sit in judgment on everything and everyone) is anti-aristocratic. Equally strange to the age is the vanished individual, the absorption in a great type, the desire not to be a personality—which constituted the distinction and ambition of many lofty men in earlier days (the greatest poets among them); or “to be a city” as in Greece; Jesuitism, Prussian officer corps and bureaucracy; or to be a pupil and continuator of great masters—for which non-social conditions and a lack of petty vanity are needed.

784 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Individualism is a modest and still unconscious form of the “will to power”; here it seems sufficient to the individual to get free from an overpowering domination by society (whether that of the state or of the church). He does not oppose them as a person but only as an individual; he represents all individuals against the totality. That means: he instinctively posits himself as equal to all other individuals; what he gains in this struggle he gains for himself not as a person but as a representative of individuals against the totality. Socialism is merely a means of agitation employed by individualism: it grasps that, to attain anything, one must organize oneself to a collective action, to a “power.” But what it desires is not a social order as the goal of the individual but a social order as a means for making possible many individuals: this is the instinct of socialists about which they frequently deceive themselves (—apart from the fact that, in order to prevail, they frequently have to deceive themselves). The preaching of altruistic morality in the service of individual egoism: one of the most common lies of the nineteenth century. Anarchism, too, is merely a means of agitation employed by socialism; by means of it, socialism arouses fear, by means of fear it begins to fascinate and to terrorize: above all—it draws the courageous, the daring to its side, even in the most spiritual matters. All this notwithstanding: individualism is the most modest stage of the will to power. * Once one has achieved a certain degree of independence, one wants more: people arrange themselves according to their degree of force: the individual no longer simply supposes himself the equal of others, he seeks his equals—he distinguishes himself from others. Individualism is followed by the formation of groups and organs; related tendencies join together and become active as a power; between these centers of power friction, war, recognition of one another’s forces, reciprocation, approaches, regulation of an exchange of services. Finally, an order of rank. N.B.:120 2. they enter into struggle with one another, they come to an agreement over “equality of rights” (—“justice” as an aim—); 3. once this is achieved, the actual inequalities of force produce an enhanced effect (because peace rules on the whole and many small quanta of force now constitute differences that formerly did not count). Now individuals organize themselves in groups; the groups struggle for privileges and predominance. Strife breaks out again in a milder form. One desires freedom so long as one does not possess power. Once one does possess it, one desires to overpower; if one cannot do that (if one is still too weak to do so), one desires “justice,” i.e., equal power.

785 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Correction of the concept “egoism.”— When one has grasped to what extent the concept “individual” is an error because every single creature constitutes the entire process in its entire course (not merely as “inherited,” but the process itself —), then the single creature acquires a tremendously great significance. Instinct speaks quite correctly here. Where this instinct weakens—where the individual seeks a value for himself only in the service of others, one can be certain that exhaustion and degeneration are present. An altruistic disposition, genuine and without tartuffery, is an instinct for creating at least a secondary value for oneself in the service of other egoisms. Usually, however, altruism is only apparent; a detour to the preservation of one’s own feeling of vitality and value.

786 (Spring-Fall 1887)

History of Moralization and Dismoralization First proposition: There are no moral actions whatsoever: they are completely imaginary. Not only are they indemonstrable (which Kant, e.g., admitted, and Christianity as well)—they are altogether impossible. Through a psychological misunderstanding, one has invented an antithesis to the motivating forces, and believes one has described another kind of force; one has imagined a primum mobile that does not exist at all. According to the valuation that evolved the antithesis “moral” and “immoral” in general, one has to say: there are only immoral intentions and actions. Second proposition: This entire distinction “moral” and “immoral” proceeds from the idea that moral as well as immoral actions are acts arising from free spontaneity—in short, that such a spontaneity exists, or in other words: that moral judgments in general relate only to one species of intentions and actions, those that are free. But this whole species of intentions and actions is purely imaginary; the world to which alone the moral standard can be applied does not exist at all:—there are neither moral nor immoral actions. * The psychological error out of which the antithetical concepts “moral” and “immoral” arose is: “selfless,” “unegoistic,” “self-denying”—all unreal, imaginary. False dogmatism regarding the “ego”: it is taken in an atomistic sense, in a false antithesis to the “non-ego”; at the same time, pried out of becoming, as something that is a being. The false substantialization of the ego: (in the faith in individual immortality) this is made into an article of faith, especially under the influence of religio-moral training. After this artificial separation of the ego, and the declaration that it exists in and for itself, one confronted a value antithesis that seemed irrefutable: the single ego and the tremendous non-ego. It seemed evident that the value of the single ego could lie only in relating itself to the tremendous “non-ego”—being subject to it and existing for its sake.—Here the herd instincts were decisive: nothing is so contrary to this instinct as the sovereignty of the individual. But if the ego is conceived as something in and for itself, then its value must lie in self-negation. Thus: 1. the false autonomy of the “individual,” as atom; 2. the herd valuation, which abhors the desire to remain an atom and regards it as hostile; 3. as a result: the individual overcome by moving his goal; 4. now there seemed to be actions that were self-negating: one wove a whole sphere of fantastic antitheses about them; 5. one asked: in what actions does man affirm himself most strongly? Around these (sexuality, avarice, lust to rule, cruelty, etc.) prohibition, hatred, and contempt were heaped: one believed there were unselfish drives, one condemned all the selfish ones, one demanded the unselfish; 6. as a result: what had one done? One had placed a prohibition upon all the strongest, most natural, indeed the only real drives—henceforth, in order to find an action praiseworthy, one had to deny the presence in it of such drives;—tremendous falsification in psychologisms. Even any kind of “self-satisfaction” had first to be made possible by misunderstanding and construing oneself sub specie boni. Conversely: that species that derived its advantage from depriving man of his self-satisfaction (the representatives of the herd instinct; e.g., the priests and philosophers) became subtle and psychologically astute, so as to demonstrate how nonetheless selfishness ruled everywhere. Christian conclusion: “Everything is sin; even our virtues. Absolute reprehensibility of man. The unselfish action is not possible.” Original sin. In short: once man had made of his instincts an antithesis to a purely imaginary world of the good, he ended by despising himself as incapable of performing actions that were “good.” N.B. Christianity thus demonstrates an advance in the sharpening of psychological insight: La Rochefoucauld and Pascal. It grasped the essential equivalence of human actions and their equivalence of value in essentials (—all immoral). * Now one seriously set about the task of forming men in whom selfishness was dead:—priests, saints. And if one doubted the possibility of becoming “perfect,” one did not doubt that one knew what is perfect. The psychology of the saint, the priest, the “good man” naturally had to be purely phantasmagorical. One had declared the real motives of actions bad: in order still to be able to act at all, to prescribe actions, one had to describe as possible and as it were sanctify actions that are utterly impossible. With the falseness of one’s former slanders, one now honored and idealized. Rage against the instincts of life as “holy,” as venerable. Absolute chastity, absolute obedience, absolute poverty: the priestly ideal. Alms, pity, sacrifice,¹²¹ denial of beauty, of reason, of sensuality, a morose eye cast on all strong qualities one possessed: the lay ideal. * One advances: the slandered instincts, too, try to create a right for themselves (e.g., Luther’s Reformation: coarsest form of moral mendaciousness under the guise of “evangelical freedom”)—one rebaptized them with holy names; the slandered instincts try to prove themselves necessary for the existence of the virtuous instincts; one must vivre, pour vivre pour autrui:¹²² egoism as means to an end; one goes further, one tries to grant both the egoistic and the altruistic impulses a right to exist: equal rights for the one as for the other (from the standpoint of utility); one goes further, one seeks a higher utility in a preference of the egoistic viewpoint over the altruistic: more useful in relation to the happiness of the majority or the progress of mankind, etc. Thus: a preponderance of the rights of egoism, but under the perspective of extreme altruism (“collective utility for mankind”); one tries to reconcile the altruistic mode of action with naturalness, one seeks altruism in the foundations of life; one seeks egoism and altruism as equally founded in the essence of life and nature; one dreams of a disappearance of the antithesis in some future, when, owing to continual adaptation, egoism will at the same time be altruism; finally, one grasps that altruistic actions are only a species of egoistic actions—and that the degree to which one loves, spends oneself, proves the degree of individual power and personality. In short, that when one makes men more evil, one makes them better—and that one cannot be one without being the other—At this point the curtain rises on the dreadful forgery of the psychology of man hitherto. * Consequences: there are only immoral intentions and actions;—the so-called moral ones must be shown to be immoral.¹²³ The derivation of all affects from the one will to power: the same essence. The concept of life:—in the apparent antithesis (of “good” and “evil”) degrees of power in instinct express themselves, temporary orders of rank under which certain instincts are held in check or taken into service.— Justification of morality: economical, etc. * Against the second proposition. Determinism: attempt to rescue the moral world by transporting it—into the unknown. Determinism is only a modus of permitting ourselves to juggle our evaluations away once they have no place in a mechanistically conceived world. One must therefore attack determinism and undermine it: and also dispute our right to a distinction between a world in itself and a phenomenal world. 787 (1883-1888) The absolute necessity of a total liberation from ends: otherwise we should not be permitted to try to sacrifice ourselves and let ourselves go Only the innocence of becoming gives us the greatest courage and the greatest freedom! 788 (1883-1888) To restore a good conscience to the evil man—has this been my unconscious endeavor? I mean, to the evil man in so far as he is the strong man? (Dostoevsky’s judgment on the criminals in prison should be cited here.) 789 (1885-1886) Our new “freedom.”— What a feeling of freedom there is in feeling as we freed spirits do, that we are not harnessed to any system of “purposes”! Likewise, that the concepts “reward” and “punishment” do not reside in the essence of things! Likewise, that the good and the evil action cannot be called good and evil in themselves, but only in the perspective of what tends to preserve certain types of human communities! Likewise, that our assessments of pleasure and pain have no cosmic, let alone a metaphysical, significance! (—that pessimism, the pessimism of Herr von Hartmann, who claims to put the pleasure and displeasure of existence itself on the scales, with his arbitrary incarceration in the pre-Copernican prison and field of vision, would be something retarded and regressive unless it is merely a bad joke of a Berliner.)

790 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Once one is clear about the “why?” of one’s life, one can let its How? take care of itself. It is itself a sign of disbelief in a Why, in purpose and meaning, a sign of a lack of will, if the value of pleasure and displeasure step into the foreground and hedonistic-pessimistic theories get a hearing; and renunciation, resignation, virtue, and “objectivity” may at least be a sign that what matters most is beginning to be defective. 791 (1885) Up to now there has not yet been any German culture. It is no objection to this statement that there have been great hermits in Germany (e g., Goethe); for these had their own culture. But like mighty, defiant, solitary rocks, they were surrounded by the rest of what was German as by their antithesis—a soft, marshy, insecure ground upon which every step from other countries made an “impression” and created a “form”: German culture was a thing without character, an almost limitless compliance. 792 (1885) Germany, rich in clever and well-informed scholars, has lacked great souls, mighty spirits, to such an extent and for so long that it seems to have forgotten what a great soul, a mighty spirit, is; and today mediocre and quite ill-constituted men place themselves in the market square almost with a good conscience and without any embarrassment and praise themselves as great men and reformers, as, e.g., Eugen Dühring does—indeed a clever and well-informed scholar, but one who nevertheless betrays with almost every word he says that he harbors a petty soul and is tormented by narrow, envious feelings; also that what drives him is not a mighty, overflowing, benevolent, spendthrift spirit—but ambition! But to lust after honors in this age is even more unworthy of a philosopher than it was in any previous age: today, when the mob rules, when the mob bestows the honors!

793 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

My “future”:—a rigorous polytechnic education. Military service; so that, on an average, every man of the higher classes would be an officer, whatever else he might be. IV. THE WILL TO POWER AS ART

794 (March-June 1888)

Our religion, morality, and philosophy are decadence forms of man. The countermovement: art. 795 (1885-1886)¹²⁴ The artist-philosopher. Higher concept of art. Whether a man can place himself so far distant from other men that he can form them? (—Preliminary exercises: (1) he who forms himself, the hermit; (2) the artist hitherto, as a perfecter on a small scale, working on material.) 796 (1885-1886) The work of art where it appears without an artist, e.g., as body, as organization (Prussian officer corps, Jesuit order). To what extent the artist is only a preliminary stage. The world as a work of art that gives birth to itself—— 797 (1885-1886) The phenomenon “artist” is still the most transparent:—to see through it to the basic instincts of power, nature, etc.! Also those of religion and morality! “Play,” the useless—as the ideal of him who is overfull of strength, as “childlike.” The “childlikeness” of God, pais paizon.¹²⁵

798 (March-June 1888)

Apollinian—Dionysian.¹²⁶— There are two conditions in which art appears in man like a force of nature and disposes of him whether he will or no: as the compulsion to have visions and as a compulsion to an orgiastic state. Both conditions are rehearsed in ordinary life, too, but weaker: in dream and in intoxication. But the same antithesis obtains between dream and intoxication: both release artistic powers in us, but different ones: the dream those of vision, association, poetry; intoxication those of gesture, passion, song, dance.

799 (March-June 1888)

In the Dionysian intoxication there is sexuality and voluptuousness: they are not lacking in the Apollinian. There must also be a difference in tempo in the two conditions— The extreme calm in certain sensations of intoxication (more strictly: the retardation of the feelings of time and space) likes to be reflected in a vision of the calmest gestures and types of soul. The classical style is essentially a representation of this calm, simplification, abbreviation, concentration—the highest feeling of power is concentrated in the classical type. To react slowly; a great consciousness; no feeling of struggle.

800 (March-June 1888)

The feeling of intoxication, in fact corresponding to an increase in strength; strongest in the mating season: new organs, new accomplishments, colors, forms; “becoming more beautiful” is a consequence of enhanced strength.¹²⁷ Becoming more beautiful as the expression of a victorious will, of increased co-ordination, of a harmonizing of all the strong desires, of an infallibly perpendicular stress. Logical and geometrical simplification is a consequence of enhancement of strength: conversely the apprehension of such a simplification again enhances the feeling of strength— High point of the development: the grand style. Ugliness signifies the decadence of a type, contradiction and lack of co-ordination among the inner desires—signifies a decline in organizing strength, in “will,” to speak psychologically. The condition of pleasure called intoxication is precisely an exalted feeling of power— The sensations of space and time are altered: tremendous distances are surveyed and, as it were, for the first time apprehended; the extension of vision over greater masses and expanses; the refinement of the organs for the apprehension of much that is extremely small and fleeting; divination, the power of understanding with only the least assistance, at the slightest suggestion: “intelligent” sensuality—; strength as a feeling of dominion in the muscles, as suppleness and pleasure in movement, as dance, as levity and presto; strength as pleasure in the proof of strength, as bravado, adventure, fearlessness, indifference to life or death— All these climactic moments of life mutually stimulate one another; the world of images and ideas of the one suffices as a suggestion for the others:—in this way, states finally merge into one another though they might perhaps have good reason to remain apart. For example: the feeling of religious intoxication and sexual excitation (—two profound feelings, co-ordinated to an almost amazing degree. What pleases all pious women, old or young? Answer: a saint with beautiful legs, still young, still an idiot). Cruelty in tragedy and sympathy (—also normally co-ordinated—) Spring, dance, music:— all competitions between the sexes—and even that Faustian “infinity in the breast.” Artists, if they are any good, are (physically as well) strong, full of surplus energy, powerful animals, sensual; without a certain overheating of the sexual system a Raphael is unthinkable— Making music is another way of making children; chastity is merely the economy of an artist—and in any event, even with artists fruitfulness ceases when potency ceases— Artists should see nothing as it is, but fuller, simpler, stronger: to that end, their lives must contain a kind of youth and spring, a kind of habitual intoxication.

801 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

The states in which we infuse a transfiguration and fullness into things and poetize about them until they reflect back our fullness and joy in life: sexuality; intoxication; feasting; spring; victory over an enemy, mockery; bravado; cruelty; the ecstasy of religious feeling. Three elements principally: sexuality, intoxication, cruelty—all belonging to the oldest festal joys of mankind, all also preponderate in the early “artist.” Conversely, when we encounter things that display this transfiguration and fullness, the animal responds with an excitation of those spheres in which all those pleasurable states are situated— and a blending of these very delicate nuances of animal well-being and desires constitutes the aesthetic state. The latter appears only in natures capable of that bestowing and overflowing fullness of bodily vigor; it is this that is always the primum mobile. The sober, the weary, the exhausted, the dried-up (e.g. scholars) can receive absolutely nothing from art, because they do not possess the primary artistic force, the pressure of abundance: whoever cannot give, also receives nothing “Perfection”: in these states (in the case of sexual love especially) there is naively revealed what the deepest instinct recognizes as higher, more desirable, more valuable in general, the upward movement of its type; also toward what status it really aspires. Perfection: that is the extraordinary expansion of its feeling of power, riches, necessary overflowing of all limits.

802 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Art reminds us of states of animal vigor; it is on the one hand an excess and overflow of blooming physicality into the world of images and desires; on the other, an excitation of the animal functions through the images and desires of intensified life;—an enhancement of the feeling of life, a stimulant to it. How can even ugliness possess this power? In so far as it still communicates something of the artist's victorious energy which has become master of this ugliness and awfulness; or in so far as it mildly excites in us the pleasure of cruelty (under certain conditions even a desire to harm ourselves, self-violation—and thus the feeling of power over ourselves). 803 (1883-1888) "Beauty" is for the artist something outside all orders of rank, because in beauty opposites are tamed; the highest sign of power, namely power over opposites; moreover, without tension:—that violence is no longer needed; that everything follows, obeys, so easily and so pleasantly—that is what delights the artist's will to power.

804 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Origin of the beautiful and ugly.¹²⁸—Biological value of the beautiful and the ugly.— That which is instinctively repugnant to us, aesthetically, is proved by mankind's longest experience to be harmful, dangerous, worthy of suspicion: the suddenly vocal aesthetic instinct (e.g., in disgust) contains a judgment. To this extent the beautiful stands within the general category of the biological values of what is useful, beneficent, life-enhancing—but in such a way that a host of stimuli that are only distantly associated with, and remind us only faintly of, useful things and states give us the feeling of the beautiful, i.e., of the increase of the feeling of power (—not merely things, therefore, but also the sensations that accompany such things, or symbols of them). Thus the beautiful and the ugly are recognized as relative to our most fundamental values of preservation. It is senseless to want to posit anything as beautiful or ugly apart from this. The beautiful exists just as little as does the good, or the true. In every case it is a question of the conditions of preservation of a certain type of man: thus the herd man will experience the value feeling of the beautiful in the presence of different things than will the exceptional or over-man. It is the perspective of the foreground, which concerns itself only with immediate consequences, from which the value of the beautiful (also of the good, also of the true) arises. All instinctive judgments are shortsighted in regard to the chain of consequences: they advise what is to be done immediately. The understanding is essentially a brake upon immediate reactions on the basis of instinctive judgments: it retards, it considers, it looks further along the chain of consequences. Judgments concerning beauty and ugliness are shortsighted (—they are always opposed by the understanding—) but persuasive in the highest degree; they appeal to our instincts where they decide most quickly and pronounce their Yes and No before the understanding can speak. The most habitual affirmations of beauty excite and stimulate each other; once the aesthetic drive is at work, a whole host of other perfections, originating elsewhere, crystallize around “the particular instance of beauty.” It is not possible to remain objective, or to suspend the interpretive, additive, interpolating, poetizing power (—the latter is the forging of the chain of affirmations of beauty). The sight of a “beautiful woman”— Thus 1. the judgment of beauty is shortsighted, it sees only the immediate consequences; 2. it lavishes upon the object that inspires it a magic conditioned by the association of various beauty judgments—that are quite alien to the nature of that object. To experience a thing as beautiful means: to experience it necessarily wrongly— (which, incidentally, is why marriage for love is, from the point of view of society, the most unreasonable kind of marriage). 805 (1883-1888) On the genesis of art.— That making perfect, seeing as perfect, which characterizes the cerebral system bursting with sexual energy (evening with the beloved, the smallest chance occurrences transfigured, life a succession of sublime things, “the misfortune of the unfortunate lover worth more than anything else”); on the other hand, everything perfect and beautiful works as an unconscious reminder of that enamored condition and its way of seeing—every perfection, all the beauty of things, revives through contiguity a this aphrodisiac bliss.

(Physiologically: the creative instinct of the artist and the distribution of semen in his blood—) The demand for art and beauty is an indirect demand for the ecstasies of sexuality communicated to the brain. The world become perfect, through “love”— 806 (1883-1888) Sensuality in its disguises: (1) as idealism (“Plato”), peculiar to youth, creating the same kind of concave image that the beloved in particular assumes, imposing an encrustation, magnification, transfiguration, infinity upon everything—; (2) in the religion of love: “a handsome young man, a beautiful woman,” somehow divine, a bridegroom, a bride of the soul—; (3) in art, as the “embellishing” power: as man sees woman and, as it were, makes her a present of everything excellent, so the sensuality of the artist puts into one object everything else that he honors and esteems—in this way he perfects an object (“idealizes” it). Woman, conscious of man’s feelings concerning women, assists his efforts at idealization by adorning herself, walking beautifully, dancing, expressing delicate thoughts: in the same way, she practices modesty, reserve, distance—realizing instinctively that in this way the idealizing capacity of the man will grow. (—Given the tremendous subtlety of woman’s instinct, modesty remains by no means conscious hypocrisy: she divines that it is precisely an actual naive modesty that most seduces a man and impels him to overestimate her. Therefore woman is naive—from the subtlety of her instinct, which advises her of the utility of innocence. A deliberate closing of one’s eyes to oneself— Wherever dissembling produces a stronger effect when it is unconscious, it becomes unconscious.)

807 (Summer-Fall 1888)

What a tremendous amount can be accomplished by that intoxication which is called “love” but which is yet something other than love!— But everyone has his own knowledge of this. The muscular strength of a girl increases as soon as a man comes into her vicinity; there are instruments to measure this. When the sexes are in yet closer contact, as, e.g., at dances and other social events, this strength is augmented to such a degree that real feats of strength are possible: in the end one scarcely believes one’s own eyes—or one’s watch. In such cases, to be sure, we must reckon with the fact that dancing in itself, like every other swift movement, brings with it a kind of intoxication of the whole vascular, nervous, and muscular system. So one has to reckon with the combined effects of a twofold intoxication.— And how wise it is at times to be a little tipsy! There are realities that one may never admit to oneself; after all, one is a woman; after all, one has a woman’s pudeurs— Those young creatures dancing over there are obviously beyond all reality: they are dancing with nothing but palpable ideals; what is more, they even see ideals sitting around them: the mothers!— Opportunity to quote Faust— They look incomparably better when they are a little tipsy like that, these pretty creatures—oh, how well they know that, too. They actually become amiable because they know it. Finally, they are also inspired by their finery; their finery is their third intoxication: they believe in their tailors as they believe in their God—and who would dissuade them from this faith? This faith makes blessed! And self-admiration is healthy! Self-admiration protects against colds. Has a pretty woman who knew herself to be well dressed ever caught cold? Never! I am even assuming that she was barely dressed.¹²⁹

808 (March-June 1888)

Do you desire the most astonishing proof of how far the transfiguring power of intoxication can go?— “Love” is this proof: that which is called love in all the languages and silences of the world. In this case, intoxication has done with reality to such a degree that in the consciousness of the lover the cause of it is extinguished and something else seems to have taken its place—a vibration and glittering of all the magic mirrors of Circe— Here it makes no difference whether one is man or animal; even less whether one has spirit, goodness, integrity. If one is subtle, one is fooled subtly; if one is coarse, one is fooled coarsely; but love, and even the love of God, the saintly love of “redeemed souls,” remains the same in its roots: a fever that has good reason to transfigure itself, an intoxication that does well to lie about itself— And in any case, one lies well when one loves, about oneself and to oneself: one seems to oneself transfigured, stronger, richer, more perfect, one is more perfect— Here we discover art as an organic function: we discover it in the most angelic instinct, “love”; we discover it as the greatest stimulus of life—art thus sublimely expedient even when it lies— But we should do wrong if we stopped with its power to lie: it does more than merely imagine; it even transposes values. And it is not only that it transposes the feeling of values: the lover is more valuable, is stronger. In animals this condition produces new weapons, pigments, colors, and forms; above all, new movements, new rhythms, new love calls and seductions. It is no different with man. His whole economy is richer than before, more powerful, more complete than in those who do not love. The lover becomes a squanderer: he is rich enough for it. Now he dares, becomes an adventurer, becomes an ass in magnanimity and innocence; he believes in God again, he believes in virtue, because he believes in love; and on the other hand, this happy idiot grows wings and new capabilities, and even the door of art is opened to him. If we subtracted all traces of this intestinal fever from lyricism in sound and word, what would be left of lyrical poetry and music?— L’art pour l’art perhaps: the virtuoso croaking of shivering frogs, despairing in their swamp— All the rest Was created by love—

809 (March-June 1888)

All art exercises the power of suggestion over the muscles and senses, which in the artistic temperament are originally active: it always speaks only to artists—it speaks to this kind of a subtle flexibility of the body. The concept “layman” is an error. The deaf man is not a species of the man with good hearing. All art works tonically, increases strength, inflames desire (i.e., the feeling of strength), excites all the more subtle recollections of intoxication—there is a special memory that penetrates such states: a distant and transitory world of sensations here comes back. The ugly, i.e., the contradiction to art, that which is excluded from art, its No—every time decline, impoverishment of life, impotence, disintegration, degeneration are suggested even faintly, the aesthetic man reacts with his No. The effect of the ugly is depressing: it is the expression of a depression. It takes away strength, it impoverishes, it weighs down—The ugly suggests ugly things; one can use one’s states of health to test how variously an indisposition increases the capacity for imagining ugly things. The selection of things, interests, and questions changes. A state closely related to the ugly is encountered in logic, too: heaviness, dimness. Mechanically speaking, equilibrium is lacking: the ugly limps, the ugly stumbles: antithesis to the divine frivolity of the dancer. The aesthetic state possesses a superabundance of means of communication, together with an extreme receptivity for stimuli and signs. It constitutes the high point of communication and transmission between living creatures—it is the source of languages. This is where languages originate: the languages of tone as well as the languages of gestures and glances. The more complete phenomenon is always the beginning: our faculties are subtilized out of more complete faculties. But even today one still hears with one’s muscles, one even reads with one’s muscles. Every mature art has a host of conventions as its basis—in so far as it is a language. Convention is the condition of great art, not an obstacle—Every enhancement of life enhances man’s power of communication, as well as his power of understanding. Empathy with the souls of others is originally nothing moral, but a physiological susceptibility to suggestion: “sympathy,” or what is called “altruism,” is merely a product of that psychomotor rapport which is reckoned a part of spirituality (induction psycho-motrice, Charles Féré thinks). One never communicates thoughts: one communicates movements, mimic signs, which we then trace back to thoughts.

810 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Compared with music all communication by words is shameless; words dilute and brutalize; words depersonalize; words make the uncommon common.

811 (March-June 1888)

It is exceptional states that condition the artist—all of them profoundly related to and interlaced with morbid phenomena— so it seems impossible to be an artist and not to be sick. Physiological states that are in the artist as it were molded into a “personality” and that characterize men in general to some degree: intoxication, the feeling of enhanced power; the inner need to make of things a reflex of one’s own fullness and perfection; the extreme sharpness of certain senses, so they understand a quite different sign language—and create one—the condition that seems to be a part of many nervous disorders—; extreme mobility that turns into an extreme urge to communicate; the desire to speak on the part of everything that knows how to make signs—; a need to get rid of oneself, as it were, through signs and gestures; ability to speak of oneself through a hundred speech media—an explosive condition. One must first think of this condition as a compulsion and urge to get rid of the exuberance of inner tension through muscular activity and movements of all kinds; then as an involuntary co-ordination between this movement and the processes within (images, thoughts, desires)—as a kind of automatism of the whole muscular system impelled by strong stimuli from within —; inability to prevent reaction; the system of inhibitions suspended, as it were. Every inner movement (feeling, thought, affect) is accompanied by vascular changes and consequently by changes in color, temperature, and secretion. The suggestive power of music, its “suggestion mentale”;— the compulsion to imitate: an extreme irritability through which a given example becomes contagious—a state is divined on the basis of signs and immediately enacted— An image, rising up within, immediately turns into a movement of the limbs—a certain suspension of the will—(Schopenhauer!!!) A kind of deafness and blindness towards the external world—the realm of admitted stimuli is sharply defined. This is what distinguishes the artist from laymen (those susceptible to art): the latter reach the high point of their susceptibility when they receive; the former as they give—so that an antagonism between these two gifts is not only natural but desirable. The perspectives of these two states are opposite: to demand of the artist that he should practice the perspective of the audience (of the critic—) means to demand that he should impoverish himself and his creative power— It is the same here as with the difference between the sexes: one ought not to demand of the artist, who gives, that he should become a woman—that he should receive. Our aesthetics hitherto has been a woman’s aesthetics to the extent that only the receivers of art have formulated their experience of “what is beautiful?” In all philosophy hitherto the artist is lacking— This, as the foregoing indicates, is a necessary mistake; for the artist who began to understand himself would misunderstand himself: he ought not to look back, he ought not to look at all, he ought to give.— It is to the honor of an artist if he is unable to be a critic — otherwise he is half and half, he is “modern.”

812 (March-June 1888)

I set down here a list of psychological states as signs of a full and flourishing life that one is accustomed today to condemn as morbid. For by now we have learned better than to speak of healthy and sick as of an antithesis: it is a question of degrees. My claim in this matter is that what is today called “healthy” represents a lower level than that which under favorable circumstances would be healthy—that we are relatively sick—The artist belongs to a still stronger race. What would be harmful and morbid in us, in him is nature——But one objects to us that it is precisely the impoverishment of the machine that makes possible extravagant powers of understanding of every kind of suggestion: witness our hysterical females. An excess of sap and force can bring with it symptoms of partial constraint, of sense hallucinations, susceptibility to suggestion, just as well as can impoverishment of life: the stimulus is differently conditioned, the effect remains the same— But the aftereffect is not the same; the extreme exhaustion of all morbid natures after their nervous eccentricities has nothing in common with the states of the artist, who does not have to atone for his good periods— He is rich enough for them: he is able to squander without becoming poor. As one may today consider “genius” as a form of neurosis, so perhaps also the artistic power of suggestion—and indeed our artists are painfully like hysterical females!!! But that is an objection to “today,” not to “artists.” Inartistic states: those of objectivity, mirroring, suspended will—(Schopenhauer’s scandalous misunderstanding when he took art for a bridge to the denial of life) — Inartistic states: among those who become impoverished, withdraw, grow pale, under whose eyes life suffers:—the Christian. 813 (1888) The modern artist, in his physiology next-of-kin to the hysteric, is also distinguished by this morbidity as a character. The hysteric is false—he lies from love of lying, he is admirable in every art of dissimulation—unless his morbid vanity plays a trick on him. This vanity is like a continual fever that requires narcotics and does not shrink from any self-deception, any farce, that promises momentary relief. (Incapacity for pride and the continual need for revenge for a deeply ingrained self-contempt—this is almost the definition of this kind of vanity.) The absurd irritability of his system, which turns all experiences into crises and introduces the “dramatic” into the smallest accidents of life, robs him of all calculability: he is no longer a person, at most a rendezvous of persons and now this one, now that one shoots forward with shameless assurance. Precisely for this reason, he is great as an actor: all these poor will-less people whom doctors study so closely astonish one with their virtuosity in mimicry, transfiguration, assumption of almost any desired character.

814 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Artists are not men of great passion, whatever they may like to tell us and themselves. And this for two reasons: they lack any sense of shame before themselves (they observe themselves while they live; they spy on themselves, they are too inquisitive) and they also lack any sense of shame before great passion (they exploit it as artists). Secondly, however, their vampire, their talent, grudges them as a rule that squandering of force which one calls passion.— If one has a talent, one is also its victim: one lives under the vampirism of one's talent. One does not get over a passion by representing it: rather, it is over when one is able to represent it. (Goethe teaches otherwise; but here it seems that he wanted to misunderstand himself—from delicatezza.130)

815 (Summer-Fall 1888)

The rationale of life.— A relative chastity, a prudent caution on principle regarding erotic matters, even in thought, can belong to the grand rationale of life even in richly endowed and complete natures. This principle applies especially to artists, it is part of their best wisdom of life. Completely non-suspect voices have lent support to this opinion: I name Stendhal and Th. Gautier, also Flaubert. The artist is perhaps necessarily a sensual man, generally excitable, susceptible in every sense to stimuli, meeting the very suggestion of a stimulus halfway even from afar. This notwithstanding, he is on the average, under the pressure of his task, of his will to mastery, actually moderate, often even chaste. His dominant instinct demands this of him: it does not permit him to expend himself in any casual way. The force that one expends in artistic conception is the same as that expended in the sexual act: there is only one kind of force. An artist betrays himself if he succumbs here, if he squanders himself here: it betrays a lack of instinct, of will in general; it can be a sign of decadence—in any case, it devalues his art to an incalculable degree.¹³¹

816 (March-June 1888)

Compared with the artist, the appearance of the scientific man is actually a sign of a certain damming-up and lowering of the level of life (—but also of strengthening, severity, hardness, will power). To what extent falsity, indifference to truth and utility may be signs of youth, of “childishness,” in an artist— Their habitual manner, their unreasonableness, their ignorance about themselves, their indifference to “eternal values,” their seriousness in “play”— their lack of dignity; buffoon and god side by side; saint and canaille— Imitation as an instinct, commanding.— Artists of ascending life—artists of declining life: do they not belong to all phases?— Yes!¹³²

817 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Would any link at all be missing in the chain of art and science if woman, if the works of women were missing? Admitting exceptions—they prove the rule—woman attains perfection in everything that is not a work: in letters, in memoirs, even in the most delicate handiwork, in short in everything that is not a métier—precisely because in these things she perfects herself, because she here obeys the only artistic impulse she has—she wants to please— But what has woman to do with the passionate indifference of the true artist, who assigns more importance to a sound, a breath, a heyday!¹³³ than to himself? who strains with every finger to reach his innermost secrets? who accords no value to anything that cannot become form (—that cannot surrender itself, make itself public—). Art as it is practiced by the artist—do you not grasp what it is: an attempt to assassinate all pudeurs?¹³⁴ Only in this century has woman ventured to turn to literature (—vers la canaille plumière écrivassière in the words of old Mirabeau): she dabbles in writing, she dabbles in art, she is losing her instincts. But why? if one may ask.

818 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

One is an artist at the cost of regarding that which all non-artists call “form” as content, as “the matter itself.” To be sure, then one belongs in a topsy-turvy world: for henceforth content becomes something merely formal—our life included. 819 (1883-1888) A sense for and a delight in nuances (—the real mark of modernity), in that which is not general, runs counter to the drive that delights and excels in grasping the typical: like the Greek taste of the best period. There is an overpowering of the fullness of life in it; measure becomes master; at bottom there is that calm of the strong soul that moves slowly and feels repugnance toward what is too lively. The general rule, the law, is honored and emphasized: the exception, conversely, is set aside, the nuance obliterated. The firm, powerful, solid, the life that reposes broad and majestic and conceals its strength—that is what “pleases”; i.e., that corresponds to what one thinks of oneself. 820 (1885) In the main, I agree more with the artists than with any philosopher hitherto: they have not lost the scent of life, they have loved the things of “this world”—they have loved their senses. To strive for “desensualization”: that seems to me a misunderstanding or an illness or a cure, where it is not merely hypocrisy or self-deception. I desire for myself and for all who live, may live, without being tormented by a puritanical conscience, an ever-greater spiritualization and multiplication of the senses; indeed, we should be grateful to the senses for their subtlety, plenitude, and power and offer them in return the best we have in the way of spirit. What are priestly and metaphysical calumnies against the senses to us! We no longer need these calumnies: it is a sign that one has turned out well when, like Goethe, one clings with ever-greater pleasure and warmth to the “things of this world”:— for in this way he holds firmly to the great conception of man, that man becomes the transfigurer of existence when he learns to transfigure himself.136

821 (March-June 1888)

Pessimism in art?— The artist gradually comes to love for their own sake the means that reveal a condition of intoxication: extreme subtlety and splendor of color, definiteness of line, nuances of tone: the distinct where otherwise, under normal conditions, distinctness is lacking. All distinct things, all nuances, to the extent that they recall these extreme enhancements of strength that intoxication produces, awaken this feeling of intoxication by association: the effect of works of art is to excite the state that creates art— intoxication. What is essential in art remains its perfection of existence, its production of perfection and plenitude; art is essentially affirmation, blessing, deification of existence— What does a pessimistic art signify? Is it not a contradictio?— Yes.— Schopenhauer is wrong when he says that certain works of art serve pessimism. Tragedy does not teach “resignation”— To represent terrible and questionable things is in itself an instinct for power and magnificence in an artist: he does not fear them— There is no such thing as pessimistic art— Art affirms. Job affirms.— But Zola? But the Goncourts?— The things they display are ugly: but that they display them comes from their pleasure in the ugly— It’s no good! If you think otherwise, you’re deceiving yourselves.— How liberating is Dostoevsky! 822 (1888) If my readers are sufficiently initiated into the idea that “the good man” represents, in the total drama of life, a form of exhaustion, they will respect the consistency of Christianity in conceiving the good man as ugly. Christianity was right in this. For a philosopher to say, “the good and the beautiful are one,” is infamy; if he goes on to add, “also the true,” one ought to thrash him. Truth is ugly. We possess art lest we perish of the truth.

823 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The moralization of the arts.— Art as freedom from moral narrowness and corner-perspectives; or as mockery of them. Flight into nature, where its beauty is coupled with frightfulness. Conception of the great human being. —Fragile, useless luxury souls, troubled even by a breath, “beautiful souls.” —To awaken deceased ideals in all their merciless severity and brutality, as the most magnificent monsters they are. —A joyful delight in the psychological insight into the sinuosity and unconscious play-acting of all moralized artists. —The falsity of art—to bring to light its immorality. —To bring to light “basic idealizing powers” (sensuality, intoxication, superabundant animality). 824 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. 1888)137 Modern counterfeiting in the arts: regarded as necessary, namely as corresponding to the most characteristic needs of the modern soul. One plugs the gaps of talent, even more the gaps in education, tradition, schooling. First: one seeks for oneself a less artistic public, which loves unconditionally (—and soon kneels down before the person). The superstition of our century, the superstitious belief in the “genius,” helps. Second: one harangues the obscure instincts of the dissatisfied, ambitious, self-disguised spirits in a democratic age: importance of poses. Third: one transfers the procedures of one art to the other arts, confounds the objectives of art with those of knowledge or the church or racial interests (nationalism) or philosophy—one pulls all the stops at once and awakens the dark suspicion that one may be a god. Fourth: one flatters women, sufferers, the indignant, one makes narcotics and opiates dominant in art, too. One tickles the cultured, readers of poets and ancient stories.

825 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The division into “public hall” and “private chamber”; in the former one has to be a charlatan today, in the latter one is determined to be a virtuoso and nothing more! The specific “genius” of our century spans this division, is great in both: the great charlatanry of Victor Hugo and Richard Wagner, but coupled with so much genuine virtuosity that they satisfied even the most refined artistic connoisseurs. Hence their lack of greatness: their perspective was continually changing, now directed to the coarsest demands, now to the most refined.

826 (Spring-Fall 1887)

False “intensification”: 1. in romanticism: this constant Espressivo is no sign of strength but of a feeling of deficiency; 2. picturesque music, so-called dramatic music, is above all easier (as is the brutal colportage and the enumeration of faits and traits in the naturalistic novel); 3. “passion” a matter of nerves and wearied souls; like the delight in high mountains, deserts, storms, orgies, and horrors— in the bulky and massive (e.g., on the part of historians); there actually exists a cult of orgies of feeling (—how does it happen that strong ages have an opposite need in art—a need for a realm beyond passion?) 4. preference for exciting material (erotica or socialistica or pathologica) : all signs that show for whom one is working today: for the overworked and absent-minded or enfeebled. One has to tyrannize in order to produce any effect at all.139

827 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Modern art as an art of tyrannizing—— A coarse and strongly defined logic of delineation; motifs simplified to the point of formulas; the formula tyrannizes. Within the delineations a wild multiplicity, an overwhelming mass, before which the senses become confused; brutality in color, material, desires. Examples: Zola, Wagner; in a more spiritual order, Taine. Thus: logic, mass and brutality. 828 (1883-1888) In regard to painters: tous ces modernes sont des poètes qui ont voulu être peintres. L'un a cherché des drames dans l'histoire, l'autre des scènes de moeurs, celui-ci traduit des religions, celui-là une philosophie.¹⁴⁰ One imitates Raphael, another the early Italian masters; landscape artists employ trees and clouds to make odes and elegies. No one is simply a painter; all are archaeologists, psychologists, theatrical producers of this or that recollection or theory. They enjoy our erudition, our philosophy. Like us, they are full and overfull of general ideas They like a form, not for the sake of what it is, but for the sake of what it expresses. They are sons of a scholarly, tormented, and reflective generation—a thousand miles removed from the old masters, who did not read and only thought of feasting their eyes. 829 (1888) Fundamentally, even Wagner's music is still literature, no less than the whole of French romanticism: the charm of exoticism (strange times, customs, passions), exercised on sentimental stay-at-homes. The delight of entering the vastly distant foreign prehistoric land, accessible only through books, and of finding the whole horizon painted with new colors and possibilities—— The intuition of yet more distant, unexplored worlds; disdain for the boulevards—— For nationalism, let us not deceive ourselves, is merely another form of exoticism—— Romantic musicians relate what exotic books have made of them: one would like to experience exotic things, passions after the Florentine and Venetian taste: in the end one contents oneself with seeking them in pictures—— The essential thing is the type of new desire, the wish to imitate and to experience the lives of others, disguise, dissimulation of the soul—— Romantic art is only a makeshift substitute for a defective "reality." The attempt to do new things: revolution, Napoleon. Napoleon, the passion of new possibilities of the soul, an expansion of the soul. Weariness of will; all the greater excesses in the desire to feel, imagine, and dream new things——consequence of the excesses one has experienced: hunger for excessive feelings—— Foreign literatures offered the strongest spices.

830 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Winckelmann's and Goethe's Greeks, Victor Hugo's orientals, Wagner's Edda characters, Walter Scott's Englishmen of the thirteenth century—some day the whole comedy will be exposed! it was all historically false beyond measure, but —modern.¹⁴¹

831 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Toward a characterization of national genius in relation to what is foreign and borrowed:— The English genius coarsens and makes natural everything it takes up; the French makes thin, simplifies, logicizes, adorns; the German confuses, compromises, confounds and moralizes; the Italian has made by far the freest and subtlest use of what it has borrowed, and introduced a hundred times more into it than it took out of it: as the richest genius which had the most to bestow.

832 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The Jews approached genius in the sphere of art with Heinrich Heine and Offenbach, this most gifted and high-spirited satyr, who as a musician clung to the great tradition and who is for those who have more than mere ears a real liberation from the sentimental and at bottom degenerate musicians of German romanticism.

833 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Offenbach: French music with the spirit of Voltaire, free, high-spirited, with a little sardonic grin, but bright, clever almost to the point of banality (—he does not use make-up—) and without the mignardise of morbid or blond-Viennese sensuality. 834 (1884) If one understands by artistic genius the greatest freedom under the law, divine frivolity, facility in the hardest things, then Offenbach has even more right to the name “genius” than Wagner. Wagner is heavy and ponderous: nothing is more foreign to him than moments of the most high-spirited perfection, such as this buffoon Offenbach achieves five or six times in almost every one of his buffooneries.¹⁴³ But perhaps one might understand something else by the word genius.¹⁴⁴— 835 (1885-1886) For the chapter “Music.”¹⁴⁵—German and French and Italian music. (Our lowest periods politically the most fruitful. The Slavs?)— The cultural-historical ballet: has overcome opera — Actors’ music and musicians’ music.— An error that what Wagner created was a form:—it was formlessness. The possibility of a dramatic construction has still to be discovered.— Rhythm. “Expression” at any cost.— In praise of Carmen.— In praise of Heinrich Schütz (and the “Liszt Society”)— Whorish instrumentation.— In praise of Mendelssohn: an element of Goethe in him and nowhere else! (just as another element of Goethe came to perfection in Rahel;¹⁴⁶ a third in Heinrich Heine.)¹⁴⁷

836 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Descriptive music; leave it to reality to be effective— All these kinds of art are easier, more imitable; the poorly gifted employ them. Appeal to the instincts; art with the power of suggestion.

837 (Spring-Fall 1887)

On our modern music — The decay of melody is the same as the decay of the “idea,” of dialectic, of freedom of the most spiritual activity—a piece of clumsiness and constipation that is developing to new heights of daring and even to principles;—finally, one has only the principles of one’s talents, one’s narrowmindedness of a talent. “Dramatic music” nonsense! It is simply bad music— “Feeling,” “passion” as surrogates when one no longer knows how to achieve an exalted spirituality and the happiness that attends it (e g, that of Voltaire). Technically, “feeling” and “passion” are easier—they presuppose much poorer artists. Recourse to drama betrays that an artist is more a master of false means than of genuine means. We have dramatic painting, dramatic lyrics, etc. 838 (1888) We lack in music an aesthetic that would impose laws on musicians and give them a conscience; we lack, as a consequence, a genuine conflict over “principles”—for as musicians we laugh at Herbart’s velleities in this realm as much as we do at Schopenhauer’s. In fact, this results in a great difficulty: we no longer know on what basis to found the concepts “model,” “mastery,” “perfection”—we grope blindly in the realm of values with the instinct of old love and admiration; we come close to believing “what is good is what pleases us”— It awakens my mistrust when Beethoven is everywhere quite innocently described as a “classicist”: I would strictly maintain that in the other arts one understands by a classicist an artist of the opposite type of Beethoven’s. But when even the complete and obvious disintegration of style in Wagner, his so-called dramatic style, is taught and honored as “exemplary,” as “mastery,” as “progress,” my impatience reaches its height. The dramatic style in music, as Wagner understands it, is the renunciation of style in general, on the presupposition that something else is a hundred times more important than music, namely the drama. Wagner can paint, he employs music for something other than music, he emphasizes poses, he is a poet; finally, he appealed to “beautiful feelings” and “heaving bosoms” like all artists of the theater—and with all this he won over the women and even those in need of culture: but what is music to women and those in need of culture! They have no conscience for art; they do not suffer when all the principal and most indispensable virtues of an art are trampled under foot and mocked for the benefit of secondary objectives (as ancilla dramaturgica) What is the point of extending the means of expression if that which expresses, art itself, has lost the law of its being! The picturesque pomp and power of tones, the symbolism of sound, rhythm, colors of harmony and disharmony, the suggestive significance of music, the whole sensuality of music which Wagner has brought into dominance—all this Wagner recognized in music, drew out of it, developed. Victor Hugo did something similar to language; but already today the French are asking themselves whether, in Hugo’s case, it was not a corruption of language— whether, with the increase of sensuality in language, reason, spirituality, the profound obedience to law in language have not been depressed? That the poets in France have become sculptors, that the musicians in Germany have become actors and culture-mongers— are these not signs of decadence?

839 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Today we have a musical pessimism, even among the non-musical. Who has not met him, who has not cursed him—the wretched youth who tortures his piano into cries of despair, who single-handed heaves forward the mud of the gloomiest gray-brown harmonies? This identifies one as a pessimist— But whether this also identifies one as a musician? I cannot be made to think so. The Wagnerian pur sang is unmusical; he succumbs to the elemental powers of music somewhat as a woman succumbs to the will of her hypnotist—and in order to be able to do this, he must not be made suspicious by a severe and subtle conscience in rebus musicis et musicantibus.¹⁵⁰ I said “somewhat as”—: but perhaps we have more than a metaphor here. Consider the means for producing effects that Wagner prefers to use (—and had for the most part to invent for himself): they are strangely similar to those with which a hypnotist achieves his effect (—his choice of tempo and tonal color for his orchestra; the repellent avoidance of logic and squareness in his rhythm; the lingering, soothing, mysterious, hysterical quality of his “endless melody”).— And is the condition to which the Lohengrin prelude, for example, reduces its hearers, especially women, essentially different from a somnambulistic trance?— I heard an Italian woman who had just listened to the prelude in question say, with those entranced eyes that Wagneriennes know how to affect: “come si dorme con questa musica!”¹⁵¹

840 (March-June 1888)

Religion in music.— How much unadmitted and even uncomprehended satisfaction of all religious needs is still to be found in Wagnerian music! How much prayer, virtue, unction, “virginity,” “redemption” speak through it!— That music may dispense with words and concepts—oh what advantage she derives from that fact, this cunning saint, who leads and seduces back to all that was formerly believed!— Our intellectual conscience has no need to feel ashamed—it remains outside—when some ancient instinct or other drinks with trembling lips from forbidden cups— This is shrewd, healthy and, in so far as it betrays shame at the satisfaction of the religious instinct, even a good sign— Underhand Christianity: type of the music of “Wagner’s final period.” 841 (March-June 1888)¹⁵² I distinguish between courage in the face of people, courage in the face of things, and courage in the face of paper. The latter was, e.g., the courage of David Strauss. I distinguish further between courage before witnesses and courage without witnesses: the courage of a Christian, of a believer in God in general, can never be courage without witnesses—this fact alone degrades it. I distinguish, finally, courage rooted in temperament and courage rooted in fear of fear: a particular instance of the latter type is moral courage. There should also be added courage from despair. Wagner possessed this kind of courage. His situation regarding music was, at bottom, desperate. He lacked the two things needed to make a good musician: nature and culture, a predisposition toward music and training and schooling in music. He possessed courage: he made a principle of what he lacked—he invented a style of music for himself. “Dramatic music,” as invented by him, is the music he was capable of making—Wagner’s limitations define this concept. And he was misunderstood!— Was he misunderstood?— Five-sixths of modern artists are in this position. Wagner is their savior; five-sixths is in any case the “lowest estimate.” In every instance in which nature has shown herself inexorable and in which on the other hand culture has remained accidental, tentative, dilettante, the artist turns instinctively—what am I saying?— enthusiastically to Wagner: “half did he drag him, half he sank,” as the poet says.¹⁵³

842 (March-June 1888)

“Music”—and the grand style.— The greatness of an artist cannot be measured by the “beautiful feelings” he arouses: leave that idea to females. But according to the degree to which he approaches the grand style, to which he is capable of the grand style. This style has this in common with great passion, that it disdains to please; that it forgets to persuade; that it commands; that it wills— To become master of the chaos one is; to compel one’s chaos to become form: to become logical, simple, unambiguous, mathematics, law—that is the grand ambition here.— It repels; such men of force are no longer loved—a desert spreads around them, a silence, a fear as in the presence of some great sacrilege— All the arts know such aspirants to the grand style: why are they lacking in music? No musician has yet built as that architect did who created the Palazzo Pitti— Here lies a problem. Does music perhaps belong to that culture in which the domain of men of force of all kinds has ceased? Does the concept grand style ultimately stand in contradiction to the soul of music—to the “woman” in our music?— I here touch upon a cardinal question: where does our entire music belong? The ages of classical taste knew nothing to compare with it: it began to blossom when the Renaissance world had attained its evening, when “freedom” had departed from morals and even from men:—is it part of its character to be counter-Renaissance? Is it the sister of the Baroque style, since it is in any case its contemporary? Is music, modern music, not already decadence?— Once before I pointed to this question: whether our music is not a piece of counter-Renaissance in art? whether it is not next-of-kin to the Baroque style? whether it has not grown up in contradiction to all classical taste, so that all ambitions to become classical are forbidden to it by its nature? The answer to this first-rank question of values would not remain in doubt if the proper inferences had been drawn from the fact that music achieved its greatest ripeness and fullness as romanticism—once again as a movement of reaction against classicism. Mozart—a delicate and amorous soul, but entirely eighteenth century, even when he is serious.— Beethoven the first great romantic, in the sense of the French conception of romanticism, as Wagner is the last great romantic—both instinctive opponents of classical taste, of severe style—to say nothing of “grand” style.

843 (March-June 1888)

Romanticism: an ambiguous question, like everything modern. The aesthetic states twofold. The full and bestowing as opposed to the seeking, desiring. 844 (1885-1886) A romantic is an artist whose great dissatisfaction with himself makes him creative—who looks away, looks back from himself and from his world. 845 (1885-1886) Is art a consequence of dissatisfaction with reality? Or an expression of gratitude for happiness enjoyed? In the former case, romanticism; in the latter, aureole and dithyramb (in short, art of apotheosis) : Raphael, too, belongs here; he merely had the falsity to deify what looked like the Christian interpretation of the world. He was grateful for existence where it was not specifically Christian. The moral interpretation makes the world unbearable. Christianity was the attempt to “overcome” the world by it; i.e., to negate it. In praxi, such a murderous attempt of insanity—an insane self-elevation of man above the world—resulted in making man gloomy, small, and impoverished: only the most mediocre and harmless type of man, the herd type, profited by it, was advanced by it, if you like. Homer as an artist of apotheosis; Rubens also. Music has not yet had one. The idealization of the man of great sacrilege (a sense of his greatness) is Greek; 154 depreciation, slandering, contempt for the sinner is Judeo-Christian. 846 (1885-1886) What is romanticism?— In regard to all aesthetic values, I now employ this fundamental distinction: I ask in each individual case “has hunger or superabundance become creative here?” At first sight, another distinction might seem more plausible—it is far more obvious—namely the distinction whether the desire for rigidity, eternity, “being” has been the cause of creation, or rather the desire for destruction, for change, for becoming. But both kinds of desire prove, when examined more closely, to be ambiguous and interpretable according to the scheme mentioned above, which, I think, is to be preferred. The desire for destruction, change, becoming can be the expression of an overfull power pregnant with the future (my term for this, as is known, is the word “Dionysian”); but it can also be the hatred of the ill-constituted, disinherited, underprivileged, which destroys, has to destroy, because what exists, indeed existence itself, all being itself, enrages and provokes it. “Eternalization,” on the other hand, can proceed from gratitude and love—an art of this origin will always be an art of apotheosis, dithyrambic perhaps with Rubens, blissful with Hafiz, bright and gracious with Goethe, and shedding a Homeric aureole over all things—but it can also be that tyrannic will of a great sufferer who would like to forge what is most personal, individual, and narrow—most idiosyncratic—in his suffering, into a binding law and compulsion, taking revenge on all things, as it were, by impressing, forcing, and branding into them his image, the image of his torture. The latter is romantic pessimism in its most expressive form, whether as Schopenhauerian philosophy of will or as Wagnerian music.¹⁵⁵

847 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Whether behind the antithesis classic and romantic there does not lie hidden the antithesis active and reactive?—

848 (Spring-Fall 1887)

To be classical, one must possess all the strong, seemingly contradictory gifts and desires—but in such a way that they go together beneath one yoke; arrive at the right time to bring to its climax and high point a genus of literature or art or politics (not after this has already happened—); reflect a total state (of a people or a culture) in one's deepest and innermost soul, at a time when it still exists and has not yet been overpainted with imitations of foreign things (or when it is still dependent—); and one must not be a reactive but a concluding and forward-leading spirit, saying Yes in all cases, even with one's hatred. "Is the highest personal value not part of it?"— To consider perhaps whether moral prejudices are not playing their game here and whether great moral loftiness is not perhaps in itself a contradiction of the classical?¹⁵⁶— Whether the moral monsters must not necessarily be romantics, in word and deed?— Precisely such a preponderance of one virtue over the others (as in the case of a moral monster) is hostile to the classical power of equilibrium: supposing one possessed this loftiness and was nonetheless classical, then we could confidently infer that one also possessed immorality of the same level: possibly the case of Shakespeare (assuming it was really Lord Bacon).¹⁵⁷

849 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Future things.— Against the romanticism of great “passion.”— To grasp that a quantum of coldness, lucidity, hardness is part of all “classical” taste: logic above all, happiness in spirituality, “three unities,” concentration, hatred for feeling, heart, esprit, hatred for the manifold, uncertain, rambling, for intimations, as well as for the brief, pointed, pretty, good-natured. One should not play with artistic formulas: one should remodel life so that afterward it has to formulate itself. It is an amusing comedy at which we have only now learned to laugh, which we only now see: that the contemporaries of Herder, Winckelmann, Goethe, and Hegel claimed to have rediscovered the classical ideal—and at the same time Shakespeare!— And the same generation had meanly repudiated the French classical school! as if the essential things could not have been learned here as well as there!— But one desired “nature,” “naturalness”: oh stupidity! One believed that classicism was a kind of naturalness! To think through, without prejudice or indulgence, in what soil a classical taste can grow. Hardening, simplification, strengthening, making man more evil: these belong together. Logical-psychological simplification. Contempt for detail, complexity, the uncertain. The romantics in Germany do not protest against classicism, but against reason, enlightenment, taste, the eighteenth century. The sensibility of romantic-Wagnerian music: antithesis of classical sensibility. The will to unity (because unity tyrannizes—namely over the listener, spectator); but inability to tyrannize over oneself concerning the main thing—namely in regard to the work itself (omitting, shortening, clarifying, simplifying). Overwhelming through masses (Wagner, Victor Hugo, Zola, Taine).

850 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The nihilism of artists.— Nature cruel in her cheerfulness; cynical in her sunrises. We are enemies of sentimental emotions. We flee to where nature moves our senses and our imagination; where we have nothing to love, where we are not reminded of the moral semblances and delicacies of this northerly nature—and the same is the case in the arts. We prefer that which no longer reminds us of “good and evil.” Our moralistic susceptibility to stimuli and pain is, as it were, redeemed by a terrible and happy nature, in the fatalism of the senses and forces. Life without goodness. The benefit consists in the contemplation of nature’s magnificent indifference to good and evil. No justice in history, no goodness in nature: that is why the pessimist, if he is an artist, goes in historicis to those places where the absence of justice itself is revealed with splendid naiveté, where perfection comes into view—and also in nature, to those places where her evil and indifferent character is not disguised, where she exhibits the character of perfection— The nihilistic artist betrays himself in willing and preferring cynical history, cynical nature.

851 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

What is tragic?— On repeated occasions I have laid my finger on Aristotle's great misunderstanding in believing the tragic affects to be two depressive affects, terror and pity. If he were right, tragedy would be an art dangerous to life: one would have to warn against it as notorious and a public danger. Art, in other cases the great stimulant of life, an intoxication with life, a will to life, would here, in the service of a declining movement and as it were the handmaid of pessimism, become harmful to health (—for that one is “purged” of these affects through their arousal, as Aristotle seems to believe, is simply not true). Something that habitually arouses terror or pity disorganizes, weakens, discourages—and supposing Schopenhauer were right that one should learn resignation from tragedy (i.e., a gentle renunciation of happiness, hope, will to life), then this would be an art in which art denies itself. Tragedy would then signify a process of disintegration: the instinct for life destroying itself through the instinct for art. Christianity, nihilism, tragic art, physiological decadence—these would go hand in hand, come into predominance at the same time, assist one another forward—downward— Tragedy would be a symptom of decline. One can refute this theory in the most cold-blooded way: namely, by measuring the effects of a tragic emotion with a dynamometer. And one would discover as a result what ultimately only the absolute mendaciousness of a systematizer could misunderstand—that tragedy is a tonic. If Schopenhauer did not want to grasp this, if he posited a general depression as the tragic condition, if he suggested to the Greeks (—who to his annoyance did not “resign themselves”—) that they had not attained the highest view of the world—that is parti pris, logic of a system, counterfeit of a systematizer: one of those dreadful counterfeits that ruined Schopenhauer's whole psychology, step by step (—arbitrarily and violently, he misunderstood genius, art itself, morality, pagan religion, beauty, knowledge, and more or less everything).

852 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

The tragic artist.¹⁵⁹— It is a question of strength (of an individual or of a people), whether and where the judgment “beautiful” is applied. The feeling of plenitude, of dammed-up strength (which permits one to meet with courage and good-humor much that makes the weakling shudder)—the feeling of power applies the judgment “beautiful” even to things and conditions that the instinct of impotence could only find hateful and “ugly.” The nose for what we could still barely deal with if it confronted us in the flesh—as danger, problem, temptation—this determines even our aesthetic Yes. (“That is beautiful” is an affirmation.) From this it appears that, broadly speaking, a preference for questionable and terrifying things is a symptom of strength; while a taste for the pretty and dainty belongs to the weak and delicate. Pleasure in tragedy characterizes strong ages and natures: their non plus ultra is perhaps the divina commedia. It is the heroic spirits who say Yes to themselves in tragic cruelty: they are hard enough to experience suffering as a pleasure. Supposing, on the other hand, that the weak desire to enjoy an art that is not meant for them; what would they do to make tragedy palatable for themselves? They would interpret their own value feelings into it; e.g., the “triumph of the moral world-order” or the doctrine of the “worthlessness of existence” or the invitation to “resignation” (—or half-medicinal, half-moral discharges of affects à la Aristotle).¹⁶⁰ Finally: the art of the terrifying, in so far as it excites the nerves, can be esteemed by the weak and exhausted as a stimulus: that, for example, is the reason Wagnerian art is esteemed today. It is a sign of one’s feeling of power and well-being how far one can acknowledge the terrifying and questionable character of things; and whether one needs some sort of “solution” at the end. This type of artists’ pessimism is precisely the opposite of that religio-moral pessimism that suffers from the “corruption” of man and the riddle of existence—and by all means craves a solution, or at least a hope for a solution. The suffering, desperate, self-mistrustful, in a word the sick, have at all times had need of entrancing visions to endure life (this is the origin of the concept “blessedness”). A related case: the artists of decadence, who fundamentally have a nihilistic attitude toward life, take refuge in the beauty of form—in those select things in which nature has become perfect, in which she is indifferently great and beautiful—(—“Love of beauty” can therefore be something other than the ability to see the beautiful, create the beautiful; it can be an expression of the very inability to do so.) Those imposing artists who let a harmony sound forth from every conflict are those who bestow upon things their own power and self-redemption: they express their innermost experience in the symbolism of every work of art they produce—their creativity is gratitude for their existence. The profundity of the tragic artist lies in this, that his aesthetic instinct surveys the more remote consequences, that he does not halt shortsightedly at what is closest at hand, that he affirms the large-scale economy which justifies the terrifying, the evil, the questionable—and more than merely justifies them. (I) The conception of the work that one encounters in the background of this book is singularly gloomy and unpleasant: no type of pessimism known hitherto seems to have attained to this degree of malevolence. The antithesis of a real and an apparent world is lacking here: there is only one world, and this is false, cruel, contradictory, seductive, without meaning—A world thus constituted is the real world. We have need of lies in order to conquer this reality, this “truth,” that is, in order to live—That lies are necessary in order to live is itself part of the terrifying and questionable character of existence. Metaphysics, morality, religion, science—in this book these things merit consideration only as various forms of lies: with their help one can have faith in life. “Life ought to inspire confidence”: the task thus imposed is tremendous. To solve it, man must be a liar by nature, he must be above all an artist. And he is one: metaphysics, religion, morality, science—all of them only products of his will to art, to lie, to flight from “truth,” to negation of “truth.” This ability itself, thanks to which he violates reality by means of lies, this artistic ability of man par excellence—he has it in common with everything that is. He himself is after all a piece of reality, truth, nature: how should he not also be a piece of genius in lying! That the character of existence is to be misunderstood—profoundest and supreme secret motive behind all that is virtue, science, piety, artistry. Never to see many things, to see many things falsely, to imagine many things: oh how shrewd one still is in circumstances in which one is furthest from thinking oneself shrewd! Love, enthusiasm, “God”—So many subtleties of ultimate self-deception, so many seductions to life, so much faith in life! In those moments in which man was deceived, in which he duped himself, in which he believes in life: oh how enraptured he feels! What delight! What a feeling of power! How much artists’ triumph in the feeling of power!—Man has once again become master of “material”—master of truth!—And whenever man rejoices, he is always the same in his rejoicing: he rejoices as an artist, he enjoys himself as power, he enjoys the lie as his form of power.—(II) Art and nothing but art! It is the great means of making life possible, the great seduction to life, the great stimulant of life. Art as the only superior counterforce to all will to denial of life, as that which is anti-Christian, anti-Buddhist, antinihilist par excellence. Art as the redemption of the man of knowledge—of those who see the terrifying and questionable character of existence, who want to see it, the men of tragic knowledge. Art as the redemption of the man of action—of those who not only see the terrifying and questionable character of existence but live it, want to live it, the tragic-warlike man, the hero. Art as the redemption of the sufferer—as the way to states in which suffering is willed, transfigured, deified, where suffering is a form of great delight. (III) One will see that in this book pessimism, or to speak more clearly, nihilism, counts as “truth.” But truth does not count as the supreme value, even less as the supreme power. The will to appearance, to illusion, to deception, to becoming and change (to objectified deception) here counts as more profound, primeval, “metaphysical” than the will to truth, to reality, to mere appearance:—the last is itself merely a form of the will to illusion. In the same way, pleasure counts as being more primeval than pain: pain only as conditioned, as a consequence of the will to pleasure (of the will to become, grow, shape, i.e., to create: in creation, however, destruction is included). A highest state of affirmation of existence is conceived from which the highest degree of pain cannot be excluded: the tragic-Dionysian state. (IV) In this way, this book is even anti-pessimistic: that is, in the sense that it teaches something that is stronger than pessimism, “more divine” than truth: art. Nobody, it seems, would more seriously propose a radical negation of life, a really active negation even more than merely saying No to life, than the author of this book. Except that he knows—he has experience of it, perhaps he has experience of nothing else!—that art is worth more than truth. Already in the preface, in which Richard Wagner is invited as to a dialogue, this confession of faith, this artists’ gospel, appears: “art as the real task of life, art as life’s metaphysical activity —”¹⁶² 124 1911, p. 511: “Contemporaneous with the beginning of work on Beyond Good and Evil, and initially planned as the continuation of the preface. “Line 1: After The artist-philosopher’ the MS goes on: ‘(hitherto mentioned scientific procedure, attitude to religion and politics).’ “In the margin, this comment on the whole aphorism: ‘here belongs the sequence of rank of the higher men, which must be described.’ ” 125 A child playing. 128a Nietzsche uses the English term, as in Genealogy III, section 4. 131 1911, p. 512: “A second part of this aphorism, dealing with Richard Wagner, has been omitted.” This part will be found, in the facsimile pages, and in translation in the Appendix. 136 MS not in Nietzsche’s handwriting—evidently dictated by him—but then revised by his hand. 141 1911, p. 512: “Last line, another reading: ‘modern, true.’ ” 144 1911, p. 512: These lines were “taken from a note about Richard Wagner.” This note is included in the facsimile pages and in translation in the Appendix. “Squareness” in the preceding paragraph: Quadratur. All of these notes on Wagner should be compared with The Case of Wagner. 152 1911, p. 512: “From a larger draft used in The Case of Wagner.” Nietzsche’s repeated emphasis on the magnificent indifference of nature invites comparison with the conclusion of Camus’ The Stranger; indeed this whole section—and not only this section—may have left its mark on Camus. Note also Nietzsche’s frequent use of the word “absurd.” I. ORDER OF RANK 854 (1884) In the age of suffrage universel, i.e., when everyone may sit in judgment on everyone and everything, I feel impelled to re-establish order of rank.

855 (Spring-Fall 1887)

What determines rank, sets off rank, is only quanta of power, and nothing else.
856 (1885-1886) The will to power.— How those men would have to be constituted who took upon themselves this revaluation. Order of rank as order of power: war and danger the presupposition for a rank to retain the conditions of its existence. The grandiose prototype: man in nature—the weakest, shrewdest creature making himself master, subjugating the stupider forces.

857 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

I distinguish between a type of ascending life and another type of decay, disintegration, weakness. Is it credible that the question of the relative rank of these two types still needs to be posed?

858 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

What determines your rank is the quantum of power you are: the rest is cowardice. 859 (1883-1888) Advantage of detachment from one's age.— In a state of detachment from both movements, individualistic and collectivistic morality—for even the former does not recognize order of rank and would grant one the same freedom as all. My ideas do not revolve around the degree of freedom that is granted to the one or to the other or to all, but around the degree of power that the one or the other should exercise over others or over all, and to what extent a sacrifice of freedom, even enslavement, provides the basis for the emergence of a higher type. Put in the crudest form: how could one sacrifice the development of mankind to help a higher species than man to come into existence?— 860 (1884) Of rank. The terrible consequence of “equality”— finally, everyone believes he has a right to every problem. All order of rank has vanished. 861 (1884) A declaration of war on the masses by higher men is needed! Everywhere the mediocre are combining in order to make themselves master! Everything that makes soft and effeminate, that serves the ends of the “people” or the “feminine,” works in favor of suffrage universal, i.e., the dominion of inferior men. But we should take reprisal and bring this whole affair (which in Europe commenced with Christianity) to light and to the bar of judgment. 862 (1884) A doctrine is needed powerful enough to work as a breeding agent: strengthening the strong, paralyzing and destructive for the world-weary.¹ The annihilation of the decaying races. Decay of Europe.— The annihilation of slavish evaluations.— Dominion over the earth as a means of producing a higher type.— The annihilation of the tartuffery called “morality” (Christianity as a hysterical kind of honesty in this: Augustine, Bunyan).— The annihilation of suffrage universal; i.e., the system through which the lowest natures prescribe themselves as laws for the higher.— The annihilation of mediocrity and its acceptance. (The onesided, individuals— peoples; to strive for fullness of nature through the pairing of opposites: race mixture to this end).— The new courage—no a priori truths (such truths were sought by those accustomed to faith!), but a free subordination to a ruling idea that has its time: e.g., time as a property of space, etc.

863 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The concept “stronger and weaker man” reduces itself to the idea that in the first case a great deal of force is inherited—he is a summation—in the second, as yet little—(—inadequate inheritance, splintering of that which is inherited).

Weakness can be an inaugural phenomenon: “as yet little”; or a terminal phenomenon: “no more.” The starting point is where great force is, where force is to be discharged. The mass, as the sum of the weak, reacts slowly; defends itself against much for which it is too weak—of which it can make no use; does not create, does not advance. This in opposition to the theory that denies the strong individual and believes “the mass does it.” It is the same difference as between two separated generations: four or five generations may lie between the active agent and the mass—a chronological difference. The values of the weak prevail because the strong have taken them over as devices of leadership.

864 (March-June 1888)

Why the weak conquer. In summa: the sick and weak have more sympathy, are “more humane”—the sick and weak have more spirit, are more changeable, various, entertaining—more malicious: it was the sick who invented malice. (A morbid precociousness is often found in the rickety, scrofulous and tubercular —.) Esprit: quality of late races: Jews, Frenchmen, Chinese. (The anti-Semites do not forgive the Jews for possessing “spirit”—and money. Anti-Semites—another name for the “underprivileged.”) The sick and weak have had fascination on their side: they are more interesting than the healthy: the fool and the saint—the two most interesting kinds of man—closely related to them, the “genius.” The great “adventurers and criminals” and all men, especially the most healthy, are sick at certain periods in their lives:—the great emotions, the passions of power, love, revenge, are accompanied by profound disturbances. And as for decadence, it is represented in almost every sense by every man who does not die too soon:—thus he also knows from experience the instincts that belong to it:—almost every man is decadent for half his life. Finally: woman! One-half of mankind is weak, typically sick, changeable, inconstant—woman needs strength in order to cleave to it; she needs a religion of weakness that glorifies being weak, loving, and being humble as divine: or better, she makes the strong weak—she rules when she succeeds in overcoming the strong. Woman has always conspired with the types of decadence, the priests, against the “powerful,” the “strong,” the men—. Woman brings the children to the cult of piety, pity, love:—the mother represents altruism convincingly. Finally: increasing civilization, which necessarily brings with it an increase in the morbid elements, in the neurotic-psychiatric and criminal. An intermediary species arises: the artist, restrained from crime by weakness of will and social timidity, and not yet ripe for the madhouse, but reaching out inquisitively toward both spheres with his antennae: this specific culture plant, the modern artist, painter, musician, above all novelist, who describes his mode of life with the very inappropriate word “naturalism”—Lunatics, criminals, and “naturalists” are increasing: sign of a growing culture rushing on precipitately—i.e., the refuse, the waste, gain importance—the decline keeps pace. Finally: the social hodgepodge, consequence of the Revolution, the establishment of equal rights, of the superstition of “equal men.” The bearers of the instincts of decline (of resentment, discontent, the drive to destroy, anarchism, and nihilism), including the slave instincts, the instincts of cowardice, cunning, and canaille in those orders that have long been kept down, mingle with the blood of all classes: two, three generations later the race is no longer recognizable—everything has become mob. From this there results a collective instinct against selection, against privilege of all kinds, that is so powerful and self-assured, hard, and cruel in its operation, that the privileged themselves actually soon succumb to it: whoever still wants to retain power flatters the mob, works with the mob, must have the mob on its side—the “geniuses” above all: they become heralds of those feelings with which one moves the masses—the note of sympathy, even reverence, for all that has lived a life of suffering, lowliness, contempt, persecution, sounds above all other notes (types: Victor Hugo and Richard Wagner) .— The rise of the mob signifies once again the ascendancy of the old values. Such an extreme movement in respect of tempo and means as our civilization represents, shifts men’s center of gravity: those men who matter most, who have, as it were, the task of compensating for the vast danger of such a morbid movement;—they will become procrastinators par excellence, slow to adopt, reluctant to let go, and relatively enduring in the midst of this tremendous change and mixture of elements. In such circumstances, the center of gravity necessarily shifts to the mediocre: against the dominion of the mob and of the eccentric (both are usually united), mediocrity consolidates itself as the guarantee and bearer of the future. Thus emerges a new opponent for exceptional men—or a new seduction. Provided they do not accommodate themselves to the mob and try to flatter the instincts of the “disinherited,” they will have to be “mediocre” and “solid.” They know: mediocritas is also aurea—indeed, it alone disposes of money and gold (—of all that glitters—)—And once more the old virtue, and the entire dated world of the ideal in general, gains a body of gifted advocates.— Result: mediocrity acquires spirit, wit, genius—it becomes entertaining, it seduces.³ * Result.— A high culture can stand only upon a broad base, upon a strong and healthy consolidated mediocrity. Science—and even art—work in its service and are served by it. Science could not wish for a better situation: it belongs as such to a mediocre kind of man—it is out of place among the exceptional—it has nothing aristocratic, and even less anything anarchistic, in its instinct. The power of the middle is, further, upheld by trade, above all trade in money: the instinct of great financiers goes against everything extreme—that is why the Jews are at present the most conserving power in our intensely threatened and insecure Europe. They can have no use for revolution, socialism, or militarism: if they desire and employ power, even over the revolutionary party, this is only a consequence of the aforesaid and not a contradiction. They need occasionally to arouse fear of other extreme tendencies— by demonstrating how much power they have in their hands. But their instinct itself is unswervingly conservative—and “mediocre”— Wherever there is power, they know how to be powerful; but the employment of their power is always in one direction. The honorable term for mediocre is, of course, the word “liberal.” * Reflection.— It is absurd to assume that this whole victory of values is antibiological: one must try to explain it in terms of an interest life has in preserving the type “man” even through this method of the dominance of the weak and underprivileged—:

otherwise, man would cease to exist?—Problem—— The enhancement of the type fatal for the preservation of the species? Why? History shows: the strong races decimate one another: through war, thirst for power, adventurousness; the strong affects: wastefulness—(strength is no longer hoarded, spiritual disturbance arises through excessive tension); their existence is costly; in brief—they ruin one another; periods of profound exhaustion and torpor supervene: all great ages are paid for— The strong are subsequently weaker, more devoid of will, more absurd than the weak average. They are races that squander. “Duration” as such has no value: one might well prefer a shorter but more valuable existence for the species.— It would remain to be proved that, even so, a richer yield of value would be gained than in the case of the shorter existence; i.e., that man as summation of strength acquires a much greater quantum of mastery over things if life is as it is— We stand before a problem of economics

865 (Spring-Fall 1887)

An attitude that calls itself “idealism” and that will not allow mediocrity to be mediocre, or woman to be woman!— No uniformity! Let us be clear how dearly a virtue is bought; and that virtue is not something of average desirability, but a noble madness, a beautiful exception, with the privilege of strong feelings—

866 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

The need to show that as the consumption of man and mankind becomes more and more economical and the “machinery” of interests and services is integrated ever more intricately, a countermovement is inevitable. I designate this as the secretion of a luxury surplus of mankind: it aims to bring to light a stronger species, a higher type that arises and preserves itself under different conditions from those of the average man. My concept, my metaphor for this type is, as one knows, the word “overman.” On that first road which can now be completely surveyed, arise adaptation, leveling, higher Chinadom, modesty in the instincts, satisfaction in the dwarfing of mankind—a kind of stationary level of mankind. Once we possess that common economic management of the earth that will soon be inevitable, mankind will be able to find its best meaning as a machine in the service of this economy—as a tremendous clockwork, composed of ever smaller, ever more subtly “adapted” gears; as an ever-growing superfluity of all dominating and commanding elements; as a whole of tremendous force, whose individual factors represent minimal forces, minimal values. In opposition to this dwarfing and adaptation of man to a specialized utility, a reverse movement is needed—the production of a synthetic, summarizing, justifying man for whose existence this transformation of mankind into a machine is a precondition, as a base on which he can invent his higher form of being. He needs the opposition of the masses, of the “leveled,” a feeling of distance from them! he stands on them, he lives off them. This higher form of aristocracy is that of the future.—Morally speaking, this overall machinery, this solidarity of all gears, represents a maximum in the exploitation of man; but it presupposes those on whose account this exploitation has meaning. Otherwise it would really be nothing but an overall diminution, a value diminution of the type man—a regressive phenomenon in the grand style. It is clear, what I combat is economic optimism: as if increasing expenditure of everybody must necessarily involve the increasing welfare of everybody. The opposite seems to me to be the case: expenditure of everybody amounts to a collective loss: man is diminished—so one no longer knows what aim this tremendous process has served. An aim? a new aim?—that is what humanity needs.

867 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Insight into the increase of overall power: to calculate to what extent even the decline of individuals, of classes, of ages, of peoples is included in this growth. Shifting of the center of gravity of a culture. The cost of every great growth: who bears it! Why it must now be tremendous.

868 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Overall view of the future European: the most intelligent slave animals, very indutrsious, fundamentally very modest, inquisitive to excess, multifarious, pampered, weak of will—a cosmopolitan chaos of affects and intelligence. How could a stronger species raise itself out of him? A species with classical taste? Classical taste: this means will to simplification, strengthening, to visible happiness, to the terrible, the courage of psychological nakedness (—simplification is a consequence of the will to strengthening; allowing happiness to become visible, also nakedness, a consequence of the will to be terrible—). To fight upward out of that chaos to this form—requires a compulsion: one must be faced with the choice of perishing or prevailing. A dominating race can grow up only out of terrible and violent beginnings. Problem: where are the barbarians of the twentieth century? Obviously, they will come into view and consolidate themselves only after tremendous socialist crises—they will be the elements capable of the greatest severity toward themselves and able to guarantee the most enduring will. 869 (1885-1886) The most powerful and most dangerous passions of man, of which he can most easily perish, have been outlawed so completely that the most powerful men themselves have become impossible or have had to feel evil—“harmful and forbidden.” This loss is considerable, but hitherto it has been unavoidable: now that a host of counterforces has been reared by the temporary suppression of those passions (of lust for power, pleasure in change and deception), it is again possible to unloose them: they will no longer possess their old savagery. We permit ourselves a tame barbarism: just look at our artists and statesmen. 870 (1884) The root of all evil: that the slavish morality of meekness, chastity, selflessness, absolute obedience, has triumphed—ruling natures were thus condemned (1) to hypocrisy, (1) to torments of conscience—creative natures felt like rebels against God, uncertain and inhibited by eternal values. The barbarians showed that the ability for restraint was not at home among them: they feared and slandered the passions and drives of nature—also the view of the ruling Caesars and classes. On the other hand, the suspicion arose that all moderation was weakness, or a sign of growing old and weary (—thus La Rochefoucauld suspected that “virtue” was a pretty word among those who could no longer take any pleasure in vice). Moderation itself was represented as a matter of severity, self-conquest, asceticism, as a fight with the devil, etc. The natural delight of aesthetic natures in measure, the enjoyment of the beauty of measure, was overlooked or denied, because one desired an anti-eudaemonistic morality. The faith in the pleasure of moderation—that pleasure of the rider on a fiery steed!—has been lacking hitherto.—The mediocrity of weaker natures has been confused with the moderation of the strong! In summa: the best things have been slandered because the weak or the immoderate swine have cast a bad light on them— and the best men have remained hidden—and have often misunderstood themselves.

871 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The vicious and unbridled: their depressive influence on the value of the desires. It was the dreadful barbarism of custom that, especially in the Middle Ages, compelled the creation of a veritable “league of virtue”—together with an equally dreadful exaggeration of that which constitutes the value of man. Struggling “civilization” (taming) needs every kind of irons and torture to maintain itself against terribleness and beast-of-prey natures. Here a confusion is quite natural, although its influence has been fatal: that which men of power and will are able to demand of themselves also provides a measure of that which they may permit themselves. Such natures are the antithesis of the vicious and unbridled: although they may on occasion do things that would convict a lesser man of vice and immoderation. Here the concept of the “equal value of men before God” is extraordinarily harmful; one forbade actions and attitudes that were in themselves among the prerogatives of the strongly constituted—as if they were in themselves unworthy of men. One brought the entire tendency of the strong into disrepute when one erected the protective measures of the weakest (those who were weakest also when confronting themselves) as a norm of value. Confusion went so far that one branded the very virtuosi of life (whose autonomy offered the sharpest antithesis to the vicious and unbridled) with the most opprobrious names. Even now one believes one must disapprove of a Cesare Borgia; that is simply laughable. The church has excommunicated German emperors on account of their vices: as if a monk or priest had any right to join in a discussion about what a Frederick II may demand of himself. A Don Juan is sent to hell: that is very naive. Has it been noticed that in heaven all interesting men are missing?— Just a hint to the girls as to where they can best find their salvation.— If one reflects with some consistency, and moreover with a deepened insight into what a “great man” is, no doubt remains that the church sends all “great men” to hell—it fights against all “greatness of man.” 872 (1884)

The rights a man arrogates to himself are related to the duties he imposes upon himself, to the tasks to which he feels equal. The great majority of men have no right to existence, but are a misfortune to higher men.⁴ 873 (1884)

Misunderstanding of egoism—on the part of common natures who know nothing whatever of the pleasure of conquest and the insatiability of great love, nor of the overflowing feeling of strength that desires to overpower, to compel to itself, to lay to its heart—the drive of the artist in relation to his material. Often it is merely the penchant for activity that is looking for a field of action. In ordinary “egoism” it is precisely the “non-ego,” the profoundly average creature, the species man, who desires to preserve himself: if this is perceived by rarer, subtler, and less average men, it enrages them. For they judge: “we are nobler! Our preservation is more important than that of those cattle!” 874 (1884) The degeneration of the rulers and the ruling classes has been the cause of the greastest mischief in history! Without the Roman Caesars and Roman society, the insanity of Christianity would never have come to power. When lesser men begin to doubt whether higher men exist, then the danger is great! And one ends by discovering that there is virtue also among the lowly and subjugated, the poor in spirit, and that before God men are equal—which has so far been the non plus ultra of nonsense on earth! For ultimately, the higher men measured themselves according to the standard of virtue of slaves—found they were “proud,” etc., found all their higher qualities reprehensible. When Nero and Caracalla sat up there, the paradox arose: “the lowest man is worth more than that man up there!” And the way was prepared for an image of God that was as remote as possible from the image of the most powerful—the god on the cross! 875 (1884) The higher man and the herd man. When great men are lacking, one makes demigods or whole gods out of the great men of the past: the outbreak of religion demonstrates that man no longer delights man (—“no, nor woman neither,” with Hamlet). Or: one brings many men together into one heap as a parliament and hopes they will be equally tyrannical. “Tyrannization” is the quality of great men: they make lesser men stupid. 876 (1888) The best example of the degree to which a plebeian agitator of the mob is incapable of comprehending the concept “higher nature” is provided by Buckle. The view he combats so passionately—that “great men,” individuals, princes, statesmen, geniuses, generals are the levers and causes of all great movements—is instinctively misunderstood by him, as if it meant that what is essential and valuable in such “higher men” were their capacity for setting masses in motion: in short, their effect. But the “higher nature” of the great man lies in being different, in incommunicability, in distance of rank, not in an effect of any kind—even if he made the whole globe tremble.⁵

877 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

The Revolution made Napoleon possible: that is its justification. For the sake of a similar prize one would have to desire the anarchical collapse of our entire civilization. Napoleon made nationalism possible: that is its excuse.⁶ The value of a man (apart from his morality or immorality, naturally; for with these concepts the value of a man is not even touched) does not reside in his utility; for it would continue to exist even if there were no one to whom he could be of any use. And why could not precisely that man who produced the most disastrous effects be the pinnacle of the whole species of man: so high, so superior that everything would perish from envy of him?

878 (Spring-Fall 1887)

To appraise the value of a man according to how useful he is to men, or how much he costs, or what harm he does them—that is as much—or as little—as to appraise a work of art according to the effects it produces. But in this way, the value of a man in comparison with other men is not even touched upon. “Moral evaluation,” in so far as it is a social evaluation, measures men exclusively according to the effects they produce. A man with a taste of his own, enclosed and concealed by his solitude, incommunicable, reserved—an unfathomed man, thus a man of a higher, at any rate a different species: how should you be able to evaluate him, since you cannot know him, cannot compare him? Moral valuation has resulted in the greatest obtuseness of judgment: the value of a man in himself is underrated, almost overlooked, almost denied. Remnant of naive teleology: the value of man only in relation to men.

879 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Preoccupation with morality places a spirit in a low order of rank: he lacks the instinct for privilege, the a parte, the feeling of freedom of creative natures, of the “children of God” (or of the devil—). And it is all one whether he preaches current morality or uses his ideal for a critique of current morality: he belongs to the herd—even if it be as the herd’s supreme requirement, its “shepherd.”

880 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Replacement of morality by the will to our goal, and consequently to the means to it.

881 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

Order of rank:— What is mediocre in the typical man? That he does not understand the necessity for the reverse side of things: that he combats evils as if one could dispense with them; that he will not take the one with the other—that he wants to erase and extinguish the typical character of a thing, a condition, an age, a person, approving of only one part of their qualities and wishing to abolish the others. The “desirability” of the mediocre is what we others combat: the ideal conceived as something in which nothing harmful, evil, dangerous, questionable, destructive would remain. Our insight is the opposite of this: that with every growth of man, his other side must grow too; that the highest man, if such a concept be allowed, would be the man who represented the antithetical character of existence most strongly, as its glory and sole justification— Commonplace men can represent only a tiny nook and corner of this natural character: they perish when the multiplicity of elements and the tension of opposites, i.e., the preconditions for greatness in man, increases. That man must grow better and more evil is my formula for this inevitability— Most men represent pieces and fragments of man: one has to add them up for a complete man to appear. Whole ages, whole peoples are in this sense somewhat fragmentary; it is perhaps part of the economy of human evolution that man should evolve piece by piece. But that should not make one forget for a moment that the real issue is the production of the synthetic man; that lower men, the tremendous majority, are merely preludes and rehearsals out of whose medley the whole man appears here and there, the milestone man who indicates how far humanity has advanced so far. It does not advance in a single straight line; often a type once achieved is lost again (—with all the tensions of the past three hundred years, for example, we have not yet reattained the man of the Renaissance, and the man of the Renaissance, in turn, is inferior to the man of antiquity).⁷

882 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

One recognizes the superiority of the Greek man and the Renaissance man—but one would like to have them without the causes and conditions that made them possible.

883 (Spring-Fall 1887)

“Purification of taste” can only be the result of a strengthening of the type. Our society of today only represents culture; the cultured man is lacking. The great synthetic man is lacking, in whom the various forces are unhesitatingly harnessed for the attainment of one goal. What we possess is the multifarious man, perhaps the most interesting chaos there has ever been, but not the chaos before the creation of a world, but that after—Goethe as the most beautiful expression of the type (—absolutely not an Olympian!).^{7a}

884 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Handel, Leibniz, Goethe, Bismarck—characteristic of the strong German type. Existing blithely among antitheses, full of that supple strength that guards against convictions and doctrines by employing one against the other and reserving freedom for itself.

885 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

I have grasped this much: if one had made the rise of great and rare men dependent upon the approval of the many (assuming that the latter knew what qualities belonged to greatness and also at whose expense all greatness evolves) —well, there would never have been a single significant man!— That the course of things makes its way independently of the approval of the great majority: that is why a few astonishing things have insinuated themselves on the earth.

886 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The order of rank of human values.— a. One should not evaluate a man according to individual works. Epidermal actions. Nothing is rarer than a personal action. A class, a rank, a race, an environment, an accident—anything is more likely to be expressed in a work or act than is a “personality” [eine “Person”]. b. One should not assume in any case that many men are “personalities.” And then some are several personalities, most are none.

Wherever the average qualities preponderate, on which the preservation of a type depends, being a personality would be a waste, a luxury, it would be senseless to demand a “personality.” They are bearers, tools of transmission. c. The “personality,” a relatively isolated fact; considering the far greater importance of continuation and averageness, almost something antinatural. For the production of a personality one needs early isolation, a compulsion to an existence of defense and combat, something like an incarceration, a greater power of self-definition; and above all a much lower impressionability than that of the average man, whose humanity is contagious. First question concerning order of rank: how solitary or how gregarious one is. (In the latter case, one’s value resides in the qualities that secure the survival of one’s herd, one’s type; in the former, in that which distinguishes, isolates, defends one, and makes one’s solitariness possible.) Consequence: one should not evaluate the solitary type from the viewpoint of the gregarious, nor the gregarious from the viewpoint of the solitary. Viewed from a height, both are necessary; their antagonism is also necessary—and nothing should be banished more thoroughly than the “desirability” that some third thing might evolve out of the two (“virtue” as hermaphroditism). That is as little “desirable” as the approximation and reconciliation of the sexes. To evolve further that which is typical, to make the gulf wider and wider—— Concept of degeneration in both cases: when the herd starts to acquire the qualities of the solitary, and the latter the qualities of the herd—in short, when they approximate each other. This concept of degeneration has nothing to do with moral evaluation.

887 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Where one must seek the stronger natures.— The ruin and degeneration of the solitary species is much greater and more terrible; they have the instincts of the herd, the tradition of values, against them; their instruments of defense, their protective instincts, are from the beginning not sufficiently strong or certain—chance must be very favorable to them if they are to prosper (—they prosper most often in the lowest and socially most abandoned elements; if one looks for personality, that is where one finds it much more certainly than in the middle classes!). The strata and class struggle that aims at “equality of rights”—once it is more or less over, the war against the solitary personality will begin. (In a certain sense, the latter can maintain and develop himself most easily in a democratic society: namely, when the coarser means of defense are no longer necessary and habits of order, honesty, justice, and trust are part of the usual conditions.) The strongest must be bound most firmly, watched, laid in chains, and guarded—if the instinct of the herd has its way. For them a regime of self-control, ascetic detachment, or “duty” in exhausting work in which one completely loses oneself.

888 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

I attempt an economic justification of virtue.— The task is to make man as useful as possible and to approximate him, as far as possible, to an infallible machine: to this end he must be equipped with the virtues of the machine (—he must learn to experience the states in which he works in a mechanically useful way as the supremely valuable states; hence it is necessary to spoil the other states for him as much as possible, as highly dangerous and disreputable). The first stumbling block is the boredom, the monotony, that all mechanical activity brings with it. To learn to endure this— and not only endure it—to learn to see boredom enveloped in a higher charm: this has hitherto been the task of all higher schooling. To learn something that is of no concern to us, and to find one’s “duty” precisely in this “objective” activity; to learn to value pleasure and duty as altogether separate things—that is the invaluable task and achievement of higher schooling. This is why the philologist has hitherto been the educator as such: because his activity provides the model of sublime monotony in action; under his banner the young man learns to “grind”: first prerequisite for future efficiency in the fulfillment of mechanical duties (as civil servant, husband, office slave, newspaper reader, and soldier). Such an existence perhaps requires a philosophical justification and transfiguration more than any other: agreeable feelings in general must be relegated to a lower rank by some sort of infallible court of appeal; “duty in itself,” perhaps even the pathos of reverence in regard to everything disagreeable—and this demand speaking imperatively from beyond any question of utility, amusement, purpose— The mechanical form of existence as the highest, most venerable form of existence, worshiping itself (—type: Kant as a fanatic of the formal concept “thou shalt”).⁸

889 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

The economic valuation of ideals hitherto—i.e., selection of certain affects and states, selected and reared at the expense of others. The lawgiver (or the instinct of society) selects a number of states and affects through whose operation a regularity in performance is guaranteed (namely, a mechanical performance as a consequence of the regular requirements of those affects and states). Supposing that these states and affects contain painful ingredients, then a means must be found to overcome these painful ingredients through a value-idea designed to make displeasure seem valuable and therefore pleasurable in a higher sense. Reduced to a formula: “How can something disagreeable become agreeable?” For example, when our obedience, our submission to the law, attain honor through the strength, power, self-overcoming they entail.⁹ As do our consideration for the community, the neighbor, the fatherland, our “humanization,” our “altruism,” “heroism.” That one should like to do disagreeable things—that is the object of ideals.

890 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The dwarfing of man must for a long time count as the only goal; because a broad foundation has first to be created so that a stronger species of man can stand upon it. (To what extent every strengthened species of man hitherto has stood upon a level of the lower——)

891 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Absurd and contemptible form of idealism that would not have mediocrity mediocre and, instead of feeling a sense of triumph at a state of exceptionalness, becomes indignant over cowardice, falsity, pettiness, and wretchedness. One should not desire these things to be different! and should make the gulf wider!— One should compel the higher kind of man to sever himself from the others through the sacrifices he has to make to his state of being. Chief viewpoint: establish distances, but create no antitheses. Dissolve the intermediate forms and reduce their influence: chief means of preserving distances.

892 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

How should one wish to spoil mediocrity for the mediocre! As one will see, I do the opposite: every step away from it—so I teach—leads to immorality.¹⁰

893 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Hatred for mediocrity is unworthy of a philosopher: it is almost a question mark against his “right to philosophy.” Precisely because he is an exception he has to take the rule under his protection, he has to keep the mediocre in good heart.

894 (Spring-Fall 1887)

What I fight against: that an exceptional type should make war on the rule—instead of grasping that the continued existence of the rule is the precondition for the value of the exception. For example, the ladies who, instead of feeling their abnormal thirst for scholarship as a distinction, want to disrupt the status of woman in general.

895 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The increase of force despite the temporary decline of the individual: to establish a new level: a method of assembling forces for the preservation of small achievements, in opposition to uneconomic waste; destructive nature temporarily subdued as an instrument for this future economy; preservation of the weak, because a tremendous number of petty tasks have to be performed; preservation of an attitude of mind that makes existence still possible for the weak and suffering; to implant solidarity as an instinct against the instinct of fear and servility; struggle against accident, also against the accident of “great men.”

896 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Struggle against men justified on economic grounds. They are dangerous, accidents, exceptions, tempests, strong enough to call in question things slowly built and established. Explosives should not merely be detonated harmlessly; where possible detonation should be prevented: fundamental instinct of all civilized society.

897 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

Whoever reflects upon the way in which the type man can be raised to his greatest spendor and power will grasp first of all that he must place himself outside morality; for morality has been essentially directed to the opposite end: to obstruct or destroy that spendid evolution wherever it has been going on. For such an evolution does indeed consume so great a quantity of men in its service that a reverse movement is only too natural: the weaker, more delicate, intermediate existences need to take sides against that gloriousness of life and strength; and to that end they have to acquire a new valuation of themselves by virtue of which they can condemn life in this highest plenitude, and where possible destroy it. A tendency hostile to life is therefore characteristic of morality, in so far as it wants to overpower the types of life.

898 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The strong of the future.— That which partly necessity, partly chance has achieved here and there, the conditions for the production of a stronger type, we are now able to comprehend and consciously will: we are able to create the conditions under which such an elevation is possible. Until now, “education” has had in view the needs of society: not the possible needs of the future, but the needs of the society of the day. One desired to produce “tools” for it. Assuming the wealth of force were greater, one could imagine forces being subtracted, not to serve the needs of society but some future need. Such a task would have to be posed the more it was grasped to what extent the contemporary form of society was being so powerfully transformed that at some future time it would be unable to exist for its own sake alone, but only as a tool in the hands of a stronger race. The increasing dwarfing of man is precisely the driving force that brings to mind the breeding of a stronger race—a race that would be excessive precisely where the dwarfed species was weak and growing weaker (in will, responsibility, self-assurance, ability to posit goals for oneself). The means would be those history teaches: isolation through interests in preservation that are the reverse of those which are average today; habituation to reverse evaluations; distance as a pathos; a free conscience in those things that today are most undervalued and prohibited. The homogenizing of European man is the great process that cannot be obstructed: one should even hasten it. The necessity to create a gulf, distance, order of rank, is given eo ipso—not the necessity to retard this process. As soon as it is established, this homogenizing species requires a justification: it lies in serving a higher sovereign species that stands upon the former and can raise itself to its task only by doing this. Not merely a master race whose sole task is to rule, but a race with its own sphere of life, with an excess of strength for beauty, bravery, culture, manners to the highest peak of the spirit; an affirming race that may grant itself every great luxury— strong enough to have no need of the tyranny of the virtue-imperative, rich enough to have no need of thrift and pedantry, beyond good and evil; a hothouse for strange and choice plants. 899 (1885) Our psychologists, whose glance lingers involuntarily on symptoms of decadence alone, again and again induce us to mistrust the spirit. One always sees only those effects of the spirit that make men weak, delicate, and morbid; but now there are coming 900 (1885) I point to something new: certainly for such a democratic type there exists the danger of the barbarian, but one has looked for it only in the depths. There exists also another type of barbarian, who comes from the heights: a species of conquering and ruling natures in search of material to mold. Prometheus was this kind of barbarian. 901 (Spring-Fall 1887)¹² Main consideration: not to see the task of the higher species in leading the lower (as, e.g., Comte does), but the lower as a base upon which higher species performs its own tasks—upon which alone it can stand. The conditions under which a strong and noble species maintains itself (regarding spiritual discipline) are the reverse of those which govern the “industrial masses,” the shopkeepers à la Spencer. That which is available only to the strongest and most fruitful natures and makes their existence possible—leisure, adventure, disbelief, even dissipation—would, if it were available to mediocre natures, necessarily destroy them—and actually does. This is where industriousness, rule, moderation, firm “conviction” have their place—in short, the “herd virtues”: under them this intermediate type of man grows perfect.

902 (Manuscript source uncertain)

On the sovereign types.— The “shepherd” as opposed to the “master” (—the former a means of preserving the herd; the latter the end for which the herd exists).

903 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Temporary preponderance of the social value-feelings comprehensible and useful: it is a question of creating a foundation upon which a stronger species will ultimately be possible.— Standard of strength: to be able to live under the reverse evaluations and to will them again eternally. State and society as foundation: world-economic point of view, education as breeding.¹³

904 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Insight that “free spirits” lack: the identical discipline that makes a strong nature even stronger and capable of great undertakings, shatters and withers the mediocre:—doubt—la largeur de coeur—experiment—independence. 905 (1885-1886) The hammer. How would men have to be constituted whose evaluations would be the reverse?— Men who possess all the qualities of the modern soul, but are strong enough to transform them into pure health?— The means they employ in their task. 906 (1883-1888) The strong man, mighty in the instincts of a powerful health, digests his deeds in just the same way as he digests his meals; he can cope even with heavy food: in the main, however, he is led by a faultless and severe instinct into doing nothing that disagrees with him, just as he eats nothing he does not enjoy. 907 (1884) If only we could foresee the most favorable conditions under which creatures of the highest value arise! It is a thousand times too complicated and the probability of failure very great: so it is not inspiring to look for them!— Skepticism.— On the other hand: we can increase courage, insight, hardness, independence, and the feeling of responsibility; we can make the scales more delicate and hope for the assistance of favorable accidents. 908 (1884) Before we can think of acting, a tremendous amount of work has to be done. In the main, however, a shrewd exploitation of the given situation is, no doubt, our best, most advisable course of action. The actual creation of such conditions as are created by chance presupposes iron men who have never yet lived. The immediate task is to make the personal ideal prevail and become real! He who has grasped the nature of man, the origin of man’s highest, shudders at man and flees from all action: consequence of inherited valuations! ! That the nature of man is evil, is my consolation: it guarantees strength!

909 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The typical forms of self-formation. Or: the eight principal questions. Whether one wants to be more multifarious or simpler? Whether one wants to become happier or more indifferent to happiness and unhappiness? Whether one wants to become more contented with oneself or more exacting and inexorable? Whether one wants to become softer, more yielding, more human, or more “inhuman”? Whether one wants to become more prudent or more ruthless? Whether one wants to reach a goal or to avoid all goals (as, e.g., the philosopher does who smells a boundary, a nook, a prison, a stupidity in every goal)? Whether one wants to become more respected or more feared? Or more despised? Whether one wants to become tyrant or seducer or shepherd or herd animal?

910 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Type of my disciples.— To those human beings who are of any concern to me I wish suffering, desolation, sickness, ill-treatment, indignities—I wish that they should not remain unfamiliar with profound self-contempt, the torture of self-mistrust, the wretchedness of the vanquished: I have no pity for them, because I wish them the only thing that can prove today whether one is worth anything or not—that one endures.¹⁵ 911 (1885-1886) The happiness and self-contentment of the Lazzaroni or the “bliss” of “beautiful souls” or the consumptive love of Herrnhuteristic pietists prove nothing regarding order of rank among men. As a great educator, one would have to scourge such a race of “blessed people” mercilessly into unhappiness. The danger of dwarfing, of relaxation is present at once:—against Spinozistic or Epicurean happiness and against all relaxation in contemplative states. But if virtue is the means to such a happiness, very well, then one has to become master over virtue, too.

912 (March-June 1888)

I absolutely cannot see how one can later make up for having failed to go to a good school at the proper time. Such a man does not know himself; he walks through life without having learned to walk; his flabby muscles reveal themselves with every step. Sometimes life is so merciful as to offer this hard schooling once more later: sickness for years perhaps, that demands the most extreme strength of will and self-sufficiency; or a sudden calamity, affecting also one's wife and child, that compels one to a form of activity that restores energy to the slack fibers and toughness to the will to live. The most desirable thing is still under all circumstances a hard discipline at the proper time, ie, at that age at which it still makes one proud to see that much is demanded of one. For this is what distinguishes the hard school as a good school from all others: that much is demanded; and sternly demanded; that the good, even the exceptional, is demanded as the norm; that praise is rare, that indulgence is nonexistent; that blame is apportioned sharply, objectively, without regard for talent or antecedents. One needs such a school from every point of view: that applies to the most physical as well as to the most spiritual matters; it would be fatal to desire to draw a distinction here! The same discipline makes both the good soldier and the good scholar; and looked at more closely, there is no good scholar who does not have the instincts of a good soldier in his makeup. To be able to command and also proudly to obey; to stand in the ranks, but also capable at any time of leading; to prefer danger to comfort; not to weigh the permitted and the forbidden on a shopkeeper's scales; to be a foe more of the petty, sly, parasitic, than of the evil.— What does one learn in a hard school? Obeying and commanding. 913 (1885-1886) To disavow merit: but to do that which is above all praise, indeed above all understanding. 914 (1885-1886) New form of morality: common vows over what one intends to do and leave undone, emphatic renunciation of many things. Tests to see if one is ripe for it.¹⁸

915 (Spring-Fall 1887)

I also want to make asceticism natural again: in place of the aim of denial, the aim of strengthening; a gymnastics of the will; abstinence and periods of fasting of all kinds, in the most spiritual realm, too; a casuistry of deeds in regard to the opinions we have regarding our strengths; an experiment with adventures and arbitrary dangers. (Dîners chez Magny: nothing but spiritual gourmets with indigestion.¹⁹)— One should even devise tests for one's strength in being able to keep one's word. 916 (1884; rev. Spring-Fall 1888) What has been ruined by the church's misuse of it: asceticism: one has hardly the courage so far to display its natural utility, its indispensability in the service of the education of the will. Our absurd pedagogic world, before which the "useful civil servant" hovers as a model, thinks it can get by with "instruction," with brain drill; it has not the slightest idea that something else is needed first—education of will power; one devises tests for everything except for the main thing: whether one can will, whether one may promise; the young man finishes school without a single question, without any curiosity even, concerning this supreme value-problem of his nature; fasting: in every sense—even as a means of preserving the delicacy of one's ability to enjoy all good things (e.g., occasionally to stop reading, listening to music, being pleasant; one must have fast days for one's virtues, too); the "monastery": temporary isolation, accompanied by strict refusal, e.g., of letters; a kind of most profound self-reflection and self-recovery that desires to avoid, not "temptations," but "duties": an escape from the daily round; a detachment from the tyranny of stimuli and influences that condemns us to spend our strength in nothing but reactions and does not permit their accumulation to the point of spontaneous activity (one should observe our scholars from close up: they think only reactively; i.e., they have to read before they can think); feasts: One has to be very coarse in order not to feel the presence of Christians and Christian values as an oppression beneath which all genuine festive feelings go to the devil. Feasts include: pride, exuberance, wantonness; mockery of everything serious and Philistine; a divine affirmation of oneself out of animal plenitude and perfection—one and all states which the Christian cannot honestly welcome. The feast is paganism par excellence; courage confronted with one's own nature: dressing up in "moral" costumes.— That one has no need of moral formulas in order to welcome an affect; standard: how far we can affirm what is nature in us—how much or how little we need to have recourse to morality; death.— One must convert the stupid physiological fact into a moral necessity. So to live that one can also will at the right time to die!^{19a}

917 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

To feel stronger—or in other words, joy—always presupposes a comparison (but not necessarily with others, but with oneself in the midst of a state of growth and without one's first knowing in how far one is making comparisons—). Artificial strengthening: whether by stimulating chemicals or by stimulating errors (“delusions”): e.g., the feeling of security such as a Christian possesses; he feels strong in being able to trust, to be patient and composed: he owes this artificial strength to the illusion of being protected by a god; e.g., the feeling of superiority: as when the caliph of Morocco is allowed to see only globes upon which his three united kingdoms occupy four-fifths of the surface; e.g., the feeling of uniqueness: as when the European imagines that the march of culture takes place in Europe, and when he seems to himself to be a kind of abridged world process; or when the Christian makes all existence in general revolve around the “salvation of man.” —It is a question of where one feels the pressure, the constraint: according to where this is, a different feeling of being stronger will be produced. A philosopher, e.g., feels in the midst of the coolest, most transmontane abstraction acrobatics like a fish in water, while colors and tones oppress him; to say nothing of the dim desires—that which others call “the ideal.”

918 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

One would make a fit little boy stare if one asked him: “Would you like to become virtuous?”— but he will open his eyes wide if asked: “Would you like to become stronger than your friends?”— * How does one become stronger?— By coming to decisions slowly; and by clinging tenaciously to what one has decided. Everything else follows. The sudden and the changeable: the two species of weakness. Not to mistake oneself for one of them; to feel the distance— before it is too late! Beware of the good-natured! Association with them makes one languid. All associations are good that make one practice the weapons of defense and offense that reside in one’s instincts. All one’s inventiveness toward testing one’s strength of will— To see the distinguishing feature in this, and not in knowledge, astuteness, wit. One must learn in time to command—just as much as to obey. One must learn modesty, tact in modesty: that is, to confer distinction and to honor by being modest; the same with trust—. to confer distinction, to honor. * For what does one have to atone most? For one’s modesty; for having failed to listen to one’s most personal requirements; for having mistaken oneself; for having underestimated oneself; for having lost a good ear for one’s instincts this lack of reverence for oneself revenges itself through every kind of deprivation: health, friendship, well-being, pride, cheerfulness, freedom, firmness, courage. One never afterward forgives oneself for this lack of genuine egoism: one takes it for an objection, for a doubt about a real ego.

919 (March-June 1888)

I wish men would begin by respecting themselves: everything else follows from that. To be sure, as soon as one does this one is finished for others: for this is what they forgive last: “What? A man who respects himself?”— This is something different from the blind drive to love oneself: nothing is more common, in the love of the sexes as well as of that duality which is called “I,” than contempt for what one loves:—fatalism in love.

920 (Spring-Fall 1887)

“I want this or that”; “I wish that this or that were thus”; “I know that this or that is thus”—the degrees of strength: the man of will, the man of desire, the man of faith.

921 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The means by which a stronger species maintains itself. To grant oneself the right to exceptional actions; as an experiment in self-overcoming and freedom. To venture into states in which it is not permitted not to be a barbarian. To create control and certainty in regard to one's strength of will through asceticism of every kind. Not to communicate oneself; silence; beware of charm.²⁰ To learn obedience in such a way that it provides a test of one's self-support. Casuistry of honor taken to the greatest extreme of subtlety. Never to conclude "what is right for one is fair for another"—but conversely! To treat requital, the permission to give back, as a privilege and a rare distinction. To have no ambition to emulate the virtues of others.

922 (Spring-Fall 1887)

What means one has to employ with rude peoples, and that “barbarous” means are not arbitrary and capricious, becomes palpable in practice as soon as one is placed, with all one’s European pampering, in the necessity of keeping control over barbarians, in the Congo or elsewhere.

923 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

The warlike and the peaceful.— Are you a man with the instincts of a warrior in your system? If so, a second question arises: are you by instinct a warrior of attack or a warrior of defense? The remainder of mankind, all that is not warlike by instinct, wants peace, wants concord, wants “freedom,” wants “equal rights”: these are only different names and stages of the same thing. To go where one has no need to defend oneself—such men become dissatisfied with themselves if they are obliged to offer resistance: [they want to]²¹ create conditions in which there is no longer war of any kind. If the worst comes to the worst, to submit, obey, acquiesce: anything is better than waging war—thus, e.g., does a Christian’s instinct counsel him. In the case of the born warrior, there is something like armament in his character, in his choice of states, in the development of every quality: in the first type, it is the “weapon” that is developed best, in the latter the armor. The unarmed, the unarmored: what expedients and virtues they need in order to endure—to triumph.

924 (Spring-Fall 1887)

What will become of the man who no longer has any reasons for defending himself or for attacking? What affects does he have left if he has lost those in which lie his weapons of defense and attack?

925 (Summer-Fall 1888)

Marginal note on a niaiserie anglaise.²²— “Do not unto others what you would not have them do unto you.” That counts as wisdom; that counts as prudence; that counts as the basis of morality—as the “golden rule.” John Stuart Mill believes in it (and what Englishman does not?) But this rule does not brook the slightest attack. The calculation, “do nothing that ought not to be done to you,” prohibits actions on account of their harmful consequences: the concealed premise is that an action will always be requited. But what if someone holding the Principe in his hand were to say: “It is precisely such actions that one must perform, to prevent others from performing them first—to deprive others of the chance to perform them on us”? On the other hand: let us consider a Corsican whose honor demands a vendetta. He does not want a bullet in his body either; but this prospect, the probability of getting shot, does not deter him from vindicating his honor— And in all decent actions, are we not deliberately indifferent to the prospect of what may happen to us? To avoid an action that might have harmful consequences for us—that would mean a ban on decent actions in general. Nonetheless, the rule is valuable because it betrays a type of man: it is the instinct of the herd that finds its formula in this rule—one is equal, one takes oneself for equal: as I to you, thus you to me.— Here there is a real belief in an equivalence of actions that in all actual circumstances simply does not exist. Not every action can be returned: between actual “individuals” there are no equal actions, consequently no “requital”— When I do something, I am very far from thinking that anyone else can do much the same: it belongs to me — One cannot pay me back, it will always be “another” action that is perpetrated against me.—

926 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Against John Stuart Mill.— I abhor his vulgarity, which says: “What is right for one is fair for another”; “what you would not, etc., do not unto others”; which wants to establish all human intercourse on the basis of mutual services, so that every action appears as a kind of payment for something done to us. The presupposition here is ignoble in the lowest sense: here an equivalence of value between my actions and yours is presupposed; here the most personal value of an action is simply annulled (that which cannot be balanced or paid in any way—). “Reciprocity” is a piece of gross vulgarity; precisely that something I do may not and could not be done by another, that no balance is possible (—except in the most select sphere of “my equals,” inter pares—), that in a deeper sense one never gives back, because one is something unique and does only unique things —this fundamental conviction contains the cause of aristocratic segregation from the masses, because the masses believe in “equality” and consequently in equivalence and “reciprocity.”

927 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The parochial narrowness of moral valuation with its “useful” and “harmful” has its own good reasons; it is the necessary perspective of society, which is able to survey only the close and closest in regard to consequences. The state and the politician already have need of a more supra-moral attitude, because they have to reckon with a much greater complexity of effects. A world economy would also be possible with such distant perspectives that all its individual demands might seem unjust and arbitrary at the moment.

928 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

“Should one follow one’s feelings?”—That one should put one’s life in danger, yielding to a generous feeling and under the impulse of a moment, that is of little value and does not even characterize one. Everyone is equally capable of that—and in this resolution, a criminal, a bandit, and a Corsican certainly excel decent people. A higher stage is: to overcome even this pressure within us and to perform a heroic act not on impulse—but coldly, raisonnable, without being overwhelmed by stormy feelings of pleasure— The same applies to compassion: it must first be habitually sifted by reason; otherwise it is just as dangerous as any other affect. Blind indulgence of an affect, totally regardless of whether it be a generous and compassionate or a hostile affect, is the cause of the greatest evils. Greatness of character does not consist in not possessing these affects—on the contrary, one possesses them to the highest degree—but in having them under control. And even that without any pleasure in this restraint, but merely because

929 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

“To give one’s life for a cause”—a great effect. But there are many things for which one would give one’s life: the affects one and all desire to be gratified. Whether it be compassion or anger or revenge—that one stakes one’s life on it does not make any value difference. How many have sacrificed their lives for pretty girls—and, worse, even their health! If one has the temperament, one instinctively chooses what is dangerous; e g, adventures in speculation if one is a philosopher; or in immorality if one is virtuous. One kind of man will risk nothing, another wants risks. Are we others despisers of life? On the contrary, we seek life raised to a higher power, life lived in danger—²⁴ But that, to repeat it, does not mean we want to be more virtuous than others. Pascal, e.g., wanted to risk nothing and remained a Christian: perhaps that was virtuous.— One always makes sacrifices.

930 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

How much advantage man sacrifices, how little “self-interested” he is! All his affects and passions demand their rights— and how remote from the prudent utility of self-interest is an affect! One does not desire “happiness”; one must be English to be able to believe that man always seeks his advantage.²⁶ Our desires want to violate things with a protracted passion—their accumulated strength seeks resistance.

931 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The affects are one and all useful, some directly, others indirectly; in regard to utility it is quite impossible to fix any scale of values—even though in economic terms the forces of nature are one and all good, i.e., useful, and also the source of so much terrible and irrevocable fatality. The most one could say is that the most powerful affects are the most valuable, in as much as there are no greater sources of strength.

932 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Well-meaning, helpful, good-natured attitudes of mind have not come to be honored on account of their usefulness, but because they are states of richer souls that are capable of bestowing and have their value in the feeling of the plenitude of life. Observe the eyes of benefactors: what one sees is the antithesis of self-denial, of hatred for the moi, of “Pascalism.”

933 (Spring-Fall 1887)

In Summa: domination of the passions, not their weakening or extirpation!—The greater the dominating power of a will, the more freedom may the passions be allowed. The “great man” is great owing to the free play and scope of his desires and to the yet greater power that knows how to press these magnificent monsters into service. The “good man” is at every stage of civilization the harmless and the useful combined: a kind of mean; the expression of the general consciousness of the kind of man whom one has no reason to fear but whom one must nonetheless not despise. Education: essentially the means of ruining the exceptions for the good of the rule.²⁷ Higher education:²⁸ essentially the means of directing taste against the exceptions for the good of the mediocre. Only when a culture has an excess of powers at its disposal can it also constitute a hothouse for the luxury cultivation of the exception, the experiment, of danger, of the nuance:—this is the tendency of every aristocratic culture.

934 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Nothing but questions of strength: how far to prevail against the conditions that preserve society and against its prejudices?— how far to unchain one's terrible qualities through which most people perish?—how far to oppose truth and reflect on its most questionable sides?—how far to oppose suffering, self-contempt, pity, sickness, vice, with the query as to whether one cannot become master of them? (—what does not destroy us makes us stronger—)—finally: how far to acknowledge in one's mind the rule, the commonplace, the petty, good, upright, the average nature, without letting oneself be vulgarized by them?— Hardest test of character: not to let oneself be ruined through seduction by the good. The good as luxury, as subtlety,³⁰ as vice.

935 (Fall 1888)

Type: True graciousness, nobility, greatness of soul proceed from abundance; do not give in order to receive—do not try to exalt themselves by being gracious;—prodigality as the type of true graciousness, abundance of personality as its presupposition.

936 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Aristocracy. Herd-animal ideals—now culminating as the highest value standard of “society”: attempt to give them a cosmic, even a metaphysical value.— Against them I defend aristocracy. A society that preserves a regard and delicatessen for freedom must feel itself to be an exception and must confront a power from which it distinguishes itself, toward which it is hostile, and on which it looks down. The more I relinquish my rights and level myself down, the more I come under the dominion of the average and finally of the majority. The presupposition inherent in an aristocratic society for preserving a high degree of freedom among its members is the extreme tension that arises from the presence of an antagonistic drive in all its members: the will to dominate— If you would do away with firm opposition and differences in rank, you will also abolish all strong love, lofty attitudes, and the feeling of individuality. * Toward a true psychology of the society based on freedom and equality— What diminishes? The will to self-responsibility, sign of the decline of autonomy; efficiency in defense and attack, also in the most spiritual things: the power of commanding; the sense of reverence, subservience, ability to keep silent; great passion, the great task, tragedy, cheerfulness.

937 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Augustin Thierry read in 1814 what De Montlosier had said in his work De la monarchie française: he answered with a cry of indignation and commenced his work. That emigrant had said: Race d'affranchis, race d'esclaves arrachés de nos mains, peuple tributaire, peuple nouveau, licence vous fut octroyée d'être libres, et non pas à nous d'être nobles; pour nous tout est de droit, pour vous tout est de grâce, nous ne sommes point de votre communauté; nous sommes un tout par nous-mêmes.³² 938 (1884) How the aristocratic world increasingly bleeds itself and makes itself weaker! Because of the nobility of its instincts it throws away its privileges and because of the refinement of its hyper-culture it takes an interest in the people, the weak, the poor, the poetry of the petty, etc. 939 (1885-1886) There is a noble and dangerous carelessness that permits a profound inference and insight: the carelessness of the self-assured and overrich soul that has never troubled about friends but knows only hospitality, and practices, and knows how to practice, only hospitality—heart and home open to anyone who cares to enter, whether beggar or cripple or king. This is genuine geniality: whoever has that, has a hundred “friends” but in all probability not a single friend. 940 (1884) The teaching meden agan applies to men of overflowing strength—not to the mediocre. The enkrateia and askesis is only a stage toward the heights: the “golden nature” is higher. “Thou shalt”—unconditional obedience in Stoics, in the Christian and Arab orders, in the philosophy of Kant (it is immaterial whether to a superior or to a concept). Higher than “thou shalt” is “I will” (the heroes); higher than “I will” stands: “I am” (the gods of the Greeks). The barbarian gods express nothing of the pleasure of restraint—are neither simple nor frivolous nor moderate.

941 (Summer-Fall 1883)

The meaning of our gardens and palaces (and to this extent also the meaning of all desire for riches) is: to remove disorder and vulgarity from sight and to build a home for nobility of soul. The majority, to be sure, believe they will acquire higher natures when those beautiful, peaceful objects have operated upon them: hence the rush to go to Italy and on travels, etc.; all reading and visits to theatres. They want to have themselves formed— that is the meaning of their cultural activity! But the strong, the mighty want to form and no longer to have anything foreign about them! Thus men also plunge into wild nature, not to find themselves but to lose and forget themselves in it. “To be outside oneself” as the desire of all the weak and the self-discontented. 942 (1885) There is only nobility of birth, only nobility of blood. (I am not speaking here of the little word “von” or of the Almanach de Gotha:36 parenthesis for asses.) When one speaks of “aristocrats of the spirit,” reasons are usually not lacking for concealing something; as is well known, it is a favorite term among ambitious Jews. For spirit alone does not make noble; rather, there must be something to ennoble the spirit.— What then is required? Blood.³⁷ 943 (1885) What is noble?³⁸ —Care for the most external things, in so far as this care forms a boundary, keeps distant, guards against confusion. —Apparent frivolity in word, dress, bearing, through which a stoic severity and self-constraint protects itself against all immodest inquisitiveness. —Slowness of gesture, and of glance. There are not too many valuable things: and these come and wish to come of themselves to the valuable man. We do not easily admire. —Endurance of poverty and want, also of sickness. —Avoidance of petty honors and mistrust of all who praise readily: for whoever praises believes he understands what he praises: but to understand— Balzac, that typical man of ambition, has revealed it—comprendre c’est égal.³⁹ —Our doubt as to the communicability of the heart goes deep; solitude not as chosen but as given. —The conviction that one has duties only to one’s equals, toward the others one acts as one thinks best: that justice can be hoped for (unfortunately not counted on) only inter pares.⁴⁰ —An ironic response to the “talented,” the belief in a nobility by birth in moral matters too. —Always to experience oneself as one who bestows honors, while there are not many fit to honor one. —Always disguised: the higher the type, the more a man requires an incognito. If God existed, he would, merely on grounds of decency, be obliged to show himself to the world only as a man. —The ability for otium,⁴¹ the unconditional conviction that although a craft in any sense does not dishonor, it certainly takes away nobility. No “industriousness” in the bourgeois sense, however well we may know how to honor and reward it, or like those insatiably cackling artists who act like hens, cackle and lay eggs and cackle again. —We protect artists and poets and those who are masters in anything; but as natures that are of a higher kind than these, who have only the ability to do something, merely “productive men,” we do not confound ourselves with them. —Pleasure in forms; taking under protection everything formal, the conviction that politeness is one of the greatest virtues; mistrust for letting oneself go in any way, including all freedom of press and thought, because under them the spirit grows comfortable and doltish and relaxes its limbs. —Delight in women, as in a perhaps smaller but more delicate and ethereal kind of creature. What joy to encounter creatures who have only dancing, foolishness, and finery in their heads! They have been the delight of every very tense and profound male soul whose life was weighed down with great responsibilities. —Pleasure in princes and priests, because they preserve the belief in differences in human values even in the valuation of the past, at least symbolically and on the whole even actually. —Ability to keep silent: but not a word about that in the presence of listeners. —Endurance of protracted enmities: lack of easy reconcilability. —Disgust for the demagogic, for the “enlightenment,” for “being cozy,”⁴² for plebeian familiarity. —The collection of precious things, the needs of a high and fastidious soul; to desire to possess nothing in common. One’s own books, one’s own landscapes. —We rebel against experiences, good and bad, and are slow to generalize. The individual case: how ironic we feel toward the individual case if it has the bad taste to pose as the rule! —We love the naive and naive people, but as spectators and higher natures; we find Faust just as naive as his Gretchen. —We esteem the good very little, as herd animals: we know that in the worst, most malignant, hardest men a priceless golden drop of goodness is often concealed, that outweighs all mere benevolence of milk souls. —We consider that a man of our kind is not refuted by his vices, nor by his follies. We know that we are hard to recognize, and that we have every reason to give ourselves foregrounds.

944 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

What is noble?— That one constantly has to play a part. That one seeks situations in which one has constant need of poses. That one leaves happiness to the great majority: happiness as peace of soul, virtue, comfort, Anglo-angelic shopkeeperdom à la Spencer. That one instinctively seeks heavy responsibilities. That one knows how to make enemies everywhere, if the worst comes to the worst even of oneself. That one constantly contradicts the great majority not through words but through deeds. 945 (1886-1887) Virtue (e.g., in the form of truthfulness) as our noble and dangerous luxury; we must not refuse the disadvantages it brings with it.

946 (Spring-Fall 1887)

To desire no praise: one does what profits one, or what gives one pleasure, or what one must.

947 (Jan.-Fall 1888)

What is chastity in a man? That his sexual taste has remained noble; that in eroticis he likes neither the brutal nor the morbid nor the prudent.

948 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The “concept of honor”: resting on the faith in “good society,” in chivalrous basic traits, in the obligation continually to maintain poise. Essential: that one does not think one’s life important; that one insists unconditionally on good manners on the part of everyone with whom one comes in contact (at least, when they do not belong to “us”); that one is neither familiar, nor genial, nor merry, nor modest, except inter pares; that one always maintains poise.

949 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

That one stakes one's life, one's health, one's honor, is the consequence of high spirits and an overflowing, prodigal will: not from love of man but because every great danger challenges our curiosity about the degree of our strength and our courage. 950 (1884-1886) "Eagles dive straight to the point."— Not the least sign of nobility of soul is the magnificent and proud stupidity with which it attacks—"straight to the point."

951 (Spring-Fall 1887)

War on the effeminate conception of “nobility”!—a quantum more of brutality cannot be dispensed with, any more than closeness to crime. Even “self-satisfaction” is not part of it; one should be adventurous, experimental, destructive also toward oneself—no beautiful-soul twaddle—. I want to make room for a more robust ideal. 952 (1884-1886) “Paradise lies in the shadow of swords”—also a symbol and motto by which souls of noble and warlike origin betray themselves and divine each other. 953 (1886-1887) The two paths.— [There comes]43 a point in time when man has strength in excess at his disposal: science aims at establishing this slavery of nature. Then man acquires leisure: to cultivate himself into something new, higher. New aristocracy. Then a host of virtues are superseded that had been conditions of existence.— Qualities no longer needed are lost. We no longer need virtues: consequently we lose them (—as we do the morality of “one thing is needful,” of salvation of soul, and of immortality: they were means of making possible for man a tremendous self-constraint through the affect of a tremendous fear: : :). The various kinds of indigence through whose discipline man is formed: indigence teaches work, thought, self-constraint. * Physiological purification and strengthening. The new aristocracy has need of an opposite against which it struggles: preservation must be a dreadfully urgent matter. The two futures of mankind: (1) consistent growth of mediocrity; (2) conscious distinction, self-shaping. A doctrine that creates a gulf: it preserves the highest and the lowest kind (it destroys the mean). Aristocrats so far, spiritual and temporal, prove nothing against necessity for a new aristocracy. 954 (1885-1886) A question constantly keeps coming back to us, a seductive and wicked question perhaps: may it be whispered into the ears of those who have a right to such questionable questions, the strongest souls of today, whose best control is over themselves: is it not time, now that the type “herd animal” is being evolved more and more in Europe, to make the experiment of a fundamental, artificial and conscious breeding of the opposite type and its virtues? And would it not be a kind of goal, redemption, and justification for the democratic movement itself if someone arrived who could make use of it—by finally producing beside its new and sublime development of slavery (—that is what European democracy must become ultimately) a higher kind of dominating and Caesarian spirits who would stand upon it, maintain themselves by it, and elevate themselves through it? To new, hitherto impossible prospects, to their own prospects? To their own tasks? 955 (1885) To view the contemporary European makes me very hopeful: an audacious ruling race is developing on the basis of an extremely intelligent herd mass. It will not be long before the movement for the cultivation of the latter will no longer have the foreground all to itself. 956 (1885) The same conditions that hasten the evolution of the herd animal also hasten the evolution of the leader animal. 957 (1885)

Inexorably, hesitantly, terrible as fate, the great task and question is approaching: how shall the earth as a whole be governed? And to what end shall “man” as a whole—and no longer as a people, a race—be raised and trained? Law-giving moralities are the principal means of fashioning man according to the pleasure of a creative and profound will, provided that such an artist’s will of the first rank has the power in its hands and can make its creative will prevail through long periods of time, in the form of laws, religions, and customs. Such men of great creativity, the really great men according to my understanding, will be sought in vain today and probably for a long time to come: they are lacking; until, after much disappointment, one must begin to comprehend why they are lacking and that nothing stands more malignantly in the way of their rise and evolution, today and for a long time to come, than what in Europe today is called simply “morality”—as if there were no other morality and could be no other—the aforementioned herd-animal morality which is striving with all its power for a universal green-pasture happiness on earth, namely for security, absence of danger, comfort, the easy life, and ultimately, “if all goes well,” hopes to do away with any kind of shepherd or bellwether. The two doctrines it preaches most often are: “equal rights” and “sympathy with all that suffers”—and it takes suffering itself to be something that must absolutely be abolished. That such “ideas” as these are still modern gives one a bad opinion of modernity. Whoever has thought profoundly about where and how the plant man has hitherto grown most vigorously must conclude that this has happened under the reverse conditions: that the dangerousness of his situation must grow to tremendous proportions, that his power of invention and dissembling must struggle up beneath protracted oppression and compulsion, that his will to live must be enhanced to an unconditional will to power and to overpower, and that danger, severity, violence, danger in the street as well as in the heart, inequality of rights, concealment, stoicism, the art of experiment, devilry of all kinds, in short the opposite of all the herd thinks desirable, are necessary for the elevation of the type man. A morality with such reverse intentions, which desires to train men for the heights, not for comfort and mediocrity, a morality with the intention of training a ruling caste—the future masters of the earth—must, if it is to be taught, appear in association with the prevailing moral laws, in the guise of their terms and forms. That for this, however, many transitional means of deception must be devised, and that, because the lifetime of a single man signifies virtually nothing in relation to the accomplishment of such protracted tasks and aims, the very first thing to be done is the rearing of a new kind of man, in whom the duration of the necessary will and the necessary instinct will be guaranteed through many generations—a new master type and caste—all this is as obvious as is the protracted and not easily expressible etcetera of this idea. To prepare a reversal of values for a certain strong kind of man of the highest spirituality and strength of will and to this end slowly and cautiously to unfetter a host of instincts now kept in check and calumniated—whoever reflects on this becomes one of us, the free spirits—to be sure, a different kind of “free spirit” from those before us; for the latter wanted approximately the opposite of what we do. To us, it seems to me, belong above all the pessimists of Europe, the poets and thinkers of an enraged idealism, in so far as their discontent with all existence involved them at least by logical necessity in a discontent with present-day man; also certain insatiably ambitious artists who unhesitatingly and unconditionally fight for the special rights of higher men and against the “herd animal” and who, by means of the seductions of art, lull to sleep all herd instincts and herd cautiousness in choice spirits; thirdly and finally all those critics and historians who courageously carry forward the happily-begun discovery of the world of antiquity—it is the work of the new Columbus, the German spirit (for we still stand at the beginning of this conquest). For in the world of antiquity there reigned a different, more lordly morality than today; and the man of antiquity, raised in this morality, was a stronger and deeper man than the man of today—he alone has hitherto been “the man that has turned out well.” But the seductive power that antiquity exercises on such well-turned-out, i.e., strong and enterprising, souls is the most subtle and effective of all antidemocratic and anti-Christian influences even today, as at the time of the Renaissance. 958 (1884) I write for a species of man that does not yet exist: for the “masters of the earth.” Religions, as consolations and relaxations, dangerous: man believes he has a right to take his ease. In Plato’s Theages it is written: “Each one of us would like to be master over all men, if possible, and best of all God.” This attitude must exist again.44a Englishmen, Americans, and Russians—— 959 (1885-1886)45 The jungle-growth “man” always appears where the struggle for power has been waged the longest. Great men. The Romans—jungle animals. 960 (1885-1886) From now on there will be more favorable preconditions for more comprehensive forms of dominion, whose like has never yet existed. And even this is not the most important thing; the possibility has been established for the production of international racial unions whose task will be to rear a master race, the future “masters of the earth”;—a new, tremendous aristocracy, based on the severest self-legislation, in which the will of philosophical men of power and artist-tyrants will be made to endure for millenia—a higher kind of man who, thanks to their superiority in will, knowledge, riches, and influence, employ democratic Europe as their most pliant and supple instrument for getting hold of the destinies of the earth, so as to work as artists upon “man” himself. Enough: the time is coming when politics will have a different meaning. 961 (1885) To see at which points in history great human beings arise. The significance of protracted despotic moralities: they tense the bow, if they do not break it. 962

(1885) A great man—a man whom nature has constructed and invented in the grand style—what is he? First: there is a long logic in all of his activity, hard to survey because of its length, and consequently misleading; he has the ability to extend his will across great stretches of his life and to despise and reject everything petty about him, including even the fairest, “divinest” things in the world. Secondly: he is colder, harder, less hesitating, and without fear of “opinion”; he lacks the virtues that accompany respect and “respectability,” and altogether everything that is part of the “virtue of the herd.” If he cannot lead, he goes alone; then it can happen that he may snarl at some things he meets on his way. Third: he wants no “sympathetic” heart, but servants, tools; in his intercourse with men he is always intent on making something out of them. He knows he is incommunicable: he finds it tasteless to be familiar; and when one thinks he is, he usually is not. When not speaking to himself, he wears a mask. He rather lies than tells the truth: it requires more spirit and will.⁴⁷ There is a solitude within him that is inaccessible to praise or blame, his own justice that is beyond appeal.

963 (Spring-Fall 1887)

The great man is necessarily a skeptic (which is not to say that he has to appear to be one), provided that greatness consists in this: to will something great and the means to it. Freedom from any kind of conviction is part of the strength of his will. Thus it accords with that “enlightened despotism” exercised by every great passion. Such a passion takes the intellect into its service; it has the courage even for unholy means; it removes scruples; it permits itself convictions, it even needs them, but it does not submit to them. The need for faith, for anything unconditional in Yes and No, is a proof of weakness; all weakness is weakness of will. The man of faith, the believer, is necessarily a small type of man. Hence “freedom of spirit,” i.e., unbelief as an instinct [is a precondition of greatness.]⁴⁹

964 (1884) The great man feels his power over a people, his temporary coincidence with a people or a millenium; this enlargement in his experience of himself as causa and voluntas is misunderstood as “altruism”; it drives him to seek means of communication: all great men are inventive in such means. They want to embed themselves in great communities; they want to give a single form to the multifarious and disordered; chaos stimulates them. Misunderstanding of love. There is a slavish love that submits and gives itself; that idealizes, and deceives itself—there is a divine love that despises and loves, and reshapes and elevates the beloved. To gain that tremendous energy of greatness in order to shape the man of the future through breeding and, on the other hand, the annihilation of millions of failures, and not to perish of the suffering one creates, though nothing like it has ever existed!—

965 (1884) The revolution, confusion, and distress of peoples is, in my view, inferior to the distress of great individuals during their development. One must not let oneself be deceived: the many distresses of all the small constitute a sum only in the feelings of powerful human beings.— To think of oneself in moments of great danger, to derive advantage from the disadvantage of many: this can be, in the case of a very high degree of deviation, a sign of a great character who manages to master his compassionate and just impulses.

966 (1884) In contrast to the animals, man has cultivated an abundance of contrary drives and impulses within himself: thanks to this synthesis, he is master of the earth.— Moralities are the expression of locally limited orders of rank in his multifarious world of drives, so man should not perish through their contradictions. Thus a drive as master, its opposite weakened, refined, as the impulse that provides the stimulus for the activity of the chief drive. The highest man would have the greatest multiplicity of drives, in the relatively greatest strength that can be endured. Indeed, where the plant “man” shows himself strongest one finds instincts that conflict powerfully (e.g., in Shakespeare), but are controlled.

967 (1885) Whether one does not have the right to account all great men evil? This cannot be shown in a pure state in all individual cases. Often they have been capable of masterly dissimulation and assumed the outward forms and gestures of great virtues. Often they honored virtue seriously and with a passionate hardness against themselves, but out of cruelty: seen from a distance, this is deceptive. Many misunderstood themselves; not infrequently a great task calls forth great qualities, e.g., justice. The essential point is: the greatest perhaps also possess great virtues, but in that case also their opposites. I believe that it is precisely through the presence of opposites and the feelings they occasion that the great man, the bow with the great tension, develops. 968 (1886-1887) In great men, the specific qualities of life—injustice, falsehood, exploitation—are at their greatest. But in so far as they have had an overwhelming effect, their essence has been most misunderstood and interpreted as goodness. Type: Carlyle as interpreter.50

969 (Spring-Fall 1887)

In general, every thing is worth as much as one has paid for it. This does not hold, to be sure, if one takes the individual in isolation; the great capabilities of the individual are utterly out of proportion to what he himself has done, sacrificed, and suffered for them. But if one considers his family history, one discovers the history of a tremendous storing up and capital accumulation of strength through all kinds of renunciation, struggle, work, and prevailing. It is because the great man has cost so much, and not because he appears as a miracle and gift of heaven and “chance,” that he has become great: “heredity” a false concept. One’s forebears have paid the price for what one is. 970 (1883-1888) Danger in modesty.— To adapt ourselves too early to the tasks, societies, everyday life and everyday work, in which chance has placed us, at a time when neither our strength nor our goal has yet entered our consciousness with the force of law; the all-too-early certainty of conscience, comfortableness, sociability thus achieved, this premature resignation that insinuates itself into our feelings as a release from inner and outer unrest, pampers and holds one back in the most dangerous fashion. To learn to feel respect after the fashion of “those like us,” as if we ourselves had no measure in us and no right to determine values; the effort to evaluate as others do, against the inner voice of our taste, which is also a form of conscience, becomes a terrible, subtle constraint: if there is not finally an explosion, with a sudden bursting asunder of all the bonds of love and morality, then such a spirit becomes withered, petty, effeminate, and factual. The opposite is bad enough, but better nonetheless: to suffer from one’s environment, from its praise as well as from its blame, wounded by it and festering inwardly without betraying the fact; to defend oneself with involuntary mistrust against its love, to learn silence, perhaps concealing it behind speech,⁵¹ to create for oneself nooks and undiscoverable solitudes for moments of relief, of tears, of sublime consolation—until one is finally strong enough to say, “what do I have to do with you?” and to go one’s own way.

971 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Men who are destinies, who by bearing themselves bear destinies, the whole species of heroic bearers of burdens: oh how they would like to rest from themselves for once! how they thirst for strong hearts and necks, so as to be free from what oppresses them, at least for a few hours! And how vainly they thirst! — They wait; they look at everything that passes: no one approaches them with as much as a thousandth part of their suffering and passion,⁵³ no one divines in what way they are waiting—At length, at length they learn their first piece of worldly prudence—not to wait any more; and soon another one: to be genial, to be modest, from now on to endure everyone, to endure everything—in short, to endure even a little more than they have endured so far. 97254 (1884) Legislators of the future.— After having tried in vain for a long time to attach a definite concept to the word “philosopher”— for I found many contradictory characteristics—I recognized at last that there are two distinct kinds of philosopher: those who want to ascertain a complex fact of evaluations (logical or moral); those who are legislators of such evaluations. The former try to master the world of the present or the past by concentrating and abridging the multiplicity of events through signs: their aim is to make previous events surveyable, comprehensible, graspable, and usable—they assist the task of man to employ all past things for the benefit of his future. The latter, however, are commanders; they say: “Thus it shall be!” They alone determine the “whither” and the “wherefore,” what is useful and what constitutes utility for men; they dispose of the preparatory work of scientific men, and all knowledge is for them only a means for creation. This second kind of philosopher rarely prospers; and their situation and danger is indeed fearful. How often they have deliberately blindfolded themselves simply so as not to have to behold the narrow ledge that separates them from a plunge into the abyss; e.g. Plato, when he convinced himself that the “good” as he desired it was not the good of Plato but the “good in itself,” the eternal treasure that some man, named Plato, had chanced to discover on his way! This same will to blindness dominates the founders of religions in a much coarser form: their “thou shalt” must not by any means sound in their ears like “I will”— they dare to fulfill their task only as the command of a god; only as an “inspiration” is their value legislation a bearable burden under which their conscience is not crushed. As soon as these two means of comfort, that of Plato and that of Mohammed, have fallen away and no thinker can relieve his conscience with the hypothesis of a “god” or “eternal values,” the claim of the legislator of new values rises to a new fearfulness never yet attained. From then on, those elect on whom the suspicion of having such a duty begins to dawn, try to see if they cannot, “at the right moment,” elude it, as their greatest danger, through some kind of detour; for example, by convincing themselves that the task has already been accomplished, or cannot be accomplished, or that their shoulders are not strong enough for such burdens, or that they are already overburdened with other, more immediate tasks, or that even this new, distant duty is a seduction and temptation, drawing them away from all other duties, a sickness, a kind of madness. Many may indeed succeed in eluding it: history is full of the traces of men who have eluded this task, and of their bad consciences. Usually, however, there came to these men of fate that redeeming hour, that autumnal hour of ripeness, in which they had to do what they did not even “want” to do—and the deed of which they had hitherto been most afraid fell easily and unsought from the tree, as an involuntary deed, almost as a gift.— 973 (1885) The human horizon.— One can conceive philosophers as those who make the most extreme efforts to test how far man could elevate himself— Plato especially: how far his strength will reach. But they do it as individuals; perhaps the instinct of the Caesars, of founders of states, etc, was greater, as they pondered how far man might be driven in his evolution and under “favorable conditions.” But they had an insufficient understanding of the nature of favorable circumstances. Great question: where has the plant “man” hitherto grown up most magnificently? For this question the study of comparative history is necessary.

974 (Fall 1888)

A fact, a work is eloquent in a new way for every age and every new type of man. History always enunciates new truths. 975 (1885-1886) To remain objective, hard, firm, severe in carrying through an idea—artists succeed best in this; but when one needs men for this (as teachers, statesmen, etc., do), then the repose and coldness and hardness soon vanish. With natures like Caesar and Napoleon, one gets some notion of “disinterested” work on their marble, whatever the cost in men. On this road lies the future of the highest men: to bear the greatest responsibility and not collapse under it.— Hitherto, the delusions of inspiration were almost always needed in order not to lose one’s faith in one’s right and one’s hand. 976 (1884) Why the philosopher rarely turns out well. His requirements include qualities that usually destroy a man: a tremendous multiplicity of qualities; he must be a brief abstract of man, of all man’s higher and lower desires: danger from antitheses, also from disgust at himself; he must be inquisitive in the most various directions: danger of going to pieces; he must be just and fair in the highest sense, but profound in love, hate (and injustice), too; he must be not only a spectator, but also a legislator: judge and judged (to the extent that he is a brief abstract of the world); extremely multifarious, yet firm and hard. Supple. 977 (1885) The really royal calling of the philosopher (as expressed by Alcuin the Anglo-Saxon): prava corrigere, et recta corroborare, et sancta sublimare.⁵⁵ 978 (1885) The new philosopher can arise only in conjunction with a ruling caste, as its highest spiritualization. Great politics, rule over the earth, are at hand; complete lack of the principles that are needed. 979 (1885) Fundamental thought: the new values must first be created— we shall not be spared this task! For us the philosopher must be a legislator. New types. (How the highest types hitherto [e.g., Greeks] were reared: to will this type of “chance” consciously.) 980⁵⁶ (1885) Assuming one thinks of a philosopher as a great educator, powerful enough to draw up to his lonely height a long chain of generations, then one must also grant him the uncanny privileges of the great educator. An educator never says what he himself thinks, but always only what he thinks of a thing in relation to the requirements of those he educates He must not be detected in this dissimulation; it is part of his mastery that one believes in his honesty. He must be capable of employing every means of discipline:⁵⁷ some he can drive toward the heights only with the whips of scorn; others, who are sluggish, irresolute, cowardly, vain, perhaps only with exaggerated praise. Such an educator is beyond good and evil; but no one must know it.

981 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Not to make men “better,” not to preach morality to them in any form, as if “morality in itself,” or any ideal kind of man, were given; but to create conditions that require stronger men who for their part need, and consequently will have, a morality (more clearly: a physical-spiritual discipline) that makes them strong! Not to allow oneself to be misled by blue eyes or heaving bosoms: greatness of soul has nothing romantic about it. And unfortunately nothing at all amiable. 982 (1884) One must learn from war: (1) to associate death with the interests for which one fights—that makes us venerable; (2) one must learn to sacrifice many and to take one’s cause seriously enough not to spare men; (3) rigid discipline, and to permit oneself force and cunning in war. 983 (1884) Education in those rulers’ virtues that master even one’s benevolence and pity: the great cultivator’s virtues (“forgiving one’s enemies” is child’s play by comparison), the affect of the creator must be elevated—no longer to work on marble!—The exceptional situation and powerful position of those beings (compared with any prince hitherto): the Roman Caesar with Christ’s soul.⁵⁹ 984 (1884) Greatness of soul is inseparable from greatness of spirit.⁶⁰ For it involves independence; but in the absence of spiritual greatness, independence ought not to be allowed, it causes mischief, even through its desire to do good and practice “justice.” Small spirits must obey—hence cannot possess greatness. 985 (1885) The higher philosophical man, who has solitude not because he wishes to be alone but because he is something that finds no equals: what dangers and new sufferings have been reserved for him precisely today, when one has unlearned belief in order of rank and consequently does not know how to honor and understand this solitude! Formerly the sage almost sanctified himself in the mind of the crowd by going apart in this way—today the hermit sees himself surrounded as if by a cloud of gloomy doubts and suspicions. And not merely on the part of the envious and wretched: he must sense misunderstanding, neglect, and superficiality even in all benevolence shown him. He knows that crafty cunning of narrow-minded pity that feels itself good and holy when it tries to “save” him from himself, perhaps by means of more comfortable situations or more orderly, more reliable company—indeed, he will have to admire the unconscious instinct of destruction with which all the spiritually mediocre go to work against him, with a perfect faith in their right to do so! It is necessary for these men of incomprehensible loneliness to wrap themselves vigorously and boldly in the cloak of external, spatial solitude, too: that is part of their prudence. Even cunning and disguise are needed today if such a man is to preserve himself, to keep himself aloft, in the midst of the dangerous, down-dragging currents of the age. Every attempt to endure in the present, to endure the present, every approach to the men and aims of today, he will have to atone as if it were his own special sin; and he may marvel at the concealed wisdom of his nature that, after every such attempt, at once draws him back to himself by means of sickness and bad accidents. 986 (1885) “—Maledetto colui che contrista un spirto immortal!”⁶¹ MANZONI (Conte di Carmagnola, ACT II). 987 (1884)⁶² The most difficult and highest form of man will succeed most rarely: thus the history of philosophy reveals a superabundance of failures, of accidents, and an extremely slow advance; whole millennia intervene and overwhelm what had been achieved; the continuity is broken again and again. It is an appalling history — the history of the highest man, the sage.— What is most harmed is precisely the memory of the great, for the semi-failures and the failures misunderstand them and vanquish them by means of “successes.” Every time “an influence” shows itself, a mob crowds upon the scene; the chatter of the petty and the poor in spirit is a terrible torment for the ears of those who remember with a shudder that the destiny of humanity depends upon the attainment of its highest type. From my childhood I have pondered the conditions for the existence of the sage, and I will not conceal my joyous conviction that he is again becoming possible in Europe—perhaps only for a short time. 988 (1885) We new philosophers, however, not only do we start by describing the actual order of rank and differences in the value of men, we also desire precisely the opposite of an assimilation, an equalization:⁶³ we teach estrangement in every sense, we open up gulfs such as have never existed before, we desire that man should become more evil than he has ever been before. In the meantime, we are still strangers to and from one another. We have many reasons to be hermits and to put on masks—we shall therefore be poor at looking for those like us. We shall live alone and probably suffer the torments of all seven solitudes. But if we should come across one another, one may wager that we mistake or mutually deceive one another.

989 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Les philosophes ne sont pas faits pour s'aimer. Les aigles ne volent point en compagnie. Il faut laisser cela aux perdrix, aux étourneaux.... Planer au-dessus et avoir des griffes, voilà le lot des grands génies.⁶⁴ GALIANI. 990 (1885) I forgot to say that such philosophers are cheerful and that they like to sit in the abyss below a perfectly clear sky: they need different means from other men for enduring life; for they suffer differently (namely, as much from the profundity of their contempt for man as from their love for man).— The most suffering animal on earth invented for itself—laughter. 991 (1885-1886) On the misunderstanding of “cheerfulness.” Temporary relief from a protracted tension; the high spirits, the saturnalia of a spirit that is dedicating and preparing itself for protracted and terrible decisions. The “fool” in the form of “science.”

992 (March-June 1888)

New order of rank of spirits: the tragic natures no longer to the fore. 993 (1885)
It is a comfort to me to know that above the steam and filth of human lowlands there is a higher, brighter humanity, very small in number (for everything outstanding is by its nature rare) : one belongs to it, not because one is more talented or more virtuous or more heroic or more loving than the men below, but —because one is colder, brighter, more far-seeing, more solitary; because one endures, prefers, demands solitude as happiness, as privilege, indeed as a condition of existence; because one lives among clouds and lightning as among one's own kind, but equally among rays of sunlight, drops of dew, flakes of snow, and everything that necessarily comes from the heights and, when it moves, moves eternally only in the direction from above to below. Aspirations toward the heights are not ours.— Heroes, martyrs, geniuses and enthusiasts are not still, patient, subtle, cold, slow enough for us.

994 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Absolute conviction: that value feelings above and below are different; that countless experiences are lacking in those below; that between below and above misunderstanding is necessary. 995 (1884) How do men attain great strength and a great task? All the virtues and efficiency of body and soul are acquired laboriously and little by little, through much industry, self-constraint, limitation, through much obstinate, faithful repetition of the same labors, the same renunciations; but there are men who are the heirs and masters of this slowly-acquired manifold treasure of virtue and efficiency—because, through fortunate and reasonable marriages, and also through fortunate accidents, the acquired and stored-up energies of many generations have not been squandered and dispersed but linked together by a firm ring and by will. In the end there appears a man, a monster of energy, who demands a monster of a task. For it is our energy that disposes of us; and the wretched spiritual game of goals and intentions and motives is only a foreground—even though weak eyes may take them for the matter itself. 996 (1885-1886) The sublime man has the highest value, even if he is terribly delicate and fragile, because an abundance of very difficult and rare things has been bred and preserved together through many generations. 997 (1884) I teach: that there are higher and lower men, and that a single individual can under certain circumstances justify the existence of whole millennia—that is, a full, rich, great, whole human being in relation to countless incomplete fragmentary men. 998 (1884) The highest men live beyond the rulers, freed from all bonds; and in the rulers they have their instruments. 999 (1884) Order of rank: He who determines values and directs the will of millenia by giving direction to the highest natures is the highest man. 1000 (1884) I believe I have guessed some of the things in the soul of the highest man; perhaps anyone who unriddles him must perish; but whoever has seen him must help to make him possible. Fundamental thought: we must consider the future as decisive for all our evaluations—and not seek the laws of our actions behind us! 1001 (1884) Not “mankind” but overman is the goal!

1002 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Come l'uom s'eterna—65 INF. XV 85 See also section 386 above, and Zarathustra IV, “On the Higher Man,” section 5 (Portable Nietzsche, p. 400), as well as III, “The Convalescent,” section 2 (ibid, p. 330 f). 7a See the Appendix, below. 12 “In the MS, underlined, ‘For the third essay.’ Refers to the planned continuation of the Genealogy, which was supposed to comprise three further essays” (1911, p 512) 16 “Lazzarone, a name now often applied generally to beggars, is an Italian term, particularly used of the poorest class of Neapolitans, who, without any fixed abode, live by odd jobs and fishing, but chiefly by begging” (Encyclopaedia Britannica, 11th ed, article on “Lazar”). 19a Cf. Zarathustra I, “On Free Death,” and Twilight, “Skirmishes,” section 36 (Portable Nietzsche, pp 183 ff and 536 f). The idea of the non ecclesiastical monastery was developed by Hermann Hesse in his Nobel Prize winning novel, Das Glasperlenspiel (The Bead Game, also translated as Magister Ludi). 20 “Charm” (Anmut) represents a doubtful reading. Cf. also Jean-Marie Guyau, Esquisse d’une morale sans obligation ni sanction (F. Alcan, Paris 1885), p. 212: “Il y avait donc dans le pari de Pascal un élément qu’il n’a pas mis en lumière. Il n’a guère vu que la crainte du risque, il n’a pas vu le plaisir du risque” (There is in the wager of Pascal an element he did not make clear He saw only the fear of risk, he did not see the pleasure of risk) 30 “Subtlety”: uncertain reading. 32 “Tribe of freedmen, tribes of slaves torn from our hands, tributary people, new people, license has been granted to you to be free, but not to us to be noble; for us everything is a right, for you everything is a matter of grace; we are not part of your community; we are entire by ourselves.” 36 “The Almanach de Gotha, which has existed since 1763, published since 1871 both in French and German, gives a particular account of all the royal and princely families of Europe ...” (Encyclopaedia Britannica, 11th ed., vol I, p. 712). The word von is the mark of nobility in this sense, and when Friedrich Schiller, for example, was elevated to the nobility his name became Friedrich von Schiller. 44a This dialogue is now usually attributed to “an imitator of Plato”; e g, by W D Ross in The Oxford Classical Dictionary (Clarendon Press, Oxford 1949), p 891. But see the chapter on “Theages” in Paul Friedländer, Plato, vol II (2nd rev ed, Walter de Gruyter, Berlin 1957), especially pp. 141 f and 301 f There is a similar passage in Plato’s Theaetetus 176 This whole matter, of course, transcends philological niceties; what is at stake is one of the most crucial points of Nietzsche’s philosophy: he was not an irrationalist And all the men he most admired were, without exception, great intellects—but not merely great intellects. Cf. sections 876 ff above. II. DIONYSUS

1003 (Jan-Fall 1888)

To him that has turned out well, who does my heart good, carved from wood that is hard, gentle, and fragrant—in whom even the nose takes pleasure—this book is dedicated. He enjoys the taste of what is wholesome for him; his pleasure in anything ceases when the bounds of the wholesome are crossed; he divines the remedies for partial injuries; he has illnesses as great stimulants of his life; he knows how to exploit ill chances; he grows stronger through the accidents that threaten to destroy him; he instinctively gathers from all that he sees, hears, experiences, what advances his main concern—he follows a principle of selection—he allows much to fall through; he reacts with the slowness bred by a long caution and a deliberate pride—he tests a stimulus for its origin and its intentions, he does not submit; he is always in his own company, whether he deals with books, men, or landscapes; he honors by choosing, by admitting, by trusting.

1004 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

To attain a height and bird's eye view, so one grasps how everything actually happens as it ought to happen; how every kind of "imperfection" and the suffering to which it gives rise are part of the highest desirability.

1005 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Around 1876 I was terrified to see all I had desired hitherto compromised, as I grasped which way Wagner was going now; and I was bound very closely to him by all the bonds of a profound identity of needs, by gratitude, by his irreplaceability and the absolute privation I saw before me. At the same time I seemed to myself irrevocably incarcerated in my philology and teaching—in an accident and makeshift of my life: I no longer knew how to extricate myself, and was weary, spent, used up. At the same time I grasped that my instinct went into the opposite direction from Schopenhauer's: toward a justification of life, even at its most terrible, ambiguous, and mendacious; for this I had the formula "Dionysian." Against the theory that an "in-itself of things" must necessarily be good, blessed, true, and one, Schopenhauer's interpretation of the "in-itself" as will was an essential step; but he did not understand how to deify this will: he remained entangled in the moral-Christian ideal. Schopenhauer was still so much subject to the dominion of Christian values that, as soon as the thing-in-itself was no longer "God" for him, he had to see it as bad, stupid, and absolutely reprehensible. He failed to grasp that there can be an infinite variety of ways of being different, even of being god.⁶⁶

1006 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Moral values have hitherto been the highest values: would anybody call this in question?— If we remove these values from this position, we alter all values: the principle of their order of rank hitherto is thus overthrown.

1007 (Spring-Fall 1887)

To revalue values—what would that mean? All the spontaneous—new, future, stronger—movements must be there; but they still appear under false names and valuations and have not yet become conscious of themselves. A courageous becoming-conscious and affirmation of what has been achieved—a liberation from the slovenly routine of old valuations that dishonor us in the best and strongest things we have achieved.

1008 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Every doctrine for which all accumulated energies and explosives are not yet ready at hand, is superfluous. A revaluation of values is achieved only when there is a tension of new needs, of men with new needs, who suffer from the old values without attaining this consciousness.

1009 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Points of view for my values: whether out of abundance or out of want?⁶⁷—whether one looks on or lends a hand—or looks away and walks off?⁶⁸—whether out of stored-up energy, “spontaneously,” or merely stimulated reactively, and provoked? whether simple, out of a paucity of elements, or out of overwhelming mastery over many, so they are pressed into service when they are needed?—whether one is a problem or a solution?—whether perfect with a small task or imperfect with an extraordinary goal? whether one is genuine or merely an actor, whether one is genuine as an actor or merely a copy of an actor, whether one is a “representative” or that which is represented?⁶⁹ whether a “personality” or merely a rendezvous of personalities—whether sick from sickness or excessive health? whether one goes on ahead as a shepherd or as an “exception” (third species: as a fugitive)?⁷⁰ whether one needs dignity, or to be a “buffoon”? whether one seeks resistance or avoids it? whether one is imperfect through being “too early” or “too late”? whether by nature one says Yes or No or is a peacock’s tail of many colors? whether one is sufficiently proud not to be ashamed even of one’s vanity? whether one is still capable of a bite of conscience? (—this species is becoming rare: formerly the conscience had too much to chew: now it seems to have lost its teeth)?⁷¹ whether one is still capable of a “duty”? (—there are those who would lose their whole joy in living if their duty were taken from them—especially the womanly, the born subjects.) 1010 (1883-1888) Suppose our usual conception of the world were a misunderstanding: could a form of perfection be conceived within which even such misunderstandings would receive their sanction? Conception of a new perfection: that which does not correspond to our logic, our “beautiful,” our “good,” our “true,” could be perfect in a higher sense than even our ideal.

1011 (Manuscript source uncertain)

Our great renunciation: not to deify the unknown; we are just beginning to know little. False and wasted endeavors. Our “new world”: we have to realize to what degree we are the creators of our value feelings—and thus capable of projecting “meaning” into history. This faith in truth attains its ultimate conclusion in us—you know what it is: that if there is anything that is to be worshipped it is appearance that must be worshipped, that the lie—and not the truth—is divine!

1012 (1883-1888) Whoever pushes rationality forward also restores new strength to the opposite power, mysticism and folly of all kinds. To distinguish in every movement (1) that it is in part exhaustion from a preceding movement (satiety from it, the malice of weakness toward it, sickness); (2) that it is in part newly-awakened, long slumbering, accumulated energy—joyous, exuberant, violent: health. 1013 (1885-1886) Health and sickliness: one should be careful! The standard remains the efflorescence of the body, the agility, courage, and cheerfulness of the spirit—but also, of course, how much of the sickly it can take and overcome—how much it can make healthy. That of which more delicate men would perish belongs to the stimulants of great health. 1014 (1885) It is only a question of strength: to have all the morbid traits of the century, but to balance them through a superabundant, recuperative strength. The strong man.

1015 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

On the strength of the nineteenth century.— We are more medieval than the eighteenth century; not merely more curious about or easily stimulated by the strange and rare. We have revolted against the Revolution— We have emancipated ourselves from fear of reason, the ghost that haunted the eighteenth century: we again dare to be absurd, childish, lyrical—in one word: “we are musicians.” We are as little afraid of the ridiculous as of the absurd. The devil finds that the tolerance of God works in his favor: even more, he is interesting as one who has been misunderstood and slandered from of old—we rescue the honor of the devil. We no longer separate the great from the terrible. We include together the good things, in their complexity, and the worst things: we have overcome the absurd “desirability” of former days (which desired increase of the good without increase of the evil). Cowardice before the ideal of the Renaissance has receded—we even dare to aspire to its mores. Intolerance toward the priest and the church has come to an end at the same time; “it is immoral to believe in God”—but precisely this seems to us the best justification of such faith. We have granted all these things their rights. We are not afraid of the reverse side of “good things” (—we seek them: we are brave and curious enough); e g, of Hellenism, of morality, of reason, of good taste (we compute the losses one sustains with all such precious things: one almost makes oneself poor with such a precious thing —). Just as little do we conceal from ourselves the reverse side of bad things.

1016 (March-June 1888)

What does us honor.— If anything does us honor, it is this: we have transferred seriousness: we regard as important the lowly things that have at all times been despised and left aside—on the other hand, we let “beautiful feelings” go cheap. Is there a more dangerous aberration than contempt for the body? As if it did not condemn all spirituality to become sickly—to the vapeurs of “idealism”!

Whatever Christians and idealists have devised has neither rhyme nor reason: we are more radical. We have discovered the “smallest world” as that which is decisive everywhere.⁷² The way our streets are paved, good air in our room,⁷³ food—we grasp their value; we have taken all the necessities of existence seriously and despise all “beautiful-soulism” as a kind of “levity and frivolity.”—What was formerly most despised has been brought to the front.

1017 (Spring-Fall 1887)

In place of the “natural man” of Rousseau, the nineteenth century has discovered a truer image of “man”—it has had the courage to do so.— On the whole, the Christian concept “man” has thus been reinstated. What one has not had the courage for is to call this “man in himself” good and to see in him the guarantee of the future. Neither has one dared to grasp that an increase in the terribleness of man is an accompaniment of every increase in culture; in this, one is still subject to the Christian ideal and takes its side against paganism, also against the Renaissance concept of virtù. But the key to culture is not to be found in this way: and in praxi one retains the falsification of history in favor of the “good man” (as if he alone constituted the progress of man) and the socialist ideal (i.e., the residue of Christianity and of Rousseau in the de-Christianized world). The struggle against the eighteenth century: its supreme overcoming by Goethe and Napoleon. Schopenhauer, too, struggles against it; but he involuntarily steps back into the seventeenth century—he is a modern Pascal, with Pascalian value judgments without Christianity. Schopenhauer was not strong enough for a new Yes. Napoleon: insight that the higher and the terrible man necessarily belong together. The “man” reinstated; the woman again accorded her due tribute of contempt and fear. “Totality” as health and highest activity; the straight line, the grand style in action rediscovered; the most powerful instinct, that of life itself, the lust to rule, affirmed. 1018 (1887)⁷⁴ (Revue des deux mondes, Feb. 15, 1887. Taine on Napoleon): “Suddenly the faculté maîtresse unfolds: the artist enclosed in the politician emerges de sa gaine;⁷⁶ he creates dans l’idéal et l’impossible.⁷⁷ He is once more recognized for what he is: the posthumous brother of Dante and Michelangelo: and in truth, in view of the firm contours of his vision, the intensity, coherence, and inner logic of his dream, the profundity of his meditation, the superhuman grandeur of his conception, he is like them et leur égal: son génie a la même taille et la même structure; il est un des trois esprits souverains de la renaissance italienne.”⁷⁸ Nota bene—Dante, Michelangelo, Napoleon.

1019 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev. Spring-Fall 1888)

On the pessimism of strength — In the inner psychic economy of the primitive man, fear of evil predominates. What is evil? Three things: chance, the uncertain, the sudden. How does primitive man fight against evil?— He conceives it as reason, as power, even as a person. In this way he establishes the possibility of entering into a kind of treaty with it and in general to exercise influence over it in advance—to forestall it. —Another expedient is to assert that its malice and harmfulness is merely appearance one interprets the consequences of chance, of the uncertain and sudden as well meant, as meaningful. —A third means: one interprets the bad above all as “deserved”: one justifies evil as punishment. —In summa one submits to it: the whole religio-moral interpretation is only a form of submission to evil.— The faith that a good meaning lies in evil means to abandon the struggle against it. Now the whole history of culture represents a diminution of this fear of chance, the uncertain, the sudden. For culture means learning to calculate, to think causally, to forestall, to believe in necessity. With the increase of culture, man can do without that primitive form of submission to ills (called religion or morality), that “justification of evil.” Now he makes war on “ills”—he abolishes them. Indeed, a state is possible in which the sense of security and belief in law and calculability enter consciousness in the form of satiety and disgust—while the delight in chance, the uncertain and sudden becomes titillating. Let us dwell a moment on this symptom of highest culture—I call it the pessimism of strength. Man no longer needs a “justification of ills”; “justification” is precisely what he abhors: he enjoys ills pur, cru; he finds senseless ills the most interesting. If he formerly had need of a god, he now takes delight in a world disorder without God, a world of chance, to whose essence belong the terrible, the ambiguous, the seductive. In such a state it is precisely the good that needs “justifying,” i.e., it must be founded in evil and danger or involve some great stupidity: then it still pleases. Animality no longer arouses horror; esprit and happy exuberance in favor of the animal in man is in such ages the most triumphant form of spirituality. Man is now strong enough to be ashamed of any faith in God: he may again play the advocatus diaboli. If he in praxi advocates the preservation of virtue, he does it for reasons that recognize in virtue a subtlety, a cunning, a form of lust for gain and power. This pessimism of strength also ends in a theodicy, i.e., in an absolute affirmation of the world—but for the very reasons that formerly led one to deny it—and in this fashion to a conception of this world as the actually-achieved highest possible ideal.

1020 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

The chief kinds of pessimism: the pessimism of sensibility (excessive irritability with a preponderance of unpleasurable feelings); the pessimism of “unfree will” (in other words: a lack of strength in resisting stimuli); the pessimism of doubt (a distaste for everything firm, for all grasping and touching). The psychological states proper to these can all be observed in the madhouse, even if in a somewhat exaggerated form. Also “nihilism” (the penetrating feeling of —“nothingness”). But where does the moral pessimism of Pascal belong? the metaphysical pessimism of the Vedanta philosophy? the social pessimism of the anarchists (or of Shelley)? the pessimism of sympathy (like that of Leo Tolstoy, Alfred de Vigny)? Are all these not likewise phenomena of decay and sickness? — To give excessive weight to moral values or to fictions of the “beyond” or to social distress or to suffering in general: every such exaggeration of a narrow viewpoint is in itself already a sign of sickness. Likewise the preponderance of No over Yes! What must not be confused with all this: pleasure in saying No and doing No out of a tremendous strength and tension derived from saying Yes—peculiar to all rich and powerful men and ages. A luxury, as it were; also a form of bravery that opposes the terrible; a sympathetic feeling for the terrible and questionable because one is, among other things, terrible and questionable: the Dionysian in will, spirit, taste.

1021 (Manuscript source uncertain)

My Five “No’s” My struggle against the feeling of guilt and the projection of the concept of punishment into the physical and metaphysical world; also into psychology and the interpretation of history. Insight into the moralization of all previous philosophies and valuations. My recognition and identification of the traditional ideal, the Christian, even where the dogmatic form of Christianity has been abandoned. The dangerousness of the Christian ideal lies in its value feelings, in that which can do without conceptual expression: my struggle against latent Christianity (e.g., in music, in socialism). My struggle against the eighteenth century of Rousseau, against his “nature,” his “good man,” his belief in the dominion of feeling—against the softening, weakening, moralization of man: an ideal born of hatred for aristocratic culture; in praxi, the dominion of the feelings of unbridled resentment, devised as a banner for the struggle (—the morality of guilt feelings of the Christian, the morality of resentment a posture of the mob). My struggle against romanticism, in which Christian ideals and the ideals of Rousseau unite, but compounded with a nostalgia for the old days of priestly-aristocratic culture, for virtù, for the “strong human being”—something extremely hybrid; a false and impersonated strong humanity that values extreme states in general and sees in them a symptom of strength (“cult of passion”; an imitation of the most expressive forms, furor espressivo, not out of plenitude but out of a lack).— (What in the nineteenth century is born of a relative plenitude, with gusto: cheerful music, etc.; among poets, e.g., Stifter and Gottfried Keller are signs of greater strength, inner well-being, than——. Grand technique and inventiveness, the natural sciences, history (?)⁸⁰: products of relative strength, self-confidence of the nineteenth century.) My struggle against the predominance of the herd instincts now that science makes common cause with them; against the inward hatred with which every kind of order of rank and distance are treated.

1022 (Spring 1887-March 1888)

From the pressure of plenitude, from the tension of forces that continually increase in us and do not yet know how to discharge themselves, there arises a condition like that preceding a storm: the nature we constitute becomes dark. This, too, is “pessimism”—A doctrine that puts an end to such a condition by commanding something or other—a revaluation of values by virtue of which the accumulated forces are shown a way, a whither, so they explode into lightning flashes and deeds—certainly does not need to be a doctrine of happiness: by releasing force that had been compressed and dammed to the point of torment it brings happiness.

1023 (March-June 1888)

Pleasure appears where there is the feeling of power. Happiness: in the triumphant consciousness of power and victory. Progress: the strengthening of the type, the ability for great willing; everything else is misunderstanding, danger.

1024 (Spring-Fall 1887)

A period when the old masquerade and moral decking-up of the affects arouses antipathy: naked nature; where the decisiveness of quanta of power is simply admitted (as determining rank); where the grand style appears again as the consequence of grand passion.

1025 (Spring-Fall 1887)

To press everything terrible into service, one by one, step by step, experimentally: this is what the task of culture demands; but until it is strong enough for this, it must oppose, moderate, veil, even curse all this. Everywhere that a culture posits evil, it gives expression to a relationship of fear, thus a weakness. Thesis: everything good is the evil of former days made serviceable. Standard: the greater and more terrible the passions are that an age, a people, an individual can permit themselves, because they are capable of employing them as means, the higher stands their culture;⁸¹ the more mediocre, the weaker, the more submissive and cowardly a man is, the more he will posit as evil: it is with him that the realm of evil is most comprehensive. The basest man will see the realm of evil (i.e., of that which is forbidden and hostile to him) everywhere.

1026 (Summer-Fall 1883)

Not “happiness follows virtue”—but the more powerful man first designates his happy state as virtue. Evil actions belong to the powerful and virtuous: bad, base ones to the subjected. The most powerful man, the creator, would have to be the most evil, in as much as he carries his ideal against the ideals of other men and remakes them in his own image. Evil here means: hard, painful, enforced. Such men as Napoleon must come again and again and confirm the belief in the autocracy of the individual: but he himself was corrupted by the means he had to employ and lost noblesse of character. If he had had to prevail among a different kind of man he could have employed other means; and it would thus not seem to be a necessity for a Caesar to become bad.

1027 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Man is beast and superbeast;⁸² the higher man is inhuman and superhuman: these belong together. With every increase of greatness and height in man, there is also an increase in depth and terribleness: one ought not to desire the one without the other— or rather: the more radically one desires the one, the more radically one achieves precisely the other.

1028 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Terribleness is part of greatness: let us not deceive ourselves. 1029 (1884-1886) I have presented such terrible images to knowledge that any “Epicurean delight” is out of the question. Only Dionysian joy is sufficient: I have been the first to discover the tragic.⁸³ The Greeks, thanks to their moralistic superficiality, misunderstood it. Even resignation is not a lesson of tragedy, but a misunderstanding of it! Yearning for nothingness is a denial of tragic wisdom, its opposite! 1030 (1883-1888) A full and powerful soul not only copes with painful, even terrible losses, deprivations, robberies, insults; it emerges from such hells with a greater fullness and powerfulness; and, most essential of all, with a new increase in the blissfulness of love. I believe that he who has divined something of the most basic conditions for this growth in love will understand what Dante meant when he wrote over the gate of his Inferno: “I, too, was created by eternal love.”⁸⁴

1031 (Spring-Fall 1887)

To explore the whole sphere of the modern soul, to have sat in its every nook—my ambition, my torture, and my happiness. Really to overcome pessimism—a Goethean eye full of love and good will as the result. 1032 (1883-1885)⁸⁵ The first question is by no means whether we are content with ourselves, but whether we are content with anything at all.⁸⁶ If we affirm one single moment, we thus affirm not only ourselves but all existence.⁸⁷ For nothing is self-sufficient, neither in us ourselves nor in things; and if our soul has trembled with happiness and sounded like a harp string just once, all eternity was needed to produce this one event—and in this single moment of affirmation all eternity was called good, redeemed, justified, and affirmed.

1033 (March-June 1888)

The affirmative affects pride, joy, health, love of the sexes, enmity and war, reverence, beautiful gestures and manners,⁸⁸ strong will, the discipline of high spirituality, will to power, gratitude toward earth and life—everything that is rich and desires to bestow and that replenishes and gilds and immortalizes and deifies life—the whole force of transfiguring virtues, everything that declares good and affirms in word and deed— 1034 (1888) We few or many who again dare to live in a dismoralized world, we pagans in faith: we are probably also the first to grasp what a pagan faith is:—to have to imagine higher creatures than man, but beyond good and evil; to have to consider all being higher as also being immoral. We believe in Olympus—and not in the “Crucified.”

1035 (Spring-Fall 1887; rev Spring-Fall 1888)

Latter-day man has employed his power of idealization in regard to a god chiefly to make the god more and more moral. What does that signify?—Nothing good, a diminution of the strength of man. For in itself the opposite would be possible; and there are indications of this. God conceived as an emancipation from morality, taking into himself the whole fullness of life's antitheses and, in a divine torment, redeeming and justifying them: God as the beyond and above of the wretched loafers' morality of "good and evil." 1036 (1885-1886) A humanitarian God cannot be demonstrated from the world we know: today you can be compelled to admit this much. But what conclusions do you draw?⁸⁹ "He cannot be demonstrated to us": epistemological skepticism. You are all afraid of the conclusion: "from the world we know, a very different god would be demonstrable, one who at any rate is not humanitarian"—and, in short, you hold fast to your God and devise for him a world we do not know.

1037 (Spring-Fall 1887)

Let us remove supreme goodness from the concept of God: it is unworthy of a god. Let us also remove supreme wisdom: it is the vanity of philosophers that is to be blamed for this mad notion of God as a monster of wisdom: he had to be as like them as possible. No! God the supreme power—that suffices! Everything follows from it, “the world” follows from it! 1038 (March-Fall 1888)⁹⁰ —And how many new gods are still possible! As for myself, in whom the religious, that is to say god-forming, instinct occasionally becomes active at impossible times—how differently, how variously the divine has revealed itself to me each time! So many strange things have passed before me in those timeless moments that fall into one’s life as if from the moon, when one no longer has any idea how old one is or how young one will yet be—I should not doubt that there are many kinds of gods— There are some one cannot imagine without a certain halcyon and frivolous quality in their make-up— Perhaps light feet are even an integral part of the concept “god”— Is it necessary to elaborate that a god prefers to stay beyond everything bourgeois and rational? and, between ourselves, also beyond good and evil? His prospect is free—in Goethe’s words.⁹¹— And to call upon the inestimable authority of Zarathustra in this instance: Zarathustra goes so far as to confess: “I would believe only in a God who could dance”— To repeat: how many new gods are still possible!— Zarathustra himself, to be sure, is merely an old atheist: he believes neither in old nor in new gods. Zarathustra says he would; but Zarathrusta will not— Do not misunderstand him. The type of God after the type of creative spirits, of “great men.”

1039 (March-June 1888)

And how many new ideals are, at bottom, still possible!— Here is a little ideal I stumble upon once every five weeks on a wild and lonely walk, in an azure moment of sinful happiness. To spend one's life amid delicate and absurd things; a stranger to reality; half an artist, half a bird and metaphysician; with no care for reality, except now and then to acknowledge it in the manner of a good dancer with the tips of one's toes; always tickled by some sunray of happiness; exuberant and encouraged even by misery—for misery preserves the happy man; fixing a little humorous tail even to the holiest things: this, as is obvious, is the ideal of a heavy, hundredweight spirit—a spirit of gravity.

1040 (Summer-Fall 1888)

From the soul's school of war.⁹² (Dedicated to the brave, the cheerful, the temperate.) I should not like to undervalue the amiable virtues; but greatness of soul is not compatible with them. Even in the arts, the grand style excludes the pleasing. * In times of painful tension and vulnerability, choose war: it hardens, it produces muscles. * The deeply wounded have Olympian laughter; one has only what one needs to have. * It has been ten years already: not a sound reaches me any longer—a land without rain. One must have a great deal of humanity left not to die of thirst in the drought. 1041 (1888) My new path to a “Yes”.—Philosophy, as I have hitherto understood and lived it, is a voluntary quest for even the most detested and notorious sides of existence. From the long experience I gained from such a wandering through ice and wilderness, I learned to view differently all that had hitherto philosophized: the hidden history of philosophy, the psychology of its great names, came to light for me. “How much truth can a spirit endure, how much truth does a spirit dare?”—this became for me the real standard of value Error is cowardice—every achievement of knowledge is a consequence of courage, of severity toward oneself, of cleanliness toward oneself— Such an experimental philosophy as I live anticipates experimentally even the possibilities of the most fundamental nihilism; but this does not mean that it must halt at a negation, a No, a will to negation. It wants rather to cross over to the opposite of this—to a Dionysian affirmation of the world as it is, without subtraction, exception, or selection—it wants the eternal circulation:—the same things, the same logic and illogic of entanglements. The highest state a philosopher can attain: to stand in a Dionysian relationship to existence—my formula for this is amor fati It is part of this state to perceive not merely the necessity of those sides of existence hitherto denied, but their desirability; and not their desirability merely in relation to the sides hitherto affirmed (perhaps as their complement or precondition), but for their own sake, as the more powerful, more fruitful, truer sides of existence, in which its will finds clearer expression. It is also part of this state to depreciate that side of existence which alone has been affirmed hitherto; to perceive the origin of this valuation and how little a Dionysian value standard for existence is obliged to it: I pulled up and perceived what it really was that here affirmed (on one hand, the instinct of the suffering; on the other the instinct of the herd; and thirdly, the instinct of the majority against the exceptions—). Thus I guessed to what extent a stronger type of man would necessarily have to conceive the elevation and enhancement of man as taking place in another direction: higher beings, beyond good and evil, beyond those values which cannot deny their origin in the sphere of suffering, the herd, and the majority—I sought in history the beginnings of this construction of reverse ideals (the concepts “pagan,” “classical,” “noble” newly discovered and expounded—). 1042 (1885-1886) To demonstrate to what extent the Greek religion was higher than the Judaeo-Christian. The latter conquered because the Greek religion had become degenerate (had retrogressed). 1043 (1884) It is nothing to be wondered at that a couple of millenia are needed to re-establish contact—a couple of millennia mean little! 1044 (1885-1886) There is a need for those who will sanctify all activities, not only eating and drinking—and not merely in remembrance of them and to become one with them, but this world must be transfigured ever anew and in new ways. 1045 (1886-1887) The most spiritual men feel the stimulus and charm of sensuous things in a way that other men—those with “fleshly hearts”—cannot possibly imagine and ought not to imagine: they are sensualists in the best faith, because they accord the senses a more fundamental value than to that fine sieve, that thinning and reducing machine, or whatever we may call what in the language of the people is named “spirit.” The strength and power of the senses—this is the essential thing in a well-constituted and complete man: the splendid “animal” must be given first—what could any “humanization” matter otherwise! 1046 (1884) We want to hold fast to our senses and to our faith in them—and think their consequences through to the end! The nonsensuality of philosophy hitherto as the greatest nonsensicality of man. The existing world, upon which all earthly living things have worked so that it appears as it does (durable and changing slowly), we want to go on building—and not criticize it away as false! Our valuations are a part of this building; they emphasize and underline. Of what significance is it if entire religions say: “all is bad and false and evil”! This condemnation of the entire process can only be a judgment of the ill-constituted! To be sure, the ill-constituted can be the greatest sufferers and the most subtle? The contented could be of little value? One must understand the artistic basic phenomenon that is called “life”—the building spirit that builds under the most unfavorable conditions: in the slowest manner——A demonstration of all its combinations must first be produced afresh: it preserves itself.

1047 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

Sexuality, the lust to rule, pleasure in appearance and deception, great and joyful gratitude for life and its typical states—these are of the essence of the pagan cults and have a good conscience on their side.— Unnaturalness (already in Greek antiquity) fights against the pagan, as morality, as dialectic. 1048 (1885-1886) An anti-metaphysical view of the world—yes, but an artistic one. 1049 (1885-1886) Apollo's deception: the eternity of beautiful form; the aristocratic legislation, "thus shall it be for ever!" Dionysus: sensuality and cruelty. Transitoriness could be interpreted as enjoyment of productive and destructive force, as continual creation.

1050 (March-June 1888)

The word “Dionysian” means: an urge to unity, a reaching out beyond personality, the everyday, society, reality, across the abyss of transitoriness: a passionate-painful overflowing into darker, fuller, more floating states; an ecstatic affirmation of the total character of life as that which remains the same, just as powerful, just as blissful, through all change; the great pantheistic sharing of joy and sorrow that sanctifies and calls good even the most terrible and questionable qualities of life; the eternal will to procreation, to fruitfulness, to recurrence; the feeling of the necessary unity of creation and destruction. The word “Apollinian” means: the urge to perfect self-sufficiency, to the typical “individual,” to all that simplifies, distinguishes, makes strong, clear, unambiguous, typical: freedom under the law. The further development of art is as necessarily tied to the antagonism between these two natural artistic powers as the further development of man is to that between the sexes. Plenitude of power and moderation, the highest form of self-affirmation in a cool, noble, severe beauty: the Apollinianism of the Hellenic will. This antithesis of the Dionysian and the Apollinian within the Greek soul is one of the great riddles to which I felt myself drawn when considering the nature of the Greeks. Fundamentally I was concerned with nothing except to guess why precisely Greek Apollinianism had to grow out of a Dionysian subsoil; why the Dionysian Greek needed to become Apollinian; that is, to break his will to the terrible, multifarious, uncertain, frightful, upon a will to measure, to simplicity, to submission to rule and concept. The immoderate, disorderly Asiatic lies at his roots: the bravery of the Greek consists in his struggle with his Asiaticism; beauty is not given to him, as little as is logic or the naturalness of customs—it is conquered, willed, won by struggle—it is his victory.⁹⁶ 1051 (1885) The highest and most illustrious human joys, in which existence celebrates its own transfiguration, come, as is reasonable, only to the rarest and best-constituted men; and even to these only when they themselves and their ancestors have lived long, preparatory lives directed to this goal, and not even in the knowledge of this goal. Then an overflowing wealth of the most multifarious forces and the most dextrous power of “free willing” and lordly command dwell amicably together in one man; the spirit is then as much at home in the senses as the senses are at home in the spirit; and whatever takes place in the spirit must enkindle a subtle extraordinary happiness and play in the senses. And also the other way around! Consider this reverse process in the case of Hafiz; even Goethe, however much more faintly, gives us an idea of this occurrence. It is probable that with such perfect and well-constituted men the most sensual functions are finally transfigured by a symbol-intoxication of the highest spirituality: they experience a kind of deification of the body in themselves and are as distant as possible from the ascetic philosophy of the proposition “God is a spirit”—and this shows clearly that the ascetic is the “ill-constituted man,” who calls good only a something-in-itself, and indeed a something that judges and condemns—and also calls it “God.” From that height of joy where man feels himself to be altogether a deified form and a self-justification of nature, down to the joy of healthy peasants and healthy half-human animals, this whole, long, tremendous light and color scale of happiness, the Greeks, not without the grateful shudder of him who is initiated into a mystery, not without much caution and pious silence, called by the divine name: Dionysus.—What do any latter-day men, the children of a fragmentary, multifarious, sick, strange age, know of the range of Greek happiness; what could they know of it! Whence would the slaves of “modern ideas” derive a right to Dionysian festivals! When the Greek body and the Greek soul “bloomed,” and not in conditions of morbid exaltation and madness, there arose that mysterious symbol of the highest world-affirmation and transfiguration of existence that has yet been attained on earth. Here we have a standard by which everything that has grown up since is found too short, too poor, too narrow. One only needs to pronounce the word “Dionysus” in the presence of the best latter-day names and things, in the presence of Goethe perhaps, or Beethoven, or Shakespeare, or Raphael—at once we feel that our best things and moments have been judged. Dionysus is a judge!—Have I been understood? There can be no doubt that the Greeks sought to interpret the ultimate mysteries “of the destiny of the soul” and everything they knew concerning education and purification, above all concerning the immovable order of rank and inequality of value between man and man, on the basis of their Dionysian experiences: here is the great depth, the great silence, in all matters Greek—one does not know the Greeks as long as this hidden subterranean entrance lies blocked. Importunate scholar’s eyes will never see anything in these things, however much scholarship still has to be employed in this excavation. Even the noble zeal of such friends of antiquity as Goethe and Winckelmann here has something unpermitted, even immodest about it. To wait and to prepare oneself; to await the emergence of new sources; to prepare oneself in solitude for strange faces and voices; to wash one’s soul ever cleaner from the marketplace dust and noise of this age; to overcome everything Christian through something supra-Christian, and not merely to put it aside—for the Christian doctrine was the counterdoctrine to the Dionysian; to rediscover the South in one and to spread out above one a bright, glittering, mysterious southern sky; to reconquer southern health and hidden powerfulness of soul; step by step to become more comprehensive, more supranational, more European, more Near Eastern, finally more Greek—for the Greek was the first great union and synthesis of everything Near Eastern, and on that account the inception of the European soul, the discovery of our “new world”: whoever lives under such imperatives, who knows what he may not encounter one day? Perhaps—a new day!

1052 (March-June 1888)

The two types: Dionysus and the Crucified.⁹⁷— To determine: whether the typical religious man [is]⁹⁸ a form of decadence (the great innovators are one and all morbid and epileptic); but are we not here omitting one type of religious man, the pagan? Is the pagan cult not a form of thanksgiving and affirmation of life? Must its highest representative not be an apology for and deification of life? The type of a well-constituted and ecstatically overflowing spirit! The type of a spirit that takes into itself and redeems the contradictions and questionable aspects of existence! It is here I set the Dionysus of the Greeks: the religious affirmation of life, life whole and not denied or in part; (typical—that the sexual act arouses profundity, mystery,¹⁰⁰ reverence). Dionysus versus the “Crucified”: there you have the antithesis. It is not a difference in regard to their martyrdom—it is a difference in the meaning of it. Life itself, its eternal fruitfulness and recurrence, creates torment, destruction, the will to annihilation. In the other case, suffering—the “Crucified as the innocent one”—counts as an objection to this life, as a formula for its condemnation.— One will see that the problem is that of the meaning of suffering: whether a Christian meaning or a tragic meaning. In the former case, it is supposed to be the path to a holy existence; in the latter case, being is counted as holy enough to justify even a monstrous amount of suffering. The tragic man affirms even the harshest suffering: he is sufficiently strong, rich, and capable of deifying to do so. The Christian denies even the happiest lot on earth: he is sufficiently weak, poor, disinherited to suffer from life in whatever form he meets it. The god on the cross is a curse on life, a signpost to seek redemption from life; Dionysus cut to pieces is a promise of life: it will be eternally reborn and return again from destruction.¹⁰² 85 “Above the beginning, the MS has the incomplete sentence: ‘Once one has comprehended, not only in how far every one of our actions is necessary but also how they mutually entail each other and how every nuance of feeling——’ ” (1911, p. 514). These reflections on The Birth of Tragedy—apparently in connection with the section on that book in Ecce Homo—help our understanding of Nietzsche’s first work. In sum: this section is in many ways typical of the whole book. It was written in extreme haste, and it would be an understatement to say that it was not polished for publication; but for all that it is remarkable—as a document that aids our understanding of Nietzsche, as a prose passage, and for the ideas it expresses. Schlechta’s edition, as usual, does not follow the MS but the standard editions, ignoring the information furnished in 1911 (p 514 in this case). III. THE ETERNAL RECURRENCE 1053 (1884) My philosophy brings the triumphant idea of which all other modes of thought will ultimately perish. It is the great cultivating idea: the races that cannot bear it stand condemned; those who find it the greatest benefit are chosen to rule. 1054 (1885-1886) The greatest of struggles: for this a new weapon is needed. The hammer: to provoke a fearful decision, to confront Europe with the consequences: whether its will “wills” destruction. Prevention of reduction to mediocrity. Rather destruction! 1055 (1885) A pessimistic teaching and way of thinking, an ecstatic nihilism, can under certain conditions be indispensable precisely to the philosopher—as a mighty pressure and hammer with which he breaks and removes degenerate and decaying races to make way for a new order of life, or to implant into that which is degenerate and desires to die a longing for the end. 1056 (1884) It want to teach the idea that gives many the right to erase themselves—the great cultivating idea. 1057 (1883-1888) The eternal recurrence. A prophecy.¹⁰³ Presentation of the doctrine and its theoretical presuppositions and consequences. Proof of the doctrine. Probable consequences of its being believed (it makes everything break open). a) Means of enduring it; b) Means of disposing of it. Its place in history as a mid-point. Period of greatest danger. Foundation of an oligarchy above peoples and their interests: education to a universally human politics. Counterpart of Jesuitism. 1058 (1883-1888) The two greatest philosophical points of view (devised by Germans) : a) that of becoming, of development. b) that according to the value of existence (but the wretched form of German pessimism must first be overcome!)—both brought together my me in a decisive way. Everything becomes and recurs eternally— escape is impossible! — Supposing we could judge value, what follows? The idea of recurrence as a selective principle, in the service of strength (and barbarism!!). Ripeness of man for this idea. 1059 (1884) The idea [of the eternal recurrence]:¹⁰⁴ the presuppositions that would have to be true if it were true. Its consequences. As the hardest idea: its probable effect if it were not prevented, i.e., if all values were not revalued. Means of enduring it: the revaluation of all values. No longer joy in certainty but in uncertainty; no longer “cause and effect” but the continually creative; no longer will to preservation but to power; no longer the humble expression, “everything is merely subjective,” but “it is also our work!— Let us be proud of it!” 1060 (1884) To endure the idea of the recurrence one needs: freedom from morality; new means against the fact of pain (pain conceived as a tool, as the father of pleasure; there is no cumulative consciousness of displeasure); the enjoyment of all kinds of uncertainty, experimentalism, as a counterweight to this extreme fatalism; abolition of the concept of necessity; abolition of the “will”; abolition of “knowledge-in-itself.” Greatest elevation of the consciousness of strength in man, as he creates the overman. 1061 (1887-1888) The two most extreme modes of thought—the mechanistic and the Platonic—are reconciled in the eternal recurrence: both as ideals. 1062 (1885) If the world had a goal, it must have been reached. If there were for it some unintended final state, this also must have been reached. If it were in any way capable of a pausing and becoming fixed, of “being,” if in the whole course of its becoming it possessed even for a moment this capability of “being,” then all becoming would long since have come to an end, along with all thinking, all “spirit.” The fact of “spirit” as a form of becoming proves that the world has no goal, no final state, and is incapable of being. The old habit, however, of associating a goal with every event and a guiding, creative God with the world, is so powerful that it requires an effort for a thinker not to fall into thinking of the very aimlessness of the world as intended. This notion—that the world intentionally avoids a goal and even knows artifices for keeping itself from entering into a circular course—must occur to all those who would like to force on the world the ability for eternal novelty, i.e., on a finite, definite, unchangeable force of constant size, such as the world is, the miraculous power of infinite novelty in its forms and states. The world, even if it is no longer a god, is still supposed to be capable of the divine power of creation, the power of infinite transformations; it is supposed to consciously prevent itself from returning to any of its old forms; it is supposed to possess not only the intention but the means of avoiding any repetition; to that end, it is supposed to control every one of its movements at every moment so as to escape goals, final states, repetitions—and whatever else may follow from such an unforgiveably insane way of thinking and desiring. It is still the old religious way of thinking and desiring, a kind of longing to believe that in some way the world is after all like the old beloved, infinite, boundlessly creative God—that in some way “the old God still lives”—that longing of Spinoza which was expressed in the words “deus sive natura”¹⁰⁵ (he even felt “natura sive deus”). What, then, is the law and belief with which the decisive change, the recently attained preponderance of the scientific spirit over the religious, God-inventing spirit, is most clearly formulated? Is it not: the world, as force, may not be thought of as unlimited, for it cannot be so thought of; we forbid ourselves the concept of an infinite force as incompatible with the concept “force.” Thus—the world also lacks the capacity for eternal novelty. ¹⁰⁶³ (1886-1887) The law of the conservation of energy demands eternal recurrence. ¹⁰⁶⁴ (1885) That a state of equilibrium is never reached proves that it is not possible. But in an indefinite space it would have to have been reached. Likewise in a spherical space. The shape of space must be the cause of eternal movement, and ultimately of all “imperfection.” That “force” and “rest,” “remaining the same,” contradict one another. The measure of force (as magnitude) as fixed, but its essence in flux.¹⁰⁶ “Timelessness” to be rejected. At any precise moment of a force, the absolute conditionality of a new distribution of all its forces is given: it cannot stand still. “Change” belongs to the essence, therefore also temporality: with this, however, the necessity of change has only been posited once more conceptually.

1065 (Nov. 1887-March 1888)

A certain emperor always bore in mind the transitoriness of all things so as not to take them too seriously and to live at peace among them. To me, on the contrary, everything seems far too valuable to be so fleeting: I seek an eternity for everything: ought one to pour the most precious salves and wines into the sea?—My consolation is that everything that has been is eternal: the sea will cast it up again.

1066 (March-June 1888)

The new world-conception.— The world exists; it is not something that becomes, not something that passes away. Or rather: it becomes, it passes away, but it has never begun to become and never ceased from passing away—it maintains itself in both.— It lives on itself: its excrements are its food. We need not worry for a moment about the hypothesis of a created world. The concept “create” is today completely indefinable,¹⁰⁷ unrealizable; merely a word, a rudimentary survival from the ages of superstition; one can explain nothing with a mere word. The last attempt to conceive a world that had a beginning has lately been made several times with the aid of logical procedures—generally, as one may divine, with an ulterior theological motive. Lately one has sought several times to find a contradiction in the concept “temporal infinity of the world in the past” (regressus in infinitum): one has even found it, although at the cost of confusing the head with the tail. Nothing can prevent me from reckoning backward from this moment and saying “I shall never reach the end”; just as I can reckon forward from the same moment into the infinite. Only if I made the mistake—I shall guard against it—of equating this correct concept of a regressus in infinitum with an utterly unrealizable concept of a finite progressus up to this present, only if I suppose that the direction (forward or backward) is logically a matter of indifference, would I take the head—this moment—for the tail: I shall leave that to you, my dear Herr Dühring!— I have come across this idea in earlier thinkers: every time it was determined by other ulterior considerations (— mostly theological, in favor of the creator spiritus). If the world could in any way become rigid, dry, dead, nothing, or if it could reach a state of equilibrium, or if it had any kind of goal that involved duration, immutability, the once-and-for-all (in short, speaking metaphysically: if becoming could resolve itself into being or into nothingness), then this state must have been reached. But it has not been reached: from which it follows— This is the sole certainty we have in our hands to serve as a corrective to a great host of world hypotheses possible in themselves. If, e.g., the mechanistic theory cannot avoid the consequence, drawn for it by William Thomson,¹⁰⁸ of leading to a final state, then the mechanistic theory stands refuted. If the world may be thought of as a certain definite quantity of force and as a certain definite number of centers of force—and every other representation remains indefinite and therefore useless—it follows that, in the great dice game of existence, it must pass through a calculable number of combinations. In infinite time, every possible combination would at some time or another be realized; more: it would be realized an infinite number of times. And since between every combination and its next recurrence all other possible combinations would have to take place, and each of these combinations conditions the entire sequence of combinations in the same series, a circular movement of absolutely identical series is thus demonstrated: the world as a circular movement that has already repeated itself infinitely often and plays its game in infinitum. This conception is not simply a mechanistic conception; for if it were that, it would not condition an infinite recurrence of identical cases, but a final state. Because the world has not reached this, mechanistic theory must be considered an imperfect and merely provisional hypothesis. 1067109 (1885) And do you know what “the world” is to me? Shall I show it to you in my mirror? This world: a monster of energy, without beginning, without end; a firm, iron magnitude of force that does not grow bigger or smaller, that does not expend itself but only transforms itself; as a whole, of unalterable size, a household without expenses or losses, but likewise without increase or income; enclosed by “nothingness” as by a boundary; not something blurry or wasted, not something endlessly extended, but set in a definite space as a definite force, and not a space that might be “empty” here or there, but rather as force throughout, as a play of forces and waves of forces, at the same time one and many, increasing here and at the same time decreasing there; a sea of forces flowing and rushing together, eternally changing, eternally flooding back, with tremendous years of recurrence, with an ebb and a flood of its forms; out of the simplest forms striving toward the most complex, out of the stillest, most rigid, coldest forms toward the hottest, most turbulent, most self-contradictory, and then again returning home to the simple out of this abundance, out of the play of contradictions back to the joy of concord, still affirming itself in this uniformity of its courses and its years, blessing itself as that which must return eternally, as a becoming that knows no satiety, no disgust, no weariness: this, my Dionysian world of the eternally self-creating, the eternally self-destroying, this mystery world of the twofold voluptuous delight, my “beyond good and evil,” without goal, unless the joy of the circle is itself a goal; without will, unless a ring feels good will toward itself—do you want a name for this world? A solution for all its riddles? A light for you, too, you best-concealed, strongest, most intrepid, most midnightly men?—This world is the will to power—and nothing besides! And you yourselves are also this will to power—and nothing besides! For Nietzsche’s argument see also section 55 above, as well as my Nietzsche, Chapter 11, section II, and my article on Nietzsche in the Encyclopedia of Philosophy, ed Paul Edwards, New York, 1967. A Note on This Edition For the present volume I enlisted as a collaborator R. J. Hollingdale, author of Nietzsche: The Man and His Philosophy (University of Louisiana Press, 1965). I made a new translation of Book I, and he furnished new translations of Books II, III, and IV, which I subsequently corrected and revised very extensively, after comparing them with the original German, sentence for sentence I am also responsible for the notes and the editorial apparatus—indeed, for the volume as a whole. W. K. VINTAGE BOOKS EDITION, September, 1968 © Copyright, 1967, by Walter Kaufmann eISBN:

978-0-307-43474-6 rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions Published in New York by Random House, Inc. acknowledgment is made to the Nationale Forschungs- und Gedenkstätten der Klassischen Deutschen Literatur in Weimar permission to reproduce eight facsimile pages from the original manuscript. v.1 for MARTHA LINDE 1881-1966 On the Editions of THE WILL TO POWER THE FIRST EDITION appeared in 1901 in volume XV of Nietzsche's Werke (in the so-called Grossoktav edition). The title page read N A C H G E L A S S E N E W E R K E. Der Wille zur Macht. Versuch einer Umwerthung aller Werthe. (Studien und Fragmente) VON Friedrich Nietzsche. LEIPZIG Druck und Verlag von C G Naumann The editors were Peter Gast, Ernst Horneffer, and August Horneffer. On the last page of her preface, Nietzsche's sister wrote: "But I emphasize expressly that I myself am not the editor of this volume but at most a collaborator in the most modest sense of that word. The only circumstance that permits me to write this preface is that the collected edition of my brother's works is published at my behest, and hence the heaviest part of the responsibility, with all its cares and fights, has been resting on my shoulders for many years now. This 15th volume is to be considered as the culmination of the perennial, troublesome, conscientious labors of the editors: Peter Gast, Ernst and August Horneffer ..."

483 sections (490 pages) plus 23 pages of Nietzsche's plans, and another 23 pages of editorial notes. The editors did not have time to do the job as they themselves felt it ought to be done, because Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche, as head of the Nietzsche-Archive, insisted that the volume be published in a hurry. There were recriminations between her and the brothers Horneffer, and they left the Archive. The second edition of 1906, in the so-called Taschen edition of the Werke (for the different editions of the works in German see the bibliography at the end of my translation of The Birth of Tragedy and The Case of Wagner in one volume, Vintage Books, New York 1967), followed roughly the same plan as the first edition but comprised 1,067 sections. Peter Gast checked all the material against Nietzsche's manuscripts, which he is said to have been able to decipher better than anyone else, and he seems to have had a fairly free hand in Books I and III. The reprint of 1911 (in vols. XV and XVI of the revised edition of the Grossoktav edition) follows the text of 1906, but Dr. Otto Weiss contributed an appendix of invaluable scholarly notes on the manuscripts. In the so-called Musarion edition (23 vols., 1920-29), published by the Musarion Verlag in Munich, the text of 1906 and 1911, which had been published by Kröner in Leipzig, is reprinted in vols. XVIII and XIX, but the apparatus differs in two important respects from the edition of 1911: on the basis of the information given by Dr. Weiss on p. 480 ff, a table is included that furnishes the approximate date of composition for every one of the 1,067 sections; and the editorial notes listing departures from the manuscripts are omitted. Indeed, these notes are found only in the edition of 1911, and the list of dates appears only in the Musarion edition. These two editions are therefore the most scholarly and helpful, that of 1911 being by far the best. No subsequent edition has made any important scholarly contribution. The editions of Bäumler, Würzbach, and Schlechta are discussed in the Editor's Introduction to the present edition, and the editorial notes contain many examples showing how Schlechta's edition is less faithful to the manuscripts than the edition of 1911, notwithstanding his explicit claims which have been widely taken on credit on both sides of the Atlantic. Finally, it may be noted that Bäumler's first edition of Der Wille zur Macht, in volume 78 of Kröners Taschen edition (1930) presented the work as one of Nietzsche's books: the title page mentions no editors. In the reprint in Sämtliche Werke in zwölf Bänden, 12 vols., Kröner, Stuttgart 1964-65, the text follows volume 78 with the same pagination, but the title page adds "Ausgewählt und geordnet von Peter Gast unter Mitwirkung von Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche" (selected and arranged by Peter Gast with the aid of Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche); and in a postscript (pp. 711-15) to his editorial afterword (pp. 699-711—a slightly revised version of the earlier afterword, though neither the publisher nor Bäumler calls attention to the fact that some changes have been made) Alfred Bäumler deals briefly with Karl Schlechta's and Erich Podach's criticisms of the editing of Nietzsche's Nachlass.

Chronology of Nietzsche's Works A much more comprehensive bibliography is included in my translation of The Birth of Tragedy and The Case of Wagner, New York, Vintage Books, 1967. Selections from the aphoristic books (1878-82) are included in The Portable Nietzsche, New York, The Viking Press, 1954, and in my edition of The Genealogy of Morals and Ecce Homo, New York, Vintage Books, 1967.

THE BIRTH OF TRAGEDY UNTIMELY MEDITATIONS David Strauss 1876 HUMAN, ALL-TOO-HUMAN THE DAWN THE GAY SCIENCE THUS SPOKE ZARATHUSTRA 1883-1892 Parts I and II published separately in 1883, Part III in 1884, forty copies of Part IV printed in 1885 (but only seven distributed among friends); first public ed. of Part IV, dated 1891 and published in 1892 Translation with commentary by Walter Kaufmann, 1954 (originally in The Portable Nietzsche). BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL ON THE GENEALOGY OF MORALS THE CASE OF WAGNER Translation with commentary by Walter Kaufmann, 1967. THE TWILIGHT OF THE IDOLS (written 1888) THE ANTICHRIST (written 1888) ECCE HOMO (written 1888) NIETZSCHE CONTRA WAGNER (written 1888) THE WILL TO POWER (Notes written 1883-1888) Hegel, G W F., itr.1, p.1, 2.1, 2.2, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 6.1, 7.1, 9.1; Hegelian, 4.3, 5.6 Heidegger, Martin, 2.1, 5.1 Heine, Heinrich, 2.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3 Helvétius, Claude Adrien Heraclitus, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4 Herbart herd, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 8.8, 8.9, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5; fold; herd animal, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.4, 4.8,

4.9, 5.1, 8.10, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 10.10; herd consciousness; herd ideal, 7.2, 8.11, 10.11; herd instinct, 2.4, 3.5, 3.6, 4.11, 4.12, 5.2, 6.1, 7.3, 8.12, 10.12, 10.13, 11.1, 11.2; herd man; herd standard; herd virtues, 2.5, 3.7, 4.14; mob Herder, Johann Gottfried, 4.1, 4.2, 9.1 heredity hermit Herrnhuter Hesse, Hermann higher type, 6.1, 7.1, 7.2. See also man, higher Hilton, James Hindus Hippocrates Hitler, Adolf Hoffmann, Ernst Theodor Amadeus Hollingdale, R. J. Homer, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 5.1, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2 honor, 8.1, 8.2, 10.1 Horace Horneffer, August, fm.1 Horneffer, Ernst, fm.1 hospitality Hugo, Victor, 2.1, 2.2, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 10.1 Hume, David, 2.1, 2.2, 6.1, 6.2 hunger, 2.1, 3.1, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 9.1 Ibsen, Henrik, itr.1, 2.1, 2.2, 8.1 ideal(ism), 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3; ideal drives; idealist, 4.1, 6.1, 7.1, 8.1, 10.1, 10.2; idealization ideas, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 9.1 identity, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8; principle of idiot, 3.1, 4.1, 5.1, 5.2, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2 images, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3 immoderate swine immoralist, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 4.1, 5.1, 8.1 imperatives, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 6.1, 8.1, 10.1. See also ought India, Indians, 1.1, 2.1, 3.1, 4.1, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3; Indian culture; Indian ideal indignation individual (ism), 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 8.1 (esp. 783-85), 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 11.1, 11.2; individualistic morality indulgence, blind inertia, 4.1, 4.2, 6.1 infinite Ingres, Jean Auguste Dominique innocence of becoming, 6.1, 8.1, 8.2 instinct(s), see passion(s) intellect, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3 intermediaries, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3 interpretation, p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 6.15, 6.16, 6.17, 6.18, 6.19, 6.20, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 9.2, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3. See also perspectivism intoxication, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 5.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 11.1 introspection, see inwardness “invented” inwardness, 4.1, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3 Ionians Isis isolation, see solitude Israel, 3.1, 4.1 Italy, 2.1, 10.1; Italians, 6.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3; music, 2.2, 9.4 Jaspers, Karl, 5.1, 10.1 Jesuitism, 8.1, 8.2, 12.1; Jesuit Order Jesus, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 3.13, 3.14, 3.15, 3.16, 3.17, 3.18, 3.19, 3.20, 3.21, 3.22, 3.23, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1; The Crucified, 11.2, 11.3; Founder of Christianity, 3.24, 4.6; “God on the Cross”, 3.25, 4.7 Jew(s), 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 3.13, 3.14, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3; Hebrews, 3.15, 4.4; Judaism, 3.16, 3.17, 3.18, 3.19, 3.20, 3.21, 3.22, 3.23, 3.24, 4.5, 9.3, 11.1. See also Semite(s) Job Juan, Don, 10.1. See also Mozart judgment(s), 1.1, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 7.2, 9.1 justice, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 5.1, 5.2, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2,

8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5; retributive Kafka, Franz Kant, Immanuel, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 5.9, 5.10, 5.11, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 7.1, 8.1, 10.1, 10.2; Kantian, 3.1, 4.7, 5.12 Keller, Gottfried Kierkegaard, Søren Klopstock, Friedrich Gottlieb knowledge, 1.1, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 6.1, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 9.1, 9.2; knowledge-in-itself. See also epistemology Kraftgejhl, 7.1 labor, division of, 2.1, 6.1, 8.1, 8.2 Lamartine, Alphonse Marie Louis de language, 2.1, 2.2, 4.1, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 12.1 l'art pour l'art La Rochefoucauld, Francois Duc de, 2.1, 4.1, 4.2, 8.1, 8.2, 10.1 Latuka law, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1, 12.1 See also penal law; legislator Lazzarone legislator (lawgiver), 8.1, 10.1, 10.2 Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhelm von, 2.1, 5.1, 5.2, 10.1 Leonardo da Vinci Leopardi, Giacomo Lesage, Alain René Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim levelling, 5.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4 Levy, Oscar lie(s), 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 9.1, 10.1, 11.1; liars life, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 4.14, 4.15, 4.16, 4.17, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 6.15, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4 Liszt Society Locke, John logic(al), 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 2.1, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 6.15, 6.16, 6.17, 6.18, 6.19, 6.20, 7.1, 7.2, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 10.1, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3; logicians; logicizing Lortzing, Gustav Albert Louis XIV love, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 5.1, 6.1, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 8.8, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4 Ludovici, Anthony M. Luther, Martin, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 8.1, 8.2 Machiavelli, Niccolo; Machiavellianism, 4.1, 8.1; Principe, 10.1 Magny, dîners chez, 2.1, 10.1 man, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 2.9, 2.10, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 4.14, 4.15, 4.16, 4.17, 4.18, 4.19, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 9.8, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.3a, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 10.10, 10.11, 10.12, 11.1, 11.2, 12.1; good man, 1.3, 2.11, 2.12, 2.13, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 4.20, 4.21, 4.22, 4.23, 4.24, 4.25, 4.26, 5.5, 8.2, 8.3, 10.13, 11.3, 11.4; great man, 4.27, 4.28, 5.6, 8.4, 10.14, 10.15, 10.16, 10.17, 10.18, 10.19, 10.20, 10.21, 10.22, 11.5; higher man, 3.13, 3.14, 4.29, 6.11, 6.12, 8.5, 9.9, 10.23, 10.24, 10.25, 10.26, 10.27, 10.28, 10.29, 10.30, 10.31, 11.6, 11.7; man of knowledge; "natural man"; noble man, 10.33; synthetic man, 10.35, 10.36, 10.37, 11.9, 11.10, 11.11 manners, bad; good Manu, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 8.1, 8.2 Manzoni, Alessandro Marcus Aurelius Mark, the evangelist marriage, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 6.1, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2 martyr Marx, Karl mask, 2.1, 4.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5 master(s), 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7; master race, 3.5, 3.6, 10.8, 10.9; mastery mathematics, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4 matter Matthew, the evangelist mean, 4.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4 meaning, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4 means, see ends mechanism, mechanics, mechanistic, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 8.1, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 12.1, 12.2 mediocrity, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 11.1, 12.1

Megarian school Melians memory, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3 Mendelssohn, Felix, 2.1, 9.1, 9.2 metaphysics, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 4.1, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 8.1, 9.1, 11.1; metaphysical need, 1.5, 6.9 Meyer, Michael Michelangelo Michelet, Jules Middle Ages, 8.1, 10.1 Mill, John Stuart, 1.1, 4.1, 8.1, 10.1, 10.2
Mirabeau, Victor de Riquetti, Marquis de miracles, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 4.1, 7.1, 10.1 Mitchell, Silas Weir, 3.1, 3.2 Mithras, 3.1, 3.2 Mittel modernity, 2.1, 2.2 See also European nihilism, p.1 modesty, danger in, 10.1, 10.2 Mohammed, 3.1, 10.1; Mohammedanism, 3.2, 3.3 monads, see atoms monarchy, 8.1, 8.2
monastery, see solitude Montaigne, Michel Eyquem de Montlosier, François Dominique de Reynaud, Comte de morality, p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 1.10, 1.11, 1.12, 1.13, 1.14, 1.15, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 2.9, 2.10, 2.11, 2.12, 2.13, 2.14, 2.15, 2.16, 2.17, 2.18, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 3.13, 3.14, 3.15, 4.1, 4.2, 3.16, 3.17, 3.18, 3.19, 3.20, 3.21, 3.22, 3.23, 3.24, 3.25, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 7.1, 7.2, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 8.8, 8.9, 8.10, 8.11, 8.12, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 9.8, 9.9, 9.10, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 10.10, 10.11, 10.12, 10.13, 10.14, 10.15, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5, 11.6, 11.7, 11.8, 11.9; individualistic, 4.5, 10.16; moral-metaphysical needs, see metaphysical need motion, movement, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6
Mozart, Wolfgang Amadeus, 2.1, 9.1; Don Giovanni, 2.2, 2.3, 10.1; The Magic Flute, 9.2 Musarion edition, fm.1, itr.1, itr.2, 5.1, 9.1, 11.1 music, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 9.8, 9.9, 9.10, 11.1; descriptive;
French, 2.6, 9.12, 9.13; grand style; modern; Viennese Napoleon I, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 4.1, 5.1, 6.1, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4;
Napoleonic movement, 5.2, 5.3 nationalism naturalist nature, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 2.9, 2.10, 2.11, 2.12, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 4.14, 4.15, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 11.1,

11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5 Nazi(s), itr.1, 10.1, 10.2 necessity, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 7.1, 7.2, 9.1, 12.1 Nero neurosis, nervous disorders, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 10.1; hysteric Newman, Ernest newspapers, 2.1, 10.1 New Testament, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10 Nietzsche Archive, fm.1 Nietzsche, Friedrich, The Antichrist, itr.1, 1.1, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 4.1, 5.1, 5.2, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 11.1; Beyond Good and Evil, itr.1 2.1, 2.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, Bk. III Pt. I n, 6.1, 6.2, 9.1, 9.2, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 10.10, 10.11, 10.12, 11.2, 11.3; The Birth of Tragedy, itr.1, 2.3, 5.6, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 11.4, 11.5; The Case of Wagner, itr.1, 2.4, 9.6, 9.7, 9.8; The Dawn, 1.2, 4.2, 4.3; Ecce Homo, itr.1, 2.5, 4.4, 9.9, 11.6, 11.7, 11.8; The Gay Science, 2.6, 4.5, 4.6, 9.10, 10.13, 10.14, 11.9, 11.10; Genealogy of Morals, itr.1, 3.8, 4.7, 10.15, 10.16; Human, All too Human, 10.17; Nietzsche Contra Wagner, itr.1, 9.11; Thus Spoke Zarathustra, itr.1, 1.3, 2.7, 2.8, 4.8, 5.7, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 7.1, 11.11, 11.12; Twilight of the Idols, itr.1, itr.2, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 2.9, 2.10, 2.11, 2.12, 2.13, 2.14, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 4.14, 4.15, 5.8, 5.9, 5.10, 5.11, 5.12, Bk. III Pt. I n, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 7.2, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 9.12, 9.13, 9.14, 10.18, 10.19, 10.20, 10.21, 11.13, 11.14 Nihilisierung nihilism, nihilistic, prf.1, p.1, 1.1, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 7.1, 9.1, 10.1, 11.1, 11.2, 12.1; nihilistic religion, 3.4, 4.3, 5.3, 7.2 Norway Novalis (pseud for Hardenberg, Friedrich von) nützliche "Scheinbarkeiten" obedience, 3.1, 4.1 object, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7 objectivity, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 8.1 Odysseus Offenbach, Jacques, 9.1, 9.2 Old Testament, 3.1, 8.1 Olympian; Olympic, p.1, 11.1; Olympus opinion, see belief opposites organic, 1.1, 4.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1; organic life, 7.1, 7.2; organic world; organism, 1.1, 1.2, 5.1, 6.2, 6.3, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1; pre-organic Orient Osiris ought, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3; "thou shalt". See also imperatives Overbeck, Franz overcoming, p.1, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 12.1 overman, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 11.1, 12.1. See also man oxen, 4.1, 4.2 pain, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 7.10, 7.11, 7.12, 7.13, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 9.1, 9.2 pantheism, p.1, 1.1 Papageno, 9.1. See also Mozart paralysis parasites Paris commune Parmenides, 5.1, 6.1 Pascal, Blaise, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 8.1, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1, 11.2; Pascalism, 3.5, 4.6, 10.3 passion(s), 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 4.14, 4.15, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 5.9, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3 patriotism, 8.1, 8.2 Paul, St., 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 4.1, 7.1 peaceful, 5.1, 10.1 penal law, 4.1, 5.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 11.1. See also law; justice perceptions, 6.1, 6.2 perfection, 1.1,

1.2, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 9.8, 9.9, 9.10, 9.11, 11.1, 11.2 Pericles, 5.1, 5.2, 8.1; Periclean age Perry, Ralph Barton Persian person(al)ity, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1 perspectivism, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4. See also interpretation pessimism, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 2.9, 2.10, 2.11, 2.12, 2.13, 2.14, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 10.1, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 12.1, 12.2; romantic Peter, St., 3.1, 3.2 Petronius, 3.1, 3.2 Pharisees phenomena(lism), 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9 philosopher, prf.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 11.1, 11.2, 12.1; artist-philosopher; Aryan philosophers; Parisian; solitary philosophy, p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 7.1, 7.2, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 10.1, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3; ancient, 4.10, 5.2; German, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5; modern; nihilistic; of right; Vedanta. See also Greek Pitti, Palazzo pity, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 6.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 11.1 Plato, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 5.9, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 8.1, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 11.1; Platonic; Platonism, 3.4, 6.3 pleasure, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 7.10, 7.11, 7.12, 7.13, 7.14, 7.15, 7.16, 7.17, 7.18, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 11.1, 11.2, 12.1, 12.2, 12.3 Plutarch Podach, Erich, itr.1, 1.1, 2.1, Appendix Poles Poe, E A, Appendix pope; papacy pose, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 11.1, 11.2; actor; dissimulation positivism, p.1, 2.1, 6.1 praise/blame, 2.1, 4.1, 7.1, 8.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5 preservation, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 12.1 priest, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 3.13, 3.14, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 5.1, 5.2, 8.1, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 11.1, 11.2 priest, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 3.13, 3.14, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 5.1, 5.2, 8.1, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 11.1, 11.2 procreation, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 11.1, 11.2 Procrustes' bed progress, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 2.9, 2.10, 2.11, 3.1, 6.1, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 8.1, 9.1, 11.1, 11.2 Prometheus, 9.1, 10.1 Protagoras, 5.1, 5.2 Protestantism, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1,

3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 8.1 providence prudence, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 6.1, 8.1, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5 Prussian officer corps, 8.1, 9.1 psychology, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1 punishment, p.1, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 10.1, 11.1, 11.2 purpose, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 2.1, 3.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 10.1, 10.2, 12.1, 12.2 Pyrrho, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5 Pythagoreans quality, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4 quantity race, 1.1, 1.2; race mixture rank, order of, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4 Ranke, Leopold von Raphael, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 11.1 reality, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 6.15, 6.16, 6.17, 6.18, 6.19, 6.20, 7.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6; in-itself reason, 4.1, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12 rebel, 8.1, 9.1, 10.1 rechtwinklig reciprocity, 10.1, 10.2 Reformation, 2.1, 4.1, 8.1 Regnard, Jean-François religion, religious, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 9.8, 9.9, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 12.1; of love; pagan remorse, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3. See also conscience Renaissance, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 5.1, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 10.1, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3; man, 10.2, 10.3 Renan, Joseph Ernest, 2.1, 2.2 repression resistance, 1.1, 3.1, 4.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 7.10, 8.1, 8.2, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 11.1 responsibility, 1.1, 1.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 6.1, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5 ressentiment, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 4.1, 4.2, 6.1, 8.1, 10.1, 11.1 revaluation of ancient values revenge, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1 reward, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 8.1, 8.2 Reynard the Fox, 3.1, 5.1 right (adj), 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 10.1, 10.2 right(s), 2.1, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 8.8, 8.9, 8.10, 8.11, 8.12, 8.13, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4 Rilke, Rainer Maria Romans, Rome, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 10.1, 10.2; Empire, 3.5, 3.6, 4.2; Rome, 2.2, 8.1 romanticism, p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 2.9, 2.10, 2.11, 2.12, 2.13, 3.1, 4.1, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 9.1, 10.1, 11.1; French; German Romulus, 2.1, 2.2 Ross, W. D Rousseau, Jean Jacques, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 2.9, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 8.1, 11.1, 11.2 Rubens, Peter Paul, 9.1, 9.2 rücksichtslose Rechtschaffenheit Russia, Russian(s), 3.1, 8.1, 8.2, 10.1, 10.2; pessimism Sabbath saint, p.1, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 8.1, 9.1, 10.1 Sainte-Beuve, Charles-Augustin de, 2.1, 5.1 salvation, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 3.13, 3.14, 3.15, 3.16, 3.17, 3.18, 4.1, 4.2,

4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 8.1, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2 Sand, George, 2.1, 2.2 Sartre, Jean-Paul Satan Saul (King) Savonarola scapegoat
 Schérer, E. H. A. Schiller, Friedrich, 2.1, 2.2, 4.1; Thekla, 2.1, 2.2 Schlechta, Karl, itr.1, itr.2, fm.1, 1.1, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 7.1, 7.2, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1, 11.2, Appendix scholar, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 9.1, 10.1 scholasticism school Schopenhauer, Arthur, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 6.1, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3; Schopenhauer as Educator; Schopenhauerian
 Schumann, Robert Schütz, Heinrich science, scientific, p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 5.9, 5.10, 5.11, 5.12, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 11.1, 12.1 Scott, Walter, 2.1, 9.1 selection, 3.1, 10.1, 11.1 self, 6.1, 7.1 self-esteem; self-respect vs. self-love. selfishness, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3 Semite(s), Semitic, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 5.1 See also anti-Semites; Jews
 Seneca sense impressions, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11 sense, inner, 6.1, 6.2 sex, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 6.1, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 10.1, 11.1, 11.2; Wagner's sexuality, Appendix Shakespeare, William, 2.1, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 11.1 Shelley, Percy Bysshe shepherd, 4.1, 4.2, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 11.1 sickness, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 1.10, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 3.13, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5, 11.6, 11.7 Simplicius sin,
 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 6.1, 8.1, 8.2; original, 4.10, 8.3 Sitte and Sittlichkeit, 4.1, 4.2 skepticism, p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 2.1, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 5.9, 5.10, 5.11, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1 slave(ry), 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 11.1 Slavs sobriety, see prudence socialism, socialist(s), p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 10.1, 11.1; Socialist Workers' Party society, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 7.2, 8.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8
 Socrates, 4.1, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 6.1 soldier and scholar solitude, 4.1, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 11.1 Sophist, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1 soul, 1.1,
 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 4.1, 4.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 7.1, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1 space, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 12.1, 12.2; Euclidean Spain, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3 species, 1.1, 1.2, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 10.1
 Spencer, Herbert, 1.1, 1.2, 4.1, 5.1, 6.1, 10.1, 10.2 Spengler, Oswald Spinoza, Baruch, 1.1, 2.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 6.1, 7.1, 7.2, 10.1, 12.1; Spinozism, p.
 1 spirit, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 2.9,

2.10, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5, 11.6, 12.1; “absolute pure spirit” “square”,
 2.1, 4.1 state, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 7.1, 8.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3; community Stendhal, see Beyle Stewart,
 H. F. Stifter, Adalbert Stöcker, Adolf, 2.1, 3.1 Stoic(al), 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 8.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3 Strauss, David Friedrich Strindberg, August strong, the,
 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 1.10, 1.11, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 2.9, 2.10, 2.11, 2.12, 2.13, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 4.14, 4.15, 4.16, 4.17, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 7.10, 7.11, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 8.8, 8.9, 8.10, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 10.10, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5, 11.6, 12.1, 12.2 subject, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13,
 6.14, 6.15 sublimation substance, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3 Sudras, 2.1, 2.2 suffering, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 7.1, 7.2, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5, 11.6 suffrage, universal, 4.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3 superman, see overman superstition, 3.1, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 7.2 Swedenborg, Emanuel sympathy, see pity Tacitus Tahiti Taine, Hippolyte Adolphe, 2.1, 5.1, 9.1, 9.2, 11.1 talent, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3 talion taming, see domestication Tartuffe, 1.1, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 10.1 teleology, 6.1, 6.2 Teresa, St terrible, 9.1, 9.2, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5, 11.6, 11.7; terrifying Tertullian Thekla (Schiller heroine), 2.1, 2.2 Thierry, Augustin, 4.1, 10.1 thing-in-itself, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 3.1, 4.1, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 7.1, 7.2, 9.1, 11.1, 11.2, 12.1 things, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12,
 6.13 thinking, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14,
 6.15 Thomson, William thought(s), 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13 Thucydides, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3 Tieck, Ludwig time, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6 Timon toleration Tolstoy, Leo Nikolaevich, 2.1, 5.1, 11.1 tradition tragedy, tragic, 1.1, 2.1, 3.1, 5.1, 6.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 10.1, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3 truth, p.
 1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 5.9, 5.10, 5.11, 5.12,
 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 6.15, and,
 6.16, 6.17, 6.18, 6.19, 6.20, 6.21, 6.22, 6.23, 6.24, 6.25, 6.26, 6.27, 6.28, 6.29,
 6.30, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3; a priori 5.1, 6.1, 10.1; Christian; truthfulness, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3 Turgenev, Ivan S ugliness, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 7.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7 Uhland,

Ludwig unconscious unity, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11
 Unschuld des Werdens utilitarianism, 2.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 8.1 utility, 1.1,
 1.2, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 10.10 Valhalla valuations, 3.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 8.8, 8.9, 9.1, 10.1 value(s), prf.1, p.1, 1.1, 2.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 9.8; physiological Varnhagen, Rahel, 9.1, 9.2 Vedanta, 3.1, 7.1, 11.1
 Venetian, 2.1, 2.2; taste Venus, 4.1, 8.1 Ver-Ichlichung, Ver-Aenderung Vernet, Horace Verri, Count verzeichnet Vesuvius Viennese music Vigny, Alfred de virtue, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 8.8, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 10.10, 10.11, 10.12, 10.13, 10.14, 10.15, 10.16, 10.17, 10.18, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4; herd virtues, 2.5, 3.10, 4.8
 Voltaire, Francois Marie Arouet de, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 3.1, 5.1, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2
 Wagner, Richard, p.1, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 9.8, 9.9, 9.10, 9.11, 9.12, 9.13, 9.14, 10.1, 11.1; The Flying Dutchman, 2.7;
 Lohengrin, 3.1; Nibelungen, p.1, 2.8; Parsifal, 2.9, 2.10, 4.1, 8.1; Tannhäuser, 4.2; Tristan und Isolde, 1.2; Wagnerian, 4.3, 9.15 See also Appendix Wallace, Alfred Russel war, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 11.1, 11.2; warlike weak, the, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 11.1, 11.2 Weiss, Otto, fm.1 welfare, 8.1, 10.1 Whitehead, Alfred North will, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 6.15, 6.16, 6.17, 6.18, 6.19, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 7.10, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 12.1, 12.2; will to power, passim Willens-Punktationen Winckelmann, Johann Joachim, 9.1, 9.2, 11.1 wissenschaftlicher Mensch, 5.1;
 Wissenschaftlichkeit Wittgenstein, Ludwig woman, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 9.8, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 11.1 world, p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 6.15, 6.16, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 10.1, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5, 11.6, 11.7, 11.8, 11.9, 12.1, 12.2, 12.3; another world, 1.8, 2.3, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 5.6, 6.17,

6.18, 11.10; apparent world, 1.9, 2.4, 3.9, 5.7, Bk. III Pt. I n, 6.19, 6.20, 6.21, 6.22, 6.23, 6.24, 6.25, 6.26, 6.27, 6.28, 6.29, 7.8, 8.2, 9.4 (see also appearance); inner world, 6.30, 6.31, 6.32; outer world, 6.33, 6.34, 6.35, 6.36, 6.37; true (real) world, 1.10, 1.11, 1.12, 1.13, 2.5, 3.10, 4.12, 5.8, 5.9, Bk. III Pt. In, 6.38, 6.39, 6.40, 6.41, 6.42, 6.43, 6.44, 6.45, 6.46, 6.47, 6.48, 6.49, 6.50, 7.9, 7.10, 8.3, 9.5; unknown world, 1.14, 6.51, 7.11 Würzbach, Friedrich Zarathustra Zeno, the founder of Stoicism Zola, Emile, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3 Zucht, Züchtung, Züchtigung zurückgetreten INDEX The German editors' arrangement of Nietzsche's notes is far from ideal, and their table of contents is apt to give the false impression that those interested in morality, for example, need to turn only to sections 253-405 Any systematic arrangement of these notes would leave much to be desired; but the Index should help to give readers a more adequate idea of the contents of this volume. Most of the work on this Index was done by Andrew Neal Sears in June, 1966, the month he graduated from Princeton University with high honors in philosophy He made use of the work already done by Stephen R Watson, and of a name index started some years ago by Stephen Brown, now M D. It is a pleasure to express my gratitude to all three of them, and also to Princeton's excellent program of undergraduate research assistantships I supervised the work and at various stages made hundreds of additions Academy action, 1.1, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 8.1, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8; man of Adam adiaphora aesthetic(s), 4.1, 5.1; state, 4.2, 9.1; taste affect, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 11.1, 11.2 See also passions afterlife, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 4.1 Alcuin the Anglo-Saxon Alexander the Great, 5.1, 8.1 Alfieri, Vittorio Allgeist Almanach de Gotha altruism, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3 ambition, 8.1, 8.2, 10.1 American(s), 3.1, 10.1 Amiel, Henri Frédéric amor fati anarchism, p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1 Anaxagoras, 5.1, 5.2 Anaximander, 5.1, 5.2 ancestors animality, 6.1, 11.1, 11.2 anti-Semites, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 4.1, 9.1, 10.1 Apollinian, 9.1, 9.2, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3 Apollo appearance(s), 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 6.15, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 8.1, 9.1, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3; logical Arab(s), 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 10.1; Arabic Aristippus aristocracy, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 11.1, 11.2 Aristophanes, 4.1, 11.1 Aristotle, 4.1, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 10.1, 11.1; Poetics, 9.4 art, artist(ic), p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 9.2,

10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 10.10, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5, 11.6 Aryan, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3 ascetic, 1.1, 11.1; asceticism, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4 Asia, 2.1, 3.1; Asiatic atavism atheist, 2.1, 3.1 Athens, 3.1, 3.2, 5.1, 8.1; Athenian atoms, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 8.1 Augustine, St, 2.1, 3.1, 6.1, 10.1 Austrians Babylon Bacon of Verulam, 3.1, 6.1, 9.1 Balzac, Honoré barbarian(ism), 5.1, 7.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 12.1 Baroque Baudelaire, Charles, 2.1, Appendix Bäumler, Alfred, itr. 1, itr.2 beast of prey, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1, 11.2 beauty, p.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 7.1, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 10.1, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3 becoming, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 5.2, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 9.1, 9.2, 12.1, 12.2, 12.3, 12.4, 12.5 Beecher-Stowe, Harriet Beethoven, Ludwig van, 2.1, 2.2, 9.1, 9.2, 11.1 being, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 6.15, 6.16, 6.17, 6.18, 6.19, 6.20, 6.21, 6.22, 6.23, 6.24, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 7.10, 7.11, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 9.1, 11.1, 12.1, 12.2 belief, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 4.1, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 6.15, 7.1, 7.2, 10.1 Bernard, Claude Besinnung Beyle, Henri, 2.1, 2.2, 6.1, 6.2, 9.1 beyond good and evil, 1.1, 2.1, 4.1, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 12.1 Bible, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 8.1 See also Old Testament; New Testament Biedermann Bismarck, Otto von, 2.1, 2.2, 10.1 Bizet, Georges, Carmen Björnson, Björnstjerne blame, see praise/blame body, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 6.15, 6.16, 6.17, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 8.1, 9.1, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5 Borgia, Cesare bourgeois, 2.1, 3.1, 10.1 Brahma Brahmins, 2.1, 3.1 Brahms, Johannes Brandes, Georg breeding, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 10.1, 10.2 Brosset, Président de Buckle, Henry Thomas Buddha, 1.1, 1.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3; Buddhism, Buddhistic, p. 1, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 3.13, 4.1, 6.1, 7.1, 9.1; Buddhists, 3.14, 3.15, 3.16, 5.1, 5.2; European, 1.6, 2.4 Bunyan, John Byron, Lord, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3 Caesar, Julius, 4.1, 6.1, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 10.1, 11.1 Caesar with Christ's soul, 10.1, 10.2 Cagliostro, Alessandro Caliph of Morocco Camus, Albert, itr.1, 3.1, 9.1 Caracalla Carlyle, Thomas, 1.1, 4.1, 5.1, 8.1, 10.1, 10.2 Carlylism castration, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2 catharsis, 9.1, 9.2 causalism, 2.1, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 7.1, 7.2, 11.1 causality, 1.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7 cause, p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 7.10, 7.11, 7.12; and effect, 1.4, 1.5, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 4.1, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 6.12, 6.13, 6.14, 6.15, 6.16, 6.17, 7.13, 7.14, 7.15, 7.16, 7.17, 7.18, 7.19, 7.20, 7.21, 12.1; will as certainty, 6.1, 6.2 Chamfort, Sébastien Roch Nicolas chance, 7.1, 7.2 chandala(s), 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4 change, see becoming

Charlemagne chastity Chateaubriand cheerfulness, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1 Chinese, China, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 8.1, 10.1; Chinadom choc, 7.1, 8.1
 Christianity, Christian(s), p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 1.8, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 2.8, 2.9, 2.10, 2.11, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 4.14, 4.15, 4.16, 4.17, 4.18, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5, 11.6, 11.7, 11.8, Appendix; pagan-Christian See also church church, 1.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 3.13, 3.14, 3.15, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 8.1, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1; Church Fathers Cicero Cimarosa, Domenico, Matrimonio Segreto Circe; Circe of philosophers civilization, 2.1, 2.2, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3 classical; style, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 11.1; taste, 3.3, 10.1 Columbus, Christopher commanders, see legislators communication, 6.1, 9.1 communist Comorro compassion, see pity Comte, August, 2.1, 2.2, 4.1, 6.1, 6.2, 10.1 concepts, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8
 Confucius Congo conscience, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 5.1, 5.2, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 11.1 conscious(ness), 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 8.1, 9.1, 11.1 contempt for what one loves Continentals, 8.1. See also Europe(ans) control, 4.1, 4.2, 10.1, 10.2 Copernicus, Nicholas, p.1; Copernican Corsican(s), 2.1, 3.1, 8.1, 10.1, 10.2 counterfeit(ing), 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 5.1, 5.2, 7.1, 7.2, 9.1, 9.2 Counter-Reformation Counter-Renaissance courage, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 4.1, 5.1, 5.2, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3 cowardice, error is criminal, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3 Crucified, the, versus Dionysus, 4.1, 11.1, 11.2 culture, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 7.1, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3 custom, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3 Damocles Dancourt, Florent Carton, Sieur d'Ancourt danger(ous), 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 10.10, 10.11, 10.12, 10.13, 10.14, 10.15, 10.16, 11.1, 12.1 Dante, Alighieri, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3; Divina Commedia Darwin, Charles, 2.1, 2.2, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3; Darwinism, 2.3, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 7.4; Darwinists, English and German David (King) death, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 10.1, 10.2 decadence, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 5.9, 5.10, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1
 Delacroix, Ferdinand Victor Eugène, 2.1, 2.2 democracy, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 3.1, 4.1, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6 Democritus, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5 Descartes, Renè, 2.1, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5 desires, see passion(s) determinism, 2.1, 3.1, 4.1, 6.1, 8.1 dialectic, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 11.1 Diaspora dichten Diogenes Dionysus, Dionysian, 3.1,

3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 11.1, especially, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4 disciples discipline, 10.1, 10.2 domestication, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 5.1, 7.1, 10.1, 10.2 Dostoevsky, Fyodor Mikhailovich, 2.1, 3.1, 5.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 9.1; Crime and Punishment, 8.5, 8.6 drives, see passion(s) Dühring, Eugen, 2.1, 8.1, 12.1 Edda education, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5 ego, 1.1, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 10.1 egoism, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 5.1, 5.2, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 10.1, 10.2; mass Egypt(ians), 3.1, 3.2, 5.1 Eichendorff, Joseph von Eliot, George Empedocles ends and/or means, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5 England; English, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 5.1, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 10.2; Englishman, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5 enlightenment, 2.1, 2.2, 10.1 environment, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 4.1, 7.1, 8.1, 10.1, 10.2 Epictetus Epicurus, 3.1, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 6.1, 10.1; “garden of”; Epicureanism, 3.1, 11.1; Epicureans epistemology, 2.1, 2.2, 4.1, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 5.9, 5.10, 5.11, 5.12, 5.13, 5.14, 5.15, 5.16, 5.17, 5.18, 6.1, 7.1, 11.1. See also knowledge equality, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 8.8, 8.9, 8.10, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 10.10, 10.11, 10.12, 11.1 erdichten error(s), p.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 7.1, 8.1; is cowardice Eschenbach, Wolfram von Eskimos eternal recurrence, El, 1.1, 5.1, 5.2, 6.1, 6.2, 11.1, 11.2, 12.1; Eternal Recurrence, The ethics, see morality eudaemonism, see happiness Europe(an)(s), prf.1, prf.2, p.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 5.1, 5.2, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 10.9, 10.10, 11.1, 12.1; nihilism, prf.1, prf.2, p.1, 2.1 evaluations, see valuations evil, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 4.14, 4.15, 4.16, 4.17, 4.18, 4.19, 4.20, 4.21, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 7.2, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5, 11.6 evolution, 1.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 8.1, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4 exception(al)s, 1.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 5.1, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 11.1, 11.2, exhaustion, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 2.1, 2.2, 3.4, 3.5, 4.8, 4.9, 9.3, 9.4, 10.8, 10.9, 11.3; the exhausted explanation extreme, seduction of fact, 2.1, 2.2, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11 faith, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 7.1, 8.1, 9.1, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1, 11.2 familiar family; family theory. See also marriage fasting fatalism; joyous Faust, see Goethe; Faustian feast Féré, Charles Ferney, Squire of, 2.1, 2.2. See also Voltaire Feuerbach, Ludwig Flaubert, Gustave, 2.1, 2.2, 9.1 Florence; Florentine taste Fontane, Theodor force, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 7.7, 7.8, 7.9, 7.10, 7.11, 7.12, 7.13, 7.14, 7.15, 7.16, 7.17, 7.18,

7.19, 7.20, 7.21, 7.22, 7.23, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 8.8, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 11.1, 12.1, 12.2, 12.3, 12.4 form, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6 Förster-Nietzsche, Elisabeth, fm.1, itr.1, itr.2, Appendix Fouillée, Alfred, 8.1, 8.2 France, French, E, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 4.1, 5.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 10.1; music, 2.8, 9.4, 9.5; Revolution, 2.9, 2.10, 2.11, 2.12, 3.1, 4.2, 10.2, 10.3 Francis of Assisi, St., 3.1, 4.1 Frederick the Great, King, 4.1, 4.2 Frederick II, Emperor Frederick III freedom, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 7.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 8.6, 8.7, 8.8, 8.9, 8.10, 8.11, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3 Freud, Sigmund, 4.1, 6.1 Friedländer, Paul Fromentin, Eugène Galiani, Abbé Ferdinand, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 10.1 Gast, Peter, fm.1, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 5.1, 6.1, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1 Gautier, Théophile, 2.1, 2.2, 9.1 Gavarni Geist genius, 1.1, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1, 7.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4; artistic German(s), Germany, E, 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 12.1; Reich, E, 4.3; Reichsdeutscher, 4.4; spirit, 2.8, 2.9, 2.10, 8.4; “un-German” Gewöhnung und Verwöhnung Gide, André, itr.1, 2.1, 2.2 Gluck, Christoph Willibald goal, 10.1. See also purpose God, p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 1.8, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 3.13, 3.14, 3.15, 3.16, 3.17, 3.18, 3.19, 3.20, 3.21, 3.22, 3.23, 3.24, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 4.14, 4.15, 4.16, 4.17, 4.18, 4.19, 4.20, 4.21, 4.22, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.10, 6.11, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5, 7.6, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5, 11.6, 11.7, 11.8, 12.1; kingdom of, 3.25, 3.26, 4.23; God is dead Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 2.5, 2.6, 2.7, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 5.1, 6.1, 6.2, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 9.7, 9.8, 10.1, 10.2, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4; Der Fischer, 9.9; Faust, 2.1, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 11.1; Gretchen Goncourts, Les Frères (Edmond and Jules), 2.1, 5.1, 9.1 good, p.1, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 4.9, 4.10, 4.11, 4.12, 4.13, 4.14, 4.15, 4.16, 4.17, 4.18, 4.19, 4.20, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.5a, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 5.9, 5.10, 5.11, 5.12, 5.13, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 7.1, 7.2, 8.1, 8.2, 9.1, 9.2, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5, 11.6, 11.7, 11.8, 11.9, 11.10 gratitude, 4.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 9.1, 11.1 Great Mother greatness, see man, great; greatness of character; of soul, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 11.1 Greek(s), Greece, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 2.4, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 8.1, 9.1, 9.2, 9.3, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3; Hellenism; philosophy, 2.1, 2.2, 3.1, 3.2, 4.1, 5.1, 5.2, 9.1 (see also philosophy—ancient); religion Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm Grossoktav edition, itr.1, fm.1 Grote, George guilt, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 5.1,

5.2, 6.1, 8.1, 11.1. See also sin; original sin Guyau, Jean-Marie, 4.1, 10.1 Hafiz (pseudo. for Shams ud-din Mohammed), 9.1, 11.1 Hamlet hammer, 2.1, 2.2, 10.1, 12.1, 12.2 Handel, George Frederic Hanswurst, 9.1, happiness, 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 3.13, 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 4.7, 4.8, 5.1, 5.2, 5.3, 5.4, 5.5, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 5.9, 5.10, 5.11, 5.12, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3, 8.4, 8.5, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 10.1, 10.2, 10.3, 10.4, 10.5, 10.6, 10.7, 10.8, 11.1, 11.2, 11.3, 11.4, 11.5 Härtle, Heinrich Hartmann, Eduard von, 2.1, 7.1, 8.1 Haydn, Franz Joseph Hebrews, 3.1, 4.1. See also Jews hedonism, 1.1, 3.1, 3.2, 5.1, 6.1, 8.1, 8.2, 8.3 Editor's Introduction 1

THE WILL TO POWER is a very famous and interesting book, but its stature and its reputation are two very different things. Indeed, the nature and contents of the book are as little known as its title is familiar. In a way this is odd because the book has been so widely cited and discussed; but in the history of ideas one finds perpetually that Hegel was right when he said in the preface to his first book: "What is well-known is not necessarily known merely because it is well-known." Two false views of The Will to Power have had their day, in turn. The first was propagated by Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche, the philosopher's sister, when she first published the book after his death: for a long time, it was widely held to represent Nietzsche's crowning systematic achievement, to which one had to turn for his final views. Alfred Bäumler began his postscript to the handy one-volume edition of the work (Kröner's Taschenausgabe, 1 vol. 78, 1930): "The Will to Power is Nietzsche's philosophical magnum opus. All the fundamental results of his thinking are brought together in this book. The aversion of its author against systematizers must not deter us from calling this work a system."

Philosophically, Bäumler was a nobody, but the editions of Nietzsche's works for which he wrote his postscripts were the most convenient and least expensive and read very widely. Being a Nazi, Bäumler was called to Berlin as professor of philosophy after Hitler came to power. His ideas about Nietzsche were accepted not only by large numbers of Germans but also by many of Nietzsche's detractors outside Germany. Ernest Newman, for example, admits in the fourth volume of his Life of Richard Wagner (1946) that his account of Nietzsche relies heavily on Bäumler's "masterly epitome of Nietzsche's thinking, Nietzsche, Der Philosoph und Politiker"² (p. 335). After World War II this view of The Will to Power was discredited along with the Nazis; and in the process the book itself was discredited, too. The gist of the new view was that The Will to Power is not worth reading at all. The man who has done more for this new myth than anyone else is Karl Schlechta, whose edition of Nietzsche's works in three thin-paper volumes (Werke in drei Bänden, 1954-1956) created something of an international sensation—particularly the third volume with its odd handling of The Will to Power and its lengthy "Philological Postscript." A passage from the postscript makes clear what is at stake: "The Will to Power contains nothing new, nothing that could surprise anyone who knows everything N published or intended to publish” (p. 1,403). This is as untenable as Bäumler’s view: the book contains a good deal that has no close parallel in the works Nietzsche finished; for example, but by no means only, much of the material on nihilism in Book I, some of the epistemological reflections in Book III, and the attempts at proofs of the doctrine of the eternal recurrence of the same events—and scores of brilliant formulations. But Schlechta’s express view matters much less than what he did to The Will to Power; and matters are further complicated by the fact that what he did and what he said he did are two different things. He did away with the systematic arrangement of the older editions and with the title The Will to Power and offered the material in his third volume under the heading “Aus dem Nachlass der Achtzigerjahre,” that is, “From the unpublished manuscript material of the eighties.” And he claimed that his arrangement was faithful to the manuscripts and chronological (manuskriptgetreu-chronologisch, p. 1,393), although in fact it is neither. This question cannot be avoided here because it would be unscholarly and perverse to reproduce the old systematic arrangement in this translation if a far superior arrangement of the material had been made available in 1956. But Schlechta’s arrangement is utterly pointless, and indeed explicable only as an over-reaction against the Bäumler view: it represents an attempt to render The Will to Power all but unreadable. Suppose, first of all, Schlechta’s arrangement did follow the manuscripts faithfully; even then it could not claim to be chronological. For as Schlechta himself notes in passing in his postscript (p. 1,396), Nietzsche had the habit of using over and over old notebooks that had not yet been completely filled, and of writing in them now from the front toward the back, now from the back toward the front; and sometimes he filled right-hand pages only, at other times left-hand pages only. And Erich Podach claims in Ein Blick in Notizbücher Nietzsche’s (“A Glance into Nietzsche’s Notebooks,” 1963) that “Nietzsche as a rule used his notebooks from back to front” (p. 8). Plainly, an arrangement that was really faithful to the manuscripts would not be an arrangement at all, but simply chaotic—and almost literally unreadable. Moreover, Podach shows in the same book (pp. 202-206) that Schlechta did not always follow the manuscripts (see my notes on sections 2 and 124 below). Nor did Schlechta merely fail to consult the manuscripts, using the printed text of the standard edition instead; he did not even make a point of consulting the twenty-odd pages of notes at the end of the 1911 edition where scores of departures from the manuscripts are registered. Even if it is granted that by taking these departures into account the present translation is philologically preferable to Schlechta’s edition, it may seem odd that the old systematic arrangement has been followed here once again. There are two reasons for this. First, for all its faults, this arrangement has the virtue of making it easy for the reader to locate passages and to read straight through a lot of notes dealing with art or religion or the theory of knowledge. Provided one realizes that one is perusing notes and not a carefully wrought systematic work, the advantages of such an arrangement outweigh the disadvantages. But would it not have been possible to improve the systematic arrangement? This brings us to the second reason for following the old editions: there is something drastically wrong with scholarly translations that are not based on, do not correspond to, and cannot be easily checked against any original. This translation should be useful to scholars and critics, philosophers and historians, professors and students; it should be possible to cite it and also to find in it passages cited by others; and it should be easy to compare the text with readily available German editions. To remind the reader of the difference, the approximate date of composition is furnished in brackets after the number of each note, and every attempt has been made to preserve the stylistic character of the original. The temptation to complete sentences, spruce up the punctuation, and turn jottings into attractive epigrams has been resisted with a will.³ And in my notes I have called attention to passages in Nietzsche's late books in which some of these notes have been put to use—sometimes almost literally, but often with an interesting and perhaps unexpected twist. And in some notes I offer cross references to other passages in which Nietzsche takes a different tack. A generation ago, many readers might have felt that if this book did not offer Nietzsche's final system, it could surely be ignored. But now that people have become used to reading the notebooks of Gide, Kafka, and Camus, for example, without taking them for anything but what they are, there is no need to downgrade Nietzsche's notes because they are mere notes. Of course, the reason he did not use some of them in his later works, although he could have included a lot of them quite easily in a chapter of aphorisms in Twilight of the Idols, was that many of them did not altogether satisfy him. Whether he used or did not use them, these notes obviously do not represent his final views: in his last active year, 1888, he completed five books; during the immediately preceding two years, another two. So we clearly need not turn to his notes to find what he really thought in the end. But it is fascinating to look, as it were, into the workshop of a great thinker; and Nietzsche's notes need not fear comparison with the notes of other great writers. On the contrary. In 1901, the year after Nietzsche's death, his sister published her first version of The Will to Power in volume 15 of her edition of his collected works, arranging 483 notes under topical headings. In 1904 she included 200 pages of additional notes "from The Will to Power" in the last volume of her biography of Nietzsche, to help its sales. And in 1906 another edition of the collected works offered a new version of The Will to Power in two volumes: the new material was mixed in with the old, and the total number of notes now came to 1,067. In the so-called Grossoktav edition of Nietzsche's Werke the same 1,067 notes appear in volumes 15 and 16, and volume 16 (1911) also features an appendix which contains “uncertain aphorisms and variants,” numbered 1,068 through 1,079; “plans, dispositions, drafts” (pp. 413-67); a postscript (pp. 471-80); a list furnishing the numbers of the notebooks in which each of the notes and drafts was found; and notes indicating small departures from the manuscripts. I have made abundant use of these notes in the pages that follow, sometimes citing the volume in which they are found as “1911.”⁴ For these notes were not reprinted in the otherwise superior Musarion edition of Nietzsche’s Werke, in which The Will to Power comprises volumes 18 and 19. The other material found in 1911 is offered in that edition, too, except that the list of the notebooks is superseded by a list giving the approximate date of composition of each of the 1,067 notes. The dates given in the following pages in brackets, immediately after the number of each note, are taken from that list. The handiest edition of the work is probably the one-volume edition in Kröner’s Taschen edition, volume 78, published in 1930 with Alfred Bäumler’s postscript (discussed above). Kröner has seen fit to reprint these Nietzsche editions, complete with Bäumler’s postscripts. On close examination, however, it appears that some changes have been made in Bäumler’s remarks about The Will to Power, although this is not indicated anywhere. This edition contains none of the scholarly apparatus. In 1940 Friedrich Würzbach published his own rearrangement of the notes of The Will to Power, under the title “The Legacy of Friedrich Nietzsche: Attempt at a new interpretation of all that happens and a revaluation of all values, from the unpublished manuscript material and arranged in accordance with Nietzsche’s intentions.”⁵ The claim that these notes rather than the books Nietzsche finished represent his legacy is as untenable as the boast that this—or any—arrangement can claim the sanction of Nietzsche’s own intentions. The bulk of Würzbach’s material was taken from The Will to Power, but he also included some other notes (all of them previously published in the Grossoktav edition and the Musarion edition), and he amalgamated notes of all periods, from 1870 to 1888. On pages 683-97 he furnished the dates, but he nowhere indicated the numbers of the notes in the standard edition of The Will to Power. This edition was translated into French but has won no acceptance in Germany or among scholars elsewhere. What needs to be said about the standard arrangement followed in the present translation I said in my Nietzsche in 1950: “To arrange the material, Frau Förster-Nietzsche chose a four-line draft left by her brother, and distributed the notes under its four headings. Nietzsche himself had discarded this draft, and there are a dozen later ones, about twenty-five in all; but none of these were briefer than this one which listed only the titles of the four projected parts and thus gave the editor the greatest possible freedom. (It was also the only draft which suggested “Zucht und Züchtung” as the title of Part IV, and Frau Förster-Nietzsche may have been charmed by these words, although her brother, as we shall see, did not consider ‘breeding’ a function of race.) His own attempt to distribute some of his notes

among the four parts of a later and more detailed plan was ignored, as was the fact that Nietzsche had abandoned the entire project of The Will to Power in 1888.... Moreover, the Antichrist, however provocative, represents a more single-minded and sustained inquiry than any of Nietzsche's other books and thus suggests that the major work of which it constitutes Part I [or at least was for a while intended to form Part I] was not meant to consist of that maze of incoherent, if extremely interesting, observations which have since been represented as his crowning achievement. While he intended to use some of this material, he evidently meant to mold it into a coherent and continuous whole; and the manner in which he utilized his notes in his other finished books makes it clear that many notes would have been given an entirely new and unexpected meaning. "The publication of The Will to Power as Nietzsche's final and systematic work blurred the distinction between his works and his notes and created the false impression that the aphorisms in his books are of a kind with these disjointed jottings. Ever since, The Will to Power, rather than the Götzen-Dämmerung [Twilight of the Idols], Antichrist, and Ecce Homo, has been searched for Nietzsche's final position; and those who find it strangely incoherent are led to conclude that the same must be true a fortiori of his parva opera. "The two most common forms of the Nietzsche legend can thus be traced back to his sister. In the manner just indicated, she unwittingly laid the foundation for the myth that Nietzsche's thought is hopelessly incoherent, ambiguous, and self-contradictory; and by bringing to her interpretation of her brother's work the heritage of her late husband [a prominent anti-Semite whose ideology Nietzsche had excoriated on many occasions], she prepared the way for the belief that Nietzsche was a proto-Nazi" (Prologue, section I). Four years later, in 1954, when I published The Portable Nietzsche and presented four complete works as well as selections from Nietzsche's other books, notes, and letters, all arranged in chronological order, I included a few notes from The Will to Power under such headings as "NOTES (1887)" with footnotes reading: "Published as part of The Will to Power by Nietzsche's executors." Schlechta's edition of 1956 thus did not require me to change my mind about The Will to Power. But it may seem odd that in the light of my own estimate of The Will to Power I should have decided to publish a translation. The explanation is simple. Nietzsche's late works had to be made available first of all. Toward that end I made entirely new translations of Thus Spoke Zarathustra, Twilight of the Idols, The Antichrist, and Nietzsche contra Wagner (all included in The Portable Nietzsche), and more recently of Beyond Good and Evil (with commentary, 1966), The Birth of Tragedy and The Case of Wagner (with commentary, 1967), and Ecce Homo (1967). And I collaborated on a new translation of the Genealogy of Morals (1967). Beginning with Zarathustra, then, all of Nietzsche's later works will be available in new translations. At that point The Will to Power should be made accessible, too, for those who cannot read these notes in the original German. To be sure, there is an old translation, done by Anthony M. Ludovici for The Complete Works of Friedrich Nietzsche, edited by Dr. Oscar Levy. Originally published in 1914, the two volumes of The Will to Power were “revised afresh by their translator” for the edition of 1924, and reprinted without further revision in 1964. Dr. Levy was probably quite right when in a prefatory note he called Ludovici “the most gifted and conscientious of my collaborators,” but unfortunately this does not mean that Ludovici’s translations are roughly reliable. Even in the revised version, the heading of section 12, for example, refers to “Cosmopolitan Values” instead of “Cosmological Values.” Let us say that Ludovici was not a philosopher, and let it go at that. It would be pointless to multiply editorial notes in order to catalogue his mistranslations. But as long as we shall never mention him in the notes, one other example may be permissible. Section 86 begins: “Your Henrik Ibsen has become very clear to me.” Evidently confusing deutlich (clear) and deutsch, Ludovici renders this: “In my opinion, Henrik Ibsen has become very German.” Nietzsche loved brevity to the point of ellipsis and often attached exceptional weight to the nuances of the words he did put down. Without an ear for the subtlest connotations of his brilliant, sparkling German, one is bound to misunderstand him. Nietzsche is Germany’s greatest prose stylist, and his language is a delight at every turn like a poet’s—more than that of all but the very greatest poets. At the same time Nietzsche deals with intricate philosophical questions, especially but not only in The Will to Power, and whoever lacks either a feeling for poetry or some knowledge of these problems and their terminology is sure to come to grief in trying to fathom Nietzsche, sentence for sentence, as a translator must. Yet Nietzsche’s writings have an appeal that those of most other philosophers—and of all other German philosophers—lack. People turn to him for striking epigrams and brilliant formulations; they remember phrases out of context; indeed, he is more often than not read out of context—casually, carelessly, as if the details did not matter. If one turns to translations—whether the old ones of The Complete Works or the more recent paperback versions that flaunt their modernity—one usually falls victim to translators who have read him that way. In addition to all this, Nietzsche writes as a “good European” (his coinage), alluding freely to Greek and Roman, French, Italian, and German literature and history, and he uses foreign phrases when they have nuances that might easily be lost in German. If we simply rendered all such phrases into English, not only subtle shades of meaning would be lost but—ininitely more important—something of this European flavor. If we simply left them all in the original, most students would be stumped by them; hence I have offered English translations in footnotes, with apologies to those who do not need them. Occasionally, no English equivalents are offered because the meaning seems so obvious, usually because the words are almost the same in English. Similarly, some of the men referred to are identified in notes. In all such matters compromises seem unavoidable: to identify all would be insufferable, to identify none would leave even some scholars baffled, and no mean could answer every student's needs without at the same time striking some others as superfluous. Precisely the same consideration applies to all other notes. Listing all parallel passages at every point would swell the editorial notes beyond all reason: after all, there are many indices to Nietzsche's collected works (three different ones by Richard Oehler—for the Grossoktav edition, the Musarion edition, and Kröner's Taschen edition—and one by Karl Schlechta for his edition, as well as one in English for The Collected Works), and my recent translations furnish indices for individual works. Moreover, cross references and indices always do harm as well as good, especially in Nietzsche's case: there is no substitute for reading his main works straight through, giving attention to the movement of his thought and to the context in which various things are said. But if no passages were cited in which Nietzsche put to use the notes his sister published posthumously in The Will to Power, the following pages would be as misleading as all previous editions, English and German. As it is, this translation offers a great deal of information not to be found in any German edition, though it owes a great deal to the editorial apparatus of the Grossoktav edition and a little to that of the Musarion edition. It should facilitate a better understanding of Nietzsche, of the nineteenth century, and perhaps also of some of the problems with which he dealt—and therefore of the twentieth century, too. Fall of 1885 THE WILL TO POWER A book for thinking, nothing else: it belongs to those for whom thinking is a delight, nothing else— That it is written in German is untimely, to say the least: I wish I had written it in French so that it might not appear to be a confirmation of the aspirations of the German Reich. The Germans of today are no thinkers any longer: something else delights and impresses them. The will to power as a principle might be intelligible to them. It is precisely among the Germans today that people think less than anywhere else. But who knows? In two generations one will no longer require the sacrifice involved in any nationalistic squandering of power and in becoming stupid. (Formerly I wished I had not written my Zarathustra in German.) 2 "The Philosopher and Politician [sic]," published in 1931. BOOK ONE EUROPEAN NIHILISM 1 (1885-1886) Toward an Outline Nihilism stands at the door: whence comes this uncanniest of all guests? Point of departure: it is an error to consider "social distress" or "physiological degeneration" or, worse, corruption, as the cause of nihilism. Ours is the most decent and compassionate age. Distress, whether of the soul, body, or intellect, cannot of itself give birth to nihilism (i.e., the radical repudiation of value, meaning, and desirability). Such distress always permits a variety of interpretations. Rather: it is in one particular interpretation, the Christian-moral one, that nihilism is rooted. The end of Christianity—at the hands of its own morality (which cannot be replaced), which turns against the Christian God (the sense of truthfulness, developed highly by Christianity, is nauseated by the falseness and mendaciousness of all Christian interpretations of the world and of history; rebound from “God is truth” to the fanatical faith “All is false”; Buddhism of action—). Skepticism regarding morality is what is decisive. The end of the moral interpretation of the world, which no longer has any sanction after it has tried to escape into some beyond, leads to nihilism. “Everything lacks meaning” (the untenability of one interpretation of the world, upon which a tremendous amount of energy has been lavished, awakens the suspicion that all interpretations of the world are false). Buddhistic tendency, yearning for Nothing. (Indian Buddhism is not the culmination of a thoroughly moralistic development; its nihilism is therefore full of morality that is not overcome: existence as punishment, existence construed as error, error thus as a punishment—a moral valuation.) Philosophical attempts to overcome the “moral God” (Hegel, pantheism). Overcoming popular ideals: the sage; the saint; the poet. The antagonism of “true” and “beautiful” and “good”—Against “meaninglessness” on the one hand, against moral value judgments on the other: to what extent has all science and philosophy so far been influenced by moral judgments? and won’t this net us the hostility of science? Or an antiscientific mentality? Critique of Spinozism. Residues of Christian value judgments are found everywhere in socialistic and positivistic systems. A critique of Christian morality is still lacking. The nihilistic consequences of contemporary natural science (together with its attempts to escape into some beyond). The industry of its pursuit eventually leads to self-disintegration, opposition, an antiscientific mentality. Since Copernicus man has been rolling from the center toward X.* The nihilistic consequences of the ways of thinking in politics and economics, where all “principles” are practically histrionic: the air of mediocrity, wretchedness, dishonesty, etc. Nationalism. Anarchism, etc. Punishment. The redeeming class and human being are lacking—the justifiers—The nihilistic consequences of historiography and of the “practical historians,” i.e., the romantics. The position of art: its position in the modern world absolutely lacking in originality. Its decline into gloom. Goethe’s allegedly Olympian stance. Art and the preparation of nihilism: romanticism (the conclusion of Wagner’s Nibelungen). * Cf. Genealogy of Morals, third essay, section 25. BOOK TWO CRITIQUE OF THE HIGHEST VALUES HITHERTO BOOK THREE PRINCIPLES OF A NEW EVALUATION BOOK FOUR DISCIPLINE AND BREEDING* * Zucht und Züchtung: See my note on section 980 below; also sections 398, 462, 862, 1053; Beyond, sections 225 and 262; and the last three pages of Chapter 10 of my Nietzsche. Very few of Nietzsche’s notes deal with “breeding,” and the contents of Book IV therefore bear little relation to this title. The same consideration applies to the second part of Book IV:

“Dionysus” Nietzsche’s sister might have chosen a later draft instead of this one, of March 17, 1887, which put down Zucht und Züchtung as the title of Book IV (this draft consists only of the four book titles, and does not include any subdivisions). But most of the other drafts, being more detailed, would have posed even greater problems. PREFACE (Nov. 1887-March 1888) CONTENTS Neither the table of contents nor the headings in the text are Nietzsche’s; both were introduced by the German editors to create the impression of a major systematic work. They are retained here with minor modifications to assist those who want to locate notes discussing particular problems. See also the comprehensive index, made especially for this edition. Cover Title Page Copyright Dedication EDITOR’S INTRODUCTION Acknowledgments ON THE EDITIONS OF The Will to Power CHRONOLOGY OF NIETZSCHE’S WORKS FACSIMILES from Nietzsche’s manuscript NIETZSCHE’S PREFACE BOOK ONE. EUROPEAN NIHILISM I. Nihilism II. History of European Nihilism BOOK TWO. CRITIQUE OF THE HIGHEST VALUES HITHERTO I. Critique of Religion II. Critique of Morality A. Critique of Ideals B. Critique of the “Good Man,” the Saint, etc. C. Disparagement of the So-Called Evil Qualities D. Critique of the Words: Improvement, Perfecting, Elevation III. Critique of Philosophy BOOK THREE. PRINCIPLES OF A NEW EVALUATION I. The Will to Power as Knowledge II. The Will to Power in Nature A. The Organic Process B. Man III. The Will to Power as Society and Individual IV. The Will to Power as Art BOOK FOUR. DISCIPLINE AND BREEDING I. Order of Rank II. Dionysus III. The Eternal Recurrence APPENDIX: Commentary on the FACSIMILES INDEX About the Author