every mountain for fatherlands and motherlands. But nowhere have I found a home; I am unsettled in every city and I depart from every gate. The men of the present, to whom my heart once drove me, are strange to me and a mockery; and I have been driven from fatherlands and motherlands. So now I love only my children's land, the undiscovered land in the furthest sea: I bid my sails seek it and seek it. I will make amends to my children for being the child of my fathers: and to all the future – for this present! Thus spoke Zarathustra. Of Immaculate Perception W HEN the moon rose yesterday I thought it was about to give birth to a sun, it lay on the horizon so broad and pregnant. But it was a liar with its pregnancy; and I will sooner believe in the man in the moon than in the woman. To be sure, he is not much of a man, either, this timid night-reveller. Truly, he travels over the roofs with a bad conscience. For he is lustful and jealous, the monk in the moon, lustful for the earth and for all the joys of lovers. No, I do not like him, this tomcat on the roofs! All who slink around half-closed windows are repugnant to me! Piously and silently he walks along on star-carpet: but I do not like soft-stepping feet on which not even a spur jingles. Every honest man's step speaks out: but the cat steals along over the ground. Behold, the moon comes along catlike and without honesty. This parable I speak to you sentimental hypocrites, to you of 'pure knowledge'! I call you – lustful! You too love the earth and the earthly: I have divined you well! – but shame and bad conscience is in your love – you are like the moon! Your spirit has been persuaded to contempt of the earthly, but your entrails have not: these, however, are the strongest part of you! And now your spirit is ashamed that it must do the will of your entrails and follows by-ways and lying-ways to avoid its own shame. 'For me, the highest thing would be to gaze at life without desire and not, as a dog does, with tongue hanging out' – thus speaks your mendacious spirit to itself: 'To be happy in gazing, with benumbed will, without the grasping and greed of egotism – cold and ashen in body but with intoxicated moon-eyes! 'For me, the dearest thing would be to love the earth as the moon loves it, and to touch its beauty with the eyes alone' -thus the seduced one seduces himself. 'And let this be called by me immaculate perception of all things: that I desire nothing of things, except that I may lie down before them like a mirror with a hundred eyes.' Oh, you sentimental hypocrites, you lustful men! You lack innocence in desire: and therefore you now slander desiring! Truly, you do not love the earth as creators, begetters, men joyful at entering upon a new existence! Where is innocence? Where there is will to begetting. And for me, he who wants to create beyond himself has the purest will. Where is beauty? Where I have to will with all my will; where I want to love and perish, that an image may not remain merely an image. Loving and perishing: these have gone together from eternity. Will to love: that means to be willing to die, too. Thus I speak to you cowards! But now your emasculated leering wants to be called 'contemplation'! And that which lets cowardly eyes touch it shall be christened 'beautiful'! Oh, you befoulers of noble names! But it shall be your curse, you immaculate men, you of pure knowledge, that you will never bring forth, even if you lie broad and pregnant on the horizon! Truly, you fill your mouths with noble words: and are we supposed to believe that your hearts are overflowing, you habitual liars? But my words are poor, despised, halting words: I am glad to take what falls from the table at your feast. Yet with them I can still – tell the truth to hypocrites! Yes, my fish-bones, shells, and prickly leaves shall – tickle hypocrites' noses! There is always bad air around you and around your feasts: for your lustful thoughts, your lies and secrets are in the air! Only dare to believe in yourselves – in yourselves and in your entrails! He who does not believe in himself always lies. You have put on the mask of a god, you 'pure': your dreadful coiling snake has crawled into the mask of a god. Truly, you are deceivers, you 'contemplative'! Even Zarathustra was once the fool of your divine veneer; he did not guess at the serpent-coil with which it was filled. Once I thought I saw a god's soul at play in your play, you of pure knowledge! Once I thought there was no better art than your arts! Distance concealed from me the serpent-filth, and the evil odour, and that a lizard's cunning was prowling lustfully around. But I approached you: then day dawned for me – and now it dawns for you – the moon's love affair had come to an end! Just look! There it stands, pale and detected – before the dawn! For already it is coming, the glowing sun – its love of the earth is coming! All sun-love is innocence and creative desire! Just look how it comes impatiently over the sea! Do you not feel the thirst and the hot breath of its love? It wants to suck at the sea and drink the sea's depths up to its height: now the sea's desire rises with a thousand breasts. It wants to be kissed and sucked by the sun's thirst; it wants to become air and height and light's footpath and light itself! Truly, like the sun do I love life and all deep seas. And this I call knowledge: all that is deep shall rise up – to my height! Thus spoke Zarathustra. Of Scholars A S I lay asleep, a sheep ate at the ivy-wreath upon my head – ate and said: 'Zarathustra is no longer a scholar.' It spoke and went away stiffly and proud. A child told me of it. I like to lie here where children play, beside the broken wall, among thistles and red poppies. To children I am still a scholar, and to thistles and red poppies, too. They are innocent, even in their wickedness. But to the sheep I am no longer a scholar: thus my fate will have it – blessed be my fate! For this is the truth: I have left the house of scholars and slammed the door behind me. Too long did my soul sit hungry at their table; I have not been schooled, as they have, to crack knowledge as one cracks nuts. I love freedom and the air over fresh soil; I would sleep on ox-skins rather than on their dignities and respectabilities. I am too hot and scorched by my own thought: it is often about to take my breath away. Then I have to get into the open air and away from all dusty rooms. But they sit cool in the cool shade: they want to be mere spectators in everything and they take care not to sit where the sun burns upon the steps. Like those who stand in the street and stare at the people passing by, so they too wait and stare at thoughts that others have thought. If one takes hold of them, they involuntarily raise a dust like sacks of flour; but who could guess that their dust derived from corn and from the golden joy of summer fields? When they give themselves out as wise, their little sayings and truths make me shiver: their wisdom often smells as if it came from the swamp: and indeed, I have heard the frog croak in it! They are clever, they have cunning fingers: what is my simplicity compared with their diversity? Their fingers understand all threading and knitting and weaving: thus they weave the stockings of the spirit! They are excellent clocks: only be careful to wind them up properly! Then they tell the hour without error and make a modest noise in doing so. They work like mills and rammers: just throw seed-corn into them! – they know how to grind corn small and make white dust of it. They keep a sharp eye upon one another and do not trust one another as well as they might. Inventive in small slynesses, they lie in wait for those whose wills go upon lame feet – they lie in wait like spiders. I have seen how carefully they prepare their poisons; they always put on protective gloves. They also know how to play with loaded dice; and I found them playing so zealously that they were sweating. We are strangers to one another, and their virtues are even more opposed to my taste than are their falsehoods and loaded dice. And when I lived among them I lived above them. They grew angry with me for that. They did not want to know that someone was walking over their heads; and so they put wood and dirt and rubbish between their heads and me. Thus they muffled the sound of my steps: and from then on the most scholarly heard me the worst. They put all the faults and weaknesses of mankind between themselves and me – they call this a ‘false flooring’ in their houses. But I walk above their heads with my thoughts in spite of that; and even if I should walk upon my own faults, I should still be above them and their heads. For men are not equal: thus speaks justice. And what I desire they may not desire! Thus spoke Zarathustra. Of Poets ‘S INCE I have known the body better,’ said Zarathustra to one of his disciples, ‘the spirit has been only figuratively spirit to me; and all that is “intransitory” – that too has been only an “image”’. 19 ‘I heard you say that once before,’ answered the disciple; ‘and then you added: “But the poets lie too much.” Why did you say that the poets lie too much?’ ‘Why?’ said Zarathustra. ‘You ask why? I am not one of those who may be questioned about their Why. ‘Do my experiences date from yesterday? It is a long time since I experienced the reasons for my opinions. ‘Should I not have to be a barrel of memory, if I wanted to carry my reasons, too, about with me? ‘It is already too much for me to retain even my opinions; and many a bird has flown away. ‘And now and then I find in my dove-cote an immigrant creature which is strange to me and which trembles when I lay my hand upon it. ‘Yet what did Zarathustra once say to you? That the poets lie too much? – But Zarathustra too is a poet. ‘Do you now believe that he spoke the truth? Why do you believe it?’ The disciple answered: ‘I believe in Zarathustra.’ But Zarathustra shook his head and smiled. Belief does not make me blessed (he said), least of all belief in myself. But granted that someone has said in all seriousness that the poets lie too much: he is right – we do lie too much. We know too little and are bad learners: so we have to lie. And which of us poets has not adulterated his wine? Many a poisonous hotch-potch has been produced in our cellars, many an indescribable thing has been done there. And because we know little, the poor in spirit delight our hearts, especially when they are young women. And we desire even those things the old women tell one another in the evening. We call that the eternal-womanly in us. And we believe in the people and its ‘wisdom’ as if there were a special secret entrance to knowledge which is blocked to him who has learned anything. But all poets believe this: that he who, lying in the grass or in lonely bowers, pricks up his ears, catches a little of the things that are between heaven and earth. And if they experience tender emotions, the poets always think that nature herself is in love with them: And that she creeps up to their ears, to speak secrets and amorous flattering words into them: of this they boast and pride themselves before all mortals! Alas, there are so many things between heaven and earth of which only the poets have let themselves dream! And especially above heaven: for all gods are poets’ images, poets’ surreptitiousness! Truly, it draws us ever upward – that is, to cloudland: we set our motley puppets on the clouds and then call them gods and supermen. And are they not light enough for these insubstantial seats? – all these gods and supermen. Alas, how weary I am of all the unattainable that is supposed to be reality. Alas, how weary I am of the poets! When Zarathustra had spoken thus, his disciple was angry with him, but kept silent. And Zarathustra, too, kept silent; and his eye had turned within him as if it were gazing into the far distance. At length he sighed and drew a breath. I am of today and of the has-been (he said then); but there is something in me that is of tomorrow and of the day-after-tomorrow and of the shall-be. I have grown weary of the poets, the old and the new: they all seem to me superficial and shallow seas. They have not thought deeply enough: therefore their feeling – has not plumbed the depths. A little voluptuousness and a little tedium: that is all their best ideas have ever amounted to. All their harp-jangling is to me so much coughing and puffing of phantoms; what have they ever known of the ardour of tones! They are not clean enough for me, either: they all disturb their waters so that they may seem deep. And in that way they would like to show themselves reconcilers: but to me they remain mediators and meddlers, and mediocre and unclean men! Ah, indeed I cast my net into their sea and hoped to catch fine fish; but I always drew out an old god’s head. Thus the sea gave a stone to the hungry man. And they themselves may well originate from the sea. To be sure, one finds pearls in them: then they themselves are all the more like hard shell-fish. And instead of the soul I often found in them salty slime. They learned vanity, too, from the sea: is the sea not the peacock of peacocks? It unfurls its tail even before the ugliest of buffaloes, it never wearies of its lace-fan of silver and satin. The buffalo looks on insolently, his soul like the sand, yet more like the thicket, but most like the swamp. What are beauty and sea and peacock-ornaments to him? I speak this parable to the poets. Truly, their spirit itself is the peacock of peacocks and a sea of vanity! The poet's spirit wants spectators, even if they are only buffaloes! But I have grown weary of this spirit: and I see the day coming when it will grow weary of itself. Already I have seen the poets transformed; I have seen them direct their glance upon themselves. I have seen penitents of the spirit appearing; they grew out of the poets. Thus spoke Zarathustra. Of Great Events T HERE is an island in the sea – not far from the Blissful Islands of Zarathustra – upon which a volcano continually smokes; the people, and especially the old women among the people, say that it is placed like a block of stone before the gate of the underworld, but that the narrow downward path which leads to this gate of the underworld passes through the volcano itself. Now at the time Zarathustra was living on the Blissful Islands it happened that a ship dropped anchor at the island upon which the smoking mountain stood; and its crew landed in order to shoot rabbits. Towards the hour of noon, however, when the captain and his men were reassembled, they suddenly saw a man coming towards them through the air, and a voice said clearly: 'It is time! It is high time!' But as the figure was closest to them – it flew quickly past, however, like a shadow, in the direction of the volcano – they recognized, with the greatest consternation, that it was Zarathustra; for all of them had seen him before, except the captain himself, and they loved him as the people love: that is, with love and awe in equal parts. 'Just look!' said the old steersman, 'there is Zarathustra going to Hell!' At the same time as these sailors landed on the volcano island, the rumour went around that Zarathustra had disappeared; and when his friends were questioned, they said that he had gone aboard a ship by night without saying where he intended to sail. Thus there arose a disquiet; after three days, however, there was added to this disquiet the story of the sailors – and then all the people said that the Devil had carried Zarathustra off. Of course, his disciples laughed at this talk; and one of them even said: 'I would rather believe that Zarathustra had carried off the Devil.' But at the bottom of their souls they were all full of apprehension and longing: so great was their joy when, on the fifth day, Zarathustra appeared among them. And this is the tale of Zarathustra's conversation with the fire-dog: The earth (he said) has a skin; and this skin has diseases. One of these diseases, for example, is called 'Man'. And another of these diseases is called 'the fire-dog': men have told many lies and been told many lies about him. To fathom this secret I fared across the sea: and I have seen truth naked, truly! barefoot to the neck. Now I know all about the fire-dog; and also about all the revolutionary and subversive devils which not only old women fear. ‘Up with you, fire-dog, up from your depth!’ I cried, ‘and confess how deep that depth is! Where does it come from, that which you snort up? ‘You drink deeply from the sea: your bitter eloquence betrays that! Truly, for a dog of the depths you take your food too much from the surface! ‘At the best, I hold you to be the earth’s ventriloquist: and when I have heard subversive and revolutionary devils speak, I have always found them like you: bitter, lying, and superficial. ‘You understand how to bellow and how to darken the air with ashes! You are the greatest braggart and have sufficiently learned the art of making mud boil. ‘Where you are there must always be mud around and much that is spongy, hollow, and compressed: it wants to be freed. “Freedom”, you all most like to bellow: but I have unlearned belief in “great events” whenever there is much bellowing and smoke about them. ‘And believe me, friend Infernal-racket! The greatest events – they are not our noisiest but our stillest hours. ‘The world revolves, not around the inventors of new noises, but around the inventors of new values; it revolves inaudibly. ‘And just confess! Little was ever found to have happened when your noise and smoke dispersed. What did it matter that a town had been mummified and a statue lay in the mud! ‘And I say this to the overthrowers of statues: To throw salt into the sea and statues into the mud are perhaps the greatest of follies. ‘The statue lay in the mud of your contempt: but this precisely is its law, that its life and living beauty grow again out of contempt! ‘And now it arises again, with diviner features and sorrowfully-seductive; and in truth! it will even thank you for overthrowing it, you overthrowers! ‘I tender, however, this advice to kings and churches and to all that is weak with age and virtue – only let yourselves be overthrown! That you may return to life, and that virtue – may return to you!’ Thus I spoke before the fire-dog: then he interrupted me sullenly and asked: ‘The church? What is that then?’ ‘The church?’ I answered. ‘The church is kind of state, and indeed the most mendacious kind. But keep quiet, you hypocrite dog! You surely know your own kind best! ‘Like you, the state is a hypocrite dog; like you, it likes to speak with smoke and bellowing – to make believe, like you, that it speaks out of the belly of things. ‘For the state wants to be absolutely the most important beast on earth; and it is believed to be so, too!’ When I said that, the fire-dog acted as if he were mad with envy. ‘What?’ he cried, ‘the most important beast on earth? And it is believed to be so, too?’ And so much steam and hideous shrieking came from his throat I thought he would choke with vexation and envy. At length he grew quieter and his panting ceased; as soon as he was quiet, however, I said laughing; ‘You are vexed, fire-dog: therefore I am right about you! ‘And that I may press my point, let me speak of another fire-dog, which really speaks from the heart of the earth. ‘His breath exhales gold and golden rain: so his heart will have it. What are ashes and smoke and hot mud to him now! ‘Laughter flutters from him like a motley cloud; he is ill-disposed towards your gurgling and spitting and griping of the bowels! 'Gold and laughter, however, he takes from the heart of the earth: for, that you may know it – the heart of the earth is of gold . ' When the fire-dog heard this he could no longer bear to listen to me. Abashed, he drew in his tail, said 'Bow-wow' in a small voice and crawled down into his cave. Thus narrated Zarathustra. But his disciples hardly listened to him, so great was their desire to tell him about the sailors, the rabbits, and the flying man. 'What am I to think of it?' said Zarathustra. 'Am I then a ghost? 'But it will have been my shadow. Surely you have heard something of the Wanderer and his Shadow? 20 'This, however, is certain: I must keep it under stricter control – otherwise it will ruin my reputation.' And once again Zarathustra shook his head and wondered. 'What am I to think of it?' he said again. 'Why, then, did the phantom cry: "It is time! It is high time!"? ' For what, then, is it – high time?' Thus spoke Zarathustra. The Prophet –AND I saw a great sadness come over mankind. The best grew weary of their works. A teaching went forth, a belief ran beside it: Everything is empty, everything is one, everything is past! And from every hill it resounded: Everything is empty, everything is one, everything is past! We have harvested, it is true: but why did all our fruits turn rotten and brown? What fell from the wicked moon last night? All our work has been in vain, our wine has become poison, an evil eye has scorched our fields and our hearts. We have all become dry; and if fire fell upon us we should scatter like ashes – yes, we have made weary fire itself. All our wells have dried up, even the sea has receded. The earth wants to break open, but the depths will not devour us! Alas, where is there still a sea in which one could drown: thus our lament resounds – across shallow swamps. Truly, we have grown too weary even to die; now we are still awake and we live on – in sepulchres!' Thus did Zarathustra hear a prophet speak; 21 and his prophecy went to Zarathustra's heart and transformed him. He went about sad and weary; and he became like those of whom the prophet had spoken. 'Truly,' he said to his disciples, 'this long twilight is very nearly upon us. Alas, how shall I preserve my light through it? 'May it not be smothered in this sadness! It is meant to be a light to more distant worlds and to the most distant nights!' Zarathustra went about grieving thus in his heart; and for three days he took no food or drink, had no rest and forgot speech. At length it happened that he fell into a deep sleep. And his disciples sat around him in the long watches of the night and waited anxiously to see if he would awaken and speak again and be cured of his affliction. And this is the discourse that Zarathustra spoke when he awoke; his voice, however, came to his disciples as if from a great distance: Listen to the dream which I dreamed, friends, and help me to read its meaning! It is still a riddle to me, this dream; its meaning is hidden within it and imprisoned and does not yet fly above it with unconfined wings. I dreamed I had renounced all life. I had become a night-watchman and grave-watchman yonder upon the lonely hill-fortress of death. Up there I guarded death's coffins: the musty vaults stood full of these symbols of death's victory. Life overcome regarded me from glass coffins. I breathed the odour of dust-covered eternities: my soul lay sultry and dust-covered. And who could have ventilated his soul there? Brightness of midnight was all around me, solitude crouched beside it; and, as a third, the rasping silence of death, the worst of my companions. I carried keys, the rustiest of all keys; and I could open with them the most creaking of all doors. When the wings of this door were opened, the sound ran through the long corridors like an evil croaking; this bird cried out ill-temperedly, it did not want to be awakened. But it was even more fearful and heart-tightening when it again became silent and still all around and I sat alone in that malignant silence. So did time pass with me and creep past, if time still existed: what did I know of it I But at last occurred that which awakened me. Three blows were struck on the door like thunderbolts, the vault resounded and roared three times again: then I went to the door. Alpa! I cried, who is bearing his ashes to the mountain? Alpa! Alpa! Who is bearing his ashes to the mountain? And I turned the key and tugged at the door and exerted myself. But it did not open by so much as a finger's breadth: Then a raging wind tore the door asunder: whistling, shrilling and piercing it threw to me a black coffin: And in the roaring and whistling and shrilling, the coffin burst asunder and vomited forth a thousand peals of laughter. And from a thousand masks of children, angels, owls, fools, and child-sized butterflies it laughed and mocked and roared at me. This terrified me dreadfully: it prostrated me. And I shrieked with horror as I had never shrieked before. But my own shrieking awoke me – and I came to myself. Thus Zarathustra narrated his dream and then fell silent: for he did not yet know the interpretation of his dream. But the disciple whom he loved most arose quickly, grasped Zarathustra's hand, and said: Your life itself interprets to us this dream, O Zarathustra! Are you yourself not the wind with a shrill whistling that tears open the doors of the fortress of death? Are you yourself not the coffin full of motley wickednesses and angel-masks of life? Truly, Zarathustra comes into all sepulchres like a thousand peals of children's laughter, laughing at these night-watchmen and grave-watchmen, and whoever else rattles gloomy keys. You will terrify and overthrow them with your laughter; fainting and reawakening will demonstrate your power over them. And even when the long twilight and the weariness unto death appears, you will not set in our heaven, you advocate of life! You have shown us new stars and new glories of the night; truly, you have spread out laughter itself above us like a motley canopy. Henceforth laughter of children will always issue from coffins; henceforth a strong wind will always come, victorious, to all weariness unto death: of that you yourself are our guarantee and prophet! Truly, you have dreamed your enemies themselves : that was your most oppressive dream! But as you awoke from them and came to yourself, so shall they awake from themselves – and come to you! Thus spoke the disciple; and all the others then pressed around Zarathustra and grasped his hands and sought to persuade him to leave his bed and his sadness and return to them. But Zarathustra sat upon his bed erect and with an absent expression. Like one who has returned home after being long in a strange land did he look upon his disciples and examine their faces; and as yet he did not recognize them. But when they raised him and set him upon his feet, behold, his eye was suddenly transformed; he understood everything that had happened, stroked his beard, and said in a firm voice: Well now! This has had its time; but see to it, my disciples, that we have a good meal, and quickly! Thus I mean to do penance for bad dreams! The prophet, however, shall eat and drink beside me: and truly, I will yet show him a sea in which he can drown! Thus spoke Zarathustra. Then, however, he gazed long into the face of the disciple who had interpreted the dream, and shook his head. Of Redemption As Zarathustra was going across the great bridge one day, the cripples and beggars surrounded him and a hunchback spoke to him thus: Behold, Zarathustra! The people, too, learn from you and acquire belief in your teaching; but for the people to believe you completely, one thing is still needed – you must first convince even us cripples! Here now you have a fine selection and truly, an opportunity with more than one forelock! You can cure the blind and make the lame walk; and from him who has too much behind him you could well take a little away, too – that, I think, would be the right way to make the cripples believe in Zarathustra! But Zarathustra replied thus to him who had spoken: If one takes the hump away from the hunchback, one takes away his spirit – that is what the people teach. And if one gives eyes to the blind man, he sees too many bad things on earth: so that he curses him who cured him. But he who makes the lame man walk does him the greatest harm: for no sooner can he walk than his vices run away with him – that is what the people teach about cripples. And why should Zarathustra not learn from the people, if the people learn from Zarathustra? But it is the least serious thing to me, since I have been among men, to see that this one lacks an eye and that one an ear and a third lacks a leg, and there are others who have lost their tongue or their nose or their head. I see and have seen worse things and many of them so monstrous that I should not wish to speak of all of them; but of some of them I should not wish to be silent: and they are, men who lack everything except one thing, of which they have too much – men who are no more than a great eye or a great mouth or a great belly or something else great – I call such men inverse cripples. And when I emerged from my solitude and crossed over this bridge for the first time, I did not believe my eyes and looked and looked again and said at last: ‘That is an ear! An ear as big as a man!’ I looked yet more closely: and in fact under the ear there moved something that was pitifully small and meagre and slender. And in truth, the monstrous ear sat upon a little, thin stalk – the stalk, however, was a man! By the use of a magnifying glass one could even discern a little, envious face as well; and one could discern, too, that a turgid little soul was dangling from the stalk. The people told me, however, that the great ear was not merely a man, but a great man, a genius. But I have never believed the people when they talked about great men – and I held to my belief that it was an inverse cripple, who had too little of everything and too much of one thing. When Zarathustra had spoken thus to the hunchback and to those whose mouthpiece and advocate he was, he turned to his disciples with profound ill-humour and said: Truly, my friends, I walk among men as among the fragments and limbs of men! The terrible thing to my eye is to find men shattered in pieces and scattered as if over a battle-field of slaughter. And when my eye flees from the present to the past, it always discovers the same thing: fragments and limbs and dreadful chances – but no men! The present and the past upon the earth – alas! my friends – that is my most intolerable burden; and I should not know how to live, if I were not a seer of that which must come. A seer, a wilier, a creator, a future itself and a bridge to the future – and alas, also like a cripple upon this bridge: Zarathustra is all this. And even you have often asked yourselves: Who is Zarathustra to us? What shall we call him? and, like me, you answer your own questions with questions. Is he a promiser? Or a fulfiller? A conqueror? Or an inheritor? A harvest? Or a ploughshare? A physician? Or a convalescent? Is he a poet? Or a genuine man? A liberator? Or a subduer? A good man? Or an evil man? I walk among men as among fragments of the future: of that future which I scan. And it is all my art and aim, to compose into one and bring together what is fragment and riddle and dreadful chance. And how could I endure to be a man, if man were not also poet and reader of riddles and the redeemer of chance! To redeem the past and to transform every ‘It was’ into an ‘I wanted it thus!’ – that alone do I call redemption! Will – that is what the liberator and bringer of joy is called: thus I have taught you, my friends! But now learn this as well: The will itself is still a prisoner. Willing liberates: but what is it that fastens in fetters even the liberator? ‘It was’: that is what the will’s teeth-gnashing and most lonely affliction is called. Powerless against that which has been done, the will is an angry spectator of all things past. The will cannot will backwards; that it cannot break time and time’s desire – that is the will’s most lonely affliction. Willing liberates: what does willing itself devise to free itself from its affliction and to mock at its dungeon? Alas, every prisoner becomes a fool! The imprisoned will, too, releases itself in a foolish way. It is sullenly wrathful that time does not run back; ‘That which was’ – that is what the stone which it cannot roll away is called. And so, out of wrath and ill-temper, the will rolls stones about and takes revenge upon him who does not, like it, feel wrath and ill-temper. Thus the will, the liberator, becomes a malefactor: and upon all that can suffer it takes revenge for its inability to go backwards. This, yes, this alone is revenge itself: the will’s antipathy towards time and time’s ‘It was’.

Truly, a great foolishness dwells in our will; and that this foolishness acquired spirit has become a curse to all human kind. The spirit of revenge : my friends, that, up to now, has been mankind's chief concern; and where there was suffering, there was always supposed to be punishment. 'Punishment' is what revenge calls itself: it feigns a good conscience for itself with a lie. And because there is suffering in the willer himself, since he cannot will backwards – therefore willing itself and all life was supposed to be – punishment! And then cloud upon cloud rolled over the spirit: until at last madness preached: 'Everything passes away, therefore everything deserves to pass away! 'And that law of time, that time must devour her children, is justice itself: thus madness preached. 'Things are ordered morally according to justice and punishment. Oh, where is redemption from the stream of things and from the punishment "existence"? ' Thus madness preached. 'Can there be redemption when there is eternal justice? Alas, the stone "It was" cannot be rolled away: all punishments, too, must be eternal!' Thus madness preached. 'No deed can be annihilated: how could a deed be undone through punishment? That existence too must be an eternally-recurring deed and guilt, this, this is what is eternal in the punishment "existence"! 'Except the will at last redeem itself and willing become not-willing –': but you, my brothers, know this fable-song of madness! I led you away from these fable-songs when I taught you: 'The will is a creator.' All 'It was' is a fragment, a riddle, a dreadful chance – until the creative will says to it: 'But I willed it thus!' Until the creative will says to it: 'But I will it thus! Thus shall I will it!' But has it ever spoken thus? And when will this take place? Has the will yet been unharnessed from its own folly? Has the will become its own redeemer and bringer of joy? Has it unlearned the spirit of revenge and all teeth-gnashing? And who has taught it to be reconciled with time, and higher things than reconciliation? The will that is the will to power must will something higher than any reconciliation – but how shall that happen? Who has taught it to will backwards, too? But at this point of his discourse, Zarathustra suddenly broke off and looked exactly like a man seized by extremest terror. With terrified eyes he gazed upon his disciples; his eyes transpierced their thoughts and their reservations 22 as if with arrows. But after a short time he laughed again and said in a soothed voice: 'It is difficult to live among men because keeping silent is so difficult. Especially for a babblers.' Thus spoke Zarathustra. The hunchback, however, had listened to the conversation and had covered his face the while; but when he heard Zarathustra laugh, he looked up in curiosity, and said slowly: 'But why does Zarathustra speak to us differently than to his disciples?' Zarathustra answered: 'What is surprising in that? One may well speak in a hunchbacked manner to a hunchback!' 23 'Very good,' said the hunchback; 'and with pupils one may well tell tales out of school. 'But why does Zarathustra speak to his pupils differently – than to himself?' Of Manly Prudence I T is not the height, it is the abyss that is terrible! The abyss where the glance plunges downward and the hand grasps upward . There the heart grows giddy through its twofold will. Ah, friends, have you, too, divined my heart's twofold will? That my glance plunges into the heights and that my hand wants to hold on to the depths and lean there – that, that is my abyss and my danger. My will clings to mankind, I bind myself to mankind with fetters, because I am drawn up to the Superman: for my other will wants to draw me up to the Superman. That my hand may not quite lose its belief in firmness: that is why I live blindly among men, as if I did not recognize them. I do not recognize you men: this darkness and consolation has often spread around me. I sit at the gateway and wait for every rogue and ask: Who wants to deceive me? This is my first manly prudence: I let myself be deceived so as not to be on guard against deceivers. Ah, if I were on guard against men, how could men be an anchor for my ball? It would be torn upward and away too easily! This providence lies over my fate: I have to be without foresight. And he who does not want to die of thirst among men must learn to drink out of all glasses; and he who wants to stay clean among men must know how to wash himself even with dirty water. And to console myself I often spoke thus: 'Well then! Come on, old heart! A misfortune failed to harm you: enjoy that as your – good fortune!' This, however, is my second manly prudence: I am more considerate to the vain than to the proud. Is wounded vanity not the mother of all tragedies? But where pride is wounded there surely grows up something better than pride. If life is to be pleasant to watch, its play must be well acted: for that, however, good actors are needed. I found all vain people to be good actors: they act and desire that others shall want to watch them – all their spirit is in this desire. They act themselves, they invent themselves; I like to watch life in their vicinity – it cures melancholy. I am considerate to the vain because they are physicians to my melancholy and hold me fast to mankind as to a play. And further: who can estimate the full depth of the vain man's modesty! I love and pity him on account of his modesty. He wants to learn belief in himself from you; he feeds upon your glances, he eats praise out of your hands. He believes even your lies when you lie favourably to him: for his heart sighs in its depths: 'What am I ?' And if the virtue that is unconscious of itself be the true virtue: well, the vain man is unconscious of his modesty! This, however, is my third manly prudence: I do not let your timorousness spoil my pleasure at the sight of the wicked. I am happy to see the marvels the hot sun hatches: tigers and palm trees and rattle-snakes. Among men, too, there is a fine brood of the hot sun and much that is marvellous in the wicked. Indeed, as your wisest man did not seem so very wise to me, so I found that human wickedness, too, did not live up to its reputation. And I often shook my head and asked: Why go on rattling, you rattle-snakes? Truly, there is still a future, even for evil! And the hottest South has not yet been discovered for mankind. How many a thing is now called grossest wickedness which is only twelve feet broad and three months long! One day, however, greater dragons will come into the world. For, that the Superman may not lack his dragon, the super-dragon worthy of him, much hot sunshine must yet burn upon damp primeval forests! Your wild cats must have become tigers and your poison-toads crocodiles: for the good huntsman shall have a good hunt! And truly, you good and just! There is much in you that is laughable and especially your fear of him who was formerly called the 'Devil'! Your souls are so unfamiliar with what is great that the Superman would be fearful to you in his goodness! And you wise and enlightened men, you would flee from the burning sun of wisdom in which the Superman joyfully bathes his nakedness! You highest men my eyes have encountered! This is my doubt of you and my secret laughter: I think you would call my Superman – a devil! Alas, I grew weary of these highest and best men: from their 'heights' I longed to go up, out, away to the Superman! A horror overcame me when I saw these best men naked: then there grew for me the wings to soar away into distant futures. Into most distant futures, into more southerly Souths than artist ever dreamed of: thither where gods are ashamed of all clothes! But I want to see you disguised, you neighbours and fellow-men, and well-dressed and vain and worthy as 'the good and just'. And I myself will sit among you disguised, so that I may misunderstand you and myself: that, in fact, is my last manly prudence. Thus spoke Zarathustra. The stillest hour W HAT has happened to me, my friends? You behold me troubled, driven forth, unwillingly obedient, ready to go – alas, to go away from you! Yes, Zarathustra must go into his solitude once again: but this time the bear goes unhappily back into his cave! What has happened to me? Who has ordered this? – alas, my mistress will have it so, so she told me; have I ever told you her name? Yesterday towards evening my stillest hour spoke to me: that is the name of my terrible mistress. And thus it happened, for I must tell you everything, that your hearts may not harden against me for departing so suddenly! Do you know the terror which assails him who is falling asleep? He is terrified down to his toes, because the ground seems to give way, and the dream begins. I tell you this in a parable. Yesterday, at the stillest hour, the ground seemed to give way: my dream began. The hand moved, the dock of my life held its breath – I had never heard such stillness about me: so that my heart was terrified. Then, voicelessly, something said to me: 'You know, Zarathustra?' And I cried out for terror at this whisper, and the blood drained from my face: but I kept silent. Then again, something said to me voicelessly: 'You know, Zarathustra, but you do not speak!' And I answered at last defiantly: 'Yes, I know, but I will not speak!' Then again something said to me voicelessly: 'You will not, Zarathustra? Is this true? Do not hide yourself in your defiance!' And I wept and trembled like a child and said: 'Alas, I want to, but how can I? Release me from this alone! It is beyond my strength!' Then again something said to me voicelessly: 'Of what consequence are you, Zarathustra? Speak your teaching and break!’ And I answered: ‘Ah, is it my teaching? Who am I ? I await one who is more worthy; I am not worthy even to break by it.’ Then again something said to me voicelessly: ‘Of what consequence are you? You are not yet humble enough. Humility has the toughest hide.’ And I answered: ‘What has the hide of my humility not already endured? I live at the foot of my heights: how high are my peaks? No one has yet told me. But I know my valleys well.’ Then again something said to me voicelessly: ‘O Zarathustra, he who has to move mountains moves valleys and low-lands too.’ And I answered: ‘My words have as yet moved no mountains and what I have spoken has not reached men. Indeed, I went to men, but I have not yet attained them.’ Then again something said to me voicelessly: ‘How do you know that ? The dew falls upon the grass when the night is at its most silent.’ And I answered: ‘They mocked me when I found and walked my own way; and in truth my feet trembled then. ‘And they spoke thus to me: You have forgotten the way, now you will also forget how to walk!’ Then again something said to me voicelessly: ‘Of what consequence is their mockery? You are one who has unlearned how to obey: now you shall command! ‘Do you know what it is all men most need? Him who commands great things. ‘To perform great things is difficult: but more difficult is to command great things. ‘This is the most unpardonable thing about you: You have the power and you will not rule.’ And I answered: ‘I lack the lion’s voice for command.’ Then again something said to me as in a whisper: ‘It is the stillest words which bring the storm. Thoughts that come on doves’ feet guide the world. ‘O Zarathustra, you shall go as a shadow of that which must come: thus you will command and commanding lead the way.’ And I answered: ‘I am ashamed.’ Then again something said to me voicelessly: ‘You must yet become a child and without shame. ‘The pride of youth is still in you, you have become young late: but he who wants to become a child must overcome even his youth.’ And I considered long and trembled. At last, however, I said what I had said at first: ‘I will not.’ Then a laughing broke out around me. Alas, how this laughing tore my body and ripped open my heart! And for the last time something said to me: ‘O Zarathustra, your fruits are ripe but you are not ripe for your fruits! ‘So you must go back into solitude: for you shall yet grow mellow.’ And again something laughed, and fled: then it grew still round me as if with a twofold stillness. I, however, lay on the ground and the sweat poured from my limbs. Now you have heard everything, and why I must return to my solitude. I have kept nothing back from you, my friends. And you have heard, too, who is the most silent of men – and intends to remain so! Ah, my friends! I should have something more to tell you, I should have something more to give you! Why do I not give it? Am I then mean? When Zarathustra had said these words, however, the violence of his grief and the nearness of his departure from his friends overwhelmed him, so that he wept aloud; and no one knew how to comfort him.

But that night he went away alone and forsook his friends. PART THREE ‘ You look up when you desire to be exalted. And I look down, because I am exalted ‘ Who among you can at the same time laugh and be exalted? ‘ He who climbs upon the highest mountains laughs at all tragedies, real or imaginary . ’

ZARATHUSTRA: ‘ Of Reading and Writing ’ The Wanderer I T was midnight when Zarathustra made his way over the ridge of the island, so that he might arrive at the other shore with the early dawn: for there he meant to board ship. For there was a good harbour at which foreign ships, too, liked to drop anchor: they took on board many who wanted to leave the Blissful Islands and cross the sea. Now, as Zarathustra was climbing the mountain he recalled as he went the many lonely wanderings he had made from the time of his youth, and how many mountains and ridges and summits he had already climbed. I am a wanderer and a mountain-climber (he said to his heart), I do not like the plains and it seems I cannot sit still for long. And whatever may yet come to me as fate and experience – a wandering and a mountain-climbing will be in it: in the final analysis one experiences only oneself. The time has passed when accidents could befall me; and what could still come to me that was not already my own? It is returning, at last it is coming home to me – my own Self and those parts of it that have long been abroad and scattered among all things and accidents. And I know one thing more: I stand now before my last summit and before the deed that has been deferred the longest. Alas, I have to climb my most difficult path! Alas, I have started upon my loneliest wandering! But a man of my sort does not avoid such an hour: the hour that says to him: ‘Only now do you tread your path of greatness! Summit and abyss – they are now united in one! ‘You are treading your path of greatness: now what was formerly your ultimate danger has become your ultimate refuge! ‘You are treading your path of greatness: now it must call up all your courage that there is no longer a path behind you! ‘You are treading your path of greatness: no one shall steal after you here! Your foot itself has extinguished the path behind you, and above that path stands written: Impossibility. ‘And when all footholds disappear, you must know how to climb upon your own head: how could you climb upward otherwise? ‘Upon your own head and beyond your own heart! Now the gentlest part of you must become the hardest. ‘He who has always been very indulgent with himself sickens at last through his own indulgence. All praise to what makes hard! I do not praise the land where butter and honey – flow! ‘In order to see much one must learn to look away from oneself – every mountain-climber needs this hardness. ‘But he who, seeking enlightenment, is over-eager with his eyes, how could he see more of a thing than its foreground! ‘You, however, O Zarathustra, have wanted to behold the ground of things and their background: 24 so you must climb above yourself – up and beyond, until you have even your stars under you!’ Yes! To look down upon myself and even upon my stars: that alone would I call my summit , that has remained for me as my ultimate summit! Thus spoke Zarathustra to himself as he climbed, consoling his heart with hard sayings: for his heart was wounded as never before. And when he arrived at the top of the mountain ridge, behold, there lay the other sea spread out before him: and he stood and was long silent. But the night at this height was cold and dear and bright with stars. I know my fate (he said at last with sadness). Well then! I am ready. My last solitude has just begun. Ah, this sorrowful, black sea beneath me! Ah, this brooding reluctance! Ah, destiny and sea! Now I have to go down to you! I stand before my highest mountain and my longest wandering: therefore I must first descend deeper than I have ever descended, – deeper into pain than I have ever descended, down to its blackest stream! So my destiny will have it. Well then! I am ready. Whence arise the highest mountains? I once asked. Then I learned that they arise from the sea. This testimony is written into their stones and into the sides of their summits. The highest must arise to its height from the deepest. Thus spoke Zarathustra on the mountain summit, where it was cold; when he drew near to the sea, however, and at length stood alone beneath the cliffs, he had grown weary on the way and more yearning than he was before. Everything is still asleep (he said); even the sea is asleep. Its eye looks at me drowsily and strangely. But it breathes warmly; I feel it. And I feel, too, that it is dreaming. Dreaming, it writhes upon a hard pillow. Listen! Listen! How it groans with wicked memories! Or with wicked expectations? Ah, I am sad with you, dark monster, and angry even with myself for your sake. Alas, that my hand has insufficient strength! In truth, I should dearly like to release you from your bad dreams! And as Zarathustra thus spoke, he laughed at himself with melancholy and bitterness. What, Zarathustra! he said, do you want to sing consolation even to the sea? Ah, you fond fool, Zarathustra, too eager to trust! But that is what you have always been: you have always approached trustfully all that is fearful. You have always wanted to caress every monster. A touch of warm breath, a little soft fur on its paw – and at once you have been ready to love and entice it. Love is the danger for the most solitary man, love of any thing if only it is alive! Indeed, my foolishness and modesty in love is laughable! Thus spoke Zarathustra and laughed again: but then he thought of the friends he had left, and he was angry with himself because of his thoughts, as if he had injured his friends with them. And forthwith the laughing man wept – for anger and longing did Zarathustra weep bitterly. Of the Vision and the Riddle 1 W H E N it became rumoured among the sailors that Zarathustra was on the ship – for a man from the Blissful Islands had gone on board at the same time as he – a great curiosity and expectancy arose. But Zarathustra was silent for two days and was cold and deaf for sorrow, so that he responded neither to looks nor to questions. But on the evening of the second day he opened his ears again, although he still remained silent: for there were many strange and dangerous things to hear on this ship, which had come from afar and had yet further to go.

Zarathustra, however, was a friend to all who take long journeys and do not want to live without danger. And behold! in listening his tongue was loosened, and the ice of his heart broke: then he started to speak thus: To you, the bold venturers and adventurers and whoever has embarked with cunning sails upon dreadful seas, to you who are intoxicated by riddles, who take pleasure in twilight, whose soul is lured with flutes to every treacherous abyss – for you do not desire to feel for a rope with cowardly hand; and where you can guess you hate to calculate – to you alone do I tell this riddle that I saw – the vision of the most solitary man. Lately I walked gloomily through a deathly-grey twilight, gloomily and sternly with compressed lips. Not only one sun had gone down for me. A path that mounted defiantly through boulders and rubble, a wicked, solitary path that bush or plant no longer cheered: a mountain path crunched under my foot's defiance. Striding mute over the mocking clatter of pebbles, trampling the stones that made it slip: thus my foot with effort forced itself upward. Upward – despite the spirit that drew it downward, drew it towards the abyss, the Spirit of Gravity, my devil and archenemy. Upward – although he sat upon me, half dwarf, half mole; crippled, crippling; pouring lead-drops into my ear, leaden thoughts into my brain. 'O Zarathustra,' he said mockingly, syllable by syllable, 'you stone of wisdom! You have thrown yourself high, but every stone that is thrown must – fall! 'O Zarathustra, you stone of wisdom, you projectile, you star-destroyer! You have thrown yourself thus high, but every stone that is thrown – must fall! 'Condemned by yourself and to your own stone-throwing: O Zarathustra, far indeed have you thrown your stone, but it will fall back upon you !' Thereupon the dwarf fell silent; and he long continued so. But his silence oppressed me; and to be thus in company is truly more lonely than to be alone! I climbed, I climbed, I dreamed, I thought, but everything oppressed me. I was like a sick man wearied by his sore torment and reawakened from sleep by a worse dream. But there is something in me that I call courage: it has always destroyed every discouragement in me. This courage at last bade me stop and say: 'Dwarf! You! Or I!' For courage is the best destroyer – courage that attacks : for in every attack there is a triumphant shout. Man, however, is the most courageous animal: with his courage he has overcome every animal. With a triumphant shout he has even overcome every pain; human pain, however, is the deepest pain. Courage also destroys giddiness at abysses: and where does man not stand at an abyss? Is seeing itself not – seeing abysses? Courage is the best destroyer: courage also destroys pity. Pity, however, is the deepest abyss: as deeply as man looks into life, so deeply does he look also into suffering. Courage, however, is the best destroyer, courage that attacks: it destroys even death, for it says: 'Was that life? Well then! Once more!' But there is a great triumphant shout in such a saying. He who has ears to hear, let him hear. 2 'Stop, dwarf!' I said. 'I! Or you! But I am the stronger of us two – you do not know my abysmal thought! That thought – you could not endure!’ Then something occurred which lightened me: for the dwarf jumped from my shoulder, the inquisitive dwarf! And he squatted down upon a stone in front of me. But a gateway stood just where we had halted. ‘Behold this gateway, dwarf!’ I went on: ‘it has two aspects. Two paths come together here: no one has ever reached their end. ‘This long lane behind us: it goes on for an eternity. And that long lane ahead of us – that is another eternity. ‘They are in opposition to one another, these paths; they abut on one another: and it is here at this gateway that they come together. The name of the gateway is written above it: “Moment”. ‘But if one were to follow them further and ever further and further: do you think, dwarf, that these paths would be in eternal opposition?’ ‘Everything straight lies,’ murmured the dwarf disdainfully. ‘All truth is crooked, time itself is a circle.’ ‘Spirit of Gravity!’ I said angrily, ‘do not treat this too lightly! Or I shall leave you squatting where you are, Lame-foot – and I have carried you high! ‘Behold this moment!’ I went on. ‘From this gateway Moment a long, eternal lane runs back : an eternity lies behind us. ‘Must not all things that can run have already run along this lane? Must not all things that can happen have already happened, been done, run past? ‘And if all things have been here before: what do you think of this moment, dwarf? Must not this gateway, too, have been here – before? ‘And are not all things bound fast together in such a way that this moment draws after it all future things? Therefore – draws itself too? ‘For all things that can run must also run once again forward along this long lane. ‘And this slow spider that creeps along in the moonlight, and this moonlight itself, and I and you at this gateway whispering together, whispering of eternal things – must we not all have been here before? ‘ – and must we not return and run down that other lane out before us, down that long, terrible lane – must we not return eternally?’ Thus I spoke, and I spoke more and more softly: for I was afraid of my own thoughts and reservations. Then, suddenly, I heard a dog howling nearby. Had I ever heard a dog howling in that way? My thoughts ran back. Yes! When I was a child, in my most distant childhood: – then I heard a dog howling in that way. And I saw it, too, bristling, its head raised, trembling in the stillest midnight, when even dogs believe in ghosts: – so that it moved me to pity. For the full moon had just gone over the house, silent as death, it had just stopped still, a round glow, still upon the flat roof as if upon a forbidden place: that was what had terrified the dog: for dogs believe in thieves and ghosts. And when I heard such howling again, it moved me to pity again. Where had the dwarf now gone? And the gateway? And the spider? And all the whispering? Had I been dreaming? Had I awoken? All at once I was standing between wild cliffs, alone, desolate in the most desolate moonlight. But there a man was lying! And there! The dog, leaping, bristling, whining; then it saw me coming – then it howled again, then it cried out – had I ever heard a dog cry so for help? 25 And truly, I had never seen the like of what I then saw. I saw a young shepherd writhing, choking, convulsed, his face distorted; and a heavy, black snake was hanging out of his mouth. Had I ever seen so much disgust and pallid horror on a face? Had he, perhaps, been asleep? Then the snake had crawled into his throat – and there it had bitten itself fast. My hands tugged and tugged at the snake – in vain! they could not tug the snake out of the shepherd's throat. Then a voice cried from me: 'Bite! Bite! 'Its head off! Bite!' – thus a voice cried from me, my horror, my hate, my disgust, my pity, all my good and evil cried out of me with a single cry. You bold men around me! You venturers, adventurers, and those of you who have embarked with cunning sails upon undiscovered seas! You who take pleasure in riddles! Solve for me the riddle that I saw, interpret to me the vision of the most solitary man! For it was a vision and a premonition: what did I see in allegory? And who is it that must come one day? Who is the shepherd into whose mouth the snake thus crawled? Who is the man into whose throat all that is heaviest, blackest will thus crawl? The shepherd, however, bit as my cry had advised him; he bit with a good bite! He spat far away the snake's head – and sprang up. No longer a shepherd, no longer a man – a transformed being, surrounded with light, laughing ! Never yet on earth had any man laughed as he laughed! O my brothers, I heard a laughter that was no human laughter – and now a thirst consumes me, a longing that is never stilled. My longing for this laughter consumes me: oh how do I endure still to live! And how could I endure to die now! Thus spoke Zarathustra. Of Involuntary Bliss WITH such riddles and bitterness in his heart did Zarathustra fare across the sea. When he was four days' journey from the Blissful Islands and from his friends, however, he had overcome all his pain – triumphantly and with firm feet he again accepted his destiny. 26 And then Zarathustra spoke thus to his rejoicing conscience: I am again alone and willingly so, alone with the pure sky and the open sea; and again it is afternoon around me. It was afternoon when I once found my friends for the first time, it was afternoon, too, when I found them a second time – at the hour when all light grows stiller. For whatever happiness that is still travelling between heaven and earth now seeks shelter in a luminous soul: with happiness all light has now grown stiller. O afternoon of my life! Once my happiness, too, climbed down into the valley to seek a shelter: there it found these open, hospitable souls. O afternoon of my life! What have I not given away that I might possess one thing: this living plantation of my thoughts and this dawn of my highest hope! Once the creator sought companions and children of his hope: and behold, it turned out that he could not find them, except he first create them himself. Thus I am in the midst of my work, going to my children and turning from them: for the sake of his children must Zarathustra perfect himself. For one loves from the very heart only one's child and one's work; and where there is great love of oneself, then it is a sign of pregnancy: thus have I found. My children are still green in their first spring, standing close together and shaken in common by the winds, the trees of my garden and my best soil. And truly! Where such trees stand together, there blissful islands are! But one day I will uproot them and set each one up by itself, that it may learn solitude and defiance and foresight. Then it shall stand by the sea, gnarled and twisted and with supple hardiness, a living lighthouse of unconquerable life. Yonder, where storms plunge down into the sea and the mountain's snout drinks water, there each of them shall one day keep its day and night watch, for its testing and recognition. It shall be tested and recognized, to see whether it is of my kind and my race – whether it is master of a protracted will, silent even when it speaks, and giving in such a way that in giving it takes – that it may one day be my companion and a fellow-creator and fellow-rejoicer of Zarathustra – such a one as inscribes my will upon my tablets: for the greater perfection of all things. And for its sake, and for those like it, must I perfect myself : therefore I now avoid my happiness and offer myself to all unhappiness – for my ultimate testing and recognition. And truly, it was time I went; and the wanderer's shadow and the longest sojourn and the stillest hour – all told me: 'It is high time!' The wind blew to me through the keyhole and said: 'Come!' The door sprang cunningly open and said: 'Go!' But I lay fettered to love of my children: desire set this snare for me, desire for love, that I might become my children's victim and lose myself through them. To desire – that now means to me: to have lost myself. I possess you, my children! In this possession all should be certainty and nothing desire. But the sun of my love lay brooding upon me, Zarathustra stewed in his own juice – then shadows and doubts flew past me. I hankered after frost and winter: 'Oh that frost and winter would again make me crackle and crunch!' I sighed: then icy mist arose from me. My past broke open its graves, many a pain buried alive awoke: they had only been sleeping, concealed in winding sheets. Thus in symbols everything called to me: 'It is time!' But I – did not hear: until at last my abyss stirred and my thought bit me. Alas, abysmal thought that is my thought! When shall I find the strength to hear you boring and no longer tremble? My heart rises to my throat when I hear you boring I Even your silence threatens to choke me, you abysmal, silent thought! I have never yet dared to summon you up : it has been enough that I – carried you with me! I have not yet been strong enough for the ultimate lion's arrogance and lion's wantonness. Your heaviness has always been fearful enough for me: but one day I shall find the strength and the lion's voice to summon you up! When I have overcome myself in that, I will overcome myself in that which is greater; and a victory shall be the seal of my perfection! In the meantime, I travel on uncertain seas; smooth-tongued chance flatters me; I gaze forward and backward, still I see no end. The hour of my last struggle has not yet arrived – or has it perhaps just arrived? Truly, sea and life around me gaze at me with insidious beauty! O afternoon of my life! O happiness before evening! O harbour in mid-sea! O peace in uncertainty! How

I mistrust you all! Truly, I am mistrustful of your insidious beauty! I am like the lover who mistrusts all-too-velvety smiles. As the jealous man thrusts his best beloved from him, tender even in his hardness – thus do I thrust this blissful hour from me. Away with you, blissful hour! With you there came to me an involuntary bliss! I stand here ready for my deepest pain – you came out of season! Away with you, blissful hour! Rather take shelter yonder – with my children! Hurry, and bless them before evening with my happiness! There evening already approaches: the sun is sinking. Away – my happiness! Thus spoke Zarathustra. And he waited all night for his unhappiness: but he waited in vain. The night remained clear and still and happiness itself drew nearer and nearer to him. Towards morning, however, Zarathustra laughed to his heart and said ironically: ‘Happiness runs after me. That is because I do not run after women. Happiness, however, is a woman.’ Before Sunrise O SKY above me! O pure, deep sky! You abyss of light! Gazing into you, I tremble with divine desires. To cast myself into your height – that is my depth! To hide myself in your purity – that is my innocence! The god is veiled by his beauty: thus you hide your stars. You do not speak: thus you proclaim to me your wisdom. You have risen for me today, mute over the raging sea; your love and your modesty speak a revelation to my raging soul. That you have come to me, beautiful, veiled in your beauty; that you have spoken to me mutely, manifest in your wisdom: Oh how should I not divine all that is modest in your soul! You came to me before the sun, to me the most solitary man. We have been friends from the beginning: we have grief and terror and world in common; we have even the sun in common. We do not speak to one another, because we know too much: we are silent together, we smile our knowledge to one another. Are you not the light of my fire? Do you not have the sister-soul of my insight? Together we learned everything; together we learned to mount above ourselves to ourselves and to smile uncloudedly – to smile uncloudedly down from bright eyes and from miles away when under us compulsion and purpose and guilt stream like rain. And when I wandered alone, what did my soul hunger after by night and on treacherous paths? And when I climbed mountains, whom did I always seek, if not you, upon mountains? And all my wandering and mountain-climbing: it was merely a necessity and an expedient of clumsiness: my whole will desires only fly, to fly into you! And what have I hated more than passing clouds and all that defiles you? And I have hated even my own hatred, because it defiled you! I dislike the passing clouds, these stealthy cats of prey: they take from you and from me what we have in common – the vast and boundless declaration of Yes and Amen. We dislike these mediators and mixers, the passing clouds: these half-and-halfers, who have learned neither to bless nor to curse from the heart. I would rather sit in a barrel under a closed sky, rather sit in an abyss without a sky, than see you, luminous sky, defiled by passing clouds! And often I longed to bind them fast with jagged golden wires of lightning, so that I, like the thunder, might drum upon their hollow bellies – an angry drummer, because they rob me of your Yes! and Amen! O sky above me, you pure sky! You luminous sky! You abyss of light! – because they rob me of my Yes! and Amen! For I would rather have noise and thunder and storm-curses than this cautious, uncertain feline repose; and among men, too, I hate most all soft-walkers and half-and-halfers and uncertain, hesitating passing clouds. And ‘He who cannot bless shall learn to curse!’ – this clear teaching fell to me from the dear sky, this star stands in my sky even on dark nights. I, however, am one who blesses and declares Yes, if only you are around me, you pure, luminous sky! You abyss of light I – then into all abysses do I carry my consecrating declaration Yes. I have become one who blesses and one who declares Yes: and for that I wrestled long and was a wrestler, so that I might one day have my hands free for blessing. This, however, is my blessing: To stand over everything as its own sky, as its round roof, its azure bell and eternal certainty: and happy is he who thus blesses! For all things are baptized at the fount of eternity and beyond good and evil; good and evil themselves, however, are only intervening shadows and damp afflictions and passing clouds. Truly, it is a blessing and not a blasphemy when I teach: ‘Above all things stands the heaven of chance, the heaven of innocence, the heaven of accident, the heaven of wantonness.’ 27 ‘Lord Chance’ 28 – he is the world’s oldest nobility, which I have given back to all things; I have released them from servitude under purpose. I set this freedom and celestial cheerfulness over all things like an azure bell when I taught that no ‘eternal will’ acts over them and through them. I set this wantonness and this foolishness in place of that will when I taught: ‘With all things one thing is impossible – rationality!’ A little reason, to be sure, a seed of wisdom scattered from star to star – this leaven is mingled with all things: for the sake of foolishness is wisdom mingled with all things! A little wisdom is no doubt possible; but I have found this happy certainty in all things: that they prefer – to dance on the feet of chance. O sky above me, you pure, lofty sky! This is now your purity to me, that there is no eternal reason-spider and spider’s web in you – that you are to me a dance floor for divine chances, that you are to me a gods’ table for divine dice and dicers! But are you blushing? Did I say something unspeakable? Did I slander you when I meant to bless you? Or is it the shame of our being together which makes you blush? Are you telling me to go and be silent because now – day is coming? The world is deep: and deeper than day has ever comprehended. Not everything may be spoken in the presence of day. But day is coming: so let us part! O sky above me, you modest, glowing sky! O you, my happiness before sunrise! Day is coming: so let us part! Thus spoke Zarathustra. Of the Virtue that Makes Small 1 WHEN Zarathustra was again on firm land he did not go off straightway to his mountains and his cave, but made many journeys and asked many questions and inquired of this and that, so that he said jokingly of himself: ‘Behold a river that flows back to its source through many meanderings!’ For he wanted to learn what had been happening to men while he had been away: whether they had become bigger or smaller. And once he saw a row of new houses, and he marvelled and said: What do these houses mean? Truly, no great soul put them up as its image! Did a silly child perhaps take them out of its toy-box? If only another child would put them back into its box! And these sitting-rooms and bedrooms: are men able to go in and out of them? They seem to have been made for dolls; or for dainty nibblers who perhaps let others nibble with them. And Zarathustra stopped and considered. At length he said sadly: ‘Everything has become smaller! ‘Everywhere I see lower doors: anyone like me can still pass through them, but – he has to stoop! ‘Oh when shall I return to my home, where I shall no longer have to stoop – shall no longer have to stoop before the small men ’! And Zarathustra sighed and gazed into the distance. The same day, however, he spoke his discourse upon the virtue that makes small. 2 I go among this people and keep my eyes open: they do not forgive me that I am not envious of their virtues. They peck at me because I tell them: For small people small virtues are necessary – and because it is hard for me to understand that small people are necessary! Here I am still like a cockerel in a strange farmyard, who is pecked at even by the hens; but I am not unfriendly to these hens on that account. I am polite towards them, as towards every small vexation; to be prickly towards small things seems to me the wisdom of a hedgehog. They all talk of me when they sit around the fire at evening – they talk of me, but no one thinks – of me! This is the new silence I have learned: their noise about me spreads a cloak over my thoughts. They bluster among themselves: ‘What does this gloomy cloud want with us? Let us see that it does not bring us a pestilence!’ And recently a woman pulled back her child when it was coming towards me: ‘Take the children away!’ she cried; ‘such eyes scorch children’s souls.’ They cough when I speak: they think that coughing is an objection to strong winds – they know nothing of the raging of my happiness! ‘We have no time yet for Zarathustra’ – thus they object; but of what consequence is a time that ‘has no time’ for Zarathustra? And should they even praise me: how could I rest on their praise? Their praise is a barbed girdle to me: it scratches me even when I take it off. And I have learned this, too, among them: he who praises appears to be giving back, in truth however he wants to be given more! Ask my foot if it likes their melodies of praise and enticement! Truly, to such a measure and tick-tock beat it likes neither to dance nor to stand still. They would like to lure and commend me to small virtue; they would like to persuade my foot to the tick-tock measure of a small happiness. I go among this people and keep my eyes open: they have become smaller and are becoming ever smaller: and their doctrine of happiness and virtue is the cause For they are modest even in virtue – for they want ease. But only a modest virtue is compatible with ease. To be sure, even they learn in their own way how to stride and to stride forward: that is what I call their limping . Therewith they become a hindrance to anyone who is in a hurry. And some of them go forward and at the same time look backward with a stiff neck: I like to run up against them. Foot and eye should not lie, nor give one another the lie. But there is much lying among the small people. Some of them will , but most of them are only willed . Some of them are genuine, but most of them are bad actors. There are unconscious actors among them and involuntary actors – the genuine are always rare, especially genuine actors. There is little manliness here: therefore their women make themselves manly. For only he who is sufficiently a man will – redeem the woman in woman. And I have found this hypocrisy the worst among them: that even those who command affect the virtues of those who obey. ‘I serve, you serve, we serve’ – so here even the hypocrisy of the rulers intones – and alas, if the first ruler is only the first servant! Ah, my eyes’ curiosity has strayed even into their hypocrisies; and I have divined well all their fly-happiness and their humming around sunny window-panes. I see as much weakness as goodness. As much weakness as justice and pity. They are frank, honest, and kind to one another, as grains of sand are frank, honest, and kind to grains of sand. To embrace modestly a little happiness – that they call ‘submission’! And at the same time they are looking out for a new little happiness. Fundamentally they want one thing most of all: that nobody shall do them harm. So they steal a march on everyone and do good to everyone. This, however, is cowardice : although it be called ‘virtue’. And when they speak harshly, these little people, I hear in it only their hoarseness – every draught, in fact, makes them hoarse. They are clever, their virtues have clever fingers. But they lack fists, their fingers do not know how to fold into fists. To them, virtue is what makes modest and tame: with it they make the wolf into a dog and man himself into man’s best domestic animal. ‘We have set our chairs down in the middle ’ – that is what their smirking tells me – ‘and as far away from dying warriors as from contented swine.’ This, however, is – mediocrity : although it be called moderation. 3 I go among this people and let fall many a word; but they know neither how to take nor to keep. They are surprised that I have not come to rail at their lusts and vices; and truly, I have not come to warn against pickpockets, either! They are surprised that I am not prepared to improve and sharpen their cleverness: as if they had not already sufficient wiseacres, whose voices grate on me like slate-pencils! And when I cry: ‘Curse all the cowardly devils within you who would like to whimper and clasp their hands and worship,’ then they cry: ‘Zarathustra is godless.’ And this is especially the cry of their teachers of submission; but it is into precisely their ears that I love to shout: Yes! I am Zarathustra the Godless! These teachers of submission! Wherever there is anything small and sick and scabby, there they crawl like lice; and only my disgust stops me from cracking them. Well then! This is my sermon for their ears: I am Zarathustra the Godless, who says ‘Who is more godless than I, that I may rejoice in his teaching?’ I am Zarathustra the Godless: where shall I find my equal? All those who give themselves their own will and renounce all submission, they are my equals. I am Zarathustra the Godless: I cook every chance in my pot. And only when it is quite cooked do I welcome it as my food. And truly, many a chance came imperiously to me: but my will spoke to it even more imperiously, then it went down imploringly on its knees – imploring shelter and love with me, and urging in wheedling tones: ‘Just see, O Zarathustra, how a friend comes to a friend!’ But why do I speak where no one has my kind of ears? And so I will shout it out to all the winds: You will become smaller and smaller, you small people! You will crumble away, you comfortable people! You will yet perish – through your many small virtues, through your many small omissions, through your many small submissions! Too indulgent, too yielding: that is the state of your soil! But in order to grow big, a tree wants to strike hard roots into hard rocks! Even what you omit weaves at the web of mankind’s future; even your nothing is a spider’s web and a spider that lives on the future’s blood. And when you take, it is like stealing, you small virtuous people; but even among rogues, honour says: ‘One should steal only where one cannot plunder.’ ‘It is given’ – that is also a doctrine of submission. But I tell you, you comfortable people: it is taken, and will be taken more and more from you! 29 Oh, that you would put from you all half willing, and decide upon lethargy as you do upon action! Oh, that you understood my saying: ‘Always do what you will – but first be such as can will! ‘Always love your neighbour as yourselves – but first be such as love themselves – ‘such as love with a great love, such as love with a great contempt!’ Thus speaks Zarathustra the Godless. But why do I speak where no one has my kind of ears? Here it is yet an hour too early for me. Among this people I am my own forerunner, my own cock-crow through dark lanes. But their hour is coming! And mine too is coming! Hourly will they become smaller, poorer, more barren – poor weeds! poor soil! And soon they shall stand before me like arid grass and steppe, and truly! weary of themselves – and longing for fire rather than for water! O blessed hour of the lightning! O mystery before noontide! One day I shall turn them into running fire and heralds with tongues of flame – one day they shall proclaim with tongues of flame: It is coming, it is near, the great noontide! Thus spoke Zarathustra. On the Mount of Olives WINTER, an ill guest, sits in my house; my hands are blue from his friendly handshake. I honour him, this ill guest, but I am glad to let him sit alone. I gladly run away from him; and if you run well you can escape him! With warm feet and warm thoughts do I run yonder where the wind is still, to the sunny corner of my mount of olives. There I laugh at my stern guest and am still fond of him, for he drives the flies away and silences many little noises for me at home. For he will not permit even a gnat to buzz about, far less two gnats; and he makes the streets lonely, so that the moonlight is afraid there at night. He is a hard guest, but I honour him, and do not pray to a fat-bellied fire-idol, as the weaklings do. Rather a little chattering of teeth than idol-worship! – so my nature will have it. And I especially detest all lustful, steaming, musty fire-idols. Whom I love I love better in winter than in summer; I now mock my enemies better and more heartily, since winter sits in my home. Heartily, in truth, even when I crawl into bed – even there my hidden happiness laughs and grows wanton; even my deceptive dream laughs. I, a – crawler? Never in my life have I crawled before the powerful; and if I ever lied, I lied from love. For that reason I am joyful even in my winter bed. A meagre bed warms me more than an opulent one, for I am jealous of my poverty. And it is most faithful to me in the winter. I start each day with a wickedness, I mock winter with a cold bath: my stern house-companion grumbles at that. I also like to tickle him with a wax candle: so that he may finally let the sky emerge from an ash-grey dawn. For I am especially wicked in the morning: at the early hour when the bucket clatters at the well and horses neigh warmly in grey streets. Then I wait impatiently, until the luminous sky at last dawns for me, the snowy-bearded winter sky, the white-haired, ancient sky – the silent, whiter sky, that often conceals even its sun! Did I learn long, luminous silence from it? Or did it learn it from me? Or did each of us devise it himself? The origin of all good things is thousand fold – all good, wanton things spring for joy into existence: how should they do that – once only? Long silence is also a good, wanton thing, and to gaze like the winter sky from a luminous, round-eyed countenance – like it, to conceal one's sun and one's inflexible sun-will: truly, I have learned well this art and this winter wantonness! It is my favourite wickedness and art, that my silence has learned not to betray itself by silence. Rattling words and dice have I outwitted the solemn attendants: my will and purpose shall elude all the stern watchers. So that no one might see down into my profundity and ultimate will – that is why I devised my long, luminous silence. I have found so many shrewd men who veiled their faces and troubled their waters, so that no one might see through them and under them. But the shrewder distrusters and nut-crackers came straight to them: straightway they fished out their best-hidden fish! But the clear, the honest, the transparent – they seem to me the shrewdest silent men: those whose profundity is so deep that even the clearest water does not – betray it. You snowy-bearded winter sky, you round-eyed, white-haired sky above me! O you heavenly image of my soul and its wantonness! And do I not have to hide myself, like one who has swallowed gold, so that my soul shall not be slit open? Do I not have to wear stilts, so that they may not notice my long legs – all these envious and injurious people around me? These reeky, cosy, worn-out, mouldy, woebegone souls – how could their envy endure my happiness? So I show them only ice and winter on my peaks – and not that my mountain also winds all the girdles of sunlight around it! They hear only the whistling of my winter storms: and not that I also fare over warm seas, like passionate, heavy, hot south winds. They even pity my accidents and chances: but my doctrine is: 'Let chance come to me: it is as innocent as a little child!' How could they endure my happiness, if I did not put accidents and the miseries of winter and fur-hats and coverings of snow-clouds around my happiness! – if I did not myself pity their pity, the pity of these envious and injurious people! – if I myself did not sigh and let my teeth chatter in their presence, and patiently let myself be wrapped up in their pity! This is the wise wantonness and benevolence of my soul: it does not bide its winter and frosty storms; neither does it hide its chilblains. For one person, solitude is the escape of an invalid; for another, solitude is escape from the invalids. Let them bear me chattering and sighing with winter cold, all these poor, squint-eyed knaves around me! With such sighing and chattering have I escaped their heated rooms. Let them pity me and sigh with me over my chilblains: 'He will yet freeze to death on the ice of knowledge!' – so they wail. In the meanwhile, I run with warm feet hither and thither upon my mount of olives: in the sunny corner of my mount of olives do I sing and mock all pity. Thus sang Zarathustra. Of Passing By

THUS, slowly making his way among many people and through divers towns, did Zarathustra return indirectly to his mountain and his cave. And behold, on his way he came unawares to the gate of the great city; here, however, a frothing fool with hands outstretched sprang at him and blocked his path. But this was the fool the people called 'Zarathustra's ape': for he had learned from him something of the composition and syntax of language and perhaps also liked to borrow from his store of wisdom. The fool, however, spoke thus to Zarathustra: O Zarathustra, here is the great city: here you have nothing to seek and everything to lose. Why do you want to wade through this mud? Take pity on your feet! Rather spit upon the gate and – turn back! Here is the Hell for hermits' thoughts: here great thoughts are boiled alive and cooked small. Here all great emotions decay: here only little, dry emotions may rattle! Do you not smell already the slaughter-houses and cook-shops of the spirit? Does this city not reek of the fumes of slaughtered spirit? Do you not see the souls hanging like dirty, limp rags? – And they also make newspapers from these rags! Have you not heard how the spirit has here become a play with words? It vomits out repulsive verbal swill! – And they also make newspapers from this verbal swill. They pursue one another and do not know where. They inflame one another, and do not know why. They rattle their tins, they jingle their gold. They are cold and seek warmth in distilled waters; they are inflamed and seek coolness in frozen spirits; they are all ill and diseased with public opinion. All lusts and vices are at home here; but there are virtuous people here, too, there are many adroit, useful virtues: Many adroit virtues with scribbling fingers and behinds hardened to sitting and waiting, blessed with little chest decorations and padded, rumpless daughters. There is also much piety here and much devout spittle-licking and fawning before the God of Hosts. Down 'from on high' drips the star and the gracious spittle; every starless breast longs to go up 'on high'. The moon has its court, and the court has its mooncalves: to all that comes from the court, however, do the paupers and all the adroit pauper-virtues pray. 'I serve, you serve, we serve' – thus does all adroit virtue pray to the prince: so that the merited star may at last be fastened to the narrow breast. But the moon still revolves around all that is earthly: so the prince, too, still revolves around what is most earthly of all: that, however, is the shopkeepers' gold. The God of Hosts is not the god of the golden ingots; the prince proposes, but the shopkeeper – disposes! By all that is luminous and strong and good in you, O Zarathustra! spit upon this city of shopkeepers and turn back! Here all blood flows foul and tepid and frothy through all veins: spit upon the great city that is the great rubbish pile where all the scum froths together! Spit upon the city of flattened souls and narrow breasts, of slant eyes and sticky fingers – upon the city of the importunate, the shameless, the ranters in writing and speech, the overheated ambitious: where everything rotten, disreputable, lustful, gloomy, overripe, ulcerous, conspiratorial festers together – spit upon the great city and turn back! But here Zarathustra interrupted the frothing fool and stopped his mouth. Have done! (cried Zarathustra) Your speech and your kind have long disgusted me! Why did you live so long in the swamp that you had to become a frog and toad yourself? Does not foul, foaming swamp-blood now flow through your own veins, so that you have learned to quack and rail like this? Why did you not go into the forest? Or plough the earth? Is the sea not full of green islands? I despise your contempt; and since you warned me, why did you not warn yourself? My contempt and my bird of warning shall ascend from love alone; not from the swamp! They call you my ape, you frothing fool: but I call you my grunting pig – by grunting you are undoing even my praise of folly. What, then, was it that started you grunting? That nobody had flattered you enough: therefore you sat down beside this filth, so that you might have cause for much grunting – so that you might have cause for much revenge! For all your frothing, you vain fool, is revenge; I have divined you well! But your foolish teaching is harmful to me, even when you are right I And if Zarathustra's teaching were a hundred times justified, you would still – use my teaching falsely! Thus spoke Zarathustra; and he looked at the great city, sighed and was long silent. At length he spoke thus: This great city, and not only this fool, disgusts me. In both there is nothing to make better, nothing to make worse. Woe to this great city! And I wish I could see already the pillar of fire in which it will be consumed! For such pillars of fire must precede the great noontide. Yet this has its time and its own destiny. But I offer you in farewell this precept, you fool: Where one can no longer love, one should – pass by! Thus spoke Zarathustra and passed by the fool and the great city. Of the Apostates 1 A LAS , everything that lately stood green and motley in this meadow already lies faded and grey! And how much honey of hope have I carried from here into my beehives! All these young hearts have already grown old – and not even old! only weary, common, comfortable: they describe it: ‘We have grown pious again.’ But lately I saw them running out in the early morning with bold feet: but the feet of their knowledge grew weary and now they slander even their morning boldness! Truly, many of them once lifted their legs like a dancer, the laughter in my wisdom beckoned to them: then they considered. And now I have seen them bent – to creep to the Cross. Once they fluttered around light and freedom like flies and young poets. A little older, a little colder: and already they are mystifiers and mutterers and stay-at-homes. Did their hearts perhaps despair because solitude devoured me like a whale? Did their ears perhaps listen long and longingly in vain for me and for my trumpet and herald calls? Alas! They are always few whose heart possesses a long-enduring courage and wantonness; and in such, the spirit, too, is patient. The remainder, however, are cowardly. The remainder: that is always the majority, the commonplace, the superfluity, the many-too-many – all these are cowardly! He who is of my sort will also encounter experiences of my sort, so that his first companions must be corpses and buffoons. His second companions, however, will call themselves his believers : a lively flock, full of love, full of folly, full of adolescent adoration. He among men who is of my sort should not grapple his heart to these believers; he who knows fickle-cowardly human nature should not believe in these springs and many-coloured meadows! If they could do otherwise, they would choose otherwise. The half-and-half spoil every whole. Why complain because leaves wither? Let them fall, let them go, O Zarathustra, and do not complain I Rather blow among them with rustling winds – blow among these leaves, O Zarathustra: so that all that is withered may run from you the faster. 2 ‘We have grown pious again’ – thus these apostates confess; and many of them are still too cowardly to confess it. I look into their eyes, then I tell them to their face and to the blushes of their cheeks: You are those who again pray! But it is a disgrace to pray! Not for everyone, but for you and me and for whoever else has his conscience in his head. For joy it is a disgrace to pray! You know it well: the cowardly devil in you who would like to clasp his hands and to fold his arms and to take it easier: – it was this cowardly devil who persuaded you: ‘There is a God!’ Through that , however, have you become one of those who dread the light, whom light never lets rest; now you must stick your head deeper every day into night and fog! And truly, you have chosen well the hour: for even now the night-birds have again flown out. The hour has arrived for all people who fear the light, the evening hour of ease when there is no – ‘ease’ for them. I hear and smell it: the hour for their chase and procession has arrived; not indeed for a wild chase, but for a tame, lame, snuffling, soft-walker's and soft-prayer's chase – for a chase after soulful hypocrites: all mousetraps of the heart have now again been set! And wherever I raise a curtain, a little night-moth comes fluttering out. Has it perhaps been crouching there with another little night-moth? For everywhere I smell little hidden communities; and wherever there are closets, there are new devotees in them and the atmosphere of devotees. They sit together on long evenings and say: 'Let us again become as little children and say Dear God!' – ruined in mouth and stomach by the pious confectioners. Or they observe on long evenings a cunning, lurking Cross-spider, which preaches prudence to the spiders themselves and teaches: 'There is good spinning under Crosses!' Or they sit all day with fishing-rods beside swamps and for that reason think themselves deep; but he who fishes where there are no fish I do not call even superficial! Or they learn to play the harp in pious-joyful style with a song-poet who would like to harp his way into the hearts of young women – for he has grown weary of the old women and their praises. Or they learn to shudder with a learned half-madman who waits in darkened rooms so that the spirits may come to him – and the spirit 30 has quite departed! Or they listen to an old, roving, whistling tramp who has learned from the distressful winds the distress of tones; now he whistles like the wind and preaches distress in distressful tones. And some of them have even become night-watchmen: now they know how to blow horns and to go around at night and awaken old things that have long been asleep. I heard five sayings about old things last night beside the garden wall: they came from such old, distressed, dried-up night-watchmen: 'For a father he does not look after his children enough: human fathers do it better!' 'He is too old! He no longer looks after his children at all'-thus the other night-watchman answered. 'Has he any children? No one can prove it, if he doesn't prove it himself! I have long wished he would prove it thoroughly for once.' 'Prove it? As if he has ever proved anything! He finds it hard to prove things; he thinks it very important that people should believe him.' 'Yes, yes! Belief makes him happy, belief in him. Old people are like that I So shall we be, too!' Thus the two old night-watchmen and light-scarecrows spoke together and thereupon blew their horns distressfully: so it happened last night beside the garden wall. My heart, however, writhed with laughter and was like to break and knew not where to go and sank into the midriff. Truly, it will yet be the death of me, to choke with laughter when I see asses intoxicated and hear night-watchmen thus doubt God. For has not the time for all such doubts long since passed? Who may still awaken such old, sleeping, light-shunning things! With the old gods, they have long since met their end – and truly, they had a fine, merry, divine ending! They did not 'fade away in twilight' 31 – that is a lie! On the contrary: they once – laughed themselves to death! That happened when the most godless saying proceeded from a god himself, the saying: 'There is one God! You shall have no other gods before me!'

– an old wrath-beard of a god, a jealous god, thus forgot himself: And all the gods laughed then and rocked in their chairs and cried: ‘Is not precisely this godliness, that there are gods but no God?’ He who has ears to hear, let him hear. Thus spoke Zarathustra in the town which he loved and which is called ‘The Pied Cow’. For from here he had only two days to go before arriving again at his cave and his animals; and his soul rejoiced continually at the nearness of his home-coming. The Home-Coming O SOLITUDE ! Solitude, my home ! I have lived too long wildly in wild strange lands to come home to you without tears! Now shake your finger at me as mothers do, now smile at me as mothers smile, now say merely: ‘And who was it that once stormed away from me like a storm-wind? – ‘who departing cried: I have sat too long with Solitude, I have unlearned how to be silent! You have surely learned that – now? ‘O Zarathustra, I know all: and that you were lonelier among the crowd, you solitary, than you ever were with me! ‘Loneliness is one thing, solitude another: you have learned that – now! And that among men you will always be wild and strange: ‘wild and strange even when they love you: for above all they want to be indulged! ‘But here you are at your own hearth and home; here you can utter everything and pour out every reason, nothing is here ashamed of hidden, hardened feelings. ‘Here all things come caressingly to your discourse and flatter you: for they want to ride upon your back. Upon every image you here ride to every truth. ‘Here you may speak to all things straight and true: and truly, it sounds as praise to their ears, that someone should speak with all things – honestly! ‘But it is another thing to be lonely. For, do you remember, O Zarathustra? When once your bird cried above you as you stood in the forest undecided, ignorant where to go, beside a corpse. ‘When you said: May my animals lead me! I found it more dangerous among men than among animals. That was loneliness! ‘And do you remember, O Zarathustra? When you sat upon your island, a well of wine among empty buckets, giving and distributing, bestowing and out-pouring among the thirsty: ‘until at last you sat alone thirsty among the intoxicated and lamented each night: “Is it not more blessed to receive than to give? And more blessed to steal than to receive?” – That was loneliness! ‘And do you remember, O Zarathustra? When your stillest hour came and tore you forth from yourself, when it said in an evil whisper: “Speak and break!” – ‘when it made you repent of all your waiting and silence and discouraged your humble courage: That was loneliness!’ O Solitude! Solitude, my home I How blissfully and tenderly does your voice speak to me! We do not question one another, we do not complain to one another, we go openly together through open doors. For with you all is open and clear; and here even the hours run on lighter feet. For time weighs down more heavily in the dark than in the light. Here, the words and word-chests of all existence spring open to me: all existence here wants to become words, all becoming here wants to learn speech from me. Down there, however – all speech is in vain! There, the best wisdom is to forget and pass by: I have learned that – now! He who wants to understand all things among men has to touch all things. But my hands are too clean for that. I even dislike to breathe in their breath; alas, that I lived so long among their noise and bad breath! O blissful stillness around me! O pure odours around me! Oh, how this stillness draws pure breath from a deep breast! Oh, how it listens, this blissful stillness! But down there – everything speaks, everything is unheard. One may ring in one's wisdom with bells – the shopkeeper in the market-place will out-ring it with pennies! Everything among them speaks, no one knows any longer how to understand. Everything falls away into failure, nothing falls any longer into deep wells. Everything among them speaks, nothing prospers and comes to an end any longer. Everything cackles, but who still wants to sit quietly upon the nest and hatch eggs? Everything among them speaks, everything is talked down. And what yesterday was still too hard for time itself and its teeth, today hangs chewed and picked from the mouth of the men of today. Everything among them speaks, everything is betrayed. And what was once called a secret and a secrecy of profound souls, today belongs to the street-trumpeters and other butterflies. O humankind, you strange thing! You noise in dark streets! Now again you lie behind me – my greatest danger lies behind me! My greatest danger always lay in indulgence and sufferance; and all humankind wants to be indulged and suffered. With truths held back, with foolish hand and foolish-fond heart and rich in pity's little lies – that is how I used to live among men. I sat among them disguised, ready to misunderstand myself so that I might endure them, and glad to tell myself: 'You fool, you do not know men!' One forgets what one has learned about men when one lives among men: there is too much foreground in all men – what can far-seeing, far-seeking eyes do there! And when they misunderstood me, I, like a fool, indulged them more than I did myself: for I was accustomed to being hard with myself and often even taking revenge on myself for this indulgence. Stung by poisonous flies and hollowed out like a stone by many drops of wickedness: that is how I sat among them and still told myself: 'Everything small is innocent of its smallness!' Especially those who call themselves 'the good' did I discover to be the most poisonous flies: they sting in all innocence; how could they be – just towards me! Pity teaches him to lie who lives among the good. Pity makes the air stifling for all free souls. For the stupidity of the good is unfathomable. To conceal myself and my riches – that did I learn down there: for I found everybody still poor in spirit. It was my pity's lie that I knew with everybody, that I saw and scented in everybody what was sufficient spirit for him and what was too much spirit for him! Their pedantic wise men: I called them wise, not pedantic – thus I learned to slur words. Their gravediggers: I called them investigators and scholars – thus I learned to confound words. Gravediggers dig diseases for themselves. Evil vapours repose beneath old rubble. One should not stir up the bog. One should live upon mountains. With happy nostrils I breathe again mountain-freedom! At last my nose is delivered from the odour of all humankind! My soul, tickled by sharp breezes as with sparkling wine, sneezes – sneezes and cries to itself: Bless you! Thus spoke Zarathustra. Of the Three Evil Things 1 I N a dream, in my last morning dream, I stood today upon a headland – beyond the world, I held a pair of scales and weighed the world. Oh, that the dawn came to me too soon! It glowed me into wakefulness, the jealous dawn! It is always jealous of the glow of my morning dreams. Measurable to him who has time, weighable to a good weigher, accessible to strong pinions, divivable to divine nutcrackers: thus did my dream find the world. My dream, a bold sailor, half ship half hurricane, silent as a butterfly, impatient as a falcon: how did it have time and patience today for weighing of worlds? Did my wisdom perhaps speak secretly to it, my laughing, wakeful day-wisdom that mocks all ‘infinite worlds’? For my wisdom says: ‘Where power is, there number becomes master: it has more power.’ How confidently did my dream gaze upon this finite world, eager neither for new things nor for old; neither in awe nor in supplication – as if a round apple presented itself to my hand, a ripe, golden apple with a soft, cool, velvety skin – thus the world presented itself to me – as if a tree nodded to me, a wide-branching, strong-willed tree, bent for reclining and as a footstool for the way-weary: thus the world stood upon my headland – as if tender hands brought me a casket – a casket open for the delight of modest, adoring eyes: thus the world presented himself before me today – not so enigmatic as to frighten away human love, not so explicit as to put to sleep human wisdom – a good, human thing was the world to me today, this world of which so many evil things are said! How grateful I am to my morning dream, that today in the early morning I thus weighed the world! It came to me as a good, human thing, this dream and comforter of the heart! And that I may do the same as it by day and learn and imitate its best aspects, I will now place the three most evil things upon the scales and weigh them well and humanly. He who taught how to bless also taught how to curse: which are the three most-cursed things in the world? I will place these upon the scales. Sensual pleasure, lust for power, selfishness : these three have hitherto been cursed the most and held in the worst and most unjust repute – these three will I weigh well and humanly. Well then! Here is my headland and there is the sea: it rolls towards me, shaggy, fawning, the faithful old hundred-headed canine monster that I love. Well then! Here I will hold the scales over the rolling sea: and I choose a witness, too, to look on – you, hermit tree, you heavy-odoured, broad-arched tree that I love! Upon what bridge does the present go over to the hereafter? What compulsion compels the high to bend to the low? And what bids even the highest – to grow higher still? Now the scales stand level and still: I have thrown in three weighty questions, the other scale bears three weighty answers. 2 Sensual pleasure: goad and stake to all hair-shirted despisers of the body and anathematized as ‘the world’ by all afterworldsmen: for it mocks and makes fools of all teachers of confusion and error. Sensual pleasure: to the rabble the slow fire over which they are roasted; to all worm-eaten wood, to all stinking tatters, the ever-ready stewing-oven of lust. Sensual pleasure: innocent and free to free hearts, the earth’s garden-joy, an overflowing of thanks to the present from all the future. Sensual pleasure: a sweet poison only to the withered, but to the lion-willed the great restorative and reverently-preserved wine of wines. Sensual pleasure: the great symbolic happiness of a higher happiness and highest hope. For marriage is promised to many, and more than marriage – to many that are stranger to one another than man and woman: and who has fully conceived how strange man and woman are to one another! Sensual pleasure – but I will fence my thoughts round, and my words too: so that swine and hot fanatics shall not break into my garden! Lust for power: the scourge of fire of the hardest-hearted; the cruel torment reserved by the cruellest for himself; the dark flame of living bonfires. Lust for power: the wicked fly seated upon the vainest peoples; the mocker of all uncertain virtue; which rides upon every horse and every pride. Lust for power: the earthquake that breaks and bursts open all that is decayed and hollow; the rolling, growling, punitive destroyer of whitewashed sepulchres; the flashing question-mark beside premature answers. Lust for power: before its glance man crawls and bends and toils and becomes lower than the swine or the snake – until at last the cry of the great contempt bursts from him – Lust for power: the fearsome teacher of the great contempt, who preaches in the face of cities and empires ‘Away with you!’ – until at last they themselves cry out ‘Away with me !’ Lust for power: which, however, rises enticingly even to the pure and the solitary and up to self-sufficient heights, glowing like a love that paints purple delights enticingly on earthly heavens. Lust for power: but who shall call it lust , when the height longs to stoop down after power I Truly, there is no sickness and lust in such a longing and descent! That the lonely height may not always be solitary and sufficient to itself; that the mountain may descend to the valley and the wind of the heights to the lowlands – Oh who shall find the rightful baptismal and virtuous name for such a longing! ‘Bestowing virtue’ – that is the name Zarathustra once gave the unnameable. And then it also happened – and truly, it happened for the first time! – that his teaching glorified selfishness , the sound, healthy selfishness that issues from a mighty soul – from a mighty soul, to which pertains the exalted body, the beautiful, victorious, refreshing body, around which everything becomes a mirror; the supple, persuasive body, the dancer whose image and epitome is the self-rejoicing soul. The self-rejoicing of such bodies and souls calls itself: ‘Virtue’. Such self-rejoicing protects itself with its doctrines of good and bad as with sacred groves; with the names it gives its happiness it banishes from itself all that is contemptible. It banishes from itself all that is cowardly; it says: Bad – that is to say, cowardly! He who is always worrying, sighing, complaining, and who gleans even the smallest advantage, seems contemptible to it. It also despises all woeful wisdom: for truly, there is also a wisdom that blossoms in darkness, a night-shade wisdom, which is always sighing: 'All is vain!' Timid mistrustfulness seems base to it, as do all who desire oaths instead of looks and hands; and all-too-mistrustful wisdom, for such is the nature of cowardly souls. It regards as baser yet him who is quick to please, who, dog-like, lies upon his back, the humble man; and there is also a wisdom that is humble and dog-like and pious and quick to please. Entirely hateful and loathsome to it is he who will never defend himself, who swallows down poisonous spittle and evil looks, the too-patient man who puts up with everything, is content with everything: for that is the nature of slaves. Whether one be servile before gods and divine kicks, or before men and the silly opinions of men: it spits at skies of all kinds, this glorious selfishness! Bad: that is what it calls all that is broken-down and niggardly-servile, unclear, blinking eyes, oppressed hearts, and that false, yielding type of man who kisses with broad, cowardly lips. And sham-wisdom: that is what it calls all wit that slaves and old men and weary men affect; and especially the whole bad, raving, over-clever priest-foolishness! And to ill-use selfishness – precisely that has been virtue and called virtue. And 'selfless' – that is what, with good reason, all these world-weary cowards and Cross-spiders wished to be! But now the day, the transformation, the sword of judgement, the great noontide comes to them all: then many things shall be revealed! And he who declares the Ego healthy and holy and selfishness glorious – truly, he, a prophet, declares too what he knows: 'Behold, it comes, it is near, the great noontide!' Thus spoke Zarathustra. Of the Spirit of Gravity 1 MY glib tongue – is of the people; I speak too coarsely and warmly for silky rabbits. And my words sound even stranger to all inky fish and scribbling foxes. My hand – is a fool's hand: woe to all tables and walls and whatever has room left for fool's scribbling, fool's doodling! My foot – is a horse's foot: with it I trot and trample up hill, down dale, hither and thither over the fields, and am the Devil's own for joy when I am out at a gallop. My stomach – is it perhaps an eagle's stomach? For it likes lamb's flesh best of all. But it is certainly a bird's stomach. Nourished with innocent and few things, ready and impatient to fly, to fly away – that is my nature now: how should there not be something of the bird's nature in it! And especially bird-like is that I am enemy to the Spirit of Gravity: and truly, mortal enemy, arch-enemy, born enemy! Oh where has my enmity not flown and strayed already! I could sing a song about that – and I will sing one, although I am alone in an empty house and have to sing it to my own ears. There are other singers, to be sure, whose voices are softened, whose hands are eloquent, whose eyes are expressive, whose hearts are awakened, only when the house is full: I am not one of them. 2 He who will one day teach men to fly will have moved all boundary-stones; all boundary-stones will themselves fly into the air to him, he will baptize the earth anew – as ‘the weightless’. The ostrich runs faster than any horse, but even he sticks his head heavily into heavy earth: that is what the man who cannot yet fly is like. He calls earth and life heavy: and so will the Spirit of Gravity have it! But he who wants to become light and a bird must love himself – thus do I teach. Not with the love of the sick and diseased, to be sure: for with them even self-love stinks! One must learn to love oneself with a sound and healthy love, so that one may endure it with oneself and not go roaming about – thus do I teach. Such roaming about calls itself ‘love of one’s neighbour’: these words have been up to now the best for lying and dissembling, and especially for those who were oppressive to everybody. And truly, to learn to love oneself is no commandment for today or for tomorrow. Rather is this art the finest, subtlest, ultimate, and most patient of all. For all his possessions are well concealed from the possessor; and of all treasure pits, one’s own is the last to be digged – the Spirit of Gravity is the cause of that. Almost in the cradle are we presented with heavy words and values: this dowry calls itself ‘Good’ and ‘Evil’. For its sake we are forgiven for being alive. And we suffer little children to come to us, to prevent them in good time from loving themselves: the Spirit of Gravity is the cause of that. And we – we bear loyally what we have been given upon hard shoulders over rugged mountains! And when we sweat we are told: ‘Yes, life is hard to bear!’ But only man is hard to bear! That is because he bears too many foreign things upon his shoulders. Like the camel, he kneels down and lets himself be well laden. Especially the strong, weight-bearing man in whom dwell respect and awe: he has laden too many foreign heavy words and values upon himself – now life seems to him a desert! And truly I Many things that are one’s own are hard to bear, too! And much that is intrinsic in man is like the oyster, that is loathsome and slippery and hard to grasp – so that a noble shell with noble embellishments must intercede for it. But one has to learn this art as well: to have a shell and a fair appearance and a prudent blindness! Again, it is deceptive about many things in man that many a shell is inferior and wretched and too much of a shell. Much hidden goodness and power is never guessed at; the most exquisite dainties find no tasters! Women, or the most exquisite of them, know this: a little fatter, a little thinner – oh, how much fate lies in so little! Man is difficult to discover, most of all to himself; the spirit often tells lies about the soul. The Spirit of Gravity is the cause of that. But he has discovered himself who says: This is my good and evil: he has silenced thereby the mole and dwarf who says: ‘Good for all, evil for all.’ Truly, I dislike also those who call everything good and this world the best of all. I call such people the all-contented. All-contentedness that knows how to taste everything: that is not the best taste! I honour the obstinate, fastidious tongues and stomachs that have learned to say ‘I’ and ‘Yes’ and ‘No’. But to chew and digest everything – that is to have a really swinish nature! Always to say Ye-a 32

– only the ass and those like him have learned that. Deep yellow and burning red: that is to my taste – it mixes blood with all colours. But he who whitewashes his house betrays to me a whitewashed soul. One loves mummies, the other phantoms; and both alike enemy to all flesh and blood – oh, how both offend my taste! For I love blood. And I do not want to stay and dwell where everyone spews and spits: that is now my taste – I would rather live among thieves and perjurers. No one bears gold in his mouth. More offensive to me, however, are all lickspittles; and the most offensive beast of a man I ever found I baptized Parasite: it would not love, yet wanted to live by love. I call wretched all who have only one choice: to become an evil beast or an evil tamer of beasts: I would build no tabernacles among these men. I also call wretched those who always have to wait – they offend my taste: all tax-collectors and shopkeepers and kings and other keepers of lands and shops. Truly, I too have learned to wait, I have learned it from the very heart, but only to wait for myself. And above all I have learned to stand and to walk and to run and to jump and to climb and to dance. This, however, is my teaching: He who wants to learn to fly one day must first learn to stand and to walk and to run and to climb and to dance – you cannot learn to fly by flying! With rope-ladders I learned to climb to many a window, with agile legs I climbed up high masts: to sit upon high masts of knowledge seemed to me no small happiness – to flicker like little flames upon high masts: a little light, to be sure, but yet a great comfort to castaway sailors and the shipwrecked! I came to my truth by diverse paths and in diverse ways: it was not upon a single ladder that I climbed to the height where my eyes survey my distances. And I have asked the way only unwillingly – that has always offended my taste! I have rather questioned and attempted the ways themselves. All my progress has been an attempting and a questioning – and truly, one has to learn how to answer such questioning! That however – is to my taste: not good taste, not bad taste, but my taste, which I no longer conceal and of which I am no longer ashamed. ‘This – is now my way: where is yours?’ Thus I answered those who asked me ‘the way’. For the way – does not exist! Thus spoke Zarathustra. Of Old and New Law – Tables 1 H E R E I sit and wait, old shattered law-tables around me and also new, half-written law-tables. When will my hour come? – the hour of my down-going, my descent: for I want to go to men once more. For that I now wait: for first the sign that it is my hour must come to me – namely, the laughing lion with the flock of doves. Meanwhile I talk to myself, as one who has plenty of time. No one tells me anything new; so I tell myself to myself. 2 When I visited men, I found them sitting upon an old self-conceit. Each one thought he had long since known what was good and evil for man. All talk of virtue seemed to them an ancient wearied affair; and he who wished to sleep well spoke of ‘good’ and ‘evil’ before retiring. I disturbed this somnolence when I taught that nobody yet knows what is good and evil – unless it be the creator!

But he it is who creates a goal for mankind and gives the earth its meaning and its future: he it is who creates the quality of good and evil in things. And I bade them overturn their old professorial chairs, and wherever that old self-conceit had sat. I bade them laugh at their great masters of virtue and saints and poets and world-redeemers. I bade them laugh at their gloomy sages, and whoever had sat as a black scarecrow, cautioning, on the tree of life. I sat myself on their great grave-street, and even beside carrion and vultures – and I laughed over all their ‘past’ and its decayed expiring glory. Truly, like Lenten preachers and fools did I cry anger and shame over all their great and small things – their best is so very small! Their worst is so very small! – thus I laughed. Thus from out of me cried and laughed my wise desire, which was born on the mountains, a wild wisdom, in truth! – my great desire with rushing wings. And often it tore me forth and up and away and in the midst of laughter: and then indeed I flew, an arrow, quivering with sun-intoxicated rapture: out into the distant future, which no dream has yet seen, into warmer Souths than artists have ever dreamed of, there where gods, dancing, are ashamed of all clothes – so that I might speak in parables, and hobble and stutter like poets: and truly, I am ashamed that I still have to be a poet! Where all becoming seemed to me the dancing of gods and the wantonness of gods, and the world unrestrained and abandoned and fleeing back to itself – as many gods eternally fleeing and re-seeking one another, as many gods blissfully self-contradicting, communing again and belonging again to one another – Where all time seemed to me a blissful mockery of moments, where necessity was freedom itself, which blissfully played with the goad of freedom – Where I found again my old devil and arch-enemy, the Spirit of Gravity, and all that he created: compulsion, dogma, need and consequence and purpose and will and good and evil: For must there not exist that which is danced upon, danced across? Must there not be moles and heavy dwarfs – for the sake of the nimble, the nimblest? 3 There it was too that I picked up the word ‘Superman’ and that man is something that must be overcome, that man is a bridge and not a goal; counting himself happy for his noontides and evenings, as a way to new dawns: Zarathustra’s saying of the great noontide, and what ever else I have hung up over men, like a purple evening afterglow. Truly, I showed them new stars, together with new nights – and over cloud and day and night I spread out laughter like a coloured canopy. I taught them all my art and aims: to compose into one and bring together what is fragment and riddle and dreadful chance in man – as poet, reader of riddles, and redeemer of chance, I taught them to create the future, and to redeem by creating – all that was past. To redeem that past of mankind and to transform every ‘It was’, until the will says: ‘But I willed it thus! So shall I will it-’ this did I call redemption, this alone did I teach them to call redemption. Now I await my redemption – that I may go to them for the last time. For I want to go to man once more: I want to go under among them, I want to give them, dying, my richest gift! From the sun when it goes down, that superabundant star, I learned this: then, from inexhaustible riches it pours out gold into the sea – so that the poorest fisherman rows with golden oars! For once I saw this, and did not tire of weeping to see it. Like the sun, Zarathustra also wants to go down: now he sits here and waits, old shattered law-tables around him and also new law-tables – half-written. 4 Behold, here is a new law-table: but where are my brothers, to bear it with me to the valley and to fleshly hearts? Thus commands my great love for the most distant men: Do not spare your neighbour! Man is something that must be overcome. There are diverse paths and ways to overcoming: just look to it! But only a buffoon thinks: ‘Man can also jumped over’. Overcome yourself even in your neighbour: and a right that you can seize for yourself you should not accept as a gift! What you do, no one can do to you. Behold, there is no requital. He who cannot command himself should obey. And many a one can command himself but be very remiss in obeying what he commands! 5 This is the will of those of noble soul: they desire nothing gratis, least of all life. He who is of the mob wants to live gratis; we others, however, to whom life has given itself- we are always considering what we can best give in return! And truly, it is a noble speech that says: ‘What life has promised us, we shall keep that promise – to life!’ One should not wish to enjoy where one has not given enjoyment. And – one should not wish to enjoy! For enjoyment and innocence are the most modest things: neither want to be looked for. One should have them – but one should look rather for guilt and pain! 6 O my brothers, he who is a first-born is always sacrificed. Now we are first-born. We all bleed at secret sacrificial tables, we all burn and roast to the honour of ancient idols. Our best is still young: this excites old palates. Our flesh is tender, our skin is only a lamb-skin: – how should we not excite old idol-priests! He still lives on in us ourselves, the old idol-priest, who roasts our best for his feast. Alas, my brothers, how should the firstborn not be sacrifices! But our kind will have it thus; and I love those who do not wish to preserve themselves. I love with my whole love those who go down and perish: for they are going beyond. 7 To be truthful – few can do it! And those who can, will not! Least of all, however, can the good be truthful. Oh these good men! Good men never tell the truth; to be good in that way is a sickness of the spirit. They yield, these good men, they acquiesce, their hearts imitate, they obey from the heart: but he who obeys does not listen to himself! All that the good call evil must come together that one truth may be born: O my brothers, are you, too, evil enough for this truth? The bold attempt, prolonged mistrust, the cruel No, satiety, the cutting into the living – how seldom do these come together! But from such seed is – truth raised. Hitherto all knowledge has grown up beside the bad conscience! Shatter, you enlightened men, shatter the old law-tables! 8 When water is planked over so that it can be walked upon, when gangway and railings span the stream: truly, he is not believed who says: 'Everything is in flux.' 33 On the contrary, even simpletons contradict him. 'What?' say the simpletons, 'everything in flux? But there are planks and railings over the stream! 'Over the stream everything is firmly fixed, all the values of things, the bridges, concepts, all "Good" and "Evil": all are firmly fixed !' But when hard winter comes, the animal-tamer of streams, then even the cleverest learn mistrust; and truly, not only the simpletons say then: 'Is not everything meant to – stand still?' 'Fundamentally, everything stands still' – that is a proper winter doctrine, a fine thing for unfruitful seasons, a fine consolation for hibernators and stay at-homes. 'Fundamentally, everything stands still' – the thawing wind, however, preaches to the contrary! The thawing wind, an ox that is no ploughing ox – a raging ox, a destroyer that breaks ice with its angry horns! Ice, however – breaks gangways! O my brothers, is everything not now in flux? Have not all railings and gangways fallen into the water and come to nothing? Who can still cling to 'good' and 'evil'? 'Woe to us! Hail to us! The thawing wind is blowing!' – Preach thus, O my brothers, through every street! 9 There is an old delusion that is called good and evil. Up to now, this delusion has orbited about prophets and astrologers. Once people believed in prophets and astrologers: and therefore people believed: 'Everything is fate: you shall, for you must!' Then again people mistrusted all prophets and astrologers: and therefore people believed: 'Everything is freedom: you can, for you will!' O my brothers, up to now there has been only supposition, not knowledge, concerning the stars and the future: and therefore there has hitherto been only supposition, not knowledge, concerning good and evil! 10 'You shall not steal! You shall not kill!' – such words were once called holy; in their presence people bowed their knees and their heads and removed their shoes. But I ask you: Where have there ever been better thieves and killers in the world than such holy words have been? Is there not in all life itself- stealing and killing? And when such words were called holy was not truth itself – killed? Or was it a sermon of death that called holy that which contradicted and opposed all life? – O my brothers, shatter, shatter the old law-tables! 11 My pity for all that is past is that I see: It has been handed over – handed over to the favour, the spirit, the madness of every generation that comes and transforms everything that has been into its own bridge! A great despot could come, a shrewd devil, who with his favour and disfavour could compel and constrain all that is past, until it became his bridge and prognostic and herald and cock-crow. This, however, is the other danger and my other pity: he who is of the mob remembers back to his grandfather – with his grandfather, however, time stops. Thus all that is past is handed over: for the mob could one day become master, and all time be drowned in shallow waters. Therefore, O my brothers, is a new nobility needed: to oppose all mob-rule and all despotism and to write anew upon new law-tables the word: 'Noble'. For many noblemen are needed, and noblemen of many kinds, for nobility to exist !

Or, as I once said in a parable: ‘Precisely this is godliness, that there are gods but no God!’ 12 O my brothers, I direct and consecrate you to a new nobility: you shall become begetters and cultivators and sowers of the future – truly, not to a nobility that you could buy like shopkeepers with shopkeepers’ gold: for all that has a price is of little value. Let where you are going, not where you come from, henceforth be your honour I Your will and your foot that desires to step out beyond you – let them be your new honour! Truly, not that you have served a prince – of what account are princes now! – or have become a bulwark to that which stands, that it may stand more firmly! Not that your family have grown courtly at courts and you have learned to stand for long hours in shallow pools, motley-coloured like a flamingo: for being able to stand is a merit with courtiers; and all courtiers believe that part of the bliss after death is – being allowed to sit! And not that a ghost, called holy, led your ancestors into promised lands that I do not praise: for in the land where the worst of all trees, the Cross, grew – there is nothing to praise! – and truly, wherever this ‘Holy Ghost’ led its knights, goats and geese and Cross-eyed and wrong-headed fellows always – ran at the head of the procession! O my brothers, your nobility shall not gaze backward, but outward ! You shall be fugitives from all fatherlands and fore-fatherlands! You shall love your children’s land : let this love be your new nobility – the undiscovered land in the furthest sea! I bid your sails seek it and seek it! You shall make amends to your children for being the children of your fathers: thus you shall redeem all that is past I This new law-table do I put over you! 13 ‘Wherefore live? All is vanity! To live – that means to thrash straw; to live – that means to burn oneself and yet not become warm.’ Ancient rigmarole like this still counts as ‘wisdom’; and it is the more honoured because it is old and smells damp. Even mould ennobles. Children might speak in this way: they shrink from the fire because it has burned them! There is much childishness in the old books of wisdom. And how should he who is always ‘thrashing straw’ be allowed to slander thrashing! Such a fool would have to have his mouth stopped! Such people sit down to dinner and bring nothing with them, not even a good appetite – and now they say slanderously: ‘All is vanity!’ But to eat and drink well, O my brothers, is truly no vain art! Shatter, shatter the law-tables of the never-joyful! 14 ‘To the pure all things are pure’ – thus speaks the people. But I say to you: To the swine all things become swinish! That is why the fanatics and hypocrites with bowed heads whose hearts too are bowed down preach: ‘The world itself is a filthy monster.’ For they all have an unclean spirit; but especially those who have no peace or rest except they see the world from behind – these afterworldsmen! I tell these to their faces, although it does not sound pleasant: The world resembles man in that it has a behind – so much is true! There is much filth in the world: so much is true! But the world itself is not yet a filthy monster on that account! There is wisdom in the fact that much in the world smells ill:

disgust itself creates wings and water-divining powers! Even in the best there is something to excite disgust; and even the best is something that must be overcome! O my brothers, there is much wisdom in the fact that there is much filth in the world! 15 These sayings I heard pious afterworldsmen say to their consciences, and truly without deceit or falsehood, although there is nothing more false or deceitful in the world. ‘Let the world be! Do not raise even a finger against it!’ ‘Let him who wants to slaughter and kill and harass and swindle the people: do not raise even a finger against it! Thus they will yet learn to renounce the world.’ ‘And your own reason – you shall yourself choke and throttle; for it is a reason of this world – thus you shall yourself learn to renounce the world.’ Shatter, O my brothers, shatter these ancient law-tables of the pious! Shatter by your teachings the sayings of the world-calumniators! 16 ‘He who learns much, unlearns all violent desiring’ – people whisper that to one another today in all dark streets. ‘Wisdom makes weary, nothing is worth while; you shall not desire!’ – I found this new law-table hanging even in public market-places. Shatter, O my brothers, shatter this new law-table too! The world-weary and the preachers of death hung it up, and so did the jailers: for behold, it is also a sermon urging slavery: They have learned badly and the best things not at all, they have learned everything too early and too fast: they have eaten badly – that is how they got that stomach-ache – for their spirit is stomach-ache: it counsels death! For truly, my brothers, the spirit is a stomach! Life is a fountain of delight: but all wells are poisoned for him from whom an aching stomach, the father of affliction, speaks. To know: that is delight to the lion-willed! But he who has grown weary is only ‘willed’, he is the sport of every wave. And that is always the nature of weak men: they lose themselves on their way. And at last their weariness asks: ‘Why have we ever taken any way? It is a matter of indifference!’ It sounds pleasant to their ears when it is preached: ‘Nothing is worth while! You shall not will!’ This, however, is a sermon urging slavery. O my brothers, Zarathustra comes as a fresh, blustering wind to all the way-weary; he will yet make many noses sneeze! My liberal breath blows even through walls and into prisons and imprisoned spirits! Willing liberates: for willing is creating: thus I teach. And you should learn only for creating! And you should first learn from me even how to learn, how to learn well! – He who has ears to hear, let him hear! 17 There stands the boat – over there is perhaps the way to the great Nothingness. But who wants to step into this ‘perhaps’? None of you wants to step into the death-boat! How then could you be world-weary? World-weary! And you have not yet even parted from the earth!! have always found you still greedy for the earth, still in love with your own weariness of the earth! Your lip does not hang down in vain – a little earthly wish still sits upon it I And in your eye – does not a little cloud of unforgotten earthly joy swim there? There are many excellent inventions on earth, some useful, some pleasant: the earth is to be loved for their sake. And there are many things so well devised that they are like women's breasts: at the same time useful and pleasant. But you world-weary people! You should be given a stroke of the cane! Your legs should be made sprightly again with cane-strokes! For: if you are not invalids and worn-out wretches of whom the earth is weary, you are sly sluggards or dainty, sneaking lust-cats. And if you will not again run about merrily, you shall – pass away! One should not want to be physician to the incurable: thus Zarathustra teaches: so you shall pass away! But to make an end requires more courage than to make a new verse: all physicians and poets know that. 18 O my brothers, there are law-tables framed by weariness and law-tables framed by laziness, indolent laziness: although they speak similarly they want to be heard differently. Look here at this languishing man! He is only an inch from his goal, but from weariness he has laid himself defiantly here in the dust: this valiant man! He yawns from weariness at the path and the earth and the goal and at himself: he refuses to take another step – this valiant man! Now the sun burns down upon him and the dogs lick his sweat: but he lies there in his defiance and prefers to languish – to languish an inch from his goal! Truly, he will have to be pulled into his heaven by the hair – this hero! Better to leave him lying where he has laid himself, so that sleep, the comforter, may come to him with cooling, murmuring rain: Let him lie until he awakes of his own accord, until of his own accord he disavows all weariness and what weariness has taught through him! Only, my brothers, scare away the dogs from him, the indolent skulkers, and all the swarming vermin – all the swarming 'cultured' vermin who feast upon the sweat of every hero! 19 I form circles and holy boundaries around myself; fewer and fewer climb with me upon higher and higher mountains: I build a mountain-range out of holier and holier mountains. But wherever you would climb with me, O my brothers, see to it that we parasite climbs with you! Parasite: that is a worm, a creeping, supple worm, that wants to grow fat on your sick, sore places. And it is its art to divine the weary spots in climbing souls: it builds its loathsome nest in your grief and dejection, in your tender modesty. Where the strong man is weak, where the noble man is too gentle, there it builds its loathsome nest: the parasite dwells where the great man possesses little sore places. Which is the highest type of being and which the lowest? The parasite is the lowest type; but he who is of the highest type nourishes the most parasites. For the soul which possesses the longest ladder and can descend the deepest: how should the most parasites not sit upon it? the most spacious soul, which can run and stray and roam the farthest into itself; the most necessary soul, which out of joy hurls itself into chance – the existing soul which plunges into becoming; the possessing soul which wants to partake in desire and longing – the soul fleeing from itself which retrieves itself in the widest sphere; the wisest soul, to which foolishness speaks sweetest – the soul that loves itself the most, in which all things have their current and countercurrent and ebb and flow: – oh how should the highest soul not possess the worst parasites? 20 O my brothers, am I then cruel? But I say: That which is falling should also be pushed! Everything of today – it is falling, it is decaying: who would support it? But I – want to push it too! Do you know the delight that rolls stones into precipitous depths? – These men of today: just see how they roll into my depths! I am a prologue to better players, O my brothers! An example! 34 Follow my example! And him you do not teach to fly, teach – to fall faster! 21 I love the brave: but it is not enough to be a swordsman, one must also know against whom to be a swordsman! And there is often more bravery in containing oneself and passing by: in order to spare oneself for a worthier enemy! You should have enemies whom you hate but not enemies whom you despise: you must be proud of your enemy: thus I taught once before. You should spare yourselves, O my friends, for a worthier enemy: therefore you must pass many things by, especially must you pass by many of the rabble who din in your ears about people and peoples. Keep your eye clear of their For and Against! There is much right, much wrong in it: whoever looks on grows angry. To look in, to weigh in – that comes to the same thing in this case: therefore go off into the forests and lay your sword to sleep! Go your ways! And let people and peoples go theirs! – dark ways, to be sure, on which not one hope lightens any longer! Let the shopkeeper rule where everything that still glisters is – shopkeeper’s gold! The age of kings is past: what today calls itself the people deserves no king. Just see how these people themselves now behave like shopkeepers: they glean the smallest advantage from sweepings of every kind. They lie in wait for one another, they wheedle things out of one another – they call that ‘good neighbourliness’. Oh blessed, distant time when a people said to itself: ‘I want to be – master over peoples!’ For, my brothers: the best shall rule, the best wants to rule! And where it is taught differently, there – the best is lacking. 22 If they – had bread for nothing, alas! – what would they cry for! Their maintenance – that is their proper entertainment; 35 and life shall be hard for them! They are beasts of prey: even in their ‘working’ – there is robbery, even in their ‘earning’ – there is fraud! Therefore life shall be hard for them! Thus they shall become finer beasts of prey, subtler, cleverer, more man-like beasts of prey: for man is the finest beast of prey. Man has already robbed all beasts of their virtues: that is why, of all beasts, life is the hardest for man. Only the birds are still beyond him. And if man should learn to fly, alas I to what height – would his rapaciousness fly! 23 This is how I would have man and woman: the one fit for war, the other fit for bearing children, but both fit for dancing with head and heels. And let that day be lost to us on which we did not dance once! And let that wisdom be false to us that brought no laughter with it! 24 Your marriage-contracting: see it is not a bad contracting . You have decided too quickly: from that follows – break up of marriage. 36 And yet rather break up of marriage than bending of marriage, lying in marriage! – A woman said to me: ‘True, I broke up my marriage, but first my marriage – broke me up!’ I have always found the badly-paired to be the most revengeful: they make everybody suffer for the fact that they are no longer single. For that reason I want honest people to say to one another: ‘We love each other: let us see to it that we stay in love! Or shall our promise be a mistake? 37 ‘Allow us a term and a little marriage, to see if we are fit for the great marriage! It is a big thing always to be with another!’ Thus I counsel all honest people; and what would be my love for the Superman and for everything to come if I should counsel and speak otherwise! To propagate yourselves, not only forward but upward – may the garden of marriage assist you, O my brothers! 25 He who has grown wise concerning old origins, behold, he will at last seek new springs of the future and new origins. O my brothers, it will not be long before new peoples shall arise and new springs rush down into new depths. For the earthquake – that blocks many wells and causes much thirst – also brings to light inner powers and secret things. The earthquake reveals new springs. In the earthquake of ancient peoples new springs break forth. And around him who cries: ‘Behold here a well for many who are thirsty, one heart for many who long, one will for many instruments’ – around him assembles a people, that is to say: many experimenters. Who can command, who can obey – that is experimented here! Alas, with what protracted searching and succeeding, and failing and learning and experimenting anew! Human society: that is an experiment, so I teach – a long search: 38 it seeks, however, the commander! – an experiment, O my brothers I And not a ‘contract’ I Shatter, shatter that expression of the soft-hearted and half-and-half! 26 O my brothers! With whom does the greatest danger for the whole human future lie? Is it not with the good and just?– with those who say and feel in their hearts: ‘We already know what is good and just, we possess it too; woe to those who are still searching for it!’ And whatever harm the wicked may do, the harm the good do is the most harmful harm! And whatever harm the world-calumniators may do, the harm the good do is the most harmful harm. O my brothers, someone who once looked into the heart of the good and just said: ‘They are the Pharisees.’ But he was not understood. The good and just themselves could not understand him: their spirit is imprisoned in their good conscience. The stupidity of the good is unfathomably clever. But it is the truth: the good have to be Pharisees – they have no choice! The good have to crucify him who devises his own virtue! That is the truth! But the second man to discover their country, the country, heart, and soil of the good and just, was he who asked: ‘Whom do they hate the most?’ They hate the creator most: him who breaks the law-tables and the old values, the breaker – they call him the law-breaker. For the good – cannot create: they are always the beginning of the end:– they crucify him who writes new values on new law-tables, they sacrifice the future to themselves – they crucify the whole human future! The good – have always been the beginning of the end. 27 O my brothers, have you understood this saying, too? And what I once said about the 'Ultimate Man'? With whom does the greatest danger to the whole human future lie? Is it not with the good and just? Shatter, shatter the good and just! – O my brothers, have you understood this saying, too? 28 Do you flee from me? Are you frightened? Do you tremble at this saying? O my brothers, when I bade you shatter the good and the law-tables of the good, only then did I embark mankind upon its high seas. And only now does the great terror, the great prospect, the great sickness, the great disgust, the great sea-sickness come to it. The good taught you false shores and false securities; you were born and kept in the lies of the good. Everything has been distorted and twisted down to its very bottom through the good. But he who discovered the country of 'Man', also discovered the country of 'Human Future'. Now you shall be seafarers, brave, patient seafarers! Stand up straight in good time, O my brothers, learn to stand up straight! The sea is stormy: many want to straighten themselves again by your aid. The sea is stormy: everything is at sea. Well then! Come on, you old seaman-hearts! What of fatherland! Our helm wants to fare away, out to where our children's land is! Out, away, more stormy than the sea, storms our great longing! 29 'Why so hard?' the charcoal once said to the diamond; 'for are we not close relations?' Why so soft? O my brothers, thus I ask you: for are you not – my brothers? Why so soft, so unresisting and yielding? Why is there so much denial and abnegation in your hearts? So little fate in your glances? And if you will not be fates, if you will not be inexorable: how can you – conquer with me? And if your hardness will not flash and cut and cut to pieces: how can you one day – create with me? For creators are hard. And it must seem bliss to you to press your hand upon millennia as upon wax, bliss to write upon the will of millennia as upon metal – harder than metal, nobler than metal. Only the noblest is perfectly hard. This new law-table do I put over you, O my brothers: Become hard! 30 O my Will! My essential, my necessity, dispeller of need! Preserve me from all petty victories! O my soul's predestination, which I call destiny! In-me! Over-me! Preserve and spare me for a great destiny! And your last greatness, my Will, save for your last – that you may be inexorable in your victory! Ah, who has not succumbed to his own victory! Ah, whose eye has not dimmed in this intoxicated twilight! Ah, whose foot has not stumbled and in victory forgotten – how to stand! That I may one day be ready and ripe in the great noontide: ready and ripe like glowing ore, like cloud heavy with lightning and like swelling milk-udder – ready for myself and my most secret Will: a bow eager for its arrow, an arrow eager for its star – a star, ready and ripe in its noontide, glowing, transpierced, blissful through annihilating sun-arrows – a sun itself and an inexorable sun-will, ready for annihilation in victory! O Will, my essential, my necessity, dispeller of need! Spare me for one great victory! Thus spoke Zarathustra. The Convalescent 1 O

NE morning, not long after his return to the cave, Zarathustra sprang up from his bed like a madman, cried with a terrible voice, and behaved as if someone else were lying on the bed and would not rise from it; and Zarathustra's voice rang out in such a way that his animals came to him in terror and from all the caves and hiding-places in the neighbourhood of Zarathustra's cave all the creatures slipped away, flying, fluttering, creeping, jumping, according to the kind of foot or wing each had been given. Zarathustra, however, spoke these words: Up, abysmal thought, up from my depths! I am your cockerel and dawn, sleepy worm: up! up! My voice shall soon crow you awake! Loosen the fetters of your ears: listen! For I want to hear you! Up! Up! Here is thunder enough to make even the graves listen! And wipe the sleep and all the dimness and blindness from your eyes! Hear me with your eyes, too: my voice is a medicine even for those born blind. And once you are awake you shall stay awake for ever. It is not my way to awaken great-grandmothers from sleep in order to bid them – go back to sleep! 39 Are you moving, stretching, rattling? Up! Up! You shall not rattle, you shall – speak to me! Zarathustra the Godless calls you! I, Zarathustra, the advocate of life, the advocate of suffering, the advocate of the circle – I call you, my most abysmal thought! Ah! you are coming – I hear you! My abyss speaks, I have turned my ultimate depth into the light! Ah! Come here! Give me your hand – ha! don't! Ha, ha! – Disgust, disgust, disgust – woe is me! 2 Hardly had Zarathustra spoken these words, however, when he fell down like a dead man and remained like a dead man for a long time. But when he again came to himself, he was pale and trembling and remained lying down and for a long time would neither eat nor drink. This condition lasted seven days; his animals, however, did not leave him by day or night, except that the eagle flew off to fetch food. And whatever he had collected and fetched he laid upon Zarathustra's bed: so that at last Zarathustra lay among yellow and red berries, grapes, rosy apples, sweet-smelling herbs and pine-cones. At his feet, however, two lambs were spread, which the eagle had, with difficulty, carried off from their shepherd. At last, after seven days, Zarathustra raised himself in his bed, took a rosy apple in his hand, smelt it, and found its odour pleasant. Then his animals thought the time had come to speak with him. 'O Zarathustra,' they said, 'now you have lain like that seven days, with heavy eyes: will you not now get to your feet again? 'Step out of your cave: the world awaits you like a garden. The wind is laden with heavy fragrance that longs for you; and all the brooks would like to run after you. 'All things long for you, since you have been alone seven days – step out of your cave! All things want to be your physicians! 'Has perhaps a new knowledge come to you, a bitter, oppressive knowledge? You have lain like leavened dough, your soul has risen and overflowed its brim.' 'O my animals,' answered Zarathustra, 'go on talking and let me listen! Your talking is such refreshment: where there is talking, the world is like a garden to me. How sweet it is, that words and sounds of music exist: are words and music not rainbows and seeming bridges between things eternally separated? ‘Every soul is a world of its own; for every soul every other soul is an afterworld. ‘Appearance lies most beautifully among the most alike; for the smallest gap is the most difficult to bridge. ‘For me – how could there be an outside-of-me? There is no outside! But we forget that, when we hear music; how sweet it is, that we forget! ‘Are things not given names and musical sounds, so that man may refresh himself with things? Speech is a beautiful foolery: with it man dances over all things. ‘How sweet is all speech and all the falsehoods of music! With music does our love dance upon many-coloured rainbows.’ ‘O Zarathustra,’ said the animals then, ‘all things themselves dance for such as think as we: they come and offer their hand and laugh and flee – and return. ‘Everything goes, everything returns; the wheel of existence rolls for ever. Everything dies, everything blossoms anew; the year of existence runs on for ever. ‘Everything breaks, everything is joined anew; the same house of existence builds itself for ever. Everything departs, everything meets again; the ring of existence is true to itself for ever. ‘Existence begins in every instant; the ball There rolls around every Here. The middle is everywhere. The path of eternity is crooked.’ ‘O you buffoons and barrel-organs!’ answered Zarathustra and smiled again; ‘how well you know what had to be fulfilled in seven days: ‘and how that monster crept into my throat and choked me! But I bit its head off and spat it away. ‘And you – have already made a hurdy-gurdy song of it? I, however, lie here now, still weary from this biting and spitting away, still sick with my own redemption. ‘And you looked on at it all? O my animals, are you, too, cruel? Did you desire to be spectators of my great pain, as men do? For man is the cruellest animal. ‘More than anything on earth he enjoys tragedies, bullfights, and crucifixions; and when he invented Hell for himself, behold, it was his heaven on earth. ‘When the great man cries out, straightway the little man comes running; his tongue is hanging from his mouth with lasciviousness. He, however, calls it his “pity”. ‘The little man, especially the poet – how zealously he accuses life in words! Listen to it, but do not overlook the delight that is in all accusation! ‘Such accusers of life: life overcomes them with a glance of its eye. “Do you love me?” it says impudently; “just wait a little, I have no time for you yet.” ‘Man is the cruellest animal towards himself; and with all who call themselves “sinners” and “bearers of the Cross” and “penitents” do not overlook the sensual pleasure that is in this complaint and accusation! ‘And I myself- do I want to be the accuser of man? Ah, my animals, this alone have I learned, that the wickedest in man is necessary for the best in him, ‘that all that is most wicked in him is his best strength and the hardest stone for the highest creator; and that man must grow better and wicked: ‘To know: Man is wicked; that was to be tied to no torture-stake – but I cried as no one had cried before: “Alas, that his wickedest is so very small! Alas, that his best is so very small!”

‘The great disgust at man – it choked me and had crept into my throat: and what the prophet prophesied: “It is all one, nothing is worth while, knowledge chokes.” ‘A long twilight limps in front of me, a mortally-weary, death-intoxicated sadness which speaks with a yawn. ““The man of whom you are weary, the little man, recurs eternally” – thus my sadness yawned and dragged its feet and could not fall asleep. ‘The human earth became to me a cave, its chest caved in, everything living became to me human decay and bones and mouldering past. ‘My sighs sat upon all the graves of man and could no longer rise; my sighs and questions croaked and choked and gnawed and wailed by day and night: ““Alas, man recurs eternally! The little man recurs eternally!” ‘I had seen them both naked, the greatest man and the smallest man: all too similar to one another, even the greatest all too human! ‘The greatest all too small! – that was my disgust at man I And eternal recurrence even for the smallest! that was my disgust at all existence! ‘Ah, disgust! Disgust! Disgust!’ Thus spoke Zarathustra and sighed and shuddered; for he remembered his sickness. But his animals would not let him speak further. ‘Speak no further, convalescent!’ – thus his animals answered him, ‘but go out to where the world awaits you like a garden. ‘Go out to the roses and bees and flocks of doves! But go out especially to the song-birds, so that you may learn singing from them! ‘For convalescents should sing; let the healthy talk. And when the healthy man, too, desires song, he desires other songs than the convalescent.’ ‘O you buffoons and barrel-organs, do be quiet!’ answered Zarathustra and smiled at his animals. ‘How well you know what comfort I devised for myself in seven days! ‘That I have to sing again – that comfort and this convalescence did I devise for myself: do you want to make another hurdy-gurdy song out of that, too?’ ‘Speak no further,’ his animals answered once more; ‘rather first prepare yourself a lyre, convalescent, a new lyre! ‘For behold, O Zarathustra! New lyres are needed for your new songs. ‘Sing and bubble over, O Zarathustra, heal your soul with new songs, so that you may bear your great destiny, that was never yet the destiny of any man! ‘For your animals well know, O Zarathustra, who you are and must become: behold, you are the teacher of the eternal recurrence , that is now your destiny! ‘That you have to be the first to teach this doctrine – how should this great destiny not also be your greatest danger and sickness! ‘Behold, we know what you teach: that all things recur eternally and we ourselves with them, and that we have already existed an infinite number of times before and all things with us. ‘You teach that there is a great year of becoming, a colossus of a year: this year must, like an hour-glass, turn itself over again and again, so that it may run down and run out anew: ‘so that all these years resemble one another, in the greatest things and in the smallest, so that we ourselves resemble ourselves in each great year, in the greatest things and in the smallest. ‘And if you should die now, O Zarathustra: behold, we know too what you would then say to yourself – but your animals ask you not to die yet! ‘You would say – and without trembling, but rather gasping for happiness: for a great weight and oppression would have been lifted from you, most patient of men! “Now I die and decay,” you would say, “and in an instant I shall be nothingness. Souls are as mortal as bodies. “But the complex of causes in which I am entangled will recur – it will create me again! I myself am part of these causes of the eternal recurrence. “I shall return, with this sun, with this earth, with this eagle, with this serpent – not to a new life or a better life or a similar life: “I shall return eternally to this identical and self-same life, in the greatest things and in the smallest, to teach once more the eternal recurrence of all things, “to speak once more the teaching of the great noontide of earth and man, to tell man of the Superman once more. “I spoke my teaching, I broke upon my teaching: thus my eternal fate will have it – as prophet do I perish! “Now the hour has come when he who is going down shall bless himself. Thus – ends Zarathustra’s down-going.”’ When the animals had spoken these words they fell silent and expected that Zarathustra would say something to them: but Zarathustra did not hear that they were silent. On the contrary, he lay still with closed eyes like a sleeper, although he was not asleep: for he was conversing with his soul. The serpent and the eagle, however, when they found him thus silent, respected the great stillness around him and discreetly withdrew. Of the Great Longing O MY soul, I taught you to say ‘today’ as well as ‘once’ and ‘formerly’ and to dance your dance over every Here and There and Over-there. O my soul, I rescued you from all corners, I brushed dust, spiders, and twilight away from you. O my soul, I washed the petty shame and corner-virtue away from you and persuaded you to stand naked before the eyes of the sun. With the storm which is called ‘spirit’ I blew across your surging sea; I blew all clouds away, I killed even that killer-bird 40 called ‘sin’. O my soul, I gave you the right to say No like the storm and to say Yes as the open sky says Yes: now, silent as light you stand, and you pass through denying storms. O my soul, I gave you back freedom over created and uncreated things: and who knows as you know the delight of things to come? O my soul, I taught you contempt that comes not as the gnawing of a worm, the great, the loving contempt which loves most where it despises most. O my soul, I taught you so to persuade that you persuade the elements themselves to come to you: like the sun that persuades the sea to rise even to its height. O my soul, I took from you all obeying, knee-bending, and obsequiousness; I myself gave you the names ‘Dispeller of Care’ and ‘Destiny’. O my soul, I gave you new names and many-coloured toys, I called you ‘destiny’ and ‘encompassment of encompassments’ and ‘time’s umbilical cord’ and ‘azure bell’. O my soul, I gave your soil all wisdom to drink, all new wines and also all immemorially ancient strong wines of wisdom. O my soul, I poured every sun and every night and every silence and every longing upon you: – then you grew up for me like a vine. O my soul, now you stand superabundant and heavy, a vine with swelling udders and close-crowded golden-brown wine-grapes: oppressed and weighed down by your happiness, expectant from abundance and yet bashful because of your expectancy. O my soul, now there is nowhere a soul more loving and encompassing and spacious! Where could future and past be closer together than with you? O my soul, I have given you everything and my hands have become empty through you: and now! now you ask me smiling and full of melancholy: ‘Which of us owes thanks? ‘does the giver not owe thanks to the receiver for receiving? Is giving not a necessity? Is taking not – compassion?’ O my soul, I understand the smile of your melancholy: your superabundance itself now stretches out longing hands! Your fullness looks out over raging seas and searches and waits; the longing of over-fullness gazes out of the smiling heaven of your eyes! And truly, O my soul I Who could behold your smile and not dissolve into tears? The angels themselves dissolve into tears through the over-kindness of your smile. It is your kindness and over-kindness that wishes not to complain and weep: and yet your smile longs for tears, O my soul, and your trembling mouth for sobs. ‘Is all weeping not a complaining? And all complaining not an accusing?’ Thus you speak to yourself, and because of that, O my soul, you will rather smile than pour forth your sorrow, pour forth in gushing tears all your sorrow at your fullness and at all the desire of the vine for the vintager and the vine-knife! But if you will not weep nor alleviate in weeping your purple melancholy, you will have to sing , O my soul! Behold, I smile myself, who foretold you this: to sing with an impetuous song, until all seas grow still to listen to your longing, until, over still, longing seas, the boat glides, the golden marvel around whose gold all good, bad, marvellous things leap: and many great and small beasts also, and everything that has light, marvellous feet that can run upon violet paths, towards the golden marvel, the boat of free will, and to its master: he, however, is the vintager who waits with diamond-studded vine-knife, your great redeemer, O my soul, the nameless one for whom only future songs will find a name! And truly, your breath is already fragrant with future songs, already you glow and dream, already you drink thirstily from all deep, resounding wells of comfort, already your melancholy reposes in the bliss of future songs! O my soul, now I have given you everything and even the last thing I had to give, and my hands have become empty through you: – that I bade you sing , behold, that was the last thing I had to give! That I bade you sing, now say, say: Which of us now – owes thanks? But better still: sing for me, sing, O my soul! And let me pay thanks! Thus spoke Zarathustra. The Second Dance Song 1 L ATELY I gazed into your eyes, O Life: I saw gold glittering in your eyes of night – my heart stood still with delight: I saw a golden bark glittering upon dark waters, a submerging, surging, re-emerging golden tossing bark! At my feet, my dancing-mad feet, you threw a glance, a laughing, questioning, melting tossing glance: Twice only did you raise your castanets in your little hands – then my feet were already tossing in a mad dance. My heels raised themselves, my toes listened for what you should propose: for the dancer wears his ears – in his toes! I sprang to your side: then you fled back from my spring; towards me the tongues of your fleeing, flying hair came hissing! Away from you and from your serpents did I retire: then at once you stood, half turned, your eyes full of desire. With your crooked smile – you teach me crooked ways, upon crooked ways my feet learn – guile! I fear you when you are near, I love you when you are far; your fleeing allures me, your seeking secures me: I suffer, but for you what would I not gladly endure! For you whose coldness inflames, whose hatred seduces, whose flight constrains, whose mockery – induces: who would not hate you, great woman who binds us, en-winds us, seduces us, seeks us, finds us I Who would not love you, you innocent, impatient, wind-swift, child-eyed sinner! Where now do you take me, you unruly paragon? And again you forsake me, you sweet, ungrateful tomboy! I dance after you, I follow you even when only the slightest traces of you linger. Where are you? Give me your hand I Or just a finger! Here are caves and thickets: we shall go astray! Stop! Stand still! Do you not see owls and bats flitting away? Would you befool me? You bat! You owl! Where are we? Did you learn from the dogs thus to bark and howl? Your little white teeth you sweetly bare at me, from under your curly little mane your wicked eyes stare at me! This is a dance over dale and hill: I am the hunter – will you be my hound or will you be my kill? Now beside me! And quickly, you wicked rover I Now spring up! And across! – Help! In springing! myself have gone over! Oh see me lying, you wanton companion, and begging for grace! I long to follow you in – a sweeter chase! – love’s chase through flowery bushes, still and dim! Or there beside the lake, where goldfishes dance and swim! Are you now weary? There yonder are sheep and evening: let us end our pursuit: is it not sweet to sleep when the shepherd plays his flute? Are you so very weary? I will carry you there, just let your arms sink! And if you are thirsty – I should have something, but you would not like it to drink! – Oh this accursed, nimble, supple snake and slippery witch! Where have you gone? But on my face I feel from your hand two spots and blotches itch! I am truly weary of being your shepherd, always sheepish and meek! You witch, if I have hitherto sung for you, now for me you shall – shriek! To the rhythm of my whip you shall shriek and trot! Did I forget my whip? – I did not! 2 Then Life answered me thus, keeping her gentle ears closed: ‘O Zarathustra! Do not crack your whip so terribly! You surely know: noise kills thought – and now such tender thoughts are coming to me. ‘We are both proper ne’er-do-wells and ne’er-do-ills. Beyond good and evil did we discover our island and our green meadow – we two alone! Therefore we must love one another! ‘And even if we do not love one another from the very heart, do people have to dislike one another if they do not love one another from the very heart? ‘And that I love you and often love you too well, that I know: and the reason is that I am jealous of your Wisdom. Ah, this crazy old fool, Wisdom! 'If your Wisdom should one day desert you, alas! then my love would quickly desert you too.' Thereupon, Life gazed thoughtfully behind her and around her and said gently: 'O Zarathustra, you are not faithful enough to me! 'You do not love me nearly as much as you say; I know you are thinking of leaving me soon. 'There is an old, heavy, heavy booming bell: it booms out at night up to your cave: 'when you hear this bell beat the hour at midnight, then you think between one and twelve – 'you think, O Zarathustra, I know it, you think of leaving me soon!' 'Yes,' I answered hesitatingly, 'but you also know....' And I said something into her ear, in the midst of her tangled, yellow, foolish locks. 'You know that, O Zarathustra? No one knows that.' And we gazed at one another and looked out at the green meadow, over which the cool evening was spreading, and wept together. But then Life was dearer to me than all my Wisdom had ever been. Thus spoke Zarathustra. 3 One! O Man! Attend! Two! What does deep midnight's voice contend? Three! 'I slept my sleep, Four! 'And now awake at dreaming's end: Five! 'The world is deep, Six! 'Deeper than day can comprehend. Seven! 'Deep is its woe, Eight! 'Joy – deeper than heart's agony: Nine! 'Woe says: Fade! Go! Ten! 'But all joy wants eternity, Eleven! ' – wants deep, deep, deep eternity!' Twelve! The Seven Seals (or: The Song of Yes and Amen) 1 I F I be a prophet and full of that prophetic spirit that wanders on high ridges between two seas, wanders between past and future like a heavy cloud, enemy to sultry lowlands and to all that is weary and can neither die nor live: ready for lightning in its dark bosom and for redeeming beams of light, pregnant with lightnings which affirm Yes! laugh Yes! ready for prophetic lightning-flashes: but blessed is he who is thus pregnant! And, in truth, he who wants to kindle the light of the future must hang long over the mountains like a heavy storm! Oh how should I not lust for eternity and for the wedding ring of rings – the Ring of Recurrence! Never yet did I find the woman by whom I wanted children, unless it be this woman, whom I love: for I love you, O Eternity! For I love you, O Eternity! 2 If ever my anger broke graves open, moved boundary-stones, and rolled old shattered law-tables into deep chasms: if ever my mockery blew away mouldered words, and if I came like a broom to the Cross-spiders and as a scouring wind to old sepulchres: if ever I sat rejoicing where old gods lay buried, world-blessing, world-loving, beside the monuments of old world-slanderers: for I love even churches and the graves of gods, if only heaven is looking, pure-eyed, through their shattered roofs; I like to sit like grass and red poppies on shattered churches: Oh how should I not lust for eternity and for the wedding ring of rings – the Ring of Recurrence! Never yet did I find the woman by whom I wanted children, unless it be this woman, whom I love: for I love VCM , O Eternity! For I love you, O Eternity! 3 If ever a breath of the creative breath has come to me, and a breath of that heavenly necessity that compels even chance to dance in star-rounds: if ever I have laughed with the laugh of the creative lightning, which the thunder of the deed, grumbling but obedient, follows: if ever I have played dice with the gods at their table, the earth, so that the earth trembled and broke open and streams of fire snorted forth: for the earth is a table of the gods, and trembling with creative new words and the dice throws of the gods: Oh how should I not lust for eternity and for the wedding ring of rings – the Ring of Recurrence! Never yet did I find the woman by whom I wanted children, unless it be this woman, whom I love: for I love you, O Eternity! For I love you, O Eternity! 4 If ever I have drunk a full draught from that foaming mixing-bowl of spice, in which all things are well compounded: if ever my hand has welded the furthest to the nearest, and fire to spirit and joy to sorrow and the wickedest to the kindest: if I myself am a grain of that redeeming salt that makes everything mix well together in the bowl: for there is a salt that unites good with evil; and even the most evil is worthy to be a spice and a last over-foaming: Oh how should I not lust for eternity and for the wedding ring of rings – the Ring of Recurrence! Never yet did I find the woman by whom I wanted children, unless it be this woman, whom I love: for I love you, O Eternity! For I love you, O Eternity! 5 If I love the sea and all that is sea like, and love it most when it angrily contradicts me: if that delight in seeking that drives sails towards the undiscovered is in me, if a seafarer's delight is in my delight: if ever my rejoicing has cried: 'The shore has disappeared – now the last fetter falls from me, 'the boundless roars around me, far out glitter space and time, well then, come on! old heart!' Oh how should I not lust for eternity and for the wedding ring of rings – the Ring of Recurrence! Never yet did I find the woman by whom I wanted children, unless it be this woman, whom I love: for I love you, O Eternity! For I love you, O Eternity! 6 If my virtue is a dancer's virtue, and if I often leap with both feet in golden-emerald rapture: if my wickedness is a laughing wickedness, at home among rose bowers and hedges of lilies: for in laughter all evil is present, but sanctified and absolved through its own happiness: and if it be my Alpha and Omega that everything heavy shall become light, every body a dancer, all spirit a bird: and, truly, that is my Alpha and Omega! Oh how should I not lust for eternity and for the wedding ring of rings – the Ring of Recurrence! Never yet did I find the woman by whom I wanted children, unless it be this woman, whom I love: for I love you, O Eternity! For I love you, O Eternity! 7 If ever I spread out a still sky above myself and flew with my own wings into my own sky: if, playing, I have swum into deep light-distances and bird-wisdom came to my freedom: but thus speaks bird-wisdom: 'Behold, there is no above, no below! Fling yourself about, out, back, weightless bird I Sing! speak no more! 'are not all words made for the heavy? Do not all words lie to the light? Sing! speak no more!' Oh how should I not lust for eternity and for the wedding ring of rings – the Ring of Recurrence! Never yet did I find the woman by whom I wanted children, unless it be this woman, whom I love: for I love you, O Eternity! For I love you, O Eternity! PART FOUR Alas, where in the world have there been greater follies than with the compassionate? And what in the world has caused more suffering than the follies of the compassionate? Woe to all lovers who cannot surmount pity Thus spoke the Devil to me once: Even God has his Hell: it is his love for man And I lately heard him say these words: God is dead; God has died of his pity for man

ZARATHUSTRA: ‘Of the Compassionate’ The Honey Offering AND again months and years passed over Zarathustra’s soul, and he did not heed it; his hair, however, grew white. One day, as he was sitting upon a stone before his cave and gazing silently out – but the outlook there is of the sea and tortuous abysses – his animals went thoughtfully around him and at last placed themselves in front of him. ‘O Zarathustra,’ they said, ‘are you perhaps looking out for your happiness?’ – ‘Of what account is happiness?’ he answered. ‘For long I have not aspired after happiness, I aspire after my work.’ ‘O Zarathustra,’ said the animals then, ‘you say that as one who has too many good things. Do you not lie in a sky-blue lake of happiness?’ ‘You buffoons,’ answered Zarathustra and smiled, ‘how well you chose that image! But you know too that my happiness is heavy and not like a liquid wave: it oppresses me and will not leave me, and behaves like molten pitch.’ Then his animals again went thoughtfully around him and placed themselves once more in front of him. ‘O Zarathustra,’ they said, ‘is that why you yourself are growing ever darker and more sallow, although your hair looks white and flaxen? Behold, you are sitting in your pitch!’ ‘What are you saying, my animals?’ said Zarathustra laughing. ‘Truly, I spoke slander when I spoke of pitch. What is happening to me happens to all fruits that grow ripe. It is the honey in my veins that makes my blood thicker, and my soul quieter.’ ‘It will be so, O Zarathustra,’ answered the animals and pressed towards him; ‘but would you not like to climb a high mountain today? The air is clear, and today one can see more of the world than ever.’ ‘Yes, my animals,’ he answered, ‘your advice is admirable and after my own inclination: today I will climb a high mountain! But take care that I have honey ready to hand there, yellow, white, fine, ice-cool golden honey in the comb. For I intend to offer the honey offering.’ But when Zarathustra had reached the summit he sent home the animals which had accompanied him, and found that he was now alone: then he laughed with his whole heart, looked around him and spoke thus: That I spoke of offerings and honey offerings was merely a ruse and, truly, a useful piece of folly! Up here I can speak more freely than before hermits’ caves and hermits’ pets. Offer – what? I squander what is given me, I, a squanderer with a thousand hands: how could I call that – an offering! And when I desired honey, I desired only bait and sweet syrup and gum, which even grumbling bears and strange, sullen, wicked birds are greedy for: the finest bait, such as huntsmen and fishermen need. For

although the world is like a dark animal-jungle and a pleasure-ground for all wild huntsmen, it seems to me to be rather and preferably an unfathomable, rich sea, a sea full of many-coloured fishes and crabs for which even the gods might long and become fishers and casters of nets: so rich is the world in strange things, great and small! Especially the human world, the human sea: now I cast my golden fishing-rod into it and say: Open up, human abyss! Open up and throw me your fishes and glistening crabs! With my finest bait shall I bait today the strangest human fish! My happiness itself shall I cast far and wide, between sunrise, noontide, and sunset, to see if many human fishes will not learn to kick and tug at my happiness, until they, biting on my sharp, hidden hooks, have to come up to my height, the most multicoloured groundlings of the abyss to the most wicked of all fishers of men. For I am he, from the heart and from the beginning, drawing, drawing towards me, drawing up to me, raising up, a drawer, trainer, and taskmaker who once bade himself, and not in vain: 'Become what you are!' Thus men may now come up to me: for I am still waiting for the signs that it is time for my descent; as yet I do not myself go down, as I must, among men. Therefore I wait here, cunning and scornful upon high mountains, not impatient, not patient, on the contrary one who has unlearned even patience, because he no longer 'suffers in patience'. 41 For my destiny is allowing me time: has it forgotten me? Or is it sitting in the shadows behind a great stone catching flies? And truly, I am grateful to my eternal destiny for not hunting and harrying me and for allowing me time for buffooneries and mischief: so that today I have climbed this high mountain to catch fish. Has a man ever caught fish on a high mountain? And if what I want and do up here is a stupidity, better to do it than to become solemn and green and sallow by waiting down there, to become by waiting a pompous shorter of wrath, a holy howling storm from the mountains, an impatient man crying down into the valleys: 'Listen, or I shall lash you with the scourge of God!' Not that I should be angry with such wrathful men on that account! They are good enough for a laugh! How impatient they must be, these great alarm-drums that must find a voice today or never! But I and my destiny – we do not speak to Today, neither do we speak to the Never: we have patience and time and more than time. For it must come one day and may not pass by. What must come one day and may not pass by? Our great Hazar, our great, far-off empire of man, the thousand-year empire of Zarathustra. How far off may that 'far off' be? What do I care! But I am not less certain of it on that account – I stand securely with both feet upon this foundation, upon this eternal foundation, upon hard, primordial rock, upon this highest, hardest primordial hill to which all the winds come as to the dividing-place of storms, asking Where? and Whence? and Whither? Here laugh, laugh my bright and wholesome wickedness! Down from high mountains cast your glistening, mocking laughter. With your glistening bait for me the fairest human fish! And what belongs to me in all seas, my in-and-for-me in all things – fish it out for me, bring it here to me: I wait for it, I the wickedest of all fishermen. Away, away my hook! In, down, bait for my happiness! Drop down your sweetest dew, honey of my heart! Bite, my hook, into the belly of all black affliction! Gaze out, gaze out, my eye! Oh how many seas round about me, what dawning human futures! And above me – what rosy stillness! What cloudless silence! The Cry of Distress

THE following day Zarathustra was again sitting upon the stone before his cave while the animals were roving about in the world outside fetching fresh food – and fresh honey, too: for Zarathustra had consumed and squandered the old honey to the last drop. But as he was sitting there with a stick in his hand, tracing the shadow of his figure in the ground, thinking (and truly!) not about himself and his shadow – all at once he started back in alarm: for he saw another shadow beside his own. And as he quickly rose and looked around, behold, there stood beside him the prophet, the same that had once eaten and drunk at his table, the prophet of the great weariness who taught: ‘It is all one, nothing is worth while, the world is without meaning, knowledge chokes.’ But his face had changed in the interim; and when Zarathustra looked into the prophet’s eyes, his heart was again startled: so many evil prophecies and ashen lightning-flashes passed across this face! The prophet, who had perceived what was going on in Zarathustra’s soul, wiped his hand over his face, as if he wanted to wipe it away; Zarathustra did the same. And when each had silently composed and reassured himself, they shook hands as a sign that they wanted to recognize one another. ‘Welcome to you,’ said Zarathustra, ‘you prophet of the great weariness; not in vain shall you once have been guest at my table. Eat and drink with me today also, and forgive a cheerful old man for sitting down at table with you!’ ‘A cheerful old man?’ answered the prophet, shaking his head. ‘But whoever you are or want to be, O Zarathustra, you have little time left up here to be it – in a little time your boat shall no longer sit in the dry!’ ‘Am I then sitting in the dry?’ asked Zarathustra, laughing. ‘The waves around your mountain rise and rise,’ answered the prophet, ‘waves of great distress and affliction: soon they will lift your boat too, and carry you away.’ Thereupon Zarathustra was silent and wondered. ‘Do you still hear nothing?’ the prophet went on. ‘Does not the sound of rushing and roaring arise from the depths?’ Zarathustra was again silent and listened: then he heard a long, protracted cry, which the abysses threw from one to another, for none of them wanted to retain it, so evil did it sound. ‘You preacher of evil,’ said Zarathustra at last, ‘that is a cry of distress and a human cry, perhaps it comes from out a black sea. But what is human distress to me! The ultimate sin that is reserved for me – perhaps you know what it is called?’ ‘Pity!’ answered the prophet from an overflowing heart, and raised both hands aloft – ‘O Zarathustra, I come to seduce you to your ultimate sin!’ – And hardly were these words spoken than the cry rang out again, and more protracted and more distressful than before, and much nearer. ‘Do you hear? Do you hear, O Zarathustra?’ cried the prophet. ‘The cry is meant for you, it calls to you: Come, come, come, it is time, it is high time!’ Hereupon Zarathustra was silent, confused, and deeply shaken; at last he asked like one undecided: ‘And who is it that calls me?’ ‘But you know who it is,’ answered the prophet vehemently, ‘why do you hide yourself? It is the Higher Man that cries for you!’ ‘The Higher Man?’ cried Zarathustra, horror-struck. ‘What does he want? What does he want? The Higher Man! What does he want here?’ – and his skin was covered with sweat. The prophet, however, did not respond to Zarathustra’s anguish, but listened intently towards the depths. But when it had remained quiet there for a long time, he turned his gaze back and saw Zarathustra standing and trembling. ‘O Zarathustra,’ he began in a scornful voice, ‘you do not stand there like one made giddy by happiness: you will have to dance if you are not to fall over! ‘But even if you were to dance before me and indulge in all your tricks, no one could say: “Behold, here dances the last happy man!” ‘Anyone who sought him here would visit these heights in vain: he would find caves, certainly, and backwood-caves, hiding-places for the hidden, but not mines of happiness and treasure-houses and new gold-veins of happiness. ‘Happiness – how could man find happiness with such buried men and hermits! Must I yet seek ultimate happiness upon blissful islands and far away among forgotten seas? ‘But it is all one, nothing is worth while, seeking is useless, and there are no blissful islands any more!’ Thus sighed the prophet; with his last sigh, however, Zarathustra again became cheerful and assured, like one emerging from a deep chasm into the light. ‘No! No! Thrice No!’ he cried vigorously, and stroked his beard. ‘I know better! There still are blissful islands! Do not talk about such things, you sighing sack-cloth! ‘Cease to splash about such things, you morning rain-cloud! Do I not stand here already wet with your affliction and drenched as a dog? ‘Now I shall shake myself and run away from you, so that I may become dry again: you must not be surprised at that! Do you think me discourteous? But this is my court. ‘But concerning your Higher Man: very well! I shall seek him at once in those forests: his cry came from there. Perhaps he is being attacked by an evil beast. ‘He is in my domain: here he shall not come to harm! And truly, there are many evil beasts about me.’ With these words Zarathustra turned to go. Then the prophet said: ‘O Zarathustra, you are a rogue! ‘I know it: you want to be rid of me! You would rather run into the forests and waylay evil beasts! ‘But what good will it do you? In the evening you will have me back; I shall sit in your own cave, patient and heavy as a log – and wait for you!’ ‘So be it!’ Zarathustra shouted behind him as he departed: ‘and whatever in my cave belongs to me also belongs to you, my guest! ‘But should you discover honey in there, very well! just lick it up, you growling bear, and sweeten your soul! For in the evening we must both be in good spirits, ‘in good spirits and glad that this day has ended! And you yourself shall dance to my songs as my dancing bear. ‘You do not believe it? You are shaking your head? Very well! Go on, old bear! But I too – am a prophet!’ Thus spoke Zarathustra. Conversation with the Kings 1 Z ARATHUSTRA had not been going an hour through his mountains and forests when all at once he saw a strange procession. Along just that path that he was going down came two kings, adorned with crowns and purple sashes and bright as flamingos: they drove before them a laden ass. ‘What do these kings want in my kingdom?’ said Zarathustra in astonishment to his heart, and quickly concealed himself behind a bush. But as the kings drew abreast of him, he said, half aloud like someone talking to himself: ‘Strange! Strange! I cannot make this out! I see two kings – and only one ass!’ Then the two kings halted, smiled, gazed at the place from which the voice had come, and then looked one another in the face. ‘No doubt people think such things as that at home, too,’ said the king on the right, ‘but they do not utter them.’ The king on the left shrugged his shoulders and answered: ‘It is probably a goat-herd. Or a hermit who has lived too long among trees and rocks. For no company at all also corrupts good manners.’ ‘Good manners?’ replied the other king indignantly and bitterly. ‘What is it we are avoiding, then? Is it not “good manners”? Our “good company”? ‘Truly, better to live among hermits and goat-herds than with our gilded, false, painted rabble – although it calls itself “good company”, “although it calls itself “nobility”. But there everything is false and rotten, most of all the blood, thanks to old, evil diseases and worse quacks. ‘I think the finest and dearest man today is a healthy peasant, uncouth, cunning, obstinate, enduring; that is the noblest type today. ‘The peasant is the finest man today; and the peasantry should be master! But ours is the kingdom of the rabble – I no longer let myself be taken in. Rabble, however, means: hotchpotch. ‘Rabble-hotchpotch: in that everything is mixed up with everything else, saint and scoundrel and gentleman and Jew and every beast out of Noah’s Ark. ‘Good manners! Everything is false and rotten with us. Nobody knows how to be respectful any more: it is from precisely this that we are running away. They are honey-mouthed, importunate dogs, they gild palm-leaves. ‘It is this disgust that chokes me, that we kings ourselves have become false, arrayed and disguised in the old, yellowed pomp of our grandfathers, show-pieces for the stupidest and the craftiest and whoever today traffics with power! ‘We are not the first of them – yet we have to pretend to be: we have at last become tired and disgusted with this deception. ‘Now we are avoiding the mob, all these ranters and scribbling-blue bottles, the stench of shopkeepers, the struggles of ambition, the foul breath: faugh, to live among the mob, ‘faugh, to pretend to be the first among the mob! Ah, disgust! disgust! disgust! What do we kings matter any more!’ ‘Your old illness is assailing you,’ the king on the left said at this point, ‘disgust is assailing you, my poor brother. But you know that someone can overhear us.’ Hereupon Zarathustra, who had kept his ears and eyes open to these speeches, rose from his hiding-place, stepped towards the kings and began: 'He who has overheard you, he who likes to overhear you, O kings, is called Zarathustra. 'I am Zarathustra, who once said: "What do kings matter any longer!" Forgive me, but I was glad when you said to one another: "What do we kings matter!" 'This, however, is my kingdom and dominion: what might you be seeking in my kingdom? But perhaps on your way you have found what I am seeking : that is, the Higher Man.' When the kings heard this they beat their breasts and said in a single voice: 'We have been recognized! 'With the sword of these words you have cut through the thickest darkness of our hearts. You have discovered our distress, for behold! we are on our way to find the Higher Man – 'the man who is higher than we: although we are kings. We are leading this ass to him. For the Highest Man shall also be the highest lord on earth. 'There is no harder misfortune in all human destiny than when the powerful of the earth are not also the first men. Then everything becomes false and awry and monstrous. 'And when they are even the last men and more beast than man, then the value of the rabble rises higher and higher and at last the rabble-virtue says: Behold, I alone am virtue!' 'What do I hear?' answered Zarathustra; 'what wisdom from kings! I am enchanted, and truly, I already feel the urge to compose a verse about it: 'even if it should be a verse not suited to everyone's ears. I long ago unlearned consideration for long ears. Very well! Come on! (But here it happened that the ass, too, found speech: it said clearly and maliciously 'Ye-a'.) 'Once on a time – 'twas A.D. One, I think – Thus spoke the Sybil, drunken without drink: "How bad things go! Decay! Decay! Ne'er sank the world so low! Rome is now a harlot and a brothel too, Rome's Caesar's a beast, and God himself – a Jew!"' 2 The kings were delighted with these lines of Zarathustra's; and the king on the right said: 'O Zarathustra, how well we did to come out and see you! 'For your enemies have shown us your image in their mirror, from which you gazed with the grimace of a devil and with mocking laughter, so that we were afraid of you. 'But what good was it! Again and again you stung our ears and hearts with your sayings. Then at last we said: What does it matter how he looks! 'We must hear him, him who teaches: You should love peace as a means to new wars and a short peace more than a long! 'No one ever spoke such warlike words: What is good? To be brave is good. It is the good war that hallows every cause. 'O Zarathustra, at such words the blood of our fathers stirred in our bodies: it was like spring speaking to old wine-casks. 'Our fathers loved life when swords were crossed like red-flecked serpents; they thought all suns of peace faint and feeble, but the long peace made them ashamed. 'How they sighed, our fathers, when they saw resplendent, parched swords upon the wall! Like them, they thirsted for war. For a sword wants to drink blood and sparkles with its desire.' As the kings thus eagerly talked and babbled of the happiness of their fathers, Zarathustra was overcome by no small desire to mock their eagerness: for they were apparently very peaceable kings that he saw before him, with aged, refined faces. But he controlled himself. 'Very well!' he said, 'yonder leads the way to Zarathustra's cave; and this day shall have a long evening! But now a cry of distress calls me hurriedly away from you. 'My cave will be honoured if kings would sit and wait in it: but, to be sure, you will have to wait a long time! 'But really! What does it matter! Where today does one learn to wait better than in courts? And the whole virtue still remaining to kings – is it not today called: being able to wait!' Thus spoke Zarathustra. The Leech AND Zarathustra walked thoughtfully farther and deeper through forests and past swampy places; but, as happens with those who think on difficult things, on his way he unintentionally trod on a man. And behold, all at once a cry of pain and two curses and twenty little invectives spurted up into his face: so that in his fright he raised his stick and brought it down on the man he had trodden on. But he immediately came to his senses; and his heart laughed at the folly he had just committed. 'Forgive me,' he said to the man he had trodden on, who had angrily risen and sat down again, 'forgive me and first of all accept a parable. 'How a wanderer dreaming of distant things unintentionally stumbles over a dog on a lonely road, a dog lying in the sun: 'how they both start up and let fly at one another like mortal enemies, these two, frightened to death: thus it happened with us. 'And yet! And yet – how little was lacking for them to caress one another, this dog and this solitary! For they are both- solitaires!' 'Whoever you may be,' said the trodden-on man, still angry, 'you have come too near me with your parable and not only with your foot! 'For look, am I a dog?' – and thereupon the sitting man arose and drew his naked arm from the swamp. For previously he had lain stretched out on the ground, concealed and unrecognizable, like someone lying in wait for swamp game. 'But what are you doing!' cried Zarathustra in alarm, for he saw that a great deal of blood was running down the naked arm, 'what has happened to you? Has an evil beast bitten you, unhappy man?' The bleeding man laughed, still irritated. 'What is it to do with you!' he said, and made to go off. 'Here I am at home and in my domain. Whoever wants to question me, let him: but I shall hardly reply to a blockhead!' 'You are wrong,' said Zarathustra compassionately, and held him fast, 'you are wrong: here you are not in your own home but in my kingdom, and I will have no one come to harm here. 'But none the less, call me what you like – I am what I must be. I call myself Zarathustra. 'Very well! Up yonder leads the way to Zarathustra's cave: it is not far – will you not tend your wounds in my home? 'Things have gone ill with you in this life, you unhappy man: first a beast bit you, and then – a man trod on you!' But when the trodden-on man heard the name of Zarathustra, he changed. 'What has happened to me!' he cried; 'who concerns me in this life except this one man, Zarathustra, and that one beast that lives on blood, the leech? 'For the sake of the leech I have lain here beside this swamp like a fisherman, and already my outstretched arm has been bitten ten times; now a fairer leech bites for my blood, Zarathustra himself! 'Oh happiness! Oh wonder! Praised be this day, that lured me to this swamp! Praised be the best, liveliest cupping-glass alive today, praised be the great leech of conscience, Zarathustra!' Thus spoke the man who had been trodden on; and Zarathustra rejoiced at his words and their fine, respectful manner. 'Who are you?' he asked, and offered him his hand, 'between us there is still much to elucidate and dear up: but already, it seems to me, it is bright, broad daylight.' 'I am the conscientious man of the spirit,' answered the other, 'and scarcely anyone is sterner, stricter, and more severe in things of the spirit than I, apart from him from whom I learned, Zarathustra himself. 'Better to know nothing than half-know many things! Better to be a fool on one's own account than a wise man at the approval of others! I – go to the root of things: 'what matter if it be great or small? If it be swamp or sky? A hand's breadth of ground is enough for me: if only it be thoroughly firm ground! 'a hand's breadth of ground: one can stand upon that. In truly conscientious knowledge there is nothing great and nothing small.' 'So perhaps you are an expert on the leech?' asked Zarathustra. 'And do you probe the leech down to its ultimate roots, conscientious man?' 'O Zarathustra,' answered the man who was trodden on, 'that would be a colossal task, how could I undertake it! 'But what I am master of and expert on is the leech's brain – that is my world! 'And that too is a world! But forgive me that my pride here speaks out, for here I have not my equal. That is why I said "Here I am at home". 'How long have I probed this one thing, the brain of the leech, so that slippery truth should here no longer slip away from me! Here is my kingdom! 'For its sake I have cast away all others, for its sake I have grown indifferent to all others; and close beside my knowledge couches my black ignorance. 'The conscience of my spirit demands of me that I know one thing and apart from that know nothing: I am disgusted by all the semi-intellectual, all the vaporous, hovering, visionary. 'Where my honesty ceases I am blind and want to be blind. But where I want to know I also want to be honest, that is, severe, stern, strict, cruel, inexorable. 'Because you, O Zarathustra, once said: "Spirit is the life that itself cuts into life", that led and seduced me to your teaching. And truly, with my own blood have I increased my own knowledge!' 'As the evidence indicates,' Zarathustra interposed; for blood continued to run down the naked arm of the man of conscience. For ten leeches had bitten into it. 'Oh you strange fellow, how much this evidence tells me, for it tells me about yourself! And perhaps I could not pour all of it into your stern ears! 'Very well! Let us part here! But I should like to meet you again. Up yonder leads the way to my cave: tonight you shall there be my welcome guest! 'And I should also like to make amends to your body for treading upon you: I shall think about that. But now a cry of distress calls me hurriedly away from you.' Thus spoke Zarathustra. The Sorcerer

1 W HEN Zarathustra had turned the corner around a rock, however, he saw not far below him on the same pathway a man who was throwing his arms about as if in a frenzy and who finally hurled himself to earth flat on his belly. 'Stop!' said Zarathustra then to his heart, 'he yonder must surely be the Higher Man, that evil cry of distress came from him – I will see if he can be helped.' But when he ran to the spot where the man lay on the ground, he found a trembling old man with staring eyes; and however much Zarathustra tried to raise him and set him upon his legs, it was in vain. Neither did the unfortunate man seem to notice that there was anyone with him; on the contrary, he continually looked around him with pathetic gestures, like one forsaken by and isolated from all the world. Eventually, however, after much trembling, quivering, and self-contortion, he began to wail thus: Who still warms me, who still loves me? Offer me hot hands! Offer me coal-warmers for the heart! Spread-eagled, shuddering, Like a half-dead man whose feet are warmed – Shaken, alas! by unknown fevers, Trembling with sharp icy frost-arrows, Pursued by you, my thought! Unutterable, veiled, terrible one! Huntsman behind the clouds! Struck down by your lightning-bolt, You mocking eye that stares at me from the darkness – thus I lie, Bend myself, twist myself, tortured By every eternal torment, Smitten By you, cruel huntsman, You unknown – God! Strike deeper! Strike once again! Sting and sting, shatter this heart! What means this torment With blunt arrows? Why do you look down, Unwearied of human pain, With malicious divine flashing eyes? Will you not kill, Only torment, torment? Why – torment me, You malicious, unknown God? Ha ha! Are you stealing near? At such a midnight hour What do you want? Speak! You oppress me, press me – Ha! far too closely! Away! Away! You hear me breathing, You overhear my heart, You jealous God – Yet, jealous of what? Away! Away! Why the ladder? Would you climb Into my heart, Climb into my most secret Thoughts? Shameless, unknown – thief! What would you get by stealing? What would you get by listening? What would you get by torturing, You torturer? You – Hangman-god! Or shall I, like a dog, Roll before you? Surrendering, raving with rapture, Wag – love to you? In vain! Strike again, Cruellest knife! No, Not dog – I am only your game, Cruellest huntsman! Your proudest prisoner, You robber behind the clouds! For the last time, speak! What do you want, way layer, from me? You God veiled in lightning! Unknown One! Speak, What do you want, unknown – God? What? Ransom? How much ransom? Demand much – thus speaks my pride! And be brief – thus speaks my other pride! Ha ha! Me – you want me? Me – all of me?... Ha ha! And you torment me, fool that you are, You rack my pride? Offer me love – who still warms me? Who still loves me? – offer me hot hands! Offer me coal-warmers for the heart, Offer me, the most solitary, Whom ice, alas! sevenfold ice Has taught to long for enemies, For enemies themselves, Offer, yes yield to me, Cruellest enemy – Yourself! He is gone! He himself has fled, My last, sole companion, My great enemy, My unknown, My Hangman-god! No! Come back, With all your torments! Oh come back To the last of all solitaires! All the streams of my tears Run their course to you! And the last flame of my heart – It burns up to you! Oh come back, My unknown God! My pain! My last – happiness! 2 At this point, however, Zarathustra could restrain himself no longer; he took his stick and struck the wailing man with all his force. ‘Stop!’ he shouted at him with furious laughter, ‘stop, you actor! You fabricator! You liar from the heart! I know you well! ‘I will warm your legs for you, you evil sorcerer, I well know how to make things warm for such as you!’ ‘Leave off,’ said the old man and jumped up from the ground, ‘beat me no more, O Zarathustra! I was doing it only in fun! ‘Such things are part of my art; I wanted to put you yourself to the proof when I gave you this exhibition! 42 And truly, you have seen well through me! ‘But you, too, have given me no small proof of yourself: you are hard , you wise Zarathustra!

 You strike hard with your “truths”, your cudgel forced from me – this truth!’ ‘Do not flatter,’ answered Zarathustra, still excited and frowning,’ you actor from the heart! You are false: why speak – of truth! ‘You peacock of peacocks, you ocean of vanity, what did you play before me, you evil sorcerer, in whom was I supposed to believe when you wailed in such a fashion?’ ‘ The penitent of the spirit ,’ said the old man, ‘it was he I played: you yourself once invented this expression – the poet and sorcerer who at last turns his spirit against himself, the transformed man who freezes through his bad knowledge and bad conscience.
 ‘And just confess it: it took a long time, O Zarathustra, for you to see through my trick and lie! You believed in my distress when you took my head in your hands, ‘I heard you wail: “He has been too little loved, too little loved!” My wickedness rejoiced within me that I had deceived you so far.’ ‘You may have deceived subtler men than me,’ said Zarathustra severely. ‘I am not on my guard against deceivers, I must be without caution: so my fate will have it. ‘You, however, must deceive: I know you so far. You must always be ambiguous, with two, three, four, five meanings! And what you just confessed was not nearly true enough and not nearly false enough for me! ‘You evil fabricator, how could you do otherwise! You would even deck your disease if you showed yourself naked to your physician. ‘Thus you decked your lie before me when you said “I was doing it only in fun!” There was also earnestness in it, you are something of a penitent of the spirit! ‘I have divined you well: you have become the enchanter of everyone, but against yourself you have no lie and no cunning left – you are disenchanted with yourself! ‘You have reaped disgust as your single truth. With you, no word is genuine any more, but your mouth is genuine: that is, the disgust that clings to your mouth.’ ‘But who are you!’ the old sorcerer cried at this point in a defiant voice, ‘who dares to speak like this to me , the greatest man, living today?’ – and a green lightning-flash shot from his eye at Zarathustra. But immediately he changed and said sadly: ‘O Zarathustra, I am tired of it, my arts disgust me, I am not great , why do I pretend! But, you know it well – I sought greatness! 'I wanted to appear a great man and I convinced many: but this lie has been beyond my strength. I am collapsing under it. 'O Zarathustra, everything about me is a lie; but that I am collapsing – this is genuine !' 'It honours you,' said Zarathustra gloomily, casting down his eyes, 'it honours you that you sought greatness, but it also betrays you. You are not great. 'You evil old sorcerer, this is the best and most honest thing that I honour in you, that you have grown weary of yourself and have declared "I am not great". 'In that do I honour you as a penitent of the spirit: and, if only for a passing breath, in this one moment you were – genuine. 'But say, what do you seek here among my forests and cliffs? And when you laid yourself in my path, what proof did you want of me? 'What did you test me in?' Thus spoke Zarathustra and his eyes sparkled. The old sorcerer was silent for a time, then he said: 'Did I test you? I – only seek. 'O Zarathustra, I seek a genuine man, a proper, simple man, a man of one meaning and of all honesty, a repository of wisdom, a saint of knowledge, a great man! 'For do you not know, O Zarathustra? I seek Zarathustra .' And at this point a long silence arose between the two; Zarathustra, however, became deeply absorbed, so that he closed his eyes. Then, however, returning to his companion, he grasped the sorcerer's hand and said, with much politeness and guile: 'Very well! Up yonder leads the way to where Zarathustra's cave lies. You may seek there him you wish to find. 'And ask advice of my animals, my eagle and my serpent: they shall help you seek. But my cave is big. 'I myself, to be sure – I have never yet seen a great man. The eye of the subtlest is crude today for what is great. It is the kingdom of the mob. 'I have found so many who stretched and inflated themselves, and the people cried: "Behold a great man!" But what good are all bellows! The wind escapes from them at last. 'A frog that has blown itself out too long explodes at last: then the wind escapes. To prick the belly of a puffed-up windbag I call a fine sport. Hear that, lads! 'Today belongs to the mob: who still knows what is great, what small! Who could successfully seek greatness there! Only a fool: a fool would succeed. 'Do you seek great men, you strange fool? Who taught you to? Is today the time for it? Oh, you evil seeker, why – do you tempt 43 me?' Thus spoke Zarathustra, comforted at heart, and continued, laughing, on his way. Retired from Service N OT long after Zarathustra had freed himself from the sorcerer, however, he again saw someone sitting beside the path he was going: a tall, dark man with a pale, haggard face; this man greatly vexed him. 'Alas,' he said to his heart, 'there sits disguised affliction, he seems to be of the priestly sort: what do they want in my kingdom? 'What! I have hardly escaped from that sorcerer: must another magician cross my path, 'some wizard who operates by laying on hands, some gloomy miracle-worker by the grace of God, some anointed world-slanderer: may the Devil take him! 'But the Devil is never in his proper place: he always comes too late, that confounded dwarf and club-foot!' Thus cursed Zarathustra impatiently in his heart and considered how, with averted gaze, he might slip past the dark man: but behold, it turned out differently. For at the same moment the sitting man had already seen him; and not unlike someone whom an unexpected happiness has befallen, he jumped up and went towards Zarathustra. 'Whoever you may be, traveller,' he said, 'help one who has gone astray, a seeker, an old man who may easily come to harm here! 'The world here is strange and remote to me, and I hear the howling of wild animals; and he who could have afforded me protection is himself no more. 'I was seeking the last pious man, a saint and hermit who, alone in his forest, had as yet heard nothing of what all the world knows today.' 'What does all the world know today?' asked Zarathustra. 'This, perhaps: that the old God in whom all the world once believed no longer lives?' 'That is so,' answered the old man sadly. 'And I served that old God until his last hour. 'Now, however, I am retired from service, without master, and yet I am not free, neither am I merry even for an hour, except in memories. 'That is why I climbed into these mountains, that I might at last celebrate a festival once more, as becomes an old pope and church-father: for know, I am the last pope! – a festival of pious memories and divine services. 'But now he himself is dead, the most pious of men, that saint in the forest who used continually to praise his God with singing and muttering. 'When I found his hut I no longer found him himself, but I did find two wolves in it, howling over his death – for all animals loved him. Then I hurried away. 'Had I come into these forests and mountains in vain? Then my heart decided to seek another, the most pious of all those who do not believe in God – to seek Zarathustra!' Thus spoke the old man and gazed with penetrating eyes at him who stood before him; Zarathustra, however, took the old pope's hand and for a long time regarded it admiringly. 'Behold, venerable man,' he said then, 'what a long and beautiful hand! It is the hand of one who has always distributed blessings. But now it holds fast him you seek, me, Zarathustra. 'It is I, the godless Zarathustra, the same who says: Who is more godless than I, that I may rejoice in his teaching?' Thus spoke Zarathustra and pierced with his glance the thoughts and reservations of the old pope. At last the latter began: 'He who loved and possessed him most, he has now lost him the most also: 'behold, am I myself not the more godless of us two now? But who could rejoice in that!' 'You served him to the last,' asked Zarathustra thoughtfully, after a profound silence, 'do you know how he died? Is it true what they say, that pity choked him, 'that he saw how man hung on the Cross and could not endure it, that love for man became his Hell and at last his death?' The old pope, however, did not answer, but looked away shyly and with a pained and gloomy expression. 'Let him go,' said Zarathustra after prolonged reflection, during which he continued to gaze straight in the old man's eye. 'Let him go, he is finished. And although it honours you that you speak only good of this dead god, yet you know as well as I who he was; and that he followed strange paths.' 'Between ourselves,' said the old pope, becoming cheerful, 'or, as I may say, spoken beneath three eyes' 44 (for he was blind in one eye) 'in divine matters I am more enlightened than Zarathustra himself – and may well be so. 'My love served him long years, my will obeyed all his will. A good servant, however, knows everything, and many things, too, that his master hides from himself. 'He was a hidden god, full of secrecy. Truly, he even came by a son through no other than secret and indirect means. At the door of faith in him stands adultery. 'Whoever honours him as a god of love does not think highly enough of love itself. Did this god not also want to be judge? But the lover loves beyond reward and punishment. 'When he was young, this god from the orient, he was hard and revengeful and built himself a Hell for the delight of his favourites. 'But at length he grew old and soft and mellow and compassionate, more like a grandfather than a father, most like a tottery old grandmother. 'Then he sat, shrivelled, in his chimney corner, fretting over his weak legs, world-weary, weary of willing, and one day suffocated through his excessive pity.' 'Old pope,' Zarathustra interposed at this point, 'did you see that with your own eyes? It certainly could have happened like that: like that, and also otherwise. When gods die, they always die many kinds of death. 'But very well! One way or the other, one way and the other – he is gone! He offended the taste of my ears and eyes, I will say no worse of him. 'I love everything that is clear-eyed and honest of speech. But he – you must know it, old priest, there was something of your nature about him, something of the priestly nature – he was ambiguous. 'He was also indistinct. How angry he was with us, this shorter of wrath, because we mistook his meaning! But why did he not speak more clearly? 'And if our ears were to blame, why did he give us ears that were unable to hear him properly? If there was dirt in our ears, very well! who put it there? 'He had too many failures, this potter who had not learned his craft I But that he took vengeance on his pots and creations because they had turned out badly – that was a sin against good taste. 'There is also good taste in piety: that said at last: Away with such a god! Better no god, better to produce destiny on one's own account, better to be a fool, better to be God oneself!' 'What do I hear!' the old pope said at this point, pricking up his ears; 'O Zarathustra, you are more pious than you believe, with such an unbelief! Some god in you has converted you to your godlessness. 'Is it not your piety itself that no longer allows you to believe in a god? And your exceeding honesty will yet carry you off beyond good and evil, too! 'For behold, what has been reserved for you? You have eyes and hand and mouth destined for blessing from eternity. One does not bless with the hand alone. 'In your neighbourhood, although you would be the most godless, I scent a stealthy odour of holiness and well-being that comes from long benedictions: it fills me with joy and sorrow. 'Let me be your guest, O Zarathustra, for a single night! Nowhere on earth shall I be happier now than with you!' 'Amen! So shall it be!' said Zarathustra in great astonishment, 'up yonder leads the way, there lies Zarathustra's cave. 'Indeed, I would gladly lead you there myself, venerable man, for I love all pious men. But now a cry of distress calls me hurriedly away from you. 'I will have no one come to harm in my domain; my cave is an excellent refuge. And most of all I should like to set every sad and sorrowful person again on firm land and firm legs. 'Who, however, could lift your melancholy from your shoulders? I am too weak for that. Truly, we should have to wait a long time before someone reawakened your god for you. 'For this old god no longer lives: he is quite dead.' Thus spoke Zarathustra. The Ugliest Man A ND again Zarathustra's feet ran through forests and mountains, and his eyes sought and sought, but him they desired to see, the great sufferer and crier of distress, was nowhere to be seen. All the time he was on his way, however, he rejoiced in his heart and was thankful. 'What good things this day has given me,' he said, 'as recompense for having begun so badly! What strange discourses I have found! 'Now I will long chew their words as if they were fine corn; my teeth shall grind and crunch them small, until they flow into my soul like milk!' But when the path again rounded a rock, all at once the scenery changed, and Zarathustra stepped into a kingdom of death. Here black and red cliffs projected up: no grass, no tree, no cry of birds. For it was a valley which all beasts avoided, even the beasts of prey; except that a kind of ugly, thick, green serpent, when it grew old, came here to die. Therefore the shepherds called this valley 'Serpent's Death'. Zarathustra, however, was plunged into dark recollections, for it seemed to him as if he had stood in this valley once before. And many heavy things settled upon his mind: so that he went slowly and ever slower and at last stopped. Then, however, as he opened his eyes, he saw something sitting on the pathway, shaped like a man and yet hardly like a man, something unutterable. And all at once Zarathustra was overcome by the great shame of having beheld such a thing: blushing to his white hair, he turned his glance away and lifted his foot to leave this evil spot. But then the dead wilderness resounded: for from the ground issued a gurgling, rasping sound such as water makes in stopped-up water-pipes at night; and at last a human voice and human speech emerged from it: it sounded thus: 'Zarathustra! Zarathustra! Read my riddle! Speak, speak! What is the revenge on the witness? 'I entice you back, here is slippery ice! Take care, take care that your pride does not here break its legs! 'You think yourself wise, proud Zarathustra! So read the riddle, you hard nut-cracker – the riddle that I am! So speak: who am I?' But when Zarathustra had heard these words, what do you think then happened to his soul? Pity overcame him ; and all at once he sank down, like an oak tree that has long withstood many woodchoppers, heavily, suddenly, to the terror even of those who wanted to fell it. But at once he arose from the ground and his countenance grew stern. 'I know you well,' he said in a brazen voice: 'you are the murderer of God ! Let me go. 'You could not endure him who saw you – who saw you unblinking and through and through, you ugliest man! You took revenge upon this witness!’ Thus spoke Zarathustra and made to depart; but the unutterable creature grasped for a corner of his garment and began again to gurgle and grope for speech. ‘Stay!’ he said at last, ‘stay! Do not go by! I have divined what axe it was that struck you to earth: Hail to you, O Zarathustra, that you are standing again! ‘You have divined, I know it well, how he feels who killed God – how the murderer of God feels. Stay I Sit beside me; it is not to no purpose. ‘To whom did I intend to go if not to you? Stay, sit down! But do not look at me! Honour thus – my ugliness! ‘They persecute me: now you are my last refuge. Not with their hatred, not with their henchmen – oh, I would mock such persecution, I would be proud and glad of it! ‘Has not all success hitherto been with the well-persecuted? And he who persecutes well easily learns to follow 45 – for he is already – at the heels of others. But it is their pity, ‘it is their pity from which I flee and flee to you. O Zarathustra, my last refuge, protect me; you, the only one who can divine me: ‘you have divined how he feels who has killed him . Stay! And if you will go, impatient man, do not go the way I came. That way is bad. ‘Are you angry with me because I have mangled language too long? Because I have advised you? But know: it is I, the ugliest man, ‘who also have the biggest, heaviest feet. Where I have gone, the way is bad. I tread all roads to death and to destruction. ‘But that you went past me, silent; that you blushed, I saw it well: by that I knew you for Zarathustra. ‘Anyone else would have thrown me his alms, his pity, in glance and speech. But for that – I am not enough of a beggar, you have divined that – ‘for that I am too rich , rich in big things, in fearsome things, in the ugliest things, in the most unutterable things! Your shame, O Zarathustra, honoured me! ‘I escaped with difficulty from the importunate crowd of those who pity, that I might find the only one who today teaches “Pity is importunate” – you, O Zarathustra! ‘ – be it the pity of a god, be it human pity: pity is contrary to modesty. And unwillingness to help may be nobler than that virtue which comes running with help. ‘That however, pity, is called virtue itself with all little people – they lack reverence for great misfortune, great ugliness, great failure. ‘I look beyond all these, as a dog looks over the backs of swarming flocks of sheep. They are little, well-meaning, well-woolled, colourless people. ‘As a heron looks contemptuously over shallow ponds, with head thrown back: so do I look over the swarm of colourless little waves and wills and souls. ‘Too long have they been allowed right, these little people: thus at last they have been allowed power, too – now they teach: “Only that is good which little people call good.” ‘And “truth” today is what the preacher said who himself sprang from them, that strange saint and advocate of the little people who testified of himself “I – am the truth”. ‘This immodest man has long made the cock’s comb of the little people rise up in pride – he who taught no small error when he taught “I – am the truth”. ‘Was an immodest man ever answered more politely? But you, O Zarathustra, passed him by and said: "No! No! Thrice No!" 'You warned against his error, as the first to do so, you warned against pity – no one else, only you and those of your kind. 'You are ashamed of the shame of the great sufferer; and truly, when you say "A great cloud emerges from pity, take care mankind!" 'When you teach "All creators are hard, all great love is beyond pity": O Zarathustra, how well-read in weather-omens you seem to me! 'You yourself, however – warn yourself too against your pity! For many are on their way to you, many suffering, doubting, despairing, drowning, freezing people – 'I warn you too against myself. You have read my best, my worst riddle, me myself, and what I have done. I know the axe that fells you. 'But he – had to die: he looked with eyes that saw everything – he saw the depths and abysses of man, all man's hidden disgrace and ugliness. 'His pity knew no shame: he crept into my dirtiest corners. This most curious, most over-important, over-compassionate god had to die. 'He always saw me : I desired to take revenge on such a witness – or cease to live myself. 'The god who saw everything, even man : this god had to die! Man could not endure that such a witness should live.' Thus spoke the ugliest man. Zarathustra, however, rose and prepared to go: for he was chilled to his very marrow. 'You unutterable creature,' he said, 'you warned me against your road. As thanks for that, I recommend you mine. Behold, up yonder lies Zarathustra's cave. 'My cave is big and deep and possesses many corners; there the best hidden man can find his hiding place. And close by it are a hundred secret and slippery ways for creeping, fluttering, and jumping beasts. 'You outcast who cast yourself out, do you not wish to live among men and the pity of men? Very well, do as I do. Thus you will also learn from me; only the doer learns. 'And first of all and above all speak with my animals! The proudest animal and the wisest animal – they may well be the proper counsellors for both of us!' Thus spoke Zarathustra and went his way, even more thoughtfully and slowly than before: for he asked himself many things and did not easily know what to answer. How poor is man! (he thought in his heart) how ugly, how croaking, how full of secret shame! They tell me that man loves himself: ah, how great must this self-love be! How much contempt is opposed to it! Even this man has loved himself as he has despised himself – he seems to me a great lover and a great despiser. I have yet found no one who has despised himself more deeply: even that is height. Alas, was he perhaps the Higher Man whose cry I heard? I love the great despisers. Man, however, is something that must be overcome. The Voluntary Beggar WHEN Zarathustra had left the ugliest man he felt chilled and alone: for he had absorbed much coldness and loneliness, to such an extent that even his limbs had grown colder. But he climbed on, up hill, down dale, past green pastures but also over wild, stony courses where no doubt an impatient brook had formerly made its bed: then all at once he grew warmer and more cheerful. 'What has happened to me?' he asked himself. 'Something warm and living refreshes me, it must be nearby. 'Already I am less alone; unknown companions and brothers circle about me, their warm breath touches my soul.' But when he peered about him and sought the comforters of his loneliness, behold, they were cows standing together on a hillock; it was their nearness and odour that had warmed his heart. These cows, however, seemed to be listening eagerly to a speaker, and paid no heed to him who approached. And when Zarathustra was quite near them he clearly heard a human voice speaking from out the midst of the cows; and apparently they had all turned their heads towards the speaker. Then Zarathustra eagerly sprang up the hillock and pulled the animals away, for he feared that here someone had had an accident, which the sympathy of cows could hardly remedy. But in this he was deceived; for behold, there on the ground sat a man who appeared to be persuading the animals to have no fear of him, a peaceable man and mountain sermonizer out of whose eyes goodness itself preached. 'What do you seek here?' cried Zarathustra in surprise. 'What do I seek here?' he answered: 'the same as you seek, you peace-breaker! That is, happiness on earth. 'To that end, however, I may learn from these cows. For, let me tell you, I have already been talking to them half a morning and they were just about to reply to me. Why do you disturb them? 'If we do not alter and become as cows, we shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. For there is one thing we should learn from them: rumination. 'And truly, if a man should gain the whole world and not learn this one thing, rumination: what would it profit him! He would not be free from his affliction, 'his great affliction: that, however, is today called disgust. Who today has not his heart, mouth, and eyes filled with disgust? You too! You too! But regard these cows!' Thus spoke the mountain sermonizer and then turned his glance upon Zarathustra, for up to then it had rested lovingly upon the cows: at that, however, he changed. 'Who is that I am speaking with?' he cried, startled, and jumped up from the ground. 'This is the man without disgust, this is Zarathustra himself, the overcomer of the great disgust, this is the eye, this is the mouth, this is the heart of Zarathustra himself.' And as he spoke thus he kissed the hands of him to whom he spoke with overflowing eyes, and behaved like someone to whom a valuable gift and jewel has unexpectedly fallen from heaven. The cows, however, looked on and were amazed. 'Do not speak of me, you strange, friendly man!' said Zarathustra, restraining his affection, 'first speak to me of yourself! Are you not the voluntary beggar who once threw away great riches, ' – who was ashamed of his riches and of the rich, and fled to the poor that he might give them his abundance and his heart? But they received him not.' 'But they received me not,' said the voluntary beggar, 'you know that. So at last I went to the animals and to these cows.' 'Then you learned', Zarathustra interrupted the speaker, 'how it is harder to give well than to take well, and that to give well is an art and the ultimate, subtlest master-art of kindness.' 'These days especially,' answered the voluntary beggar: 'for today everything base has become rebellious and reserved and in its own way haughty: that is, in the mob's way. 'For the hour has come, you know it, for the great, evil, protracted, slow rebellion of the mob and the slaves: it grows and grows! 'Now all benevolence and petty giving provokes the base; and let the over-rich be on their guard! 'Whoever today lets drops fall like a big-bellied bottle out of a too-narrow neck – people like to break the necks of such bottles today. 'Lustful greed, bitter envy, sour vindictiveness, mob pride: all this threw itself in my face. It is no longer true that the poor are blessed. The kingdom of heaven, however, is with the cows.'

'And why is it not with the rich?' asked Zarathustra, tempting him, as he restrained the cows which were sniffing familiarly at the man of peace. 'Why do you tempt me?' answered the latter. 'You yourself know better even than I. For what drove me to the poorest, O Zarathustra? Was it not disgust with our richest? ' – disgust with those punished by riches, who glean advantage from all kinds of sweepings, with cold eyes, rank thoughts, disgust with this rabble that stinks to heaven, 'disgust with this gilded, debased mob whose fathers were pick-pockets or carrion-birds or ragmen with compliant, lustful, forgetful wives – for they are all of them not far from whores – 'mob above, mob below! What are "poor" and "rich" today! I unlearned this distinction – then I fled away, far away and ever farther, until I came to these cows.' Thus spoke the man of peace and himself snorted and perspired as he spoke: so that the cows were again amazed.

Zarathustra, however, looked him in the face with a smile all the while he was speaking so sternly, and then silently shook his head. 'You do violence to yourself, mountain sermonizer, when you use such stern words. Neither your mouth nor your eyes were made for such sternness. 'Nor your stomach either, as I think: that opposes all such raging and hating and over-frothing. Your stomach wants gentler things: you are no butcher. 'On the contrary, you seem to me a man of plants and roots. Perhaps you grind corn. But you are certainly disinclined to fleshy pleasures and love honey.' 'You have divined me well,' answered the voluntary beggar with lightened heart. 'I love honey, I also grind corn, for I have sought what tastes well and produces sweet breath: 'also what takes a long time, a day's work and a day's chewing for gentle idlers and sluggards. 'To be sure, these cows have attained the greatest proficiency in it: they have devised rumination and lying in the sun. And they abstain from all heavy thoughts that innate the heart.' 'Very well!' said Zarathustra: 'you shall see my animals, too, my eagle and my serpent – there is not their like on earth today. 'Behold, yonder leads the way to my cave: be its guest tonight. And speak with my animals of the happiness of animals, 'until I return home myself. For now a cry of distress calls me hurriedly away from you. You will find new honey, too, at my cave, golden honey in the comb, cold as ice: eat it! 'But now straightway take leave of your cows, you strange, friendly man! although it may be hard for you. For they are your warmest friends and teachers!' 'Except one, whom I love more,' answered the voluntary beggar. 'You yourself are good, and even better than a cow, O Zarathustra!' 'Away, away with you! you arrant flatterer!' cried Zarathustra mischievously, 'why do you spoil me with such praise and honey of flattery?' 'Away, away from me!' he cried again and swung his stick at the affectionate beggar; he, however, ran nimbly away. The Shadow B UT hardly had the voluntary beggar run off and was Zarathustra alone again than he heard a new voice behind him calling: 'Stop! Zarathustra! Wait! It is I, O Zarathustra, I, your shadow!' But Zarathustra did not wait, for a sudden ill-humour overcame him on account of all the crowding and thronging on his mountains. 'Where has my solitude fled?' he said. 'Truly, it is becoming too much for me; these mountains are swarming, my kingdom is no longer of this world, I need new mountains. 'Does my shadow call me? Of what account is my shadow I Let it run after me! I – shall run away from it.' Thus spoke Zarathustra to his heart and ran off. But he who was behind him followed after: so that forthwith there were three runners one behind the other, that is, foremost the voluntary beggar, then Zarathustra, and thirdly and hindmost his shadow. They had not been running thus for long when Zarathustra became conscious of his folly and at once shook off his ill-humour and disgust. 'What!' he said, 'have not the most laughable things always happened with us old hermits and saints? 'Truly, my folly has grown high in the mountains! Now I hear six foolish old legs clattering one behind the other! 'But can Zarathustra really be afraid of a shadow? And anyway, I think it has longer legs than I.' Thus spoke Zarathustra, laughing with his eyes and his entrails, then stopped and turned quickly around – and behold, in doing so he almost threw his follower and shadow to the ground, the latter followed so closely upon his heels and was so weak. For when Zarathustra inspected him with his eyes, he was as terrified as if he had suddenly seen a ghost, so slight, dark, hollow, and spent did this follower appear. 'Who are you?' Zarathustra asked furiously, 'what are you doing here? And why do you call yourself my shadow? I do not like you.' 'Forgive me,' answered the shadow, 'that it is I; and if you do not like me, very good, O Zarathustra! I praise you and your good taste in that. 'I am a wanderer, who has already walked far at your heels: always going but without a goal and without a home: so that, truly, I am almost the eternal Wandering Jew, except that I am neither eternal nor a Jew. 'What? Must I always be going? Whirled by every wind, restless, driven onward? O Earth, you have grown too round for me! 'I have sat on every surface, like weary dust I have fallen asleep upon mirrors and window-panes: everything takes from me, nothing gives, I have become thin – I am almost like a shadow. 'But I have fled to you and followed you longest, O Zarathustra, and although I have hidden myself from you, yet I was your best shadow: where you have sat there I sat too. 'I have travelled with you in the remotest, coldest worlds, like a ghost that voluntarily walks over snow and winter roofs. 'I have striven with you into all that was forbidden, worst, most remote: and if anything in me be a virtue, it is that I have feared no prohibition. 'I have broken up with you whatever my heart revered. I have overthrown boundary stones and statues, I have pursued the most dangerous desires – truly, I once went beyond every crime. 'I have unlearned with you belief in words and values and great names. When the Devil casts his skin does his name not also fall away? For that too is a skin. The Devil himself is perhaps – a skin. "Nothing is true, everything is permitted": thus I told myself. I plunged into the coldest water, with head and heart. Alas, how often I stood naked, like a red crab, on that account! 'Alas, where have all my goodness and shame and belief in the good fled! Alas, where is that mendacious innocence that I once possessed, the innocence of the good and their noble lies! 'Truly, too often did I follow close by the feet of truth: then it kicked me in the face. Sometimes I intended to lie, and behold! only then did I hit – the truth. 'Too much has become clear to me: now I am no longer concerned with it. No longer is there anything living that I love – how should I still love myself? "To live as I desire to live or not to live at all": that is what I want, that is what the most saintly man wants. But alas! how can I still have – a desire? 'Have I – still a goal? A haven to which my sail races? 'A good wind? Alas, only he who knows where he is going knows which wind is a good and fair wind for him. 'What is left to me? A heart weary and insolent; a restless will; infirm wings; a broken backbone. 'This seeking for my home: O Zarathustra, do you know this seeking was my affliction, 46 it is consuming me. 'Where is – my home? I ask and seek and have sought for it, I have not found it. Oh eternal Everywhere, oh eternal Nowhere, oh eternal – Vanity!' Thus spoke the shadow, and Zarathustra's face lengthened at his words. 'You are my shadow!' he said at length, sorrowfully. 'Your danger is no small one, you free spirit and wanderer! You have had a bad day: see you do not have a worse evening! 'Even a prison at last seems bliss to such restless people as you. Have you ever seen how captured criminals sleep? They sleep peacefully, they enjoy their new security. 'Take care that you are not at last captured by a narrow belief, a hard, stern illusion! For henceforth everything that is narrow and firm will entice and tempt you. 'You have lost your goal: alas, how will you get over and laugh away that loss? By losing your goal – you have lost your way, too! 'You poor traveller, wanderer, you weary butterfly! Would you this evening have a resting place and homestead? So go up to my cave! 'Yonder leads the way to my cave. And now I will run quickly away from you again. Already it is as if a shadow were lying upon me. 'I will run alone, so that it may again grow bright around me. For that I still have to be a long time merrily on my legs. In the evening, however, we shall – dance!' Thus spoke Zarathustra. At Noontide A ND Zarathustra ran and ran and found no one else and was alone and found himself again and again and enjoyed and relished his solitude and thought of good things, for hours on end. About the hour of noon, however, when the sun stood exactly over Zarathustra's head, he passed by an old gnarled and crooked tree which was embraced around by the abundant love of a vine and hidden from itself: from the vine an abundance of yellow grapes hung down to the wanderer. Then he felt a desire to relieve a little thirst and to pluck himself a grape; but when he had already extended his arm to do so, he felt an even greater desire to do something else: that is, to lie down beside the tree at the hour of perfect noon and sleep. This Zarathustra did; and no sooner had he lain down upon the ground, in the stillness and secrecy of the multicoloured grass, than he forgot his little thirst and fell asleep. For, as Zarathustra's saying has it: One thing is more necessary than another. Only his eyes remained open – for they were not wearied of seeing and admiring the tree and the love of the vine. In falling asleep, however, Zarathustra spoke thus to his heart: Soft! Soft! Has the world not just become perfect? What has happened to me? As a delicate breeze, unseen, dances upon the smooth sea, light, light as a feather: thus – does sleep dance upon me. My eyes it does not close, my soul it leaves awake. It is light, truly I light as a feather. It persuades me, I know not how; it inwardly touches me with a caressing hand, it compels me. Yes, it compels me, so that my soul stretches itself out: how lengthy and weary my soul has grown, my strange soul! Has a seventh day's evening come to it just at noontide? Has it wandered too long, blissfully, among good and ripe things? It stretches itself out, long, long – longer! it lies still, my strange soul. It has tasted too many good things, this golden sadness oppresses it, it makes a wry mouth. Like a ship that has entered its stillest bay – now it leans against the earth, weary of long voyages and uncertain seas. Is the earth not more faithful? As such a ship lies against the shore, nestles against the shore – there it suffices for a spider to spin its thread out to it from the land. No stronger ropes are needed. As such a weary ship rests in the stillest bay: thus do I now rest close to the earth, faithful, trusting, waiting, fastened to it by the finest threads. Oh happiness! Oh happiness! Would you sing, O my soul? You lie in the grass. But this is the secret, solemn hour when no shepherd plays his flute. Take care! Hot noontide sleeps upon the fields. Do not sing! Soft! The world is perfect. Do not sing, you grass bird, O my soul! Do not even whisper! Just see – soft! old noontide sleeps, it moves its mouth: has it not just drunk a drop of happiness – an ancient brown drop of golden happiness, of golden wine? Something glides across it, its happiness laughs. Thus – does a god laugh. Soft! 'Happiness; how little attains happiness!' Thus I spoke once and thought myself wise. But it was a blasphemy: I have learned that now. Wise fools speak better. Precisely the least thing, the gentlest, lightest, the rustling of a lizard, a breath, a moment, a twinkling of the eye – little makes up the quality of the best happiness. Soft! What has happened to me? Listen! Has time flown away? Do I not fall? Have I not fallen – listen! into the well of eternity? What is happening to me? Still! Is it stinging me – alas – in the heart? In the heart! oh break, break, heart, after such happiness, after such stinging! What? Has the world not just become perfect? Round and ripe? Oh, golden round ring 47 – whither does it fly? Away, after it! Away! Soft – (and at this point Zarathustra stretched himself and felt that he was asleep). Up! (he said to himself) up, sleeper! You noontide sleeper! Very well, come on, old legs I! It is time and past time, you have still a good way to go. You have slept your fill, how long? Half an eternity! Very well, come on, my old heart! For how long after such a sleep may you – wake your fill? (But then he fell asleep again, and his soul contradicted him and resisted and again lay down.) ‘Let me alone! Soft! Has the world not just become perfect? Oh perfect as a round golden ball!’ Get up (said Zarathustra), you little thief, you lazybones! 48 What! Still stretching, yawning, sighing, falling into deep wells? But who are you then, O my soul? (And at this point he started, for a ray of sunlight had glanced down from the sky on to his face.) O sky above me (he said, sighing, and sat upright), are you watching me? Are you listening to my strange soul? When will you drink this drop of dew that has fallen upon all earthly things – when will you drink this strange soul – when, well of eternity! serene and terrible noontide abyss! when will you drink my soul back into yourself? Thus spoke Zarathustra and raised himself from his bed beside the tree as from a strange intoxication: and behold, the sun was still standing straight above his head. One might rightly gather from that, however, that Zarathustra had not been sleeping for long. The Greeting I T was only in the late afternoon that Zarathustra, after long, vain searching and roaming about, returned home to his cave. But when he was opposite it, not twenty paces away, then occurred that which he now least expected: he heard again the great cry of distress. And astonishing thing! this time it came from his own cave. It was a protracted, manifold, strange cry, however, and Zarathustra clearly distinguished that it was composed of many voices: although, heard from a distance, it might sound like a cry from a single throat. Thereupon, Zarathustra sprang towards his cave, and behold! what a spectacle awaited him after that concert! For all those whom he had passed by that day were seated together: the king on the right and the king on the left, the old sorcerer, the pope, the voluntary beggar, the shadow, the conscientious man of the spirit, the sorrowful prophet, and the ass; the ugliest man, however, had placed a crown upon his head and slung two purple sashes around him, for, like all the ugly, he loved to disguise and embellish himself. But in the midst of this melancholy company stood Zarathustra’s eagle, agitated and with feathers ruffled, for he had been expected to answer too much for which his pride had no answer; the wise serpent, however, hung about its neck. Zarathustra beheld all this with great amazement; then, however, he examined each of his guests with gentle curiosity, read what was in their souls, and was amazed anew. In the meantime the assembled guests had risen from their seats and were respectfully waiting for Zarathustra to speak. Zarathustra, however, spoke thus: You despairing men! You strange men! So was it your cry of distress I heard? And now I know, too, where to seek him whom I sought today in vain: the Higher Man – he sits in my own cave, the Higher Man! But why am I surprised! Have I myself not enticed him to me with honey offerings and cunning bird-calls of my happiness? But it seems to me you are ill adapted for company, you disturb one another's hearts, you criers of distress, when you sit here together? First of all someone else must come, someone to make you laugh again, a good, cheerful Jack Pudding, a dancer and breeze and madcap, some old fool or other: – what do you think? But forgive me, you despairing men, that I speak before you such petty words, truly unworthy of such guests I But you do not guess what makes my heart wanton: you yourselves do it, and the sight of you, forgive me for it! For anyone beholding a man in despair grows brave. To encourage a despairing man – anyone thinks himself strong enough for that. To me have you given this strength – a goodly guest-gift, my exalted guests! Very well, do not be angry with me if I offer you something of mine. This is my kingdom and my domain: but what is mine shall be yours for this evening and this night. My animals shall serve you: let my cave be your resting place! No one shall despair at my hearth and home, I protect everyone from his wild animals in my preserve. And that is the first thing I offer you: security! The second, however, is: my little finger. And when you have that, take the whole hand, very well! and the heart in addition! Welcome to this place, welcome, my guests! Thus spoke Zarathustra and laughed with love and mischievousness. After this greeting, his guests bowed themselves again and held a respectful silence; the king on the right, however, replied to him in their name. By the manner in which you have offered us hand and greeting, O Zarathustra, do we recognize you as Zarathustra. You have humbled yourself before us; you have almost injured our respect: but who could have humbled himself with such pride as you? That uplifts us ourselves, it is a refreshment to our eyes and hearts. Just to see this would we climb higher mountains than this mountain. For we have come as sightseers, we wanted to see what makes sad eyes bright. And behold, already all our distressful crying is over. Already our hearts and minds are opened and delighted. Little is needed for our hearts to grow wanton. Nothing more gladdening grows on earth, O Zarathustra, than an exalted, robust will: it is the earth's fairest growth. A whole landscape is refreshed by one such tree. To the pine-tree, O Zarathustra, do I compare him who grows up like you: tall, silent, hard, alone, of the finest, supplest wood, magnificent – at last, however, reaching out with strong, green branches for its domain, asking bold questions of the winds and storms and whatever is at home in the heights, replying more boldly, a commander, a victor: oh who would not climb high mountains to behold such trees? The gloomy man, too, and the ill-constituted, refresh themselves at your tree, O Zarathustra; at your glance even the restless man grows secure and heals his heart. And truly, many eyes today are raised to your mountain and your tree; a great longing has arisen, and many have learned to ask: Who is Zarathustra? And he into whose ear you have ever poured your song and your honey: all the hidden men, the hermits and hermit-couples, say all at once to their hearts: 'Does Zarathustra still live? There is no longer any point in living, it is all one, everything is in vain: except we live with Zarathustra!' 'Why does he not come, he who has proclaimed himself so long?' thus many ask. 'Has solitude devoured him? Or should we perhaps go to him?' Now solitude itself yields and breaks apart and can no longer contain its dead. The resurrected are to be seen everywhere. Now the waves rise and rise around your mountain, O Zarathustra. And however high your height may be, many must reach up to you: your boat shall not sit in the dry for much longer. And that we despairing men have now come into your cave and are already no longer despairing: that is only a sign and omen that better men are on their way to you; for this itself is on its way to you, the last remnant of God among men, that is: all men possessed by great longing, great disgust, great satiety, all who do not want to live except they learn to hope again – except they learn from you, O Zarathustra, the great hope! Thus spoke the king on the right and grasped Zarathustra's hand to kiss it; but Zarathustra resisted his adoration and stepped back startled, silently and abruptly, as if escaping into the far distance. But after a short while he was again with his guests, regarded them with clear, questioning eyes, and said: My guests, you Higher Men, I will speak clearly and in plain German to you. 49 It is not for you that I have been waiting in these mountains. ('Clearly and in plain German? God help us!' said the king on the left to himself at this point; 'it is clear he does not know the good Germans, this wise man from the East! 'But he means "uncouthly and in German" – very well! Nowadays that is not in quite the worst taste!') Truly, you may all be Higher Men (Zarathustra went on): but for me – you are not high and strong enough. For me, that is to say: for the inexorable that is silent within me but will not always be silent. And if you belong to me, it is not as my right arm. For he who himself stands on sick and tender legs, as you do, wants above all, whether he knows it or conceals it from himself: to be spared. My arms and my legs, however, I do not spare, I do not spare my warriors: how, then, could you be fit for my warfare? With you I should still spoil every victory. And some of you would give in simply on hearing the loud beating of my drums. Neither are you handsome enough nor sufficiently wellborn for me. I need pure, smooth mirrors for my teaching; upon your surface even my own reflection is distorted. Many a burden, many a memory weighs down your shoulders; many an evil dwarf crouches in your corners. And there is hidden mob in you, too. And although you are high and of a higher type, much in you is crooked and malformed. There is no smith in the world who could hammer you straight and into shape for me. You are only bridges: may higher men than you step across upon you! You are steps: so do not be angry with him who climbs over you into bis height! From your seed there may one day grow for me a genuine son and perfect heir: but that is far ahead. You yourselves are not those to whom my heritage and name belong. It is not for you that I wait here in these mountains, it is not with you that I may go down for the last time. You have come to me only as omens that higher men are already on their way to me, not men possessed of great longing, great disgust, great satiety, and that which you called the remnant of God, No! No! Thrice No! It is for others that I wait here in these mountains and I will not lift my foot from here without them, for higher, stronger, more victorious, more joyful men, such as are square-built in body and soul: laughing lions must come! O my guests, you strange men, have you yet heard nothing of my children? And that they are on their way to me? Speak to me of my gardens, of my Blissful Islands, of my beautiful new race, why do you not speak of them? This guest-gift do I beg of your love, that you speak to me of my children. In them I am rich, for them I became poor: what have I not given, what would I not give, to possess one thing: these children, this living garden, these trees of life of my will and of my highest hope! Thus spoke Zarathustra and suddenly halted in his discourse: for his longing overcame him and he closed his eyes and mouth because his heart was so moved. And all his guests, too, remained silent and stood still and dismayed: except that the old prophet started to make signs with his hands and his features. The Last Supper F OR at this point the prophet interrupted the greeting of Zarathustra and his guests: he thrust himself forward like one with no time to lose, grasped Zarathustra's hand and cried: 'But Zarathustra! 'One thing is more necessary than another, so you say yourself: very well, one thing is now more necessary to me than all others. 'A word in season: did you not invite me to a meal? And here are many who have travelled far. You don't intend to fob us off with speeches, do you? 'Besides, you have all been thinking too much about freezing, drowning, choking, and other physical dangers: no one, however, has thought about my danger, that is, starving – ' (Thus spoke the prophet; but when Zarathustra's animals heard his words they ran off in terror. For they saw that all they had brought home during the day would not suffice to cram this one philosopher.) 'And dying of thirst,' the prophet went on. 'And although I have heard water splashing here like speeches of wisdom, plenteous and unceasing: I – want wine! 'Not everyone is a born water-drinker, like Zarathustra. Neither is water of any use to weary and drooping men: we ought to have wine – that alone brings sudden recovery and unpremeditated health!' On this occasion, when the prophet desired wine, it happened that the king on the left, the silent one, also found speech for once. 'We have provided for wine,' he said, 'I and my brother, the king on the right: we have wine enough – a whole ass's load of it. So nothing is lacking but bread.' 'Bread?' replied Zarathustra laughing. 'It is precisely bread that hermits do not have. But man does not live by bread alone, but also by the flesh of good lambs, of which I have two. 'Let us quickly slaughter these and prepare them spicily with sage: that is how I like it. And neither is there any lack of roots and fruits, fine enough even for gourmets and epicures; nor of nuts and other riddles that need cracking. 'Thus we shall very shortly partake of an excellent meal. But whoever wants to eat with us must also lend a hand, even the kings. For with Zarathustra even a king may be a cook.' Everyone heartily agreed with this suggestion: except that the voluntary beggar exclaimed against flesh and wine and spices. 'Just listen to this glutton Zarathustra!' he said jokingly: 'does one take to caves and high mountains in order to partake of such meals? 'To be sure, I now understand what he once taught us: "Praised be a moderate poverty!" and why he wants to abolish beggars.' 'Be of good cheer,' Zarathustra replied to him, 'as I am. Stick to your usual custom, admirable man: grind your corn, drink your water, praise your own cooking: if only it makes you happy! 'I am a law only for my own, I am not a law for all. But he who belongs to me must be strong-limbed and nimble-footed, 'merry in war and feasting, no mournful man, no dreamy fellow, ready for what is hardest as for a feast, healthy and whole. 'The best belongs to me and mine; and if we are not given it, we take it: the best food, the purest sky, the most robust thoughts, the fairest women!' Thus spoke Zarathustra; the king on the right, however, replied: 'Strange! Did one ever hear such clever things from the mouth of a philosopher? 'And truly, it is the rarest thing to find a philosopher clever as well as wise, and not an ass.' Thus spoke the king on the right and wondered; the ass, however, maliciously replied to his speech with 'Ye-a.' This, however, was the beginning of that long meal which is called 'The Last Supper' 50 in the history books. And during that meal nothing was spoken of but the Higher Man. Of the Higher Man 1 W HEN I went to men for the first time, I committed the folly of hermits, the great folly: I set myself in the market-place. And when I spoke to everyone, I spoke to no one. In the evening, however, tight-rope walkers and corpses were my companions; and I myself was almost a corpse. With the new morning, however, came to me a new truth: then I learned to say: 'What are the market-place and the mob and the mob's confusion and the mob's long ears to me!' You Higher Men, learn this from me: In the market-place no one believes in Higher Men. And if you want to speak there, very well, do so! But the mob blink and say: 'We are all equal.' 'You Higher Men' – thus the mob blink – 'there are no Higher Men, we are all equal, man is but man, before God – we are all equal!' Before God! But now this God has died. And let us not be equal before the mob. You Higher Men, depart from the market-place! 2 Before God! But now this God has died! You Higher Men, this God was your greatest danger. Only since he has lain in the grave have you again been resurrected. Only now does the great noontide come, only now does the Higher Man become – lord and master! Have you understood this saying, O my brothers? Are you terrified: do your hearts fail? Does the abyss here yawn for you? Does the hound of Hell here yelp at you? Very well! Come on, you Higher Men! Only now does the mountain of mankind's future labour. God has died: now we desire – that the Superman shall live. 3 The most cautious people ask today: 'How may man still be preserved?' Zarathustra, however, asks as the sole and first one to do so: 'How shall man be overcome?' The Superman lies close to my heart, he is my paramount and sole concern – and not man: not the nearest, not the poorest, not the most suffering, not the best. O my brothers, what I can love in man is that he is a going-across and a going-down. And in you, too, there is much that makes me love and hope. That you have despised, you Higher Men, that makes me hope. For the great despisers are the great reverers. That you have despaired, there is much to honour in that. For you have not learned how to submit, you have not learned petty prudence. For today the petty people have become lord and master: they all preach submission and acquiescence and prudence and diligence and consideration and the long et cetera of petty virtues. What is womanish, what stems from slavishness and especially from the mob hotchpotch: that now wants to become master of mankind's entire destiny – oh disgust! disgust! That questions and questions and never tires: 'How may man preserve himself best, longest, most agreeably?' With that – they are the masters of the present. Overcome for me these masters of the present, O my brothers – these petty people: they are the Superman's greatest danger! Overcome, you Higher Men, the petty virtues, the petty prudences, the sand-grain discretion, the ant-swarm inanity, miserable ease, the 'happiness of the greatest number'! And rather despair than submit. And truly, I love you because you do not know how to live today, you Higher Men! For thus do you – live best! 4 Do you possess courage, O my brothers? Are you stouthearted? Not courage in the presence of witnesses, but hermits' and eagles' courage, which not even a god observes any more? I do not call cold-spirited, mulish, blind, or intoxicated men stout-hearted. He possesses heart who knows fear but masters fear; who sees the abyss, but sees it with pride. He who sees the abyss, but with an eagle's eyes – he who grasps the abyss with an eagle's claws: he possesses courage. 5 'Man is evil' – all the wisest men have told me that to comfort me. Ah, if only it be true today! For evil is man's best strength. 'Man must grow better and more evil' – thus do I teach. The most evil is necessary for the Superman's best. It may have been good for that preacher of the petty people to bear and suffer the sin of man. I, however, rejoice in great sin as my great consolation. But these things are not said for long ears. Neither does every word belong in every mouth. They are subtle, remote things: sheep's hooves ought not to grasp for them! 6 You Higher Men, do you think I am here to put right what you have done badly? Or that I mean henceforth to make more comfortable beds for you sufferers? Or show you restless, erring, straying men new, easier footpaths? No! No! Thrice No! More and more, better and better men of your kind must perish – for life must be harder and harder for you. Only thus, only thus does man grow to the height where the lightning can strike and shatter him: high enough for the lightning! My mind and longing go out to the few, the protracted, the remote things: what are your many, little, brief miseries to me! You have not yet suffered enough! For you suffer from yourselves, you have not yet suffered from man. You would lie if you said otherwise! None of you suffer from what I have suffered. 7 It does not suffice me that the lightning no longer does harm. I do not want to conduct it away: it shall learn – to work for me. My wisdom has long collected itself like a cloud, it is growing stiller and darker. Thus does every wisdom that shall one day give birth to lightnings. I do not want to be light for these men of the present, or be called light by them. These men – I want to blind: lightning of my wisdom! put out their eyes! 8 Do not will beyond your powers: there is an evil falsity about those who will beyond their powers. Especially when they will great things! For they awaken mistrust of great things, these subtle fabricators and actors: until at last they are false to themselves, squint-eyed, whitewashed rottenness, cloaked with clever words, with pretended virtues, with glittering, false deeds. Guard yourselves well against that, you Higher Men! For I count nothing more valuable and rare today than honesty. Does this present not belong to the mob? The mob, however, does not know what is great or small, what is straight and honest: it is innocently crooked, it always lies. 9 Have a healthy mistrust today, you Higher Men, you stouthearted, open-hearted men! And keep your reasons secret! For this present belongs to the mob. Who could overturn with reasons what the mob has once learned to believe without reasons? And in the market-place one convinces with gestures. But reasons make the mob mistrustful. And when truth has triumphed for once, then you have asked with healthy mistrust: ‘What mighty error has fought fork?’ Be on your guard, too, against the learned! They hate you: for they are unfruitful! They have cold, dried-up eyes, before which all birds lie stripped of their feathers. They boast that they do not tell lies: but inability to lie is far from being love of truth. Be on your guard I Freedom from fever is far from being knowledge! I do not believe frozen spirits. He who cannot lie does not know what truth is. 10 If you want to rise high, use your own legs! Do not let yourselves be carried up, do not sit on the backs and heads of strangers! But did you mount horse? Do you now ride pell-mell up to your goal? Very well, my friend! But your lame foot also sits with you on your horse! When you reach your goal, when you jump from your horse: precisely upon your height you Higher Man, will you stumble! 11 You creators, you Higher Men! One is pregnant only with one’s own child. Let nothing impose upon you, nothing persuade you! For who is your neighbour? And if you do things ‘for your neighbour’, still you do not create for him! Unlearn this ‘for’, you creators: your very virtue wants you to have nothing to do with ‘for’ and ‘for the sake of and ‘because’. You should stop your ears to these false little words. This ‘for one’s neighbour' is the virtue only of petty people: there they say 'birds of a feather' and 'one good turn deserves another' – they have neither right to nor strength for your selfishness! The prudence and providence of pregnancy is in your selfishness! What no one has yet seen, the fruit: that is protected and indulged and nourished by your whole love. Where your whole love is, with your child, there too is your whole virtue! Your work, your will is your 'neighbour': let no false values persuade you otherwise! 12 You creators, you Higher Men! Whoever has to give birth is sick; but whoever has given birth is unclean. Ask the women: one does not give birth for pleasure. The pain makes hens and poets cackle. You creators, there is much in you that is unclean. That is because you have to be mothers. A new child: oh how much new filth has also entered the world I Go aside I And whoever has given birth should wash his soul clean! 13 Do not be virtuous beyond your powers I And do not ask anything improbable of yourselves! Follow in the footsteps of your fathers' virtue! How would you climb high if the will of your fathers did not climb with you? But he who wants to be a first-born should see that he does not also become a last-born I And you should not pretend to be saints in those matters in which your fathers were vicious! He whose fathers passed their time with women, strong wine, and roast pork, what would it be if he demanded chastity of himself? It would be a piece of folly! Truly, I think it would be much for such a one to be the husband of one or two or three women. And if he founded monasteries and wrote above the doors: 'The way to holiness', I should still say: What of it! it is another piece of folly! He has founded for himself a house of refuge and correction: much good may it do him I But I have no faith in it. It is what one takes into solitude that grows there, the beast within included. And so, many should be dissuaded from solitude. Has there ever been anything filthier on earth than the saints of the desert? Not only the devil was loose around them – but the swine, too. 14 Timid, ashamed, awkward, like a tiger whose leap has failed: this is how I have often seen you slink aside, you Higher Men. A throw you made had failed. But what of that, you dice-throwers! You have not learned to play and mock as a man ought to play and mock! Are we not always seated at a great table for play and mockery? And if great things you attempted have turned out failures, does that mean you yourselves are – failures? And if you yourselves have turned out failures, does that mean – man is a failure? If man has turned out a failure, however: very well! come on! 15 The higher its type, the less often does a thing succeed. You Higher Men here, are you not all – failures? Be of good courage, what does it matter! How much is still possible! Learn to laugh at yourselves as a man ought to laugh! And no wonder you have failed and half succeeded, you half-broken men! Does there not strive and struggle in you -mankind's future? Mankind's most distant, most profound questions, his reaching to the furthest stars, his prodigious power: does all that not foam together in your pot? No wonder many a pot is shattered! Learn to laugh at yourselves, as a man ought to laugh. You Higher Men, oh how much is still possible! And truly, how much has already succeeded! How rich this earth is in good little perfect things, in well-constituted things! Set good little perfect things around you, you Higher Men! Things whose golden ripeness heals the heart. Perfect things teach hope. 16 What has been the greatest sin here on earth? Was it not the saying of him who said: 'Woe to those who laugh!' Did he himself find on earth no reason for laughter? If so, he sought badly. Even a child could find reasons. He – did not love sufficiently: otherwise he would also have loved us, the laughers I But he hated and jeered at us, he promised us wailing and gnashing of teeth. Does one then straightway have to curse where one does not love? That – seems to me bad taste. But that is what he did, this uncompromising man. He sprang from the mob. And he himself did not love sufficiently: otherwise he would not have been so angry that he was not loved. Great love does not desire love – it desires more. Avoid all such uncompromising men! They are a poor, sick type, a mob type: they look upon this life with an ill will, they have an evil eye for this earth. Avoid all such uncompromising men! They have heavy feet and sultry hearts – they do not know how to dance. How could the earth be light to such men! 17 All good things approach their goal crookedly. Like cats they arch their backs, they purr inwardly at their approaching happiness – all good things laugh. His step betrays whether a man is stepping along his own path: so watch me walk! But he who approaches his goal, dances. And truly, I have not become a statue, I do not stand here stiff, stumpy, stony, a pillar; I love to run fast. And although there are swamps and thick afflictions on earth, he who has light feet runs even across mud and dances as upon swept ice. Lift up your hearts, my brothers, high, higher! And do not forget your legs I Lift up your legs, too, you fine dancers: and better still, stand on your heads! 18 This laugher's crown, this rose-wreath crown: I myself have set this crown on my head, I myself have canonized my laughter. I have found no other strong enough for it today. Zarathustra the dancer, Zarathustra the light, who beckons with his wings, ready for flight, beckoning to all birds, prepared and ready, blissfully light-hearted: Zarathustra the prophet, Zarathustra the laughing prophet, no impatient nor uncompromising man, one who loves jumping and escapades; 51 I myself have set this crown on my head! 19 Lift up your hearts, my brothers, high! higher! And do not forget your legs! Lift up your legs, too, you fine dancers: and better still, stand on your heads! There are beasts who are heavy-footed even in happiness, there are those who are clumsy-footed from birth. They exert themselves strangely, like an elephant trying to stand on its head. But better to be foolish with happiness than foolish with misfortune, better to dance clumsily than to walk lamely. So learn from me my wisdom: even the worst thing has two good sides, even the worst thing has good dancing legs: so learn, you Higher Men, how to stand on your own proper legs! So unlearn trumpeting of affliction and all mob-sorrowfulness! Oh how sad the Jack Puddings of the mob seem to me at present! This present, however, belongs to the mob. 20 Be like the wind when it rushes forth from its mountain caves: it will dance to its own pipe, the seas tremble and leap under its footsteps. That which gives wings to asses and milks lionesses, all praise to that unruly spirit that comes to all the present and all the mob like a storm-wind, – that is enemy to all thistle-heads and prying noses and to all withered leaves and weeds: all praise to that wild, good, free storm-spirit that dances upon swamps and afflictions as upon meadows! That hates the wasted dogs of the mob and all the ill-constituted brood of gloom: all praise to this spirit of all free spirits, the laughing storm that blows dust in the eyes of all the dim-sighted and ulcerated. You Higher Men, the worst about you is: none of you has learned to dance as a man ought to dance – to dance beyond yourselves! What does it matter that you are failures! How much is still possible! So learn to laugh beyond yourselves! Lift up your hearts, you fine dancers, high! higher! and do not forget to laugh well! This laughter's crown, this rose-wreath crown: to you, my brothers, do I throw this crown! I have canonized laughter; you Higher Men, learn – to laugh! The Song of Melancholy 1 Z ARATHUSTRA was standing near the door of his cave as he spoke this discourse; with the final words, however, he escaped from his guests and fled for a short while into the open air. 'Oh pure odours around me,' he exclaimed, 'oh blissful stillness around me! But where are my animals? Come here, come here, my eagle and my serpent! 'Tell me, my animals: all these Higher Men – do they perhaps not smell well? Oh pure odours around me! Only now do I know and feel how I love you, my animals.' And Zarathustra said again: 'I love you, my animals!' But the eagle and the serpent pressed around him when he said these words, and looked up at him. All three stood silently together in this attitude, and sniffed and breathed in the good air together. For the air here outside was better than with the Higher Men. 2 Hardly had Zarathustra left his cave, however, when the old sorcerer got up, looked cunningly around, and said: He has gone out! And already, you Higher Men – if I may tickle you with this name of praise and flattery, as he does – already my evil spirit of deceit and sorcery attacks me, my melancholy devil, who is an adversary of this Zarathustra from the very heart: forgive him for it! Now he insists on working charms before you, now he has his hour; I wrestle in vain with this evil spirit. To all of you, whatever honours you may bestow upon yourselves with words, whether you call yourselves 'the free spirits' or 'the truthful' or 'the penitents of the spirit' or 'the unfettered' or 'the great desirers', to all of you, like me, suffer from the great disgust, for whom the old God has died and as yet no new God lies in cradles and swaddling clothes – to all of you is my evil spirit and sorcery-devil well-disposed. I know you, Higher Men, I know him – I also know this demon whom I love despite myself, this Zarathustra: he himself often seems to me like the beautiful mask of a saint, like a strange, new masquerade in which my evil spirit, the melancholy devil, takes pleasure – I love Zarathustra, so I often think, for the sake of my evil spirit. But already he is attacking me and compelling me, this spirit of melancholy, this evening-twilight devil: and truly, you Higher Men, he has a desire – just open your eyes! – he has a desire to come naked, whether as man or woman I do not yet know: but he is coming, he is compelling me, alas! Open your senses! Day is fading away, now evening is coming to all things, even to the best things; listen now, and see, you Higher Men, what devil, whether man or woman, this spirit of evening melancholy is!

 Thus spoke the old sorcerer, looked cunningly around and then seized his harp. 3
 When the air grows clear, When the dew's comfort Rains down upon the earth, Invisible and unheard - For dew the comforter Wears tender shoes like all that gently comforts: Do you then remember, do you, hot heart, How once you thirsted For heavenly tears and dew showers, Thirsted, scorched and weary, While on yellow grassy paths Wicked evening sunlight-glances Ran about you through dark trees, Blinding, glowing sunlight-glances, malicious? 'The wooer of truth? You?' – so they jeered - 'No! Only a poet! An animal, cunning, preying, creeping, That has to lie, That knowingly, wilfully has to lie: Lusting for prey, Motley-masked, A mask to itself, A prey to itself - That – the wooer of truth? No!
 Only a fool! Only a poet! Only speaking motley, Crying out of fools-masks, Stalking around on deceitful word-bridges, On motley rainbows, Between a false heaven And a false earth, Soaring, hovering about - Only a fool! Only a poet!
 That – the wooer of truth? Not still, stiff, smooth, cold, Become an image, Become a god's statue, Not set up before temples, A god's watchman: No! enemy to such statues of truth, More at home in any wilderness than before temples, Full of cat's wantonness, Leaping through every window, Swiftly! into every chance, Sniffing out every jungle, Sniffing with greedy longing, That you may run, Sinfully-healthy and motley and fair, In jungles among motley-speckled beasts of prey, Run with lustful lips, Happily jeering, happily hellish, happily blood-thirsty, Preying, creeping, lying: Or like the eagle staring Long, long into abysses, Into its abysses: Oh how they circle down, Under and in, Into ever deeper depths! Then, Suddenly, with straight aim, Quivering flight, They pounce on lambs, Headlong down, ravenous, Lusting for lambs, Angry at all lamb-souls, Fiercely angry at all that look. Sheepish, lamb-eyed, curly-wooled, Grey with lamb-sheep kindness! Thus, Eagle like, panther like, Are the poet's desires, Are your desires under a thousand masks, You fool! You poet! You saw man As God and sheep: To rend the God in man As the sheep in man, And in rending to laugh
 - That, that is your blessedness! A panther's and eagle's blessedness! A poet's and fool's blessedness!' When the air grows clear, When the moon's sickle Creeps along, green, Envious, in the purple twilight: Enemy to day, With every step secretly Sickling down The hanging rose-gardens, Until they sink, Sink down, pale, down to night: So sank I once From my delusion of truth, From my daytime longings, Weary of day, sick with light, Sank downwards, down to evening, down to shadows: Scorched and thirsty With one truth: Do you remember, do you, hot heart, How you thirsted then? That I am banished From all truth, Only a fool! Only a poet! Of Science T HUS sang the sorcerer; and all who were present went like birds unawares into the net of his cunning and melancholy voluptuousness. Only the conscientious man of the spirit was not captured: he quickly snatched the harp away from the sorcerer and cried: 'Air! Let in good air! Let Zarathustra in! You are making this cave sultry and poisonous, you evil old sorcerer! 'You seduce to unknown desires and wildernesses, you false, subtle man. And alas, when such as you chatter and make ado about truth! 'Woe to all free spirits who are not on their guard against such sorcerers! Their freedom is done with: you teach and lure back into prisons, 'you old melancholy devil, a luring bird-call sounds from your lamenting, you are like those who with their praise of chastity secretly invite to voluptuousness!' Thus spoke the conscientious man of the spirit; the old sorcerer, however, looked around him, enjoyed his victory, and on that account swallowed the displeasure the conscientious man had caused him. 'Be quiet!' he said in a modest voice, 'good songs want to echo well; one should be long silent after good songs. 'That is what all of them are doing, these Higher Men. But you, perhaps, have understood little of my song? There is little of the spirit of sorcery in you.' 'You praise me', replied the conscientious man, 'when you separate me from yourself. Very well! But you others, what do I see? You are all sitting there with lustful eyes: 'You free souls, where has your freedom fled! You almost seem like men who have been gazing long at wicked girls dancing naked: your very souls are dancing! 'There must be more of that which the sorcerer called his evil spirit of sorcery and deceit in you, you Higher Men -we must surely be different. 'And truly, we talked and thought together enough, before Zarathustra came home to his cave, for me to know: we are different. 'We seek different things – even up here, you and I. For I seek more security , that is why I came to Zarathustra. For he is still the surest tower and will ' – today, when everything is tottering, when all the earth quakes. But you, when I see what eyes you make, almost seem to me to be seeking more insecurity, 'more horror, more danger, more earthquaking. You have a desire, I almost think, forgive me my presumption, you Higher Men, 'you have a desire for the worst, most dangerous kind of life that terrifies me the most, for the life of wild animals, for the forests, caves, steep mountains, and labyrinths. 'And it is not those who lead out of danger that please you best, but those who lead you astray from all paths, the misleaders. But if you actually harbour such desires, they seem to me, nevertheless, to be impossible. 'For fear – that is man's original and fundamental sensation; everything is explained by fear, original sin and original virtue. From fear grew also my virtue, which is called:

science. 'For fear of wild animals – that has been fostered in man the longest, including the animal he hides and fears within himself- Zarathustra calls it "the beast within". 'This protracted, ancient fear at length grown subtle, spiritual, intellectual – today, it seems to me, it is called: science .' Thus spoke the conscientious man; but Zarathustra, who had just come back to his cave and had heard and understood the last discourse, threw the conscientious man a handful of roses and laughed at his 'truths'. 'What,' he cried, 'what did I just hear? Truly, I think you are a fool, or I myself am one: and I shall straightway stand your "truth" on its head. 'For fear – is the exception with us. Courage, however, and adventure and joy in the unknown, the unattempted – courage seems to me the whole pre-history of man. 'He has envied the wildest, most courageous animals all their virtues and robbed them of them: only thus did he become – man. 'This courage, at length grown subtle, spiritual, intellectual, this human courage with eagle's wings and serpent's wisdom: this , it seems to me, is today called – ' 'Zarathustra !' all those sitting together cried as if from a single mouth and burst into a great peal of laughter; and it was as if a heavy cloud had risen from off them. Even the sorcerer laughed and said prudently: 'Well! My evil spirit has departed! 'And did I myself not warn you against him, when I said he was a deceiver, a spirit of deceit and lies? 'And especially when he shows himself naked. But how can I prevent his pranks I Did I create him and the world? 'Very well! Let us be good again and of good cheer I And although Zarathustra looks ill-temperedly – just see him! he is angry with me: 'before night comes he will again learn to love and praise me, he cannot live long without committing such follies. 'He – loves his enemies: he understands this art better than anyone I have seen. But he takes revenge for that – on his friends!' Thus spoke the old sorcerer, and the Higher Men applauded him: so that Zarathustra went round and mischievously and lovingly shook hands with his friends, like one who has to make amends and apologize to everyone for something. As he came to the door of his cave, however, he already felt again a desire for the good air outside and for his animals, and he was about to slip out. Among the Daughters of the Desert 1 Do not go! (said then the wanderer who called himself Zarathustra's shadow) stay with us, otherwise the old, dull affliction may again assail us. That old sorcerer has already done his worst for our benefit, and just look, the good, pious pope there has tears in his eyes and has again embarked on the sea of melancholy. These kings there may still put on a brave face before us: for they have learned that better than any of us today! But had they no witnesses, I wager that with them, too, the bitter business would begin again – the bitter business of drifting clouds, of damp melancholy, of veiled skies, of stolen suns, of howling autumn winds, the bitter business of our howling and cries of distress: stay with us, O Zarathustra! Here there is much hidden misery that wants to speak out, much evening, much cloud, much damp air! You have fed us with strong man's fare and nourishing sayings: do not let us, for dessert, be assailed again by delicate, effeminate spirits! You alone make the air around you robust and clear I Have I ever found on earth such good air as with you in your cave? I have seen many lands, my nose has learned to test and appraise many kinds of air: but with you my nostrils taste their greatest delight! Except, except – oh forgive an old memory! Forgive me an old after-dinner song that I once composed among the daughters of the desert - for with them there was the same good, clear, oriental air; there I was farthest away from cloudy, damp, melancholy Old Europe! In those days I loved such oriental girls and other blue kingdoms of heaven, over which no clouds and no thoughts hung. You would not believe how prettily they sat there when they were not dancing, deep but without thoughts, like little secrets, like ribboned riddles, like after-dinner nuts - motley and strange indeed! but without clouds: riddles that one can read: to please such girls I then devised an after-dinner psalm. Thus spoke the wanderer and shadow; and before anyone could answer him he had seized the old sorcerer's harp, crossed his legs, and looked calmly and sagely about him -with his nostrils, however, he drew in the air slowly and inquiringly, like someone tasting strange air in strange lands. Thereupon he began to sing with a kind of roaring. 2 Deserts grew: woe to him who harbours deserts Ha! Solemnly! Solemnly indeed! A worthy beginning! Solemnly in an African way! Worthy of a lion Or of a moral screech-ape – but it is nothing for you, You desert maidens, At whose feet I, For the first time, A European under palm-trees, Am permitted to sit. Selah. Wonderful, truly! Here I now sit, Beside the desert, and Yet so far from the desert, And in no way devastated: For I am swallowed down By this smallest oasis: – it simply opened, yawning, Its sweetest mouth, The sweetest-smelling of all little mouths: Then I fell in, Down, straight through – among you, You dearest maidens! Selah. All hail to that whale If it made things so pleasant For its guests! – you understand My learned allusion? All hail to his belly If it was As sweet an oasis-belly As this is: which, however, I call in question, – since I come from Europe, Which is more sceptical than Any little old wife. May God improve it! Amen! Here I now sit In this smallest oasis Like a date, Brown, sweet, oozing golden, Longing for a girl's rounded mouth, But longing more for girlish, Ice-cold, snow-white, cutting Teeth: for these do The hearts of all hot dates lust. Selah. Like, all too like That aforesaid southern fruit Do I lie here, by little Flying insects Sniffed and played around, And by even smaller, More foolish and more sinful Wishes and notions, Besieged by you, You silent girl-kittens Full of misgivings, Dudu and Suleika, Sphinxed round , that I may cram Much feeling into two words: (May God forgive me This sin of speech!) I sit here sniffing the finest air, Air of Paradise, truly, Bright, buoyant air, gold-streaked, As good air as ever Fell from the moon - Came it by chance, Or did it happen by wantonness, As the old poets tell? I, doubter, however, call it In question; since I come From Europe, Which is more sceptical than any Little old wife. May God improve it I Amen. Drinking in the fairest air, With nostrils swollen like goblets, Without future, without memories, Thus do I sit here, you Dearest maidens, And regard the palm-tree, And watch how, like a dancer, It bends and bows and sways at the hips, – if one watches long one follows suit! Like a dancer who, it would seem, Has stood long, dangerously long, Always on one little leg? – so that she has forgotten, it would seem, Her other leg? At least, in vain I sought the missing Twin-jewel – that is, the other leg – In the sacred vicinity Of her dearest, daintiest Little fluttering, flickering, fan-swirling skirt. Yes, if you would quite believe me, You sweet maidens: She has lost it! It has gone! Gone for ever! That other leg! Oh, what a shame about that other dear leg! Where can it now be, sorrowing forsaken? That lonely leg? Perhaps in fear before an Angry, blonde-maned Lion-monster? Or perhaps even Gnawed off, broken in pieces - Pitiable, alas! alas! broken in pieces! Selah. Oh do not weep, Gentle hearts! Do not weep, you Date-hearts! Milk-bosoms! You heart-caskets Of sweetwood! Do not weep, Pale Dudu! Be a man, Suleika! Courage! Courage! – Or would perhaps Something bracing, heart-bracing, Be in place here? An anointed proverb? A solemn exhortation? Ha! Up, dignity! Virtuous dignity! European dignity! Blow, blow again, Bellows of virtue! Ha! Roar once again, Roar morally! Roar like a moral lion Before the daughters of the desert! For virtuous howling, You dearest maidens, Is loved best of all by European ardour, European appetite! And here I stand now, As European, I cannot do otherwise, so help me God! 52 Amen! Deserts grow: woe to him who harbours deserts! The Awakening 1 A FTER the song of the wanderer and shadow, the cave suddenly became full of noise and laughter: and as the assembled guests were all speaking together and even the ass no longer remained silent in the face of such encouragement, Zarathustra was overcome by a little repugnance and scorn towards his visitors: although, at the same time, he rejoiced at their gaiety. For it seemed to him to be a sign of recovery. So he stole out into the open air and spoke with his animals. ‘Where is their distress now?’ he said, and already he was breathing again after his little disgust, ‘it seems that in my home they have unlearned distressful crying! ‘although, unhappily, not yet crying itself.’ And Zarathustra stopped his ears, for just then the ‘Ye-a’ of the ass mingled strangely with the loud rejoicing of these Higher Men. ‘They are merry,’ he began again,’ and, who knows, perhaps at the expense of their host. And if they have learned laughing from me, still it is not my laughter they have learned. ‘But what of it! They are old men: they recover in their own way, they laugh in their own way; my ears have suffered worse things and not been annoyed. ‘This day is a victory: it wavers already, it flees, the Spirit of Gravity , my old arch-enemy I How well this day is ending, that began so ill and so gravely! ‘And it is ending. Evening has already come: it is riding over the sea to us; that excellent horseman! How it sways, joyfully returning, in its purple saddle! ‘The sky gazes, clear, upon it, the world lies deep: O all you strange men who have come to me, it is already worth while to live with me! Thus spoke Zarathustra. And then the shouting and laughter of the Higher Men again came from the cave: it had started again. 'They are biting, my bait is effective, before them too their enemy, the Spirit of Gravity, is wavering. Already they are learning to laugh at themselves: do I hear aright? 'My man's fare, my succulent and strengthening discourse, is effective: and truly, I did not feed them with distending vegetables! But with warriors' food, with conquerors' food: I awakened new desires. 'There are new hopes in their arms and legs, their hearts are stretching themselves. They are discovering new words, soon their spirits will breathe wantonness. 'To be sure, such food may not be for children, or for fond little women, old or young. Their stomachs are persuaded otherwise; I am not their teacher and physician. 'These Higher Men's disgust is wavering: very well! that is my victory. They are growing assured in my kingdom, all stupid shame is leaving them, they are unburdening themselves. 'They are unburdening their hearts, good hours are coming back to them, they take their ease and ruminate – they grow thankful. 'This I take for the best sign: they grow thankful. Before long they will be devising festivals and erecting memorials to their old joys. 'They are convalescents !' Thus spoke Zarathustra gaily to his heart and gazed out; his animals, however, pressed around him and respected his happiness and his silence. 2 But suddenly Zarathustra's ear was startled: for the cave, which had been full of noise and laughter, all at once became deathly still; his nose, however, smelt a sweet-smelling vapour and incense, as if of burning pine-cones. 'What is happening? What are they doing?' he asked himself, and stole to the entrance, so that he might behold his guests unobserved. But, wonder upon wonders! what did he then see with his own eyes! 'They have all become pious again, they are praying, they are mad!' he said, and was astounded beyond measure. And indeed, all these Higher Men, the two kings, the retired pope, the evil sorcerer, the voluntary beggar, the wanderer and shadow, the old prophet, the conscientious man of the spirit, and the ugliest man: they were all kneeling like children and credulous old women, and worshipping the ass. And at that very moment the ugliest man began to gurgle and snort, as if something unutterable was trying to get out of him; but when he actually reached the point of speech, behold, it was a strange, pious litany in praise of the worshipped and perfumed ass. The litany went thus: Amen! And praise and honour and wisdom and thanks and glory and strength be to our God for ever and ever! The ass, however, brayed 'Ye-a'. He bears our burden, he has taken upon himself the likeness of a slave, he is patient from the heart and he never says Nay; and he who loves his God, chastises him. The ass, however, brayed 'Ye-a'. He does not speak, except always to say Yea to the world he created: thus he praises his world. It is his subtlety that does not speak: thus he is seldom thought wrong. The ass, however, brayed 'Ye-a'. He goes through the world unpretentiously. Grey is the favourite colour 53 in which he wraps his virtue. If he has spirit, he conceals it; but everyone believes in his long ears. The ass, however, brayed 'Ye-a'. What hidden wisdom it is, that he wears long ears and says only Yea and never Nay! Has he not created the world after his own image, that is, as stupid as possible? The ass, however, brayed 'Ye-a'. You go straight and crooked ways; you care little what we men think straight or crooked. Your kingdom is beyond good and evil. It is your innocence not to know what innocence is. The ass, however, brayed 'Ye-a'. For behold, how you spurn no one, not beggars nor kings. You suffer little children to come to you, and when bad boys bait you, you simply say Yea. The ass, however, brayed 'Ye-a'. You love she-asses and fresh figs, you eat anything. A thistle titillates your heart, if you happen to be hungry. The wisdom of a god is in that. The ass, however, brayed 'Ye-a'. The Ass Festival 1 A T this point in the litany, however, Zarathustra could no longer master himself; he cried out 'Ye-a' louder even than the ass, and sprang into the midst of his guests gone mad. 'But what are you doing, my friends?' he cried, pulling the worshippers up from the ground. 'Woe to you if anyone else but Zarathustra had seen you. 'Everyone would adjudge you, with your new faith, to be the worst blasphemers or the most foolish of old women! 'And you, old pope, how can you reconcile yourself to worshipping an ass as God in this way?' 'O Zarathustra,' answered the pope, 'forgive me, but in divine matters I am even more enlightened than you. That stands to reason. 'Better to worship God in this shape than in no shape at all! Consider this saying, my exalted friend: you will quickly see that there is wisdom in such a saying. 'He who said "God is a spirit" took the biggest step and leap towards unbelief yet taken on earth: such a saying is not easily corrected! 'My old heart leaps and bounds to know that there is something left on earth to worship. Forgive a pious old pope's heart that, O Zarathustra!' 'And you,' said Zarathustra to the wanderer and shadow, 'you call and think yourself a free spirit? And do you carry on here such priestly idolatries? 'Truly, you behave here even worse than you did with your wicken brown maidens, you evil new believer!' 'It is bad enough,' answered the wanderer and shadow, 'you are right: but what can I do! The old God lives again, O Zarathustra, you may say what you will. 'It is all the fault of the ugliest man: he has awakened him again. And if he says that he once killed him: with gods, death is always only a prejudice.' 'And you,' said Zarathustra, 'you evil old sorcerer, what were you doing? Who in this free age shall believe in you henceforth, if you believe in such godly asinities? 'What you did was a stupidity; how could you, prudent man, do anything so stupid!' 'O Zarathustra,' answered the prudent sorcerer, 'you are right, it was a stupidity, and it was hard enough to do it.' 'And even you,' said Zarathustra to the conscientious man of the spirit, 'just consider, and lay your finger on your nose! For is there nothing here against your conscience? Is your spirit not too pure for this praying and the exhalations of these devotees?’ ‘There is something in it,’ answered the conscientious man and laid his finger on his nose, ‘there is something in this spectacle which even does my conscience good. ‘I may not believe in God, perhaps: but it is certain that God seems to me most worthy belief in this form. ‘God is supposed to be eternal according to the testimony of the most pious: he who has so much time takes his time. As slow and as stupid as possible: but such a one can in that way go very far, none the less. ‘And he who has too much spirit might well become infatuated with stupidity and folly. Consider yourself, O Zarathustra! ‘You yourself – truly I even you could become an ass through abundance and wisdom. ‘Does a consummate philosopher not like to walk on the most crooked paths? Appearance teaches it, O Zarathustra – your appearance!’ ‘And you yourself, finally,’ said Zarathustra and turned towards the ugliest man, who was still lying on the ground raising his arm up to the ass (for he was giving it wine to drink). ‘Speak, you unutterable creature, what have you been doing? ‘You seem changed, your eyes are glowing, the mantle of the sublime covers your ugliness: what did you do? ‘Is it true what they say, that you have awakened him again? And why? Was he not with reason killed and done away with? ‘You yourself seem awakened: what did you do? Why did you reform? Why were you converted? Speak, you unutterable creature!’ ‘O Zarathustra,’ answered the ugliest man, ‘you are a rogue. ‘Whether he still lives or lives again or is truly dead, which of us two knows that best? I ask you. ‘But one thing I know -1 once learned it from you yourself, O Zarathustra: He who wants to kill most thoroughly – laughs. “One kills, not by anger but by laughter” – that is what you once said. O Zarathustra, you obscure man, you destroyer without anger, you dangerous saint, you are a rogue!’ 2 Then, however, Zarathustra, amazed at such purely roguish answers, leaped back to the door of his cave and, turning towards all his guests, cried in a loud voice: ‘O all you clowns, you buffoons! Why do you pretend and dissemble before me! ‘How the heart of each of you writhed with joy and mischievousness, because you had at last again become as little children, that is, pious, ‘because you at last again behaved as children do, that is, prayed, clasped your hands and said “Dear God”! ‘But now leave this nursery, my own cave, where today every kind of childishness is at home. Come out here and cool your hot childish wantonness and the clamour of your hearts! ‘To be sure: except you become as little children you shall not enter into this kingdom of heaven.’ (And Zarathustra pointed upwards with his hands.) ‘But we certainly do not want to enter into the kingdom of heaven: we have become men, so we want the kingdom of earth ’ 3 And Zarathustra began to speak once more. ‘O my new friends,’ he said, ‘you strange men, you Higher Men, how well you please me now, ‘since you have become joyful again I Truly, you have all blossomed forth: for such flowers as you, I think, new festivals are needed. ‘a little brave nonsense, some divine service and ass festival, some joyful old Zarathustra-fool, a blustering wind to blow your souls bright. 'Do not forget this night and this ass festival, you Higher Men! You devised that at my home, I take that as a good omen – only convalescents devise such things! 'And if you celebrate it again, this ass festival, do it for love of yourselves, do it also for love of me! And in remembrance of me !' Thus spoke Zarathustra. The Intoxicated Song 1 M EANWHILE, however, one after another had gone out into the open air and the cool, thoughtful night; but Zarathustra himself led the ugliest man by the hand, to show him his nocturnal world and the big, round moon and the silver waterfalls beside his cave. There at last they stood silently together, just a group of old folk, but with comforted, brave hearts and amazed in themselves that it was so well with them on earth; but the mystery of the night drew nearer and nearer their hearts. And Zarathustra thought to himself again: 'Oh, how well they please me now, these Higher Men!' – but he did not say it, for he respected their happiness and their silence. Then, however, occurred the most astonishing thing in that long, astonishing day: the ugliest man began once more and for the last time to gurgle and snort, and when he at last came to the point of speech, behold, a question leaped round and pure from his mouth, a good, deep, clear question, which moved the hearts of all who heard it. 'My assembled friends,' said the ugliest man, 'what do you think? For the sake of this day – I am content for the first time to have lived my whole life. 'And it is not enough that I testify only this much. It is worth while to live on earth: one day, one festival with Zarathustra has taught me to love the earth. "Was that – life?" I will say to death. "Very well! Once more!"' 'My friends, what do you think? Will you not, like me, say to death: "Was that – life? For Zarathustra's sake, very well! Once more!"' Thus spoke the ugliest man; and it was not long before midnight. And what would you think then took place? As soon as the Higher Men had heard his question, they were all at once conscious of their transformation and recovery, and of who had given them these things: then they leaped towards Zarathustra, thanking, adoring, caressing, kissing his hands, each after his own fashion: so that some laughed, some wept. The old prophet, however, danced with pleasure; and even if he was then full of sweet wine, as some narrators believe, he was certainly fuller still of sweet life and had renounced all weariness. There are even those who tell that the ass danced at that time: for not in vain had the ugliest man given it wine to drink. This may be the case, or it may be otherwise; and if in truth the ass did not dance that evening, greater and stranger marvels than the dancing of an ass occurred. In brief, as Zarathustra's saying has it: 'What does it matter!' 2 Zarathustra, however, when this incident with the ugliest man occurred, stood there like one intoxicated: his eyes grew dim, his tongue stammered, his feet tottered. And who could divine what thoughts then passed over Zarathustra's soul? But it seemed that his soul fell back and fled before him and was in remote distances and as if 'upon a high ridge', as it is written, 'wandering like a heavy cloud between past and future.' But gradually, while the Higher Men were holding him in their arms, he came to himself a little and his hands restrained the adoring and anxious throng; yet he did not speak. All at once, however, he swiftly turned his head, for he seemed to hear something: then he laid a finger to his lips and said: 'Come! ' And at once it grew still and mysterious all around; from the depths, however, there slowly arose the sound of a bell. Zarathustra listened to it, as the Higher Men did; then he laid a finger to his lips a second time and said again: 'Come! Come! Midnight is coming on !' and his voice had altered. But still he did not move from his place: then it grew yet more still and mysterious, and everything listened, even the ass and Zarathustra's animals of honour, the eagle and the serpent, likewise Zarathustra's cave and the great, cool moon and the night itself. Zarathustra, however, laid his hand to his lips for the third time and said: Come! Come! Come! Let us walk now! The hour has come: let us walk into the night 3 You Higher Men, midnight is coming on: so I will say something in your ears, as that old bell says it in my ear, as secretly, as fearfully, as warmly as that midnight-bell tells it to me, which has experienced more than one man: which has already counted your fathers' painful heartbeats -ah! ah! how it sighs! how in dreams it laughs! the ancient, deep, deep midnight! Soft! Soft! Then many a thing can be heard which may not speak by day; but now, in the cool air, when all the clamour of your hearts, too, has grown still, now it speaks, now it is heard, now it creeps into nocturnal, over-wakeful souls: ah! ah! how it sighs! how in dreams it laughs! do you not hear, how secretly, fearfully, warmly it speaks to you, the ancient, deep, deep midnight? O Man! Attend! 4 Woe is me! Where has time fled? Did I not sink into deep wells? The world is asleep Ah! Ah! The dog howls, the moon is shining. I will rather die, die, than tell you what my midnight-heart is now thinking. Now I am dead. It is finished. Spider, why do you spin your web around me? Do you want blood? Ah! Ah! The dew is falling, the hour has come – the hour which chills and freezes me, which asks and asks and asks: 'Who has heart enough for it? ' – who shall be master of the world? Who will say: Thus shall you run, you great and small streams!' – the hour approaches: O man, you Higher Man, attend! this discourse is for delicate ears, for your ears – what does deep midnight's voice contend? 5 I am borne away, my soul dances. The day's task! The day's task! Who shall be master of the world? The moon is cool, the wind falls silent. Ah I Ah! Have you flown high enough? You dance: but a leg is not a wing. You good dancers, now all joy is over: wine has become dregs, every cup has grown brittle, the graves mutter. You have not flown high enough: now the graves mutter: 'Redeem the dead! Why is it night so long? Does the moon not intoxicate us?' You Higher Men, redeem the graves, awaken the corpses! Alas, why does the worm still burrow? The hour approaches, it approaches, the bell booms, the heart still drones, the woodworm, the heart's worm, still burrows.

Alas! The world is deep! 6 Sweet lyre! Sweet lyre! Your sound, your intoxicated, ominous sound, delights me! – from how long ago, from how far away does your sound come to me, from a far distance, from the pools of love! You ancient bell, you sweet lyre! Every pain has torn at your heart, the pain of a father, the pain of our fathers, the pain of our forefathers; your speech has grown ripe, ripe like golden autumn and afternoon, like my hermit's heart – now you say: The world itself has grown ripe, the grapes grow brown, now they want to die, to die of happiness. You Higher Men, do you not smell it? An odour is secretly welling up, a scent and odour of eternity, an odour of roseate bliss, a brown, golden wine odour of ancient happiness, of intoxicated midnight's dying happiness, which sings: The world is deep: deeper than day can comprehend 7 Let me be! Let me be! I am too pure for you. Do not touch me! Has my world not just become perfect? My skin is too pure for your hands. Let me be, stupid, doltish, stifling day! Is midnight not brighter? The purest shall be master of the world; the least known, the strongest, the midnight souls, who are brighter and deeper than any day. O day, do you grope for me? Do you feel for my happiness? Do you think me rich, solitary, a pit of treasure, a chamber of gold? O world, do you desire me? Do you think me worldly? Do you think me spiritual? Do you think me divine? But day and world, you are too clumsy, have cleverer hands, reach out for deeper happiness, for deeper unhappiness, reach out for some god, do not reach out for me: my unhappiness, my happiness is deep, you strange day, but yet I am no god, no divine Hell: deep is its woe, 8 God's woe is deeper, you strange world I Reach out for God's woe, not for me! What am I? An intoxicated, sweet lyre – a midnight lyre, a croaking bell which no one understands but which has to speak before deaf people, you Higher Men! For you do not understand me! Gone! Gone! Oh youth! Oh noontide! Oh afternoon! Now come evening and midnight; the dog howls, the wind: is the wind not a dog? It whines, it yelps, it howls. Ah! Ah! how it sighs! how it laughs, how it rasps and gasps, the midnight hour! How it now speaks soberly, this intoxicated poet! perhaps it has overdrunk its drunkenness? perhaps it has grown over-wakeful? perhaps it ruminates? it ruminates upon its woe in dreams, the ancient, deep midnight hour, and still more upon its joy. For joy, though woe be deep: Joy is deeper than heart's agony 9 You grape-vine! Why do you praise me? For I cut you! I am cruel, you bleed: what means your praise of my intoxicated cruelty? 'What has become perfect, everything ripe – wants to die!' thus you speak. Blessed, blessed be the vine-knife! But everything unripe wants to live: alas! Woe says: 'Fade! Be gone, woe!' But everything that suffers wants to live, that it may grow ripe and merry and passionate, passionate for remoter, higher, brighter things. 'I want heirs,' thus speaks everything that suffers, 'I want children, I do not want myself.' Joy, however, does not want heirs or children, joy wants itself, wants eternity, wants recurrence, wants everything eternally the same. Woe says: 'Break, bleed, heart!

Walk, legs! Wings, fly! Upward! Upward, pain!' Very well! Come on! my old heart: Woe says: Fade! Go! 10 What do you think, you Higher Men? Am I a prophet? A dreamer? A drunkard? An interpreter of dreams? A midnight bell? A drop of dew? An odour and scent of eternity? Do you not hear it? Do you not smell it? My world has just become perfect, midnight is also noonday, pain is also joy, a curse is also a blessing, the night is also a sun – be gone, or you will learn: a wise man is also a fool. Did you ever say Yes to one joy? O my friends, then you said Yes to all woe as well. All things are chained and entwined together, all things are in love; if ever you wanted one moment twice, if ever you said: 'You please me, happiness, instant, moment!' then you wanted everything to return I you wanted everything anew, everything eternal, everything chained, entwined together, everything in love, O that is how you loved the world, you everlasting men, loved it eternally and for all time: and you say even to woe: 'Go, but return!' For all joy wants -eternity! 11 All joy wants the eternity of all things, wants honey, wants dregs, wants intoxicated midnight, wants graves, wants the consolation of graveside tears, wants gilded sunsets, what does joy not want! it is thirstier, warmer, hungrier, more fearful, more secret than all woe, it wants itself; it bites into itself, the will of the ring wrestles within it, it wants love, it wants hatred, it is superabundant, it gives, throws away, begs for someone to take it, thanks him who takes, it would like to be hated; so rich is joy that it thirsts for woe, for Hell, for hatred, for shame, for the lame, for the world – for it knows, oh it knows this world! You Higher Men, joy longs for you, joy the intractable, blissful – for your woe, you ill-constituted! All eternal joy longs for the ill-constituted. For all joy wants itself, therefore it also wants heart's agony I O happiness! O pain! Oh break, heart! You Higher Men, learn this, learn that joy wants eternity, joy wants the eternity of all things, wants deep, deep, deep eternity! 12 Have you now learned my song? Have you divined what it means? Very well! Come on! You Higher Men, now sing my roundelay! Now sing yourselves the song whose name is 'Once more', whose meaning is 'To all eternity!' – sing, you Higher Men, Zarathustra's roundelay! O Man! Attend! What does deep midnight's voice contend? 'I slept my sleep, 'And now awake at dreaming's end: 'The world is deep, 'Deeper than day can comprehend. 'Deep is its woe, 'Joy – deeper than heart's agony: 'Woe says: Fade! Go! 'Bat all joy wants eternity, 'Wants deep, deep, deep eternity!' The Sign O N the morning after this night, however, Zarathustra sprang up from his bed, girded his loins, and emerged from his cave, glowing and strong, like a morning sun emerging from behind dark mountains. 'Great star,' he said, as he had said once before, 'you profound eye of happiness, what would all your happiness be if you did not have those for whom you shine! 'And if they remained in their rooms while you were already awake and had come, giving and distributing: how angry your proud modesty would be! 'Very well! they are still asleep, these Higher Men, while I am awake: they are not my rightful companions! It is not for them I am waiting in my mountains. 'I want to go to my work, to my day: but they do not understand what are the signs of my morning, my step -is no awakening call for them. 'They are still sleeping in my cave, their dream still drinks at my intoxicated songs. Yet the ear that listens to me , the obeying ear, is missing from them.' Zarathustra had said this to his heart when the sun rose: then he looked inquiringly aloft, for he heard above him the sharp cry of his eagle. 'Very well!' he cried up, 'so do I like it, so do I deserve it. My animals are awake, for I am awake. 'My eagle is awake and, like me, does honour to the sun. With eagle's claws it reaches out for the new light. You are my rightful animals: I love you. 'But I still lack my rightful men!' Thus spoke Zarathustra; then, however, he suddenly heard that he was surrounded by countless birds, swarming and fluttering – the whirring of so many wings and the throng about his head, however, were so great that he shut his eyes. And truly, it was as if a cloud had fallen upon him, a cloud of arrows discharged over a new enemy. And behold, in this case it was a cloud of love, and over a new friend. 'What is happening to me?' thought Zarathustra, in his astonished heart, and slowly lowered himself on to the great stone that lay beside the exit of his cave. But, as he was clutching about, above and underneath himself, warding off the tender birds, behold, then something even stranger occurred: for in doing so he clutched unawares a thick, warm mane of hair; at the same time, however, a roar rang out in front of him – the gentle, protracted roar of a lion. 'The sign has come ' said Zarathustra, and his heart was transformed. And in truth, when it grew clear before him, there lay at his feet a fallow, powerful animal that lovingly pressed its head against his knee and would not leave him, behaving like a dog that has found his old master again. The doves, however, were no less eager than the lion with their love; and every time a dove glided across the lion's nose, the lion shook its head and wondered and laughed. While this was happening, Zarathustra said but one thing: 'My children are near, my children ' then he grew quite silent. His heart, however, was loosened, and tears fell from his eyes down upon his hands. And he no longer paid attention to anything, and sat there motionless and no longer warding off the animals. Then the doves flew back and forth and sat upon his shoulder and fondled his white hair and did not weary of tenderness and rejoicing. The mighty lion, however, continually licked the tears that fell down upon Zarathustra's hands, roaring and growling shyly as he did so. Thus did these animals. All this lasted a long time, or a short time: for, properly speaking, there is no time on earth for such things. In the meantime, however, the Higher Men in Zarathustra's cave had awakened and arranged themselves for a procession, that they might go to Zarathustra and offer him their morning greeting: for they had discovered when they awoke that he was no longer among them. But when they reached the door of the cave, and the sound of their steps preceded them, the lion started violently, suddenly turned away from Zarathustra, and leaped up to the cave, roaring fiercely; the Higher Men, however, when they heard its roaring, all cried out as with a single throat and fled back and in an instant had vanished. But Zarathustra himself, bewildered and spell-bound, raised himself from his seat, gazed about him, stood there amazed, questioned his heart, recollected, and saw he was alone. 'What was it I heard?' he slowly said at last, 'what has just happened to me?' And at once his memory returned and he comprehended in a glance all that had happened between yesterday and today. 'This here is the stone,' he said and stroked his beard, 'on this did I sit yesterday morning; and here did the prophet come to me, and here I first heard the cry which I heard even now, the great cry of distress. 'O you Higher Men, it was of your distress that old prophet prophesied to me yesterday morning, 'he tried to seduce and tempt me to your distress: O Zarathustra, he said to me, I have come to seduce you to your ultimate sin. 'To my ultimate sin?' cried Zarathustra and laughed angrily at his own words. 'What has been reserved for me as my ultimate sin?' And once more Zarathustra became absorbed in himself and sat himself again on the great stone and meditated. Suddenly, he leaped up - 'Pity! Pity for the Higher Man !' he cried out, and his countenance was transformed into brass. 'Very well! That - has had its time! 'My suffering and my pity - what of them! For do I aspire after happiness? I aspire after my work! 'Very well! The lion has come, my children are near, Zarathustra has become ripe, my hour has come! 'This is my morning, my day begins: rise up now, rise up, great noontide!' Thus spoke Zarathustra and left his cave, glowing and strong, like a morning sun emerging from behind dark mountains.

NOTES 1. Untergeben has three meanings: to descend or go down; to set (as of the sun); and to be destroyed or to go under. There is much play upon this triple meaning throughout the book. The noun Untergang is treated in a similar way. 2. Übergang und Untergang . The antithesis über (over) and unter (under) is very frequently employed. It is not always possible to bring this out fully in translation. 3. Rede = discourse; Vorrede = prologue. The play on words is lost in translation. 4. Breeber = breaker; Verbrecher normally = criminal. 'Law-breaker' retains the verbal repetition. 5. Hintenveltler is a coinage meaning 'those who believe in an after life'. It gains force from its similarity to the word Hinter-wäldler = backwoodsmen. 6 . The Danish writer Soren Kierkegaard (1813-55), who advocated a return to Christianity by means of a 'leap' from unbelief into belief, is perhaps being criticized here. Much in this chapter reads like a refutation of Kierkegaard. 7 . The phrase derives from the expression Mit dem Kopfe durch die Wand wollen = to run full tilt at everything. 8. Geist means spirit, mind, and intellect - the human understanding. I have generally rendered it as spirit because this seems to me to include intellect and mind while intellect is too narrow in meaning and understanding too cumbrous for the contexts in which Geist occurs. In Thus Spoke Zarathustra, Geist never has any supernatural connotation. Where spirit in the sense of soul (Seele) is intended, I have used the word soul. 9. Denken = to think, bedenklich = suspicious – a neat play upon words lost in translation. 10 . The people referred to are the Persians. The two following are the Jews and the Germans. 11. Nächsten = neighbour and nearest, and throughout this chapter Ferruten (= the most distant), the opposite of nearest, is also made to mean the opposite of neighbour, i.e. the people of the most distant future. Hence the continual antithesis between “neighbour” and ‘most distant’ – an antithesis not quite so clear in translation as in the original. 12 . An untranslatable pun. ‘To give a person a paw’ means to strike him across the hand with a cane. 13 . There is a play upon words here that can hardly be transmitted in translation. ‘Nicht nur fort sollst du dich pflanzen, sondern binauf!’ ‘Fortpflanzen’ means to propagate (biological) and to trans plant (botanical); ‘binpflanzen’ means to plant out (in the sense of planting out cuttings from a single, original plant). The sentence means: You should not only propagate yourself, transplant your self in the future just as you are; you should see to it that your children are something higher and less confined than you. 14 . The reference is to the first line of the final verse of Goethe’s Faust Part Two: All that is transitory is but an image. See also note 19. 15 . In German gerecht (just) and gerächt (revenged) are pronounced identically. 16. Hoch und steil leben means literally to live in a high and steep place, figuratively to live nobly and boldly. 17. Blicke = glances; Augenblicke = moments. But by a quibble ‘Augenblicke’ can be made to mean ‘glances of the eyes’ (Augen — eyes). This word-play is lost in translation. 18 . ‘Doer’ is in German (in this case) Handelnden – giving a play upon the word ‘hand’. 19 .The final ‘Mystic Chorus’ of Goethe’s Faust Part Two is burlesqued in this chapter. Verbal references to it will be clear from the following literal translation: All that is transitory Is but an image; The unattainable Here becomes reality; The indescribable Here it is done! The eternal-womanly Draws up upward! 20. The Wanderer and his Shadow is the title of one of Nietzsche’s books (the Third Part of Human, All Too Human). 21 . The prophet is Arthur Schopenhauer (1788–1860), who also appears in Part Four. 22. Gedanken und Hintergedanken : the antithesis is lost in translation. 23. Bucklichte = hunchback; bucklicht reden = to speak crossly. 24. Grund = ground and reason. The pun is amplified in ‘foreground’ (superficial reasons) and ‘background’ (fundamental reasons). 25 . This scene is a memory from Nietzsche’s childhood. Nietzsche’s father died following a fall, and it seems that Nietzsche was attracted to the scene by the frightened barking of a dog: he found his father lying unconscious. It is not entirely clear why the scene should have been evoked at this point. The most likely suggestion is that Nietzsche at one time thought that events recurred within historical time, and was troubled by the idea that he might meet the same death as his father. (The idea seems to have assumed the nature of an obsession: its origin probably lay in Nietzsche's fear of madness, which was strengthened by the fact that his father died insane. The insanity was caused by the fall, but Nietzsche was probably doubtful whether the fall did not merely bring to the surface an inherited weakness.) This old idea may have come into the author's mind at this point, and have been included in the text as a cryptic 'history' of the theory of the eternal recurrence. What follows is, of course, symbolic and not actual. 26 . For 'accepted his destiny' the author here uses the idiom 'stood upon his destiny', giving point to the words 'with firm feet', which in translation may seem puzzling. 27. Himmel means both 'sky' and 'heaven'. 28. Von Ohngefähr means 'by chance' – but the author treats the noun as a proper name and ennobles it by adding 'von ', the ordinary designation of nobility. 29 . I have left this paragraph as it stands because a properly idiomatic translation would alter the original more than is justified. Es gibt sich , as well as meaning 'it is given', is employed idiomatically to mean 'it will get better', or simply as the verbal equivalent of a shrug of the shoulders. Es nimmt sich – 'it is taken' – has no such idiomatic connotation, and is employed by the author simply as an (untranslatable) antithesis to es gibt sich. 30 . A pun on the two meanings of Geist – spirit and intellect. 31. Dämmerten – a scornful reference to Wagner's Gotter- dämmerung (The Twilight of the Gods). 32 . The Bray of an ass is rendered in German la (pronounced ee-ah), which sounds and looks very much like Ja = yes. I have adopted Thomas Common's translation of this as 'Ye-a' (the best that can be done, I think). Thomas Common always translates Ja as 'yea', in accordance with the notion that Thus Spoke Zarathustra is mock-Biblical throughout. The author employs this humorous device to great effect in Part Four. 33 . The imagery of this section derives from the saying Waster bat keine Balken = Water is not planked over, Praise the sea but keep on dry land. Im Fluss means 'in flux', but also 'in the river' and 'flowing'. Later in the same section, 'Have not all railings and gangways fallen into the water and come to nothing' refers to the expression ins Wasser fallen , which means to melt away, to come to nothing, as well as, literally, to fall into the water. This method of reducing an abstract idea to a concrete image by means of everyday idioms is of the essence of Nietzsche's art – and one reason why the vividness of his style is often dimmed in translation. 34 . A play upon Vorspiel = prologue, and Beispiel = example. 35 . A play upon Unterbalt = maintenance, and Unterhaltung = entertainment. 36 . A play upon Eheschliessen = marriage contract, and Ehebrechen = literally marriage breaking, usually adultery. The literal meaning of Ehebrechen is played upon in the following paragraphs. 37 . A play upon Versprechen = promise, and Versehen = mistake. The words balance one another because sprechen by itself means 'to speak', and sehen means 'to see'. 38 . A play, frequent in Thus Spoke Zarathustra , upon versuchen = to experiment, to attempt, and suchen = to seek. 39 . A malicious reference to the opening of Act

Three of Wagner's Siegfried, in which the Wanderer (Wotan) calls up Erda, the Earth Mother, from her sleep, and after a fifteen-minute colloquy bids her return to sleep, The style of this whole passage imitates that of the Wanderer's summons. 40. Würgerin is the feminine form of 'strangler' or 'throttler'; but the word also means the 'shrike'. It is in the feminine form because die Sünde = sin, is feminine. 41. A play upon Geduld = patience, and dulden = to endure, to suffer in patience. 42. A play upon two meanings of Probe: 'proof or test' and 'exhibition'. 43. Verstuben means both 'to test' and 'to tempt'. 44. Unter vier Augen gesprochen = between ourselves (literally 'spoken beneath four eyes'). The last pope, however, is blind in one eye. 45. A play upon verfolgen = to persecute, and folgea = to follow. 46. A play upon Suchung = seeking, Heim = home, and Helm- suchung = affliction. 47. Reif means both 'ring' and 'ripe'. 48. Tagedieb (lazy bones) means literally 'thief of daytime'. 49. A play upon the similar sound of deutsch = German, and deutlich = clearly. Deutschreden, used idiomatically, means 'to speak clearly' (compare 'in plain English'). 50. Abendmahl, the word employed here and in the title of the chapter, is an old form of Abendessen, that is, 'supper'. But it is also the normal word for 'Holy Communion', which is of course an imitation of Christ's last meal with his followers, called in English 'The Last Supper'. The pun upon 'supper' and 'Holy Communion' is not translatable, except perhaps in the way I have attempted. 51. A play upon Sprünge = leaps, and Seitensprünge = literally 'side leaps', idiomatically 'escapades'. 52. Ich kann nicht anders, Gott helfe atir! — Luther's famous words before the Diet of Worms. 53. Leib-Farbe means literally 'body colour', but idiomatically 'favourite colour'. * I owe this insight to Mr Marvin Rintala, who in his review of my biography of Nietzsche in The Review of Politics, January 1969, said I had failed to understand in what the essence of Lutheran Pietism consisted, which was true, and then went on to expound it. 'The great petition of the Lord's Prayer,' says Mr Rintala, 'is for Pietists: "Thy will be done"'. This is so much in line with the Christian origin of the conceptions of Zarathustra that I ought to have guessed it even if I did not know it.

Table of Contents Cover
About the Author Title Page
Copyright Page
Contents
Chronology
Introduction
1
2
3
4
5 6
7
Further Reading
Thus Spoke Zarathustra

PART ONE ZARATHUSTRA'S PROLOGUE
ZARATHUSTRA'S DISCOURSES
Of the Three Metamorphoses
Of the Chairs of Virtue
Of the Afterworldsmen
Of the Despisers of the Body
Of Joys and Passions
Of the Pale Criminal
Of Reading and Writing
Of the Tree on the Mountainside
Of the Preachers of Death
Of War and Warriors
Of the New Idol
Of the Flies of the Market-place
Of Chastity
Of the Friend
Of the Thousand and One Goals
Of Love of One's Neighbour
Of the Way of the Creator
Of Old and Young Women Of the Adder's Bite
Of Marriage and Children Of Voluntary Death
Of the Bestowing Virtue

PART TWO
The Child with the Mirror
On the Blissful Islands
Of the

Compassionate Of the Priests Of the Virtuous Of the Rabble Of the Tarantulas Of the Famous Philosophers The Night Song The Dance Song The Funeral Song Of Self-Overcoming Of the Sublime Men Of the Land of Culture Of Immaculate Perception Of Scholars Of Poets Of Great Events The Prophet Of Redemption Of Manly Prudence The Stillest Hour PART THREE The Wanderer Of the Vision and the Riddle Of Involuntary Bliss Before Sunrise Of the Virtue that Makes Small On the Mount of Olives Of Passing By Of the Apostates The Home-Coming Of the Three Evil Things Of the Spirit of Gravity Of Old and New Law-Tables The Convalescent Of the Great Longing The Second Dance Song The Seven Seals (or: The Song of Yes and Amen) PART FOUR The Honey Offering
The Cry of Distress Conversation with the Kings The Leech The Sorcerer Retired from Service The Ugliest Man The Voluntary Beggar The Shadow At Noontide The Greeting The Last Supper Of the Higher Man The Song of Melancholy Of Science Among the Daughters of the Desert The Awakening The Ass Festival The Intoxicated Song The Sign

Part VII

Beyond Good and Evil

1886 — Translated by Ian Johnston

=====

==== Prologue

=====

==== Friedrich Nietzsche BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL Translated by Ian Johnston, Vancouver Island University, Nanaimo, British Columbia, Canada

Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text without permission and without charge. They may also freely edit the text for their own purposes. All commercial use of this translation, however, is forbidden without the permission of the translator. For comments and questions, please contact Ian Johnston. For a Rich Text Version (Word) of this text, please use the following link: [Beyond Good and Evil \[RTF\]](#) [Table of Contents for Beyond Good and Evil] PROLOGUE

Suppose truth is a woman, what then? Would we not have good reason to suspect that all philosophers, insofar as they were dogmatists, have had a poor understanding of women, that the dreadful seriousness and the awkward pushiness with which they have so far habitually approached truth were clumsy and inappropriate ways to win over a woman? It's clear that she did not allow herself to be won over. And every form of dogmatism nowadays is standing there looking dismayed and disheartened—if it's still standing at all! For there are mockers who assert that they've collapsed, that all dogmatisms are lying on the floor—even worse, that all dogmatisms are at death's door. Speaking seriously, there are good reasons to hope that every dogmatism in philosophy—no matter how solemnly, conclusively, and decisively it has conducted itself—may have been merely a noble and rudimentary childish game, and the time is perhaps very close at hand when people will understand over and over again just what has sufficed to provide the foundation stones for such lofty and unconditional philosophical constructions of the sort dogmatists have erected up to now—any popular superstition from unimaginably long ago (like the superstition of the soul, which even today, in the form of the superstition about the subject and the ego, has still not stopped stirring up mischief), perhaps some game with words, a seduction by some grammatical construction, or a daring generalization from very narrow, very personal, very human, all-too-human facts. The philosophies of the dogmatists were, one hopes, only a promise lasting for thousands of years, as astrology was in even earlier times. In its service, people perhaps expended more work, money, astute thinking, and patience than for any genuine scientific knowledge up to that point. To it and to its “super-terrestrial” claims in Asia and Egypt we owe the grand style of architecture. It seems that in order for all great things to register their eternal demands on the human heart, they first have to wander over the earth as monstrous and frighteningly distorted faces. Dogmatic philosophy has been such a grimace—for example, the Vedanta doctrine in Asia and Platonism in Europe. We should not be ungrateful to them, even though we must also certainly concede that the worst, most protracted, and most dangerous of all errors up to now has been the error of a dogmatist, namely, Plato’s invention of the purely spiritual and of the good as such. But that now has been overcome, and, as Europe breathes a sigh of relief after this nightmare and at least can enjoy a more healthy sleep, those of us whose very task it is to stay awake are the inheritors of all the forces which the struggle against this error has fostered. To speak of the spirit and the good in this way, as Plato did, was, of course, a matter of standing truth on its head and even of denying the fundamental condition of all life, perspective. Indeed, one could, as a doctor, ask, “How did such a disease get to Plato, the most beautiful plant of antiquity? Did the wicked Socrates really corrupt him? Could Socrates have been a corruptor of youth, after all? Did he deserve his hemlock?” But the struggle against Plato, or, to put the matter in a more intelligible way and for “the people,” the fight against the thousands of years of pressure from the Christian church—since Christianity is Platonism for “the people”—created in Europe a splendid tension in the spirit, unlike anything existing on earth before. With such a tensely arched bow, we can from now on shoot for the most distant targets. Naturally, European man experiences this tension as a state of emergency. Already there have been two attempts in the grand style to ease the tension in the bow—the first time with Jesuitism, the second time with the democratic Enlightenment, through which, with the help of freedom of the press and reading newspapers, a state might, in fact, be attained in which the spirit itself is not so easily experienced as “in need”! (Germans invented gunpowder—all honour to them!—but they made up for that when they invented the printing press). But those of us who are neither Jesuits, nor democrats, nor even German enough, we good Europeans and free, very free spirits—we still have the need, the entire spiritual need, and the total tension of its bow! And perhaps we also have the arrow, the work to do, and—who knows?—the target . . . Sils-Maria, Oberengadin, June 1885.

=====

=== Part 1: On the Prejudices of Philosophers

=====

=== Friedrich Nietzsche BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL Translated by Ian Johnston, Vancouver Island University, Nanaimo, British Columbia, Canada

Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text without permission and without charge. They may also freely edit the text for their own purposes. All commercial use of this translation, however, is forbidden without the permission of the translator. For comments and questions, please contact Ian Johnston. For a Rich Text Version (Word) of this text, please use the following link: [Beyond Good and Evil \[RTF\] \[Table of Contents for Beyond Good and Evil\]](#)

PART ONE ON THE PREJUDICES OF PHILOSOPHERS

1 The will to truth, which is still going to tempt us to many a daring exploit, that celebrated truthfulness of which all philosophers up to now have spoken with respect, what questions this will to truth has already set down before us! What strange, sinister, dubious questions! There is already a long history of that—and yet does it not seem that this history has only just begun? Is it any wonder that at some point we finally become mistrustful, lose patience, and, in our impatience, turn ourselves around—that we learn from this sphinx to ask questions for ourselves? Who is really asking us questions here? What is it in us that really wants “the truth”? In fact, we paused for a long time before the question about the origin of this will—until we finally remained completely and utterly immobile in front of an even more fundamental question. We asked about the value of this will. Suppose we want truth. Why should we not prefer untruth? And uncertainty? Even ignorance? The problem of the value of truth stepped up before us—or were we the ones who stepped up before the problem? Who among us here is Oedipus? Who is the Sphinx?(1) It seems to be a tryst between questions and question marks. And could one believe that we are finally the ones to whom it seems as if the problem has never been posed up to now, as if we were the first ones to see it, to fix our eyes on it, and to dare confront it? For there is a risk involved in this—perhaps there is no greater risk. 2

“How could anything arise out of its opposite? For example, truth out of error? Or the will to truth out of the will to deception? Or selfless action out of self-seeking? Or the pure sunny look of the wise man out of greed? Origins like these are impossible. Anyone who dreams about them is a fool, in fact, something worse. Things of the highest value must have another origin peculiar to them. They cannot be derived from this ephemeral, seductive, deceptive, trivial world, from this confusion of madness and desire! Their basis must lie, by contrast, in the womb of being, in the immortal, in the hidden god, in ‘the thing in itself’—their basis must lie there, and nowhere else!” This way of shaping an argument creates the typical prejudice which enables us to recognize once more the metaphysicians of all ages. This way of establishing value stands behind all their logical procedures. From this “belief” of theirs they wrestle with their “knowledge,” with something that is finally, in all solemnity, christened “the truth.” The fundamental belief of the metaphysicians is the belief in oppositions of values. Even the most careful among them has never had the idea of raising doubts right here on the threshold, where such doubts are surely most essential, even when they promised themselves “de omnibus dubitandum” [one must doubt everything]. For we are entitled to doubt, first, whether such oppositions exist at all and, second, whether those popular ways of estimating worth and those oppositions of values on which the metaphysicians have impressed their seal are not perhaps only evaluations made in the foreground, only temporary perspectives, perhaps even a view from a corner, perhaps from underneath, a frog’s viewpoint, as it were, to borrow an expression familiar to painters. For all the value that the true, genuine, unselfish person may be entitled to, it might be possible that a higher and more fundamental value for everything in life must be ascribed to appearance, the will to deception, self-interest, and desire. It might even be possible that whatever creates the value of those fine and respected things exists in such a way that it is, in some duplicitous manner, related to, tied to, and intertwined with, perhaps even essentially the same as, those nasty, apparently contrasting things. Perhaps! But who is willing to bother with such dangerous Perhapses? For that we must await the arrival of a new style of philosopher, ones who have a different taste and inclination, the reverse of those so far—philosophers of the dangerous Perhaps, in every sense. And speaking in all seriousness, I see such new philosophers arriving on the scene. 3 After examining philosophers between the lines with a sharp eye for a sufficient length of time, I tell myself the following: we must still consider the greatest part of conscious thinking among the instinctual activities, even in the case of philosophical thinking. We must relearn here, in the same way we relearned about heredity and what is “innate.” Just as the act of birth merits little consideration in all the procedures and processes of heredity, so there is little point in setting up “consciousness” in any significant sense as something opposite to what is instinctual—most of the conscious thinking of a philosopher is led on secretly and forced into particular paths by his instincts. Even behind all logic and its apparent dynamic authority stand evaluations of worth or, putting the matter more clearly, physiological demands for the preservation of a particular way of life—for example, that what is certain is more valuable than what is uncertain, that appearance is of less value than the “truth.” Evaluations like these could, for all their regulatory importance for us, still be only foreground evaluations, a particular kind of niaiserie [foolishness] that may be necessary for the preservation of beings precisely like us. That’s assuming, of course, that not just man is the “measure of things” . . . 4 For us, the falsity of a judgment is still no objection to that judgment—that’s where our new way of speaking sounds perhaps most strange. The question is the extent to which it promotes and sustains life, maintains the species, perhaps even creates species. And, as a matter of principle, we are ready to assert that the falsest judgments (to which a priori synthetic judgments belong) are the most indispensable to us, that without our allowing logical fictions to count, without a way of measuring reality against the purely invented world of the unconditional and self-identical, without a constant falsification of the world through numbers, human beings could not live—that if we managed to give up false judgments, that would amount to a renunciation of life, a denial of life.(2) To accept falsehood as a condition of life means, of course, taking a dangerous stand against the customary feelings about value, and, for this reason alone, a philosophy which dares to do so is already standing beyond good and evil. 5 What stimulates one to look at all philosophers in part suspiciously and in part mockingly is not that we find again and again how innocent they are—how often and how easily they make mistakes and get lost, in short, how childish and child-like they are—but that they are not honest enough in what they do, while, as a group, they make a huge, virtuous noise as soon as the problem of truthfulness is touched on, even remotely. Collectively they take up a position as if they had discovered and arrived at their real opinions through the self-development of a cool, pure, god-like, disinterested dialectic (in contrast to the mystics of all ranks, who are more honest than they are and more stupid with their talk of “inspiration”—), while basically they defend with reasons sought out after the fact an assumed principle, an idea, an “inspiration,” for the most part some heartfelt wish which has been abstracted and sifted. They are all advocates who do not want to call themselves that. Indeed, for the most part they are even mischievous pleaders for their own judgments, which they baptize as “truths,” and very remote from the courage of conscience which would admit this, even this, to itself, very remote from the courageous good taste which would concede as much, whether to warn an enemy or a friend, or whether to mock themselves as an expression of their own high spirits. That equally stiff and well-behaved Tartufferie [hypocrisy] of the old Kant with which he entices us onto the clandestine path of dialectic, leading or, more correctly, seducing us to his “categorical imperative”—this dramatic performance makes us discriminating people laugh, for it amuses us in no small way to keep a sharp eye on the sophisticated scheming of the old moralists and preachers of morality.(3) Or that sort of mathematical hocus-pocus with which Spinoza presented his philosophy—in the last analysis “the love of his own wisdom,” to use the correct and proper expression—as if it were armed in metal and masked, in order in this way to intimidate from the start the courage of an assailant who would dare cast an eye on this invincible virgin and Pallas Athena—how much of his own shyness and vulnerability is betrayed by this masquerade of a solitary invalid!(4) 6 Gradually I have come to learn what every great philosophy has been up to now, namely, the self-confession of its originator and a form of unintentional and unnoticed memoir, and also that the moral (or immoral) intentions in every philosophy made up the essential living seed from which, on every occasion, the entire plant has grown. In fact, when we explain how the most remote metaphysical claims of a philosopher really arose, it's good (and shrewd) for us always to ask first: What morality is it (is he—) aiming at? Consequently, I don't believe that a "drive to knowledge" is the father of philosophy but that here, as elsewhere, knowledge (and misjudgment) have functioned only as a tool for another drive. But whoever explores the basic drives of human beings, in order to see in this particular place how far they may have carried their game as inspiring geniuses (or demons and goblins), will find that all drives have already practised philosophy at some time or another—and that every single one of them would all too gladly like to present itself as the ultimate purpose of existence and the legitimate master of all the other drives. For every drive seeks mastery and, as such, tries to practise philosophy. Of course, with scholars, men of real scientific knowledge, things may be different—"better," if you will—where there may really be something like a drive for knowledge, some small independent clock mechanism or other which, when well wound up, bravely goes on working, without all the other drives of the scholar playing any essential role. (5) The genuine "interests" of the scholar thus commonly lie entirely elsewhere, for example, in the family or in earning a living or in politics. Indeed, it is almost a matter of indifference whether his small machine is placed on this or on that point in science and whether the "promising" young worker makes a good philologist or expert in fungus or chemist—whether he becomes this or that does not define who he is. With a philosopher, by contrast, nothing at all is impersonal. And his morality, in particular, bears a decisive and crucial witness to who he is—that is, to the rank ordering in which the innermost drives of his nature are placed relative to each other. 7 How malicious philosophers can be! I know nothing more venomous than the joke which Epicurus permitted himself against Plato and the Platonists: he called them Dionysio-kolakes. The literal meaning of that, what stands in the foreground, is "flatterers of Dionysius," hence accessories of tyrants and lickspittles.(6) But the phrase says still more than that—"they are all actors, with nothing true about them" (for Dionysokolax was a popular description of an actor). And that last part is the real maliciousness which Epicurus hurled against Plato: the magnificent manners which Plato, along with his pupils, understood, the way they stole the limelight—things Epicurus did not understand!—that irritated him, the old schoolmaster from Samos, who sat hidden in his little garden in Athens and wrote three hundred books—who knows?—perhaps out of rage and ambition against Plato?—It took a hundred years until Greece came to realize who this garden god Epicurus was.—Did they realize? 8 In every philosophy there is a point where the "conviction" of the philosopher steps onto the stage, or, to make the point in the language of an old mystery play: The ass arrived Beautiful and most valiant.(7) 9 Do you want to live "according to nature"? O you noble Stoics, what a verbal swindle!(8) Imagine a being like nature—extravagant without limit, indifferent without limit, without purposes and consideration, without pity and justice, simultaneously fruitful, desolate, and unknown—imagine indifference itself as a power—how could you live in accordance with this indifference? Living—isn't that precisely a will to be something different from what this nature is? Isn't living appraising, preferring, being unjust, being limited, wanting to be different? And if your imperative "live according to nature" basically means what amounts to "live according to life"—how could you not do that? Why make a principle out of what you yourselves are and must be? The truth of the matter is quite different: while you pretend to be in raptures as you read the canon of your law out of nature, you want something which is the reverse of this, you weird actors and self-deceivers! Your pride wants to prescribe to and incorporate into nature, this very nature, your morality, your ideal. You demand that nature be "in accordance with the Stoa," and you'd like to make all existence merely living in accordance with your own image—as a huge and eternal glorification and universalizing of Stoicism! With all your love of truth, you force yourselves for such a long time and with such persistence and hypnotic rigidity to look at nature falsely, that is, stoically, until you are no longer capable of seeing nature as anything else—and some abysmal arrogance finally inspires you with the lunatic hope that, because you know how to tyrannize over yourselves—Stoicism is self-tyranny—nature also allows herself to be tyrannized. Is the Stoic then not a part of nature? . . . But this is an ancient, eternal story: what happened then with the Stoics is still happening today, as soon as a philosophy begins to believe in itself. It always creates a world in its own image. It cannot do anything different. Philosophy is this tyrannical drive itself, the most spiritual will to power, to a "creation of the world," to causa prima [first cause]. 10 The enthusiasm and the subtlety—I might even say the cunning—with which people everywhere in Europe today go at the problem "of the real and the apparent world" make one think and listen—and whoever hears only a "will to truth" in the background and nothing else certainly does not enjoy the keenest hearing. In single rare cases such a will to truth, some extravagant and adventurous spirit, a metaphysician's ambition to hold an isolated post, may really be involved, something which in the end continues to prefer a handful of "certainty" to an entire wagon full of beautiful possibilities. There may even be Puritan fanatics of conscience who would still rather lie down and die on a certain nothing than on an uncertain something. But this is nihilism and the indication of a despairing, deathly tired soul, no matter how brave the gestures of such virtue may look. But among stronger thinkers, more full of life, still thirsty for life, it appears to be something different. When they take issue with appearances and already in their arrogance mention the word "perspective," when they determine that the credibility of their own bodies is about as low as they rank the credibility of visual evidence which asserts that

“the earth stands still,” and, as a result, in an apparently good mood, let go of their surest possession (for nowadays what do we think is more secure than our bodies?), who knows whether they don’t, at bottom, want to win back something which people previously possessed with even more certainty, something or other of the old ownership of an earlier faith, perhaps “the immortal soul,” perhaps “the old god,” in short, ideas according to which life could be lived better, that is, more powerfully and more cheerfully than according to “modern ideas”? In this, there is a mistrust of these modern ideas, a lack of faith in everything which has been built up yesterday and today, and perhaps a slight mixture of aversion and scorn, which can no longer tolerate the bric-à-brac of ideas coming from very different places, of the sort so-called positivism brings to market these days, a disgust of the more discriminating taste with the fairground colourful patchiness of all these pseudo-philosophers of reality, in whom there is nothing new or genuine, other than these motley colours. In my view, we should, in these matters, side with today’s sceptical anti-realists and microscopists of knowledge: their instinct, which forces them away from modern reality, is unrefuted—what do we care about their retrogressive secret paths! The fundamental issue with them is not that they want to go “back,” but that they want to go away. With some more power, flight, courage, and artistry they’d want to move beyond—and not back! 11 It strikes me that nowadays people everywhere are trying to direct attention away from the real influence Kant exercised on German philosophy and, in particular, prudently to overlook the value he ascribed to himself. Above everything else, Kant was, first and foremost, proud of his table of categories. With this table in hand, he said, “That is the most difficult thing that ever could be undertaken on behalf of metaphysics.”—But people should understand this “could be”! He was proud of the fact that he had discovered a new faculty in human beings, the ability to make synthetic judgments a priori. Suppose that he deceived himself here. But the development and quick blood of German philosophy depend on this pride and on the competition among all his followers to discover, if possible, something even prouder—at all events “new faculties”! But let’s think this over. It’s time we did. “How are synthetic judgments a priori possible?” Kant asked himself. And what did his answer essentially amount to? Thanks to a faculty [Vermöge eines Vermögens]. Unfortunately, however, he did not answer in four words, but so laboriously, venerably, and with such an expenditure of German profundity and flourishes that people failed to hear the comical niaiserie allemande [German foolishness] inherent in such an answer. People even got really excited about this new faculty, and the rejoicing reached its height when Kant discovered yet another additional faculty—a moral faculty—in human beings, for then the Germans were still moral and not yet all complete “political realists.” Then came the honeymoon of German philosophy. All the young theologians of the Tübingen seminary went off right away into the bushes—all looking for “faculties.” And what didn’t they find—in that innocent, rich, still youthful time of the German spirit, in which Romanticism, that malicious fairy, played her pipes and sang, a time when people did not yet know how to distinguish between “finding” and “inventing”! Above all, a faculty for the “super-sensory.” Schelling christened this intellectual intuition and, in so doing, complied with the most heartfelt yearnings of his Germans, whose cravings were basically pious.(9)—The most unfair thing we can do to this entire rapturously enthusiastic movement, which was adolescent, no matter how much it boldly dressed itself up in gray and senile ideas, is to take it seriously and treat it with something like moral indignation. Enough—people grew older—the dream flew away. There came a time when people rubbed their foreheads. People are still rubbing them today. They had dreamed: first and foremost—the old Kant. “By means of a faculty,” he had said, or at least meant. But is that an answer? An explanation? Or is it not rather merely a repetition of the question? How does opium make people sleep? “By means of a faculty,” namely, the virtus dormitiva [sleeping virtue], answers that doctor in Moliere. Because it has the sleeping virtue whose nature makes the senses sleep.(10) But answers like that belong in comedy, and the time has finally come to replace the Kantian question “How are synthetic judgments a priori possible?” with another question, “Why is the belief in such judgments necessary?”—that is, to understand that for the purposes of preserving beings of our type we must believe that such judgments are true, although, of course, they could still be false judgments! Or to speak more clearly, crudely, and fundamentally: synthetic judgments a priori should not “be possible” at all: we have no right to them. In our mouths they are nothing but false judgments. Only, of course, a belief in their truth is necessary as a foreground belief and appearance which belong in the perspective optics of living. In order finally to recall the immense influence which “German philosophy”—you understand, I hope, its right to quotation marks?—has exercised throughout Europe, there should be no doubt that a certain virtus dormitiva [virtue of making people sleep] was a part of that: people—among them noble loafers, the virtuous, the mystics, the artists, the three-quarter Christians, and political obscurantists of all nations—were delighted to have, thanks to German philosophy, an antidote to the still overpowering sensualism flowing over from the previous century into this one, in short—to have a “sensus assoupire” [way of putting the senses to sleep]. 12 So far as materialistic atomism is concerned, it belongs with the most effectively refuted things we have, and perhaps nowadays in Europe no scholar remains so unscholarly that he still ascribes a serious meaning to it other than for convenient hand-and-household use (that is, as an abbreviated way of expressing oneself)—thanks primarily to that Pole Boscovich, who, together with the Pole Copernicus, has so far been the greatest and most victorious opponent of appearances.

(11) For while Copernicus convinced us to believe, contrary to all our senses, that the earth does not stand still, Boscovich taught us to renounce the belief in the final thing on the earth that “stood firm,” the belief in “stuff,” in “matter,” in what was left of the earth, in atomic particles. It was the greatest triumph over the senses ever achieved on earth so far. But we must go even further and also declare war, a relentless war to the bitter end, against the “atomistic need,” which still carries on a dangerous afterlife in places where no one suspects, like that more celebrated “metaphysical need.”—We must first of all get rid of that other and more disastrous atomism, as well, which Christianity has taught best and longest, the atomism of the soul. With this phrase let me be permitted to designate the belief which assumes that the soul is something indestructible, eternal, indivisible—like a monad, like an atomon. We should rid scientific knowledge of this belief! Just between us, it is not at all necessary here to get rid of “the soul” itself and to renounce one of the oldest and most venerable hypotheses, as habitually happens with the clumsiness of the naturalists, who hardly touch upon “the soul” without immediately losing it. But the way to new versions and refinements of the hypothesis of the soul stands open: and ideas like “mortal soul” and “soul as the multiplicity of the subject” and “soul as the social structure of drives and affects” from now on want to have civil rights in scientific knowledge. While the new psychologist is preparing an end to the superstition which so far has flourished with an almost tropical lushness in the way the soul has been imagined, at the same time he has naturally pushed himself, as it were, into a new desert and a new mistrust—it may be the case that the older psychologists had a more comfortable and happier time of it—; finally, however, he knows that in that very process he himself is also condemned to invent, and—who knows?—perhaps to discover. 13 Physiologists should think carefully about setting up the drive to preserve the self as the cardinal drive in an organic being. Above everything else, something living wants to release its power—living itself is will to power. Self-preservation is only one of the indirect and most frequent consequences of that. In short, here as everywhere, beware of all extraneous teleological principles! The drive for self-preservation is one such principle (we have Spinoza’s inconsistency to thank for it—). For that is demanded by the method, which must, in essence, be economy of principles. 14 Nowadays in perhaps five or six heads the idea is dawning that even physics is only an interpretation and explication of the world (for our benefit, if I may be permitted to say so) and not an explanation of the world. But to the extent it rests upon a faith in the senses, it counts for more and must continue to count for more for a long time yet, that is, as an explanation. Physics has eyes and fingers on its side; it has appearance and tangibility on its side. That works magically on an age with basically plebeian taste—persuasively and convincingly—indeed, it follows instinctively the canon of truth of eternally popular sensualism. What is clear, what is “explained”? Only whatever lets itself be seen and felt—every problem has to be pushed that far. By contrast, the reluctance to accept obvious evidence of the senses constituted the magic of the Platonic way of thinking, which was a noble way of thinking—perhaps among human beings who enjoyed even stronger and more discriminating senses than our contemporaries have, but who knew how to experience a higher triumph in remaining master of these senses and to do this by means of the pale, cool, gray, conceptual nets which they threw over the colourful confusion of sense, the rabble of the senses, as Plato called them. That form of enjoyment in overcoming this world and interpreting the world in the manner of Plato was different from the one which today’s physicists offer us, as well as the Darwinists and anti-teleologists among the physiological workers, with their principle of the “smallest possible force” and the greatest possible stupidity. “Where human beings have nothing more to look at and to grip, there they have also no more to seek out”—that is, of course, an imperative different from the Platonic one, but nonetheless for a coarse, diligent race of mechanics and bridge builders of the future, who have nothing but rough work to do, it might be precisely the right imperative. 15 In order to carry on physiology in good conscience, people must hold to the principle that the sense organs are not phenomena in the sense of idealistic philosophy: as such they could not, in fact, be causes! And so sensualism at least as a regulative hypothesis, if not as a heuristic principle.—What’s that? And other people even say that the outer world is the work of our organs? But then our body, as a part of this outer world, would, in fact, be the work of our organs! But then our organs themselves would, in fact, be—the work of our organs. It seems to me that this is a complete reductio ad absurdum [absurd conclusion] provided that the idea of causa sui [something being its own cause] is fundamentally absurd. Consequently, is the exterior world not the work of our organs—? 16 There are still harmless observers of themselves who believe that there are “immediate certainties,” for example, “I think,” or that superstition of Schopenhauer’s, “I will,” just as if perception here were able to seize upon its object pure and naked, as the “thing in itself,” and as if there were no falsification either on the part of the subject or of the object.(12) However, the fact is that “immediate certainty,” just as much as “absolute cognition” and “thing in itself,” contains within itself a contradictio in adjecto [contradiction in terms]. I’ll repeat it a hundred times: people should finally free themselves from the seduction of words! Let folk believe that knowing is knowing all of something. The philosopher must say to himself, “When I dismantle the process that is expressed in the sentence ‘I think,’ I come upon a series of daring assertions whose rational grounding is difficult, perhaps impossible—for example, that I am the one who thinks, that there must really be something that thinks, that thinking is an action and effect of a being who is to be thought of as a cause, that there is an ‘I’, and finally that it is already established what we mean by thinking—that I know what thinking is. For if I had not yet decided these questions in myself, how could I assess that what is now happening might not perhaps be ‘willing’ or ‘feeling’?” In short, this “I think” presupposes that I compare my immediate condition with other conditions which I know in myself in order to establish what it is. Because of this referring back to other forms of ‘knowing,’ it certainly does not have any immediate ‘certainty’ for me.” Thus, instead of that “immediate certainty,” which people may believe in the case under discussion, the philosopher encounters a series of metaphysical questions, really essential problems of intellectual knowledge, as follows: “Where do I acquire the idea of thinking? Why do I believe in cause and effect? What gives me the right to speak of an ‘I,’ and indeed of an ‘I’ as a cause, finally even of an ‘I’ as the cause of thinking?” Anyone who ventures to answer those metaphysical questions right away with an appeal to some kind of intuitive cognition, as does the man who says “I think and know that at least this is true, real, and certain”—such a person nowadays will be met by a philosopher with a smile and two question marks. “My dear sir,” the philosopher will perhaps give him to understand, “it is unlikely that you are not mistaken but why such absolute insistence on the truth?”— 17 So far as the superstitions of the logicians are concerned, I will never tire of emphasizing over and over again a small brief fact which these superstitious types are unhappy to concede—namely, that a thought comes when “it” wants to and not when “I” wish, so that it is a falsification of the facts to say that the subject “I” is the condition of the predicate “think.” It thinks: but that this “it” is precisely that old, celebrated “I” is, to put it mildly, only an assumption, an assertion, in no way an “immediate certainty.” After all, we’ve already done too much with this “it thinks”: this “it” already contains an interpretation of the event and is not part of the process itself. Following grammatical habits people conclude here as follows: “Thinking is an activity. To every activity belongs someone who does the action, therefore—.” With something close to this same pattern, the older atomism, in addition to the “force” which created effects, also looked for that clump of matter where the force is located, out of which it works—the atom. Stronger heads finally learned how to cope without this “remnant of earth,” and perhaps one day people, including even the logicians, will also grow accustomed to cope without that little “it” (to which the honest old “I” has reduced itself). 18 It’s true that the fact that a theory can be disproved is not the least of its charms: that’s precisely what attracts more sophisticated minds to it. Apparently the theory of “free will,” which has been refuted hundreds of times, owes its continuing life to this very charm alone—again and again someone or other comes along and feels he’s strong enough to refute it. 19 Philosophers customarily speak of the will as if it were the best-known thing in the world. Indeed, Schopenhauer let it be known that the will is the only thing really known to us, totally known, understood without anything taken away or added. But still, again and again it seems to me that Schopenhauer, too, in this case has only done what philosophers just do habitually—he's appropriated and exaggerated a popular opinion. Willing seems to me, above all, something complicated, something that is unified only in the word—and popular opinion simply inheres in this one word, which has overmastered the always inadequate caution of philosophers. So if we are, for once, more careful, if we are "un-philosophical," then let's say, firstly, that in every act of willing there is, to start with, a multiplicity of feelings, namely, the feeling of the condition away from which, a feeling of the condition towards which, the feeling of this "away" and "towards" themselves, then again, an accompanying muscular feeling which comes into play through some kind of habit, without our putting our "arms and legs" into motion, as soon as we "will." Secondly, just as we acknowledge feelings, indeed many different feelings, as ingredients of willing, so we should also acknowledge that thinking is an ingredient as well. In every act of will there is a commanding thought, and people should not believe that this thought can be separated from the "will," as if then the will would still be left over! Thirdly, the will is not only a complex of feeling and thinking but, above all, an affect, and, indeed, an affect of the command. What is called "freedom of the will" is essentially the feeling of superiority with respect to the one who has to obey: "I am free; 'he' must obey"—this awareness inheres in every will, as does that tense attentiveness, that direct gaze fixed exclusively on one thing, that unconditional value judgment "Do this now—nothing else needs to be done," that inner certainty about the fact that obedience will take place, and everything else that accompanies the condition of the one issuing commands. A person who wills—gives orders to something in himself that obeys or that he thinks obeys. But now observe what is the strangest thing about the will—about this multifaceted thing for which the people have only a single word: insofar as we are in a given case the one ordering and the one obeying, both at the same time, and as the one obeying we know the feelings of compulsion, of pushing and pressing, resistance and movement, which usually start right after the act of will, and insofar as we, by contrast, have the habit of disregarding this duality and of deceiving ourselves, thanks to the synthetic idea of "I," a whole series of mistaken conclusions and, consequently, of false evaluations of the will itself has attached itself to the act of willing, in such a way that the person doing the willing believes in good faith that willing is sufficient for action. Because in the vast majority of cases a person wills something only where he may expect his command to take effect—that is, in obedience and action—what is apparent has translated itself into a feeling, as if there might be some necessary effect. In short, the one who is doing the willing believes, with a reasonable degree of certainty, that will and action are somehow one thing—he ascribes his success, the carrying out of the willing, to the will itself and, in the process, enjoys an increase in that feeling of power which all success brings with it. “Freedom of the will”—that’s the expression for the multifaceted condition of enjoyment in the person willing, who commands and, at the same, identifies himself with what is carrying out the order. As such, he enjoys the triumph over things which resist him, but within himself is of the opinion that it is his will by itself which really overcame this resistance. The person doing the willing thus acquires the joyful feelings of the successful implements carrying out the order, the serviceable “under-wills” or under-souls—our body is, in fact, merely a social construct of many souls—in addition to his joyful feeling as the one who commands. L’effet c’est moi [The effect is I]. What happens here is what happens in every well-constructed and happy community—the ruling class identifies itself with the successes of the community. All willing is simply a matter of giving orders and obeying, on the basis, as mentioned, of a social construct of many “souls”: for this reason a philosopher should arrogate to himself the right to include willing as such within the field of morality: morality, that is, understood as a doctrine of the relationships of dominance under which the phenomenon “living” arises.²⁰ That individual philosophical ideas are not something spontaneous, not things which grow out of themselves, but develop connected to and in relationship with each other, so that, no matter how suddenly and arbitrarily they may appear to emerge in the history of thought, they nevertheless belong to a system just as much as do the collective members of the fauna of a continent, that point finally reveals itself by the way in which the most diverse philosophers keep filling out again and again a certain ground plan of possible philosophies. Under an invisible spell they always run around the same orbit all over again: they may feel they are still so independent of each other with their critical or systematic wills, but something or other inside leads them, something drives them in a particular order one after the other, namely, that inborn structural arrangement and relationship of ideas. Their thinking is, in fact, much less a discovery than a recognition, a remembering, a return journey back home into a distant primordial collective household of the soul, out of which those ideas formerly grew. To practise philosophy is to this extent a form of atavism of the highest order. The strange family similarity of all Indian, Greek, and German ways of practising philosophy can be explained easily enough. It’s precisely where a relationship between languages is present we cannot avoid the fact that, thanks to the common philosophy of grammar—I mean thanks to the unconscious mastery and guidance exercised by similar grammatical functions—everything has been prepared from the beginning for a similar development and order of philosophical systems, just as the road to certain other possibilities of interpreting the world seems sealed off. There will be a greater probability that philosophers from the region of the Ural-Altaic languages (in which the idea of the subject is most poorly developed) will look differently “into the world” and will be found on other pathways than Indo-Germans or Muslims: the spell of particular grammatical functions is, in the final analysis, the spell of physiological judgments of value and racial conditions.—So much for the repudiation of Locke’s superficiality in connection with the origin of ideas.(13) 21 The causa sui [something being its own cause] is the best self-contradiction that has been thought up so far, a kind of logical rape and perversity. But the excessive pride of human beings has worked to entangle itself deeply and terribly with this very nonsense. The demand for “freedom of the will,” in that superlative metaphysical sense, as it unfortunately still rules in the heads of the half-educated, the demand to bear the entire final responsibility for one’s actions oneself and to relieve God, the world, ancestors, chance, and society of responsibility for them, is really nothing less than this very causa sui and a pulling oneself into existence out of the swamp of nothingness by the hair, with more audacity than Munchhausen. Suppose someone in this way gets behind the boorish simplicity of this famous idea of the “free will” and erases it from his head, then I would invite him now to push his “enlightenment” still one step further and erase also the inverse of this non-idea [Unbegriffs] of “free will” from his head: I refer to the “un-free will,” which amounts to an abuse of cause and effect. People should not mistakenly reify “cause” and “effect,” the way those investigating nature do (and people like them who nowadays naturalize their thinking—), in accordance with the ruling mechanistic foolishness which allows the cause to push and shove until it “have an effect.” People should use “cause” and “effect” merely as pure ideas, that is, as conventional fictions to indicate and communicate, not as an explanation. In the “in itself” there is no “causal connection,” no “necessity,” no “psychological un-freedom,” no “effect following from the cause”; no “law” holds sway. We are the ones who have, on our own, made up causes, causal sequences, for-one-another, relativity, compulsion, number, law, freedom, reason, and purpose, and when we fabricate this world of signs inside things as something “in itself,” when we stir it into things, then we’re once again acting as we have always done, namely, mythologically. The “un-free will” is a myth: in real life it’s merely a matter of strong and weak wills.—It is almost always already a symptom of something lacking in a thinker himself when he senses in all “causal connections” and “psychological necessity” some compulsion, necessity, requirement to obey, pressure, and un-freedom. That very feeling is a tell-tale giveaway—the person is betraying himself. And if I have seen things correctly, the “un-freedom of the will” has generally been viewed as a problem from two totally contrasting points of view, but always in a deeply personal way: some people are not willing at any price to let go of their “responsibility,” their belief in themselves, their personal right to their merits (the vain races belong to this group—); others want the reverse: they do not wish to be responsible for or guilty of anything, and demand, out of an inner self-contempt, that they can shift blame for themselves somewhere else. People in this second group, when they write books, are in the habit nowadays of taking up the cause of criminals; a sort of socialist pity is their most attractive disguise. And in fact, the fatalism of those with weak wills brightens up amazingly when it learns how to present itself as “(T)la religion de la souffrance humaine” [the religion of human suffering]—that’s its “good taste.” 22 People should forgive me, as an old philologist who cannot prevent himself from maliciously setting his finger on corrupt methods of interpretation—but “nature’s conformity to law,” which you physicists talk about so proudly, as if—it exists only thanks to your interpretation and bad “philology”—it is not a matter of fact, a “text, but instead nothing but a naively humanitarian emendation and distortion of meaning, with which you make ample concessions to the democratic instincts of the modern soul! “Equality before the law everywhere—in that respect nature is no different and no better than we are”: a charming ulterior motive, in which once again lies disguised the rabble’s hostility to everything privileged and autocratic, as well as a second and more sophisticated atheism. Ni dieu, ni maître [neither god nor master]—that is how you want it, too, and therefore “Up with natural law!” Isn’t that so? But, as mentioned, that is interpretation, not text, and someone could come along who had an opposite intention and style of interpretation and who would know how to read out of this same nature, with a look at the same phenomena, the tyrannically inconsiderate and inexorable enforcement of power claims—an interpreter who set right before your eyes the unexceptional and unconditional quality in all “will to power,” in such a way that almost every word, even that word “tyranny,” would finally appear unusable or an already weakening metaphor losing its force—as too human—and who nonetheless in the process finished up asserting the same thing about this world as you claim, namely, that it has a “necessary” and “calculable” course, but not because laws rule the world but because there is a total absence of laws, and every power draws its final consequence in every moment. Granted that this also is only an interpretation—and you will be eager enough to raise that objection?—well, so much the better. 23 All psychology so far has remained hung up on moral prejudices and fears. It has not dared to go into the depths. To understand it as the morphology and doctrine of the development of the will to power—the way I understand it—no one in his own thinking has even touched on that, insofar, that is, as one is permitted to recognize in what has been written up to now a symptom of what people so far have kept silent about. The power of moral prejudices has driven deep into the most spiritual, the most apparently cool world, the one with the fewest assumptions, and, as is self-evident, in a way that damages, limits, blinds, and distorts. A true physical psychology has to fight against an unconscious resistance in the heart of the researcher. It has “the heart” against it. Even a doctrine of the mutual interdependence of the “good” and the “bad” drives creates, as a more sophisticated immorality, distress and aversion in a still powerful and hearty conscience—even more so a doctrine of how all the good drives are derived from the bad ones. But assuming that someone takes the affects of hate, envy, greed, and desire to rule as the affects which determine life, as something that, in the whole balance of life, have to be present fundamentally and essentially, and, as a result, have to be enhanced if life is to be further enhanced—he suffers from an orientation in his judgment as if he were seasick. Nevertheless, even this hypothesis is not nearly the most painful or the strangest in this immense and still almost new realm of dangerous discoveries;—and, in fact, there are a hundred good reasons why everyone should stay away from it, anyone who can! On the other hand, if someone aboard ship wanders here at some point—well, then! Come on! Now’s the time to keep one’s teeth tightly clenched, one’s eyes open, and one’s hand firm on the tiller!—We’re moving away directly over morality, and in the process, as we dare make our way there, we’re overwhelming, perhaps smashing apart, what’s left of our morality,—but what do we matter! Never before has a more profound world of insights revealed itself to venturesome travellers and adventurers: and the psychologist who in this manner “makes a sacrifice”—it is not the sacrificio dell’ intelletto [sacrifice of the intellect], quite the opposite—will for that reason at least be permitted to demand that psychology is recognized again as the mistress of the sciences, with the other sciences there to prepare things in her service. For from now on psychology is once more the route to fundamental problems. NOTES (1) In Greek mythology, the Sphinx was a monster which terrorized Thebes. The peril could only be averted by answering a riddle. Oedipus answered the riddle successfully and was made king of Thebes. [Back to Text] (2) a priori synthetic judgments: a central claim of Kant’s theory of knowledge, these are judgments which do not arise from experience (i.e., they are innate) but which reveal knowledge of experience (like deductively argued mathematically based scientific laws). [Back to Text] (3) Categorical imperative: the key phrase in Kant’s morality, the idea that moral action consists of acting upon a principle which could become a rational moral principle without creating a moral contradiction (“Act so that the maxim [which determines your will] may be capable of becoming a universal law for all rational beings.” Immanuel Kant (1724-1804) was an enormously influential German Enlightenment philosopher. [Back to Text] (4) Baruch de Spinoza (1632-1677), an important and controversial Dutch philosopher; Pallas Athena: the Greek goddess of wisdom. [Back to Text] (5) Nietzsche’s words Wissenschaft and wissenschaftlich, translated as science and scientific, refer to scholarship or academic research methods and activities in general. Their meaning is by no means confined to natural science. [Back to Text] (6) Dionysius (432 to 367 BC), tyrant of Syracuse. [Back to Text] (7) Nietzsche quotes the Latin: “adventavit asinus/ pulcher et fortissimus.” [Back to Text] (8) The Stoics: a Greek philosophical school (founded in 306 BC) teaching patient endurance and repression of the emotions. [Back to Text] (9) Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph Schelling (1775-1854), a German philosopher. [Back to Text] (10) Nietzsche quotes the Latin, “Quia est in eo virtus dormitiva/ Cujus est natura sensus assoupire.” Moliere (Jean-Baptiste Poquelin, 1622-1673) was a famous French playwright. [Back to Text] (11) Roger Boscovich (1711-1787), a Jesuit philosopher and an important scientific thinker, denied material substance to atoms. His ethnic identity is contested. Nicolaus Copernicus (1473-1543), Polish monk and astronomer, offered a scientific theory for a sun-centred solar system. [Back to Text] (12) Arthur Schopenhauer (1788-1860), an important German philosopher whose work had a significant influence upon Nietzsche. [Back to Text] (13) John Locke (1632-1704), a very influential English philosopher, proposed that the mind at birth was a blank slate, without innate ideas. [Back to Text]

=====
=== Part 2: The Free Spirit
=====

=== Friedrich Nietzsche BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL Translated by Ian Johnston, Vancouver Island University, Nanaimo, British Columbia, Canada
Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text without permission and without charge. They may also freely edit the text for their own purposes. All commercial use of this translation, however, is forbidden without the permission of the translator. For comments and questions, please contact Ian Johnston. For a Rich Text Version (Word) of this text, please use the following link: [Beyond Good and Evil \[RTF\]](#) [Table of Contents for Beyond Good and Evil] PART TWO THE FREE SPIRIT 24 O sancta simplicitas [O blessed simplicity]! Human beings live in such a peculiarly simple and counterfeit way! Once a man develops eyes to see this wonder, he cannot check his amazement! How bright and free and light and simple we have made everything around us! How we have learned to give our senses free license for everything superficial, our thinking a divine craving for wanton leaps and erroneous conclusions! How we have learned ways, right from the start, to maintain our ignorance in order to enjoy a hardly conceivable freedom, carelessness, rashness, heartiness, and merriment in life—in order to enjoy life. And only on this now firm granite foundation of ignorance could scientific knowledge up to now rise up, the will to know on the foundation of a much more powerful will, the will not to know, to uncertainty, to what is not true! Not as its opposite, but—as its refinement! For even if language, here as elsewhere, does not cast off its clumsiness and continues to speak about opposites where there are only degrees and many subtleties of gradation, and similarly if inveterate Tartufferie [hypocrisy] in morality, which nowadays belongs to our invincible “flesh and blood,” turns the words even of us knowledgeable people around in our mouths, here and there we understand that and laugh about how it’s precisely the best scientific knowledge that most wants to hold us in this simplified, completely artificial, appropriately created, and appropriately falsified world, and about how, willingly or unwillingly, it loves error, because, as something alive—it loves life! 25 After such a cheerful start, I’d like you to not to miss hearing a serious word: it’s directed at the most serious people. Be careful, you philosophers and friends, of knowledge—protect yourself from martyrdom! From suffering “for the sake of the truth”! Even from defending yourselves! That corrupts all the innocence and refined neutrality in your consciences. It makes you stubborn against objections and red rags; it dulls your minds, turns you into an animal and a brute, when, in the struggle with danger, slander, suspicion, expulsion, and even dirtier consequences of hostility, you finally have to play out your role as the defenders of truth on earth, as though “the truth” were such a harmless and clumsy character as to require defenders! And as for you, you knights with the most sorrowful countenances, my gentlemen loafers and spiritual cobweb spinners! Ultimately you yourselves know well enough that it really doesn’t matter if you are the ones who are proved right. You also know that up to now no philosopher has been proved right and that a more praiseworthy truthfulness could lie in every small question mark which you set after your favourite words and cherished doctrines (and occasionally after yourselves), than in all the ceremonial gestures and trump cards before prosecutors and courts of justice! Better to stand aside! Run off to some secluded place! And retain your masks and your subtlety, so that people confuse you with someone else—or fear you a little! And for my sake don’t forget the garden, the garden with the golden trellis! And have people around you who are like a garden—or like music over water in the evening, when the day is already becoming a memory. Choose good solitude, the free, high-spirited, easy solitude, which also gives you a right to remain, in some sense or other, still good yourselves! How poisonous, how crafty, how bad every long war makes us, when it does not let us fight with open force! How personal a long fear makes us, a long attention on our enemies, on potential enemies! These social outcasts, these men long persecuted and wickedly hunted down—as well as the compulsory recluses, the Spinozas or Giordano Brunos—in the end always become, even under the most spiritual masquerade and perhaps without realizing it themselves, sophisticated avengers and makers of poisons (just dig into the foundation of Spinoza’s ethics and theology)—to say nothing of the foolishness of moral indignation, which in a philosopher is the unmistakable sign that his philosophical humour has run away from him.(1) The martyrdom of a philosopher, his “sacrifice for the truth,” brings forcefully to light how much of the agitator and actor he contains within himself. And if people have looked at him with only an artistic curiosity up to this point, then, in the case of several philosophers, we can naturally understand the dangerous wish to see him also in his degeneration (degenerated into a “martyr,” into a noisy troublemaker on the stage and in tribunals). But with such a wish, people must be clear about what they are going to see in every case—only a satyr play, only a farcical epilogue, only continuing proof that the long, real tragedy is over, assuming that every philosophy in its origin was a long tragedy. 26 Every special human being strives instinctively for his own castle and secrecy, where he is saved from the crowd, the many, the majority, where he can forget the ordinary “people” who are the rule [die Regel “Mensch”], for he is an exception to them—but for the single case where he is pushed by an even stronger instinct straight against this rule, as a person who seeks knowledge in a great and exceptional sense. Anyone who, in his intercourse with human beings, does not, at one time or another, shimmer with all the colours of distress—green and gray with disgust, surfeit, sympathy, gloom, and loneliness—is certainly not a man of higher taste. But provided he does not take all this weight and lack of enthusiasm freely upon himself, always keeps away from it, and stays, as mentioned, hidden, quiet, and proud in his castle, well, one thing is certain: he was not made for, not destined for, knowledge. For if he were, he would one day have to say to himself, “The devil take my good taste! The rule is more interesting than the exception—than I am, the exception!”—and he would make his way down and, above all, “inside.” The study of the average man—long, serious, and requiring much disguise, self-control, familiarity, bad company—all company is bad company except with one’s peers—that constitutes a necessary part of the life story of every philosopher, perhaps the most unpleasant, foul-smelling part, the richest in disappointments. But if he’s lucky, as is appropriate for a fortunate child of knowledge, he encounters real short cuts and people who make his task easier—I’m referring to the so-called cynics, those who, as such, simply recognize the animal, the meanness, the “rule” in themselves and, in the process, still possess that degree of spirituality and urge to have to talk about themselves and people like them before witnesses;—now and then they even wallow in books, as if in their very own dung. Cynicism is the single form in which common souls touch upon what honesty is, and the higher man should open his ears to every cruder and more refined cynicism and think himself lucky every time a shameless clown or a scientific satyr announces himself directly in front of him. There are even cases where enchantment gets mixed into the disgust: for example, in those places where, by some vagary of nature, genius is bound up with such an indiscreet billy-goat and ape—as in the Abbé Galiani, the most profound, sharp-sighted, and perhaps also the foulest man of his century—he was much deeper than Voltaire and consequently a good deal quieter.(2) More frequently, as I have intimated, it happens that the scientific head is set on an ape's body, a refined and exceptional understanding in a common soul—among doctors and moral physiologists, in particular, that's not an uncommon occurrence. And wherever anyone speaks without bitterness and quite innocently of man as a belly with two different needs and a head with one, wherever someone constantly sees, looks for, and wants to see only hunger, sexual desire, and vanity, as if these were the real and only motivating forces in human actions, in short, wherever people speak “badly” of human beings—not even in a nasty way—there the lover of knowledge should pay fine and diligent attention; he should, in general, direct his ears to wherever people talk without indignation. For the indignant man and whoever is always using his own teeth to tear himself apart or lacerate himself (or, as a substitute for that, the world, or God, or society) may indeed, speaking morally, stand higher than the laughing and self-satisfied satyr, but in every other sense he is the more ordinary, the more trivial, the more un instructive case. And no one lies as much as the indignant man. 27 It is difficult to be understood, particularly when one thinks and lives gangasrotogati [like the flow of the river Ganges], among nothing but people who think and live differently, namely kurmagati [like the movements of a tortoise] or, in the best cases “following the gait of frogs” mandeikagati—am I simply doing everything to make myself difficult to understand?—and people should appreciate from their hearts the good will in some subtlety of interpretation. But so far as “good friends” are concerned, those who are always too lackadaisical and believe they have a particular right as friends to a life of comfort, one does well to start by giving them a recreation room and playground of misunderstanding:—so one still has to laugh—or else to get rid of them altogether, these good friends—and to laugh then, as well! 28 The most difficult thing about translating one language into another is the tempo of its style, which is rooted in the character of the race—speaking more physiologically, in the average tempo of its “metabolism.” There are honestly intended translations that, as involuntarily coarse versions of the original, are almost misrepresentations, simply because its brave and cheerful tempo, which springs over and neutralizes everything dangerous in things and words, could not be translated. A German is almost incapable of presto [quick tempo] in his language and thus, as we can reasonably infer, is also incapable of many of the most delightful and most daring nuances of free and free-spirited thinking. Just as the buffo [comic actor or singer] and satyr are foreign to him, in body and conscience, so Aristophanes and Petronius are untranslatable for him. Everything solemn, slow moving, ceremonially massive, all lengthy and boring varieties in style are developed among the Germans in a lavish diversity. You must forgive me for the fact that even Goethe's prose, with its mixture of stiffness and daintiness, is no exception, as a mirror image of the “good old time” to which it belongs, and as an expression of German taste in an age when there still was a “German taste,” a rococo taste in moribus et artibus [in customs and the arts].(3) Lessing is an exception, thanks to his play-actor’s nature, which understood a great deal and knew how to do many things. He was not the translator of Bayle for nothing and was happy to take refuge in Diderot’s or Voltaire’s company—and even happier among the Roman writers of comic drama. In tempo, too, Lessing loved free-spiritedness, the flight from Germany. But how could the German language—even in the prose of a Lessing—imitate the tempo of Machiavelli, who in his Prince allows one to breathe the fine dry air of Florence and cannot help presenting the most serious affairs in a boisterous allegro [very quick tempo], perhaps not without a malicious artistic feeling about what a contrast he is risking—long, difficult, hard, dangerous ideas, a galloping tempo, and the very best, most mischievous of moods.(4) Finally, who could even venture a German translation of Petronius, who was the master of the presto—more so than any great musician so far—in invention, ideas, and words. Ultimately what is so important about all the swamps of the sick, nasty world, even the “ancient world,” when someone like him has feet of wind, drive, and breath, the liberating scorn of a wind which makes everything healthy, as he makes everything run! And so far as Aristophanes is concerned, that transfiguring, complementary spirit for whose sake we excuse all Hellenism for having existed, provided that we have understood in all profundity everything that needs to be forgiven and transfigured there;—I don’t know what makes me dream about Plato’s secrecy and sphinx-like nature more than that petit fait [small fact], which fortunately has been preserved, that under the pillow on his deathbed people found no “Bible,” nothing Egyptian, Pythagorean, or Platonic—but something by Aristophanes. How could even a Plato have endured life—a Greek life, to which he said no—without an Aristophanes! 29 It’s the business of very few people to be independent:—that is a right of the strong. And whoever attempts it—even with the best right to it, but without being compelled to—shows by that action that he is probably not only strong but exuberantly daring. He is entering a labyrinth; he is increasing a thousand-fold the dangers which life already brings with it, not the least of which is the fact that no one’s eyes see how and where he goes astray, gets isolated, and is torn to pieces by some cavern-dwelling Minotaur of conscience. Suppose such a person comes to a bad end, that happens so far away from men’s understanding that they feel nothing and have no sympathy:—and he cannot go back any more! He cannot even go back to human pity!(5)— 30 Our loftiest insights must—and should!—ring out like foolishness, under certain circumstances like crimes, when in some forbidden way they come to the ears of those for whom they are not suitable and who are not predestined for them. The exoteric and the esoteric views, as people earlier differentiated them among philosophers, with Indians as with Greeks, Persians, and Muslims, in short, wherever people believed in a hierarchy of rank and not in equality and equal rights—this differentiation does not arise so much from the fact that the exoteric philosopher stands outside and looks, assesses, measures, and judges from the outside, not from the inside: the more essential point is that the exoteric philosopher sees the matter looking up from underneath, but the esoteric one sees it looking down from above! There are heights of the soul viewed from which even tragedy ceases to work its tragic effect, and if we gathered all the sorrow of the world into one sorrow, who could dare to decide if a glance at it would necessarily seduce and compel us to pity and thus to a doubling of that sorrow? . . . What serves the higher kind of man as nourishment or refreshment must be almost poison to a very different and lower kind of man. The virtues of the common man would perhaps amount to vices and weaknesses in a philosopher; it could be possible that a higher kind of person, if he is degenerating and nearing his end, only then acquires characteristics for whose sake people in the lower world, into which he has sunk, would find it necessary to honour him as a saint from now on. There are books which have an opposite value for the soul and for health, depending on whether the lower soul, the lower vitality, or the higher and more powerful soul makes use of them: with the first group, the books are dangerous, shattering, and disintegrating; with the second group, they are a herald's summons, which provokes the bravest to show their courage. Books for the whole world always smell foul: the stink of small people clings to them. Where the folk eat and drink, even where they worship, the place usually smells. One should not go into churches if one wants to breathe clean air. 31 In their young years, people worship and despise still without that art of subtlety that constitutes the greatest gain in life. And it's reasonable enough that they must atone, with some difficulty, for having bombarded men and things in such a way with Yes and No. Everything is arranged so that the worst of all tastes, the taste for the absolute, will be terribly parodied and misused until people learn to put some art into their feelings and even prefer risking an attempt with artificiality, as the real artists of life do. The anger and reverence typical of the young do not seem to ease up until they have sufficiently distorted people and things so that they can vent themselves on them. —Youth is in itself already something fraudulent and deceptive. Later, when the young soul, tortured by nothing but disappointments, finally turns back against itself suspiciously, still hot and wild, even in its suspicion and pangs of conscience, how it rages against itself from this point on, how it tears itself apart impatiently, how it takes revenge for its lengthy self-deception, as if it had been a voluntary blindness! In this transition people punish themselves through their mistrust of their own feeling; they torment their enthusiasm with doubt; indeed, they even feel good conscience as a danger, as a veiling of the self, so to speak, an exhaustion of their finer honesty. Above all, people take sides, on principle the side against “the young.”—A decade later, they understand that all this was also still—youth! 32 Throughout the lengthiest period of human history—we call it the prehistoric age—the value or the lack of value in an action was derived from its consequences. Thus, the action in itself was considered as insignificant as its origin, but, in somewhat the same way as even today in China an honour or disgrace reaches back from the child to the parents, so then it was the backward working power of success or failure which taught people to consider an action good or bad. Let’s call this period the pre-moralistic period of humanity: the imperative “Know thyself!” was then still unknown. In the last ten millennia, by contrast, people in a few large regions of the earth have come, step by step, to the point where they allow the value of an action to be determined, no longer by its consequences, but by its origin. On the whole, this was a great event, a considerable improvement in vision and standards, the unconscious influence of the ruling power of aristocratic values and of faith in “origins,” the sign of a period which one can designate moralistic in a narrower sense: with it the first attempt at self-knowledge was undertaken. Instead of the consequences, the origin: what a reversal of perspective! And this reversal was surely attained only after lengthy battles and fluctuations! Of course, in the process a disastrous new superstition, a peculiar narrowing of interpretation, gained control. People interpreted the origin of an action in the most particular sense as an origin from an intention. They became unanimous in believing that the value of an action lay in the value of its intention. The intention as the entire origin and prehistory of an action: in accordance with this bias people on earth have, almost up to the most recent times, given moral approval, criticized, judged, and also practised philosophy. But today shouldn’t we have reached the point where we must once again make up our minds about a reversal and fundamental shift in values, thanks to a renewed self-reflection and profundity in human beings? Are we not standing on the threshold of a period which we might at first designate negatively as outside morality: today, when the suspicion stirs, at least among us immoralists, that the decisive value of an action may lie precisely in what is unintentional in it and that all its intentionality, everything in it that we can see, know, and “are conscious of,” still belongs to its surface layer and skin,—which, like every skin, indicates something but conceals even more? In short, we believe that the intention is only a sign and a symptom, something still needing interpretation, and furthermore a sign that carries too many meanings and, thus, by itself alone means almost nothing. We think that morality, in the earlier sense, that is, a morality based on intentions, has been a prejudice, something rash and perhaps provisional, something along the lines of astrology and alchemy, but in any case something that must be overcome. The overpowering of morality, in a certain sense even the self-conquering of morality: let that be the name for the long secret work which remained reserved for the finest and most honest, and also the most malicious consciences nowadays, as living touchstones of the soul. 33 That is the only way: we must mercilessly put in question and bring before the court feelings of devotion, sacrificing for one's neighbour, the entire morality of self-renunciation, and, in exactly the same way, the aesthetic of "disinterested contemplation," according to which the emasculation of art seductively attempts these days to create a good conscience for itself. There is much too much magic and sweetness in those feelings "for others," "not for myself," for us not to find it necessary to grow doubly mistrustful here and to ask, "Are these not perhaps—seductions?"—The fact that those feelings please the person who has them and the one who enjoys their fruits, as well as the one who merely looks on—this still provides no argument for them. On the contrary, that demands immediate caution. So let's be cautious! 34 No matter what philosophical standpoint people may adopt nowadays, from every point of view the falsity of the world in which we think we live is the most certain and firmest thing our eyes are still capable of apprehending:—for that we find reason after reason, something that might well to entice us into conjectures about a deceitful principle in the "essence of things." But anyone who makes our very thinking, that is, "the intellect," responsible for the falsity of the world—an honourable solution which every conscious or unconscious advocatus dei [pleader for god] uses:— whoever takes this world, together with space, time, form, and movement as a false inference, such a person would at least have good ground finally to learn to be distrustful of all thinking itself. Would it not be the case that thinking has played the greatest of all tricks on us up to this point? And what guarantee would there be that thinking would not continue to do what it has always done? In all seriousness: the innocence of thinkers has something touching, something inspiring reverence, which permits them even today still to present themselves before consciousness with the request that it give them honest answers: for example, to the question whether it is "real," and why it really keeps itself so resolutely separate from the outer world, and similar sorts of questions. The belief in "immediate certainties" is amoral naïveté which brings honour to us philosophers—but for once we should not be "merely moral" men! Setting aside morality, this belief is a stupidity that brings us little honour! It may be the case that in bourgeois life the constant willingness to suspect is considered a sign of a "bad character" and thus belongs among those things considered unwise. Here among us, beyond the bourgeois world and its affirmations and denials—what is there to stop us from being unwise and saying that the philosopher has an absolute right to a "bad character," as the being who up to this point on earth has always been fooled the best—today he has the duty to be suspicious, to glance around maliciously from every depth of distrust. Forgive me the joke of this gloomy grimace and way of expressing myself. For a long time ago I myself learned to think differently and to make different evaluations about deceiving and being deceived, and I keep ready at least a couple of digs in the ribs for the blind anger with which philosophers themselves resist being deceived. Why not? It is nothing more than a moral prejudice that truth is worth more than appearance. That claim is even the most poorly demonstrated assumption there is in the world. People should at least concede this much: there would be no life at all if not on the basis of appearances and assessments from perspectives. And if people, with the virtuous enthusiasm and clumsiness of some philosophers, wanted to do away entirely with the “apparent world,” assuming, of course, you could do that, well then at least nothing would remain any more of your “truth” either! In fact, what compels us generally to the assumption that there is an essential opposition between “true” and “false”? Is it not enough to assume degrees of appearance and, as it were, lighter and darker shadows and tones for the way things appear—different valeurs [values], to use the language of painters? Why could the world about which we have some concern—not be a fiction? And if someone then asks “But doesn’t an author belong to a fiction?” could we not bluntly answer: Why? Doesn’t this “belong to” perhaps belong to the fiction? Is it then forbidden to be a little ironic about the subject as well as about the predicate and the object? Is the philosopher not permitted to rise above a faith in grammar? All due respect to governesses, but might it not be time for philosophy to renounce faith in governesses?— 35 O Voltaire! O humanity! O nonsense! There’s something about the “truth,” about the search for truth. And when someone goes after it in far too human a way—“il ne cherche le vrai que pour faire le bien” [he seeks the truth only to do good]—I’ll wager he comes up with nothing! 36 If we assume that nothing is “given” as real other than our world of desires and passions and that we cannot access from above or below any “reality” other than the direct reality of our drives—for thinking is only a relationship of these drives to each other—are we not allowed to make the attempt to ask the question whether this given is not sufficient also for understanding, on the basis of things like it, the so-called mechanical (or “material”) world. I don’t mean to understand it as an illusion, an “appearance,” an “idea” (in the sense of Berkeley and Schopenhauer), but as having the same degree of reality as our emotions themselves have—as a more primitive form of the world of emotions, in which everything is still combined in a powerful unity, which then branches off and develops in the organic process (also, as is reasonable, gets softer and weaker—), as a form of instinctual life in which the collective organic functions, along with self-regulation, assimilation, nourishment, excretion, and metabolism, are still synthetically bound up with one another—as an early form of life?(6) In the end making this attempt is not only permitted but is also demanded by the conscience of the method. Not to assume various forms of causality as long as the attempt to manage with a single one has not been pushed to its furthest limit (—all the way to nonsense, if I may say so): that is a moral of the method which people nowadays may not evade;—as a mathematician would say, it is a consequence “of its definition.” In the end the question is whether we really acknowledge the will as something efficient, whether we believe in the causal properties of the will. If we do—and basically our faith in this is simply our faith in causality itself—then we must make the attempt to set up hypothetically the causality of the will as the single causality. Of course, “will” can work only on “will”—and not on “stuff” (not, for example, on “nerves”—). Briefly put, we must venture the hypothesis whether in general, wherever we recognize “effects,” will is not working on will—and whether every mechanical event, to the extent that a force is active in it, is not force of will, an effect of the will.—Suppose finally that we were to succeed in explaining our entire instinctual life as a development and branching off of a single fundamental form of the will—that is, of the will to power, as my proposition asserts—and suppose we could trace back all organic functions to this will to power and also locate in it the solution to the problem of reproduction and nourishment—that is one problem—then in so doing we would have earned the right to designate all efficient force unambiguously as will to power. Seen from inside, the world defined and described according to its “intelligible character” would be simply “will to power” and nothing else.— 37 “What’s that? Doesn’t that mean in popular language that God is disproved, but the devil is not—?” On the contrary, on the contrary, my friends! And in the devil’s name, who is forcing you to speak such common language? 38 What happened only very recently, in all the brightness of modern times, with the French Revolution, that ghastly and, considered closely, superfluous farce, which, however, noble and rapturous observers from all Europe have been interpreting from a distance for so long and so passionately according to their own outrage and enthusiasm that the text disappeared under the interpretation, in the same way a noble posterity could once again misunderstand all the past and only by doing that perhaps make looking at that past tolerable.—Or rather, hasn’t this already happened? Have we ourselves not been—this “noble posterity”? And, to the extent that we understand this point, is not this the very moment when—it is over? 39 No one will readily consider a doctrine true simply because it makes us happy or virtuous, except perhaps the gentle “idealists,” who go into raptures about the good, the true, and the beautiful and allow all sorts of colourful, clumsy, and good-natured desirable things to swim around in confusion in their pond. Happiness and virtue are no arguments. But people, even judicious spirits, do like to forget that causing unhappiness and evil are by the same token no counterarguments. Something could well be true, although it is at the same time harmful and dangerous to the highest degree. In fact, it could even be part of the fundamental nature of existence that people are destroyed when they fully understand it—so that the strength of a spirit might be measured by how much it could still endure of the “truth,” or stated more clearly, by the degree it would have to have the truth diluted, masked, sweetened, muffled, and falsified. But there is no doubt about the fact that evil and unhappy people are more favoured and have a greater probability of success in discovering certain parts of the truth, to say nothing of the evil people who are happy—a species that moralists are silent about. Perhaps toughness and cunning provide more favourable conditions for the development of the strong, independent spirit and the philosopher than that gentle, refined, conciliatory good nature and that art of taking things lightly which people value in a scholar, and value rightly. If we assume, first of all, that the notion of a “philosopher” is not restricted to the philosopher who writes books—or even puts his own philosophy into books! — A final characteristic in the picture of the free-spirited philosopher is provided by Stendhal. Because of German taste I don’t wish to overlook emphasizing this trait—for it goes against German taste. This last great psychologist states the following: “To be a good philosopher it is necessary to be dry, clear, without illusions. A banker who has made a fortune has one part of the character required to make discoveries in philosophy, that is to say, to see clearly into what is.”(7) 40 Everything profound loves the mask. The most profound things of all even have a hatred for image and comparison. Shouldn’t the right disguise in which the shame of a god walks around be something exactly opposite? A questionable question: it would be strange if some mystic or other had not already ventured something like that on his own. There are processes of such a delicate sort that people do well to bury them in something crude and make them unrecognizable. There are actions of love and of extravagant generosity, after which there is nothing more advisable than to grab a stick and give an eyewitness a good thrashing:—in so doing we cloud his memory. Some people know how to befuddle or batter their own memories in order at least to take revenge on this single witness:—shame is resourceful. It is not the worst things that make people feel the worst shame. Behind a mask there is not only malice—there is so much goodness in cunning. I could imagine that a person who had something valuable and vulnerable to preserve might roll through life as coarse and round as an old green wine barrel with strong hoops. The delicacy of his shame wants it that way. For a person whose shame is profound encounters even his fate and delicate decisions on pathways which few people ever reach and of whose existence those closest to him and his most intimate associates are not permitted to know. His mortal danger hides itself from their eyes, just as his confidence in life does, once he regains it. A person who is concealed in this way, who from instinct uses speaking for silence and keeping quiet and who is tireless in avoiding communication, wants and demands that, instead of him, a mask of him wanders around in the hearts and heads of his friends. And suppose he does not want that mask: one day his eyes will open to the fact that nonetheless there is a mask of him there—and that that’s a good thing. Every profound spirit needs a mask;

even more, around every profound spirit a mask is continuously growing, thanks to the constantly false, that is, shallow interpretation of every word, every step, every sign of life he gives.— 41 A person has to test himself to see that he is meant for independence and command—and he must do this at the right time. He should not evade his tests, although they are perhaps the most dangerous game he can play, tests which in the end are made only with ourselves as witnesses and with no other judges. Not to get stuck on a single person:—not even on the someone one loves the most. Every person is a prison—a cranny as well. And not to remain stuck on one's fatherland:—not even if it is enduring the greatest suffering and in the greatest need of assistance—it is less difficult to disentangle one's heart from a victorious fatherland. Not to be stuck on pity, even in the case of higher men whose rare torment and helplessness some fortuitous circumstance has allowed us to see. Not to be stuck on a science, not even if it tempts us with the most precious discoveries apparently reserved explicitly for us. Not to get stuck on one's own detachment, on that sensual distancing and strangeness of a bird constantly soaring further up into the heights in order always to see more beneath it:—the danger of the man in flight. Not to get stuck on our own virtues and let our totality become a sacrifice to some particular detail in us, for example, our "hospitality," the danger of dangers for lofty and rich souls, who spread themselves around lavishly, almost indifferently, and push the virtue of liberality into a vice. One must know how to preserve oneself: the sternest test of independence. 42 A new sort of philosopher is emerging: I venture to baptize them with a name that is not without danger. As I figure them out—to the extent that they let themselves be figured out, for it belongs to their type to want to remain something of an enigma—these philosophers of the future may have a right, perhaps also a wrong, to be described as attempters. This name itself is finally merely an attempt and, if you will, a temptation.(8) 43 Are they new friends of the "truth," these emerging philosophers? That seems plausible enough: for all philosophers up to this point have loved their truths. But they certainly will not be dogmatists. It must go against their pride as well as their taste if their truth is still supposed to be some truth for everyman: and that has been the secret wish and deeper meaning of all dogmatic efforts up to now. "My judgment is my judgment: someone else has no casual right to it"—that's what such a philosopher of the future will perhaps say. One must rid oneself of the bad taste of wanting to agree with many. "Good" is no longer good when one's neighbour utters it. And how could there even be a "common good"! That expression contradicts itself: whatever can be common always has only little value. In the end things must stand as they stand and have always stood: great things remain for the great, the abysses for the profound, sensitivity and shudders for the refined, and, to sum up all this in brief, everything rare for the rare.— 44 After all this do I still need expressly to state that they will also be free, very free spirits, these philosophers of the future—although it's also certain that they will not be merely free spirits but something more, higher, greater, and fundamentally different that does not wish to be misunderstood and confused with something else? But as I say this, I feel a duty almost as much to them as to us who are their heralds and precursors, we free spirits!—the duty to blow away an old stupid prejudice and misunderstanding about us both, something which for too long has made the idea “free spirit” as impenetrable as fog. In all the countries of Europe and in America as well there is now something which drives people to misuse this name, a very narrow, confined, chained-up type of spirit which wants something rather like the opposite of what lies in our intentions and instincts—to say nothing of the fact that, so far as those emerging new philosophers are concerned, such spirits definitely must be closed windows and bolted doors. To put the matter briefly and seriously, these falsely named “free spirits” belong with the levellers, as eloquent and prolific writing slaves of democratic taste and its “modern ideas”: collectively people without solitude, without their own solitude, coarse brave lads whose courage or respectable decency should not be denied. But they are simply unfree and ridiculously superficial, above all with their basic tendency to see in the forms of old societies up to now the cause for almost all human misery and failure, a process which turns the truth happily on its head! What they would like to strive for with all their powers is the universal, green, pasture-happiness of the herd, with security, absence of danger, comfort, an easing of life for everyone. The two songs and doctrines they sing most frequently are called “equality of rights” and “pity for all things that suffer”—and they assume that suffering itself is something we must do away with. We who are their opposites, we who have opened our eyes and consciences for the question of where and how up to now the plant “man” has grown most powerfully to the heights, we think that this has happened every time under the opposite conditions, that for this to happen the danger of his situation first had to grow enormously, his power of invention and pretence (his “spirit”—) had to develop under lengthy pressure and compulsion into something refined and audacious, his will for living had to intensify into an unconditional will to power:—we think that hardness, violence, slavery, danger in the alley and the heart, seclusion, stoicism, the art of the tempter, and devilry of all kinds, that everything evil, fearful, tyrannical, predatory, and snake-like in human beings serves well for the ennobling of the species “man,” as much as its opposite does:—in fact, when we say only this much we have not said enough, and we find ourselves at any rate with our speaking and silence at a point at the other end of all modern ideology and things desired by the herd, perhaps as their exact opposites? Is it any wonder that we “free spirits” are not exactly the most communicative spirits? That we do not want to give away every detail of what a spirit can free itself from and where it will then perhaps be driven? And as far as the meaning of the dangerous formula “beyond good and evil” is concerned, with which we at least protect ourselves from being confused with others, we are something different from “libres-penseurs,” “liberi pensatori,” “freidenker,” [free thinkers] and whatever else all these good advocates of “modern ideas” love to call themselves. Having been at home or at least a guest in many countries of the spirit, having slipped away again and again from the musty comfortable corners into which preference and prejudice, youth, descent, contingencies of men and books, or even exhaustion from wandering around seem to have banished us, full of malice against the enticement of dependency, which lies hidden in honours, or money, or offices, or sensuous enthusiasm, thankful even for distress and the frequent vicissitudes of sickness, because they always freed us from some rule or other and its “prejudice,” thankful to god, devil, sheep, and worm in us, curious to a fault, researchers all the way to cruelty, with fingers spontaneously working for the unimaginable, with teeth and stomachs for the most indigestible things, ready for any job which demands astuteness and keen senses, ready for any exploit, thanks to an excess of “free will,” with front-souls and back-souls whose final intentions no one can easily see, with foregrounds and backgrounds that no foot may move through to the end, hidden under cloaks of light, conquerors, whether we appear like heirs and spendthrifts, stewards and collectors from dawn to dusk, miserly with our wealth and our crammed drawers, economical in learning and forgetting, resourceful in coming up with schemes, sometimes proud of tables of categories, sometimes pedants, sometimes night owls at work, even in broad daylight, in fact, when necessary, even scarecrows—and nowadays that’s necessary: that is, to the extent that we are born the sworn jealous friends of solitude, of our own most profound, most midnight, and most noontime solitude:—we are that kind of men, we free spirits! And perhaps you also are something like that, you who are coming, you new philosophers? NOTES (1) Giordano Bruno (1548-1600), an Italian philosopher who defended the theories of Copernicus (among other things), and was burned at the stake for heresy. Baruch de Spinoza (1632-1677), a Dutch philosopher, was constantly attacked for his heretical views. [Back to Text] (2) Ferdinand Galiani (1728-1787), an Italian philosopher. Voltaire: pen name of Francois Marie Arouet (1694-1778), a very important and famous French Enlightenment writer. [Back to Text] (3) Aristophanes (456-386 BC), foremost writer of Old Comedy in classical Athens; Petronius (27-66 AD), a famous Roman satirist. Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832), Germany’s greatest man of letters and literary artist. [Back to Text] (4) Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-1781), an important German dramatist. Bayle: Marie Henri Bayle (1783-1842), a well-known French novelist who wrote under the pen name Stendhal. Denis Diderot (1713-1784), French philosopher and writer, a major figure in the Enlightenment. Niccolo Machiavelli (1469-1527), Italian diplomat, dramatist, and political philosopher. [Back to Text] (5) Minotaur: in Greek mythology a monster, part man, part bull, living in the middle of the Labyrinth in Cnossus in Crete. [Back to Text] (6) George Berkeley (1685-1753), Irish bishop and philosopher. [Back to Text] (7) Stendhal: the pen name of the French novelist Marie Henri Bayle (1783-1842). Nietzsche quotes from the French: “pour être bon philosophe, il faut être sec, clair, sans illusion. Un banquier, qui a fait fortune, a une partie du caractère requis pour faire des découvertes en philosophie, c’est-à-dire pour voir clair dans ce qui est.” [Back to Text] (8) Nietzsche’s word Versuchen means both attempter and experimenter. The very similar word Versuchung means temptation. [Back to Text]

=====
 === Part 3: The Religious Mood
 =====

==== Friedrich Nietzsche BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL Translated by Ian Johnston, Vancouver Island University, Nanaimo, British Columbia, Canada
 Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text without permission and without charge. They may also freely edit the text for their own purposes. All commercial use of this translation, however, is forbidden without the permission of the translator. For comments and questions, please contact Ian Johnston. For a Rich Text Version (Word) of this text, please use the following link: Beyond Good and Evil [RTF] [Table of Contents for Beyond Good and Evil] PART THREE THE RELIGIOUS NATURE(1) 45 The human soul and its boundaries, the range of human inner experiences so far attained, the heights, depths, and extent of these experiences, the whole history of the soul up to this point and its still undrained possibilities: for a born psychologist and lover of the “great hunt” that is the predestined hunting ground. But how often must such a man say to himself in despair: “I’m just one man! Alas, only one man! And this is a huge wood, a primordial forest!” And so he wishes he could have few hundred helpers in the hunt and finely trained tracking dogs which he could drive into the history of the human soul in order to corner his wild animal there. A vain hope. He experiences over and over again, thoroughly and bitterly, how difficult it is to find helpers and hounds for all things which appeal to his curiosity. The problem he has in sending scholars out into new and dangerous hunting grounds, where courage, intelligence, and refinement are necessary in every sense, is that that’s precisely the place where scholars are no longer useful, where the “great hunt” but also the great danger begins:—right there they lose their keen eyes and noses for hunting. In order to ascertain and to establish, for example, what sort of history the problem of knowledge and conscience in the soul of the homines religiosi [religious men] has had up to now, the individual would himself perhaps have to be as profound, as wounded, and as monstrous as the intellectual conscience of Pascal was:—and then it would still be necessary to have that expansive heaven of bright, malicious spirituality capable of surveying from above this teeming mass of dangerous and painful experiences, of ordering it, and of forcing it into formulas.(2) But who would perform this service for me? And who would have time to wait for such servants?—It's clear they arise too rarely. In all ages they are so unlikely! In the end, a person must do everything himself in order to know a few things himself: that means that one has much to do!—But at all events a curiosity of the sort I have remains the most pleasant of all vices.—Forgive me. I wanted to say this: the love of the truth has its reward in heaven and even on earth.— 46 The faith demanded and not rarely attained by early Christianity in the midst of a sceptical and southern world of free spirits that had behind and within it a centuries-long battle among philosophical schools, in addition to the education in tolerance provided by the imperium romanum [Roman empire]—this faith is not that naive and gruff faith of the subordinate, something like the faith with which a Luther or a Cromwell or some other northern barbarian of the spirit hung onto his god and his Christianity.(3) That earlier faith is much more similar to Pascal's belief, which looks, in a terrifying way, something like a constant suicide of reason, a tenacious, long-lived, worm-like reason, which cannot be killed once and for all with a single blow. From the start Christian faith has been sacrifice: a sacrifice of all freedom, all pride, all self-confidence about the spirit, and at the same time slavery and self-mockery, self-mutilation. There is cruelty and a religious Phoenicianism in this faith, which one expects in a crumbling, multilayered, and very spoilt conscience: its assumption is that the subjection of the spirit is indescribably painful, that the entire past and the habits of such a spirit resist the absurdissimum [the most extreme absurdity], which is how this "faith" confronts it. Modern people, with their insensitivity to all Christian nomenclature, do not sense any more the ghastly superlative that lay in the paradox of the formula "God on the cross" for the taste of classical antiquity. To this point there has never yet been anywhere such an audacious reversal—anything as dreadful, questioning, and questionable, as this formula: it promised an inversion of all ancient values.—It is the Orient, the deep Orient, it is the Oriental slave who in this way took his revenge on Rome and its noble and frivolous tolerance, on the Roman "catholicity" of faith:—and what always enraged the slaves about their masters and against their masters was not their faith but their freedom from faith, that half-stoic, smiling lack of concern about the seriousness of belief. "Enlightenment" fills people with rage, for the slave wants something absolute; he understands only the tyrannical, even in morality; he loves as he hates, without subtlety, to the depths, to the point of pain, to the point of sickness. His many hidden sufferings grow incensed against the noble taste that seems to deny suffering. The scepticism about suffering, basically only an attitude of aristocratic morality, was also not the most insignificant factor in the origin of the last great slave revolt, which began with the French Revolution. 47 Up to this point, wherever religious neurosis has appeared on earth, we find it tied up with three dangerous dietary rules: isolation, fasting, and sexual abstinence—although it would be impossible to determine with certainty what in this may be cause and what may be effect and whether there is, in fact, a relationship between cause and effect here. This final doubt is justified by the fact that among the most regular symptoms of the religious neurosis, both with savage and docile peoples, belongs also the most sudden and most dissolute sensuality which then, just as suddenly, turns into spasms of repentance and a denial of the world and the will. We could interpret both perhaps as masked epilepsy? But nowhere should people resist interpretations more than here. About no type up to this point has such a glut of absurdity and superstition proliferated. No other type so far seems to have interested human beings, even philosophers, more than this one. It's high time to become a little cool on this issue, to learn caution, or better yet, to look away, to go away. Even in the background of the most recent philosophy, the work of Schopenhauer, there stands, almost as the essential problem, this dreadful question mark of the religious crisis and awakening. How is denial of the will possible? How is the saint possible?— This seems, in fact, to have been the question which prompted Schopenhauer to become a philosopher and to begin. Hence, it was a result really worthy of Schopenhauer that his most convinced follower (perhaps also his last, where Germany is concerned), namely, Richard Wagner, brought his own life's work to an end at this very point and finally led out onto the stage the living physical embodiment of that fearful and eternal type as Kundry, type vécu [a real-life type], at the very time when the psychiatrists of almost all the countries of Europe had an opportunity to study it up close, in every place where the religious neurosis—or as I call it, “the religious nature”—had its most recent epidemic outbreak and paraded around as the “Salvation Army.”(4) But if we ask ourselves what has really been so wildly interesting in the whole phenomenon of the saint for people of all types and ages, even for philosophers, then undoubtedly it is the appearance of a miracle associated with it, that is, the immediate succession of opposites, of conditions of the soul that are valued in morally opposed ways. People thought here they could get a grip on the fact that all of a sudden a “bad man” became a “saint,” a good man. On this point, psychology so far has suffered a shipwreck. Didn't that happen primarily because psychology subordinated itself to the control of morality, because it itself believed in opposing moral evaluations and saw, read into, and interpreted these opposites into the text and the facts? How's that? The “miracle” is only a failure of interpretation? A lack of philology?— 48 It seems that their Catholicism is much more inwardly bound up with the Latin races than all of Christianity is in general for us northerners and that, as a result, in Catholic countries unbelief means something entirely different from what it means in Protestant countries—namely, a form of rebellion against the spirit of the race; whereas, among us unbelief means rather a turning back to the spirit (or non-spirit [Ungeist]) of the race. We northerners undoubtedly stem from races of barbarians, and this also holds with respect to our talent for religion. We are badly equipped for it. One can make the Celtic people an exception to that, and for this reason they also provided the best soil for the start of the Christian infection in the north:—in France the Christian ideal bloomed only as much as the pale northern sun permitted. How strangely devout for our taste even these recent French sceptics still are, to the extent they have some Celtic blood in their ancestry! How Catholic, how un-German, August Comte’s sociology smells to us, with its Roman logic of the instincts! How Jesuitical that charming and clever cicerone [tour guide] from Port Royal, Sainte-Beuve, in spite of all his hostility to the Jesuits! And then there’s Ernest Renan: how inaccessible to us northerners the language of such a Renan sounds, in which at every moment some nothing of religious tension destroys the equilibrium of his soul, which is, in a more refined sense, sensual and reclining comfortably! One should repeat after him these beautiful sentences—and how much malice and high spirits at once arise in response in our probably less beautiful and harder, that is, more German souls: “Let us then boldly assert that religion is a product of the normal man, that man is most in touch with truth when he is most religious and most assured of an infinite destiny . . . When he is good he wants virtue to correspond to an eternal order; when he contemplates things in a disinterested manner he finds death revolting and absurd. How can we not assume that it is in those moments like this that man sees best? . . .” These sentences are so entirely antithetical to my ears and habits that when I found them my initial rage wrote beside them “la niaiserie religieuse par excellence!” [the finest example of religious foolishness]—until my later anger really grew to like them, these sentences which turn the truth on its head! It is so nice, so distinguished, to have one’s very own antithesis!(5) 49 The thing that astonishes one about the religiosity of the ancient Greeks is the unrestrained fullness of gratitude which streams out of it:—it is a very noble kind of man who stands before nature and life in this way! Later, as the rabble gained prominence in Greece, fear grew all over religion as well, and preparations were made for Christianity. 50 The passion for God: there are sincere, peasant, pushy types, like Luther’s—all Protestantism lacks southern delicatessa [delicacy]. In it there is an oriental way of existing in an exalted state [Aussersichsein], as with a slave who, without deserving it, has been pardoned or ennobled, for example, Augustine, who lacks in an offensive way all nobility of gestures and desires. There is some feminine tenderness and desire in it which pushes itself bashfully and ignorantly towards a unio mystica et physica [a mystical and physical union], as with Madame de Guyon.(6) Strangely enough, in many cases it appears as a disguise for puberty in a young woman or man, and here and there even as the hysteria of an old spinster, also as her last ambition:—in such cases the church has often already declared the woman a saint. 51 Up to now the most powerful people have still bowed reverently before the saint, as the riddle of self-conquest and of intentional final sacrifice. Why did they bow? They sensed in him—and, so to speak, behind the question mark of his frail and pathetic appearance—the superior power that wished to test itself in such a victory, the strength of the will, in which they knew how to recognize and honour their own strength and pleasure in mastery once more. They were honouring something in themselves when they revered the saint. It got to the point that the sight of a saint aroused a suspicion in them: such a monster of denial, something so contrary to nature, would not have been desired for no reason—that's what they said and questioned themselves about. Perhaps there is a reason for that, a really great danger, about which the ascetic, thanks to his secret comforters and visitors might provide more precise information? In short, the powerful people of the earth learned from the saint a new fear; they sensed a new power, a strange, as yet unconquered enemy:—it was the “will to power” which compelled them to halt in front of the saint. They had to ask him— 52 In the Jewish “Old Testament,” the book of divine justice, there are human beings, things, and speeches of such impressive style that the world of Greek and Indian literature has nothing to place beside them. We stand with fear and reverence before these tremendous remnants of what human beings once were and will in the process suffer melancholy thoughts about old Asia and its small protruding peninsula of Europe, which, in marked contrast to Asia, would like to represent the “progress of man.” Naturally, whoever is, in himself, only a weak, tame domestic animal and knows only the needs of domestic animals (like our educated people nowadays, including the Christians of “educated” Christianity), among these ruins such a man finds nothing astonishing or even anything to be sad about—a taste for the Old Testament is a touchstone with respect to “great” and “small”:—perhaps he finds the New Testament, that book of grace, still preferable to his heart (in it there is a good deal of the really tender, stifling smell of sanctimonious and small-souled people). To have glued together this New Testament, a sort of rococo of taste in all respects, with the Old Testament into a single book, as the “Bible,” and “the essential book,” that is perhaps the greatest act of daring and “sin against the spirit” that literary Europe has on its conscience. 53 Why atheism today?—“The father” in God has been fundamentally disproved, as well as “the judge,” “the rewarder.” Together with his “free will.” He is not listening—and if he were to hear, he wouldn't know how to help anyway. The worst thing is this: he appears incapable of communicating clearly. Is he indistinct?—From a number of different conversations, asking and listening, this is what I have unearthed as the cause of the decline of European theism: it seems to me that the religious instinct is, in fact, growing powerfully—but that it is rejecting, with profound distrust, theistic satisfaction. 54 When you get down to it, what has all recent philosophy been doing? Since Descartes—and, in fact, more in defiance of him than on the basis of what he had done before—all philosophers have been trying to assassinate the old idea of the soul, under the appearance of a critique of the idea of the subject and predicate—that means an attempt to kill the basic assumption of Christian teaching. More recent philosophy, as an epistemological scepticism, is, in a concealed or open manner, anti-Christian, although (and this is said for more refined ears) in no way anti-religious. Formerly, that is, people believed in “the soul,” as they believed in grammar and the grammatical subject. They said “I” is the condition, “think” is the predicate and conditioned—thinking is an activity for which a subject must be thought of as cause. Now, people tried, with an admirable tenacity and trickery, to see whether they could get out of this net, whether perhaps the opposite might not be true: “think” as the condition, “I” the conditioned—thus “I” is only a synthesis that is itself created by thinking. Basically Kant wanted to show that if we started with the subject we could not prove the subject—or the object. The possibility of an apparent existence of the subject, hence “the soul,” might not have always been alien to him—that thought which, as Vedanta philosophy, was once before present with enormous power on earth.(7) 55 There is a huge ladder of religious atrocities, with many rungs. But three of them are the most important. First people sacrificed human beings to their gods, perhaps the very ones whom they loved best. Here belong the sacrifices of the first-born in all prehistoric religions, as well as the sacrifice of Emperor Tiberius in the grotto to Mithras on the island of Capri, that most terrible of all Roman anachronisms.(8) Then, in the moral ages of humanity, people sacrificed to their gods the strongest instincts that man possessed, his “nature.” This celebratory joy sparkles in the cruel glance of the ascetic, of the enthusiastic “anti-natural man.” Finally, what was still left to sacrifice? Did people not finally have to sacrifice everything comforting, holy, healing, all hope, all belief in a hidden harmony, in future blessedness and justice? Did people not have to sacrifice God himself and, out of cruelty against themselves, worship stone, stupidity, gravity, fate, and nothingness? To sacrifice God for nothingness—this paradoxical mystery of the last act of cruelty has been reserved for the generation which is coming along right now. We all already know something about this. 56 Anyone who, like me, has, with some enigmatic desire or other, made an effort for a long time to think profoundly about pessimism and to rescue it from the half-Christian, half-German restrictions and simple-mindedness with which it has most recently appeared in this century, that is, in the form of Schopenhauer’s philosophy; anyone who really has, with an Asiatic and super-Asiatic eye, looked into and down on the most world-denying of all possible ways of thinking—beyond good and evil and no longer as Buddha and Schopenhauer do, under the spell and delusion of morality—such a man has perhaps in the process, without really wanting to do so, opened his eyes for the reverse morality: for the ideal of the most high-spirited, most lively, and most world-affirming human being, who has not only learned to come to terms with and to accept what was and is but who wants to have what was and is come back for all eternity, calling out insatiably da capo [from the beginning], not only to himself but to the entire play and spectacle, and not only to a spectacle but basically to the one who needs this particular spectacle and who makes the spectacle necessary, because over and over again he needs himself—and makes himself necessary. How's that? Wouldn't this be circulus vitiosus deus [god as a vicious circle]? 57 With the power of his spiritual glance and insight the distance and, as it were, the space around man expand: his world becomes deeper; new stars and new riddles and pictures always come into his view. Perhaps everything on which the eye of his spirit has practised its astuteness and profundity was just an excuse for exercise, a matter of play, something for children and childish heads. Perhaps one day the most solemn ideas, the ones over which we have fought and suffered the most, the ideas of "God" and "sin," will seem to us no more important than a children's toy or childish pain appears to an old man—and perhaps then "the old man" will need again another children's toy and another pain—still sufficiently a child, an eternal child! 58 Have people properly considered just how much a genuinely religious life (both its favourite task of microscopic self-examination and that tender calmness which is called "prayer" and is a constant preparedness for the "coming of God") requires an outward leisure or half-leisure—I mean leisure with a good conscience, time-honoured, from blood, something not entirely foreign to the aristocratic feeling that work is dishonourable (that is, the feeling that work makes the soul and body coarse) and how, as a result, the modern blaring, time-consuming industriousness, so proud of itself, stupidly proud, trains and prepares people, better than anything else, precisely for "unbelief"? For example, among the present inhabitants of Germany who live without religion, I find people who hold to "free-thinking" of various kinds and origins, but above all a majority of those whose industriousness, from generation to generation, has dissolved the religious instincts, so that these people no longer have any idea what purpose religions serve and take note of their presence in the world with, as it were, only a kind of indifferent wonder. They already feel that generous demands are made of them, these good people, whether from their businesses or their pleasures, to say nothing of the "Fatherland" and the newspapers and the "obligations to the family": it seems that they have no time at all left over for religion; it is especially unclear to them whether religion involves a new business or a new pleasure—for it's not possible, they tell themselves, that people go to church merely to spoil their own good moods. They are no enemies of religious customs.

If, in certain circumstances, people demand of them participation in such traditions (something required by the state, for example), they do what is required, just the way people do so many things—with a patient and modest seriousness and without much curiosity and concern. They just live too much apart and on the outside to find it necessary in such cases to conduct an argument with themselves for or against the matter. Among these indifferent people nowadays belongs the majority of German Protestants in the middle classes, particularly in the great industrious centres of trade and business, including most of the hard-working scholars and all the accessories of the university (with the exception of the theologians, whose existence and possibility there constantly provide the psychologist with more and ever more sophisticated riddles to sort out). Devout or merely church-going people rarely imagine how much good will—one could say how much arbitrary will—is involved nowadays when a German scholar takes the problem of religion seriously. On the basis of his whole trade (and, as mentioned, on the basis of the industriousness of the tradesman, which his modern conscience requires of him) he inclines to a supercilious, almost kindly amusement towards religion, mixed now and then with a slight contempt for the “uncleanliness” of the spirit which he assumes is present wherever people still profess their faith in the church. The scholar succeeds only with the help of history (hence not from his own personal experience) in bringing to religion a reverent seriousness and a certain timid consideration. But even if his feelings about religion have managed to rise all the way to gratitude towards it, in his own person he has not yet come a step closer to what still constitutes church and piety: perhaps the reverse is the case. The practical indifference to religious matters in which he was born and raised tends to sublimate itself in him to caution and cleanliness, things which avoid contact with religious people and things. And it can well be the very depth of his tolerance and humanity that tells him to stay out of the way of complex difficulties which tolerance brings with it. Every period has its own divine form of naiveté whose invention other ages may envy:—and how much naiveté, respectful, childish, and boundlessly foolish naiveté lies in this belief of the scholar in his own superiority, in the good conscience of his toleration, in the unsuspecting, unsophisticated certainty with which his instinct treats religious people as a less worthy and lower type, above whom he himself has grown up, out, and above—the scholar, the small, presumptuous dwarf and member of the rabble, the diligent and nimble head-and-hand-worker of “ideas,” of “modern ideas”! 59 Whoever has looked deep into the world will readily guess what wisdom exists in the fact that human beings are superficial. It is their preserving instinct, which teaches them to be changeable, light, and false. Here and there we find a passionate and exaggerated veneration of “pure forms,” among philosophers as well as among artists. No one should doubt that whoever requires the cult of surfaces that much has at some time or another grasped beneath those surfaces, with unhappy results. Perhaps with respect to these scorched children, the born artists, who still find the good things of life only in the intention to falsify its image (as it were, in a prolonged revenge against life), there is even a rank ordering: we could derive the degree to which life has been spoiled for them by the extent to which they wish to see its image falsified, diluted, transcended, deified. Among the artists we could count the homines religiosi [men of religion] as their highest rank. It is the deep suspicious fear of an incurable pessimism which compels entire millennia to sink their teeth into a religious interpretation of existence, the fear arising from that instinct which has a premonition that people could grasp the truth too early, before humans have become strong enough, hard enough, artistic enough. . . . From this point of view, piety, the “life in God,” could appear as the most refined and final spawn of the fear of truth, as an artist’s worship and intoxication in the face of the most consequential of all falsifications, as the will to the reversal of the truth, to untruth at any price. Perhaps up to this point there has been no stronger way of making human beings themselves look more beautiful than this very piety: through it man can become so much art, surface, play of colours, and goodness, that we no longer suffer at the sight of him.— 60 To love human beings for the sake of God—so far that has been the most noble and most remote feeling that has been attained among men. The fact that without some consecrating intention behind it the love of human beings is one more stupidity and brutishness, that the inclination to this love of humanity must first derive its extent, delicacy, its grains of salt and specks of ambergris from some higher inclination—whatever human being it happened to be who first felt and “experienced” this, no matter how much his tongue may have stumbled as it tried to express such a delicacy, let him remain for all time sanctified among us and worthy of reverence as the man who so far has flown the highest and has lost his way most beautifully! 61 The philosopher the way we understand him, we free spirits, as the man of the most all-encompassing responsibility, who has the conscience for the collective development of human beings—this philosopher will help himself to religions for use in his work of cultivation and education, just as he will use contemporary political and economic conditions. The selective and cultivating influence—that is to say always both the destructive as well as the creative and shaping influence—which can be practised with the help of religions is something multifaceted and different, according to the type of people who are put under its spell and protection. For strong, independent people, those prepared and predestined to command, those in whom the reason and culture of a ruling race become something living, religion is one more means of overcoming resistance, so that they will be able to rule; it is like a bond which ties ruler and subjects together in common and betrays and hands over to the former the consciences of the latter, something hidden in their innermost selves which would like to evade obedience. And in the event a few individual natures of such noble descent, because of their high mindedness, feel drawn towards a more secluded and more peaceful life and reserve for themselves only the most refined form of ruling (over chosen disciples or brethren in an order), then religion itself can be used as a means to create some peace for oneself from the noise and hardship of the cruder forms of ruling and cleanliness from the dirt which necessarily comes with all political action. That's something the Brahmin, for example, understood: with the help of a religious organization they arrogated to themselves the power to appoint a king for the people, while they held and felt themselves apart and outside, as men with higher purposes beyond kingship.(9) Meanwhile, religion also provides instruction for some of the ruled and an opportunity to prepare themselves for ruling and ordering in the future, those slowly ascending classes and groups, that is, those in which, because of fortunate marriage traditions, the force and desire of the will, the will to rule oneself, is always rising;—to these people religion offers sufficient stimuli and temptations to travel the route to a higher spirituality, to test the feelings of great self-conquest, of silence and solitude:—asceticism and Puritanism are almost indispensable means for educating and ennobling people when a race wishes to become master of its origins from the rabble and works its way up towards future ruling power. Finally, for ordinary people, the vast majority, who are there to serve for common needs and are permitted to exist only for that purpose, religion gives an invaluable modest satisfaction with their situation and type, all sorts of peace at heart, an ennoblement of obedience, one more source of joy and suffering with people like them, and something of a transfiguration and beautification of and a justification for the whole routine, the whole baseness, the whole half-animal poverty of their souls. Religion and the religious significance of life bring the brilliance of the sun onto such constantly troubled people and make them capable of tolerating the sight of themselves. Religion works just as an Epicurean philosophy usually works on suffering people of a higher rank—refreshing and refining and, as it were, exploiting the suffering, finally even blessing and justifying it.(10) In Christianity and Buddhism there is perhaps nothing so venerable as their art of teaching even the most abject people to place themselves, through their piety, into an illusory higher order of things and thus to hang onto their satisfaction with the real order, in the middle of which their life is hard enough—and this hardness is precisely what's necessary! 62 Finally, of course, to evaluate the opposing bad effects of such religions, as well, and to bring to light their sinister danger, there is always an expensive and fearful price to pay when religions prevail, not as a means of cultivation and education in the hand of philosophers, but as some inherently sovereign power, when religions want themselves to be the final purpose and not a means alongside other means. Among human beings, as among all other animal species, there is an excess of failures, invalids, degenerates, and infirm individuals, those who necessarily suffer. Successful examples are always the exception, among human beings as well, and, given that man is the as-yet-undetermined animal, the rare exception. But even worse: the higher the type of human being a particular person represents, the more improbable it becomes that he will be successful. The contingent, the law of absurdity in the collective household of humanity, reveals itself in the most frightening manner in its destructive effects on the higher people, whose conditions of life are refined, multifaceted, and hard to estimate. Now, how do the two greatest religions mentioned above stand in relation to this excess of unsuccessful cases? They seek to preserve, to maintain alive, anything which merely allows itself to be preserved. In fact, they side with these unsuccessful cases, in principle, as religions for those who suffer; they agree that all those who suffer from life as from some illness are right, and they would like to see to it that every other feeling of life was judged false and became impossible. Even if we still wish to fix a high value on this protecting and preserving care, inasmuch as it is concerned and has been concerned with, among all the other people, the highest type of human being as well, the one who up to this point has almost always suffered the most, nonetheless in the total reckoning, the religions so far, that is, the sovereign religions, belong among the major causes which have kept the type “man” on a lower rung—they have preserved too much of what should have perished. We have to thank them for something invaluable, and who is rich enough in gratitude not to become poor in the face of everything which, for example, the “spiritual men” of Christianity have done for Europe up to this point? And yet, if they gave consolation to sufferers, courage to the oppressed and despairing, a staff and support to those who could not stand on their own, and enticed away from society and into monasteries and spiritual penitentiaries those suffering from inner destruction and those who had become wild, what must they have done in addition, in order to work in this way in good conscience basically for the preservation of everything sick and suffering, which amounts, in fact and truth, for the deterioration of the European race? Turn all evaluations of worth on their heads—that is what they had to do! Break up the strong men, infect great hopes, bring joy in beauty under suspicion, twist all self-mastery, everything manly, lofty, domineering, all instincts characteristic of the highest and most successful of the type “man” into uncertainty, distressed conscience, and self-destruction, in fact, to turn all love for earthly things and for dominion over the earth into hatred for the earth and the earthly—that is the task the church gave itself and had to give itself, until finally in its estimation “unworldliness,” “lack of sensuality,” and “higher man” melted together into a single feeling. Suppose we could survey with the mocking and disinterested eye of an Epicurean god the strangely painful comedy of European Christianity, as crude as it is refined, I believe we would find no end to our amazement and laughter. Does it not seem that for eighteen centuries there has been ruling over Europe a will to turn the human being into a sublime monstrosity? However, anyone who, with the opposite needs, no longer Epicurean, but with some divine hammer in his hand, were to approach this almost voluntary degeneration and decay of a human being, like the Christian European (Pascal, for example), would he not have to cry out with fury, pity, and horror, “You fools! You arrogant, pitying fools, what have you done here? Was that a work for your hands? What a mess you’ve made, ruining my most beautiful stone! What have you presumed?” What I wanted to say was this: Christianity has been the most disastrous sort of arrogance so far. Men not lofty and hard enough to be permitted to shape men as artists; men not strong and far-sighted enough to allow, with a sublime conquest of the self, the foreground law of thousand-fold failure and destruction to prevail; men not noble enough to see the abysmally different rank ordering, the gulfs separating ranks between man and man:—such men have, with their “equal before God,” so far ruled over the fate of Europe to the point where finally a diminished, almost ridiculous type has been bred, a herd animal, something obliging, sickly, and mediocre—the contemporary European. . . .

NOTES (1) The title of this section is “Das Religiöse Wesen”. Wesen has a number of meanings, including person, character, disposition, nature, soul, mind, essence, inclination. [Back to Text] (2) Blaise Pascal (1623-1662), a brilliant French mathematician known for the extreme strictness and mortification of his religious beliefs. [Back to Text] (3) Martin Luther (1483-1546), German monk and theologian whose work launched the Reformation and Protestantism; Oliver Cromwell (1599-1658), English Protestant leader against King Charles I and founder of the Commonwealth (the short-lived English experiment with republican government). [Back to Text] (4) Richard Wagner (1813-1883), German composer and essayist, famous for his operas; Kundry: a character in Wagner’s opera Parsifal (1882), the high messenger of the Holy Grail. [Back to Text] (5) August Comte (1798-1857), a French philosopher who founded positivism and is considered the father of modern sociology; Port Royal: an important French religious community in the seventeenth century which encouraged self-renunciation; Charles Augustin Sainte-Beuve (1804-1869), a prominent French poet and literary critic; Ernest Renan (1823-1892), a well-known French writer on Christianity. Nietzsche quotes the the French: “Disons donc hardiment que la religion est un produit de l’homme normal, que l’homme est le plus dans le vrai quand il est le plus religieux et le plus assuré d’une destine infini . . . C’est quand il est bon qu’il veut que la vertu corresponde á un ordre éternel, c’est quand il contemple les choses d’une manière désintéressée qu’il trouve la mort révoltante et absurde. Comment ne pas supposer que c’est dans ces moments lá, que l’homme voit le mieux? . . . [Back to Text] (6) Saint Augustine (345-430),

Bishop of Hippo, a key figure in the development of early Christianity; Madame de Guyon: a sixteenth-century French mystic. [Back to Text] (7) Vedanta: a philosophical tradition within Hinduism. [Back to Text] (8) Emperor Tiberius: the Roman emperor after Augustus (from 14 AD to 37 AD). [Back to Text] (9) Brahmin: the elite priesthood in Hinduism. [Back to Text] (10) Epicurean: a follower of Epicurus (341 BC-270 BC), who taught that the highest good was pleasure, especially contemplative pleasure. [Back to Text]

==== Part 4: Epigrams and Interludes

==== Friedrich Nietzsche BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL Translated by Ian Johnston, Vancouver Island University, Nanaimo, British Columbia, Canada
Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text without permission and without charge. They may also freely edit the text for their own purposes. All commercial use of this translation, however, is forbidden without the permission of the translator. For comments and questions, please contact Ian Johnston. For a Rich Text Version (Word) of this text, please use the following link: [Beyond Good and Evil \[RTF\]](#) [Table of Contents for Beyond Good and Evil] PART FOUR APHORISMS AND INTERLUDES
63 Whoever is fundamentally a teacher takes all things seriously only in relation to his students—including even himself. 64 “Knowledge for its own sake,”—that is the ultimate snare which morality sets: with that one gets fully entangled once again in morality. 65 The charm of knowledge would be slight, if there were not so much embarrassment to overcome on the route to knowledge. 65a Man is most dishonest in relation to his god: he is not permitted to sin! 66 The inclination to diminish oneself, to let oneself be robbed, deceived, and exploited could be the shame of a god among men. 67 Love of one person is a barbarity: for it is practised at the expense of all the rest. Also the love of God. 68 “I have done that” says my memory. “I could not have done that” says my pride and remains implacable. Finally—my memory gives up. 69 One has watched life badly if one has not also seen the hand which, in a considerate manner—kills. 70 If a person has character, he still has his typical experience, which always repeats itself. 71 The wise man as astronomer: so long as you still feel the stars as something “above you,” you still lack the eye of a man who knows. 72 It’s not the strength but the duration of the lofty sensation that makes lofty people. 73 Whoever attains his ideal, in the act of doing just that goes beyond it. 73a Many peacocks hide their peacock’s tails from all eyes—and call that their pride. 74 A man with genius is unendurable if he does not possess at least two things in addition: gratitude and cleanliness. 75 The degree and type of the sexuality in a man extend all the way to the ultimate peak of his spirit. 76 Under conditions of peace the warlike man attacks himself. 77 With their principles people want to tyrannize their habits or justify them or honour them or abuse them or hide them:—two men with the same principles probably want them for fundamentally different things. 78 Anyone who despises himself nonetheless still respects himself as the one doing the despising. 79 A soul which knows that it is loved but does not itself love reveals its bottom layers—its lowest stuff comes up. 80 A matter which is explained ceases to concern us.—What did that god mean who advised “Know thyself”? Does that not perhaps mean “Stop being concerned about yourself! Become objective!”—And Socrates? —And the “scientific man”?— 81 It is dreadful to die of thirst in the sea. Must you then salt your truth so much that it can no longer—quench thirst? 82 “Pity for everyone”—that would hard and tyrannical for you, my neighbour! 83 Instinct—when the house is burning, people forget even their noonday meal.—Indeed, but people later haul it out of the ashes. 84 Woman learns to hate to the extent that she forgets how to enchant. 85 The same emotions in men and women have, nonetheless, a different tempo. That’s the reason man and woman do not cease misunderstanding each other. 86 Behind all personal vanity women themselves always have their impersonal contempt—for “woman.” 87 Bound heart, free spirit.—When one binds one’s heart firmly and keeps it imprisoned, one can provide one’s spirit many freedoms: I have said that already once. But people do not believe me, provided that they do not already know it. . . . 88 We begin to mistrust very clever people when they become embarrassed. 89 Dreadful experiences lead one to wonder whether the person who undergoes them is not something dreadful. 90 Heavy, melancholy men become lighter precisely through what makes other people heavy, through hate and love, and for a while they come to their surface. 91 So cold, so icy that we burn our fingers on him! Every hand that grasps him pulls back!—And for that very reason many assume he is glowing hot. 92 For the sake of his good reputation who has not once—sacrificed himself? 93 In affability there is no hatred for humanity, but for that very reason there is too much contempt for humanity. 94 Maturity in a man: that means having found once again the seriousness which man had as a child, in play. 95 For someone to be ashamed of his immorality: that is a step on the staircase at the end of which he is also ashamed of his morality. 96 People should depart from life in the way Odysseus separated from Nausikaa—blessing it rather than in love with it.(1) 97 What? A great man? I always see only the actor of his own ideal. 98 If we train our conscience, it will kiss us at the very moment it bites us. 99 The disappointed man speaks:—“I listened for the echo, and I heard only praise—” 100 We all present ourselves to ourselves as more simple than we are: in this way we give ourselves a rest from our fellow human beings. 101 Today a man with knowledge might easily feel like god transformed into an animal. 102 To discover that one is loved in return should really bring the lover down about his beloved. “How’s that? Is this person modest enough to love even you? Or stupid enough? Or—or—. . .” 103 The danger in happiness—”Now everything is turning out the best for me; now I love every destiny:—Who feels like being my destiny?” 104 It is not their love of humanity but the impotence of their love of humanity that prevents today’s Christians—from burning us. 105 For the free spirit, the “pious man of discovery”—the pia fraus [pious fraud] is even more contrary to his taste (against his “piety”) than the impia fraus [impious fraud]. Hence his deep lack of understanding of the church, the sort associated with the type “free spirit,”—as his lack of freedom. 106 Thanks to music even the passions enjoy themselves. 107 Once the decision has been made, to shut your ears even to the best counter-arguments: a sign of a strong character. Hence, an occasional will to stupidity. 108 There are no moral phenomena at all, but only a moral interpretation of phenomena. . . . 109 The criminal is often enough not equal to his action: he diminishes and disparages it. 110 The lawyers for a criminal are rarely sufficiently artistic to turn the beautiful terror of his action to the benefit of the person who did it. 111 Our vanity is most difficult to injure at the very point when our pride has just been hurt. 112 Anyone who feels himself predestined to observe and not to believe finds all those who believe too noisy and pushy: he fends them off. 113 “Do you want to win him over for yourself? Then make yourself embarrassed in front of him.—” 114 The immense expectation concerning sexual love and the shame in this expectation ruin all perspective in women from the beginning. 115 Where the game involves neither love nor hate, woman plays indifferently. 116 The great epochs of our lives occur when we acquire the courage to rename our evil quality our best quality. 117 The will to overcome an emotion is, in the final analysis, only the will of another emotion or of several other emotions. 118 There is an innocence in admiration: such innocence belongs to the man who does not yet have any idea that he, too, could at some point be admired. 119 The disgust with filth can be so great that it prevents us from cleansing ourselves—from “justifying” ourselves. 120 Sensuality often makes the growth of love too fast, so that the root remains weak and easy to rip out. 121 There’s something fine about the fact that God learned Greek when He wanted to become a writer—and that he did not learn it better. 122 To be happy over praise is with some men only a courtesy of the heart—and exactly the opposite of vanity of the spirit. 123 Even concubinage has been corrupted—by marriage. 124 The man who still rejoices while being burned at the stake is not triumphing over the pain but over the fact that he feels none of the pain where he expected to. A parable. 125 When we have to change our minds about anyone, we hold the awkwardness which he has thus created for us very much against him. 126 A people is nature’s detour to produce six or seven great men.—Yes, and then to get around them. 127 Science offends the modesty of all real women. With it they feel as if someone wanted to peek under their skin—or even worse, under their dress and finery. 128 The more abstract the truth you wish to teach, the more you must still seduce the senses to it. 129 The devil has the widest perspectives for God; that's why he keeps himself so far away from Him—for the devil is the oldest friend of knowledge. 130 What someone begins to show itself when his talent subsides—when he stops showing what he can do. Talent is also finery, and finery is also a hiding place. 131 The sexes deceive themselves about each other: this happens because basically they honour and love only themselves (or, to put the matter more pleasantly, only their own ideal—). Hence, the man wants the woman to be peaceful—but woman, like a cat, is essentially not peaceful, however much she may have practised an appearance of peacefulness. 132 People are best punished for their virtues. 133 The man who does not know how to find the way to his own ideal lives more carelessly and impudently than the man without an ideal. 134 All credibility, all good conscience, all appearance of the truth come only from the senses. 135 Pharisaism is not degeneration in a good man: a good part of it is rather the condition of all being-good Gut-sein 136 One man seeks a midwife for his ideas; another seeks someone he can help: that's how a good conversation arises. 137 By associating with scholars and artists one easily makes mistakes in reverse directions: behind a remarkable scholar we not infrequently find a mediocre human being, and behind a mediocre artist we often find—a very remarkable human being. 138 We act while awake as we do in a dream: we invent and fabricate the person with whom we associate—and then we immediately forget the fact. 139 In revenge and love woman is more barbaric than man. 140 Advice as riddle:—"If the bond is not to break—you must first bite down on it." 141 The lower abdomen is the reason man does not so easily consider himself a god. 142 The most demure saying I have ever heard: "In true love it's the soul that envelops the body."(3) 143 What we do best our vanity wishes to count as the thing that is most difficult for us. On the origin of many a morality. 144 When a woman has scholarly inclinations, then something is usually wrong with her sexuality. Infertility itself tends to encourage a certain masculinity of taste, for man is, if I may say so, "the infertile animal." 145 In comparing man and woman in general, we can say that woman would not have the genius for finery if she did not have the instinct for the secondary role. 146 Anyone who fights with monsters should make sure that he does not in the process become a monster himself. And when you look for a long time into an abyss, the abyss also looks into you. 147 From old Florentine novels, and in addition from life: buona femmina e mala femmina vuol bastone [the good woman and the bad woman want a stick]. Sacchetti, Nov. 86.(4) 148 To seduce a neighbour into a good opinion and, beyond that, to believe faithfully in this opinion of one's neighbour: who can match women in performing this trick?— 149 What an age finds evil is commonly an anachronistic echo of what previously was found to be good—the atavism of an older ideal. 150 Around the hero everything becomes a tragedy, around the demi-god everything becomes a satyr play, and around God everything becomes—what? Perhaps a “world”?—

 151 Having a talent is not enough: one must also have your permission to have it —isn’t that so, my friends 152 “Where the tree of knowledge stands is always paradise”: that’s what the oldest and the most recent serpents declare. 153 What is done out of love always happens beyond good and evil. 154 Objection, evasion, cheerful mistrust, and love of mockery are indications of health: everything absolute belongs to pathology. 155 A sense of tragedy ebbs and flows with sensuality. 156 With individuals madness is something rare—but with groups, parties, peoples, and ages it’s the rule. 157 The thought of suicide is a strong consolation: with it people get through many a bad night. 158 Not only our reason but also our conscience submits to our strongest drive, the tyrant in us. 159 People must repay good and bad things, but why directly to the person who did good or bad things to us? 160 We no longer love our knowledge enough, once we have communicated it. 161 Poets are shameless about their experiences: they exploit them. 162 “Our neighbour [Nächster] is not our neighbour [Nachbar] but our neighbour’s neighbour”—that’s how every nation thinks.(5) 163 Love brings to light the high and the hidden characteristics of the person who loves—what is rare and exceptional about him: to that extent it easily misleads us about what is normal in him. 164 Jesus said to his Jews: “The law was for slaves—love God as I love him, as his son! What do we sons of God have to do with morality!” 165 Concerning every party: a shepherd always needs to have a bellwether—or he himself must from time to time be a wether. 166 People do lie with their mouths, but by the way they distort their mouths in doing so they nonetheless still speak the truth. 167 With hard people intimacy is shameful thing—and something precious. 168 Christianity gave Eros poison to drink—but he didn’t die from that. Instead he degenerated into a vice. 169 To talk a lot about oneself can also be a means of hiding oneself. 170 In praise there is more pushiness than in blame. 171 Pity in a man of knowledge seems almost laughable, like soft hands on a Cyclops.(6) 172 From love of humanity people sometimes embrace anyone (because they cannot embrace everyone): but that’s something they cannot reveal to this anyone. . . . 173 A man does not hate so long as his assessments are still low, but only when his assessments are equal or higher. 174 You utilitarians, even you love everything utile [useful] only as a cart to carry your inclinations—and don’t you really find the noise of its wheels unbearable? 175 Ultimately one loves one’s desire and not the object one desires. 176 The vanity of others goes against our taste only when it offends our vanity. 177 Concerning what “truthfulness” is, perhaps no one has yet been sufficiently truthful. 178 We do not believe in the foolishness of clever men: what a loss of human rights! 179 The consequences of our actions grab us by the hair, extremely indifferent to whether we have “improved” in the meantime. 180

There is an innocence in lying which indicates good faith in a cause. 181 It is inhuman to bless where one is cursed. 182 The familiarity of a superior person embitters, because it cannot be returned. 183 “What has shaken me is not that you lied to me but that I no longer believe you.”— 184 There is a high-spirited goodness which looks like malice. 185 “I dislike him.”—Why?—“I’m no match for him.”—Has a person ever answered in this way? NOTES (1) Nausikaa: a young princess in Homer’s Odyssey. [Back to Text] (2) Pharisaism: hypocritical observance of religious or moral laws. [Back to Text] (3) Nietzsche quotes the French: “Dans le véritable amour c’est l’âme, qui enveloppe le corps.” [Back to Text] (4) Franco Sacchetti (c. 1335-c.1400), Florentine writer. [Back to Text] (5) This enigmatic sentence seems to mean that our neighbour in a religious sense (“Love thy neighbour as thyself”) is not the person nearest to us (i.e., our literal neighbour) but rather the neighbour of someone else living close beside us. [Back to Text] (6) Cyclops: in Greek mythology a giant, one-eyed monster. [Back to Text]

=====
 === Part 5: On the Natural History of Morals
 =====

=== Friedrich Nietzsche BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL Translated by Ian Johnston, Vancouver Island University, Nanaimo, British Columbia, Canada
 Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text without permission and without charge. They may also freely edit the text for their own purposes. All commercial use of this translation, however, is forbidden without the permission of the translator. For comments and questions, please contact Ian Johnston. For a Rich Text Version (Word) of this text, please use the following link: [Beyond Good and Evil \[RTF\]](#) [Table of Contents for Beyond Good and Evil] PART FIVE A NATURAL HISTORY OF MORALS 186 Moral feeling in Europe is now just as refined, old, multifaceted, sensitive, and sophisticated as the “science of morality” associated with it is still young, amateurish, awkward, and fumbling:—an attractive contrast which now and then even becomes visibly incorporated in the person of a moralist. Even the phrase “science of morality” is, so far as what it designates is concerned, much too arrogant and contrary to good taste, which tends always to prefer more modest terms. We should in all seriousness admit to ourselves what we still need to do at this point and for a long time to come, the only thing that is justified at the moment, that is, to assemble materials, to organize conceptually and set in order an immense realm of delicate feelings of value and differences in values, which live, grow, reproduce, and die off—and, perhaps, to attempt to clarify the recurring and more frequent forms of these living crystallizations—as a preparation for a theory of types of morality. Naturally, so far we have not been so modest. As soon as philosophers busied themselves with morality as a science, they collectively have demanded from themselves, with a formal seriousness which makes one laugh, something very much higher, more ambitious, more solemn. They wanted a rational basis for morality—and every philosopher so far has believed that he has provided such a rational grounding. But morality itself has been considered something “given.” How distant from their stodgy pride lay that apparently unspectacular task, left in the dust and mould, of a description, although for that work the subtlest hands and senses could hardly be subtle enough! The very fact that moral philosophers had only a crude knowledge of the moral facta [facts], in an arbitrary selection or an accidental abbreviation, something like the morality of their surroundings, their class, their church, the spirit of their age, their climate and region of the world—the very fact that they were poorly educated and not even very curious with respect to peoples, ages, and past events—meant that they never confronted at all the essential problems of morality—all of which emerge only with a comparison of several moralities. In all the “science of morality” up to this point what is still lacking, odd as it may sound, is the problem of morality itself. What’s missing is the suspicion that here there may be something problematic. What philosophers have called a “rational grounding of morality” and demanded from themselves was, seen in the right light, only a scholarly version of good faith in the ruling morality, some new way of expressing it, and thus itself an element in the middle of a determined morality, even indeed, in the final analysis, a form of denial that this morality could be grasped as a problem—and, at any rate, the opposite of a test, analysis, questioning, or vivisection of this particular belief. Listen, for example, to how even Schopenhauer presents his own task with such an almost admirable innocence, and draw your own conclusions about the scientific nature of a “science” whose ultimate masters still talk like children and little old women: “The principle,” he says (on p. 136 of The Fundamental Problems of Morality), “the basic assumption whose meaning all ethicists are essentially in agreement about—neminem laede, immo omnes, quantum potes, juve [hurt no one, instead help everyone, as much as you can]—that is essentially the principle which all teachers of morality struggle to ground in reason . . . the essential foundation of ethics, which people have been seeking for thousands of years, like the philosophers’ stone.” The difficulty of rationally grounding the principle quoted above may, of course, be considerable—as we know, it’s not something even Schopenhauer was successful in doing—and whoever has once thoroughly understood just how tastelessly false and sentimental this principle is in a world whose essence is the will to power might like to recall that Schopenhauer, although a pessimist, actually—played the flute. . . . Every day, after his meal: just read his biographer on this point. And here’s an incidental question: a pessimist, a man who denies God and the world, who stops in front of morality—who says yes to morality, to the laede-neminem [hurt no one] morality, and blows his flute—How's that? Is that really—a pessimist? 187 Even apart from the value of such claims as "There is in us a categorical imperative," we can still always ask: What does such a claim express about the person making it? There are moralities which are intended to justify their creator before other people; other moralities are meant to calm him down and make him satisfied with himself; with others he wants to nail himself to the cross and humiliate himself; with others he wants to carry out revenge; with others to hide himself; with others to be transfigured and set himself above, high up and far away. This morality serves its originator so that he forgets; that morality so that he or something about him is forgotten; some moralists may want to exercise their power and creative moods on humanity, some others, perhaps even Kant as well, want us to understand with their morality: "What is respectable about me is that I can obey—and things should be no different for you than they are for me"—in short, moralities are also only a sign language of the feelings. 188 Every morality is—in contrast to laissez aller [letting go]—a part of tyranny against "nature," also against "reason": that is, however, not yet an objection to it. For to object, we would have to decree, once again on the basis of some morality or other, that no forms of tyranny and irrationality are permitted. The essential and invaluable part of every morality is that it is a lengthy compulsion: to understand Stoicism or Port Royal or Puritanism we should remember the compulsion under which every language so far has acquired strength and freedom—the metrical compulsion, the tyranny of rhyme and rhythm. In every people how much trouble poets and orators have made for themselves!—not excepting some contemporary prose writers in whose ears a relentless conscience dwells—"for the sake of some foolishness," as utilitarian fools say, who think that makes them clever, —"out of obsequiousness to arbitrary laws," as the anarchists say, who think that makes them "free," even free spirited.(1) The strange fact, however, is that everything there is or has been on earth to do with freedom, refinement, boldness, dance, and masterly certainty, whether it is in thinking itself, or in governing, or in speaking and persuading, in the arts just as much as in morals, has developed only thanks to the "tyranny of such arbitrary laws," and in all seriousness, the probability is not insignificant that it is precisely this that is "nature" and "natural"—and not that laissez aller! Every artist knows how far from the feeling of letting himself go his "most natural" condition is, the free ordering, setting, disposing, and shaping in moments of "inspiration"—and how strictly and subtly he obeys at that very moment the thousand-fold laws which make fun of all conceptual formulations precisely because of their hardness and decisiveness (even the firmest idea, by comparison, contains something fluctuating, multiple, ambiguous—). The essential thing "in heaven and on earth," so it appears, is, to make the point again, that there is obedience for a long time and in one direction: in the process eventually there comes and always has come something for whose sake living on earth is worthwhile, for example, virtue, art, virtue, music, dance, reason, spirituality—something or other transfiguring, subtle, fantastic, and divine. The long captivity of the spirit, the mistrustful compulsion in our ability to communicate our thoughts, the discipline which the thinker imposed on himself to think within the guiding principles of a church or court or with Aristotelian assumptions, the long spiritual will to interpret everything which happens according to a Christian scheme and to discover and justify the Christian god once again in every coincidence—all this powerful, arbitrary, hard, dreadful, anti-rational activity has turned out to be the means by which the European spirit has cultivated its strength, its reckless curiosity, and its subtle flexibility. Admittedly by the same token a great deal of irreplaceable force and spirit must have been overwhelmed in the process, crushed, and ruined as well (for here, as everywhere, “nature” reveals herself as she is, in her totally extravagant and indifferent magnificence, which is an outrage, but something noble). The fact that for thousands of years European thinkers only thought in order to prove something—nowadays, by contrast, we distrust any thinker who “wants to prove something”—and that for them what was to emerge as the result of their strictest thinking was always already clearly established, as in something like Asiatic astrology earlier or the harmless Christian moralistic interpretation of the most intimate personal experience “for the glory of God” or “for the salvation of the soul” still present today—this tyranny, this arbitrariness, this strict and grandiose stupidity, has trained the spirit. Apparently slavery is also, in the cruder and more refined sense, the indispensable means for disciplining and cultivating the spirit. We should examine every morality in the following way: “nature” in it is what teaches hatred of the laissez aller, of that all-too-great freedom, and what plants the need for limited horizons, for work close at hand—it teaches the narrowing of perspective and also, in a certain sense, stupidity as a condition of living and growth. “You are to obey someone or other and for a long time: otherwise you perish and lose final respect for yourself”—this seems to me to be the moral imperative of nature, which, of course, is neither “categorical,” as the old Kant wanted the imperative to be (hence the “otherwise”), nor directed at the individual (what does nature care about individuals?), but rather at peoples, races, ages, classes, but above all at the whole animal “man,” at the human being.

189 The industrious races complain a great deal about having to tolerate idleness: it was a masterpiece of the English instinct to make Sunday so holy and so tedious, a form of cleverly invented and shrewdly introduced fasting, that the Englishman, without being aware of the fact, became eager again for weekdays and workdays. Things like it are frequently seen also in the ancient world (even if, as is reasonable among southern people, not exactly connected to work—). There must be fasts of several kinds, and in every place where powerful impulses and habits rule, the lawgivers have to take care to insert extra days in the calendar in which such an impulse is placed in chains and learns once again to go hungry. Seen from a higher viewpoint, the periods when entire races and ages get afflicted with some moral fanaticism or other look like such inserted times of compulsion and fasting, during which an impulse learns to cower down and abase itself, but also to cleanse and sharpen itself. Individual philosophical sects (for example the Stoa in the midst of Hellenistic culture and its lecherous air heavy with aphrodisiac scents) permit this sort of interpretation as well.—And with this we are also given a hint for an explanation of that paradox why it was precisely in Europe's Christian period and, in general, only under the pressure of Christian value judgments that the sex drive sublimated itself into love (amour-passion [passionate love]).

190 There is something in Plato's morality which does not really belong to Plato, but is found in his philosophy, one might say, only in spite of Plato, namely, the Socratism for which Plato was essentially too noble. "No one wants to injure himself; thus, everything bad happens unwillingly. For the bad man inflicts damage on himself: he would not do that, if he knew that bad is bad. Thus, the bad man is bad only from error. If we take his error away from him, we necessarily make him—good." This sort of argument stinks of the rabble, which in the case of bad actions fixes its eyes only on the wretched consequences and really makes the judgment "It is stupid to act badly," while "good" it assumes without further thought is identical to "useful and agreeable." So far as every utilitarianism of morality is concerned, we may guess from the start that it had an origin like this and follow our noses: we will seldom go wrong.—Plato did everything to interpret something refined and noble in the proposition of his teacher, above all, himself—Plato, the most daring of all interpreters, took all of Socrates only like a popular tune and folk song from the alleys, in order to change it into infinite and impossible variations, that is, into all his own masks and multiplicities. To speak in jest—and one based on Homer: What is the Platonic Socrates if not prosthe Platon opithen te Platon messe te chimera [Plato in front, Plato behind, and in the middle the chimera]?(2)

191 The old theological problem of "believing" and "knowing"—or, to put the matter more clearly—of instinct and reason—and thus the question whether in assessing the value of things instinct deserves more authority than rationality, which wants to assess and act according to reasons, according to a "Why?"—according to expediency and utility—it is still that old moral problem, as it first appeared in the person of Socrates and had already divided minds long before Christianity. Socrates, in fact, with a taste for his talent—which was that of a superior dialectical thinker—set himself at first on the side of reason, and, in truth, what did he do his whole life long but laugh at the awkward inability of his noble Athenians, who were men of instinct, like all noble men, and who could never provide enough information about the reasons for their actions? Finally, however, in stillness and in secret he also laughed at himself. With his more subtle conscience and self-enquiry he found in himself the same difficulty and inability. But, he said to himself, why does that mean releasing oneself from the instincts! We must give the instincts and reason the proper help. We must follow the instincts but convince reason to assist in the process with good arguments. This was the real falsehood of that great ironist, so rich in secrets. He brought his conscience to the point where it was satisfied with a kind of trick played on itself. Socrates basically had seen through the irrational in moral judgments. Plato, who was more innocent in such things and without the mischievousness of a common man, wanted to use all his power—the greatest power which a philosopher up to that time had had at his command!—to prove that reason and instinct inherently move towards a single goal, towards the good, towards “god,” and since Plato all theologians and philosophers have been on the same road—that is, in things concerning morality up to now, instinct, or as the Christians call it, “faith,” or, as I call it, “the herd,” has triumphed. We must grant that Descartes is an exception, the father of rationalism (and thus the grandfather of the Revolution), a man who conferred sole authority on reason. But reason is only a tool, and Descartes was superficial.(3) 192

Anyone who has followed the history of a single science finds in its development a text-book case for understanding the oldest and commonest events in all “knowing and perceiving.” In the former, as in the latter, the rash hypotheses, the fabrications, the good, stupid will to “believe,” the lack of suspicion and patience develop first of all—our senses learn late and never learn completely to be subtle, true, and cautious organs of discovery. With a given stimulus, our eye finds it more comfortable to produce once more an image which has already been produced frequently than to capture something different and new in an impression. To do the latter requires more power, more “morality.” To listen to something new is disconcerting and hard on our ears; we hear strange music badly. When we hear some different language, we spontaneously try to reshape the sounds we hear into words which sound more familiar and native to us: that’s how, for example, in earlier times, when the German heard the word arcubalista he changed it into armbrust [arcubalista . . . armbrust: crossbow]. Something new also finds our senses hostile and reluctant, and generally, even with the “simplest” perceptual processes, the emotions—like fear, love, hate, as well as the passive feeling of idleness—are in control.—Just as a reader nowadays hardly reads all the individual words (let alone the syllables) on a page—he’s much more likely to take about five words out of twenty at random and “guess” on the basis of these five words the presumed sense they contain—so we hardly look at a tree precisely and completely, considering the leaves, branches, colour, and shape; we find it so very much easier to imagine an approximation of the tree. Even in the midst of the most unusual experiences we still act in the same way: we make up the greatest part of the experience for ourselves and are hardly ever compelled not to look upon any event as “inventors.” What all this adds up to is that basically from time immemorial we have been accustomed to lie. Or to express the matter more virtuously and hypocritically, in short, more pleasantly: we are much more the artist than we realize. In a lively conversation I often see in front of me the face of the person with whom I am speaking so clearly and subtly determined according to the idea which he expresses or which I think has been brought out in him that this degree of clarity far exceeds the power of my ability to see:—thus, the delicacy of the play of muscles and of the expression in his eyes must be something I have made up out of my own head. The person probably had a totally different expression or none at all. 193

Quidquid luce fuit, tenebris agit [What went on in the light, acts in the darkness], but the other way around as well. What we experience in a dream, provided we experience it frequently, finally is as much a part of the collective household of our souls as anything “truly” experienced. Thanks to this, we are richer or poorer, have one more need or one less, and finally in the bright light of day and even in the happiest moments of our waking spirit we are ordered around a little by the habits of our dreams. Suppose that an individual in his dreams has often flown and, finally, as soon as he dreams, becomes aware of the power and art of flying as his privilege and also as his own enviable happiness; such a man who believes he is capable of realizing every kind of curving or angled flight with the easiest impulse, who knows the feeling of a certain godlike carelessness, an “upward” without tension and compulsion, a “downward” without condescension and without humiliation—without gravity!—how should a man with such dream experiences and dream habits not also finally discover in his waking day that the word “happiness” has a different colour and definition! How could he not desire happiness in different way? “Soaring upward,” as described by poets, for him must be, in comparison with that “flying,” too earthbound, too muscular, too forceful, even too “heavy.” 194 The difference between men does not manifest itself only in the difference between the tables of the goods they possess, in other words, only in the fact that they consider different goods worth striving for and are at odds among themselves about what is more or less valuable, about the rank ordering of the commonly acknowledged goods—the difference becomes even clearer in what counts for them as really having and possessing something good. So far as a woman is concerned, for example, a more modest man considers having her body at his disposal and sexual gratification a satisfactory and sufficient sign of having, of possession. Another man, with his more suspicious and more discriminating thirst for possessions sees the “question mark,” the fact that such a possession is only apparent, and wants a more refined test, above all, to know whether the woman not only gives herself to him but also for his sake gives up what she has or would like to have. Only then does he consider her

“possessed.” A third man, however, is at this point still not finished with his suspicion and desire to possess. He asks himself if the woman, when she gives up everything for him, is not perhaps doing this for a phantom of himself: he wants to be well known first, fundamentally, even profoundly, in order to be able to be loved at all. He dares to allow himself to be revealed.—Only then does he feel that the loved one is fully in his possession, when she is no longer deceived about him, when she loves him just as much for his devilry and hidden insatiability as for his kindness, patience, and spirituality. One man wants to possess a people: and all the higher arts of Cagliostro and Catiline he thinks appropriate for this purpose.(4) Another, with a more refined thirst for possession, tells himself “One is not entitled to deceive where one wants to possess.”—He is irritated and impatient at the idea that a mask of him rules the hearts of his people: “Hence I must let myself be known and, first of all, learn about myself!” Among helpful and charitable people we find almost routinely that crude hypocrisy which first prepares the person who is to be helped, as if, for example, he “earns” help, wants precisely their help, and would show himself deeply thankful, devoted, and obsequious to them for all their help—with these fantasies they dispose of the needy as if they are property, as if they are, in general, charitable and helpful people out of a demand for property. We find them jealous if we cross them or anticipate them in their helping. Parents unwittingly make their child into something that resembles them—they call it “an upbringing”—no mother doubts at the bottom of her heart that with a child she has given birth to a possession; no father denies himself the right to be allowed to subjugate the child to his ideas and values. In fact, in earlier times it seemed proper for fathers to dispose of the life and death of newborns at their own discretion (as among the ancient Germans). And like the father, even today the teacher, the class, the priest, and the prince still see in each new human being a harmless opportunity for a new possession. And from that follows . . . 195 The Jews—a people “born for slavery,” as Tacitus and the entire ancient world say, “the chosen people among nations,” as they themselves say and believe—the Jews achieved the amazing feat of inverting values, thanks to which life on earth for two millennia has possessed a new and dangerous appeal.(5) Their prophets fused “rich,” “godless,” “evil,” “violent,” and “sensuous” into a unity and for the first time coined the word “world” as a word connoting shame. In this inversion of values (to which belongs the use of the word for “poor” as a synonym for “holy” and “friend”) lies the significance of the Jewish people: with them begins the slave rebellion in morality. 196 We can conclude that there are countless dark bodies in the region of the sun—bodies we will never see. Between us, that’s a parable, and a psychologist of morality reads the entire writing in the stars only as a language of parable and signs, something that allows a great deal to remain concealed. 197 We fundamentally misunderstand predatory animals and predatory men (for example, Cesare Borgia), and we misunderstand “Nature,” so long as we still look for a “pathology” at the bottom of these healthiest of all tropical monsters and growths or even for some “Hell” born in them—as almost all moralists so far have done.(6) Among moralists does it not appear that there is hatred for the primeval forest and the tropics? And that the “tropical man” must at any price be discredited, whether as a sickness and degeneration of human beings or as his own hell and self-torture? But why? For the benefit of the “temperate zones”? For the benefit of the temperate human beings? For the “moral human beings”? For the mediocre? This for the chapter “morality as timidity.” 198 All these moralities that direct themselves at the individual person, for the sake of his “happiness,” as people say—what are they except proposals about conduct in relation to the degree of danger in which the individual person lives with himself, recipes against his passions, his good and bad inclinations, to the extent that they have a will to power and would like to play the master; small and great clever sayings and affectations, afflicted with the musty enclosed smell of ancient household remedies or old women’s wisdom, all baroque and unreasonable in form—because they direct themselves to “all,” because they generalize where we should not generalize—all speaking absolutely, taking themselves absolutely, all spiced with more than one grain of salt, and much more bearable, sometimes even seductive, when they learn to smell over-seasoned and dangerous, above all “of the other world.” By any intellectual standard, all that is worth little and still a far cry from “science,” to say nothing of “wisdom,” but, to say it again and to say it three times: prudence, prudence, prudence, mixed in with stupidity, stupidity, stupidity—whether it is now that indifference and coldness of an ornamental column against the hot-headed foolishness of the emotions, which the Stoics recommended and applied as a cure; or even that no-more-laughing and no-more-crying of Spinoza, his excessively naive support for the destruction of the emotions through analysis and vivisection; or that repression of the emotions to a harmless mean, according to which they should be satisfied, the Aristotelianism of morality; even morality as the enjoyment of emotions in a deliberate dilution and spiritualization through artistic symbolism, something like music or the love of God and love of man for the sake of God—for in religion the passions have civil rights once more, provided that . . . ; finally even that accommodating and wanton dedication to the emotions, as Hafis and Goethe taught, that daring permission to let go of the reins, that physical-spiritual licentia morum [moral licentiousness] in the exceptional examples of wise old owls and drunkards, for whom it “has little danger anymore.”(7) This also for the chapter “morality as timidity.” 199 Given that at all times, as long as there have been human beings, there have also been herds of human beings (racial groups, communities, tribes, peoples, states, churches) and always a great many followers in relation to the small number of those issuing orders—and taking into consideration also that so far nothing has been better and longer practised and cultivated among human beings than obedience, we can reasonably assume that typically now the need for obedience is inborn in each individual, as a sort of formal conscience that states “You are to do something or other without conditions, and leave aside something else without conditions,” in short, “Thou shalt.” This need seeks to satisfy itself and to fill its form with some content. Depending on its strength, impatience, and tension, it seizes on something, without being very particular, like a coarse appetite, and accepts what someone or other issuing commands—parents, teachers, laws, class biases, public opinion—shouts in people’s ears. The curious limitation of human development—the way it hesitates, takes so long, often regresses, and turns around on itself—is based on the fact that the herd instinct of obedience is passed on best and at the expense of the art of commanding. If we imagine this instinct at some point striding right to its ultimate excess, then there would finally be a total lack of commanders and independent people, or they would suffer inside from a bad conscience and find it necessary first to prepare a deception for themselves in order to be able to command, as if they, too, were only obeying orders. This condition is what, in fact, exists nowadays in Europe: I call it the moral hypocrisy of those in command. They do not know how to protect themselves from their bad conscience except by behaving as if they were carrying out older or higher orders (from ancestors, the constitution, rights, law, or even God), or they even borrow herd maxims from the herd way of thinking, for example, as “the first servant of their people” or as “tools of the common good.” On the other hand, the herd man in Europe today makes himself appear as if he is the single kind of human being allowed, and he glorifies those characteristics of his thanks to which he is tame, easy going, and useful to the herd, as the really human virtues, that is, public spiritedness, benevolence, consideration, diligence, moderation, modesty, forbearance, and pity. For those cases, however, where people believe they cannot do without a leader and bellwether, nowadays they make attempt after attempt to replace the commander by adding together collections of clever herd people. All the representative constitutional assemblies, for example, have this origin. But for all that, what a blissful relief for these European herd animals, what a release from a pressure which is growing unbearable is the appearance of an absolute commander. The effect which the appearance of Napoleon made was the most recent major evidence for that:—the history of the effect of Napoleon is almost the history of the higher happiness which this entire century derived from its most valuable men and moments. 200 The man from an age of dissolution, which mixes the races all together, such a man has an inheritance of a multiple ancestry in his body, that is, conflicting and frequently not merely conflicting drives and standards of value, which war among themselves and rarely give each other rest

—such a man of late culture and broken lights will typically be a weaker man. His most basic demand is that the war which constitutes him should finally end. Happiness seems to him, in accordance with a calming medicine and way of thinking (for example, Epicurean or Christian), principally as the happiness of resting, of having no interruptions, of surfeit, of the final unity, as the “Sabbath of Sabbaths,” to use the words of the saintly rhetorician Augustine, who was himself such a man. But if the opposition and war in such a nature work like one more charm and thrill in life—and if, on the other hand, in addition to that nature’s powerful and irreconcilable drives it has also inherited and cultivated a real mastery and refinement in waging war with itself—in other words, controlling and outwitting the self, then arise those delightfully amazing and inexplicable people, those enigmatic men predestined for victory and seduction, whose most beautiful expressions are Alcibiades and Caesar (—in their company I’d like to place the first European, according to my taste, the Hohenstaufen Frederick II), and, among artists, perhaps Leonardo da Vinci.(8) They appear in precisely the same ages when that weaker type, with its demands for quiet, steps into the foreground: both types belong with one another and arise from the same causes. 201 As long as the utility which rules in moral value judgments is merely the utility of the herd, as long as our gaze is directed only at the preservation of the community and we look for what is immoral precisely and exclusively in what appears dangerous to the survival of the community, there can be no “morality of loving one’s neighbour.” Assuming there already exists in society a constant small habit of consideration, pity, fairness, kindness, and mutual assistance, assuming also that in this condition of society all those drives are already active which are later described with honourable names as “virtues” and which finally are almost synonymous with the idea “morality,” at that time they are not at all yet in the realm of moral value judgments—they are still outside morality. For example, a compassionate action in the best Roman period was called neither good nor evil, neither moral nor immoral. And even if it was praised, this praise brought with it at best still a kind of resentful disdain, as soon as it was compared with some action which served the demands of the totality, of the res publica [republic]. Ultimately the “love of one’s neighbour” is always something of secondary importance, partly conventional, arbitrary, and apparent, in relation to fear of one’s neighbour. After the structure of society in its entirety is established and seems secure against external dangers, it is this fear of one’s neighbour which creates once again new perspectives of moral value judgments. Certain strong and dangerous instincts, like a love of enterprise, daring, desire for revenge, shiftiness, rapacity, and thirst for power, which up to this point not only were honoured as useful to the community, under different names, of course, from those just chosen here, but had to be powerfully inculcated and cultivated (because people constantly needed them to cope with the dangers to the totality, against the enemies of that totality)—these are now experienced as doubly dangerous—now that there is a lack of diversionary channels for them—and they are gradually abandoned, slandered, and branded as immoral. Now the opposing impulses and inclinations acquire moral honour. The herd instinct draws its conclusions, step by step. How much or how little something is dangerous to the community, dangerous to equality, in an opinion, in a condition and emotion, in a will, in a talent, that is now the moral perspective. Here also fear is once again the mother of morality. When the highest and strongest drives break out passionately and impel the individual far above and beyond the average and low level of the herd's conscience, the feeling of commonality in the community is destroyed; its belief in itself, its spine, as it were, breaks: as a result people brand these very drives and slander them most of all. The high independent spirituality, the will to stand alone, even powerful reasoning, are experienced as a danger. Everything which lifts the individual up over the herd and creates fear in his neighbour from now on is called evil. The proper, modest, conforming faith in equality, the happy medium in desires—these acquire honorable moral names. Finally, under very peaceful conditions, there is an increasing lack of opportunity and need to educate the feelings in strength and hardness. Now every severity, even in justice, begins to disrupt the conscience. A high and stern nobility and self-responsibility is almost an insult and awakens mistrust; “the lamb” and even more “the sheep” gain respect. There is a point of morbid decay and decadence in the history of society when it itself takes sides on behalf of the person who harms it, the criminal, and does so, in fact, seriously and honestly. Punishment: that seems to society somehow or other unreasonable. What's certain is that the idea of “punishment” and “We should punish” causes it distress, makes it afraid. “Is it not enough to make him un-dangerous? Why punish him as well? To punish is itself dreadful!”—with this question the morality of the herd, the morality of timidity, draws its final conclusion. Assuming people could, in general, do away with the danger, the basis of the fear, then people would have done away with this morality as well: it would no longer be necessary; it would no longer consider itself necessary! Whoever examines the conscience of the contemporary European will always have to pull out from the thousand moral folds and hiding places the same imperative, the imperative of the timidity of the herd: “Our wish is that at some point or other there is nothing more to fear(T)!” At some point or other—nowadays everywhere in Europe the will as well as the way to that point is called “progress.” 202 Let us state right away one more time what we have already said a hundred times, for today's ears don't listen willingly to such truths—to our truths. We know well enough how insulting it sounds when an individual reckons human beings in general plainly and simply and unmetaphorically among the animals, but one thing will make people consider us almost guilty, the fact that, so far as men of “modern ideas” are concerned, we constantly use the terms “herd,” “herd instincts,” and the like. What is the point of that? We cannot do anything else: for precisely here lies our new insight. We have found that in all major moral judgments Europe, together with those countries where Europe’s influence dominates, has become unanimous. People in Europe evidently know what Socrates thought he did not know and what that famous old snake once promised to teach—today people “know” what good and evil are. Now, it must sound harsh and be hard on their ears when we keep claiming all the time that what here thinks it knows, what here glorifies itself with its praise and censure and calls itself good, is the instinct of the herd animal man, which has managed to break through, overpower, and dominate other instincts and continues increasingly to do so, in accordance with the growing physiological assimilation and homogeneity, whose symptom it is. Morality today in Europe is the morality of the herd animal—thus only, as we understand the matter, one kind of human morality, alongside which, before which, and after which there are many other possible moralities, above all higher ones, or there should be. Against such a “possibility,” in opposition to such a “should be,” however, this morality defends itself with all its forces: it says stubbornly and relentlessly, “I am morality itself, and nothing outside me is moral”—in fact, with the help of a religion which indulged and catered to the most sublime desires of the herd animal, it has reached the point where we find even in the political and social arrangements an ever more visible expression of this morality: the democratic movement has come into the inheritance of the Christian movement. But the fact is that its tempo is still much too slow and drowsy for the impatient, the sick, and those addicted to the above-mentioned instinct—evidence for that comes from the wailing, which grows constantly more violent, the increasingly open snarling fangs of the anarchist hounds who now swarm through the alleys of European culture, apparently in contrast to the peacefully industrious democrats and ideologues of the revolution, even more to the foolish pseudo-philosophers and those ecstatic about brotherhood, who call themselves socialists and want a “free society.” But in reality these anarchists are at one with all of them in their fundamental and instinctive hostility to every form of society other than one of the autonomous herd (all the way to the rejection of the very ideas of “master” and “servant”—ni dieu ni maître [neither god nor master] is the way one socialist formula goes—); at one in their strong resistance against all special claims, all special rights and privileges (that means, in the last analysis, against every right, for when all people are equal, then no one needs “rights” any longer—); at one in their mistrust of a justice which punishes (as if it were a violation of the weaker people, a wrong against the necessary consequence of all earlier society—); and equally at one in the religion of pity, in their sympathy for whatever merely feels, lives, or suffers (right down to the animals, right up to “God”):— the excessive outpouring of “suffering vicariously with God” belongs to a democratic age—); at one collectively in their cries for and impatience in their pity, in their deadly hatred of suffering generally, in their almost feminine inability to stand there as spectators, to let suffering happen; at one in their involuntary gloom and softness, under whose spell Europe seems threatened by a new Buddhism; at one in their faith in the morality of mutual pity, as if that were morality in and of itself, as the height, the attained height of humanity, the sole hope of the future, a consolation for those now alive, the great absolution from all guilt of earlier times;—altogether at one in their belief in the community as the saviour, thus in the herd, in “themselves” . . . 203 We, the ones with a different belief—we, who consider the democratic movement not merely a degenerate form of political organization but a degenerate form of humanity, that is, something that diminishes humanity, makes it mediocre and of lesser worth, where do we have to reach out to with our hopes? There is no choice: we must reach for new philosophers, for spirits strong and original enough to provide the impetus for an opposing way of estimating value and to re-evaluate and invert “eternal values,” for those sent out as forerunners, for men of the future who at the present time establish the compulsion and the knot that forces the will of millennia into new paths. To teach man the future of humanity as his will, as dependent on a man’s will, and to prepare for great exploits and comprehensive attempts at discipline and cultivation, so as to put an end to that horrifying domination of nonsense and contingency which up to now has been called “history”—the nonsense of the “greatest number” is only its latest form:—for that a new type of philosophers and commanders will at some point be necessary, whose image will make all hidden, fearsome, and benevolent spirits on earth appear pale and dwarfish. The image of such leaders is what hovers before our eyes:—may I say that out loud, you free spirits? The conditions which we must partly create and partly exploit for the origin of these leaders, the presumed ways and trials thanks to which a soul might grow to such height and power to feel the compulsion for these tasks, a revaluation of values under whose new pressure and hammer a conscience would be hardened, a heart transformed to bronze, so that it might endure the weight of such responsibility and, on the other hand, the necessity for such leaders, the terrifying danger that they might not appear or could fail and degenerate—these are our real worries, the things that make us gloomy. Do you know that, you free spirits? These are the heavy, distant thoughts and thunderstorms which pass over the heaven of our life. There are few pains as severe as having once seen, guessed, and felt how an extraordinary man has gone astray and degenerated, but someone who has the rare eye for the overall danger that “man” himself is degenerating, someone who, like us, has recognized the monstrous accident which has played its game up to this point with respect to the future of humanity—a game in which there was no hand, not even a “finger of god,” playing along!—someone who divines the fate which lies hidden in the idiotic innocence and the blissful trust in “modern ideas,” and even more in the entire Christian-European morality, such a man suffers from an anxiety which cannot be compared with any other—with one look, in fact, he grasps everything that still might be cultivated in man, given a favourable combination and increase of powers and tasks; he knows with all the knowledge of his conscience how the greatest possibilities for man have not yet been exhausted and how often the type man has already stood up to mysterious decisions and new paths:—he knows even better, from his own most painful memory, what wretched things have so far usually broken apart a developing being of the highest rank, shattered him, sunk him, and made him pathetic. The overall degeneration of man, down to what nowadays shows up in the socialist fools and flat heads, as their “man of the future”—as their ideal!—this degeneration and diminution of man to a perfect herd animal (or, as they say, to a man of “free society”), this beastialization of man into a dwarf animal of equal rights and claims is possible—no doubt of that! Anyone who has once thought this possibility through to its conclusion understands one more horror than other people do—and perhaps a new task, as well! . . .

NOTES (1) Stoicism: a Greek school of philosophy from the third century BC. It stressed the importance of overcoming one’s destructive emotions; Port Royal: a convent which became the centre of Jansenism, a challenge within the Catholic Church in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. [Back to Text] (2) The Greek alphabet in Nietzsche’s phrase (προσθε Πλατων οπιθεν Πλεσση τε Χιμαιρα) has here been transliterated into the Roman alphabet; Chimera: a fabulous Greek monster, with the head of a lion, the mid-section of a goat, and a dragon’s tail. [Back to Text] (3) René Descartes (1596-1650), French philosopher and mathematician, one of the most important figures in the development of modern science and philosophy. [Back to Text] (4) Cagliostro (1743-1795), a notorious Italian fraud; Catiline: Lucius Sergius Catilina (108-62 BC), a contemporary of Julius Caesar, famous as a devious political conspirator. [Back to Text] (5) Publius Cornelius Tacitus (56-117), famous Roman historian. [Back to Text] (6) Cesare Borgia (1475-1507), Italian statesman and general well known for his ruthlessness and duplicity. [Back to Text] (7) Johann Wolfgang von Goethe: German’s greatest literary figure; Hafiz (c. 1325-1389), Persian poet and theologian. [Back to Text] (8) Alcibiades: (450-404 BC), charismatic Athenian politician and general; Julius Caesar (100-44 BC), prominent Roman politician and general; Frederick II (1194-1250), Holy Roman Emperor of the Hohenstaufen dynasty, an extraordinarily gifted and powerful medieval figure; Leonardo da Vinci (1452-1519), an Italian painter, engineer, and inventor, one of the most amazing geniuses of the Renaissance. [Back to Text]

=====

=== Part 6: We Scholars

=====

=== Friedrich Nietzsche BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL Translated by Ian Johnston, Vancouver Island University, Nanaimo, British Columbia, Canada

Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text without permission and without charge. They may also freely edit the text for their own purposes. All commercial use of this translation, however, is forbidden without the permission of the translator. For comments and questions, please contact Ian Johnston. For a Rich Text Version (Word) of this text, please use the following link: [Beyond Good and Evil \[RTF\]](#) [Table of Contents for Beyond Good and Evil] PART SIX WE SCHOLARS 204

At the risk that moralizing here also shows itself to be what it always has been—that is, an unabashed montrer ses plaies [display of one’s wounds], as Balzac says—I’d like to dare to stand up against an unreasonable and harmful shift in rank ordering that nowadays, quite unnoticed and as if with the clearest conscience, threatens to establish itself between science and philosophy. I think that on the basis of our experience—experience means, as I see it, always bad experience?—we must have a right to discuss such a higher question of rank, so that we do not speak like blind people about colour or as women and artists do against science (“Oh, this nasty science!” their instinct and embarrassment sigh, “it always finds out what’s behind things”—). The declaration of independence of the scientific man, his emancipation from philosophy, is one of the subtler effects of the nature of and the trouble with democracy: today the self-glorification and self-exaltation of the scholar stand everywhere in full bloom and their finest spring—but that is still not intended to mean that in this case self-praise smells very nice. “Away with all masters!”—that’s what the instinct of the rabble wants here, too, and now that science has enjoyed its happiest success in pushing away theology, whose “handmaiden” it was for too long, it has the high spirits and stupidity to set about making laws for philosophy and to take its turn playing the “master” for once—what am I saying?—playing the philosopher. My memory—the memory of a scientific man, if you’ll permit me to say so!—is filled to bursting with the naïveté I have heard in arrogant remarks about philosophy and philosophers from young natural scientists and old doctors (not to mention from the most educated and most conceited of all scholars, the philologists and schoolmen, who are both of these thanks to their profession—). Sometimes it was a specialist and idler who in general instinctively resisted all synthetic tasks and capabilities; sometimes the industrious worker who had taken a whiff of the otium [leisure] and of the noble opulence within the spiritual household of the philosopher and, as he did so, felt himself restricted and diminished. Sometimes it was that colour blindness of the utilitarian man, who sees nothing in philosophy other than a series of refuted systems and an extravagant expense from which no one “receives any benefit.” Sometimes fear of disguised mysticism and of an adjustment to the boundaries of knowledge sprang up; sometimes the contempt for particular philosophers, which had unwittingly been generalized into a contempt for philosophy. Finally, among young scholars I most frequently found behind the arrogant belittlement of philosophy the pernicious effect of a philosopher himself, a man whom they had, in fact, generally ceased to follow, but without escaping the spell of his value judgments dismissing other philosophers—something which brought about a collective irritation with all philosophy. (For example, Schopenhauer’s effect on the most modern Germany seems to me to be something like this: with his unintelligent anger against Hegel he created a situation in which the entire last generation of Germans broke away from their connection to German culture, and this culture, all things well considered, was a high point in and a prophetic refinement of the historical sense.(1) But Schopenhauer himself in this very matter was impoverished to the point of genius—unreceptive and un-German.) From a general point of view and broadly speaking, it may well have been, more than anything else, the human, all-too-human nature of the more recent philosophers themselves, in a word, their paltry spirit, which has most fundamentally damaged respect for philosophy and opened the gates to the instincts of the rabble. We should nonetheless acknowledge the extent to which the whole style of Heraclitus, Plato, Empedocles, and of whatever all those royal and splendid hermits of the spirit were called is absent from our modern world and how, given the sort of representatives of philosophy who nowadays, thanks to fashion, are just as much on top as at the bottom—in Germany, for example, the two lions of Berlin, the anarchist Eugen Dühring and the amalgamist Eduard von Hartmann—an honest man of science is entitled to feel that he is justifiably of a better sort, with a better descent. In particular, the sight of these mishmash philosophers who call themselves “reality philosophers” or “positivists” is capable of casting a dangerous mistrust into the soul of an ambitious young scholar: they are, in the best of cases, scholars and specialists themselves—that’s clear enough—they have been, in fact, collectively defeated and brought back under the rule of science.(2) At some time or other they wanted more from themselves, without having any right to this “more” and to its responsibilities—and now, in word and deed, they represent in a respectable, angry, vengeful way the lack of faith [den Unglauben] in the ruling task and masterfulness of philosophy. But finally—how could it be anything different? Science nowadays is in bloom, its face is filled with good conscience, while what all recent philosophy has gradually sunk to—this remnant of philosophy today—is busy generating suspicion and ill humour against itself, if not mockery and pity. Philosophy reduced to “theory of knowledge” is, in fact, nothing more than a tentative epochism [Epochistik] and a doctrine of abstinence: a philosophy which does not venture one step over the threshold and painstakingly denies itself the right to enter—that is philosophy at death’s door, an end, an agony, something pitiful! How could such a philosophy—rule!(3) 205 To tell the truth, there are so many varied dangers for the development of a philosopher today that we may well doubt whether this fruit can, in general, still grow ripe. The scope and the tower-building of the sciences have grown into something monstrous, and with these the probability that the philosopher has already grown tired while he is still learning or lets himself stop somewhere and “specialize,” so that he no longer reaches his full height, that is, high enough for an overview, for looking round, for looking down. Or else he reaches that point too late, when his best time and power are already over, or have become damaged, coarsened, and degenerate, so that his glance, his comprehensive value judgment, means little any more. The very refinement of his intellectual conscience perhaps allows him to hesitate along the way and to delay. He is afraid of being seduced into being a dilettante, a millipede, something with a thousand antennae. He knows too well that a man who has lost respect for himself may no longer give orders as a man of knowledge, may no longer lead. At that point, he would have to be willing to become a great actor, a philosophical Cagliostro and spiritual Pied Piper, in short, a seducer. In the end it’s a question of taste, even if it were not a question of conscience. Moreover, by way of doubling once again the difficulty for the philosopher, it comes to this: he demands from himself a judgment, a Yes or No, not about the sciences but about life and the value of living—he learns with reluctance to believe that he has a right or even a duty to make this judgment and that must seek his own path to that right and that belief only through the most extensive—perhaps the most disturbing, the most destructive—experiences, often hesitating, doubting, and saying nothing. As a matter of fact, the masses have for a long time mistaken and misidentified the philosopher, whether with the man of science and ideal scholar, or with the religiously elevated, desensualized, “unworldly” enthusiast drunk on God. If we hear anyone at all praised nowadays on the ground that he lives “wisely” or “like a philosopher,” that means almost nothing other than “prudently and on the sidelines.” Wisdom: that seems to the rabble to be some kind of escape, a means and a trick to pull oneself well out of a nasty game. But the real philosopher—as we see it, my friends?—lives “unphilosophically” and “unwisely,” above all imprudently, and feels the burden and the duty of a hundred attempts and temptations of life—he always puts himself at risk. He plays the wicked game. . . . 206 In comparison with a genius, that is, with a being who either engenders or gives birth, taking both words in their highest sense—the scholar, the average scientific man, always has something of the old maid about him, for, like the old maid, he does not understand the two most valuable things men do. In fact, for both scholars and old maids we concede, as if by way of compensation, that they are respectable—in their cases we stress respectability—and yet having to make this concession gives us the same sense of irritation. Let's look more closely: What is the scientific man? To begin with, a man who is not a noble type. He has the virtues of a man who is not distinguished, that is, a type of person who is not a ruler, not authoritative, and also not self-sufficient. He has diligence, a patient endorsement of his position and rank, equanimity about and moderation in his abilities and needs. He has an instinct for people like him and for what people like him require, for example, that bit of independence and green meadows without which there is no peace in work, that demand for honour and acknowledgement (which assumes, first and foremost, recognition and the ability to be recognized—), that sunshine of a good name, that constant stamp of approval of his value and his utility, which is necessary to overcome again and again the inner suspicion at the bottom of the hearts of all dependent men and herd animals. The scholar also has, as stands to reason, the illnesses and bad habits of a non-noble type: he is full of petty jealousy and has a lynx eye for what is base in those natures whose heights are impossible for him to reach. He is trusting, but only as an individual who lets himself go but does not let himself flow. Before a person who is like a great stream he just stands there all the colder and more enclosed—his eye is then like a smooth, reluctant lake in which there is no longer any ripple of delight or sympathy. The worst and most dangerous thing of which a scholar is capable he gets from his instinctive sense of the mediocrity of his type, of that Jesuitical mediocrity, which spontaneously works for the destruction of the uncommon man and seeks to break every arched bow or—even better!—to relax it. That is, to unbend it, with consideration, of course, naturally with a flattering hand—to unbend it with trusting sympathy: that is the essential art of Jesuitism, which has always understood how to introduce itself as a religion of pity.— 207 No matter how gratefully we may accommodate ourselves to the objective spirit—and who has never been sick to death of everything subjective and its damnable ipsissimosity [references to itself]!—we must ultimately also learn caution concerning this gratitude and stop the exaggeration with which in recent years we have celebrated the depersonalizing of the spirit, emptying the self from the spirit, as if that were the goal in itself, redemption and transfiguration.(4) That's what tends to happen, for example, in the pessimism school, which, for its part, has good reasons for awarding highest honour to “disinterested knowledge.” The objective man who no longer curses and grumbles like the pessimist, the ideal scholar, in whom the scientific instinct, after thousands of total and partial failures, all of a sudden comes into bloom and blossoms fully, is surely one of the most precious implements there are, but he belongs in the hands of someone more powerful. He is only a tool, we say. He is a mirror—he is no “end in himself.” The objective man is, in fact, a mirror: accustomed to submit before everything that wishes to be known, without any delight other than that available in knowing and “mirroring back”—he waits until something comes along and then spreads himself out tenderly so that even light footsteps and the spiritual essences slipping past are not lost on his surface and skin. What is still left of his “person” seems to him accidental, often a matter of chance, even more often disruptive, so completely has he himself become a conduit and reflection for strange shapes and events. He reflects about “himself” with effort and is not infrequently wrong. He readily gets himself confused with others. He makes mistakes concerning his own needs, and it is only here that he is coarse and careless. Perhaps he gets anxious about his health or about the pettiness and stifling atmosphere of wife and friends or about the lack of companions and society—indeed, he forces himself to think about his anxieties: but it’s no use! His thoughts have already wandered off to some more general example, and tomorrow he knows as little as he knew yesterday about how he might be helped. He has lost seriousness for himself—as well as time. He is cheerful, not from any lack of needs, but from a lack of fingers and handles for his own needs. His habitual concessions concerning all things and all experiences, the sunny and uninhibited hospitality with which he accepts everything which runs into him, his kind of thoughtless good will and dangerous lack of concern about Yes and No—alas, there are enough cases where he must atone for these virtues of his!—and as a human being he generally becomes far too easily the caput mortuum [worthless residue] of these virtues. If people want love and hate from him—I mean love and hate the way God, women, and animals understand them—he’ll do what he can and give what he can. But we should not be amazed when it doesn’t amount to much—when he reveals himself in these very matters as inauthentic, fragile, questionable, and rotten. His love is forced, his hate artificial, more a tour de force, a tiny vanity and exaggeration. He is genuine only as long as he is permitted to be objective: only in his cheerful comprehensiveness [Totalismus] is he still “nature” and “natural.” His mirror soul, always smoothing itself out, no longer knows how to affirm or deny. He does not command, and he does not destroy. “Je ne méprise presque rien” [There is almost nothing I despise]—he says with Leibnitz: we should not fail to hear and underestimate that presque [almost]!(5) Moreover, he is no model human being. He does not go ahead of anyone or behind. He places himself in general too far away to have a reason to take sides between good and evil. When people confused him for such a long time with the philosopher, with the Caesar-like breeder and powerhouses [Gewaltmenschen] of culture, they held him in much too high honour and overlooked the most essential thing about him—he is an instrument, something of a slave, although certainly the most sublime form of slave, but in himself nothing—presque rien [almost nothing]! The objective man is an instrument, an expensive, easily damaged and blunted tool for measurement and an artful arrangement of mirrors, something we should take care of and respect.

But he is no goal, no way out or upward, no complementary human being in whom the rest of existence is justified, no conclusion—and even less a beginning, a procreation and first cause. He is nothing strong, powerful, self-assured, something that wants to be master. He is much rather merely a delicate, inflated, sensitive, and flexible pot for forms, which must first wait for some content and meaning or other, in order to “give itself a shape” consistent with it—usually a man without form and content, a “selfless” man. And thus also nothing for women, in parenthesi [in parenthesis].— 208 When a philosopher nowadays lets us know he is not a sceptic—I hope people have sensed this from the description of the objective spirit immediately above?—the whole world is unhappy to hear it. People look at him with some awe and would like to ask so much, to question . . . in fact, among timid listeners—and there are hordes of them today—from that point on he is considered dangerous. For them it is as if in his rejection of scepticism they heard coming from far away some evil threatening noise, as if a new explosive was being tested somewhere, spiritual dynamite, perhaps a newly discovered Russian nihilin, a pessimism bonae voluntatis [of good will], which does not merely say No and will No but—terrible to imagine!—acts No!(6) Against this form of “good will”—a will to a truly active denial of life—there is today, by general agreement, no better sleeping pill and sedative than scepticism, the peaceful, gentle, soporific poppy of scepticism, and even Hamlet is prescribed these days by contemporary doctors against the “spirit” and its underground rumblings. “Aren’t people’s ears all full enough already of wicked noises?” says the sceptic, as a friend of peace and quiet, almost as a sort of security police: “This subterranean No is terrifying! Be quiet at last, you pessimistic moles!” For the sceptic, this tender creature, is frightened all too easily. His conscience has been trained to twitch with every No, even with a hard, decisive Yes—to respond as if it had been bitten. Yes! And No!—that contradicts his morality. Conversely, he loves to celebrate his virtue with a noble abstinence, perhaps by saying with Montaigne, “What do I know?”(7) Or with Socrates, “I know that I know nothing.” Or “Here I do not trust myself. There is no door open to me here.” Or “Suppose the door was open, why go in right away?” Or “What use are all rash hypotheses? Not to make any hypotheses at all could easily be part of good taste. Must you be so keen immediately to straighten something crooked? Or to stop up every hole with some piece of oakum? Isn’t there time for that? Doesn’t time have time? O you devilish fellows, can’t you wait, even for a bit? What is unknown also has its attraction—the Sphinx is a Circe, too, and Circe also was a philosopher.”(8) In this way a sceptic consoles himself, and he certainly needs some consolation. For scepticism is the most spiritual expression of a certain multifaceted physiological condition which in everyday language is called weak nerves and infirmity. It occurs every time races or classes which have been separated from each other a long time suddenly and decisively cross breed. In the new generation, which has inherited in its blood, as it were, different standards and values, everything is restlessness, disturbance, doubt, experiment; the best forces have an inhibiting effect; even the virtues do not allow each other to grow and become strong; the body and soul lack equilibrium, a centre of gravity, a perpendicular self-assurance. But what is most profoundly sick and degenerates in such mixtures is the will. These people no longer know the independence in decision making, the bold sense of pleasure in willing—they have doubts about the “freedom of the will,” even in their dreams. Our Europe today, the scene of an insanely sudden attempt at radical mixing of classes and consequently of races, is as a result sceptical in all heights and depths, sometimes with that flexible scepticism which leaps impatiently and greedily from one branch to another, sometimes gloomy, like a cloud overloaded with question marks, and often sick to death of its will! Paralysis of the will—where nowadays do we not find this cripple sitting! And often how well dressed! In such a seductive outfit! This illness has the most beautifully splendid and deceitful clothing. For example, most of what presents itself in the display windows today as “objectivity,” “the practice of science,” “l’art pour l’art” [art for art’s sake], “purely disinterested knowledge” is only dressed up scepticism and paralysis of the will—I’ll stand by this diagnosis of the European disease. The sickness of the will has spread unevenly across Europe. It appears in its greatest and most varied forms where the culture has already been indigenous for the longest time, and it disappears to the extent that the “barbarian” still—or again—achieves his rights under the baggy clothing of Western culture. Thus, in contemporary France, we can conclude as easily as we can grasp it in our hands that the will is most seriously ill, and France, which has always had a masterful skill in transforming even the fateful changes in its spirit into something attractive and seductive, truly displays its cultural dominance over Europe today as the school and exhibition hall for all the charms of scepticism. The power to will and, indeed, to desire a will that lasts a long time, is already somewhat stronger in Germany, and in the north of Germany even more so than in the middle, but it’s significantly stronger in England, Spain, and Corsica. In Germany it’s bound up with apathy, and in those other places with hard heads—to say nothing of Italy, which is too young to know yet what it wants and which first must demonstrate whether it can will.—But it’s strongest and most amazing in that immense empire in between, where Europe, so to speak, flows back into Asia, that is, in Russia. There the power to will has for a long time lain dormant and built up, there the will waits menacingly—uncertain whether, to borrow a favourite phrase of our physicists today, it will be discharged as a will to negate or a will to affirm. It may require more than wars in India and developments in Asia for Europe to be relieved of its greatest danger; it will require inner revolutions, too, the breaking up of the empire into small bodies and, above all, the introduction of the parliamentary nonsense, along with every man's duty to read his newspaper at breakfast. I'm not saying this because it's what I want. The opposite would be closer to my heart—I mean such an increase in the Russian danger, that Europe would have to decide to become equally a threat, that is, it would have to acquire a will, by means of a new caste which would rule Europe, a long, fearful, individual will, which could set itself goals for thousands of years from now—so that finally the long spun-out comedy of its small states, together with its multiple dynastic and democratic wills, would come to an end. The time for petty politics is over. The next century is already bringing on the battle for the mastery of the earth—the compulsion to grand politics. 209 The extent to which the new warlike age into which we Europeans have evidently entered may perhaps also be favourable to the development of another and stronger variety of scepticism—on that point I'd like to state my views only provisionally through a parable which friends of German history will understand easily enough. That harmless enthusiast for good-looking, tall grenadiers, who, as King of Prussia, brought into being a military and sceptical genius—and in the process basically created that new type of German who has just recently emerged victorious—the questionable and mad father of Frederick the Great—in one respect himself had the grip and lucky claw of genius.(9) He knew what Germany then needed, a lack which was a hundred times more worrisome and more urgent than some deficiency in culture and social style. His aversion to the young Frederick emerged from the anxiety of a profound instinct. What was missing was men. And he suspected to his most bitter annoyance that his own son might not be man enough. On that point he was deceived, but who in his place would not have been deceived? He saw his son decline into atheism, esprit, the pleasure-loving frivolousness of witty Frenchmen:—he saw in the background the great blood sucker, the spider of scepticism. He suspected the incurable misery of a heart that is no longer hard enough for evil and for good, of a fractured will that no longer commands, is no longer capable of commanding. But in the meantime there grew up in his son that more dangerous and harder new form of scepticism—who knows how much it was encouraged by that very hatred of his father's and by the icy melancholy of a will pushed into solitude?—the scepticism of daring masculinity, which is most closely related to the genius for war and conquest and which, in the shape of Frederick the Great, first gained entry into Germany. This scepticism despises and nonetheless grabs hold. It undermines and takes possession. It does not believe, but in so doing does not lose itself. It gives the spirit a dangerous freedom, but it keeps a firm grip on the heart. It is the German form of scepticism, which, as a constant Frederickianism [Fridericianismus] intensified into the highest spirituality, has brought Europe for some time under the dominion of the German spirit and its critical and historical mistrust. Thanks to the invincibly strong and tenacious masculine character of the great German philologists and historical critics (who, if we see them properly, were collectively also artists of destruction and subversion), gradually anew idea of the German spirit established itself, in spite of all the Romanticism in music and philosophy, an idea in which the characteristic of manly scepticism stepped decisively forward: it could be, for example, a fearlessness in the gaze, courage and hardness in the dissecting hand, a tough will for dangerous voyages of discovery, for expeditions to the spiritual North Pole under bleak and dangerous skies. There may well be good reasons why warm-blooded and superficial humanitarians cross themselves when confronted with this particular spirit: Michelet, not without a shudder, calls it cet esprit fataliste, ironique, méphistophélique [this fatalistic and ironic Mephistophelean spirit].(10) But if we want to sense how distinctive this fear of the “man” in the German spirit is, through which Europe was roused out of its “dogmatic slumber,” we might remember the earlier idea which it had to overthrow—and how it is still not so long ago that a masculine woman could dare, with unrestrained presumption, to recommend the Germans to the sympathy of Europe as gentle, good-hearted, weak-willed, poetical idiots.(11) Finally, we should understand with sufficient profundity Napoleon’s surprise when he happened to see Goethe: that reveals what people had thought about the “German spirit” for centuries. “Voilà un homme!” [There is a man!]²¹⁰—which is, in effect, saying: “That is really a man! And I had expected only a German!”— Assuming, then, that in the image of the philosophers of the future there is some characteristic which raises the question whether they would not perhaps have to be sceptics, in the sense indicated immediately above, that would, nonetheless, indicate only one thing about them—and not what they themselves were. With just as much justification they could let themselves be called critics, and it’s certain they will be people who experiment. In the names with which I have ventured to christen them, I have already particularly emphasized experiments and their enjoyment in attempting experiments. Did I do this because, as critics in body and soul, they love to use experiments in a new, perhaps broader, perhaps more dangerous sense? In their passion for knowledge, will they have to go further with daring and painful experiments, than could be considered appropriate by the soft-hearted and mollicoddled taste of a democratic century? There is no doubt that these coming philosophers will be least of all able to rid themselves of those serious and not unobjectionable characteristics which separate the critic from the sceptic—I mean the certainty in the measure of value, the conscious use of a unity of method, the shrewd courage, the standing alone, and the ability to answer for themselves. In fact, they confess that they take delight in saying No and in dissecting things and in a certain thought-out cruelty, which knows how to guide the knife surely and precisely, even when the heart is still bleeding. They will be harder (and perhaps not always only on themselves) than humane people might wish; they will not get involved with the “truth,” so that the truth can “please” them or “elevate” them and “inspire” them:—by contrast, they will have little faith that the truth itself brings with it such emotional entertainment. They will smile, these strict spirits, if someone should declare in front of them, “That idea elevates me: how could it not be true?” or “That work delights me: how could it not be beautiful?” or, “That artist enlarges me; how could he not be great?”—Perhaps they are prepared not only to smile at but also to feel a genuine disgust for everything equally enthusiastic, idealistic, feminine and hermaphroditic. Anyone who knew how to follow them right into the secret chambers of their hearts would hardly find there any intention to reconcile “Christian feelings” with “the taste of antiquity” or even with “modern parliamentarianism” (a reconciliation which is said to be taking place even among philosophers in our very uncertain and therefore very conciliatory century). These philosophers of the future will demand not only of themselves critical discipline and every habit which leads to purity and strictness in things of the spirit: they could show them off as their own kind of jewellery—nonetheless, for all that they still do not wish to be called critics. It seems to them no small insult inflicted on philosophy when people decree, as they are so fond of doing today, “Philosophy itself is criticism and critical science—and nothing else!” This evaluation of philosophy may enjoy the applause of all French and German positivists (—and it’s possible that it would have flattered even the heart and taste of Kant: we should remember the title of his major works—): our new philosophers will nonetheless affirm that critics are the tools of the philosopher and for that very reason, the fact that they are tools, are still a long way from being philosophers themselves! Even the great Chinaman of Königsberg [Kant] was only a great critic. 211 I insist on the following point: people should finally stop confusing philosophical labourers and scientific people in general with philosophers—in this particular matter we should strictly assign “to each his due” and not give too much to the former and much too little to the latter. It may be that the education of a real philosopher requires that he himself has once stood on all of those steps where his servants, the scientific labourers in philosophy, remain—and must remain. Perhaps he must himself have been critic and sceptic and dogmatist and historian and, in addition, poet and collector and traveller and solver of riddles and moralist and prophet and “free spirit” and almost everything, in order to move through the range of human worth and feelings of value and to be able to look with a variety of different eyes and consciences from the heights into every distance, from the depths into every height, from the corners into every expanse. But all these things are only preconditions for his task: the task itself requires something different—it demands that he create values. Those philosophical labourers on the noble model of Kant and Hegel have to establish some large collection of facts concerning estimates of value—that is, earlier statements of value, creations of value that have become dominant and for a while have been called “truths”—and press them into formulas, whether in the realm of logic or politics (morality) or art. The task of these researchers is to make everything that has happened and which has been valued up to now clear, easy to imagine, intelligible, and manageable, to shorten everything lengthy, even “time” itself, and to overpower the entire past, a huge and marvellous task, in the service of which every sophisticated pride and every tough will can certainly find satisfaction. But the real philosophers are commanders and lawgivers: they say “That is how it should be!” They determine first the “Where to?” and the “What for?” of human beings, and, as they do this, they have at their disposal the preliminary work of all philosophical labourers, all those who have overpowered the past—they reach with their creative hands to grasp the future. In that process, everything that is and has been becomes a means for them, an instrument, a hammer. Their “knowing” is creating; their creating is establishing laws; their will to truth is—will to power.—Are there such philosophers nowadays? Have there ever been such philosophers? Is it not necessary that there be such philosophers? . . . 212 It is increasingly apparent to me that the philosopher, who is necessarily a man of tomorrow and the day after, has in every age found and had to find himself in contradiction to his today: his enemy every time was the ideal of the day. Up to now all these extraordinary promoters of humanity whom we call philosophers and who themselves seldom felt that they were friends of wisdom but rather embarrassing fools and dangerous question marks, have discovered that their work, their hard, unsought for, inescapable task—but finally the greatness of their work—was for them to be the bad conscience of their age. By applying the knife of vivisection directly on the chest of the virtues of the day, they revealed what their own secret was—to know a new greatness for man, to know a new untrodden path to increasing his greatness. Every time they exposed how much hypocrisy, laziness, letting oneself go, and letting oneself fall, how many lies lay hidden under the most highly honoured type of their contemporary morality, how much virtue was out of date; every time they said, “We must go there, out there, where you nowadays are least at home.” Faced with a world of “modern ideas” that would like to banish everyone into a corner and a “specialty,” a philosopher, if there could be a philosopher these days, would be compelled to establish the greatness of mankind, the idea of “greatness,” directly on the basis of man’s range and multiplicity, of his integrated totality in the midst of diversity. He would even determine value and rank according to how much and how many different things one person could endure and take upon himself, how far he could extend his own responsibility. Today contemporary taste and virtue weaken and dilute the will; nothing is as topical as the weakness of the will. Thus, in the ideal of the philosopher it is precisely the strength of will, hardness, and the ability to make lengthy decisions that must be part of the idea “greatness”—with just as much justification as the opposite doctrine and the ideal of a stupid, denying, humble, selfless humanity was appropriate to an opposite age, one which suffered, like the sixteenth century, from the bottled-up energy of its will and from the wildest torrents and storm tides of selfishness. At the time of Socrates, among nothing but men of exhausted instincts, among conservative old Athenians, who allowed themselves to go “for happiness,” as they said, and for pleasure, as they did, and who, in the process, still kept mouthing the old splendid words to which their lives no longer gave them any right, perhaps irony was essential for greatness in the soul, that malicious Socratic confidence of the old doctor and member of the rabble, who sliced ruthlessly into his own flesh, as into the flesh and heart of the “noble man,” with a look which spoke intelligibly enough “Don’t play act in front of me! Here—we are the same!” By contrast, today, when the herd animal in Europe is the only one who attains and distributes honours, when “equality of rights” all too easily could get turned around into equality of wrongs—what I mean is into a common war against everything rare, strange, privileged, the higher man, the higher soul, the higher duty, the higher responsibility, the creative fullness of power and mastery—these days the sense of being noble, of willing to be for oneself, of being able to be different, of standing alone, and of having to live by one’s own initiative—these are part of the idea “greatness,” and the philosopher will reveal something of his own ideal if he proposes “The man who is to be the greatest is the one who can be the most solitary, the most hidden, the most deviant, the man beyond good and evil, lord of his virtues, a man lavishly endowed with will—this is precisely what (T)greatness(T) is to be called: capable of being as much an integrated totality as he is something multifaceted, as wide as he is full.” And to ask the question again: today—is greatness possible? 213 What a philosopher is, that’s difficult to learn because it cannot be taught: one must “know” it out of experience—or one should have the pride not to know it. But the fact that these days the whole world talks of things about which it cannot have any experience holds true above all and in the worst way for philosophers and philosophical situations: very few people are acquainted with them and are allowed to know them, and all popular opinions about them are false. And so, for example, that genuine philosophical association of a bold, exuberant spirituality, which speeds along presto, with a dialectical strictness and necessity which takes no false steps is unknown to most thinkers and scholars from their own experience, and hence, if someone wishes to talk about it in front of them, they find it implausible. They take the view that every necessity is an affliction, a painful requirement they must follow, a compulsion, and thinking itself they consider something slow, hesitant, almost laborious, and often enough “worth the sweat of the noble”—but under no circumstances something light, divine, closely related to dancing and high spirits! “Thinking” and “taking an issue seriously,” “considering it gravely”—among them these belong together: that’s the only way they have “experienced” thinking. In such matters artists may have a more subtle sense of smell. They know only too well that at the very moment when they no longer create “voluntarily,” when they make everything by necessity, their sense of freedom, refinement, authority, of creative setting up, disposing, and shaping is at its height—in short, that necessity and the “freedom of the will” are then one thing for them. Ultimately there is a rank ordering of spiritual conditions, with which the rank ordering of problems is consistent, and the highest problems shove back without mercy anyone who dares approach them without having been predestined to solve them with the loftiness and power of his spirituality. What help is it if nimble heads of nondescript people or, as happens so often these days, clumsy honest mechanics and empiricists with their plebeian ambition press forward into the presence of such problems and, as it were, up to the “court of courts”? But on such carpets crude feet may never tread: there is still a primeval law of things to look after that: the doors remain closed to these people who push against them, even if they bang or crush their heads against them! One must be born for every lofty world: to put the matter more clearly, one must be cultivated for it: one has a right to philosophy—taking the word in its grand sense—only thanks to one’s descent, one’s ancestors; here, as well, “blood” decides. For a philosopher to arise, many generations must have done the preparatory work. Every single one of his virtues must have been acquired, cared for, passed on, assimilated, and not just the bold, light, delicate walking and running of his thoughts, but, above all, the willingness to take on great responsibilities, the loftiness of the look which dominates and gazes down, the feeling of standing apart from the crowd and its duties and virtues, the affable protecting and defending of what is misunderstood and slandered, whether god or devil, the desire for and practice of great justice, the art of commanding, the breadth of will, the slow eye that seldom admires, seldom looks upward, seldom loves. . . .

NOTES (1) Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770-1831), important German idealist philosopher. [Back to Text] (2) Eugen Dühring (1833-1921) and Eduard von Hartmann (1842-1906): two well-known philosophers in Nietzsche’s day. [Back to Text] (3) Epochism means dividing time or history up into epochs. [Back to Text] (4) Nietzsche coined the word Ipsissimosität from the Latin ipsissima meaning very own. [Back to Text] (5) Gottfried Wilhelm Leibnitz (1646-1716), German philosopher, diplomat, and mathematician. [Back to Text] (6) nihilin: a word Nietzsche invents to designate some new form of strong pessimism discovered like some as yet unknown chemical. [Back to Text] (7) Michel de Montaigne (1533-1592), French diplomat and writer. [Back to Text] (8) Circe: a goddess in Homer’s Odyssey who has magical powers to turn men into swine. [Back to Text]] (9) Frederick the Great (1712-1786), son of Frederick William I, King of Prussia. Through his military and political skill he greatly enlarged Prussian territory. [Back to Text] (10) Jules Michelet (1798-1874), a French historian. Mephistopheles is the chief agent of the Devil in Goethe's Faust. [Back to Text] (11) The woman is Madame de Staël, a French writer who produced a book about German and the Germans in 1810. [Back to Text]

==== Part 7: Our Virtues

==== Friedrich Nietzsche BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL Translated by Ian Johnston, Vancouver Island University, Nanaimo, British Columbia, Canada
Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text without permission and without charge. They may also freely edit the text for their own purposes. All commercial use of this translation, however, is forbidden without the permission of the translator. For comments and questions, please contact Ian Johnston. For a Rich Text Version (Word) of this text, please use the following link: [Beyond Good and Evil \[RTF\]](#) [Table of Contents for Beyond Good and Evil] PART SEVEN OUR VIRTUES 214 Our virtues? It's probable that we, too, still have our virtues, although it's reasonable to think that they will not be those naive, four-square virtues for whose sake we respect our grandfathers, at the same time holding them somewhat at arm's length. We Europeans of the day-after-tomorrow, we first-born of the twentieth century—with all our dangerous curiosity, our multiplicity and art of disguise, our tender and, so to speak, sweetened cruelty in spirit and sense—if we're to have virtues, we'll presumably have only those which have learned best how to tolerate our most secret and most heartfelt inclinations, our most burning needs. So then let's look for them in our labyrinths!—where, as we know, so many different things get lost, so many different things disappear forever. And is there anything more beautiful than seeking out one's own virtues? Doesn't this already almost mean that one believes in one's own virtues? But this phrase "believe in one's own virtues"—isn't that basically the same thing people in earlier times used to call their "good conscience," that long worthy pigtail of an idea which our grandfathers hung behind their heads and often enough behind their understanding as well? Thus, it seems to follow that, no matter how little we may think of ourselves as old fashioned and as respectable as our grandfathers in other things, in one respect we are nonetheless the worthy grandsons of these grandfathers, we last Europeans with good consciences: we, too, still carry their pigtail.—Alas, if you knew how soon, how very soon—things will be otherwise! . . . 215 Just as it sometimes happens in the realm of the stars that two suns determine the orbit of a planet, and in some cases suns of different colours cast their lights around a single planet, sometimes red light, sometimes green light, and then again lighting it both at once, flooding it with many colours, in the same way we modern men, thanks to the complicated mechanics of our “starry heaven,” are determined by different moralities; our actions change their lights into different colours. They are rarely unambiguous—and there are enough cases where we carry out actions with many colours. 216 Love one’s enemies? I think that has been well learned. These days it happens thousands of times, in small and big things. In fact, now and then something even higher and more sublime takes place—we learn to despise when we love, and precisely when we love best: but all this is unconscious, without any fuss, without any pomp and circumstance, rather with that modesty and secret goodness which prohibit solemn words and virtuous formulas. Morality as a pose—that offends our taste nowadays. This is also a step forward, just as it was a step forward for our fathers when religion as a pose finally offended their taste, including hostility to and a Voltairean bitterness against religion (and everything that formerly went along with the sign language of free thinkers). It’s the music in our conscience, the dance in our spirit, that makes all puritanical litanies, all moral sermons and petty bourgeois respectability sound out of tune. 217 Be careful of those who set a high value on people’s ascribing to them moral tact and refinement in drawing moral distinctions! They never forgive us if they ever make a mistake in front of us (or even against us)—inevitably they become people who instinctively slander and damage us, even when they still remain our “friends.”—Blessed are the forgetful, for they are “done” with their stupidities as well. 218 Psychologists in France—and where else nowadays are there still any psychologists?—have not yet stopped enjoying the bitter and manifold pleasure they get from bêtise bourgoise [bourgeois stupidity]. It’s as if—but enough, by doing that they are revealing something. For example, Flaubert, that worthy citizen of Rouen, finished up by seeing, hearing, and tasting nothing else any more.(1) That was his kind of self-torture and more refined cruelty. Now, for a change—since this is becoming tedious—I recommend something else for our delight, and that is the unconscious shiftiness with which all good, thick, well-behaved, average spirits react to higher spirits and the work they do, that subtle, barbed, Jesuitical shiftiness, which is a thousand times more subtle than the understanding and taste of these middle-class people in their best moments—or even than the understanding of their victims as well. This is repeated evidence for the fact that “instinct” is the most intelligent of all forms of intelligence discovered so far. Briefly put, you psychologists should study the philosophy of the “rule” in its war against the “exception.” There you’ll see a drama good enough for the gods and divine maliciousness! Or, to put the matter still more clearly: practise vivisection on the “good person,” on the “homo bonae voluntatis” [man of good will]. . . on yourselves! 219 Moral judgment and condemnation are the favourite revenge of the spiritually limited against those who are less limited, as well as a form of compensation for the fact that nature has thought ill of them, and finally a chance to acquire some spirit and become refined:—malice spiritualizes. Deep in their hearts they feel good that there is a standard before which those plentifully endowed with spiritual wealth and privilege also stand, just like them:—they fight for the “equality of all before God” and almost require a faith in God just for that purpose. Among them are the most powerful opponents of atheism. Anyone who said to them “A high spirituality cannot be compared with any of the solidity and respectability of a man who is merely moral” would make them furious:—I’ll be careful not to do this. I’d much prefer to flatter them with my theory that a high spirituality itself arises only as the final offspring of moral qualities, that it is a synthesis of all those states which are ascribed to the “merely moral” man, after they have been acquired one by one through long discipline and practice, perhaps through an entire chain of generations, that high spirituality is simply the spiritualization of justice and of that kind severity which knows that its task is to maintain the order of rank in the world, not only among human beings, but even among things. 220 Given the present popular praise of the “disinterested person,” we must bring to mind, perhaps not without a certain danger, what it is that really interests the populace, and what, in general, are those things about which the common man is fundamentally and deeply concerned, including educated people, even scholars, and, unless all appearances deceive, perhaps philosophers as well. From that fact it turns out that the vast majority of what interests and charms more refined and more discriminating tastes and every higher nature appears completely “uninteresting” to the average man. Nonetheless, when he notices a devotion to these things, he calls it “désintéressé” [disinterested] and wonders to himself how it is possible to act “without interest.” There have been philosophers who have known how to confer a seductive and mystically transcendental form of expression upon this popular wonder (perhaps because in their own experience they knew nothing of higher nature?)—instead of presenting what’s reasonable—the honest naked truth that the “disinterested” action is a very interesting and interested action, provided . . . “And love?”—What’s that! Is even an action done from love supposed to be “unegoistic”? You idiots—! “What about the praise for the person who makes a sacrifice?”—But anyone who has really made a sacrifice knows that he wanted and got something for it—perhaps something of himself in exchange for something of himself—he gave up here in order to have more there, perhaps in general to be more or at least to feel himself as “more.” But this is a realm of questions and answers in which a more discriminating spirit does not like to remain; here even truth finds it so very necessary to suppress her yawns when she is required to give an answer. In the last analysis, truth is a woman: we should not treat her with force. 221 It so happens, said a moralistic pedant and pettifogger, that I respect and honour a selfless man, not because he is unselfish but because he seems to me to have a right to be of use to another man at his own expense. All right, but it's always a question of who he is and who the other is. For example, in a man who is marked out and made for command, self-denial and modest holding back would not be a virtue but a waste of virtue: that's what it seems like to me. Every unegoistic morality which takes itself unconditionally and applies itself to everyone not only sins against taste; it also provokes sins of omission, one more seduction under the guise of philanthropy—and, in particular, a seduction for and injury to the higher, rarer, and privileged people. We must compel moralities first and foremost to give way before the order of rank. We must force into the conscience of moralities an awareness of their own presumption—until they finally are collectively clear about the fact that it is immoral to say “What is right for one man is fair to another.” As for my moralistic pedant and bonhomme [fine fellow]: does he deserve it when people laugh at him as he advises moralities in this way to become moral? But people should not be too much in the right if they want those who laugh on their side. A small grain of wrong is even a part of good taste. 222 Nowadays wherever people preach pity—and, if one listens correctly, there is now no other religion preached anymore—the psychologist should keep his ears open: through all the vanity, through all the noise characteristic of these preachers (like all preachers), he'll hear a hoarse, moaning, genuine sound of self-contempt. It's part of that process of making Europe dark and ugly, which has been growing now for a hundred years (and whose first symptoms were already placed in the documentary record in a thoughtful letter from Galiani to Madame d'Épinay): unless it's the cause of this development!(2) The man of “modern ideas,” that proud ape, is uncontrollably dissatisfied with himself—that's established. He's suffering, and his vanity wants him only to suffer “with others” . . . 223 At any rate, the hybrid European—a reasonably ugly plebeian, all in all—needs a costume. He needs history as a storeroom of costumes. Naturally, he then notices that none of them fits his body properly—he changes and changes. Just take a look at the nineteenth century, at the rapid preferences and changes in the masquerades of style, along with the moments of despair over the fact that “nothing suits” us—. It's no use presenting oneself romantically or classically or in a Christian or Florentine or Baroque or “national” manner in moribus et artibus [in customs and the arts]—it “doesn't suit us”! But the “spirit,” in particular the “historical spirit,” also sees an advantage for itself even in this despair: over and over again a new piece of the past and of a foreign place is tested, put on, set aside, packed away, and above all studied:—we are the first age studious about the issue of “costume”: I mean in moralities, articles of faith, tastes in art, and religions, prepared as no other time ever was for a carnival in the grand style, for the most spiritual revelry of laughter and high spirits, for a transcendental height of the loftiest nonsense and Aristophanic mockery of the world.(3) Perhaps this is the very place where we are still discovering the realm of our own inventiveness, that realm where we too can still be original as some sort of satirists of world history and God's clowns—perhaps when nothing else today has a future, perhaps it's our very laughter that still has one! 224

The historical sense (or the ability to make quick conjectures about the rank ordering of value judgments according to which a people, a society, or a person has lived, the “instinct for divination” concerning the relations among these value judgments, for the connections between the authority of values and the authority of forces at work)—this historical sense which we Europeans claim as our distinctive characteristic, came to us as a consequence of the enthralling and wild semi-barbarianism into which Europe was plunged through the democratic intermixing of the classes and races—only the nineteenth century knows this sense as its sixth sense. The past of every form and manner of living, of cultures which earlier lay right alongside each other or over each other, flows, thanks to this intermixing, out into us “modern souls”; our instincts now run back all over the place; we ourselves are a kind of chaos. Finally “the spirit,” as I have said, sees an advantage for itself in this. Because of our semi-barbarism in body and desires we have secret entrances in all directions, in a way no noble age ever possessed, above all entrances to the labyrinth of unfinished cultures and to every semi-barbarism that has ever been present on earth. Inasmuch as the most considerable part of human civilization up to now has been semi-barbarism, the “historical sense” almost means the sense and instinct for everything, the taste and tongue for everything. And that establishes right away that it's an ignoble sense. For example, we enjoy Homer again. It's perhaps our happiest advance that we understand how to appreciate Homer, something which men of a noble culture do not know and did not know how to appropriate so easily and which they hardly allowed themselves to enjoy (for example, the French of the seventeenth century, like Saint Evremond, who criticized him for his esprit vaste [vast and all-encompassing spirit], and even Voltaire, their final chorus).(4) That very emphatic Yes and No of their palate, their easily aroused disgust, their hesitant holding back with respect to everything strange, their fear of bad taste, even of lively curiosity, and, in general, that reluctance of every noble and self-satisfied culture to acknowledge a new desire, a dissatisfaction with what is its own, an admiration for something foreign; all this makes them hostile even to the best things of the world which are not their own property or could not become their plunder—and no sense is more incomprehensible to such people than the historical sense and its obsequious plebeian curiosity. The situation is no different with Shakespeare, that amazing Spanish-Moorish-Saxon synthesis of taste, who would have made an old Athenian, one of Aeschylus' friends, laugh himself almost to death or irritated him. But we take up this wild display of colours, this confusion of the most delicate, coarsest, and most artificial things with a secret confidence and good will. We enjoy him as the very refinement of art saved especially for us and, in the process, do not allow ourselves to be disturbed at all by the unpleasant stink and the proximity of the English rabble, in which Shakespeare's art and taste live, no more so than on the Chiaja in Naples, where we go on our way with all our senses enchanted and keen, no matter how much the sewers of the rabble's quarter fill the air.⁽⁵⁾ We men of the "historical sense," we have our corresponding virtues. That's beyond dispute. We are undemanding, unselfish, modest, brave, full of self-control, full of devotion, very grateful, very patient, very obliging:—with all that we are perhaps not very "tasteful." Let's finally admit it to ourselves: what's hardest for us men of "historical sense" to grasp, to feel, to taste, and to love, what we're basically prejudiced against and almost hostile to is precisely the perfection and ultimate maturity in every culture and art, what is really noble in works or in men, the moment when their sea is smooth and they have halcyon self-sufficiency, the gold and the coolness displayed by all things that have perfected themselves. Perhaps the great virtue of the historical sense stands in a necessary opposition to good taste, at least to the very best taste, and we can reproduce in ourselves only with difficulty and hesitantly, only by forcing ourselves, the small, short, and highest strokes of happiness and transfigurations of human life, as they suddenly shine out here and there: those moments and miracles where a great force voluntarily remains standing before the boundless and unlimited—where an excess of sophisticated pleasure was enjoyed in sudden restraint and petrification, in standing firm and holding oneself steady on still trembling ground. Restraint is strange to us. Let's admit that to ourselves. Our itch is the particular itch for the unlimited, the unmeasured. Like the rider on a steed snorting its way forward we let the reins fall before the infinite, we modern men, we half-barbarians—and reach our bliss only in a place where we are most—in danger. 225 Whether hedonism, pessimism, utilitarianism, or eudaimonism—all these ways of thinking which measure the value of things according to pleasure and pain, that is, according to attendant circumstances and secondary issues, are ways of thinking in the foreground and naiveté, which anyone who knows about creative forces and an artistic conscience will look down on, not without ridicule and not without pity. Pity for you!—that is, of course, not pity the way you mean the term: not pity for social "distress," for "society" and its sick and unsuccessful people, for those depraved and broken down from the start—they're lying on the ground all around us—even less is it pity for the grumbling oppressed, the rebellious slave classes, who strive for mastery—they call it "Freedom." Our pity is a higher compassion which sees further—we see how man is making himself smaller, how you are making him smaller!—and there are moments when we look at your very pity with an indescribable anxiety, when we defend ourselves against this pity—when we find your seriousness more dangerous than any carelessness. You want, if possible—and there is no more fantastic “if possible”—to do away with suffering. What about us? It does seem that we would prefer it to be even greater and worse than it ever was! Wellbeing, the way you understand it—that is no goal. To us that looks like an end, a condition which immediately makes human beings laughable and contemptible—something which makes their destruction desirable! The discipline of suffering, of great suffering—do you not realize that up to this point it is only this discipline that has created every enhancement in man up to now? That tension of a soul in misery which develops its strength, its trembling when confronted with great destruction, its inventiveness and courage in bearing, holding out against, interpreting, and using misfortune, and whatever has been conferred upon it by way of profundity, secrecy, masks, spirit, cunning, and greatness—has that not been given to it through suffering, through the discipline of great suffering? In human beings, creature and creator are united. In man is material stuff, fragments, excess, clay, mud, folly, and chaos, but in man there is also creator, artist, hammer hardness, the divinity of the spectator and the seventh day—do you understand this contrast? And do you understand that your pity for the “creature in man” is for what must be formed, broken, forged, torn apart, burned, annealed, and purified—for what must necessarily suffer and should suffer? And our pity—do you not understand for whom our reverse pity matters, when it protects itself against your pity as against the most wretched of all mollycoddling and weakness?—And so pity against pity!—But, to say the point again, there are higher problems than all those of enjoyment, suffering, and pity, and every philosophy that leads only to these is something naive.— 226 We immoral ones!—This world which we are concerned with, in which we have to fear and love, this almost invisible and inaudible world of sophisticated commanding and sophisticated obeying, a world of “almost” from every way of looking at it—entangled, insidious, cutting, and tender—yes, this world is well defended against clumsy spectators and familiar curiosity! We have been woven into a strict yarn and shirt of duties and cannot get out of it—in that respect we are simply “men of duty,” we as well! Now and then, it’s true, we dance in our “chains” and between our “swords.” More often, it’s no less true, we gnash our teeth about it and are impatient with all the secret hardness of our fate. But we can do what we like: the fools and appearance speak against us: “They are men without duty.”—We always have fools and appearance against us! 227 If we assume that honesty is a virtue of ours from which we cannot escape, we free spirits—well, we’ll want to work on it with all our malice and love and not grow tired of “making ourselves perfect” in our virtue, the only one which remains ours: may its brilliance one day remain lying like a gilded, blue, mocking evening light over this aging culture and its dull and dark seriousness! And if

nonetheless our honesty one day grows tired and sighs and stretches its limbs and finds us too hard and would like to have things better, lighter, more loving, like a pleasing vice, let us remain hard, we final Stoics! And let us send her by way of help only what we have in us of devilry—our disgust with what is crude and approximate, our “nitimur in vetitum” [we seek what is forbidden], our courage as adventurers, our shrewd and discriminating curiosity, our most refined, most disguised, and most spiritual will to power and overcoming of the world which roams and swarms greedily around all realms of the future—let us come to the aid of our “god” with all our “devils”! It is likely that because of this people fail to recognize us and get us confused with others. What does that matter? People will say “Their ‘honesty’—that’s their devilry, nothing more than that.” What does that matter? Even if they were right! Haven’t all gods up to now been like that, devils who became holy by being re-christened? And what finally do we know about ourselves? And that spirit which guides us, what does it want to be called (it is a matter of names)? And how many spirits are we hiding? Our honesty, we free spirits—let’s take care that it does not become our vanity, our finery and splendour, our limit, our stupidity! Every virtue tends towards stupidity; every stupidity tends towards virtue: “stupid all the way to holiness” people say in Russia—let’s take care that we don’t end up becoming saints and bores through honesty! Isn’t life a hundred times too short to get bored with it? We would already have to believe in eternal life, in order to . . . 228 I hope people forgive me the discovery that all moral philosophy so far has been boring and has belonged among things which send us to sleep—and that, in my eyes, “virtue” has been impaired by nothing so much as by this tediousness of its advocates. In saying this I still don’t wish to deny their general utility. A great deal rests on the fact that as few people as possible think about morality—and so it’s very important that morality does not one day become interesting! But that’s not something people should worry about! These days things still stand the way they always have stood: I do not see anyone in Europe who might have (or might provide) some idea about how reflecting on morality could be conducted dangerously, insidiously, and seductively—that there could be disaster in the process. People should consider, for example, the tireless unavoidable English utilitarians, how they wander around crudely and honourably in Bentham’s footsteps, moving this way and that (a Homeric metaphor says it more clearly), just as Bentham himself had already wandered in the footsteps of the honourable Helvetius (this Helvetius—no, he was no dangerous man!).(6) No new idea, nothing of a more refined expression and bending of an old idea, not even a real history of an earlier thought: an impossible literature in its totality, unless we understand how to spice it up with some malice. For in these moralists as well (whom we really have to read with their ulterior motives in mind [mit Nebengedanken], if we have to read them—) that old English vice called cant

and moral Tartufferie [hypocrisy], has inserted itself, this time hidden under a new form of scientific thinking. Nor is there any lack of a secret resistance against the pangs of conscience, something a race of former Puritans will justifiably suffer from in all its scientific preoccupations with morality. (Isn't a moralist the opposite of a Puritan, namely, a thinker who considers morality something questionable, worth raising questions about, in short, as a problem? Shouldn't moralizing be—immoral?). In the end they all want English morality to be considered right, so that then mankind or "general needs" or "the happiness of the greatest number"—no! England's happiness—will be best served. They want to prove with all their might that striving for English happiness, I mean for comfort and fashion (and, as the highest priority, a seat in Parliament) is at the same time also the right path of virtue, in fact, that all virtue which has existed in the world so far has consisted of just such striving. Not one of all those ponderous herd animals with uneasy consciences (who commit themselves to promoting the cause of egoism as an issue of general welfare—) wants to know or catch a whiff of the fact that the "general welfare" is no ideal, no goal, not even a concept one can somehow grasp, but is only an emetic—that what is right for one man cannot in any way therefore be right for another, that the demand for a single morality for everyone is a direct restriction on the higher men, in short, that there is a rank ordering between man and man, as a result, also between morality and morality. These utilitarian Englishmen are a modest and thoroughly mediocre kind of human being and, as mentioned, insofar as they are boring, we cannot think highly enough of their utility. We should even encourage them, just as, to some extent, someone has tried to do in the following rhyme: Hail to you, brave working lout, "It's always better when drawn out." Always stiff in head and knee Never funny, never keen, Always sticking to the mean— Sans genie et sans esprit.(7) 229 In these recent ages, which may be proud of their humanity, there remains so much fear, so much superstitious(T) fear of the "wild cruel beasts," animals which these more humane ages are particularly proud of having overcome, that even obvious truths remain unspoken for hundreds of years, as if by some agreement, because they look as if they might help those savage beasts, which have been finally slaughtered, come back to life again. Perhaps I am risking something if I allow one such truth to escape me: let others catch it again and give it so much "milk of the devout ways of thinking" to drink, that it lies still and forgotten in its old corner.—People should learn to think differently about cruelty and open their eyes. They should finally learn to get impatient, so that such presumptuous, gross errors no longer brazenly wander around as virtues—like those dealing with tragedy, for example, which have been fattened up by old and new philosophers. Almost everything we call "higher culture" rests on the spiritualization and intensification of cruelty—that's my claim. The "wild beast" hasn't been killed at all: it's alive, it's flourishing. Only it has turned itself into—a god. What constitutes the painful delight in tragedy is cruelty. What has a pleasing effect in so-called tragic pity, and basically even in everything awe-inspiring right up to the highest and most delicate shudders of metaphysics, gets its sweetness only from the ingredient of cruelty added to the mixture. What the Roman in the arena, the Christian in the raptures of the cross, the Spaniard at the sight of a burning at the stake or a bull fight, the Japanese today who crowds into tragedies, the Parisian suburban worker who feels nostalgic for a bloody revolution, the female fan of Wagner who, with her will unhinged, lets herself “submit to” Tristan and Isolde—what all these people enjoy and try to drink down with mysterious enthusiasm is the spicy liquor of the great Circe, “cruelty.” In saying this, we must of course chase off the foolish psychology of former times, which, so far as cruelty is concerned, knew only how to teach us that it arose at the sight of someone else’s suffering. There is a substantial, over-abundant enjoyment also with one’s own suffering, with making oneself suffer—and wherever people let themselves be convinced about self-denial in a religious sense or about self-mutilation, as with the Phoenicians and ascetics, or in general about depriving themselves of sensual experience and the flesh, about remorse, Puritan pangs of repentance, about a vivisection of the conscience, and about a Pascalian sacrificio dell’intelletto [sacrifice of the intellect], they are secretly seduced and pushed on by cruelty, by that dangerous thrill of cruelty turned against themselves. Finally, people should consider that even the knowledgeable man, when he compels his spirit to acknowledge things against his spirit’s inclinations and often enough also against his heart’s desires—that is, to say No where he’d like to affirm something, to love, to worship—rules as an artist and transformer of cruelty. In fact, every attempt to be profound and thorough is a forceful violation, a willingness to do harm to the basic will of the spirit, which always wants what’s apparent and superficial—in all desire to know there is already a drop of cruelty. 230 Perhaps people don’t readily understand what I’ve said here about a “basic will of the spirit.” So permit me to offer an explanation.—The something which commands, which people call “the spirit,” wishes to be master in and around itself and to feel that it is the master. In its multiplicity it possesses the will to simplicity, a will which ties up, tames, desires to dominate and truly rule. Its needs and capabilities are in this respect the same as those which physiologists indicate belong to everything that lives, grows, and reproduces itself. The power of the spirit to appropriate other things for itself is revealed in its strong inclination to assimilate the new with the old, to simplify what is diverse, to ignore or push away what is totally contradictory, just as it arbitrarily and strongly emphasizes, brings out, and falsifies for its own purposes certain characteristics and lines in what is foreign, in every piece of the “outside world.” Its intention in so doing is the assimilation of new “experiences,” the organization of new things in an old series—and also for growth, or, to put the matter even more clearly, for the feeling of growth, for the feeling of increased power. An apparently contradictory spiritual drive serves this same will, a suddenly erupting decision in favour of ignorance, an arbitrary shutting out, a slamming of its window, an inner cry of No to this or that thing, a refusal to let something in, a kind of defensive condition against much that can be known, a satisfaction with the darkness, with the sealed-off horizon, an affirmation and endorsement of ignorance: all this is necessary in proportion to the degree of its appropriating power, its “power of digestion,” to speak metaphorically—“the spirit,” in fact, most closely resembles a stomach. With this also belongs the occasional will in the spirit to allow itself to be deceived, perhaps with a high-spirited premonition that something or other is not the case, that we simply allow something or other to be valid, a joy in all uncertainty and ambiguity, an exultant self-indulgence in the capricious narrowness and secrecy of some corner, in what is all too near at hand, in the foreground, in what is magnified or made smaller, in what has been shifted around or made more beautiful, a delight in the arbitrariness of all these expressions of power. Finally with these belongs that not unobjectionable willingness of the spirit to deceive other spirits and to play act in front of them, that constant urge and pressure of a creative, formative, changeable force: here the spirit enjoys its capacity for adopting multiple masks and shiftiness; it also enjoys the feeling of its security in this activity—precisely through its protean art is the spirit, in fact, best defended and hidden!—Working against this will to appearances, to simplification, to masks, to cloaks, in short, to the surface—for every surface is a cloak—is that sublime tendency of the person looking for knowledge who grasps and wants to grasp things thoroughly in their profundity and multiplicity, as a kind of cruelty of the intellectual conscience and taste, which every bold thinker will recognize in himself, provided that he, as is appropriate, has hardened and sharpened his eye for himself long enough and has grown accustomed to strict discipline and to stern language. He’ll say, “There’s something cruel in my spiritual inclination”—let the virtuous and charming try to persuade him that’s not so! In fact, it would sound better if, instead of cruelty, people talked of or whispered about or credited us free, very free spirits as having “excessive honesty”—and perhaps that’s how it will really ring out one day—our posthumous reputation? In the meantime—for there is plenty of time until then—we ourselves may well be the least inclined to dress ourselves up in the finery of these sorts of moralistic word sequins and shawls: our entire work so far spoils for us this very taste and its merry opulence. These are the beautiful, sparkling, jingling, festive words: honesty, love of truth, love of wisdom, sacrifice for knowledge, heroism of the truthful—there is something in them that makes a person’s pride swell up. But we hermits and marmots, we persuaded ourselves long ago, with all the secrecy of a hermit’s conscience, that this worthy verbal pomp also belongs with the old lying finery, rubbish, and gold dust of unconscious human vanity, and that underneath such flattering colours and repainted surfaces we must once again recognize the terrifying basic text of homo natura [natural man]. In fact, to translate men back into nature, to master the many vain and effusive interpretations and connoted meanings which so far have been scribbled and painted over that eternal basic text of homo natura, to see to it that in future man stands before man in the same way he, grown hard in the discipline of science, already stands these days before the rest of nature, with the fearless eyes of Oedipus and the blocked ears of Odysseus, deaf to the seductive enticements of the old metaphysical bird-catchers, who for far too long have been piping at him, "You are more! You are higher! You are of a different origin!"—that may be a peculiar and mad task, but it is a task—who wants to deny that? Why did we choose it, this mad task? Or, to put the question differently, "Why knowledge at all?"—Everyone will ask us about that. And we, pressured like this, we, who have already asked ourselves that very question a hundred times, we have found and find no better answer . . .

231 Learning changes us. It achieves what all feeding does which does not merely "preserve,"—as a physiologist knows. But deep in us, really "down there," is naturally something uneducable, a granite of spiritual fatum [fate], of predetermined decision and answer to predetermined selected questions. In every cardinal problem a steadfast "That's what I am" speaks out. About men and a women, for example, a thinker cannot learn to think differently; he can only complete his learning—only finally discover how things "stand with him" on this question. Sometimes we find certain solutions to problems which create a strong faith in us in particular. Perhaps from then on we call them our "convictions." Later we see in them mere footsteps to self-knowledge, signposts to the problem which we are—or, better, to the great stupidity which we are, to our spiritual fatum [fate], to the uneducable part way "down there." After this rich civility I have just displayed with respect to myself, perhaps there's a better chance that I'll be allowed to speak out a few truths about "woman as such," so long as from now on people realize at the start just how much these are simply my truths. 232 Woman wants to become independent—and for that reason she is beginning to enlighten men about "woman as such"—that is among the most deleterious developments in the general process of making Europe ugly. For what must these crude attempts of female scientific thinking and self-exposure bring to light! Woman has so many reasons for shame; hidden in women is so much pedantry, superficiality, so many characteristics of the school teacher, petty arrogance, petty indulgence, and petty immodesty—just look at the way she interacts with children!—Up to now basically these qualities have best been kept repressed and controlled by fear of man. Woe when the "eternally boring in woman"—she is rich in that!—is first allowed to venture out, when she begins thoroughly and in principle to forget her shrewdness and art, her qualities of grace, of play, of driving cares away, of mitigating troubles and taking things lightly, as well as her delicate skill with agreeable pleasures! Nowadays we can already hear women's voices which—by holy Aristophanes!—are frightening. They utter threats with medical clarity about what woman wants from man, from start to finish. Is it not in the very worst taste for woman to prepare like this to become scientific? So far, enlightening has fortunately been a man's business, a man's talent—in the process we remained “among ourselves.” In dealing with everything which women write about concerning “woman,” we may finally retain a healthy mistrust whether woman really wants enlightenment about herself—or is capable of wanting it. . . . Unless a woman by doing this is seeking some new finery for herself—so I do think that dressing herself up belongs to the eternally feminine?—well, by doing this she does want to arouse fear of herself:—in that way perhaps she wants to dominate. But she does not want the truth. What does a woman have to do with truth? From the very beginning nothing is stranger, more unfavourable, or more hostile to women than truth—her great art is the lie, her highest concern appearance and beauty. We men should admit it—we honour and love precisely this art and this instinct in woman, we who have a hard time of it and are happy to get our relief by associating with beings under whose hands, looks, and tender foolishness our seriousness, our gravity and profundity, seem almost silly. Finally I put the question: Has a woman ever herself conceded that a woman's head is profound, that a woman's heart is just? And is it not true that, speaking generally, “woman” up to this point has been held in contempt mostly by woman herself—and not at all by us? We men want a woman not to continue compromising herself by enlightenment, just as it was masculine care and consideration for woman that made the church decree mulier taceat in ecclesia [let a woman be silent in church]! It was an advantage for woman, when Napoleon let the all-too-eloquent Madame de Staël understand: mulier taceat in politicis [let women be silent in politics]!—And I think that a true friend of women is the person who nowadays shouts out to them: mulier taceat de muliere [let woman be silent about women]! 233 It reveals a corruption of the instincts—quite apart from revealing bad taste—when a woman makes a direct reference to Madame Roland or Madame de Staël or Mr. George Sand, as if by doing so they had something to prove in favour of the “woman as such.” Among men those names are the three comical woman as such—nothing more!—and the very best unintentional counter-arguments against emancipation and female high handedness.(8) 234 Stupidity in the kitchen, woman as cook, the ghastly absence of intelligent thought in taking care of the nourishment of the family and the master of the house! Woman understands nothing about what food means, and she wants to be the cook! If woman were a thinking creature, then, as cook for thousands of years, she'd surely have found out the most important physiological facts, while at the same time she'd have had to take ownership of the art of healing! Because of bad female cooks and the complete lack of reason in the kitchen, the development of human beings has been held up for the longest time and suffered the worst damage. Even today things are little better. A speech for fashionable young ladies. 235 There are expressions and successful projections of the spirit; there are aphorisms, a small handful of words, in which an entire culture, an entire society, suddenly crystallizes. Among these belongs that casual remark Madame de Lambert made to her son: “Mon ami, ne vous permettez jamais que de folies, qui vous feront grand plaisir” [My dear, never allow yourself any follies but those which will bring you great pleasure]—which is, by the way, the most motherly and cleverest remark that has ever been directed to a son. 236 What Dante and Goethe believed about women—the former when he sang, “Ella guardava suso, ed io in lei” [She looked upward and I at her] and the latter when he translated this passage as “the Eternally Feminine draws us upward”—I have no doubt that every more aristocratic woman will resist this faith, for that is exactly what she believes about the Eternally Masculine. . . . 237 Seven Short Maxims About Women How the longest boredom flees—when man crawls to us on his knees! Old age, alas, and science, too, give strength to even weak virtue. Dressed in black and speaking never—every woman then looks clever. When things go well, my gratitude goes—to God and the woman who cuts my clothes. When young, a flowery cavern home—when old, a dragon on the roam. A noble name, legs are fine—a man as well—would he were mine! Brief in speech, the sense quite nice—a female ass on treacherous ice! 237a Up to now women have been treated by men like birds which have strayed down to them from some high place or other, like something finer, more sensitive, wilder, stranger, sweeter, and with more soul—but like something which man must lock up so that it does not fly away. 238 To grasp incorrectly the basic problem of “man and woman,” to deny the most profound antagonism here and the necessity for an eternally hostile tension, perhaps in this matter to dream about equal rights, equal education, equal entitlements and duties—that’s a typical sign of a superficial mind. And a thinker who has shown that he’s shallow in this dangerous place—shallow in his instincts!—may in general be considered suspicious or, even worse, betrayed and exposed. Presumably he’ll be too “short” for all the basic questions of life and of life in the future, and he’ll be incapable of any profundity. By contrast, a man who does have profundity in his spirit and in his desires as well, together with that profundity of good will capable of severity and hardness and easily confused with them, can think about woman only in an oriental way: he has to grasp woman as a possession, as a property which he can lock up, as something predetermined for service and reaching her perfection in that service. In this matter he must take a stand on the immense reasoning of Asia, on the instinctual superiority of Asia: just as the Greeks did in earlier times, the best heirs and students of Asia, who, as is well known, from Homer to the time of Pericles, as they advanced in culture and in the extent of their power, also became step by step stricter with women, in short, more oriental. How necessary, how logical, even how humanly desirable this was: that's something we'd do well to think about for ourselves! 239 In no age has the weak sex been treated with such respect on the part of men as in our time—that's part of the tendency and basic taste of democracy, just like the disrespect for old age. Is it any wonder that this respect immediately leads to abuse? People want more; people learn to make demands. They finally find this toll of respect almost insulting and would prefer a competition for rights, in fact, a completely genuine fight. Briefly put, woman is losing her shame. Let's add to that at once that she is also losing her taste. She is forgetting how to be afraid of man. But the woman who "forgets how to fear" is abandoning her most womanly instincts. The fact that woman dares to come out when that part of men which inspires fear—let's say it more clearly—when the man in men—is no longer wanted and widely cultivated—is reasonable enough, even understandable enough. What's more difficult to grasp is that in this very process—woman degenerates. That's happening today: let's not deceive ourselves about it! Wherever the industrial spirit has triumphed over the military and aristocratic spirit, woman now strives for the economic and legal independence of a clerk: "woman as clerk" stands written on the door of the modern society which is now developing. As she thus empowers herself with new rights and strives to become "master" and writes the "progress" of woman on her flags and banners, it becomes appallingly clear that the opposite is taking place: woman is regressing. Since the French Revolution the influence of woman in Europe has grown smaller in proportion to the increase in her rights and demands, and the "Emancipation of Woman," to the extent that that is desired and demanded by women themselves (and not just by superficial men), has as a result shown itself to be a remarkable symptom of the growing weakening and deadening of the most feminine instincts. There is stupidity in this development, an almost masculine stupidity, about which a well-adjusted woman—who is always an intelligent woman—would have to feel thoroughly ashamed. To lose the instinct for the ground on which one is sure to gain victory, to neglect to practice the art of one's own true weapons, to allow oneself to let go before men, perhaps even "in a book," where previously one used discipline and a refined cunning humility, to work with a virtuous audacity against man's faith in a fundamentally different ideal concealed in woman, some eternally and necessarily feminine, with constant chatter to talk men emphatically out of the idea that woman, like a delicate, strangely wild, and often pleasing domestic animal, must be maintained, cared for, protected, and looked after, the awkward and indignant gathering up of everything slavish and serf-like that has inherently belonged to the position of women in the social order up to this point and that still does (as if slavery were a counter-argument and not rather a condition of every higher culture, of every enhancement of culture)—what does all this mean, if not a crumbling away of feminine instinct, a loss of femininity? Of course, there are enough idiotic friends of women and corruptors of women among the scholarly asses of the male sex who counsel woman to defeminize herself in this manner and to imitate all the foolish things which make the “man” in Europe and European “manliness” sick—people who want to bring woman down to the level of a “common education,” perhaps even to reading newspapers and discussing politics. Here and there they even want to make women into free spirits and literati: as if a woman without piety were not something totally repulsive or ridiculous to a profound and godless man. Almost everywhere people ruin woman’s nerves with the most sickly and most dangerous of all forms of music (our most recent German music) and make her more hysterical every day and more incapable of her first and last profession, giving birth to strong children. They want to make her in general even more “cultivated” and, as they say, make the “weak sex” strong through culture, as if history did not teach us as emphatically as possible that “cultivating” human beings and making them weak—that is, enfeebling and fracturing the power of the will and making it sick—have always gone hand in hand and that the most powerful and most influential women of the world (in most recent times Napoleon’s mother) can thank the force of their own particular wills—and not their school masters!—for their power and predominance over men. The thing in woman that arouses respect and often enough fear is her nature, which is “more natural” than man’s nature, her genuine predatory and cunning adaptability, her tiger’s claws under the glove, the naïveté of her egotism, her uneducable nature and inner wildness, the incomprehensibility, breadth, and roaming of her desires and virtues. . . . With all this fear, what creates sympathy for this dangerous and beautiful cat “woman” is that she appears to suffer more, to be more vulnerable, more in need of love, and more condemned to suffer disappointment than any other animal. Fear and pity: with these feelings man has stood before woman up to this point, always with one foot already in tragedy, which tears to pieces while it delights. How’s that? And has this now to come to an end? Is the magic spell of woman in the process of being broken? Are women slowly being made boring? O Europe! Europe! We know the horned animal which has always been most attractive to you. Its danger still constantly threatens you! Your old fable could still at some point once again become “history”—once again a monstrous stupidity could gain mastery of you and drag you away! And no god is hiding underneath it, no, only an “idea,” a “modern idea”!(9) NOTES (1) Gustave Flaubert (1820-1880), well known French novelist. [Back to Text] (2) Abbé Ferdinand Galiani (1728-1787), an Italian cleric and philosopher; Madame d’Épinay: Louise d’Épinay (1726-1783), a French writer. [Back to Text] (3) Aristophanes (456-386 BC), a major dramatist in classical Athens, the foremost writer of Old Comedy. [Back to Text] (4) Charles de Marguetel de Saint-Denis de Saint Evremond (1610-1703), French soldier and writer; Voltaire: pen name of Francois-Marie Arouet (1694-1778), an enormously influential and popular French philosopher and writer. [Back to Text] (5) Chiaja: an urban district in central Naples. [Back to Text] (6) Jeremy Bentham (1748-1832), English utilitarian philosopher and social reformer; Claude Helvétius (1715-1771), French philosopher, condemned by the pope and the government for his godlessness. The mention of a Homeric metaphor may be a reference to the shuffling around of cattle (a description which occurs in the Iliad). The German edition of 1900 contains an additional phrase in the parenthetical remark describing Helvetius: “this sénateur Pococurante, to use Galiani’s expression!” (Sénateur Pococurante, a character in Voltaire’s Candide, sets impossibly high standards for everything and thus finds nothing to admire or enjoy). [Back to Text] (7) The French in the last line means: “Without genius and without wit.” [Back to Text] (8) Madame Roland (1754-1793), French historian and writer; George Sand: pen name for Amandine Aurore Dupin (1804-1876), French novelist. [Back to Text] (9) In Greek mythology, the young girl Europa was carried off from Asia Minor across the sea by the god Zeus, who had transformed himself into a beautiful bull. [Back to Text]

==== Part 8: Peoples and Fatherlands

==== Friedrich Nietzsche BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL Translated by Ian Johnston, Vancouver Island University, Nanaimo, British Columbia, Canada Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text without permission and without charge. They may also freely edit the text for their own purposes. All commercial use of this translation, however, is forbidden without the permission of the translator. For comments and questions, please contact Ian Johnston. For a Rich Text Version (Word) of this text, please use the following link: [Beyond Good and Evil \[RTF\]](#) [Table of Contents for Beyond Good and Evil] PART EIGHT PEOPLES AND FATHERLANDS 240 I heard once again for the first time Richard Wagner’s overture to the Meistersinger: it is a splendid, overloaded, difficult, and late art, which prides itself on the fact that, in order to understand it, one has to assume that two centuries of music are still vital. It is to the Germans’ credit that such a pride was not misplaced! What juices and forces, what seasons and climates are intermingled here! It impresses us sometimes as old fashioned, sometimes as strange, bitter, and too young; it is as arbitrary as it is conventionally grandiose, if not infrequently mischievous, still more frequently tough and coarse—it has fire and courage and, at the same time, the loose dun-coloured skin of fruits which become ripe too late. It streams out wide and full, and suddenly a moment of inexplicable hesitation, a gap, as it were, springs up between cause and effect, a pressure that makes us dream, almost a nightmare—but already the old stream of contentment is spreading and widening once more, of manifold contentment, of old and new happiness, which very much includes the happiness of the artist with himself, something he has no desire to conceal, his amazed and happily shared knowledge of the mastery of the means he has used here, new and newly acquired artistic means, so far untried, as he seems to inform us. All in all, no beauty, nothing of the south, nothing of the delicate southern brightness of heaven, nothing of grace, no dance, scarcely any will for logic, indeed a certain awkwardness that is even emphasized, as if the artist wanted to tell us, “That is part of my purpose,” a ponderous drapery, something arbitrarily barbaric and ceremonial, a shimmy of scholarly and venerable precious objects and lace; something German, in the best and worst senses of the word, something manifold, formless, and inexhaustible in the German way, a certain German power and spiritual excess, which has no fear of hiding under the refinements of decay—and which perhaps feels at its best only there, a truly authentic emblem of the German soul, young and obsolete both at the same time, over-rotten and still over-rich for the future. This kind of music expresses best what I think of the Germans: they belong to the day before yesterday and the day after tomorrow—but they still have no today. 241 We “good Europeans,” we too have hours when we allow ourselves a hearty feeling for our fatherland, a tumble and relapse into old loves and narrow places—I have just given a sample of that—hours of national tumults, patriotic apprehensions, and all sorts of other floods of old-fashioned emotion. Slower moving spirits than we are might take a longer period of time to be done with things which with us last and have run their course in a matter of hours—some need half a year, others half a human lifetime, each according to the speed and power with which they digest and “transform their stuff.” In fact, I could think of some dull, hesitant races which, even in our rapidly moving Europe, would require half a century in order to overcome such atavistic attacks of patriotism and attachment to their soil and to return to reason, that is to say, to “good Europeanness [guten Europäerthum]” And while I indulge myself with this possibility, it so happens that I listen in on a conversation between two old “patriots.” They both were obviously hard of hearing and so spoke all the louder. One said, “That man possesses and understands philosophy as much as a peasant or a student in a fraternity. He is still innocent. But what does that matter these days! This is age of the masses, who prostrate themselves before anything built on a massive scale. That’s how it is in politics, as well. If a statesman piles up a new Tower of Babel for them, anything at all that’s immense in power and empire, they call him ‘great.’ What does it matter that in the meantime those of us who are more cautious and reserved still do not give up the old belief that only a great idea confers greatness on an act or a cause? What if a statesman brought his people into a situation where from that point on they had to practise ‘grand politics,’ something for which they were by nature poorly adapted and prepared, so that it would be necessary for them to sacrifice their old and certain virtues for the sake of a new and doubtful mediocrity—suppose a statesman sentenced his people to a general ‘politicking,’ although up to that point those same people had had better things to do and to think about and in the depth of their souls could not rid themselves of a cautious disgust with the anxiety, emptiness, noise, and devilish squabbling of those peoples who were truly politicking—suppose such a statesman goaded the sleeping passions and desires of his people and turned their earlier shyness and their pleasure in standing to one side into defects, their fondness for foreign things [Ausländerei] and their secret boundlessness into a liability, devalued for them their most heartfelt inclinations, turned their conscience around, made their spirit narrow, and their taste ‘national,’—well, would a statesman who did all those things, someone for whom his people would have to atone through all future time, in the event they had a future, would such a statesman be great?” “Undoubtedly,” the other old patriot answered him vehemently, “otherwise he would have been incapable of doing it! Perhaps it was idiotic to want something like that? But perhaps every great thing was merely idiotic at the beginning!” “That’s an abuse of words!” cried his conversational partner in response, “Strong! Strong! Strong and idiotic! Not great!” The old men had evidently worked themselves up, as they shouted their “truths” into each other’s faces like this. But I, in my happiness and remoteness, thought about how a stronger man will soon become master over the strong, and also how there is a compensation for the spiritual flattening of one people, namely, the deepening of another people.— 242 Now, let’s call what we’re looking for as the distinguishing mark of Europeans “civilization,” or “humanizing,” or “progress”; let’s use a political formula and call it simply, without praise or blame, Europe’s democratic movement: behind all the moral and political foregrounds indicated with such labels, an immense physiological process is completing itself, something whose momentum is constantly growing—the process by which the Europeans are becoming more similar to each other, their growing detachment from the conditions under which arise races linked to a climate and class, their increasing independence from any distinct environment that for centuries wanted to inscribe itself on body and soul with the same demands—hence, the slow emergence of an essentially supra-national and nomadic type of human being, who, physiologically speaking, possesses as his characteristic mark a maximum of the art and power of adaptation. This process of the developing European, which can be held back by great relapses in tempo, but which for that very reason perhaps acquires and augments its vehemence and depth—the furious storm and stress of “national feeling” still raging today belongs here, along with that anarchism which is just emerging—this process will probably rush ahead to conclusions which its naive proponents and advocates, the apostles of “modern ideas,” are least likely to expect. The same new conditions which will, on average, create a situation in which human beings are homogenous and mediocre—useful, hard-working, practical in many tasks, clever men from an animal herd—are to the highest degree suitable for giving rise to exceptional men with the most dangerous and most attractive qualities. For while that power to adapt, which keeps testing constantly changing conditions and begins a new task with every generation, almost with every decade, by no means makes possible the full power of the type, while the collective impression of such future Europeans probably will be one of many kinds of extremely useful chattering workers with little will power, men who will need a master, someone to give orders, as much as they need their daily bread, and while the democratizing of Europe thus moves towards the creation of a type prepared for slavery in the most subtle sense, the strong man, in single and exceptional cases, will have to turn out stronger and richer than he has perhaps ever been before now—thanks to the absence of prejudice in his education, thanks to the immense multiplicity of practice, art, and mask. What I wanted to say is this: the democratizing of Europe is at the same time an involuntary way of organizing for the breeding of tyrants—understanding that word in every sense, including the most spiritual. 243 I am pleased to hear that our sun is caught up in a rapid movement towards the constellation Hercules, and I hope that men on this earth act like the sun in this respect. And we first, we good Europeans! 244 There was a time when people were accustomed to confer on the Germans, as a mark of distinction, the label “profound.” Now, when the most successful type of the new Germanism craves completely different honours and perhaps finds that everything profound lacks “flair,” it is almost timely and patriotic to doubt whether we were not deceiving ourselves previously with that praise: in short, to wonder whether German profundity is not basically something else, something worse—and something which, thank God, we are about to succeed in removing. So let’s try to learn to think differently about German profundity. For that we don’t have to do anything except a little vivisection on the German soul. More than anything else, the German soul is multifaceted, with various origins, more cobbled together and superimposed than truly constructed. That comes from how it emerged. A German who had the audacity to claim “Alas, two souls dwell within my breast” would be seriously violating the truth, or, putting the matter more correctly, would lag behind the truth by several souls. As a people of the most monstrous mixing and stirring together of races, perhaps even with an excess of the pre-Aryan element, as “a people of the middle” in every sense, the Germans are more incomprehensible, more extensive, more contradictory, more unknown, more unpredictable, more surprising, and even more terrifying to themselves than other people are—they elude definition and for that reason alone are the despair of the French. It's typical of the Germans that with them the question "What is German?" never dies away. Kotzebue certainly knew his Germans well enough: "We have been acknowledged," they cheered to him—but Sand also thought he knew them. John Paul understood what he was doing when he expressed his anger over Fichte's false but patriotic flatteries and exaggerations—but it is likely that Goethe's thinking about the Germans was different from Jean Paul's, even if he thought he was right in his opinion about Fichte.(1) What did Goethe really think about the Germans?—But he never spoke clearly about many things around him, and all his life he knew how to keep a delicate silence—he probably had good reasons for that. What's certain is that "the Wars of Liberation" did not make him look up in a happier mood, any more than the French Revolution.(2) The event which made him rethink his Faust and, indeed, the entire problem of "man" was the appearance of Napoleon. There are words of Goethe in which, as if from a foreign country, he repudiates with an impatient severity what the Germans reckon as something they can be proud of: he once defined the famous German disposition [Gemüth] as "indulgence towards the weaknesses of strangers and towards one's own." Was he wrong in that? It's characteristic of the Germans that one is rarely completely wrong about them. The German soul has within it lanes and connecting paths; in it there are caves, hiding places, and dungeons. Its lack of order has a great deal of the charm of something full of secrets. The German is well acquainted with the secret routes to chaos. And just as everything loves its own metaphorical likeness, so the German loves clouds and everything unclear, developing, dim, damp, and shrouded: any kind of uncertainty, shapelessness, shifting around, or evolving he senses as something "profound." In himself, the German man does not exist—he is becoming something—he "is developing himself." Hence, "developing" is the essential German discovery and successful stroke in the great realm of philosophical formulas—a governing idea which, along with German beer and German music, is working to Germanize all Europe. Foreigners stand there amazed at and attracted to the riddles which the contradictory nature underlying the German soul presents to them (something Hegel organized into a system and Richard Wagner finally even set to music). "Good natured and malicious"—such a juxtaposition, a contradiction if applied to any other people, unfortunately justifies itself too often in Germany. Just live for a while among the Swabians! The ponderousness of the German scholar, his social tastelessness, gets on alarmingly well with an inner agility in dancing on a tightrope and with a light impudence, faced with which all the gods have by now learned about fear. If people want an ad oculos [visual] demonstration "the German soul," let them just look into German taste, into German arts and customs: what a boorish indifference to “taste”! See how there the noblest and the meanest stand next to each other! How disorderly and rich this entire spiritual household is! The German drags his soul along; he drags along everything he experiences. He digests his events badly—he’s never “finished” with them. German profundity is often only a difficult and hesitant “digestion.” And just as all chronic invalids, all dyspeptics, have an inclination for comfort, so the German loves “openness” and “conventional probity”: how comfortable it is to be open and conventional!—Today that is perhaps the most dangerous and most successful disguise the German knows—this trusting, cooperative, cards-on-the-table nature of German honesty. It is his true Mephistophelean art; with it he can “still go far!” The German lets himself go, as he gazes with true, blue, empty German eyes—and foreigners immediately confuse him with his dressing gown! What I wanted to say is this—let “German profundity” be what it will—when we are entirely among ourselves perhaps we’ll allow ourselves to laugh about it?—we’ll do well to hold its appearance and its good name in honour in future and not to dispose of our old reputation as people of profundity too cheaply for Prussian “dash” and Berlin wit and sand. It’s clever for a people to make itself pass for—and to let others think it—profound, clumsy, good natured, honest, unwise. That could even be—profound! Finally one should be a credit to one’s name—not for nothing are we called the “tiusche” people, the deceiving people . . . 245 The “good old” days are gone. In Mozart they sang themselves out:—how lucky we are that his rococo still speaks to us, that his “good society,” his loving raptures, his childish delight in Chinese effects and curlicues, the civility in his heart, his desire for delicacy, lovers, dancers, those with blissful tears, and his faith in the south can still appeal to some remnant in us! Alas, at some point it will be gone!—But who can doubt that the understanding of and taste for Beethoven will be gone even earlier!—Beethoven was, in fact, only the final chords of a stylistic transition, a break in style, and not, like Mozart, the last notes of a great centuries-long European taste. Beethoven is something that happens between an old worn out soul which is constantly breaking up and a very young soul of the future which is constantly coming on. In his music there lies that half light of eternal loss and of eternally indulgent hoping—that same light in which Europe was bathed when it dreamed with Rousseau, when it danced around the Liberty Tree of revolution and finally almost worshipped before Napoleon. But how quickly now this very feeling fades. Nowadays how difficult it has already become to know this feeling—how foreign to our ears the language of Rousseau, Schiller, Shelley, and Byron sounds, in whom collectively the same European fate found a way in words which it knew how to sing in Beethoven!(3) What has come in German music since then belongs to Romanticism, that is, historically considered, to an even shorter, even more fleeting, even more superficial movement than that great interlude, that transition in Europe from Rousseau to Napoleon and to the arrival of democracy. There is Weber: but what are Freischütz and Oberon these days for us? Or Marschner's Hans Heiling and Vampyr!(4) Or even Wagner's Tannhauser! That music has faded away, even if it has not yet been forgotten. In addition, all this Romantic music was not sufficiently noble, not sufficiently musical, to justify itself anywhere other than in the theatre and in front of crowds. Right from the start it was second-rate music, of little interest among true musicians. The situation was different with Felix Mendelssohn, that halcyon master, who won rapid admiration for his lighter, purer, and happier soul and then was forgotten just as quickly, as a lovely event in German music.(5) But as for the case of Robert Schumann, who took his work seriously and from the beginning was also taken seriously—he was the last one who founded a school—nowadays don't we count it as good luck, as a relief, and as a liberation that this very Schumann-style Romanticism has been overthrown? Schumann ran off into the "Saxon Switzerland" of his soul, half like Werther, half like Jean-Paul, but certainly nothing like Beethoven, certainly nothing like Byron!—the music of his Manfred is an error in judgment and a misunderstanding to the point of injustice.(6)—Schumann with his taste, which was basically a petty taste (that is, a dangerous tendency, doubly dangerous among the Germans, toward quiet lyricism and a drunken intoxication of feeling), always going off to the side, shyly withdrawing himself and pulling back, a nobly tender soul, who wallowed in nothing but anonymous happiness and sorrow, from the start a sort of young maiden and noli me tangere [do not touch me]: this Schumann was already merely a German event in music, no longer something European, as Beethoven was, and, to an even greater extent, Mozart. With him German music was threatened by its greatest danger, the loss of the voice for the soul of Europe and its descent to something dealing merely with the fatherland. 246 What a torture are books written in German for the person who has a third ear! How unwillingly he stands beside the slowly revolving swamp of sounds without melody, of rhythms without dance, what among the Germans is called a "book!" And as for the German who reads books! How lazily, how reluctantly, how badly he reads! How many Germans know and demand from themselves the knowledge that there is art in every good sentence, art which must be correctly grasped if the sentence is to be understood! With a misunderstanding about its tempo, for example, the sentence itself is misunderstood! That one must not be in doubt about the rhythmically decisive syllables, that one must feel the break in the extremely strict symmetry as intentional and charming, that one must lend a refined and patient ear to every staccato and every rubato, that one sorts out the sense in the series of vowels and diphthongs, how softly and richly they can colour and re-colour each other as they follow in their sequence—who among our book-reading Germans has enough goodwill to recognize these sorts of duties and demands and to listen for so much art and intentionality in the language? In the end we just “don’t have the ear for that.” And thus the most pronounced contrasts in style are not heard and the most refined artistry is wasted, as if on deaf people. These were my thoughts as I observed how crudely and naively people confused two masters of the art of prose with each other—one whose words drip down, hesitant and cold, as if from the roof of a damp cavern—he’s relying on their dull sound and echo—and the other who handles his language like a flexible sword and feels from his arm down to his toes the dangerous joy in the excessively sharp, shimmering blade that wants to bite, hiss, and cut.— 247 Just how little German style concerns itself with sound and with the ear is demonstrated in the fact that even our good musicians write badly. The German does not read aloud, not for the ear, but merely with his eyes. In the process he puts his ears away in a drawer. In antiquity a man read, when he read—and that happened rarely enough—to himself aloud and, in fact, in a loud voice. People were amazed if someone read quietly, and they secretly asked themselves why. With a loud voice—that is to say, with all the swellings, inflections, changes in tone, and shifts in tempo which the ancient public world enjoyed. At that time the principles of writing style were the same as those for the speaking style, and these principles depended in part on the astonishing development and the sophisticated needs of the ear and larynx and in part on the strength, endurance, and power of the ancient lungs. A syntactic period is, as the ancients understood it, above all a physiological totality, insofar as it is held together by a single breath. Such periods, as they manifest themselves in Demosthenes and Cicero, swelling up twice and sinking down twice, all within the single breath—that’s what ancient men enjoyed.(7) From their own schooling they knew how to value the virtue in such periods—how rare and difficult it was to deliver them. We really have no right to the great syntactical period, we moderns, we short-winded people in every sense! These ancient people were, in fact, themselves collectively dilettantes in public speaking—and as a result connoisseurs and thus critics. Hence, they drove their speakers to the utmost limits. In a similar way in the last century, once all Italian men and women understood how to sing, among them virtuoso singing (and with that the art of melody as well) reached its high point. But in Germany (right up until very recent times, when a sort of platform eloquence started flapping its young wings timidly and crudely enough) there was really only one form of public speaking which came close to being artistic: what came from the pulpit. In Germany only the preacher understood what a syllable or what a word weighs, how a sentence strikes, leaps, falls, runs, and comes to an end; only he had a conscience in his ears, often enough a bad conscience. For there is no shortage of reasons why it’s precisely the German who rarely, and almost always too late, achieves a proficiency in speaking. It is appropriate therefore that the masterwork of German prose is the masterwork of its greatest preacher: up to this point, the Bible has been the best German book. In comparison with Luther's Bible, almost everything else is mere "literature"—something that did not grow in Germany and hence also did not grow and does not grow in German hearts, as the Bible has. 248 There are two kinds of genius: one which above all breeds and desires to breed, and another which is happy to let itself be fertilized and give birth. In just the same way, there are among peoples of genius those to whom the female problem of pregnancy and the secret task of shaping, maturing, and perfecting have been assigned—the Greeks, for example, were a people of this kind, like the French—and there are others who have to fertilize and become the origin of new orders of life—like the Jews, the Romans, and, one could ask in all modesty, the Germans?—People tormented and enchanted by unknown fevers and irresistibly driven outside themselves, in love with and lusting after foreign races (after those who "let themselves be fertilized"—) and thus obsessed with mastery, like everything which has a knowledge of itself as full of procreative power and thus "by the grace of God." These two types of genius seek each other out, like man and woman, but they also misunderstand each other—like man and woman. 249 Every people has its characteristic Tartufferie [hypocrisy] and calls it its virtues.—The best that man is he does not know—he cannot know. 250 What does Europe owe the Jews?—All sorts of things, good and bad, and above all one that is at the same time among the best and the worst: the grand style in morality, the terror and majesty of infinite demands, infinite meanings, the whole romanticism and grandeur of morally questionable things [moralischen Fragwürdigkeiten]—and as a result precisely the most attractive, most insidious, and most exquisite parts of those plays of colours and enticements to life, whose afterglow these days makes the sky of our European culture glow in its evening light—perhaps as it burns itself out. Among the spectators and philosophers, we artists are grateful to the Jews for that. 251 When a people is suffering from nationalistic nervous fever and political ambition and wants to suffer, we have to accept the fact that various kinds of clouds and disturbances—in short, small attacks of stupidity—will pass over its spirit: for example, among contemporary Germans sometimes the anti-French stupidity, sometimes the anti-Jewish, sometimes the anti-Polish, sometimes the Christian-Romantic, sometimes the Wagnerian, sometimes the Teutonic, sometimes the Prussian (take a look at these poor historians Sybel and Treitzschke and their thickly bandaged heads—), and whatever else all these small obfuscations of the German spirit and conscience may call themselves.(8) May I be forgiven for the fact that I, too, during a short and risky stay in a very infected region did not remain entirely free of this illness and, like all the world, began to have ideas about things which were no concern of mine, the first sign of the political infection. For example, about the Jews. Hear me out.—I have not yet met a single German who was well disposed towards the Jews. And no matter how absolute the rejection of real anti-Semitism on the part of all cautious and political types may be, nonetheless this caution and politics directs itself not against this type of feeling itself, but only against its dangerous excess, in particular against the tasteless and disgraceful expression of this excessive feeling—on that point people should not deceive themselves. That Germany has a richly sufficient number of Jews, that the German stomach and German blood have difficulty (and will still have difficulty for a long time to come) absorbing even this quantum of “Jew”—in the way the Italians, the French, and the English have absorbed them, as a result of a stronger digestive system—that is the clear message and language of a general instinct which we must listen to and according to which we must act. “Let no more Jews in! And especially bar the doors to the east (also to Austria)!” So orders the instinct of a people whose type is still weak and uncertain, so that it could be easily erased, easily dissolved away by a stronger race. But the Jews are without any doubt the strongest, most tenacious, and purest race now living in Europe. They understand how to prevail even under the worst conditions (better even than under favourable conditions), as a result of certain virtues which today people might like to stamp as vices—thanks, above all, to a resolute faith which has no need to feel shame when confronted by “modern ideas.” They always change, if they change, only in the way the Russian empire carries out its conquests—as an empire that has time and was not born yesterday—that is, according to the basic principle “as slowly as possible!” A thinker who has the future of Europe on his conscience will, in all the designs he draws up for himself of this future, take the Jews as well as the Russians into account as, for the time being, the surest and most probable factors in the great interplay and struggle of forces. What we nowadays call a “nation” in Europe is essentially more a res facta [something made] than a res nata [something born] (indeed sometimes it looks confusingly like a res ficta et picta [something made up and unreal]—), in any case something developing, young, easily displaced, not yet a race, to say nothing of aere perennius [more enduring than bronze], as is the Jewish type. But these “nations” should be very wary of every hot-headed competition and enmity! That the Jews, if they wanted to—or if people were to force them, as the anti-Semites seem to want to do—could even now become predominant, in fact, quite literally gain mastery over Europe, is certain; that they are not working and planning for that is equally certain. Meanwhile, by contrast, they desire and wish—even with a certain insistence—to be absorbed into and assimilated by Europe. They thirst to be finally established somewhere or other, to be accepted and respected, and to bring to an end their nomadic life, to the “Wandering Jew.” And people should pay full attention to this tendency and impulse (which in itself perhaps even expresses a moderating of Jewish instincts) and accommodate it. And for this, it might perhaps be useful and reasonable to expel the noisy anti-Semitic troublemakers from the country. We should welcome them with all caution, and selectively, more or less the way the English aristocracy does. It's clear that the stronger and already more firmly established type of the new Germanism could involve itself with them with the least objection, for example, the aristocratic officers from the Mark Brandenburg.(9) It would be interesting in all sorts of ways to see whether the genius for money and patience (and above all for some spirit and spirituality, which are seriously deficient in the people just referred to) could be added to and bred into the inherited art of commanding and obeying—in both of which the land mentioned above is nowadays a classic example. But at this point it's fitting that I break off my cheerful Germanomania [Deutschthümelei] and speech of celebration. For I'm already touching on something serious to me, on the "European problem," as I understand it, on the breeding of a new ruling caste for Europe.— 252 These Englishmen are no race of philosophers. Bacon signifies an attack on the spirit of philosophy generally; Hobbes, Hume, and Locke have been a debasement and a devaluing of the idea of a "philosopher" for more than a century. Kant raised himself and rose up in reaction against Hume. It was Locke of whom Schelling was entitled to say, "Je méprise Locke" [I despise Locke].(10) In the struggle with the English mechanistic dumbing down of the world, Hegel and Schopenhauer (along with Goethe) were unanimous—both of these hostile fraternal geniuses in philosophy, who moved away from each other towards opposite poles of the German spirit and, in the process, wronged each other, as only brothers do. What's lacking in England, and what has always been missing, that's something the semi-actor and rhetorician Carlyle understood well enough, that tasteless muddle-headed Carlyle, who tried to conceal under his passionate grimaces what he understood about himself, that is, what was lacking in Carlyle—a real power of spirituality, a real profundity of spiritual insight, in short, philosophy.(11) It is characteristic of such an unphilosophical race that it clings strongly to Christianity. They need its discipline to develop their "moralizing" and humanizing. The Englishman is more gloomy, more sensual, stronger willed, and more brutal than the German—he is also for that very reason, as the more vulgar of the two, also more pious than the German. He is even more in need of Christianity. For more refined nostrils even this English Christianity has still a lingering and truly English smell of spleen and alcoholic dissipation, against which it is used with good reason as a medicinal remedy—that is, the more delicate poison against the coarser one. Among crude people, a subtler poisoning is, in fact, already progress, a step towards spiritualization. The crudity and peasant seriousness of the English are still most tolerably disguised or, stated more precisely, interpreted and given new meaning, by the language of Christian gestures and by prayers and singing psalms. And for those drunken and dissolute cattle who in earlier times learned to make moral grunts under the influence of Methodism and, more recently, once again as the “Salvation Army,” a twitch of repentance may really be, relatively speaking, the highest achievement of “humanity” to which they can be raised: that much we can, in all fairness, concede. But what is still offensive even in the most humane Englishman is his lack of music, speaking metaphorically (and not metaphorically—). He has in the movements of his soul and his body no rhythm and dance—in fact, not even the desire for rhythm and dance, for “music.” Listen to him speak, or watch the most beautiful English woman walk—in no country of the earth are there lovelier doves and swans—and finally, listen to them sing! But I’m demanding too much . . . 253 There are truths which are best recognized by mediocre heads, because they are most appropriate for them; there are truths which have charm and seductive power only for mediocre minds:—at this very point we are pushed back onto this perhaps unpleasant proposition, since the time the spirit of respectable but mediocre Englishmen—I cite Darwin, John Stuart Mill, and Herbert Spencer—is successfully gaining pre-eminence in the middle regions of European taste.(12) In fact, who could doubt how useful it is that such spirits rule from time to time? It would be a mistake to think that highly cultivated spirits who fly off to great distances would be particularly skilful at establishing many small, common facts, collecting them, and pushing to a conclusion:—they are, by contrast, as exceptional men, from the very start in no advantageous position vis-à-vis the “rules.” In the final analysis, they have more to do than merely have knowledge—for they have to be something new, to mean something new, to present new values! The gap between knowing something and being able to do something is perhaps greater as well as more mysterious than people think. It’s possible that the man who can act in the grand style, the creating man, will have to be a person who does not know; whereas, on the other hand, for scientific discoveries of the sort Darwin made a certain narrowness, aridity, and conscientious diligence, in short, something English, may not be an unsuitable arrangement. Finally we should not forget that the English with their profoundly average quality have already once brought about a collective depression of the European spirit. What people call “modern ideas” or “the ideas of the eighteenth century” or even “French ideas”—in other words, what the German spirit has risen against with a deep disgust—were English in origin. There’s no doubt of that. The French have been only apes and actors of these ideas, their best soldiers, as well, and at the same time unfortunately their first and most complete victims. For with the damnable Anglomania of “modern ideas” the âme française [French soul] has finally become so thin and emaciated that nowadays we remember almost with disbelief its sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, its profoundly passionate power, its resourceful nobility. But with our teeth we must hang on to the following principle of historical fairness and defend it against the appearance of the moment: European noblesse [nobility]—in feeling, in taste, in customs, in short, the word taken in every higher sense—is the work and invention of France; European nastiness, the plebeian quality of modern ideas, the work of England. 254 Even now France is still the place with the most spiritual and most refined European culture and the leading school of taste. But we have to know how to find this “France of taste.” Whoever belongs to it keeps himself well concealed—the number of those in whom it is embodied and lives may be small, and in addition they may perhaps be people who are not standing on the strongest legs, partly fatalistic, dark, sick, and partly mollycoddled and artificial, such people as have the ambition to conceal themselves. All of them have something in common: confronted with the raging stupidity and the noisy chattering of the democratic bourgeois, they keep their ears plugged. In fact, rolling around these days in the foreground is a stupid and coarsened France—recently, at the funeral of Victor Hugo, it celebrated a true orgy of tastelessness and at the same time of self-admiration.(13) Something else is also common to them: a great will to stand against spiritual Germanization—and an even greater inability to do so! Perhaps these days Schopenhauer is already more at home and has become more indigenous in this France of the spirit, which is also a France of pessimism, than he ever was in Germany, not to mention Heinrich Heine, who has long since been transformed into the flesh and blood of the more sophisticated and discriminating Parisian lyric poets, or Hegel, who today exercises an almost tyrannical influence in the form of Taine, the pre-eminent living historian.(14) And so far as Richard Wagner is concerned—the more French music learns to shape itself according to the real needs of the âme moderne [modern soul], the more it will become “Wagnerian.” That’s something we can predict—it’s already doing enough of that now. Nonetheless, in spite of all the voluntary or involuntary Germanizing and vulgarizing of taste, there are three things which nowadays the French can still point to with pride as their inheritance and property and as the indelible mark of an old cultural superiority over Europe. The first is the capacity for artistic passions, for devotion to “form,” for which the expression l’art pour l’art [art for art’s sake] has been invented, along with a thousand others—something like that has been present in France for three centuries and, thanks to the reverence for the “small number,” has made possible again and again a kind of chamber music in literature, which is not to be found in the rest of Europe.—The second thing on which the French can base a superiority over Europe is their ancient, multifaceted, moralistic culture, because of which we find, on average, even in the small romanciers [novelists] of the newspapers and random boulevardiers de Paris [Parisian men about town], a psychological sensitivity and curiosity of which people in Germany, for example, have no idea (to say nothing of the thing itself!). For that the Germans are lacking a couple of centuries of moralistic behaviour which, as mentioned, France did not spare itself. Anyone who calls the Germans “naive” because of this is praising them for a defect. (In contrast to the German inexperience and innocence in voluptate psychologica [in psychological delight], which is not too distantly related to the boredom of associating with Germans—and as the most successful expression of a genuine French curiosity and talent for invention in this empire of tender thrills, Henry Beyle [Stendhal] may well qualify, that remarkably prescient and pioneering man, who ran at a Napoleonic tempo through his Europe, through several centuries of the European soul, as a tracker and discoverer of this soul. It took two generations to catch up with him somehow, to grasp some of the riddles which tormented and delighted him, this strange Epicurean and question mark of a man, who was France's last great psychologist). There is still a third claim to superiority: in the nature of the French there is a semi-successful synthesis of north and south, which enables them to understand many things and tells them to do other things which an Englishman will never understand. In the French, the temperament which periodically turns towards and away from the south and in which, from time to time, the Provencal and Ligurian blood bubbles over, protects them from the dreadful northern gray on gray and the sunless conceptual ghostliness and anaemia—our German sickness of taste, against the excesses of which at the moment we have prescribed for ourselves, with great decisiveness, blood and iron—or I should say “grand politics” (in accordance with a dangerous art of healing which teaches me to wait and wait, but up to this point has not taught me to hope).(15) Even today there is still in France an advance understanding of and an accommodation with those rarer and rarely satisfied people who are too all-embracing to find their contentment in some patriotism or other and know how to love the south in the north and the north in the south—the born mid-landers, the “good Europeans.”—For them Bizet created his music, this last genius who saw a new beauty and enticement and—who discovered a piece of the south in music. (16) 255 I think all sorts of precautions are necessary against German music. Suppose that someone loves the south the way I love it, as a great school for convalescing in the most spiritual and sensual sense, as an unrestrained abundance of sun and transfiguration by the sun, which spreads itself over an existence which rules itself and believes in itself. Now, such a man will learn to be quite careful as far as German music is concerned, because in ruining his taste again it ruins his health again as well. Such a man of the south, not by descent but by faith, must, if he dreams of the future of music, also dream of a redemption of music from the north and have in his ears the prelude to a more profound, more powerful, perhaps more evil and more mysterious music, a supra-German music which does not fade away, turn yellow, and grow pale at the sight of the blue voluptuous sea and the brightness of the Mediterranean sky, the way all German music does, a supra-European music which justifies itself even when confronted with the brown desert sunsets, whose soul is related to the palm trees and knows how to be at home and to wander among huge, beautiful, solitary, predatory beasts. . . . I could imagine to myself a music whose rarest magic consisted in the fact that it no longer knew anything about good and evil, only that perhaps here and there some mariner's nostalgia or other, some golden shadow and tender weaknesses would race across it, an art which from a great distance could see speeding towards it the colours of a sinking moral world—one which has become almost unintelligible—and which would be sufficiently hospitable and deep to take in such late fugitives.— 256 Thanks to the pathological alienation which the nationalist idiocy has established and still establishes among European peoples, thanks as well to the short-sighted politicians with hasty hands, who with the help of this idiocy are on top nowadays and have no sense of how much the politics of disintegration which they carry on can necessarily be only politics for an intermission—thanks to all this and to many things today which are quite impossible to utter, now the most unambiguous signs indicating that Europe wants to become a unity are being overlooked or willfully and mendaciously reinterpreted. With all the more profound and more comprehensive men of this century the real overall direction in the mysterious work of their souls has been to prepare the way to this new synthesis and to anticipate, as an experiment, the European of the future. Only in their foregrounds or in their weaker hours, as in old age, for example, did they belong to their “fatherlands”—they were only taking a rest from themselves when they became “patriots.” I’m thinking of men like Napoleon, Goethe, Beethoven, Stendhal, Heinrich Heine, and Schopenhauer. Don’t get upset with me if I also count Richard Wagner among them. About him people should not let themselves be seduced by his own misunderstandings—geniuses of his kind rarely have the right to understand themselves. Even less, of course, by the uncivilized noise with which people in France these days close themselves off from and resist Richard Wagner. Nonetheless, the fact remains that the late French Romanticism of the forties and Richard Wagner belong together in the closest and most inner relation. In all the heights and depths of their needs they are related to each other, fundamentally related. It is Europe, the one Europe, whose soul pushes out and upward through their manifold and impetuous art, and it longs to go—where? Into a new light? Towards a new sun? But who could express exactly what all these masters of new ways of speaking did not know how to express clearly? What is certain is that the same storm and stress tormented them, that they sought in the same way, these last great seekers! All of them were dominated by literature up to their eyes and ears—the first artists educated in world literature—most of them were even themselves writers, poets, conveyers of and mixers in the arts and senses (Wagner belongs as a musician with the painters, as a poet with the musicians, as an artist generally with the actors); they were all fanatics of expression “at any price”—I’ll cite Delacroix, the one most closely related to Wagner—they were all great discoverers in the realm of the sublime, as well as of the ugly and the horrific, even greater discoverers in effects, in display, in the art of the store window—all talents far beyond their genius, virtuosos through and through, with mysterious access to everything that seduces, entices, compels, knocks over, born enemies of logic and the straight line, greedy for the strange, the exotic, the monstrous, the crooked, the self-contradictory; as men they were Tantaluses of the will, up-and-coming plebeians, who knew that they were incapable of a noble tempo, a lento [slow movement], in their lives and works—think, for example, of Balzac—unrestrained workers, almost killing themselves with work, antinomians and rebels against morals, ambitious and insatiable without equilibrium and enjoyment; all of them finally collapsing and sinking down before the Christian cross (and they were right and justified in that, for who among them would have been sufficiently profound and original for a philosophy of the Antichrist?—), on the whole, a boldly daring, marvellously violent, high-flying kind of higher men, who pulled others up into the heights, men who first taught the idea of “higher man” to their century—and it’s the century of the masses!(17) The German friends of Richard Wagner should think about whether there is anything essentially German in Wagnerian art or whether it is not precisely its distinction that it comes from supra-German sources and urges. In doing that, one should not underestimate just how indispensable Paris was for the development of a type like him, how at the most decisive period the depth of his instincts called him there, and how his whole way of appearing and his self-apostleship could perfect itself only at the sight of the model of French socialists. Perhaps with a more sophisticated comparison people will discover, to the honour of Richard Wagner’s German nature, that he carried everything out more strongly, more daringly, harder, and higher than a Frenchman of the nineteenth century could have done—thanks to the fact that we Germans are still closer to barbarism than the French are. Perhaps the most peculiar thing that Richard Wagner created is even inaccessible and unsympathetic to and beyond the emulation of the entire Latin race, which is so mature, for all time and not merely for today: the character of Siegfried, that very free man, who, in fact, may be far too free, too hard, too cheerful, too healthy, too anti-Catholic for the taste of an old and worn cultured people. He may even have been a sin against Romanticism, this anti-Roman [antiromanische] Siegfried. Well, Wagner more than made up for this sin in his old and gloomy days when—in anticipation of a taste which in the meantime has become political—he began, with his characteristic religious vehemence, if not to go to Rome, at least to preach the way there. So that you do not misunderstand these last words of mine, I’ll summon a few powerful rhymes to my assistance, which will reveal what I mean to less refined ears as well—what I have against the “late Wagner” and his Parsifal music: Is that still German? Did this oppressive screech come from a German heart? Is this self-mutilation of the flesh a German part? And is this German, such priestly affectation, this incense-smelling, sensual stimulation? And German this faltering, plunging, staggering, this uncertain bim-bam dangling? This nun-like ogling and ringing Ave bells, this whole false heavenly super-heaven of spells? Is that still German? Think! You're still standing by the entrance way. You're hearing Rome, Rome's faith without the words they say. NOTES (1) August Kotzebue (1761-1819), a well-known German writer assassinated by Karl Sand (1795-1820); John Paul (1763-1825), pen name of Johann Richter, an influential German writer in the Romantic era; Johann Gottlieb Fichte (1797-1879), an influential German philosopher. [Back to Text] (2) Wars of Liberation: the wars against Napoleon which followed the French Revolution. [Back to Text] (3) Napoleon Bonaparte (1769-1821) French general, ruler of France, and conqueror of much of Europe; Rousseau: Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712-1778), critic, philosopher and writer whose work influenced the French Revolution; Schiller: Johann Christoph Friedrich von Schiller (1759-1805), German poet, playwright, and philosopher; Shelley: Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792-1822), a major English poet in the Romantic era; Byron: George Gordon Byron (Lord Byron) (1788-1824), English poet in the Romantic era, a leading international presence in European Romanticism. [Back to Text] (4) Carl Maria Friedrich Ernst von Weber (1786-1826), German musician during the Romantic period; Heinrich Marschner (1795-1861), German composer of operas. [Back to Text] (5) Felix Mendelssohn (1809-1847) German composer in the early Romantic period. [Back to Text] (6) Robert Schumann (1810-1856) German composer and music critic; Werther: hero of a famous Romantic novel by Goethe (he commits suicide). [Back to Text] (7) Cicero (106-43 BC), the greatest of the Roman orators and prose stylists; Demosthenes (384-322 BC), a very famous Greek orator. [Back to Text] (8) Heinrich von Sybel (1817-1895) and Heinrich von Treitschke (1834-1896), important mid-nineteenth century German historians. [Back to Text] (9) Mark Brandenburg: a region near Berlin. [Back to Text] (10) Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679), English philosopher; David Hume (1711-1776), Scottish historian and philosopher; John Locke (1632-1704), English philosopher; Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph Schelling (1775-1854), German philosopher. [Back to Text] (11) Thomas Carlyle (1795-1881), Scottish essayist, historian, and biographer. [Back to Text] (12) Charles Darwin (1809-1882) English scientist, whose Origin of Species was published in 1859; John Stuart Mill (1806-1873), English utilitarian philosopher and economist; Herbert Spencer (1820-1903), English philosopher. [Back to Text] (13) Victor Hugo (1802-1885), French poet, playwright, and novelist. [Back to Text] (14) Heinrich Heine (1797-1856), German lyric poet; Hippolyte Adolphe Taine (1828-1893), French critic and historian. [Back to Text] (15) blood and iron: a phrase made famous by Otto Eduard Leopold von Bismarck (1815-1898), First Chancellor of Germany: “Not by speeches and votes of the majority are the great questions of the time decided . . . but by iron and blood.” [Back to Text] (16) Georges Bizet (1838-1875), French composer and pianist. [Back to Text] (17) Ferdinand Victor Eugene Delacroix (1798-1863), important French Romantic painter; Honore de Balzac (1799-1850), prolific French novelist. [Back to Text]

==== Part 9: What is Noble?

==== Friedrich Nietzsche BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL Translated by Ian Johnston, Vancouver Island University, Nanaimo, British Columbia, Canada
Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text without permission and without charge. They may also freely edit the text for their own purposes. All commercial use of this translation, however, is forbidden without the permission of the translator. For comments and questions, please contact Ian Johnston. For a Rich Text Version (Word) of this text, please use the following link: [Beyond Good and Evil \[RTF\]](#) [Table of Contents for Beyond Good and Evil] PART NINE WHAT IS NOBLE? 257
Every enhancement in the type “man” up to this point has been the work of an aristocratic society—and that’s how it will always be, over and over again: a society that believes in a long scale of rank ordering and differences in worth between one person and another and that, in some sense or other, requires slavery. Without the pathos of distance, the sort which grows out of the deeply rooted difference between the social classes, out of the constant gazing outward and downward of the ruling caste on the subjects and work implements, and out of their equally sustained practice of obedience and command, holding down and holding at a distance, that other more mysterious pathos would have no chance of growing at all, that longing for an ever new widening of distances inside the soul itself, the development of ever higher, rarer, more distant, more expansive, more comprehensive states, in short, simply the enhancement in the type “man,” the constant “self-surmounting of man,” to cite a moral formula in a supra-moral sense. Of course, where the history of the origins of aristocratic society is concerned (and thus the precondition for that raising of the type “man”—), we should not surrender to humanitarian illusions: truth is hard. So without further consideration, let’s admit to ourselves how up to this point every higher culture on earth has started! People with a still natural nature, barbarians in every dreadful sense of the word, predatory men still in possession of an unbroken power of the will and a desire for power, threw themselves on weaker, more civilized, more peaceful, perhaps trading or cattle-raising races, or on old, worn cultures, in which at that very moment the final forces of life were flickering out in a dazzling fireworks display of spirit and corruption. At the start the noble caste has always been the barbarian caste: its superiority has lain not primarily in physical might but in spiritual power—it has been a matter of more complete human beings (which at every level also means “more complete beasts”). 258 Corruption as the expression of the fact that within the instincts anarchy is threatening and that the foundation of the affects, what we call “life,” has been shaken: according to the living structure in which it appears, corruption is something fundamentally different. When, for example, an aristocracy, like that in France at the start of the Revolution, throws away its privileges with a sublime disgust and sacrifices itself to a dissipation of its moral feelings, this is corruption:—essentially it was only the final act in that centuries-long corruption, thanks to which the aristocracy step-by-step gave up its ruling authority and reduced itself to a function of the monarchy (finally even to the monarch’s finery and display pieces). The essential thing in a good and healthy aristocracy, however, is that it feels itself not as a function (whether of a monarchy or of a community) but as its significance and highest justification—that it therefore with good conscience accepts the sacrifice of an enormous number of people, who for its sake must be oppressed and reduced to incomplete men, to slaves and instruments of work. Its fundamental belief must, in fact, be that the society should exist, not for the sake of the society, but only as a base and framework on which an exceptional kind of nature can raise itself to its higher function and, in general, to a higher form of being, comparable to those heliotropic climbing plants on Java—people call them sipo matador—whose tendrils clutch an oak tree so much and for so long until finally, high over the tree but supported by it, they can unfold their crowns in the open light and make a display of their happiness.— 259 Mutually refraining from wounding each other, from violence, and from exploitation, and setting one’s will on the same level as others—these can in a certain crude sense become good habits among individuals, if conditions exist for that (namely, a real similarity in the quality of their power and their estimates of value, as well as their belonging together within a single body). However, as soon as people wanted to take this principle further and, where possible, establish it as the basic principle of society, it would immediately show itself for what it is, as the willed denial of life, as the principle of disintegration and decay. Here we must think through to the fundamentals and push away all sentimental weakness: living itself is essentially appropriation from and wounding and overpowering strangers and weaker people, oppression, hardness, imposing one’s own forms, annexing, and at the very least, in its mildest actions, exploitation—but why should we always use these precise words, which have from ancient times carried the stamp of a slanderous purpose? Even that body in which, as previously mentioned, individuals deal with each other as equals—and that happens in every healthy aristocracy—must itself, if it is a living body and not dying out, do to other bodies all those things which the individuals in it refrain from doing to each other: it will have to be the living will to power, it will seek to grow, grab things around it, pull to itself, and acquire predominance—not because of some morality or immorality, but because it is alive and because living is simply the will to power. But in no point is the common consciousness of the European more reluctant to be instructed than here. Nowadays people everywhere, even those in scientific disguises, are raving about the coming conditions of society from which “the exploitative character” is to have disappeared:—to my ears that sounds as if people had promised to invent a life which abstained from all organic functions. The “exploitation” is not part of a depraved or incomplete and primitive society: it belongs to the essential nature of what is living, as a basic organic function; it is a consequence of the real will to power, which is simply the will to life.—Assuming that this is something new as a theory—it is, nonetheless, in reality the fundamental fact of all history: we should at least be honest with ourselves to this extent! 260 As the result of a stroll through the many more sophisticated and cruder moral systems which up to this point have ruled or still rule on earth, I found certain characteristics routinely return with each other, bound up together, until finally two basic types revealed themselves to me and a fundamental difference sprang up. There is master morality, and there is slave morality—to this I immediately add that in all higher and more mixed cultures attempts at a mediation between both moralities make an appearance as well, even more often, a confusion and mutual misunderstanding between the two, in fact, sometimes their close juxtaposition—even in the same person, within a single soul. Distinctions in moral value have arisen either among a ruling group which was happily conscious of its difference with respect to the ruled—or among the ruled, the slaves and dependent people of every degree. In the first case, when it’s the masters who establish the idea of the “good,” the elevated and proud conditions of the soul emotionally register as the distinguishing and defining order of rank. The noble man separates his own nature from that of people in whom the opposite of such exalted and proud states expresses itself. He despises them. We should notice at once that in this first kind of morality the opposites “good” and “bad” mean no more than “noble” and “despicable”—the opposition between “good” and “evil” has another origin. The despised one is the coward, the anxious, the small, the man who thinks about narrow utility, also the suspicious man with his inhibited look, the self-abasing man, the species of human dogs who allow themselves to be mistreated, the begging flatterer, and, above all, the liar:—it is a basic belief of all aristocrats that the common folk are liars. “We tellers of the truth”—that’s what the nobility called itself in ancient Greece. It’s evident that distinctions of moral worth everywhere were first applied to men and then later, by extension, were established for actions; hence, it is a serious mistake when historians of morality take as a starting point questions like “Why was the compassionate action praised?” The noble kind of man experiences himself as a person who determines value and who does not need other people's approval. He makes the judgment "What is harmful to me is harmful in itself." He understands himself as something which in general first confers honour on things, as something which creates values. Whatever he recognizes in himself he honours. Such a morality is self-glorification. In the foreground stands the feeling of fullness, the power which wants to overflow, the happiness of high tension, the consciousness of riches which wants to give presents and provide:—the noble man also helps the unfortunate, however not, or hardly ever, from pity, but more in response to an impulse which the excess of power produces. The noble person honours the powerful man in himself and also the man who has power over himself, who understands how to speak and how to keep silent, who takes delight in dealing with himself severely and toughly, and who respects, above all, severity and toughness. "Wotan set a hard heart in my breast," it says in an old Scandinavian saga: that's poetry emerging from the soul of a proud Viking—and justifiably so. A man of this sort is simply proud of the fact that he has not been made for pity. That's why the hero of the saga adds a warning, "In a man whose heart is not hard when he is still young it will never become hard." Noble and brave men who think this way are furthest removed from that morality which sees the badge of morality specifically in pity or in actions for others or in désintéressement [disinterestedness]. The belief in oneself, pride in oneself, a fundamental hostility and irony against "selflessness" belong to noble morality, just as much as an easy contempt and caution before feelings of pity and the "warm heart." Powerful men are the ones who understand how to honour; that is their art, their realm of invention. The profound reverence for age and for ancestral tradition—all justice stands on this double reverence—the belief and the prejudice favouring forefathers and working against newcomers are typical in the morality of the powerful, and when, by contrast, the men of "modern ideas" believe almost instinctively in "progress" and the "future" and increasingly lack any respect for age, then in that attitude the ignoble origin of these "ideas" already reveals itself well enough. However, a morality of the rulers is most alien and embarrassing to present taste because of the severity of its basic principle that man has duties only with respect to those like him, that man should act towards those beings of lower rank, towards everything foreign, at his own discretion, or "as his heart dictates," and, in any case, "beyond good and evil." Here pity and things like that may belong. The capacity for and obligation to a long gratitude and a long revenge—both only within the circle of one's peers—the sophistication in paying back again, the refined idea in friendship, a certain necessity to have enemies (as, so to speak, drainage ditches for the feelings of envy, quarrelsomeness, and high spirits—basically in order to be capable of being a good friend): all those are typical characteristics of a noble morality, which, as indicated, is not the morality of “modern ideas” and which is thus nowadays difficult to sympathize with, as well as difficult to dig up and expose. Things are different with the second type of moral system, slave morality. Suppose the oppressed, depressed, suffering and unfree people, those ignorant of themselves and tired out, suppose they moralize: what will be the common feature of their moral estimates of value? Probably a pessimistic suspicion directed at the entire human situation will express itself, perhaps a condemnation of man, along with his situation. The gaze of a slave is not well disposed towards the virtues of the powerful; he possesses scepticism and mistrust; he has a subtlety of mistrust of everything “good” that is honoured in those virtues—he would like to persuade himself that even happiness is not genuine there. By contrast, those characteristics will be pulled forward and flooded with light which serve to mitigate existence for those who suffer: here respect is given to pity, to the obliging hand ready to help, to the warm heart, to patience, diligence, humility, and friendliness—for these are here the most useful characteristics and almost the only means to endure the pressure of existence. Slave morality is essentially a morality of utility. Here is the focus for the origin of that famous opposition of “good” and “evil”:—people sense power and danger within evil, a certain terror, subtlety, and strength that does not permit contempt to spring up. According to slave morality, the “evil” man thus inspires fear; according to master morality, it is precisely the “good” man who inspires and desires to inspire fear, while the “bad” man is felt as despicable. This opposition reaches its peak when, in accordance with the consequences of slave morality, finally a trace of disregard is also attached to the “good” of this morality—it may be light and benevolent—because within the way of thinking of the slave the good person must definitely be the harmless person: he is good natured, easy to deceive, perhaps a bit stupid, un bonhomme [a good fellow]. Wherever slave morality gains predominance the language reveals a tendency to bring the words “good” and “stupid” into closer proximity. A final basic difference: the longing for freedom, the instinct for happiness, and the refinements of the feeling for freedom belong just as necessarily to slave morality and morals as art and enthusiasm in reverence and in devotion are the regular symptoms of an aristocratic way of thinking and valuing. From this we can without further ado understand why love as passion—which is our European specialty—must clearly have a noble origin: as is well known, its invention belongs to the Provencal knightly poets, those splendidly inventive men of the “gay saber” [gay science] to whom Europe owes so much—almost its very self. 261 Vanity is among the things that are perhaps hardest for a noble man to understand: he will be tempted even to deny its existence where another kind of man thinks he has grasped it with both hands. For him the problem is imagining to himself beings who seek to elicit a good opinion of themselves which they themselves do not possess—and which, as a result, they also have not “earned”—people who, nonetheless, themselves later believe in this good opinion. Half of this seems to the noble man so tasteless and disrespectful of oneself and the other half so unreasonably baroque, that he would be happy to understand vanity as an exception and has doubts about it in most cases when people talk of it. For example, he'll say: "I can make a mistake about my own value and yet on the other hand still demand that my value, precisely as I determine it, is recognized by others—that, however, is not vanity (but arrogance or, in the more frequent cases, something called "humility" and "modesty"). Or again, "For many reasons I can take pleasure in the good opinion of others, perhaps because I honour and love them and enjoy all of their pleasures, perhaps also because their good opinion underscores and strengthens the faith I have in my own good opinion of myself, or perhaps because the good opinion of others, even in cases where I do not share it, is still useful to me or promises to be useful—but all that is not vanity." The noble man must first compel himself, particularly with the help of history, to see that since time immemorial, in all the levels of people dependent in some way or other, the common man was only what people thought of him:—not being at all accustomed to set values himself, he measured even himself by no value other than by how his masters assessed him (that is the essential right of masters, to create values). We should understand that, as the consequence of an immense atavism, the common man even today still always waits first for an opinion about himself and then instinctively submits himself to it: however, that is by no means merely to a "good" opinion, but also to a bad and unreasonable one (think, for example, of the greatest part of the self-assessment and self-devaluing which devout women learn from their father confessors and the devout Christian in general learns from his church). Now, in accordance with the slow arrival of the democratic order of things (and its cause, the blood mixing between masters and slaves), the originally noble and rare impulse to ascribe to oneself a value on one's own and "to think well" of oneself will really become more and more encouraged and widespread. But in every moment it has working against it an older, more extensive, and more deeply incorporated tendency—and where the phenomenon of "vanity" is concerned, this older tendency becomes master over the more recent one. The vain person takes pleasure in every good opinion which he hears about himself (quite apart from all considerations of its utility and equally apart from its truth or falsity), just as he suffers from every bad opinion. For he submits to both; he feels himself subjected to them on the basis of that oldest of instincts for submission which breaks out in him. It is "the slave" in the blood of the vain man, a trace of the slave's roguishness—and how much of the "slave" still remains nowadays in woman, for example!—that tries to tempt him into good opinions of himself; in the same way it's the slave who later prostrates himself immediately in front of these opinions, as if he had not summoned them up. —To state the matter once again: vanity is an atavism. 262 A species arises, a type becomes established and strong, under the long struggle with essentially unchanging, unfavourable conditions. By contrast, we know from the experience of breeders that species which receive an ultra-abundant nourishment and, in general, an increase in protection and care immediately tend towards variety in the type in the strongest manner and are rich in wonders and monstrosities (as well as monstrous vices). Now, let's look at an aristocratic commonwealth—for example, an ancient Greek polis [city state] or Venice—as an organization, whether voluntary or involuntary, for the purpose of breeding. There are men there living together who rely upon one another and who want their species to succeed mainly because it has to succeed or run the fearful risk of being annihilated. Here there is a lack of that advantage, that excess, that protection under which variations are encouraged. The species senses the need for itself as a species, as something which, particularly thanks to its hardness, uniformity, and simplicity of form, can generally succeed and enable itself to keep going in the constant struggles with neighbours or with the rebellious oppressed people or with those who threaten rebellion. The most varied experience teaches them which characteristics they have to thank, above all, for the fact that they are still there, in spite of all the gods and men, that they have always been victorious up to this point. These characteristics they call virtues, and they cultivate only these virtues to any great extent. They do that with severity—in fact, they desire severity. Every aristocratic morality is intolerant in its education of the young, its provisions for women, its marriage customs, its relationships between young and old, and its penal laws (which fix their eyes only on those who are deviants)—it reckons intolerance itself among the virtues, under the name “justice.” A type with few but very strong characteristics, a species of strict, warlike, shrewdly laconic people, close-knit and reserved (and, as such, having the most sophisticated feelings for the charm and nuances of society) in this way establishes itself over and above the changes in the generations. The constant struggle with unvarying, unfavourable conditions is, as mentioned, the factor that makes a type fixed and hard. Finally, however, at some point a fortunate time arises, which lets the immense tension ease. Perhaps there are no more enemies among the neighbours, and the means for living, even for enjoying life, are there in abundance. With one blow the bond and the compulsion of the old discipline are torn apart: that discipline no longer registers as necessary, as a condition of existence—if it wished to remain in existence, it could do so only as a form of luxury, as an archaic taste. Variation, whether as something abnormal (something higher, finer, and rarer) or as degeneration and monstrosity, suddenly bursts onto the scene in the greatest abundance and splendour; the individual dares to be individual and stand apart. At these historical turning points there appear alongside each other and often involved and mixed up together marvellous, multifaceted, jungle-like growths, an upward soaring, a kind of tropical tempo in competitiveness for growing and an immense annihilation and self-destruction, thanks to the wild egoisms turned against each other and, as it were, exploding, which wrestle with one another “for sun and light” and no longer know how to derive any limit, any restraint, or any consideration from the morality they have had up to that point. This very morality was the one which built up such immense power, which bent the bow in such a threatening manner—now, at this moment, it is and is becoming “outdated.” The dangerous and disturbing point is reached where the greater, more multifaceted, and more comprehensive life lives beyond the old morality; the “individual” stands there, forced to give himself his own laws, his own arts and tricks for self-preservation, self-raising, and self-redemption. Nothing but new what-for’s, nothing but new how-to’s, no common formulas any more, misunderstanding and contempt bound up together, decay, spoilage, and the highest desires tied together in a ghastly way, the genius of the race brimming over from all the horns of plenty with good and bad, an ominous simultaneous presence of spring and autumn, full of new charms and veils, characteristic of young, still unexhausted, still unwearied depravity. Once again there’s danger there, the mother of morality, great danger, this time transferred into the individual, into one’s neighbour and friend, into the alleyways, into one’s own child, into one’s own heart, into all the narrowest and most secret parts of one’s wishes and desires. What will the moral philosophers who emerge at such a time now have to preach? They discover, these keen observers and street loafers, that things are quickly coming to an end, that everything around them is going rotten and spreading corruption, that nothing lasts until the day after tomorrow, except for one kind of person, the incurably mediocre. Only the mediocre have the prospect of succeeding, of reproducing themselves—they are the people of the future, the only survivors, “Be like them! Become mediocre!”—from now on that’s the only morality that still makes sense, that people still hear.—But it is difficult to preach, this morality of mediocrity!—it may never admit what it is and what it wants! It must speak about restraint and worth and duty and love of one’s neighbour—it will have difficulty concealing its irony! 263 There is an instinct for rank which, more than anything, is already an indication of a high rank. There is a delight in the nuances of respect which permits us to surmise a noble origin and habits. The refinement, goodness, and loftiness of a soul are put to a dangerous test when something goes past in front of it which is of the first rank, but which is not yet protected by the fear of authority from prying clutches and crudities: something that goes its way unmarked, undiscovered, tentative, perhaps arbitrarily disguised and hidden, like a living touchstone. The man whose task and practice is to investigate souls will use precisely this art in a number of different forms in order to establish the ultimate value of a soul, the unalterable innate order of rank to which it belongs: he will put it to the test for its instinct of reverence. Différence engendre haine [Difference engenders hatred]: the nastiness of some natures suddenly spurts out like dirty water when some sacred container, some precious object from a locked shrine, or some book with marks of a great destiny is carried by. On the other hand, there is an involuntary falling silent, a hesitation in the eye, an end to all gestures, things which express that a soul feels close to something most worthy of reverence. The way in which reverence for the Bible in Europe has, on the whole, been maintained so far is perhaps the best piece of discipline and refinement of habits for which Europe owes a debt of thanks to Christianity: such books of profundity and ultimate significance need for their protection an externally imposed tyranny of authority in order to last for those thousands of years necessary to exhaust them and sort out what they mean. Much has been achieved when in the great mass of people (the shallow ones and all sorts of people with diarrhoea) the feeling has finally been cultivated that they are not permitted to touch everything, that there are sacred experiences before which they have to pull off their shoes and which they must keep their dirty hands off—this is almost the highest intensification of their humanity. By contrast, perhaps nothing makes the so-called educated people, those who have faith in “modern ideas,” so nauseating as their lack of shame, the comfortable impudence in their eyes and hands, with which they touch, lick, and grope everything, and it is possible that these days among a people, one still finds in the common folk, particularly among the peasants, more relative nobility of taste and tactful reverence than among the newspaper-reading demi-monde of the spirit, among the educated. 264 One cannot erase from a human being’s soul those actions which his ancestors loved most and carried out most steadfastly: whether they were, for example, industrious savers attached to a writing table and money box, modest and bourgeois in their desires, as well as modest in their virtues, or whether they were accustomed to live giving orders from morning until night, fond of harsh entertainment and, along with that, perhaps of even harsher duties and responsibilities; or whether, finally, they had at some time or other once sacrificed the old privileges of their birth and possessions in order to live entirely for their faith—for their “god”—as men of an unrelenting and delicate conscience, which blushes when confronted with any compromise. It is in no way possible that a man does not possess in his body the characteristics and preferences of his parents and forefathers, no matter what appearance might say to the contrary. This is the problem of race. If we know something about the parents, then we may draw a conclusion about the child: some unpleasant excess or other, some lurking envy, a crude habit of self-justification—these three together have at all times made up the essential type of the rabble—something like that must be passed onto the child as surely as corrupt blood, and with the help of the best education and culture people will succeed only in deceiving others about such heredity. And nowadays what else do education and culture want! In our age, one very much of the people—I mean to say our uncouth age—“education” and “culture” must basically be the art of deception—to mislead about the origin of the inherited rabble in one’s body and soul. Today an educator who preached truthfulness above everything else and constantly shouted at his students “Be true! Be natural! Act as you really are!”—even such a virtuous and true-hearted jackass would after some time learn to take hold of that furca [pitchfork] of Horace, in order to naturam expellere [drive out nature]. With what success? “Rabble” usque recurret [will always return].(1) 265 At the risk of annoying innocent ears, I propose the following: egoism belongs to the nature of the noble soul; I mean that unshakeable faith that to a being such as “we are” other beings must be subordinate by nature and have to sacrifice themselves. The noble soul takes this fact of its egoism without any question mark and without the feeling that there is anything harsh, compelled, or arbitrary in it, much more as something that may be established in the fundamental law of things. If he sought out a name for this, he would say “It is justice itself.” In some circumstances which make him hesitate at first, he admits that there are those with rights equal to his own. As soon as he has cleared up this question of rank, he moves among these equals who have the same rights as his with the same confident modesty and sophisticated reverence which he has in his dealings with himself—in accordance with an inborn heavenly mechanism which all the stars understand. It is one more part of his egoism, this sophistication and self-restraint in his relations with his equals—every star is such an egoist—: his soul honours itself in them and in the rights which it concedes to them. It has no doubt that the exchange of respect and rights, as the essential quality of all interactions, also belongs to the natural condition of things. The noble soul gives as it takes, out of the passionate and sensitive instinct for repayment, which lies deep within it. The idea “favour” has no sense and agreeable fragrance inter pares [among equals]; there may be a sublime manner of allowing presents from above to wash over one, as it were, and of drinking them up thirstily like water drops, but for these arts and gestures the noble soul has no skill. Here its egoism hinders it: in general, it is not happy to look “up above”—instead it looks either directly forward, horizontally and slowly, or down—it knows that it is on a height. 266 “We can only truly respect highly the man who is not seeking himself” Goethe to Councillor Schlosser. 267 There is a saying among the Chinese that mothers even teach their children: siao-sin, “Make your heart small!” This is the essential and basic tendency of late civilizations: I have no doubt that an ancient Greek would at once recognize this self-diminution in us contemporary Europeans as well—and for that reason alone we would already go “against his taste.” 268 Ultimately, what does it mean to be ignoble?—Words are sound signals for ideas, but ideas are more or less firm image signs for sensations which return frequently and occur together, for groups of sensations. To understand each other, it is not yet sufficient that people use the same words; they must also use the same words for the same form of inner experiences; in the end they must hold their experience in common with each other. That's why human beings belonging to a single people understand each other better among themselves than associations of different peoples, even when they use the same language; or rather, when human beings have lived together for a long time under similar conditions (climate, soil, danger, needs, work), then something arises out of that which "understands itself"—a people. In all souls, a similar number of frequently repeating experiences have won the upper hand over those which come more rarely; people understand each other on the basis of the former quickly and with ever-increasing speed—the history of language is the history of a process of abbreviation, and on the basis of this rapid understanding, people bind with one another, closely and with ever-increasing closeness. The greater the danger, the greater the need quickly and easily to come to agreement over what needs to be done; not to misunderstand each other when in danger is what people simply cannot do without in their interactions. With every friendship or love affair people still make this test: nothing of that sort lasts as soon as people reach the point where, with the same words, one of the two feels, means, senses, wishes, or fears something different from the other one. (The fear of the "eternal misunderstanding": that is the benevolent genius which so often prevents people of different sexes from over-hasty unions, to which their senses and hearts urge them—and not some Schopenhauerish "genius of the species"!—). Which groups of sensations within the soul wake up most rapidly, seize the word, give the order—that decides about the whole rank ordering of its values, that finally determines its tables of goods. The assessments of value in a man reveal something about the structure of his soul and where it looks for its conditions of life, its essential needs. Now, assume that need has always brought together only such people as could indicate with similar signs similar requirements and similar experiences, then it generally turns out that the easy ability to communicate need, that is, in the last analysis, familiarity with only average and common experiences, must have been the most powerful of all the forces which have so far determined things among human beings. People who are more similar and more ordinary have been and always are at an advantage; the more exceptional, more refined, rarer, and more difficult to understand easily remain isolated; in their isolation they are subject to accidents and rarely propagate themselves. People have to summon up huge counter-forces to check this natural, all-too-natural progressus in simile [advance into similarity], the further development of human beings into what's similar, ordinary, average, herd-like—into what's common. 269 The more a psychologist—a born and inevitable psychologist and diviner of the soul—turns himself towards exceptional examples and human beings, the greater the danger to him of suffocation from pity. He has to be hard and cheerful, more so than another man. For the corruption and destruction of loftier men, of the stranger type of soul, is the rule: it is terrible to have such a rule always before one's eyes. The multifaceted torment of the psychologist who has uncovered this destructiveness, who once discovers and then almost always rediscovers throughout all history this entire inner "hopelessness" of the loftier people, this eternal "too late!" in every sense—this torment can perhaps one day become the reason he turns with bitterness against his own lot, attempts self-destruction—and "corrupts" himself. With almost every psychologist we will see a revealing inclination for and delight in associating with ordinary and well-adjusted people: that indicates that he always needs healing, that he requires some sort of refuge and forgetting, far from what his insights and incisions, his "trade," have laid on his conscience. Fear of his memory is characteristic of him. He is easily reduced to silence before the judgments of others; he listens with an unmoving face as people revere, admire, love, and transfigure where he has seen, or he even hides his silence, while he expressly agrees with some foreground point of view or other. Perhaps the paradox of his situation gets so terrible that precisely where he has learned great pity as well as great contempt, the crowd, the educated, and the enthusiasts have for their part learned great admiration—the admiration for "great men" and miraculous animals for whose sake people bless and honour the fatherland, the earth, the value of humanity, and themselves, those to whom they draw the attention of the young and whom they use as role models in their education . . . And who knows whether in all great examples up to this point the very same thing has not happened: the crowd worshipped a god—and the "god" was only a poor sacrificial animal! Success has always been the greatest liar, and the "work" itself a success; the great statesman, the conqueror, or the discoverer is disguised in his creation to the point where he is unrecognizable; the "work" of the artist and of the philosopher first invents the man who has created it or is supposed to have created it; the "great men," as they are honoured, are small inferior works of fiction written later; in the world of historical values counterfeit is king. These great poets, for example, this Byron, Musset, Poe, Leopardi, Kleist, Gogol(2)—as they now are and perhaps had to be: men of the moment, enthusiastic, sensuous, childish, careless and sudden with trust and mistrust; with souls in which some fracture or other normally has to be concealed; often taking revenge in their works for an inner slur, often seeking with their flights upward to forget some all-too-true memory, often lost in the mud and almost infatuated, until they become like will o' the wisps around a swamp and pretend that they are stars—then the populace may well call them idealists—often struggling against a long disgust, with a recurring ghost of unbelief which makes them cold and forces them to yearn for gloria [glory] and to feed on "inherent faith" from the hands of intoxicated flatterers—what torture are these great artists and the loftier human beings in general for the man who has once guessed who they are! It is thus understandable that they should so readily experience from woman—who is clairvoyant in the world of suffering and who unfortunately also seeks to help and to save far beyond her powers—those eruptions of unlimited and most devoted pity which the crowd, above all the worshipping masses, does not understand and which it overwhelms with curious and complacent interpretations. This pity regularly deceives itself about its power; woman may believe that love can do everything—that's a belief essential to her. Alas, anyone who knows about the heart can guess how poor, stupid, helpless, presumptuous, mistaken, more easily destructive than saving even the best and deepest love is! It is possible that beneath the sacred story and charade of the life of Jesus there lies hidden one of the most painful examples of the martyrdom of knowledge about love: the martyrdom of the most innocent and most desiring heart, which was never satisfied with any human love, which demanded love, to be loved and nothing else, with hardness, with madness, with fearful outbreaks against those who denied him love; the history of a poor man unsatisfied and insatiable with love, who had to invent hell in order to send there those who did not wish to love him—and who finally, having grown to understand human love, had to invent a God who is entirely love, who is entirely capable of love—who takes pity on human love because it is so pathetic, so unknowing! Anyone who feels this way, who knows about love in this way—seeks death.—But why dwell on such painful things? Assuming we don't have to.— 270 The spiritual arrogance and disgust of every man who has suffered deeply—how profoundly men can suffer almost determines their order of rank—his chilling certainty, with which he is thoroughly soaked and coloured, that thanks to his suffering he knows more than the cleverest and wisest can know, that he has experienced and at some point been “at home” in many terrible far-off worlds, about which “you know nothing!” . . . this spiritual and silent arrogance of the sufferer, this pride of the one chosen to know, of the “initiate,” of the one who has almost been sacrificed, finds all kinds of disguise necessary to protect itself from contact with prying and compassionate hands and, in general, from everything which is not its equal in pain. Profound suffering ennobles; it separates. One of the most sophisticated forms of disguise is Epicureanism and a certain continuing courageousness in taste adopted as a show, which takes suffering lightly and resists everything sad and deep. There are “cheerful men” who use cheerfulness because it makes them misunderstood—they want to be misunderstood. There are “scientific people” who use science because that provides a cheerful appearance and because being scientific enables one to infer that the person is superficial—they want to seduce people to a false conclusion. There are free, impudent spirits who would like to hide and deny that they are broken, proud, incurable hearts; and now and then even foolishness is a mask for a disastrous, all-too-certain knowledge.(3) Hence, it follows that it's part of a more sophisticated humanity to have reverence "for the mask" and not to pursue psychology and curiosity in the wrong place. 271 What most profoundly divides two men is a different sense and degree of cleanliness. What help is all honesty and mutual utility, what help is all the good will for each other: in the end the fact remains—they "cannot bear to smell each other!" The highest instinct for cleanliness puts the person marked by it in the strangest and most dangerous isolation, like a saint: for that's simply what saintliness is—the highest spiritualization of the instinct in question. Any awareness of an indescribable abundance of pleasure in the bath, any lust and thirst which constantly drives the soul out of the night into the morning and out of cloudiness, the "affliction," into what is bright, gleaming, profound, and subtle; just as such a tendency singles out—it is a noble tendency—so it also separates. The pity of the saint is pity for the dirt of those who are human, all-too-human. And there are degrees and heights where the saint feels pity itself as contamination, as dirt . . . 272 Signs of nobility: never thinking of reducing our duties to duties for everyone; not wanting to give up one's own responsibility, not wanting to share it; to include our privileges and acting on them among one's duties. 273 A person who strives for something great looks at everyone he meets along his way either as a means or as a delay and an obstacle—or as a temporary place to rest. His characteristic high-quality goodness towards his fellow men is first possible when he has reached his height and governs. His impatience and his awareness that until that point he is always sentenced to comedy—for even war is a comedy and conceals, just as every means hides the end—corrupt all contacts for him: this kind of man knows loneliness and what is most poisonous in it. 274 The problem of those who wait. —For a higher man in whom the solution to a problem lies asleep, strokes of luck and all sorts of unpredictable things are necessary for him to swing into action at just the right time—"for an eruption," as we could say. Ordinarily it does not happen, and in all the corners of the earth people sit waiting, who hardly know to what extent they are waiting, but even less that they are waiting in vain. From time to time the call to wake up, that chance which provides "permission" for action, comes too late—at a time when their best youth and power for action have already been used up in sitting still. And many a man, in the very moment he "sprang up," has found to his horror that his limbs have gone to sleep and his spirit is already too heavy! "It is too late," he has said to himself, having lost faith in himself, and is now forever useless. —In the realm of genius, could "Raphael without hands," taking that phrase in the widest sense, perhaps not be the exception but the rule?(4)—Genius is perhaps not really so rare, but rather the five hundred hands needed to tyrannize the kairos, "the right time," to seize chance by the forelock!(5) 275 Anyone who does not want to see the height of a man looks all the more keenly at what is low and in his foreground—and in the process gives himself away. 276 With all kinds of injury and loss the lower and cruder soul is better off than the more noble one: the dangers for the latter must be greater; the probability that it will go wrong and die is even immense, given the multifaceted nature of its living conditions.—With a lizard a finger which has been lost grows back: not so with a man. 277 Bad enough! The old story again! When we have finished building our house, we suddenly notice that in the process we have learned something that we simply had to know before we started to build. The eternally tiresome “Too late!”—The melancholy of everything finished! . . . 278 Wanderer, who are you? I see you going on your way, without scorn, without love, with unfathomable eyes, damp and sad, like a lead sinker which has come back unsatisfied from every depth into the light—what was it looking for down there?—with a breast which does not sigh, with a lip which hides its disgust, with a hand which grasps only slowly: Who are you? What have you been doing? Have a rest here: this place is hospitable to everyone—relax! And whoever you happen to be, what would you like now? What do you need to recuperate? Just name it: what I have I’ll offer you! “For relaxation? For recuperation? O you inquisitive man, what are you talking about! But give me, I beg . . .” What? What? Say it!—“One more mask! A second mask!” . . . 279 Men of profound sorrow betray themselves when they are happy: they have a way of grabbing happiness as if they would like to overwhelm and strangle it from jealousy—alas, they know too well that it is running away from them! 280 “Bad! Bad! What? Is he not going—back?”—Yes! But you understand him badly if you complain about it. He’s going back, as every man does who wants to make a huge jump.— 281 “Will people believe it of me? But I demand that people believe it of me: I have always thought only badly of myself and about myself, only in very rare cases, only when under compulsion, always without delight ‘for the subject,’ ready to wander off from ‘myself,’ always without faith in the conclusion, thanks to the uncontrollable mistrust of the possibility of self-knowledge, which has taken me so far that I find even the idea of ‘immediate knowledge,’ which the theoreticians allow themselves, a contradictio in adjecto [contradiction in terms]: this entire fact is almost the surest thing I know about myself. Within me there must be some kind of aversion to believing anything definite about myself. Is a riddle perhaps hidden in that? Probably, but fortunately nothing for my own teeth. Perhaps it reveals the species to which I belong?—But not to me: and that’s enough to satisfy me. 282 “But what has happened to you?”—“I don’t know,” he said, hesitating; “perhaps the Harpies have flown over my table.”(6) Occasionally nowadays it happens that a mild, moderate, reserved man suddenly becomes violent, smashes plates, throws over the table, screams, stomps around, slanders the entire world—and finally turns aside, ashamed, furious with himself.—Where? What for? To starve off on his own? To suffocate on his memory? Anyone who has the desires of a lofty, discriminating soul and only rarely finds his table set and his nourishment ready will at all times be in great danger: but today the danger is extraordinary. Thrown into a noisy and uncouth age, with which he does not want to eat out of the same dish, he can easily perish from hunger and thirst, or, if he finally nonetheless “helps himself,”—from sudden disgust.—All of us have probably already sat at tables where we did not belong; and it’s precisely the most spiritual ones among us who are the most difficult to feed, who know that dangerous dyspepsia which comes from a sudden insight and disappointment about our food and those sitting next to us at the table—the after-dinner disgust. 283 Assuming that one wants to praise at all, there’s a refined and at the same time noble self-control that always gives praise only where one does not agree:—in other cases one would really be praising oneself, something that contradicts good taste—naturally, a self-control which provides a good opportunity and provocation for one to be constantly misunderstood. In order to permit oneself this true luxury of taste and morality, one must not live among spiritual fools, but rather among people whose misunderstandings and false ideas are still amusing for their sophistication—or one will have to pay dearly for it!—“He is praising me: thus, he admits I’m right”—this asinine way of making conclusions ruins half of life for us hermits, for it brings the asses into our neighbourhood and friendship. 284 To live with an immense and proud composure: always beyond.—To have and not have one’s feelings, one’s for and against, voluntarily, to condescend to them for hours, to sit on them, as if on a horse, often as if on a donkey:—for one needs to know how to use their stupidity as well as their fire. To preserve one’s three hundred foregrounds and one’s dark glasses: for there are occasions when no one should be allowed to look into our eyes, even less into our “reasons.” And to select for company that mischievous and cheerful vice, courtesy. And to remain master of one’s four virtues: courage, insight, sympathy, and solitude. For solitude is a virtue with us, as a sublime tendency and impulse for cleanliness, which senses how contact between one person and another—“in society”—must inevitably bring impurity with it. Every community somehow, somewhere, sometime makes people—“common.” 285 The greatest events and ideas—but the greatest ideas are the greatest events—are understood last of all: the generations contemporary with them do not experience such events—they go on living past them. What happens then is something like in the realm of the stars. The light of the most distant stars comes to men last of all: and before that light arrives, men deny that there are stars there. “How many centuries does a spirit need in order to be understood?”—that is also a standard with which people construct a rank ordering and etiquette, as is necessary, for spirit and star.— 286 “Here the view is free, the spirit elevated.”—But there is a reverse kind of person who is also on the heights and also has a free view—but who looks down. 287 What is noble? What does the word “noble” still mean to us nowadays? What reveals the noble human being, how do people recognize him, under this heavy, oppressive sky at the beginning of the rule of the rabble, which is making everything opaque and leaden?—It is not the actions that prove him—actions are always ambiguous, always inscrutable—; nor is it the “works.” Among artists and scholars today we find a sufficient number of those who through their works reveal how a profound desire for what is noble drives them: but this very need for what is noble is fundamentally different from the needs of the noble soul itself and is really the eloquent and dangerous indication that such a soul is lacking. It’s not the works; it’s the belief which decides here, which here establishes the order of rank, to take up once more an old religious formula with a new and more profound meaning: some basic certainty that a noble soul has about itself, something that does not allow itself to be sought out or found or perhaps even to be lost. The noble soul has reverence for itself.— 288 There are human beings who have spirit in an inevitable way. They may toss and turn as they wish and hold their hands in front of their tell-tale eyes (—as if the hand were not a giveaway!—): finally it always comes out that they have something they are hiding, that is, spirit. One of the most sophisticated ways to deceive, at least for as long as possible, and to present oneself successfully as stupider than one is—what in common life is often as desirable as an umbrella—is called enthusiasm, including what belongs with it, for example, virtue. For, as Galiani, who must have known, says: vertu est enthousiasme [virtue is enthusiasm]. 289 In the writings of a hermit we always hear something of the echo of a wasteland, something of the whispers and the timid gazing around of isolation; from his strongest words, even from his crying out, still resounds a new and more dangerous kind of silence, of concealment. Whoever has sat down, year in and year out, day and night, alone in an intimate dispute and conversation with his soul, whoever has become a cave bear or digger for treasure or guardian of treasure and dragon in his own cavern—it can be a labyrinth but also a gold mine—such a man’s very ideas finally take on a distinct twilight colouring and smell as much of mould as they do of profundity, something uncommunicative and reluctant, which blows cold wind over everyone passing by. The hermit does not believe that a philosopher—assuming that a philosopher has always first been a hermit—has ever expressed his real and final opinions in his books. Don’t people write books expressly to hide what they have stored inside them?—In fact, he will have doubts whether a philosopher could generally have “real and final” opinions, whether in his case behind every cave there does not lie, and must lie, an even deeper cavern—a more comprehensive, stranger, richer world beyond the surface, an abyss behind every ground, under every “foundation.” Every philosophy is a foreground philosophy—that is the judgment of a hermit: “There is something arbitrary about the fact that he remained here, looked back, and looked around, that at this point set his shovel aside and did not dig more deeply

—there is also something suspicious about it.” Every philosophy also hides a philosophy; every opinion is also a hiding place, every word is also a mask. 290 Every deep thinker is more afraid of being understood than of being misunderstood. In the latter case, perhaps his vanity suffers, but the former hurts his heart, his sympathy, which always says, “Alas, why do you want to have it as hard as I did?” 291 Man, a multifaceted, lying, artificial, and impenetrable animal, who spooks other animals less by his power than by his cunning and intelligence, has invented good conscience in order to enjoy his own soul for once as something simple; and all of morality is a long spirited falsification, thanks to which it’s at all possible to enjoy looking at the soul. From this point of view, perhaps much more belongs to the idea of “art” than people commonly believe. 292 A philosopher: that is a man who constantly experiences, sees, hears, suspects, hopes, and dreams extraordinary things; who is struck by his very own thoughts as if from outside, as if from above and below, as if they are events and lightning strikes tailor-made for him; who is himself perhaps a storm which moves along pregnant with new lightning flashes; a fateful man, around whom things always rumble and mutter and gape and proceed mysteriously. A philosopher: alas, a being that often runs away from himself, is often afraid of himself—but that is too curious not to “come back to himself” again and again. . . . 293 A man who says, “That pleases me. I take that for my own and will protect it and defend it against everyone,” a man who can lead a cause, put a decision into effect, remain true to an idea, hold on to a woman, punish and cast down an insolent person, a man who has his anger and his sword and to whom the weak, the suffering, the distressed, and even the animals are happy to go and belong to by nature—in short, a man who is naturally a master—when such a man has pity, well, this pity is worth something! But what is there in the pity of those who suffer! Or even of those who preach pity! Today in almost all of Europe there is a pathological susceptibility and sensitivity to pain, as well as a nasty lack of restraint in complaining, a mollycoddling, which likes to dress itself up with religion and philosophical bits and pieces as something loftier—there is a formal culture of suffering. In my view, the unmanliness of what is christened “pity” in such enthusiastic circles is what always strikes the eye first.—We must excommunicate this latest form of bad taste, powerfully and thoroughly; and finally I wish that people would set against their hearts and throats the good amulet “gai saber,”—“gay science,” to clarify this matter for the Germans. 294 The Olympian vice.—In spite of that philosopher who, as a genuine Englishman, tried to make laughing a defamation of character among all thinking men —“Laughter is a serious infirmity of human nature, which every thinking man will strive to overcome” (Hobbes)—I would really allow myself to order the ranks of philosophers according to the rank of their laughter—right up to those who are capable of golden laughter. And assuming that the gods also practise philosophy, a fact which many conclusions have already driven me to—I don't doubt that in the process they also know how to laugh in a superhuman and new way—and at the expense of all serious things! Gods delight in making fun: even where sacred actions are concerned, it seems they cannot stop laughing. 295 The genius of the heart, as that great hidden presence possesses it, the tempter-god and born pried piper of the conscience, whose voice knows how to climb down into the underworld of every soul, who does not say a word or cast a glance in which there does not lie some concern with and trace of temptation, whose mastery includes the fact that he understands how to seem—and not what he is, but what for those who follow him is one more compulsion to press themselves always closer to him, to follow him ever more inwardly and completely:—that genius of the heart who makes all noise and self-satisfaction fall silent and teaches it to listen, who smoothes out the rough souls and gives them a new desire to taste,—to lie still as a mirror so that the deep heaven reflects itself in them—; the genius of the heart who teaches the foolish and over-hasty hand to hesitate and reach out more delicately; who senses the hidden and forgotten treasure, the drop of goodness and sweet spirituality under the thick cloudy ice and is a divining rod for every grain of gold that has lain buried a long time in a dungeon crammed with mud and sand; the genius of the heart, at whose touch everyone goes forward richer, not divinely gifted and surprised, not as if delighted and oppressed with some foreign good, but richer in his own self, newer to himself than previously, broken open, blown upon and sounded out by a thawing wind, more uncertain perhaps, more tender, more fragile, more broken, but full of hopes that as yet have no names, full of new will and flowing, full of new irritations and opposing currents . . . But what am I doing, my friends? Whom am I speaking to you about? Have I forgotten myself so much that I have not once named him to you? Unless you have already guessed for yourselves who this questionable spirit and god is who wants to be praised in such a way. For just as things go with anyone who from the time he walked on childish legs has always been on the move and in alien territory, so many strange and not undangerous spirits have crossed my path, too, above all the one I have just been speaking about, who has come again and again, namely, no less a spirit than the god Dionysus, that enormously ambiguous and tempter god, to whom in earlier times, as you know, I offered up my first born, in all secrecy and reverence—as the last person, so I thought, who had offered a sacrifice to him: for I found no one who understood what I was doing then.(7) Meanwhile I learned a great deal, much too much, about the philosophy of this god, and, as mentioned, from mouth to mouth—I, the last disciple and initiate of the god Dionysus: and perhaps I can at last begin to give you, my friends, a little taste of this philosophy, as much as I am permitted? In a hushed voice, as is reasonable, for this concerns a number of things that are secret, new, strange, odd, and mysterious. Even the fact that

Dionysus is a philosopher and that the gods also carry on philosophy seems to me a novelty that is not harmless and that perhaps might excite mistrust precisely among philosophers—among you, my friends it has less against it, although it could be that it comes too late and not at the right moment: for it has been revealed to me that nowadays you are not happy to believe in god and gods. Also perhaps the fact that in my explanation I must proceed with more candour than is always pleasing to the strict habits of your ears? Certainly the god under discussion went further, very much further, in conversations like this and was always several steps ahead of me . . . In fact, if it were permitted, I would, following human practices, attach to him beautifully solemn names of splendour and virtue; I would have to lavish a great deal of praise on him for his courage as an explorer and discoverer, for his daring honesty, truthfulness, and love of wisdom. But such a god has no idea how to begin with all this venerable rubbish and pageantry. “Keep that,” he would say, “for yourself and people like you and anyone else who needs it! I have no reason to cover my nakedness!”—Do people sense that this type of divinity and philosopher perhaps lacks shame? He said it this way once, “In some circumstances, I love human beings”—and in saying that, he was alluding to Ariadne, who was present—“for me a human being is a pleasant, brave, inventive animal that has no equal on earth; it finds the right path even in every labyrinth.”(8) I like him: I often reflect how I could bring him further forwards and make him stronger, more evil, and more profound than he is.”—“Stronger, more evil, and more profound?” I asked shocked. “Yes,” he said once more, “stronger, more evil, and more profound, also more beautiful”—and with that the tempter god smiled with his halcyon smile, as if he had just uttered an enchanting compliment. We see here also that it is not just shame this divinity lacks—; and in general there are good reasons to suppose that in some things the gods collectively could learn from us human beings. We human beings are—more human. . . 296 Alas, what are you then, my written and painted thoughts! It’s not so long ago that you were still so colourful, young, and malicious, full of stings and secret seasonings, that you made me sneeze and laugh.—And now? You have already stripped off your novelty and some of you, I fear, are ready to become truths: you already look so immortal, so heartbreakingly honest, so boring! And was it ever different? What things we transcribe in our writing and painting, we mandarins with a Chinese brush, we immortalizers of things which let themselves be written—what are the only things we are capable of painting? Alas, only what is about to fade and is beginning to lose its fragrance! Alas, only storms which are worn out and withdrawing and old yellow feelings! Alas, only birds which have exhausted themselves flying and lost their way and now let themselves be caught by hand—by our hand! We immortalize what can no longer live and fly, only tired and crumbling things! And it is only your afternoon, my written and painted thoughts, for which I alone have colours, many colours perhaps, many colourful caresses and fifty yellows and browns and greens and reds:—but no one will sense from me how you looked in your dawn, you sudden sparks and miracles of my solitude, you, my old loved ones—my wicked thoughts! NOTES (1) Quintus Horatius Flaccus (65-8 BC) an important poet in classical Rome. [Back to Text] (2) The 1900 German edition adds here: “(I don’t dare mention greater names, but I have them in mind). [Back to Text] (3) The German edition of 1900 adds after the words “incurable hearts” the parenthetic comment: “(the cynicism of Hamlet, the case of Galiani).” [Back to Text] (4) Raphael (1483-1520): major Italian painter of the Renaissance. [Back to Text] (5) Nietzsche uses Greek letters here: καίρός. [Back to Text] (6) Harpies: mythological winged monsters who steal food. [Back to Text] (7) The “first work” Nietzsche is referring to is his Birth of Tragedy, published in 1872, in which he proposes the struggle between the Apollonian and Dionysian. [Back to Text] (8) Ariadne: in Greek mythology the daughter of Minos, king of Crete. She helped Theseus kill the Minotaur in the Labyrinth and escaped with him. When Theseus abandoned Ariadne, Dionysus fell in love with her. [Back to Text]

=====
 === End of Beyond Good and Evil (translated by Ian Johnston)
 =====
 ===

Part VIII

On the Genealogy of Morals

1887 — Translated by Ian Johnston

Nietzsche, Genealogy of Morals, Prologue Friedrich Nietzsche On the Genealogy of Morals A Polemical Tract Translated by Ian Johnston, Vancouver Island University Nanaimo, British Columbia, Canada For information on copyright and publication details, please use the following link: [Genealogy, Table of Contents. For a Rich Text Format version of this text, please use the following link: [Prologue. \[RTF\]](#), For a PDF file of the entire text of the Genealogy, use the following link (Genealogy, PDF) Prologue 1 We don't know ourselves, we knowledgeable people—we are personally ignorant about ourselves. And there's good reason for that. We've never looked for ourselves—how could it happen that one day we'd discover ourselves? With justice it's been said, "Where your treasure is, there shall your heart be also."⁽¹⁾ Our treasure lies where the beehives of our knowledge stand. We are always busy with our knowledge, as born winged creatures and collectors of intellectual honey. In our hearts we are concerned with really only one thing—to "bring something home." As far as the rest of life is concerned, what people call "experiences,"—who of us is serious enough for that? Or has enough time? In these matters, I fear, we've been "missing the point." Our hearts have simply not been engaged with that—nor, for that matter, have our ears! Instead we've been more like someone divinely distracted and self-absorbed into whose ear the clock has just pealed the twelve strokes of noon with all its force and who all at once wakes up and asks himself "What exactly did that clock strike?"—so now and then we even rub our ears afterwards and ask, totally surprised and completely embarrassed— "What have we really just experienced?" And more: "Who are we really?" Then, as I've mentioned, we count—after the fact—all the twelve trembling strokes of the clock of our experience, of our lives, of our being—alas! in the process we keep losing count . . . We remain simply and necessarily strangers to ourselves, we do not understand ourselves, we must be confused about ourselves. For us this proposition holds for all eternity: "Each man is furthest from himself"—where we ourselves are concerned, we are not "knowledgeable people" . . . 2 My thoughts about the origin of our moral prejudices—for this polemical tract is concerned about that origin—had their first brief, provisional expression in that collection of aphorisms which carried the title Human, All-too Human: A Book for Free Spirits, which I started to write in Sorrento, during a winter when I had the chance to pause, just as a traveller stops, and to look over the wide and dangerous land through which my spirit had wandered up to that point. This happened in the winter of 1876-77, but the ideas themselves are older. In the main points, they were already the same ideas which I am taking up again in the present essays:—let's hope that the long interval of time has done them some good, that they have become ripier, brighter, stronger, and more complete! But the fact that today I still stand by these ideas, that in the intervening time they themselves have constantly become more strongly associated with one another, in fact, have grown into each other and intertwined, that reinforces in me the joyful confidence that they may not have originally developed in me as single, random, or sporadic ideas, but up out of a common root, out of a fundamental will for knowledge ruling from deep within, always speaking with greater clarity, always demanding greater clarity. For that's the only thing appropriate to a philosopher. We have no right to be isolated in any way: we are not permitted either to make isolated mistakes or to run into truths in isolation. By contrast, our ideas, our values, our affirmations and denials, our if's and whether's grow out of us from the same necessity which makes a tree bear its fruit—totally related and interlinked amongst each other, witnesses of one will, one health, one soil, one sun.—As for the question whether these fruits of ours taste good to you—what does that matter to the trees! What concern is that to us, we philosophers! 3

Because of a doubt peculiar to my own nature, which I am reluctant to confess—for it concerns itself with morality, with everything which up to the present has been celebrated on earth as morality—a doubt which came into my life so early, so uninvited, so irresistibly, in such contradiction to my surroundings, my age, precedent, and my origin, that I would almost have the right to call it my “a priori [before experience]—because of this, my curiosity as well as my suspicion had to pause early on at the question of where our good and evil really originated. In fact, already as a thirteen-year-old lad, my mind was occupying itself with the problem of the origin of evil. At an age when one has “half children's play, half God in one's heart,” I devoted my first childish literary trifle, my first written philosophical exercise, to this problem—and so far as my “solution” to it at that time is concerned, well, I gave the honour to God, as is reasonable, and made him the father of evil. Is that precisely what my “a priori” demanded of me, that new immoral, at the very least unmoral “a priori” and the “categorical imperative” which spoke out from it, alas, so anti-Kantian and so cryptic, which I have increasingly listened to ever since—and not just listened to?(2) Luckily at an early stage I learned to separate theological prejudices from moral ones, and I no longer sought the origin of evil behind the world. Some education in history and philology, along with an inherently refined sense concerning psychological questions in general, quickly changed my problem into something else: Under what conditions did people invent for themselves those value judgments good and evil? And what value do they inherently possess? Have they hindered or fostered human wellbeing up to now? Are they a sign of some emergency, of impoverishment, of an atrophying life? Or is it the other way around? Do they indicate fullness, power, a will for life, its courage, its confidence, its future? To these questions I came across and proposed all sorts of answers for myself. I distinguished between ages, peoples, and different ranks of individuals. I kept refining my problem. Out of the answers arose new questions, investigations, assumptions, and probabilities, until at last I had my own country, my own soil, a totally secluded, flowering, blooming world, a secret garden, as it were, of which no one could have the slightest inkling. O how lucky we are, we knowledgeable people, provided only that we know how to stay silent long enough! 4 The initial stimulus to publish something of my hypotheses concerning the origin of morality was given to me by a lucid, tidy, clever, even precocious little book, in which for the first time I clearly ran into a topsy-turvy, perverse type of genealogical hypotheses—a genuinely English style. It drew me with that power of attraction that everything opposite, everything antipodal, contains. The title of this booklet was The Origin of the Moral Feelings, its author was Dr Paul Rée, and it appeared in the year 1877.(3) I have perhaps never read anything which I would have denied, statement by statement, conclusion by conclusion, as I did with this book, but entirely without any annoyance or impatience. In the work I mentioned above, with which I was engaged at the time, I made opportune and inopportune references to statements in Dr. Rée’s book, not in order to prove them wrong—what have I to do with preparing refutations!—but, as is appropriate to a positive spirit, to put in the place of something unlikely something more likely and, in some circumstances, in the place of some error another error. In that period, as I said, for the first time I brought into the light of day those hypotheses about genealogy to which these essays have been dedicated—but clumsily, as I myself would be the last to deny, still fettered, still without my own language for these concerns of mine, and with all sorts of retreating and vacillating. For particular details, you should compare what I say in Human, All-too Human, p. 51 [Section 45], about the double nature of the prehistory of good and evil (that is, in the spheres of the nobility and the slaves); similarly, pages 119 ff. [Section 136], concerning the worth and origin of ascetic morality, as well as pages 78, 82, and II, 35 [Sections 96, 99, and Volume II, Section 89] concerning the “Morality of Custom,” that much older and more primitive style of morality, which lies toto coelo [by all the heavens, i.e., absolutely] from the altruistic way of valuing (which Dr. Rée, like all English genealogists of morality, sees as the very essence of moral evaluation); similarly, page 74 Section 1.92; Wanderer, page 29 [Section 26]; and Daybreak, page 99 [Section 112], concerning the origin of justice as a compromise between approximately equal powers (equality as precondition of all contracts and therefore of all law); likewise concerning the origin of punishment in Wanderer, pages 25 and 34 [Sections 22 and 33], for which an intent to terrify is neither essential nor original (as Dr. Rée claims:—it is far more likely first brought in under a specific set of conditions and always as something incidental, something additional).(4) 5 Basically at that point the real concern for me at heart was something much more important than coming up with the nature of hypotheses about the origin of morality, either my own or from other people (or, more precisely stated—this latter issue was important to me only for the sake of a goal to which it is one way out of many). For me the issue was the value of morality—and in that matter I had to take issue almost alone with my great teacher Schopenhauer, the one to whom, as if to a contemporary, that book, with its passion and hidden contradiction, addresses itself (—for it, too, was a “polemical tract”).(5) The most specific issue was the worth of the “unegoistic,” of the instincts for pity, for self-denial, and for self-sacrifice, of things which Schopenhauer himself had painted with gold, deified, and projected into another world [verjenseitigt] for so long that they finally remained for him “value as such” and the reason why he said No to life and even to himself, as well. But a constantly more fundamental suspicion of these very instincts voiced itself in me, a scepticism which always dug deeper! It was precisely here that I saw the great danger to humanity, its most sublime temptation and seduction.—But in what direction? To nothingness?—It was precisely here I saw the beginning of the end, the standing still, the backward-glancing exhaustion, the will turning itself against life, the final illness tenderly and sadly announcing itself. I understood the morality of pity, which was always seizing more and more around it and which gripped even the philosophers and made them sick, as the most sinister symptom of our European culture, which itself had become sinister, as its detour to a new Buddhism? to a European Buddhism? to—nihilism? . . . This modern philosophical preference for and overvaluing of pity is really something new. Concerning the worthlessness of pity, philosophers up to now have been in agreement. I cite only Plato, Spinoza, La Rochefoucauld, and Kant—four spirits as different from one another as possible, but united in one thing, in the low value they set on pity.—(6) 6 This problem of the value of pity and of the morality of pity (—I’m an opponent of the disgraceful modern effeminacy of feeling—) appears at first to be only something isolated, a detached question mark. But anyone who remains here for a while and learns to ask questions will experience what happened to me:—a huge new vista opens up before him, a possibility grips him like an attack of dizziness, every kind of mistrust, suspicion, and fear springs up, his belief in morality, in all morality, totters—and finally he recognizes a new demand. Let’s proclaim this new demand: we need a critique of moral values, we must first question the very value of these values—and for that we need a knowledge of the conditions and circumstances out of which these values grew, under which they have developed and changed (morality as consequence, as symptom, as mask, as Tartufferie [hypocrisy], as illness, as misunderstanding, but also morality as cause, as means of healing, as stimulant, as scruple, as poison), a knowledge of a sort that has not been there up to this point, that has not even been wished for. We have taken the worth of these “values” as given, as self-evident, as beyond all dispute. Up until now people have not even had the slightest doubts about or wavered in setting up “the good man” as more valuable than “the evil man,” of higher worth in the sense of improvement, usefulness, and prosperity with respect to mankind in general (along with the future of humanity). What about this? What if the truth were the other way around? Well? What if in the “good man” there even lay a symptom of regression, like a danger, a seduction, a poison, a narcotic, something which, for example, made the present live at the cost of the future? Perhaps in greater comfort and less danger, but also on a smaller scale and in a more demeaning way? . . . So that morality itself would be guilty if the inherently possible highest power and magnificence of the human type were never attained? So that morality itself might be the danger of dangers? . . . 7 Suffice it to say that once this insight revealed itself to me, I had reasons to look around me for learned, bold, and hard-working comrades (today I’m still searching). It’s a matter of travelling through the immense, distant, and so secretive land of morality—morality which has really existed, which has really been lived—with nothing but new questions and, as it were, with new eyes. Isn’t that almost like discovering this land for the first time? . . . In this matter, it so happened that, among others I thought of, the above-mentioned Dr. Rée, because I had no doubts at all that by the very nature of his questions he would be driven on his own to a more correct methodology in order to arrive at any answers. Did I deceive myself in this? At any rate, my desire was to provide a better direction for such a keen and objective eye as his, a direction leading to a true history of morality, and to advise him in time against such an English way of making hypotheses into the blue. For, indeed, it’s obvious which colour must be a hundred times more important for a genealogist of morality than this blue: namely, gray, in other words, what has been documented, what can be established as the truth, what really took place, in short, the long and difficult-to-decipher hieroglyphic writing of the past in human morality.—This was unknown to Dr. Rée. But he had read Darwin:—and so to some extent in his hypotheses the Darwinian beast and the most modern modest and tender moral sensibility, which “no longer bites,” politely extend their hands to each other in a way that is at least entertaining—with the latter bearing a facial expression revealing a certain good-natured and refined indolence, in which is even mixed a grain of pessimism and exhaustion, as if it is really not worth taking all these things—the problems of morality—so seriously. (7) But for me things appear reversed: there are no issues at all which provide more incentives to take them seriously; among the rewards, for example, is the fact that one day perhaps people will be permitted to take them cheerfully. For cheerfulness, or, to say it in my own language, the gay science, is a reward, a reward for a lengthy, brave, hard-working, and underground seriousness, which, of course, is not something for everyone. But on that day when, from full hearts, we say “Forward! Our old morality also belongs in a comedy!” we’ll have discovered a new complication and possibility for the Dionysian drama of “the fate of the soul”:—and we can bet that he will put it to good use, the grand old immortal comic poet of our existence! . . . 8 If this writing is incomprehensible to someone or other and hurts his ears, the blame for that, it strikes me, is not necessarily mine. The writing is sufficiently clear given the conditions I assume—that people have first read my earlier writings and have taken some trouble to do so, for, in fact, these works are not easily accessible. For example, so far as my Zarathustra is concerned, I don’t consider anyone knowledgeable about it who has not at some time or another been deeply wounded by and profoundly delighted with every word in it.(8) For only then can he enjoy the privilege of sharing with reverence the halcyon element out of which that work was born, its sunny clarity, distance, breadth, and certainty. In other cases the aphoristic form creates difficulties. These stem from the fact that nowadays people do not take this form seriously enough. An aphorism, properly stamped and poured, has not yet been “deciphered” simply by being read. It’s much more the case that only now can one begin to explicate it, and that requires an art of interpretation. In the third essay of this book I have set out a model of what I call an “interpretation” for such a case.—In this essay an aphorism is presented, and the essay itself is a commentary on it. Of course, in order to practice this style of reading as art, one thing is above all essential, something that today especially has been preferably forgotten—and so it will require still more time before my writings are “readable”—something for which one almost needs to be a cow, at any rate not a “modern man”—rumination. Sils-Maria, Oberengadin July 1887

ENDNOTES

(1) The quotation is from Matthew 6.21. [Back to Text] (2) a priori: This phrase refers to some idea or capacity one possesses inherently, something not provided by experience (like the ability to reason without taking the senses into account). The phrase is commonly associated with the theories of Immanuel Kant (1724-1804) the great German philosopher; categorical imperative: the key phrase in Kant’s morality, the idea that moral action consists of acting upon a principle which could become a rational moral principle without creating a moral contradiction (“Act so that the maxim [which determines your will] may be capable of becoming a universal law for all rational beings”). [Back to Text] (3) Paul Rée (1849-1901): a German philosopher and friend of Nietzsche’s. [Back to Text] (4) Human, All-too Human was published in 1878, Wanderer in 1880 and Daybreak (or Dawn) in 1881. [Back to Text] (5) Arthur Schopenhauer

(1788-1860): German philosopher, whose work exercised a significant influence on Nietzsche, especially his emphasis on the importance of the human will. [Back to Text] (6) Plato (428-348 BC): the most important of the classical Greek philosophers; Baruch de Spinoza (1632-1677): Dutch philosopher; Francois de La Rochefoucauld (1613-1680): French author, famous for his maxims. [Back to Text] (7) Charles Darwin (1809-1882): English natural scientist whose Origin of Species was published in 1859. [Back to Text] (8) Nietzsche's Thus Spake Zarathustra was written between 1883 and 1885. [Back to Text] [Back to Genealogy of Morals, Table of Contents] [Link to Genealogy, Essay One] Nietzsche, Genealogy of Morals, Essay 1 Friedrich Nietzsche On the Genealogy of Morals A Polemical Tract Translated by Ian Johnston Vancouver Island University Nanaimo, British Columbia 2014 [Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text free of charge and without permission. They may also freely edit the text to suit their purposes. However, no commercial publication of this text or any part of it is permitted without permission of the translator. For any questions or comments please contact Ian Johnston. Note that in the following text, the words within square brackets have been added by the translator. The numbers in curved brackets indicate links to explanatory endnotes provided by the translator.] If you would like to download a Rich Text Format (Word) text of this text, please use the following link: [Genealogy 1 \[RTF\] First Essay Good and Evil, Good and Bad 1](#) —These English psychologists, whom we have to thank for the only attempts up to this point to produce a history of the origins of morality—in themselves they serve up to us no small riddle. By way of a living riddle, they even offer, I confess, something substantially more than their books—they are interesting in themselves! These English psychologists—what do they really want? We find them, willingly or unwillingly, always at the same work, that is, shoving the partie honteuse [shameful part] of our inner world into the foreground and looking for the truly effective and operative factor which has determined our development in the very place where man's intellectual pride would least wish to find it (for example, in the vis inertiae [force of inertia] of habit or in forgetfulness or in a blind, contingent, mechanical joining of ideas or in something purely passive, automatic, reflex, molecular, and fundamentally stupid)—what is it that really drives these psychologists always in this particular direction? Is it a secret, malicious, and common instinct, perhaps one which cannot be acknowledged even to itself, for belittling humanity? Or something like a pessimistic suspicion, the mistrust of idealists who've become disappointed, gloomy, venomous, and green? Or a small underground hostility and rancune [rancour] towards Christianity (and Plato), which perhaps has never once managed to cross the threshold of consciousness? Or even a lecherous taste for what is odd or painfully paradoxical, for what in existence is questionable and ridiculous? Or finally—a bit of all of these: a little vulgarity, a little gloominess, a little hostility to Christianity, a little thrill, and a need for pepper? . . . But I'm told that these men are simply old, cold, boring frogs, who creep and hop around and into people, as if they were in their own proper element, that is, in a swamp. I resist that idea when I hear it. What's more, I don't believe it. And if one is permitted to hope where one cannot know, then I hope from my heart that the situation with these men might be reversed, that these investigators and the ones peering at the soul through their microscopes may be thoroughly brave, generous, and proud animals, who know how to control their hearts and their pain and who at the same time have educated themselves to sacrifice all desirability for the sake of the truth, for the sake of every truth, even the simple, bitter, hateful, repellent, unchristian, immoral truth. . . . For there are such truths. — 2 So all respect to the good spirits that may govern in these historians of morality! But it's certainly a pity that they lack the historical spirit, that they've been left in the lurch especially by all the good spirits of history itself! As a group they all think essentially unhistorically, in what is now the traditional manner of philosophers. Of that there is no doubt. The incompetence of their genealogies of morals reveals itself at the very beginning, where the issue is to determine the origin of the idea and of the judgment "good." "People," so they proclaim, "originally praised unegoistic actions and called them good from the perspective of those for whom they were done, that is, those for whom such actions were useful. Later people forgot how this praise began, and simply because unegoistic actions had, according to custom, always been praised as good, people also felt them as good—as if they were something inherently good." We perceive right away that this initial derivation already contains all the typical characteristics idiosyncrasies of English psychologists—we have "usefulness," "forgetting," "habit," and finally "error," all as the foundation for an evaluation in which the higher man up to this time has taken pride, as if it were a sort of privilege of men generally. This pride is to be humbled, this evaluation of worth emptied of value. Has that been achieved? . . . Now, first of all, it's obvious to me that from this theory the essential source for the origin of the idea "good" has been sought for and established in the wrong place: the judgment "good" does not originate from those to whom "goodness" was shown! On the contrary, it was the "good people" themselves, that is, the noble, powerful, higher-ranking, and higher-thinking people who felt and set themselves and their actions up as good, that is to say, of the first rank, in opposition to everything low, low-minded, common, and vulgar. From this pathos of distance they first arrogated to themselves the right to create values, to stamp out the names for values. What did they care about usefulness! Particularly in relation to such a hot pouring out of the highest rank-ordering, rank-setting judgments of value, the point of view which considers utility is as foreign and inappropriate as possible. Here the feeling has reached the very opposite of the low level of warmth which is a condition for that calculating shrewdness, that reckoning by utility—and not just for a moment, not for one exceptional hour, but permanently. The pathos of nobility and distance, as I mentioned, the lasting and dominating feeling, something total and fundamental, of a higher ruling nature in relation to a lower type, to a “beneath”—that is the origin of the opposition between “good” and “bad.” (The right of the master to give names extends so far that we could permit ourselves to grasp the origin of language itself as an expression of the power of the rulers: they say “That is such and such”; they seal every object and event with a sound, and in the process, as it were, take possession of it.) Given this origin, the word “good” is from the start in no way necessarily tied up with “unegoistic” actions, as it is in the superstition of those genealogists of morality. Instead that occurs for the first time with the decline of aristocratic value judgments, when this entire contrast between “egoistic” and “unegoistic” presses itself ever more strongly into the human conscience—it is, to use my own words, the instinct of the herd which, through this contrast, finally gets its word (and its words). And even then, it takes a long time until this instinct in the masses becomes master, so that moral evaluation remains thoroughly hung up on and bogged down in that opposition (as is the case, for example, in modern Europe: today the prejudice that takes “moralistic,” “unegoistic,” and “désintéressé [disinterested]” as equally valuable ideas already governs with the force of a “fixed idea” and a disease of the brain). 3 Secondly, however, and quite apart from the fact that this hypothesis about the origin of the value judgment “good” is historically untenable, it suffers from an inherent psychological contradiction. The utility of the unegoistic action is supposed to be the origin of the praise it receives, and this origin has allegedly been forgotten:—but how is this forgetting even possible? Could the usefulness of such actions at some time or other perhaps just have stopped? The opposite is the case: this utility has rather been an everyday experience throughout the ages, and thus something that has always been constantly re-emphasized. Hence, instead of disappearing from consciousness, instead of becoming something forgettable, it must have pressed itself into the consciousness with ever-increasing clarity. How much more sensible is that contrasting theory (which is not therefore closer to the truth—) advocated, for example, by Herbert Spencer: he proposes that the idea “good” is essentially the same as the idea “useful” or “functional,” so that in judgments “good” and “bad” human beings sum up and endorse the experiences they have not forgotten and are unable to forget concerning the useful-functional and the harmful-useless.(1) According to this theory, good is something which has always proved useful, so that it may assert its validity as “valuable in the highest degree,” as “valuable in itself.” This path to an explanation is, as I said, also false, but at least the account itself is inherently sensible and psychologically tenable. 4 I was given a hint of the right direction by the following question: What, from an etymological perspective, do the meanings of “good,” as manifested in different languages, really signify? There I found that all of them lead back to the same transformation of ideas—that everywhere “noble” and “aristocratic” in a social sense is the fundamental idea out of which “good” in the sense of “spiritually noble,” “aristocratic,” “spiritually high-minded,” “spiritually privileged” necessarily develops, a process which always runs in parallel with that other one that finally transforms “common,” “vulgar,” and “low” into the concept “bad.” The most eloquent example of the latter is the German word “(schlect [bad])” itself, which is identical with the word “schlicht [plain]” — compare “schlectweg [simply]” and “schlechterdings [simply]”—and which originally designated the plain, common man, still without any suspicious side glance, simply in contrast to the noble man. Around the time of the Thirty Years War approximately, hence late enough, this sense changed into the one used now.

(2) As far as the genealogy of morals is concerned, this point strikes me as a fundamental insight; that it was first discovered so late we can ascribe to the repressive influence which democratic prejudice in the modern world exercises concerning all questions of origin. And this occurs in what appears to be the most objective realm of natural science and physiology, a point I can only hint at here. But the sort of mischief this prejudice can cause, once it has become unleashed and turned into hatred, particularly where morality and history are concerned, is revealed in the well-known case of Buckle: the plebeian nature of the modern spirit, which originated in England, broke out once again on its home turf, as violently as a muddy volcano and with that salty, over-loud, and common eloquence with which all previous volcanoes have spoken up to now.

(3) 5 With respect to our problem—which for good reasons we can call a quiet problem and which addresses in a refined manner only a few ears—there is no little interest in establishing the point that often in those words and roots which designate “good” there still shines through the main nuance of what made the nobility feel they were men of higher rank. It’s true that in most cases they perhaps name themselves simply after their superiority in strength (as “the powerful,” “the masters,” “those in command”) or after the most visible sign of this superiority, for example, as “the rich” or “the owners” (that is the meaning of arya [noble], and the corresponding words in Iranian and Slavic). But they also name themselves after a typical characteristic, and this is the case which is our concern here. For instance, they call themselves “the truthful,” above all the Greek nobility, whose mouthpiece is the Megarian poet Theognis.

(4) The word developed for this characteristic, ἔσθλος [esthlos: fine, noble], indicates, according to its root meaning, a man who is, who possesses reality, who really exists, who is true. Then, with a subjective transformation, it indicates the true man as the truthful man. In this phase of conceptual transformation it becomes the slogan and catch phrase for the nobility, and its sense shifts entirely over to mean “aristocratic,” to mark a distinction from the lying common man, as Theogonis takes and presents him—until finally, after the decline of the nobility, the word remains as a designation of spiritual noblesse [nobility] and becomes, as it were, ripe and sweet. In the word κακός [kakos: weak, worthless], as in the word δειλός [deilos: cowardly] (the plebeian in contrast to the ἀγαθός [agathos: good man]), the cowardice is emphasized. This perhaps provides a hint about the direction in which we have to seek the etymological origin for the multiple meanings of ἀγαθός [agathos: good]. In the Latin word malus [bad] (which I place alongside μέλας [melas: black, dark]) the common man could be designated as the dark-coloured, above all as the dark-haired (“hic niger est” [“this man is dark”]), as the pre-Aryan inhabitant of Italian soil, who through this colour stood out most clearly from those who became dominant, the blonds, that is, the conquering races of Aryans. At any rate, Gaelic offers me an exactly corresponding example—the word fin (for example, in the name Fin-Gal), the term designating nobility and finally the good, noble, and pure, originally referred to the blond-headed man in contrast to the dusky, dark-haired original inhabitants. Incidentally, the Celts were a thoroughly blond race. People are wrong when they link those traces of a basically dark-haired population, which are noticeable on the carefully prepared ethnographic maps of Germany, with any Celtic origin and mixing of blood, as Virchow still does.⁽⁵⁾ It is much rather the case that in these places the pre-Aryan population of Germany predominates. (The same is true for almost all of Europe: essentially the conquered races have finally attained the upper hand for themselves once again in colour, shortness of skull, perhaps even in the intellectual and social instincts. Who can confirm for us that modern democracy, the even more modern anarchism, and indeed that preference for the “Commune,” for the most primitive form of society, which all European socialists now share, does not indicate for the most part a monstrous throwback [Nachschlag]—and that the conquering master race, the race of Aryans, is not being physiologically defeated, too?). The Latin word bonus [good] I believe I can explicate as “the warrior,” provided that I am correct in tracing bonus back to an older word duonus (compare (T)bellum [war] = duellum [war] = duen-lum, which seems to me to contain that word duonus). Hence, bonus as a man of war, of division (duo [two]), as a warrior. We see what constituted a man’s “goodness” in ancient Rome. What about our German word “Gut” [good] itself? Doesn’t it indicate “den Göttlichen” [the god-like man], the man of “göttlichen Geschlechts” [“the family of gods”]? And isn’t that identical to the people’s (originally the nobles’) name for the Goths? The reasons for this hypothesis do not belong here.— 6 To this rule that the concept of political superiority always resolves itself into the concept of spiritual superiority, it is at first not an exception (although it may provide room for exceptions), when the highest caste is also the priestly caste and consequently for its overall description prefers an attribute which recalls its priestly function. Here, for example, the words “pure” and “impure” first appear as contrasting marks of one’s social position, and here, too, a “good” and a “bad” also develop later with a meaning which no longer refers to social position. Incidentally, people should be warned not to begin by taking these ideas of “pure” and “impure” too seriously, too broadly, or even symbolically. Instead they should understand that all the ideas of ancient humanity, to a degree we can hardly imagine, are originally much more coarse, crude, superficial, narrow, blunt, and, in particular, unsymbolic. The “pure man” is initially simply a man who washes himself, who forbids himself certain foods that produce diseases of the skin, who doesn’t sleep with the dirty women of the lower people, who has a horror of blood—no more, not much more! On the other hand, of course, from the very nature of an essentially priestly aristocracy it is clear enough how precisely here the opposition between different evaluations could early on become dangerously internalized and sharpened. And, in fact, they finally ripped open fissures between man and man, over which even an Achilles of the free spirit could not cross without a shudder.

(6) From the beginning there has been something unhealthy about such priestly aristocracies and about the customary attitudes which govern in them, which turn away from action, sometimes brooding, sometimes exploding with emotion, as a result of which in the priests of almost all ages there have appeared almost unavoidably those debilitating intestinal illnesses and neurasthenia. But what they themselves came up with as a remedy for this pathological disease—surely we must assert that it has finally shown itself, through its effects, even a hundred times more dangerous than the illness for which it was to provide relief. Human beings themselves are still sick from the after-effects of this priestly naïveté in healing! Let’s think, for example, of certain forms of diet (avoiding meat), of fasting, of celibacy, of the flight “into the desert” (Weir-Mitchell’s isolation, but naturally without the fattening-up cure and overeating which follow it and which constitute the most effective treatment for all hysteria induced by the ascetic ideal): consider also the whole metaphysic of the priests, so hostile to the senses, making men lazy and sophisticated, the way they hypnotize themselves in the manner of fakirs and Brahmins—Brahmanism employed as a crystal ball and fixe Idee [fixed idea]—and finally the only too understandable and common dissatisfaction with its radical cure, with nothingness (or God—the desire for a unio mystica [mystical union] with God is the longing of the Buddhist for nothingness, nirvana—and nothing more!).(7) Among the priests, everything simply becomes more dangerous—not only the remedies and arts of healing, but also pride, vengeance, mental acuity, dissipation, love, thirst for power, virtue, and illness—although it’s fair enough also to add that on the foundation of this fundamentally dangerous form of human existence, the priestly, for the first time the human being became, in general, an interesting animal, that here the human soul first attained depth in a higher sense and became evil—and, indeed, these are the two basic reasons for humanity's superiority, up to now, over other animals! You will have already guessed how easily the priestly way of evaluating can split from the knightly-aristocratic and then continue to develop into its opposite. Such a development receives a special stimulus every time the priestly caste and the warrior caste confront each other jealously and are not willing to agree amongst themselves about the reward. The knightly-aristocratic judgments of value have as their basic assumption a powerful physicality, a blooming, rich, even overflowing health, together with those things required to maintain these qualities—war, adventure, hunting, dancing, war games, and, in general, everything which involves strong, free, and happy action. The priestly-noble method of evaluating has, as we saw, other preconditions: these make it difficult enough for them when it comes to war! As is well known, priests are the most evil of enemies—but why? Because they are the most powerless. From their powerlessness, their hate grows among them into something huge and terrifying, to the most spiritual and most poisonous manifestations. The really great haters in world history and also the cleverest haters have always been priests—in comparison with the spirit of priestly revenge all the remaining spirits are hardly worth considering at all. Human history would be a really stupid affair without the spirit that entered it from the powerless. Let us quickly consider the greatest example. Nothing on earth which has been done against “the nobility,” “the powerful,” “the masters,” and “the possessors of power” is worth mentioning in comparison with what the Jews have done against them: the Jews, that priestly people, who knew how to get final satisfaction from their enemies and conquerors merely through a radical transformation of their values, that is, through an act of the most spiritual revenge. This was appropriate only to a priestly people with the most deeply suppressed priestly desire for revenge. In opposition to the aristocratic value equation (good = noble = powerful = beautiful = fortunate = loved by god), the Jews, with a consistency inspiring fear, dared to reverse things and to hang on to that with the teeth of the most profound hatred (the hate of powerlessness), that is, to “only those who suffer are good; the poor, the powerless, the low are the only good people; the suffering, those in need, the sick, the ugly are also the only pious people; only they are blessed by God; for them alone there is salvation.—By contrast, you privileged and powerful people, you are for all eternity the evil, the cruel, the lecherous, the insatiable, the godless; you will also be the unblessed, the cursed, and the damned for all eternity!” . . . We know who inherited this Judaic transformation of values . . . In connection with that huge and immeasurably disastrous initiative which the Jews launched with this most fundamental of all declarations of war, I recall the sentence I wrote at another time (in Beyond Good and Evil, page 118

(T)[Section 195])—namely, that with the Jews the slave rebellion in morality begins: that rebellion which has a two-thousand-year-old history behind it and which we nowadays no longer even notice because it—has triumphed.(8) 8 But you fail to understand that? You have no eye for something that needed two millennia to emerge victorious? . . . That’s nothing to wonder at: all lengthy things are hard to see, to assess. However, that is what took place: out of the trunk of that tree of vengeance and hatred, of Jewish hatred—the deepest and most sublime hatred, that is, a hatred which creates ideals and transforms values, something whose like has never existed on earth—from that grew something just as incomparable, a new love, the most profound and most sublime of all the forms of love:—from what other trunk could it have even grown? . . . However, one should not assume that this love arose essentially as the denial of that thirst for revenge, as the opposite of Jewish hatred! No. The reverse is the truth! This love grew out of that hatred, as its crown, as the victorious crown unfolding itself wider and wider in the purest brightness and radiant sunshine, the crown which, so to speak, was seeking in the kingdom of light and height the goal of that hate, aiming for victory, trophies, and seduction, with the same urgency with which the roots of that hatred were sinking down ever deeper and more greedily into everything profound and evil. This Jesus of Nazareth, the personified evangelist of love, this “Saviour” bringing holiness and victory to the poor, to the sick, to the sinners—was he not that very seduction in its most sinister and most irresistible form, the seduction and detour to exactly those Judaic values and innovations in ideals? Didn’t Israel attain, precisely with the detour of this “Saviour,” of this apparent enemy against and dissolver of Israel, the final goal of its sublime thirst for vengeance? Isn’t it part of the secret black art of a truly great politics of revenge, a farsighted, underground, slowly expropriating, and premeditated revenge, that Israel itself had to disown and nail to the cross, like some mortal enemy, the tool essential to its revenge before all the world, so that “all the world,” that is, all Israel’s enemies, could then take this particular bait without a second thought? On the other hand, could anyone, using the full subtlety of his mind, even imagine a more dangerous bait, something to match the enticing, intoxicating, narcotizing, corrupting power of that symbol of the “holy cross,” that ghastly paradox of a “god on the cross,” that mystery of an unimaginable and ultimate final cruelty and self-crucifixion of God for the salvation of mankind? . . . At least it is certain that sub hoc signo [under this sign] Israel, with its vengeance and revaluation of the worth of all other previous values, has triumphed again and again over all other ideals, over all nobler ideals. 9 —”But what are you doing still talking about nobler ideals! Let’s follow the facts: the people have triumphed—or ‘the slaves,’ or ‘the rabble,’ or ‘the herd,’ or whatever you want to call them—if this has taken place because of the Jews, then good for them! No people ever had a more world-historical mission. ‘The masters' have been disposed of. The morality of the common man has prevailed. We may also take this victory as a blood poisoning (it did mix the races up together)—I don't deny that. But this intoxication has undoubtedly been successful. The 'salvation' of the human race (namely, from 'the masters') is well under way. Everything is visibly turning Jewish or Christian or plebeian (what do the words matter!). The progress of this poison through the entire body of humanity seems irresistible, although its tempo and pace may seem from now on constantly slower, more delicate, less audible, and more circumspect—well, we have time enough. . . . From this point of view, does the church today still have necessary work to do, does it still have a right to exist at all? Or could we dispense with it? Quaeritur [That's a question to be asked]. It seems that it rather obstructs and hinders the progress of that poison, instead of speeding it up? Well, that just might be what makes the church useful Certainly the church is for all intents and purposes something gross and vulgar, which a more delicate intelligence, a truly modern taste, resists. Shouldn't the church at least be something more sophisticated? Today it alienates more than it seduces. . . . Who among us would really be a free spirit if the church were not there? The church repels us, not its poison. . . . Apart from the church, we even love the poison. . . .”—This is the epilogue of a “freethinker” to my speech, an honest animal, as he has richly revealed, and in addition a democratic one. He listened to me up to that point and could not bear to hear my silence—since for me at this juncture there is much to be silent about. 10 The slave revolt in morality begins when the ressentiment itself becomes creative and gives birth to values: the ressentiment of those beings who are prevented from a genuine reaction, that is, something active, and who compensate for that with a merely imaginary vengeance.(9) Whereas all noble morality grows out of a triumphant affirmation of one's own self, slave morality from the start says “No” to what is “outside,” “other,” “not itself.” And this “No” is its creative act. This transformation of the glance which confers value—this necessary projection towards what is outer instead of back onto itself—that is inherent in ressentiment. In order to arise, slave morality always requires first an opposing world, a world outside itself. Psychologically speaking, it needs external stimuli in order to act at all—its action is basically reaction. The reverse is the case with the noble method of valuing: it acts and grows spontaneously. It seeks its opposite only to affirm its own self even more thankfully, with even more rejoicing—its negative concept of “low,” “common,” “bad” is merely a pale contrasting image after the fact in relation to its positive basic concept, thoroughly saturated with life and passion, “We are noble, good, beautiful, and happy!” When the noble way of evaluating makes a mistake and abuses reality, this happens with reference to the sphere which it does not know well enough, indeed, the sphere it has strongly resisted learning the truth about: under certain circumstances it misjudges the sphere it despises, the sphere of the common man, of the low people. On the other hand, even if we assume that the feeling of contempt, of looking down, or of looking superior falsifies the image of the person despised, we should note that such distortion will fall short by a long way of the distortion with which the suppressed hatred and vengeance of the powerless man assaults his opponent—naturally, in effigy. In fact, contempt contains too much negligence, too much lack of concern, too much looking away and impatience mixed in with it, even too much of a personal feeling of joy, for it to be capable of converting its object into a truly distorted image and monster. We should not fail to hear the almost benevolent nuances which, for example, the Greek nobility places in all the words with which it separates itself from the lower people—how a constant form of pity, consideration, and forbearance is mixed in there, sweetening the words, to the point where almost all words referring to the common man finally remain as expressions for “unhappy” and “worthy of pity” (compare δειλός [deilos: cowardly], δειλῆσιος [delaios: mean, low], πονηρός [poneros: oppressed by toil, wretched], μοχθηρός [mochtheros: suffering, wretched]—the last two basically designating the common man as a slave worker and beast of burden)—and how, on the other hand, for the Greek ear the words “bad,” “low,” and “unhappy” have never stopped echoing a single note, one tone colour, in which “unhappy” predominates. This is the inheritance of the old, nobler, and aristocratic way of evaluating, which does not betray its principles even in contempt. (—Philologists should recall the sense in which οἰζυρός [oizuros: miserable], ἀνόλβος [anolbos: unblest], τλήμων [tlemon: wretched] δυστυχεῖν [dystychein: unfortunate] and ξυμφορά [xymfora: misfortune] were used). The “well born” simply felt they were “the happy ones”; they did not have to construct their happiness artificially first by looking at their enemies, or in some circumstances to talk themselves into it, to lie to themselves into it (the way all men of resentment habitually do). Similarly they knew, as complete men overloaded with power and thus necessarily active, that they must not separate action from happiness—they considered being active necessarily associated with happiness (that’s where the phrase εὖ πράττειν [eu prattein: do well, succeed] derives its origin)—all this is very much the opposite of “happiness” at the level of the powerless and oppressed, those festering with poisonous and hostile feelings, among whom happiness comes out essentially as a narcotic, an anaesthetic, quiet, peace, “Sabbath,” relaxing the soul, and stretching one’s limbs, in short, as something passive. While the noble man lives for himself with trust and candour (γενναῖος [gennaios], meaning “of noble birth,” stresses the nuance “upright” and also probably “naive”), the man of resentment is neither upright nor naive, nor honest and direct with himself. His soul squints. His spirit loves hiding places, secret paths, and back doors. Everything furtive attracts him as his world, his security, his refreshment. He understands about remaining silent, not forgetting, waiting, temporarily diminishing himself, humiliating himself. A race of such men of resentment will inevitably end up cleverer than any noble race. It will also value cleverness to a completely different extent, that is, as a condition of existence of the utmost importance; whereas, cleverness among noble men easily acquires a delicate aftertaste of luxury and sophistication about it:—here it is simply far less important than the complete functional certainty of the ruling unconscious instincts or even a certain lack of cleverness, something like brave recklessness, whether in the face of danger or of an enemy, or those wildly enthusiastic, sudden fits of anger, love, reverence, thankfulness, and vengeance, by which in all ages noble souls have recognized each other. The resentment of the noble man himself, if it comes over him, consumes and exhausts itself in an immediate reaction and therefore does not poison. On the other hand, in countless cases it just does not appear at all; whereas, in the case of all weak and powerless people it is unavoidable. Being unable to take one's enemies, one's misfortunes, even one's bad deeds seriously for any length of time—that is the mark of strong, complete natures, in whom there is a surplus of plastic, creative, healing power, as well as the power to make one forget (a good example for that from the modern world is Mirabeau, who had no memory of the insults and the maliciousness people directed at him and who therefore could not forgive, merely because he—forgot). Such a man with a single shrug simply throws off himself the many worms which eat into other men.⁽¹⁰⁾ Only here is the real “love for one's enemy” even possible—provided that it is at all possible on earth.—How much respect a noble man already has for his enemies!—and such a respect is already a bridge to love. . . . In fact, he demands his enemy for himself, as his mark of honour. Indeed, he has no enemy other than one in whom there is nothing to despise and a great deal to respect! By contrast, imagine for yourself “the enemy” as a man of resentment conceives him—and right here we have his action, his creation: he has conceptualized “the evil enemy,” “the evil one,” as, in fact, a fundamental idea from which he now also thinks his way to a complementary image and counterpart, a “good man”—himself! . . . ¹¹ We see exactly the opposite with the noble man, who conceives the fundamental idea “good” in advance and spontaneously, that is, from himself, and from there he first creates a picture of “bad” for himself! This “bad” originating from the noble man and that “evil” arising out of the stew pot of insatiable hatred—of these the first is a later creation, an afterthought, a complementary colour; by contrast, the second is the original, the beginning, the essential act in the conception of a slave morality—although the two words “bad” and “evil” both seem opposite to the same idea of “good,” how different they are! But it is not the same idea of “good.” Instead we should ask who the “evil person” really is in the sense of the morality of resentment. The strict answer to that is as follows: simply the “good person” of the other morality, the noble man, the powerful, the ruling man, only coloured over, only re-interpreted, only looked at again through the poisonous eyes of resentment. Here there is one thing we will be the last to deny: whoever has come to know those “good men” only as enemies, has known them also as nothing but evil enemies, and the same people who are kept within such strict limits by custom, honour, habit, gratitude, and even more by mutual surveillance and jealousy inter pares [among equals] and who, by contrast, demonstrate in relation to each other such resourceful consideration, self-control, refinement, loyalty, pride, and friendship—to the outside, where the strange world, the world of what is foreign to them, begins, these men are not much better than beasts of prey turned loose. Here they enjoy freedom from all social constraints. In the wilderness they make up for the tension which a long fenced-in confinement within the peace of the community brings about. They go back to the innocent conscience of a beast of prey, as joyful monsters, who perhaps walk away from a dreadful sequence of murder, arson, rape, and torture with an exhilaration and spiritual equilibrium, as if they had merely pulled off a student prank, convinced that now the poets once again have something to sing about and praise for a long time to come. At the bottom of all these noble races we cannot fail to recognize the beast of prey, the blond beast splendidly roaming around in its lust for loot and victory. This hidden basis from time to time needs to be discharged: the beast must come out again, must go back into the wilderness once more,—Roman, Arab, German, Japanese nobility, Homeric heroes, Scandinavian Vikings—in this need they are all alike. It is the noble races that left behind the concept of the “barbarian” in all their tracks, wherever they went. A consciousness of and even a pride in this fact still reveals itself in their highest culture (for example, when Pericles says to his Athenians, in that famous funeral speech, “our audacity has broken a way through to every land and sea, putting up permanent memorials to itself for good and ill”). This “audacity” of the noble races, mad, absurd, and sudden in the way it expresses itself, its unpredictability, even the improbability of its undertakings—Pericles emphatically praises the ῥαθυμία [rathumia: freedom of anxiety] of the Athenians—their indifference to and contempt for safety, body, life, comfort, their fearsome cheerfulness and the depth of their joy in all destruction, in all the physical pleasures of victory and cruelty—all this was summed up for those who suffered from such audacity in the image of the “barbarian,” of the “evil enemy,” of something like the “Goth” or “Vandal.”(11) The deep, icy mistrust which the German evokes, as soon as he comes to power, once more again today—is still an after-effect of that unforgettable terror with which for centuries Europe confronted the rage of the blond Germanic beast (although there is hardly any idea linking the old Germanic tribes and we Germans, let alone any blood relationship). Once before I have remarked on Hesiod’s dilemma when he thought up his sequence of cultural periods and sought to express them as Gold, Silver, and Iron.(12) He didn’t know what to do with the contradiction presented to him by the marvellous but, at the same time, so horrifying and violent world of Homer, other than to make two cultural ages out of one and then place one after the other—first the Age of Heroes and Demigods from Troy and Thebes, just as that world remained in the memories of the noble families who had their own ancestors in it, and then the Age of Iron as that same world appeared to the descendants of the downtrodden, exploited, ill treated, and those carried off and sold—an age of iron, as mentioned: hard, cold, cruel, empty of feeling and scruples, with everything crushed and covered with blood.(13) Assuming as true what in any event is taken as “the truth” nowadays, that it is the point of all culture simply to breed a tame and civilized animal, a domestic pet, out of the beast of prey “man,” then we would undoubtedly have to consider all those instincts of reaction and of resentment with whose help the noble races and all their ideals were finally disgraced and overpowered as the essential instruments of culture—though to do that would not yet be to claim that the bearers of these instincts also in themselves represented culture. Instead, the opposite would not only be probable—no! nowadays it is visibly apparent! These people carrying instincts of oppression and of a lust for revenge, the descendants of all European and non-European slavery, of all pre-Aryan populations in particular—they represent the regression of mankind! These “instruments of culture” are a disgrace to humanity and more a reason to be suspicious of or a counterargument against “culture” in general! We may well be right when we hang onto our fear of the blond beast at the bottom of all noble races and keep up our guard. But who would not find it a hundred times better to fear, if he could at the same time admire, rather than not fear but in the process no longer be able to rid himself of the disgusting sight of the failures, the stunted, the emaciated, and the poisoned? And is not that our fate? Today what is it that constitutes our aversion to “man”?—For we suffer from man. There’s no doubt of that. It is not a matter of fear. Rather it’s the fact that we have nothing more to fear from man, that the maggot “man” is in the foreground swarming around, that the “tame man,” the hopelessly mediocre and unedifying man, has already learned to feel that he is the goal, the pinnacle, the meaning of history, “the higher man,”—yes indeed, that he has a certain right to feel that about himself, insofar as he feels separate from the excessive number of failed, sick, tired, and spent people, who are nowadays beginning to make Europe stink, so that he senses that he is at least relatively successful, at least still capable of life, of at least saying “Yes” to life.

12 —At this point I won’t suppress a sigh and a final confidence. What is it exactly that I find so totally unbearable? Something which I cannot deal with on my own, which makes me choke and feel faint? Bad air! Bad air! That something which has failed is coming close to me, that I have to smell the entrails of a failed soul! . . . Apart from that what can we not endure by way of need, deprivation, bad weather, infirmity, hardship, and loneliness? Basically we can deal with all the other things, born as we are to an underground and struggling existence. We come back again and again into the light, we live over and over our golden hour of victory—and then we stand there, just as we were born, unbreakable, tense, ready for something new, for something even more difficult, more distant, like a bow which all troubles only serve to pull even tighter. But if there are heavenly goddesses who are our patrons, beyond good and evil, then from time to time grant me a glimpse, just grant me a single glimpse at something perfect, something completely developed, happy, powerful, triumphant, from which there is still something to fear! A glimpse of a man who justifies the human being, of a complementary and redeeming stroke-of-luck [Glücksfall] of a man, for whose sake we can hang onto a faith in humanity! . . . For matters stand like this: the diminution and levelling of European man conceal our greatest danger, since we grow tired at the sight of him . . . We see nothing today which wants to be greater. We suspect that things are still going down, down into something thinner, more good-natured, more prudent, more comfortable, more mediocre, more indifferent, more Chinese, more Christian—humanity, there is no doubt, is becoming constantly “better.” . . . Europe’s fate lies right here—with the fear of man we also have lost the love for him, the reverence for him, the hope for him, indeed, our will to him. A glimpse at man nowadays makes us tired—what is contemporary nihilism, if it is not that? . . . We are weary of man. . . . 13 —But let’s come back: the problem with the other origin of the “good,” of the good man, as the person of resentment has imagined it for himself, demands its own conclusion.—That the lambs are upset about the great predatory birds is not strange, but the fact that these large birds of prey snatch away small lambs provides no reason for holding anything against them. And if the lambs say among themselves, “These predatory birds are evil, and whoever is least like a predatory bird and instead is like its opposite, a lamb—shouldn’t that animal be good?” there is nothing to find fault with in this setting up of an ideal, except for the fact that the birds of prey will look down on them with a little mockery and perhaps say to themselves, “We are not at all annoyed with these good lambs. We even love them. Nothing is tastier than a tender lamb.” To demand from strength that it does not express itself as strength, that it does not consist of a will to overpower, a will to throw down, a will to rule, a thirst for enemies and opposition and triumphs, is just as unreasonable as to demand from weakness that it express itself as strength. A quantum of force is simply such a quantum of drive, will, and action—rather, it is nothing but this very driving, willing, and acting itself—and it cannot appear as anything else except through the seduction of language (and the fundamental errors of reason petrified in it), which understands and misunderstands all action as conditioned by something which causes actions, by a “subject.” For, in just the same way as people separate lightning from its flash and take the latter as an action, as the effect of a subject called lightning, so popular morality separates strength from manifestations of strength, as if behind the strong person there were an indifferent substrate that is free to express strength or not. But there is no such substrate; there is no “being” behind the doing, acting, or becoming. “The doer” is merely fabricated and added into the action—the act is everything. People basically duplicate the action: when they see a lightning flash, that is an action-action [ein Thun-Thun]: they set up the same event first as the cause and then yet again as its effect. Natural scientists are no better when they say “Force moves, force causes,” and so on—our entire scientific knowledge, for all its coolness and freedom from feelings, still remains exposed to the seduction of language and has not gotten rid of the changelings foisted on it, the “subjects” (the atom, for example, is such a changeling, like the Kantian “thing-in-itself”): it’s no wonder, then, that the repressed, secretly smouldering feelings of revenge and hate use this belief for their own purposes and even, in fact, maintain a faith in nothing more fervently than in the idea that the strong person is free to be weak and that the predatory bird is free to be a lamb:—in so doing, of course, they arrogate to themselves the right to blame the bird of prey for being a bird of prey. . . . When the oppressed, the downtrodden, and the violated say to each other, with the vengeful cunning of the powerless, “Let us be different from evil people, namely, good! And every person is good who does not oppress, who hurts no one, who does not attack, who does not retaliate, who hands revenge over to God, who keeps himself hidden, as we do, the person who avoids all evil and demands little from life in general, like us, the patient, humble, and upright”—what that amounts to, coolly expressed and without bias, is essentially nothing more than “We weak people are merely weak. It’s good if we do not do anything for which we are not strong enough”—but this bitter state, this shrewdness of the lowest ranks, which even insects possess (when in great danger they act as if they were dead in order not to do “too much”), has, thanks to that counterfeiting and self-deception of powerlessness, dressed itself in the splendour of a self-denying, still, patient virtue, as if the weakness of the weak man himself—that means his essence, his actions, his entire single, inevitable, and irredeemable reality—is a voluntary achievement, something willed, chosen, an action, something of merit. This kind of man has to believe in the disinterested, freely choosing “subject” out of an instinct for self-preservation and self-affirmation, in which every falsehood is habitually sanctified. Hence, the subject (or, to use a more popular style, the soul) has up to now perhaps been the best principle for belief on earth, because for the majority of the dying, the weak, and the downtrodden of all sorts it makes possible that sublime self-deception that establishes weakness itself as freedom and their being like this or that as a commendable act. 14 Is there anyone who would like to take a little look down on and under that secret how man fabricates ideals on earth? Who has the courage for that? . . . Come on, now! Here’s an open glimpse into this dark workshop. Just wait a moment, my dear Mr. Curious Daredevil: your eye must first get used to this artificial flickering light. . . . So, enough! Now speak! What's going on down there? Speak up. Say what you see, man of the most dangerous curiosity—now I'm the one who's listening.—“I see nothing, but I hear all the more. It is a careful, crafty, light rumour-mongering and whispering from every nook and cranny. It seems to me that people are lying; a sugary mildness clings to every sound. Weakness is going to be falsified into something of merit. There's no doubt about it—things are just as you said.” —Keep talking! —“And powerlessness that does not retaliate is being falsified into ‘goodness,’ anxious baseness into ‘humility,’ submission before those one hates to ‘obedience’ (of course, obedience to the one who, they say, commands this submission—they call him God). The inoffensiveness of the weak man—cowardice itself, in which he is rich, his standing at the door, his inevitable need to wait around—here acquires good names, like ‘patience,’ and is even called the virtue. That incapacity for revenge is called the lack of desire for revenge, perhaps even forgiveness (‘for they know not what they do—only we know what they do!’). People are even talking about ‘love for one's enemies’—and sweating as they say it.” —Keep talking! —“They are miserable—there's no doubt about that—all these rumour-mongers and counterfeiterers in the corners, although crouched down beside each other in the warmth—but they are telling me that their misery is God's choice, His sign, that one beats the dog one loves the most, that this misery may perhaps be a preparation, a test, an education, perhaps it is even more—something that will one day be requited and paid out with huge interest in gold, no, in happiness. They call that ‘blessedness’.” —Go on! —“Now they are letting me know that they are not only better than the powerful, the masters of the earth, whose spit they have to lick (not out of fear, certainly not out of fear, but because God commands that they honour all those in authority)—that they are not only better than these, but also ‘better off,’ or at any rate will one day have it better. But enough! Enough! I can't take it anymore. Bad air! Bad air! This workshop where man fabricates ideals—it seems to me it stinks of nothing but lies.” —No! Just one minute more! So far you haven't said anything about the masterpiece of these black magicians who make whiteness, milk, and innocence out of every blackness:—have you not noticed the perfection of their raffinement [sophistication], their most daring, most refined, most imaginative, and most fallacious artistic attempt? Pay attention! These cellar animals full of vengeance and hatred—what exactly are they making out of that vengeance and hatred? Have you ever heard these words? If you heard only their words, would you suspect that you were completely among men of resentment? . . . —“I understand. Once again I'll open my ears (oh! oh! oh! and hold my nose). Now I'm hearing for the first time what they've been saying so often: ‘We good men—we are the righteous’—what they demand they don't call repayment but 'the triumph of righteousness.' What they hate is not their enemy. No! They hate 'injustice,' 'godlessness.' What they believe and hope for is not a hope for revenge, the intoxication of sweet vengeance (something Homer has already called 'sweeter than honey'), but the victory of God, the righteous God, over the godless. What remains for them to love on earth is not their brothers in hatred but their 'brothers in love,' as they say, all the good and righteous people on the earth." —And what do they call what serves them as a consolation for all the suffering of life—the phantasmagoria of future blessedness which they are waiting for? —"What's that? Am I hearing correctly? They call that 'the last judgment,' the coming of their kingdom, the coming of 'God's kingdom'—but in the meanwhile they live 'in faith,' 'in love,' 'in hope.'" —Enough! Enough! 15 In belief in what? In love with what? In hope for what?—There's no doubt that these weak people—at some time or another they also want to be the strong people, some day their "kingdom" is to arrive—they call it simply "the kingdom of God," as I mentioned. People are indeed so humble about everything! Only to experience that, one has to live a long time, beyond death—in fact, people must have an eternal life, so they can also win eternal recompense in the "kingdom of God" for that earthly life "in faith, in love, in hope." Recompense for what? Recompense through what? . . . In my view, Dante was grossly in error when, with an ingenuousness inspiring terror, he set that inscription over the gateway into his hell: "Eternal love also created me." (14) Over the gateway into the Christian paradise and its "eternal blessedness" it would, in any event, be more fitting to let the inscription stand "Eternal hate also created me"—provided it's all right to set a truth over the gateway to a lie! For what is the bliss of that paradise? . . . Perhaps we might have guessed that already, but it is better for it to be expressly described for us by an authority we cannot underestimate in such matters, Thomas Aquinas, the great teacher and saint: "In the kingdom of heaven" he says as gently as a lamb, "the blessed will see the punishment of the damned, so that they will derive all the more pleasure from their heavenly bliss." (15) Or do you want to hear that message in a stronger tone, for example, from the mouth of a triumphant father of the church, who warns his Christians against the cruel sensuality of the public spectacles. (16) But why? "Faith, in fact, offers much more to us," he says (in de Spectaculis [On Spectacles] c. 29 ff), "something much stronger. Thanks to the redemption, very different joys are ours to command; in place of the athletes, we have our martyrs. If we want blood, well, we have the blood of Christ . . . But what awaits us on the day of His coming again, of His triumph!"—and now he takes off, the rapturous visionary: "However, there are other spectacles—that last eternal day of judgment, ignored and derided by nations, when after so many years the old age of the world and all the many things they produced will be burned in a single fire. What a broad spectacle then appears! How I will be lost in admiration! How I will laugh! How

I will rejoice! How I will exult, as I see so many great kings who by public report were accepted into heaven groaning in the deepest darkness alongside those very men who testified on their behalf, along with Jove himself! They will include governors of provinces who persecuted the name of our Lord melting in flames fiercer than those with which they proudly raged against the Christians! And then those wise philosophers who convinced their disciples that nothing was of any concern to God and who claimed either that there is no such thing as a soul or that our souls would not return to their original bodies are shamed before those very disciples as they burn in the conflagration with them! And the poets, too, shaking with fear, not in front of the tribunal of Rhadamanthus or Minos, but of the Christ they did not anticipate!(17) Then it will be easier to hear the tragic actors, because their voices will be more resonant in their own calamity” (better voices since they will be screaming in even greater terror). “The comic actors will then be easy to recognize, for the fire will make them much more agile. Then the charioteer will be on show, all red in a wheel of fire, and the athletes will be visible, thrown, not in the gymnasium, but into the flames, unless I have no wish to look at them then, so that I can more readily cast an insatiable gaze on those who raged against our Lord.(18)‘This is the man,’ I will say, ‘the son of a workman or a prostitute’” (in everything that follows and especially in the well-known description of the mother of Jesus from the Talamud, Tertullian from this point on is referring to the Jews) “the destroyer of the Sabbath, the Samaritan possessed by the devil. He is the man whom you bought from Judas, the man who was beaten with a reed and with fists, reviled with spit, who was given gall and vinegar to drink. He is the man whom his disciples took away in secret, so that it could be said that he was resurrected, or whom the gardener took away, so that the crowd of visitors would not harm his lettuce.’ What praetor or consul or quaestor or priest will from his own generosity grant you this so that you may see such sights, so that you can exult in such things?(19) And yet we already have these things to a certain extent through faith, represented to us by the imagining spirit. Besides, what sorts of things has the eye not seen or the ear not heard and what sorts of things have not arisen in the human heart? (1. Cor. 2, 9). I believe these are more pleasing than the race track and the circus and both enclosures” (the first and fourth tier of seats or, according to others, the comic and tragic stages).(20) Through faith: that’s how it’s written. 16 Let’s bring this to a conclusion. The two opposing values “good and bad” and “good and evil” have fought a fearful battle on earth for thousands of years. And if it’s true that the second value has for a long time had the upper hand, even now there is still no lack of places where the battle goes on without a final decision. We could even say that in the intervening time the battle has been constantly drawn to greater heights and, in the process, to constantly greater depths and has become constantly more spiritual, so that nowadays there is perhaps no more decisive mark of a “higher nature,” a more spiritual nature, than that it is split in that sense and is truly still a battleground for those opposites. The symbol of this battle, written in a script which has remained legible through all human history up to the present, is called “Rome against Judea, Judea against Rome.” To this point there has been no greater event than this war, this posing of a question, this contradiction between deadly enemies. Rome felt that the Jew was like something contrary to nature itself, its monstrous polar opposite, as it were. In Rome the Jew was considered “convicted of hatred against the entire human race.” And that view was correct, to the extent that we are right to link the health and the future of the human race to the unconditional rule of aristocratic values, to Roman values. By contrast, how did the Jews feel about Rome? We can guess that from a thousand signs, but it is sufficient to treat ourselves again to the Apocalypse of John, that wildest of all written outbursts which vengeance has on its conscience. (Incidentally, we must not underestimate the deep consistency of the Christian instinct when it ascribed this particular book of hate to the name of the disciple of love, the same man to whom it attributed that enthusiastic amorous gospel—: there is some truth to this, no matter how much literary counterfeiting may have been necessary for this purpose). The Romans were indeed strong and noble men, stronger and nobler than any people who had lived on earth up until then or even than any people who had ever been dreamed up. Everything they left as remains, every inscription, is delightful, provided that we can guess what is doing the writing there. By contrast, the Jews were par excellence that priestly people of resentment, who possessed an unparalleled genius for popular morality. Just compare people with related talents—say, the Chinese or the Germans—with the Jews, in order to understand which is ranked first and which is ranked fifth. Which of them has proved victorious for the time being, Rome or Judea? Surely there’s not the slightest doubt. Just think of who it is people bow down to today in Rome itself as the personification of all the highest values—and not only in Rome, but in almost half the earth, all the places where people have become merely tame or want to become tame—in front of three Jews, as we know, and one Jewess (in front of Jesus of Nazareth, the fisherman Peter, the carpet maker Paul, and the mother of the first-mentioned Jesus, named Mary). This is very remarkable: without doubt Rome has been conquered. It is true that in the Renaissance there was an incredibly brilliant reawakening of the classical ideal, of the noble way of evaluating everything. Rome itself behaved like someone who had woken up from a coma induced by the pressure of the new Jewish Rome built over it, which looked like an ecumenical synagogue and was called “Church.” But Judea immediately triumphed again, thanks to that thoroughly vulgar (German and English) movement of resentment we call the Reformation, together with what had to follow as a result, the re-establishment of the church—as well as the re-

establishment of the old grave-like tranquillity of classical Rome. In what is an even more decisive and deeper sense than that, Judea once again was victorious over the classical ideal with the French Revolution. The last political nobility which there was in Europe, in seventeenth and eighteenth century France, broke apart under the instincts of popular ressentiment—never on earth has there been heard a greater rejoicing, a noisier enthusiasm! It's true that in the midst of all this the most dreadful and most unexpected events took place: the old ideal itself stepped physically and with unheard of splendour before the eyes and the conscience of humanity—and once again stronger, simpler, and more urgently than ever rang out, in opposition to the old lying slogan of ressentiment about the privileged rights of the majority, in opposition to that will for a low condition, for abasement, for equality, for the decline and twilight of mankind—in opposition to all that there rang out the fearsome and delightful counter-slogan about the privilege of the very few! As a last signpost to a different road, Napoleon appeared, that most singular and late-born man there ever was, and in him the problem of the noble ideal itself was made flesh—we should consider well what a problem that is: Napoleon, this synthesis of monster [Unmensch] and superman [Übermensch] . . . 17 —Did that end it? Was that greatest of all oppositions of ideals thus set ad acta [aside] for all time? Or was it merely postponed, postponed indefinitely? . . . Someday would there not have to be an even more fearful blaze from the old fire, one which would take much longer to prepare? More than that: would this not be exactly what we should hope for with all our strength? Even will it? Even demand it? Anyone who, like my readers, begins to reflect on these points, to think further, will have difficulty coming to a quick conclusion—reason enough for me to come to a conclusion myself, provided that it has been sufficiently clear for a long time what I want, precisely what I want with that dangerous slogan which is written on the body of my last book: “Beyond Good and Evil” . . . At least this does not mean “Beyond Good and Bad.”— Note I am taking the opportunity provided to me by this essay publicly and formally to state a desire which I have expressed up to now only in occasional conversations with scholars, namely, that some faculty of philosophy might set up a series of award-winning academic essays in order to serve the advancement of studies into the history of morality. Perhaps this book could serve to provide a forceful push in precisely such a direction. Bearing in mind a possibility of this sort, let me propose the following question—it merits the attention of philologists and historians as much as of truly professional philosophical scholars: What suggestions does the scientific study of language, especially etymological research, provide for the history of the development of moral concepts? —On the other hand, it is, of course, just as necessary to attract the participation of physiologists and doctors to these problems (of the value of all methods of evaluating up to now). Also for this task it might be left to the professional philosophers in this particular case to become advocates and mediators, after they have completely succeeded in converting the relationships between philosophy, physiology, and medicine, originally so aloof and so mistrusting, into the most friendly and most fruitful exchange. In fact, all the tables of value, all examples of “thou shalt” that history or ethnological research knows about, need, first and foremost, illumination and interpretation from physiology—at any rate before one from psychology. All of them similarly await a critique from the point of view of medical science. The question “What is this or that table of values and ‘morality’ worth?” needs to be viewed from the most varied perspectives. For we cannot analyze the question “Value for what?” too finely. Something, for example, that would have an apparent value with respect to the longest possible capacity for the survival of a race (or to an increase in its power to adapt to a certain climate or to the preservation of the greatest number) would have nothing like the same value, if the issue were one of developing a stronger type. The well-being of the greatest number and the well-being of the smallest number are opposing viewpoints where values are concerned. We wish to leave it to the naïveté of English biologists to take the first as already the one of inherently higher value. . . . All the sciences from now on have to do the preparatory work for the future job of the philosopher, understanding that the philosopher’s task is to solve the problem of value, that he has to determine the rank order of values. ENDNOTES (1) Herbert Spencer (1820-1903), English philosopher and liberal political theorist, who extended Darwin’s evolutionary theories into sociology. [Back to Text] (2) Thirty Years War: a prolonged, devastating, and inconclusive European war over religion (1618-1648). [Back to Text] (3) Buckle: Henry Thomas Buckle (1821-1862), English historian, author of The History of Civilization in England. Buckle’s attempt to explain historical events as the results of certain mathematically precise laws generated a great deal of controversy. [Back to Text] (4) Theogonis: a Greek poet from Megara in the sixth century BC. [Back to Text] (5) Virchow: Rudolf Virchow (1821-1902), German doctor and anthropologist. [Back to Text] (6) Achilles: the warrior hero of Homer’s Iliad, one of the greatest Greek heroes. [Back to Text] (7) Weir-Mitchell: Silas Weir-Mitchell (1829-1914), American doctor and writer, well known for his rest cure for nervous diseases. [Back to Text] (8) Beyond Good and Evil: Nietzsche published this work in 1886. [Back to Text] (9) . . . ressentiment: Nietzsche uses this French word, which since his writing, and largely because of it, has entered the English language as an important term in psychology: a short definition is as follows: “deep-seated resentment, frustration, and hostility, accompanied by a sense of being powerless to express these feelings directly” (Merriam-Webster). Ressentiment is thus significantly different in meaning from resentment. [Back to Text] (10) Mirabeau: Honore Gabriel Riqueti, Comte de Mirabeau (1749-1791), French politician and writer at the time of the French Revolution. [Back to Text] (11) Pericles (495-429 BC), political leader and general in Athens at the outbreak of the Peloponnesian War. He delivered his famous funeral oration at the end of the first year of the war. The Goths: tribes from Eastern Germany who attacked the Roman Empire in the third and fourth centuries. Later (as the Visigoths and Ostrogoths) they gained political dominance in parts of Europe, once the Roman Empire collapsed; Vandals: Eastern Germanic tribes, allied to the Goths, who invaded the Roman Empire. [Back to Text] (12) Hesiod (c. 700 BC), Greek poet. [Back to Text] (13) Nietzsche's point here is that Hesiod broke the last of his ages into two: a Heroic Age, symbolized by the legendary heroes of Troy and Thebes, and an Iron Age. The latter was, in effect, the same as the Heroic Age except it was that era as seen by the suffering and oppressed (i.e., not a heroic and glorious period, but one full of wretchedness). Hesiod (in Works and Days) describes five ages: Gold, Silver, Bronze, Heroic, and Iron. Nietzsche's German word Erz can mean ore, bronze, or iron. [Back to Text] (14) Dante: Dante Alighieri (1265-1321), a Florentine poet who wrote The Divine Comedy. The phrase Nietzsche quotes comes from the first book, The Inferno, and stands over the gateway to hell. [Back to Text] (15) Thomas Aquinas (1225-1274), Catholic saint, one of the great Catholic theologians. Nietzsche quotes the Latin, as follows: "Beati in regno coelesti videbunt poenas damnatorum, ut beatitudo illis magis complacet." [Back to Text] (16) The "triumphant father of the church" is Tertullian (c. 155-230), an important figure in the early church and a fierce Christian apologist. [Back to Text] (17) Rhadamanthus or Minos: These were the names of the judges in the pagan underworld. [Back to Text] (18) Nietzsche's Latin quotation of Tertullian contains in this sentence a slight misquote: "vivos" [living] rather than visos [seen]. The English text above uses visos (Tertullian's word). [Back to Text] (19) praetor or consul or quaestor: important Roman political officials. [Back to Text] (20) Nietzsche quotes the Latin and inserts some of his own comments, as follows: "At enim supersunt alia spectacula, ille ultimus et perpetuus iudicii dies, ille nationibus insperatus, ille derisus, cum tanta saeculi vetustas et tot eius natiuitates uno igne hauriuntur. Quae tunc spectaculi latitudo! Quid admirer! Quid rideam! Ubi gaudeam! Ubi exultem, spectans tot et tantos reges, qui in coelum recepti nuntiabantur, cum ipso Iove et ipsis suis testibus in imis tenebris congemescerent! Item praesides" (die Provinzialstatthalter) "persecutores dominici nominis saevioribus quam ipsi flammis saevierunt insultantibus contra Christianos liquescentes! Quos praeterea sapientes illos philosophos coram discipulis suis una conflagrantibus erubescerent, quibus nihil ad deum pertinere suadebant, quibus animas aut nullas aut non in pristina corpora redituras affirmabant! Etiam poetas non ad Rhadamanti nec ad Minois, sed ad inopinati Christi tribunal palpitantes! Tunc magis tragoedi audiendi, magis scilicet vocales" (besser bei Stimme, noch ärgere Schreier) “in sua propria calamitate; tunc histriones cognoscendi, solutiores multo per ignem; tunc spectandus auriga in flammea rota totus rubens, tunc xysticcontemplandi non in gymnasiis, sed in igne jaculati, nisi quod ne tunc quidem illos velim vivos, ut qui malim ad eos potius conspectum insatiabilem conferre, qui in dominum desaevierunt. Hic est ille,’ dicam, ‘fabri aut quaestuariae filius’” (wie alles Folgende und insbesondere auch diese aus dem Talmud bekannte Bezeichnung der Mutter Jesu zeigt, meint Tertullian von hier ab die Juden), “‘sabbati destructor, Samarites et daemonium habens. Hic est, quem a Juda redemistis, hic est ille arundine et colaphis diverberatus, sputamentis dedecoratus, felle et aceto potatus. Hic est, quem clam discentes subripuerunt, ut resurrexisse dicatur vel hortulanus detraxit, ne lactucae suae frequentia commeantium laederentur.’ Ut talia spectes, uttalibus exultes, quis tibi praetor aut consul aut quaestor aut sacerdos de sua liberalitate praestabit? Et tamen haec jam habemus quodammodo per fidem spiritu imaginante repraesentata. Ceterum qualia illa sunt, quae nec oculus vidit nec auris audivit nec in cor hominis ascenderunt?” (1. Cor. 2, 9.) “Credo circo et utraque cavea” (erster und vierter Rang oder, nach anderen, komische und tragische Bühne) “et omni stadio gratiora.” [Back to Text] [Link to Genealogy of Morals, Table of Contents] Link to Second Essay Nietzsche, Genealogy, Essay 2 Friedrich Nietzsche On the Genealogy of Morals A Polemical Tract Translated by Ian Johnston Vancouver Island University Nanaimo, British Columbia 2014 [Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text free of charge and without permission. They may also freely edit the text to suit their purposes. However, no commercial publication of this text or any part of it is permitted without permission of the translator. For any questions or comments please contact Ian Johnston. Note that in the following text, the words within square brackets have been added by the translator. The numbers in curved brackets indicate links to explanatory endnotes provided by the translator.] If you would like to download a Rich Text Format text of this text, please use the following link: Genealogy 2 [RTF] Second Essay Guilt, Bad Conscience, and Related Matters 1 To breed an animal that is entitled to make promises—is that not precisely the paradoxical task nature has set itself where human beings are concerned? Isn’t that the real problem of human beings? . . . The fact that this problem has to a great extent been solved must seem all the more astonishing to a person who knows how to appreciate fully the power which works against this promise-making, namely forgetfulness. Forgetfulness is not merely a vis inertiae [a force of inertia], as superficial people think. Is it much rather an active capability to repress, something positive in the strongest sense, to which we can ascribe the fact that while we are digesting what we alone live through and experience and absorb into ourselves (we could call the process mental ingestion [Einverseelung]), we are conscious of what is going on as little as we are with the entire thousand-fold process which our bodily nourishment goes through (so-called physical ingestion [Einverleibung]). The doors and windows of consciousness are shut temporarily; they remain undisturbed by the noise and struggle with which the underworld of our functional organs keeps working for and against one another; a little stillness, a little tabula rasa [blank slate] of the consciousness, so that there will again be room for something new, above all, for the nobler functions and officials, for ruling, thinking ahead, determining what to do (for our organism is arranged as an oligarchy)—that is, as I said, the use of active forgetfulness, a porter at the door, so to speak, a custodian of psychic order, quiet, etiquette. From that we can see at once how, if forgetfulness were not present, there could be no happiness, no cheerfulness, no hoping, no pride, no present. The man in whom this repression apparatus is harmed and not working properly we can compare to a dyspeptic (and not just compare)—he is “finished” with nothing. . . . Now, this particular animal, which is necessarily forgetful, in which forgetfulness is present as a force, as a form of strong health, has had an opposing capability bred into it, a memory, with the help of which, in certain cases, forgetfulness will cease to function—that is, for those cases where promises are to be made. This is in no way a merely passive inability ever to be rid of an impression once it has been etched into the mind, nor is it merely indigestion over a word one has pledged at a particular time and which one can no longer be over and done with. No, it’s an active wish not to be free of the matter again, an ongoing and continuing desire for what one willed at a particular time, a real memory of one’s will, so that between the original “I will,” “I will do,” and the actual discharge of the will, its action, a world of strange w things, circumstances, even acts of the will can be interposed without a second thought and not break this long chain of the will. But how much all that presupposes! In order to organize the future in this manner, human beings must have first learned to separate necessary events from chance events, to think in terms of cause and effect, to see distant events as if they were present, to anticipate them, to set goals and the means to reach them with certainty, to develop a capability for figures and calculations in general—and for that to occur, a human being must necessarily have first himself become something one could predict, something bound by regular rules, even in the way he imagined himself to himself, so that finally he is able to act like someone who makes promises—he can make himself into a pledge for the future! 2 Precisely that development is the long history of the origin of responsibility. That task of breeding an animal which is permitted to make promises contains within it, as we have already grasped, as a condition and prerequisite, the more precise task of first making a human being necessarily uniform to some extent, one among others like him, regular and consequently predictable. The immense task involved in this, what I have called the “morality of custom” (cf. Daybreak 9, 14, 16)—the essential work of a man on his own self in the longest-lasting age of the human race, his entire pre-historical work, derives its meaning, its grand justification, from the following point, no matter how much hardship, tyranny, monotony, and idiocy it also manifested: with the help of the morality of custom and the social strait jacket, the human being was made truly predictable. Let's position ourselves, by contrast, at the end of this immense process, in the place where the tree at last yields its fruit, where society and the morality of custom finally bring to light the end for which they were simply the means: then we find, as the ripest fruit on that tree, the sovereign individual, something which resembles only itself, which has broken loose again from the morality of custom, the autonomous individual beyond morality (for "autonomous" and "moral" are mutually exclusive terms), in short, the human being who possesses his own independent and enduring will, who is entitled to make promises—and in him a consciousness quivering in every muscle, proud of what has finally been achieved and has become a living embodiment in him, a real consciousness of power and freedom, a feeling of completion for human beings generally. This man who has become free, who really is entitled to make promises, this master of free will, this sovereign—how is he not to realize the superiority he enjoys over everything which is not permitted to make a promise and make pledges on its own behalf, knowing how much trust, how much fear, and how much respect he creates—he "is worthy" of all three—and how, with this mastery over himself, he has necessarily been given in addition mastery over his circumstances, over nature, and over all less reliable creatures with a shorter will? The "free" man, the owner of an enduring unbreakable will, by possessing this, also acquires his own standard of value: he looks out from himself at others and confers respect or contempt. And just as it will be necessary for him to honour those like him, the strong and dependable (who are entitled to make promises)—in other words, everyone who makes promises like a sovereign, seriously, rarely, and slowly, who is sparing with his trust, who honours another when he does trust, who gives his word as something reliable, because he knows he is strong enough to remain upright even when opposed by misfortune, even when "opposed by fate"—in just the same way it will be necessary for him to keep his foot ready to kick the scrawny unreliable men, who make promises without being entitled to, and to hold his cane ready for the liar, who breaks his word in the very moment it comes out of his mouth. The proud knowledge of the extraordinary privilege of responsibility, the consciousness of this rare freedom, of this power over oneself and destiny, has become internalized into the deepest parts of him and grown instinctual, has become an instinct, a dominating instinct:—what will he call it, this dominating instinct, assuming that he finds he needs a word for it? There's no doubt: the sovereign man calls this instinct his conscience. 3 His conscience? . . . To begin with, we can conjecture that the idea "conscience," which we are encountering here in its highest, almost perplexing form, has a long history and changing developmental process behind it already. To be entitled to pledge one's word, and to do it with pride, and also to be permitted to say "Yes" to oneself—that is a ripe fruit, as I have mentioned, but it is also a late fruit:—for what a long stretch of time this fruit must have hung tart and sour on the tree! And for an even much longer time it was impossible to see any such fruit—no one could have promised it would appear, even if everything about the tree was certainly getting ready for it and growing in that very direction!—"How does one create a memory for the human animal? How does one stamp something like that into this partly dull, partly flickering, momentary understanding, this living embodiment of forgetfulness, so that it stays current?" . . . This ancient problem, as you can imagine, was not resolved right away with tender answers and methods. Indeed, there is perhaps nothing more fearful and more terrible in the entire prehistory of human beings than the technique for developing his memory. "We burn something in so that it remains in the memory. Only something which never ceases to cause pain remains in the memory"—that is a leading principle of the most ancient (unfortunately also the longest) psychology on earth. We might even say that everywhere on earth nowadays where there is still solemnity, seriousness, mystery, and gloomy colours in the lives of men and people, something of that terror continues its work, the fear with which in earlier times everywhere on earth people made promises, pledged their word, made a vow. The past, the longest, deepest, most severe past, breathes on us and surfaces in us when we become "solemn." When the human being considered it necessary to make a memory for himself, it never happened without blood, martyrs, and sacrifices, the most terrible sacrifices and pledges (among them the sacrifice of the first born), the most repulsive self-mutilations (for example, castration), the cruellest forms of ritual in all the religious cults (and all religions are in their deepest foundations systems of cruelty)—all that originates in that instinct which discovered in pain the most powerful means of helping to develop the memory. In a certain sense all asceticism belongs here: a couple of ideas are to be made indissoluble, omnipresent, unforgettable, "fixed," in order to hypnotize the entire nervous and intellectual system through these "fixed ideas"—and the ascetic procedures and forms of life are the means whereby these ideas are freed from jostling around with all the other ideas, in order to make them "unforgettable." The worse humanity's "memory" was, the more terrible its customs have always appeared. The harshness of the laws of punishment, in particular, provide a standard for measuring how much trouble people went to in order to triumph over forgetfulness and to maintain a present awareness of a few primitive demands of social living together for this slave of momentary feelings and desires. We Germans certainly do not think of ourselves as an especially cruel and hard-hearted people, even less as particularly careless people who live only in the present. But just take a look at our old penal code in order to understand how much trouble it takes on this earth to breed a “People of Thinkers” (by that I mean the European people among whom today we still find a maximum of trust, seriousness, tastelessness, and practicality, and who, with these characteristics, have a right to breed all sorts of European mandarins). These Germans have used terrible means to make themselves a memory in order to attain mastery over their vulgar basic instincts and their brutal crudity: think of the old German punishments, for example, stoning (—the legend even lets the mill stone fall on the head of the guilty person), breaking on the wheel (the most characteristic invention and specialty of the German genius in the realm of punishment!), impaling on a stake, ripping people apart or stamping them to death with horses (“quartering”), boiling the criminal in oil or wine (still done in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries), the well-loved practice of flaying (“cutting flesh off in strips”), carving flesh out of the chest, and probably covering the offender with honey and leaving him to the flies in the burning sun. With the help of such images and procedures people finally retained five or six “I will not’s” in the memory, and, so far as these precepts were concerned, they gave their word in order to live with the advantages of society—and it’s true! With the assistance of this sort of memory people finally came to “reason”!—Ah, reason, seriousness, mastery over emotions, this whole gloomy business called reflection, all these privileges and showpieces of human beings: how expensive they were! How much blood and horror is at the bottom of all “good things”! . . . 4 But then how did that other “gloomy business,” the consciousness of guilt, the whole “bad conscience” come into the world?—And with this we turn back to our genealogists of morality. I’ll say it once more—or have I not said anything about it yet?—they are useless. With their own merely “modern” experience extending through only a brief period [fünf Spannen lange], with no knowledge of and no desire to know the past, even less a historical instinct, a “second sight”—something necessary at this very point—they nonetheless pursue the history of morality. That must justifiably produce results which have a less than tenuous relationship to the truth. Have these genealogists of morality up to now allowed themselves to dream, even remotely, that, for instance, that major moral principle “guilt” [Schuld] derived its origin from the very materialistic idea “debt” [Schulden]? Or that punishment developed as a repayment, completely without reference to any assumption about freedom or lack of freedom of the will?—and did so, by contrast, to the point where it always first required a high degree of human development so that the animal “man” began to make those much more primitive distinctions between “intentional,” “negligent,” “accidental,” “responsible,” and their opposites and bring them to bear when meting out punishment? That idea, nowadays so trite, apparently so natural, so unavoidable, which has even had to serve as the explanation how the feeling of justice in general came into existence on earth, “The criminal deserves punishment because he could have acted otherwise,” this idea is, in fact, an extremely late achievement, indeed, a sophisticated form of human judgment and decision making. Anyone who moves this idea back to the beginnings is sticking his coarse fingers inappropriately into the psychology of older humanity. For the most extensive period of human history, punishment was certainly not meted out because people held the instigator of evil responsible for his actions, and thus it was not assumed that only the guilty party should be punished:—it was much more as it still is now when parents punish their children out of anger over some harm they have suffered, anger vented on the perpetrator—but anger restrained and modified through the idea that every injury has some equivalent and that compensation for it could, in fact, be paid out, even if that is through the pain of the perpetrator. Where did this primitive, deeply rooted, and perhaps by now ineradicable idea derive its power, the idea of an equivalence between punishment and pain? I have already given away the answer: in the contractual relationship between creditor and debtor, which is, in general, as ancient as the idea of “legal subject” and which, for its part, refers back to the basic forms of buying, selling, bartering, trading, and exchanging goods. 5 It’s true that recalling this contractual relationship arouses, as we might initially expect from what I have observed above, all sorts of suspicion of and opposition to older humanity, which established or allowed it. It’s at this particular moment that people make promises. At this very point the pertinent issue is to create a memory for the person who makes a promise, so that precisely here, we can surmise, there will exist a place for harshness, cruelty, and pain. In order to inspire trust in his promise to pay back, in order to give his promise a guarantee of its seriousness and sanctity, in order to impress on his own conscience the idea of paying back as a duty, an obligation, the debtor, by virtue of a contract, pledges to the creditor, in the event that he does not pay, something else that he still “owns,” something else over which he still exercises power, for example, his body or his woman or his freedom or even his life (or, under certain religious conditions, even his blessedness, the salvation of his soul, finally even his peace in the grave, as was the case in Egypt, where the dead body of the debtor even in the tomb found no peace from the creditor—and among the Egyptians, in particular, such peace certainly mattered). That means that the creditor could inflict all kinds of ignominy and torture on the body of the debtor, for instance, slice off the body as much as seemed appropriate for the size of the debt:—and this point of view early on and everywhere gave rise to precise, sometimes horrific estimates going into the smallest detail, legally established estimates about individual limbs and body parts. I consider it already a step forward, as evidence of a freer conception of the law, something which calculates more grandly, a more Roman idea of justice, when Rome’s Twelve Tables of Laws decreed it was all the same, no matter how much or how little the creditor cut off in such cases: “let it not be thought a crime if they cut off more or less.”⁽¹⁾ Let us clarify for ourselves the logic of this whole method of compensation—it is weird enough. The equivalency is given in this way: instead of an advantage making up directly for the harm (hence, instead of compensation in gold, land, possessions of some sort or another), the creditor is given a kind of pleasure as repayment and compensation—the pleasure of being allowed to discharge his power on a powerless person without having to think about it, the delight in “de fair le mal pour le plaisir de le faire” [doing wrong for the pleasure of doing it], the enjoyment of violation. This enjoyment is more highly prized the lower and baser the creditor stands in the social order, and it can easily seem to him a delicious mouthful, in fact, a foretaste of a higher rank. By means of the “punishment” of the debtor, the creditor participates in a right belonging to the masters. Finally he also for once comes to the lofty feeling of despising a being as someone “beneath him,” as someone he is entitled to mistreat—or at least, in the event that the real force of punishment, of executing punishment, has already been transferred to the “authorities,” the feeling of seeing the debtor despised and mistreated. The compensation thus consists of an order for and a right to cruelty.

6 In this area, that is, in the laws of obligation, the world of the moral concepts “guilt,” “conscience,” “duty,” and “sanctity of obligation” has its origin—its beginning, like the beginning of everything great on earth, was watered thoroughly and for a long time with blood. And can we not add that this world deep down has never again been completely free of a certain smell of blood and torture—(not even with old Kant whose categorical imperative stinks of cruelty)? In addition, here that weird knot linking the ideas of “guilt and suffering,” which perhaps has become impossible to undo, was first knit together. Let me pose the question once more: to what extent can suffering be a compensation for “debts”? To the extent that making someone suffer provides the highest degree of pleasure, to the extent that the person hurt by the debt, in exchange for the injury as well as for the distress caused by the injury, got an extraordinary offsetting pleasure: creating suffering—a real celebration, something that, as I’ve said, was valued all the more, the greater it contradicted the rank and social position of the creditor. I have been speculating here, for it’s difficult to see through to the foundations of such subterranean things, quite apart from the fact that it’s embarrassing. And anyone who crudely throws into the middle of all this the idea of “revenge” has buried and dimmed his insights rather than illuminated them (—revenge itself, in fact, simply takes us back to the same problem: “How can making someone suffer give us a feeling of satisfaction?”). It seems to me that the delicacy and, even more, the Tartufferie [hypocrisy] of tame house pets (I mean modern man, I mean us) resist imagining with all our power how much cruelty contributes to the great celebratory joy of older humanity, as, in fact, an ingredient mixed into almost all their enjoyments and, from another perspective, how naive, how innocent, their need for cruelty appears, how they fundamentally think of its particular “disinterested malice” (or to use Spinoza’s words, the sympathia malevolens [malevolent sympathy]) as a normal human characteristic:—and hence as something to which their conscience says a heartfelt Yes!(2) A more deeply penetrating eye might still notice, even today, enough of this most ancient and most fundamental celebratory human joy. In Beyond Good and Evil, 229 (even earlier in Daybreak, 18, 77, 113), I pointed a cautious finger at the constantly growing spiritualization and “deification” of cruelty, which runs through the entire history of higher culture (and, in a significant sense, even constitutes that culture). In any case, it’s not so long ago that people wouldn’t think of an aristocratic wedding and folk festival in the grandest style without executions, tortures, or something like an auto-da-fé [burning at the stake], and similarly no noble household lacked creatures on whom people could vent their malice and cruel taunts without a second thought (—remember, for instance, Don Quixote at the court of the duchess; today we read all of Don Quixote with a bitter taste on the tongue; it’s almost an ordeal. In so doing, we would become very foreign, very obscure to the author and his contemporaries—they read it with a fully clear conscience as the most cheerful of books. They almost died laughing at it). Watching suffering makes people feel good; creating suffering makes them feel even better—that’s a harsh principle, but an old, powerful, and human, all-too-human major principle, which, by the way, even the apes might perhaps agree with as well. For people say that, in thinking up bizarre cruelties, the apes already anticipate a great many human actions and are, as it were, an “audition.” Without cruelty there is no celebration: that’s what the oldest and longest human history teaches us—and with punishment, too, there is so much celebration! 7 With these ideas, by the way, I have no desire whatsoever to give our pessimists grist for their discordant mills grating with weariness of life. On the contrary, I want to state very clearly that in that period when human beings had not yet become ashamed of their cruelty, life on earth was happier than it is today, now that we have our pessimists. The darkening of heaven over men’s heads has always increased alarmingly in proportion to the growth of human beings’ shame before human beings. The tired, pessimistic look, the mistrust of the riddle of life, the icy denial stemming from disgust with life—these are not the signs of the wickedest eras of human beings. It’s much more the case that they first come to light as the swamp plants they are when the swamp to which they belong is there—I mean the sickly mollycoddling and moralizing, thanks to which the animal “man” finally learns to feel shame about all his instincts. On his way to becoming an “angel” (not to use a harsher word here), man cultivated for himself that upset stomach and that furry tongue which not only made the joy and innocence of the animal repulsive but also made life itself distasteful:—so that now and then he stands there before himself, holds his nose, and with Pope Innocent III disapproves and makes a catalogue of his nastiness (“conceived in filth, disgustingly nourished in his mother’s body, developed out of evil material stuff, stinking horribly, a secretion of spit, urine, and excrement”).(3) Now, when suffering always has to march out as the first among the arguments against existence, as its most serious question mark, it’s good for us to remember the times when people judged things the other way around, because they couldn’t do without making people suffer and saw a first-class magic in it, a really tempting enticement for living. Perhaps, and let me say this as a consolation for the delicate, at that time pain did not yet hurt as much as it does nowadays. That at least could be the conclusion of a doctor who had treated a Negro (taking the latter as a representative of pre-historical man) for a bad case of inner inflammation, which drives the European, even one with the best constitution, almost to despair, but which does not have the same effect on the Negro. (The graph of the human sensitivity to pain seems in fact to sink down remarkably and almost immediately after one has moved beyond the first ten thousand or ten million of the top members of the higher culture. And I personally have no doubt that, in comparison with one painful night of a single hysterical well-educated female, the total suffering of all animals which up to now have been interrogated by the knife in search of scientific answers is simply not worth considering). Perhaps it is even permissible to concede the possibility that that pleasure in cruelty does not really need to have died out. It would only require a certain sublimation and subtlety, in proportion to the way pain hurts more nowadays; in other words, it would have to appear translated into the imaginative and spiritual and embellished with nothing but names so unobjectionable that they arouse no suspicion in even the most delicate hypocritical conscience (“tragic pity” is one such name; another is “les nostalgies de la croix” [nostalgias for the cross]). What truly enrages people about suffering is not the suffering itself, but the meaninglessness of suffering. But neither for the Christian, who has interpreted into suffering an entire secret machinery for salvation, nor for the naive men of older times, who understood how to interpret all suffering in relation to the spectator or to the person inflicting the suffering, was there generally any such meaningless suffering. In order for the hidden, undiscovered, unwitnessed suffering to be removed from the world and for people to be able to deny it honestly, they were then almost compelled to invent gods and intermediate beings at all levels, high and low—briefly put, something that also roamed in hidden places, that also looked into the darkness, and that would not readily permit an interesting painful spectacle to escape its attention. For with the help of such inventions life then understood and has always understood how to justify itself by a trick, how to justify its “evil.” Nowadays perhaps it requires other helpful inventions for that purpose (for example, life as riddle, life as a problem of knowledge). “Every evil a glimpse of which edifies a god is justified”: that’s how the pre-historical logic of feeling rang out—and was that really confined only to prehistory? The gods conceived of as friends of cruel spectacle—O how widely this primitive idea still rises up even within our European humanity! We might well seek advice from, say, Calvin and Luther on this point. At any rate it is certain that even the Greeks knew of no more acceptable snack to offer their gods to make them happy than the joys of cruelty. With what sort of expression, do you think, did Homer allow his gods to look down on the fates of men? What final sense was there basically in the Trojan War and similar tragic terrors? We cannot entertain the slightest doubts about this: they were intended as celebrations for the gods: and, to the extent that the poet is in these matters more “godlike” than other men, as festivals for the poets as well. . . . Later the Greek moral philosophers in the same way imagined the eyes of god no differently, still looking down on the moral struggles, on heroism and the self-mutilation of the virtuous: the “Hercules of duty” was on a stage, and he knew he was there. Without someone watching, virtue for this race of actors was something entirely inconceivable. Surely such a daring and fateful philosophical invention, first made for Europe at that time, the invention of the “free will,” of the absolutely spontaneous nature of human beings in matters of good and evil, was created above all to justify the idea that the interest of gods in men, in human virtue, could never run out? On this earthly stage there was never to be any lack of really new things, really unheard of suspense, complications, and catastrophes. A world conceived of as perfectly deterministic would have been predictable to the gods and therefore also soon boring for them—reason enough for these friends of the gods, the philosophers, not to ascribe such a deterministic world to their gods! All of ancient humanity is full of sensitive consideration for “the spectator,” for a truly public, truly visible world, which did not know how to imagine happiness without dramatic performances and festivals. And, as I have already said, in great punishment there is also so much celebration! 8 To resume the path of our enquiry, the feeling of guilt, of personal obligation has, as we saw, its origin in the oldest and most primitive personal relationship there is, in the relationship between seller and buyer, creditor and debtor. Here for the first time one person moved up against another person, here an individual measured himself against another individual. We have found no civilization still at such a low level that something of this relationship is not already perceptible. To set prices, to measure values, to think up equivalencies, to exchange things—that preoccupied man’s very first thinking to such a degree that in a certain sense it’s what thinking itself is. Here the oldest form of astuteness was bred; here, too, we can assume are the first beginnings of man’s pride, his feeling of pre-eminence in relation to other animals. Perhaps our word “man” (manas) continues to express directly something of this feeling of the self: the human being describes himself as a being which assesses values, which values and measures, as the “inherently calculating animal.” Selling and buying, together with their psychological attributes, are even older than the beginnings of any form of social organizations and groupings; out of the most rudimentary form of personal legal rights the budding feeling of exchange, contract, guilt, law, duty, and compensation was instead first transferred to the crudest and earliest social structures (in their relationships with similar social structures), along with the habit of comparing power with power, of measuring, of calculating. The eye was now adjusted to this perspective, and with that awkward consistency characteristic of thinking in more ancient human beings, hard to get started but then inexorably moving forward in the same direction, people soon reached the great generalization: “Each thing has its price, everything can be paid off”—the oldest and most naive moral principle of justice, the beginning of all “good nature,” all “fairness,” all “good will,” all “objectivity” on earth. Justice at this first stage is good will among those approximately equal in power to come to terms with each other, to “come to an agreement” again with each other by compensation—and in relation to those less powerful, to compel them to arrive at some settlement among themselves.— 9 Always measured by the standard of prehistory (a prehistory which, by the way, is present at all times or is capable of returning), the community also stands in relation to its members in that important basic relationship of the creditor to his debtor. People live in a community. They enjoy the advantages of a community (and what advantages they are! Nowadays we sometimes underestimate them); they live protected, cared for, in peace and trust, without worries concerning certain injuries and enmities from which the man outside the community, the “man without peace,” is excluded—a German understands what “misery” [Elend] or êlend [other country] originally means—and how people pledged themselves to and entered into obligations with the community bearing in mind precisely these injuries and enmities. What will happen with an exception to this case? The community, the defrauded creditor, will see that it gets paid as well as it can—on that people can rely. The issue here is least of all the immediate damage which the offender has caused. Setting this to one side, the lawbreaker [Verbrecher] is above all a “breaker” [Brecher], a breaker of contracts and a breaker of his word against the totality, with respect to all the good features and advantages of the communal life in which, up to that point, he has had a share. The lawbreaker is a debtor who does not merely not pay back the benefits and advances given to him, but who even attacks his creditor. So from this point on not only does he forfeit, as is reasonable, all these good things and benefits—but he is also now reminded what these good things are all about. The anger of the injured creditor, the community, gives him back again to the wild outlawed condition, from which he was earlier protected. It pushes him away from itself—and now every form of hostility can vent itself on him. At this stage of cultural behaviour “punishment” is simply the copy, the mimus, of the normal conduct towards the hated, disarmed enemy who has been thrown down, who has forfeited not only all legal rights and protection but also all mercy; hence it is a case of the rights of war and the victory celebration of vae victis [woe to the conquered] in all its ruthlessness and cruelty:—which accounts for the fact that war itself (including the warlike cult of sacrifice) has given us all the forms in which punishment has appeared in history. 10 As it acquires more power, a community no longer considers the crimes of the single individual so serious, because it no longer is entitled to consider him as dangerous and unsettling for the existence of the totality as much as it did before. The wrongdoer is no longer “outlawed” and thrown out, and the common anger is no longer permitted to vent itself on him without restraint to the same extent as earlier—instead the wrongdoer from now on is carefully protected by the community against this anger, especially from that of the immediately injured person, and is taken into protective custody. The compromise with the anger of those particularly affected by the wrong doing, and thus the effort to localize the case and to avert a wider or even a general participation and unrest, the attempts to find equivalents and to settle the whole business (the compositio), above all the desire, appearing with ever-increasing clarity, to consider every crime as, in some sense or other, capable of being paid off, and thus, at least to a certain extent, to separate the criminal and his crime from each other—those are the characteristics stamped more and more clearly on the further development of criminal law. If the power and the self-confidence of a community keep growing, the criminal law also grows constantly milder. Every weakening and deeper jeopardizing of the community brings its harsher forms of criminal law to light once again. The “creditor” has always become proportionally more humane as he has become richer. Finally the amount of his wealth even becomes measured by how much damage he can sustain without suffering from it. It would not be impossible to imagine a society with a consciousness of its own power which allowed itself the most privileged luxury which it can have—letting its criminals go without punishment. “Why should I really bother about my parasites?” it could then say. “May they live and prosper; for that I am still sufficiently strong!” . . . Justice, which started with “Everything is capable of being paid for; everything must be paid off” ends at that point, by shutting its eyes and letting the person incapable of payment go free—it ends, as every good thing on earth ends, by doing away with itself. This self-negation of justice: we know what a beautiful name it calls itself—mercy. It goes without saying that mercy remains the privilege of the most powerful man, or even better, his beyond the law. 11 A critical comment here about a recently published attempt to find the origin of justice in a completely different place—that is, in resentment. But first a word in the ear of the psychologists, provided that they have any desire to study resentment itself up close for once: this plant grows most beautifully nowadays among anarchists and anti-Semites; in addition, it blooms, as it always has, in hidden places, like the violet, although it has a different fragrance.(4) And since like always has to emerge necessarily from like, it is not surprising to see attempts coming forward again from just such circles, as they have already done many times before—see above, Section 14 [First Essay]—to sanctify revenge under the name of justice—as if justice were basically only a further development of a feeling of being injured—and to bring belated honour to reactive emotions generally, all of them, using the idea of revenge. With this last point I personally take the least offence. It even seems to me a service, so far as the entire biological problem is concerned (in connection with which the worth of those emotions has been underestimated up to now). The only thing I am calling attention to is the fact that it is the very spirit of resentment out of which this new emphasis on scientific fairness grows (which favours hate, envy, resentment, suspicion, rancour, and revenge). This “scientific fairness,” that is, ceases immediately and gives way to tones of mortal enmity and prejudice as soon as it deals with another group of emotions which, it strikes me, have a much higher biological worth than those reactive ones and which therefore have earned the right to be scientifically assessed and respected first—namely, the truly active emotions, like desire for mastery, acquisitiveness, and so on (E. Dühring, The Value of Life: A Course in Philosophy, the whole book really).(5) So much against this tendency in general. But in connection with Dühring’s single principle that we have to seek the homeland of justice in the land of the reactive feeling, we must, for love of the truth, rudely turn this around by setting out a different principle: the last territory to be conquered by the spirit of justice is the land of the reactive emotions! If it is truly the case that the just man remains just even towards someone who has injured him (and not merely cold, moderate, strange, indifferent: being just is always a positive attitude), if under the sudden attack of personal injury, ridicule, and suspicion, the gaze of the lofty, clear objectivity of the just and judging eye, as profound as it is benevolent, does not itself grow dark, well, that’s a piece of perfection and the highest mastery on earth—even something that it would be wise for people not to expect here; in any event, they should not believe in it too easily. It’s certainly true that, on average, among the most just people themselves even a small dose of hostility, malice, and insinuation is enough to make them see red and chase fairness out of their eyes. The active, aggressive, over-reaching human being is still placed a hundred steps closer to justice than the reactive person. For him it is simply not necessary in the slightest to estimate an object falsely and with bias, the way the reactive man does and must do. Thus, as a matter of fact, at all times the aggressive human being, as the stronger, braver, more noble man, has had on his side a better conscience as well as a more independent eye; by contrast, we can already guess who generally has the invention of “bad conscience” on his conscience—the man of resentment! Finally, let’s look around in history: up to now in what area has the whole implementation of law in general as well as the essential need for law been at home on earth? Could it be in the area of the reactive human beings? That is entirely wrong. It is much more the case that it’s been at home with the active, strong, spontaneous, and aggressive men. Historically considered, the law on earth—let me say this to the annoyance of the above-mentioned agitator (who once even confessed about himself “The doctrine of revenge runs through all my work and efforts as the red thread of justice”)—represents that very struggle against the reactive feelings, the war with them on the part of active and aggressive powers, which have partly used up their strength to put a halt to or to restrain the excess of reactive pathos and to compel some settlement with it. Wherever justice is practised, wherever justice is upheld, we see a stronger power in relation to a weaker power standing beneath it (whether with groups or individuals), seeking ways to bring an end among the latter to the senseless rage of resentment, partly by dragging the object of resentment out of the hands of revenge, partly by setting in the place of revenge a battle against the enemies of peace and order, partly by coming up with compensation, proposing it, under certain circumstances making it compulsory, partly by establishing certain equivalents for injuries as a norm, into which from now on resentment is directed once and for all. The most decisive factor, however, which the highest power carries out and sets in place against the superior numbers of the feelings of hostility and animosity—something that power always does as soon as it is somehow strong enough to do it—is to set up law, the imperative explanation of those things which, in its own eyes, are generally considered allowed and legal and things which are considered forbidden and illegal, while after the establishment of the law, the authorities treat attacks and arbitrary acts of individuals or entire groups as an outrage against the law, as rebellion against the highest power itself, and they steer the feeling of those beneath them away from the immediate damage caused by such outrages and thus, in the long run, achieve the reverse of what all revenge desires, which sees only the viewpoint of the injured party and considers only that valid. From now on, the eye becomes trained to evaluate actions always impersonally, even the eye of the harmed party itself (although this would be the very last thing to occur, as I have remarked earlier).—Consequently, only with the setting up of the law is there a “just” and “unjust” (and not, as Dühring will have it, from the time of the injurious action). To talk of just and unjust in themselves has no sense whatsoever; it’s obvious that in themselves harming, oppressing, exploiting, destroying cannot be “unjust,” inasmuch as life essentially works that way, that is, in its basic functions it harms, oppresses, exploits, and destroys, and cannot be conceived at all without this character. We have to acknowledge something even more disturbing: the fact that from the highest biological standpoint, conditions of justice must always be only exceptional conditions, partial restrictions on the basic will to live, which is set on power; they are subordinate to the total purpose of this will as individual means, that is, as means to create larger units of power. A legal system conceived of as sovereign and universal, not as a means in the struggle of power complexes, but as a means against all struggles in general, something along the lines of Dühring's communist cliché in which each will must be considered as equal to every will, that would be a principle hostile to life, a destroyer and dissolver of human beings, an assassination attempt on the future of human beings, a sign of exhaustion, a secret path to nothingness.— 12

Here one more word concerning the origin and purpose of punishment—two problems which are separate or should be separate. Unfortunately people normally throw them together into one. How do the previous genealogists of morality deal with this issue? Naively—the way they have always worked. They find some “purpose” or other for punishment, for example, revenge or deterrence, then in a simple way set this purpose at the beginning as the causa fiendi [creative cause] of punishment and—they're finished. The “purpose in law,” however, is the very last idea we should use in the history of the emergence of law. It is much rather the case that for all forms of history there is no more important principle than that one which we reach with such difficulty but which we also really should reach—namely that what causes a particular thing to arise and the final utility of that thing, its actual use and arrangement in a system of purposes, are separate toto coelo [by all the heavens, i.e., absolutely] from each other, that something existing, which has somehow come to its present state, will again and again be interpreted by the higher power over it from a new perspective, appropriated in a new way, reorganized for and redirected to new uses, that all events in the organic world involve overpowering, acquiring mastery and that, in turn, all overpowering and acquiring mastery involve a new interpretation, a readjustment, in which the “sense” and “purpose” up to then must necessarily be obscured or entirely erased. No matter how well we have understood the usefulness of some physiological organ or other (or a legal institution, a social custom, a political practice, some style in the arts or in a religious cult), we have still not, in that process, grasped anything about its origin—no matter how uncomfortable and unpleasant this may sound in elderly ears. From time immemorial people have believed that in demonstrable purposes, in the usefulness of a thing, a form, or an institution, they could also understand the reason it came into existence—the eye as something made to see, the hand as something made to grasp. So people also imagined punishment as invented to punish. But all purposes, all uses, are only signs that a will to power has become master over something with less power and has stamped on it its own meaning of some function, and the entire history of a “thing,” an organ, a practice can by this process be seen as a continuing chain of signs of constantly new interpretations and adjustments, whose causes do not even need to be connected to each other—in some circumstances they rather follow and take over from each other by chance. Consequently, the “development” of a thing, a practice, or an organ has nothing to do with its progressus [progress] towards a single goal, even less is it the logical and shortest progressus reached with the least expenditure of power and resources—but rather the sequence of more or less profound, more or less mutually independent processes of overpowering which take place on that thing, together with the resistance which arises against that overpowering each time, the changes of form which have been attempted for the purpose of defence and reaction, as well as the results of successful counter-measures. Form is fluid; the “meaning,” however, is even more so. . . . Even within each individual organism things are no different: with every essential growth in the totality, the “meaning” of the individual organ also shifts—in certain circumstances its partial destruction, a reduction of its numbers (for example, through the obliteration of intermediate structures) can be a sign of growing power and perfection. What I wanted to say is this: the partial loss of utility, decline, and degeneration, the loss of meaning, and purposiveness, in short, death, also belong to the conditions of a real progressus [progress], which always appears in the form of a will and a way to a greater power and always establishes itself at the expense of a huge number of smaller powers. The size of a “step forward” can even be estimated by a measure of everything that had to be sacrificed to it. The humanity as mass sacrificed for the benefit of a single stronger species of man—that would be a step forward I emphasize this major point of view about historical methodology all the more since it basically runs counter to the very instinct which presently rules and to contemporary taste, which would rather still go along with the absolute contingency, even the mechanical meaninglessness, of all events rather than with the theory of a will to power playing itself out in everything that happens. The democratic idiosyncrasy of being hostile to everything which rules and wants to rule, the modern hatred of rulers [Misarchismus] (to make up a bad word for a bad thing) has gradually transformed itself into and dressed itself up as something spiritual, of the highest spirituality, to such an extent that nowadays step by step it is already infiltrating the strictest, apparently most objective scientific research, and is allowed to infiltrate it. Indeed, it seems to me already to have attained mastery over all of physiology and the understanding of life, to their detriment, as is obvious, because it has conjured away from them their fundamental concept, that of real activity. By contrast, under the pressure of this idiosyncrasy we push “adaptation” into the foreground, that is, a second-order activity, a mere reactivity; in fact, people have defined life itself as an always purposeful inner adaptation to external circumstances (Herbert Spencer). But that simply misjudges the essence of life, its will to power. That overlooks the first priority of the spontaneous, aggressive, over-reaching, re-interpreting, re-directing, and shaping powers, after whose effects the “adaptation” then follows. Thus, the governing role of the highest functions in an organism itself, the ones in which the will for living appear active and creative, are denied. People should remember the criticism Huxley directed at Spencer for his “administrative nihilism.” But the issue here concerns much more than “administration”. . . (6)

13 Returning to the business at hand, that is, to punishment, we have to differentiate between two aspects of it: first its relative duration, the way it is carried out, the action, the “drama,” a certain strict sequence of procedures and, on the other hand, its fluidity, the meaning, the purpose, the expectation linked to the implementation of such procedures. In this matter, we can here assume, without further comment, per analogium [by analogy], in accordance with the major viewpoints about the historical method we have just established, that the procedure itself will be somewhat older and earlier than its use as a punishment, that the latter was only first injected and interpreted into the procedure (which had been present for a long time but was a custom with a different meaning), in short, that it was not what our naive genealogists of morality and law up to now have assumed, who collectively imagined that the procedure was invented for the purpose of punishment, just as people earlier thought that the hand was invented for the purpose of grasping. Now, so far as that other element in punishment is concerned, the fluid element, its “meaning,” in a very late cultural state (for example in contemporary Europe) the idea of “punishment” actually presents not simply one meaning but a whole synthesis of “meanings.” The history of punishment up to now, in general, the history of its use for different purposes, finally crystallizes into a sort of unity, which is difficult to untangle, difficult to analyze, and, it must be stressed, totally incapable of definition. (Today it is impossible to say clearly why we really punish; all ideas in which an entire process is semiotically summarized elude definition. Only something which has no history is capable of being defined). At an earlier stage, by contrast, that synthesis of “meanings” still appears easier to untangle, as well as even easier to adjust. We can still see how in every individual case the elements in the synthesis alter their valence and rearrange themselves accordingly, so that soon this or that element steps forward and dominates at the expense of the rest; indeed, under certain circumstances one element (say, the purpose of deterrence) appears to rise above all the other elements. In order to give at least an idea of how uncertain, how belated, how accidental “the meaning” of punishment is and how one and the same procedure can be used, interpreted, or adjusted for fundamentally different purposes, let me offer here an example which presented itself to me on the basis of relatively little random material: punishment as a way of rendering someone harmless, as a prevention from further harm; punishment as compensation for the damage to the person injured, in some form or other (also in the form of emotional compensation); punishment as isolation of some upset to an even balance in order to avert a wider outbreak of the disturbance; punishment as way of inspiring fear of those who determine and carry out punishment; punishment as a sort of compensation for the advantages which the law breaker has enjoyed up until that time (for example, when he is made useful as a slave working in the mines); punishment as a cutting out of a degenerate element (in some circumstances an entire branch, as in Chinese law, and thus a means to keep the race pure or to sustain a social type); punishment as festival, that is, as the violation and humiliation of some enemy one has finally thrown down; punishment as a way of making a conscience, whether for the man who suffers the punishment—so-called “reform”—or whether for those who witness the punishment being carried out; punishment as the payment of an honorarium, set as a condition by those in power, which protects the wrong doer from the excesses of revenge; punishment as a compromise with the natural condition of revenge, insofar as the latter is still upheld and assumed as a privilege by powerful families; punishment as a declaration of war and a war measure against an enemy to peace, law, order, and authority, which people fight with the very measures war makes available, as something dangerous to the community, as a breach of contract with respect to its conditions, as a rebel, traitor, and breaker of the peace. 14 Of course, this list is not complete. Obviously punishment is overloaded with all sorts of useful purposes, all the more reason why people can infer from it an alleged utility, which, in the popular consciousness at least, is considered its most essential one—faith in punishment, which nowadays for several reasons is getting shaky, still finds its most powerful support in precisely that. Punishment is supposed to be valuable in waking the feeling of guilt in the guilty party. In punishment people are looking for the actual instrument for that psychic reaction called “bad conscience,” “pangs of conscience.” But in doing this, people are misappropriating reality and psychology, even for today, and how much more for the longest history of man, his prehistory! Real pangs of conscience are something extremely rare, especially among criminals and prisoners. Prisons and penitentiaries are not breeding grounds in which this species of gnawing worm particularly likes to thrive:—on that point all conscientious observers agree, in many cases delivering such a judgment with sufficient unwillingness, going against their own desires. In general, punishment makes people hard and cold. It concentrates. It sharpens the feeling of estrangement; it strengthens powers of resistance. If it comes about that punishment shatters a man’s energy and brings on a wretched prostration and self-abasement, such a consequence is surely even less pleasant than the typical result of punishment, characteristically a dry, gloomy seriousness. However, if we consider those thousands of years before the history of humanity, without a second thought we can conclude that the very development of a feeling of guilt was most powerfully hindered by punishment—at least with respect to the victims onto whom this force of punishment was vented. For let us not underestimate just how much the criminal is prevented by the very sight of judicial and executive procedures themselves from sensing that his act, the nature of his action, is something inherently reprehensible, for he sees exactly the same kind of actions committed in the service of justice, then applauded and practised in good conscience, like espionage, lying, bribery, entrapment, the whole tricky and sly art of the police and prosecution, as it manifests itself in the various kinds of punishment—the robbery, oppression, abuse, imprisonment, torture, murder, all done, moreover, as a matter of principle, without even any emotional involvement as an excuse—all these actions are in no way rejected or condemned in themselves by his judges, but only in particular respects when used for certain purposes. “Bad conscience,” this most creepy and most interesting plant among our earthly vegetation, did not grow in this soil—in fact, for the longest period in the past nothing about dealing with a “guilty party” penetrated the consciousness of judges or even those doing the punishing. By contrast, they were dealing with someone who had caused harm, with an irresponsible piece of fate. And even the man on whom punishment later fell, once again like a piece of fate, experienced in that no “inner pain,” other than what might have come from the sudden arrival of something unpredictable, a terrible natural event, a falling, crushing boulder against which there is no way to fight any more. 15 At one point Spinoza became aware of this issue in an incriminating way (something which irritates his interpreters, like Kuno Fischer, who really go to great lengths to misunderstand him on this matter), when one afternoon, he came up against some memory or other (who knows what?) and pondered the question about what, as far as he was concerned, was left of the celebrated morsus conscientiae [the bite of conscience]—for him, the man who had expelled good and evil into human fantasies and had irascibly defended the honour of his “free” God against those blasphemers who claimed that in everything God worked sub ratione boni [with good reason] (“but that means that God would be subordinate to Fate, a claim which, in truth, would be the greatest of all contradictions”). For Spinoza the world had gone back again into that state of innocence in which it had existed before the invention of bad conscience. So with that what, then, had become of the morsus conscientiae? “The opposite of gaudium [joy],” Spinoza finally told himself “is sorrow, accompanied by the image of something over and done with which happened contrary to all expectation” (Ethics III, Proposition XVIII, Schol. I. II). In a manner no different from Spinoza’s, those instigating evil who incurred punishment have for thousands of years felt, so far as their “crime” is concerned, “Something has unexpectedly gone awry here,” not “I should not have done that”—they submitted to their punishment as people submit to a sickness or some bad luck or death, with that brave fatalism free of revolt which, for example, even today gives the Russians an advantage over us westerners in coping with life. If back then there was some criticism of the act, such criticism came from prudence: without question we must seek the essential effect of punishment above all in an increase of prudence, in an extension of memory, in a will to go to work from now on more carefully, more mistrustfully, more secretly, with the awareness that we are in many things definitely too weak, in a kind of improved ability to judge ourselves. In general, what can be achieved through punishment, in human beings and animals, is an increase in fear, a honing of prudence, and control over desires. In the process, punishment tames human beings, but it does not make them “better”—people could with more justification assert the opposite. (Popular wisdom says “Injury makes people prudent,” but to the extent that it makes them prudent, it also makes them bad. Fortunately, often enough it makes people stupid). 16 At this point, I can no longer avoid setting out, in an initial, provisional statement, my own hypothesis about the origin of “bad conscience.” It is not easy to get people to attend to it, and it requires them to consider it at length, to guard it, and to sleep on it. I consider bad conscience the profound illness which human beings had to come down with under the pressure of that most fundamental of all the changes which they ever experienced—that change when they finally found themselves locked within the confines of society and peace. Just like the things water animals must have gone through when they were forced either to become land animals or to die off, so events must have played themselves out with this half-beast so happily adapted to the wilderness, war, wandering around, adventure—suddenly all its instincts were devalued and “disengaged.” From this point on, these animals were to go on foot and “carry themselves”; whereas previously they had been supported by the water. A terrible heaviness weighed them down. In performing the simplest things they felt ungainly. In dealing with this new unknown world, they no longer had their old leaders, the ruling unconscious drives which guided them safely—these unfortunate creatures were reduced to thinking, inferring, calculating, bringing together cause and effect, reduced to their “consciousness,” their most impoverished and error-prone organ! I believe that never on earth has there been such a feeling of misery, such a leaden discomfort—while at the same time those old instincts had not all of a sudden stopped imposing their demands! Only it was difficult and seldom possible to do their bidding. For the most part, they had to find new and, as it were, underground satisfactions for themselves. All instincts which are not discharged to the outside are turned back inside—this is what I call the internalization [Verinnerlichung] of man. From this first grows in man what people later call his “soul.” The entire inner world, originally as thin as if stretched between two layers of skin, expanded and extended itself, acquired depth, width, and height, to the extent that what a person discharged out into the world was obstructed. Those frightening fortifications with which the organization of the state protected itself against the old instincts for freedom—punishments belong above all to these fortifications—brought it about that all those instincts of the wild, free, roaming man turned themselves backwards, against man himself. Enmity, cruelty, joy in pursuit, in attack, in change, in destruction—all those turned themselves against the possessors of such instincts. That is the origin of “bad conscience.” The man who, because of a lack of external enemies and opposition, was forced into an oppressive narrowness and regularity of custom impatiently tore himself apart, persecuted himself, gnawed away at himself, grew upset, and did himself damage—this animal which scraped itself raw against the bars of its cage, which people want to “tame,” this impoverished creature, consumed with longing for the wild, which had to create out of its own self an adventure, a torture chamber, an uncertain and dangerous wilderness—this fool, this yearning and puzzled prisoner, became the inventor of “bad conscience.” But with him was introduced the greatest and weirdest illness, from which humanity up to the present time has not recovered, the suffering of man from man, from himself, a consequence of the forcible separation from his animal past, a leap and, so to speak, a fall into new situations and living conditions, a declaration of war against the old instincts, on which, up to that point, his power, joy, and ability to inspire fear had been based. Let us at once add that, on the other hand, the fact that there was on earth an animal soul turned against itself, taking sides against itself, meant there was something so new, profound, unheard of, enigmatic, contradictory, and full of the future, that with it the picture of the earth was fundamentally changed. In fact, it required divine spectators to appreciate the dramatic performance which then began and whose conclusion is by no means yet in sight—a spectacle too fine, too wonderful, too paradoxical, to be allowed to play itself out senselessly and unobserved on some ridiculous star or other! Since then man has been included among the most unexpected and most thrillingly lucky rolls of the dice in the game played by Heraclitus’ “great child,” whether he’s called Zeus or chance.(7) For himself he arouses a certain interest, a tension, a hope, almost a certainty, as if something is announcing itself with him, something is preparing itself, as if the human being were not the goal but only a way, an episode, a bridge, a great promise . . . 17

Inherent in this hypothesis about the origin of bad conscience is, firstly, the assumption that the change was not gradual or voluntary and did not manifest itself as an organic growth into new conditions, but as a break, a leap, something forced, an irrefutable disaster, against which there was no struggle, nor even any resentment. Secondly, however, it assumes that the adaptation of a populace hitherto unchecked and shapeless into a fixed form, just as it was initiated by an act of violence, was carried to its conclusion by nothing but acts of violence—that consequently the oldest “State” emerged as a terrible tyranny, as an oppressive and inconsiderate machinery, and continued working until such raw materials of people and half-animals finally were not only thoroughly kneaded and submissive but also given a shape. I used the word “State”: it is self-evident who is meant by that term—some pack of blond predatory animals, a race of conquerors and masters, which, organized for war and with the power to organize, without thinking about it, sets its terrifying paws on a subordinate population which may perhaps be vast in numbers but is still without any form, is still wandering about. That is, in fact, the way the “State” begins on earth. I believe that fantasy has been done away with which sees the beginning of the state in a “contract.” The man who can command, who is by nature a “master,” who comes forward with violence in his actions and gestures—what has he to do with making contracts! We do not negotiate with such beings. They come like fate, without cause, reason, consideration, or pretext. They are present as lightning is present, too fearsome, too sudden, too convincing, too “different” even to become merely hated. Their work is the instinctive creation of forms, the imposition of forms. They are the most involuntary and most unconscious artists in existence:—where they appear something new is soon present, a power structure which lives, something in which the parts and functions are demarcated and coordinated, in which there is, in general, no place for anything which does not first derive its “meaning” from its relationship to the totality. These men, these born organizers, have no idea what guilt, responsibility, and consideration are. In them that fearsome egotism of the artist is in charge, which stares out like bronze and knows how to justify itself for all time in the “work,” just as a mother does in her child. They are not the ones in whom “bad conscience” grew—that point is obvious from the outset. But this hateful plant would not have grown without them. It would have failed if an immense amount of freedom had not been driven from the world under the pressure of their hammer blows, their artistic violence, or at least had not been driven from sight and, as it were made latent. This powerful instinct for freedom, once made latent—we already understand how—this instinct for freedom driven back, repressed, imprisoned inside, and finally still able to discharge and direct itself only against itself—that and that alone is what bad conscience is in its beginning. 18 We need to be careful not to entertain a low opinion of this entire phenomenon simply because it is from the start nasty and painful. In fact, it is basically the same active force which is at work on a grander scale in those artists of power and organizers and which builds states. Here it is inner, smaller, more mean spirited, directing itself backwards, into “the labyrinth of the breast,” to use Goethe’s words, and it creates bad conscience for itself and builds negative ideals, just that instinct for freedom (to use my own language, the will to power). Only the material on which the shaping and violating nature of this force directs itself here is simply man himself, his entire old animal self—and not, as in that greater and more striking phenomenon, on another man or on other men. This furtive violation of the self, this artistic cruelty, this pleasure in giving a shape to oneself as a tough, resisting, suffering material, to burn into it a will, a critique, a contradiction, a contempt, a denial, this weird and horribly pleasurable work of a soul willingly divided against itself, which makes itself suffer for the pleasure of creating suffering, all this active “bad conscience,” as the essential womb of ideal and imaginative events, finally brought to light—we have already guessed—also an abundance of strange new beauty and affirmation and perhaps for the first time the idea of the beautiful in general. . . . For what would be “beautiful,” if its opposite had not yet come to an awareness of itself, if ugliness had not already said to itself, “I am ugly”? At least, after this hint the paradox will be less puzzling, the extent to which in contradictory ideas, like selflessness, self-denial, self-sacrifice, an ideal can be indicated, something beautiful. And beyond that, one thing we do know—I have no doubt about it—namely, the nature of the pleasure which the selfless, self-denying, self-sacrificing person experiences from the beginning: this pleasure belongs to cruelty. So much for the moment on the origin of the “unegoistic” as something of moral worth and on the demarcation of the soil out of which this value has grown: only bad conscience, only the will to abuse the self, provides the condition for the value of the unegoistic. 19 Bad conscience is a sickness—there’s no doubt about that—but a sickness the way pregnancy is a sickness. Let’s look for the conditions in which this illness has arrived at its most terrible and most sublime peak:—in this way we’ll see what really brought about its entry into the world at the start. But that requires a lot of endurance—and we must first go back once more to an earlier point of view. The relationship in civil law between the debtor and his creditor, which I have reviewed extensively already, has been interpreted once again in an extremely remarkable and dubious historical manner into a relationship which we modern men are perhaps least capable of understanding, namely, into the relationship between those people presently alive and their ancestors. Within the original tribal cooperatives—we’re talking about primeval times—the living generation always acknowledged a legal obligation to the previous generations, and especially to the earliest one which had founded the tribe (and this was in no way merely a sentimental obligation: the latter is something we could even reasonably claim was, in general, absent for the longest period of the human race). Here the reigning conviction is that the tribe exists at all only because of the sacrifices and achievements of its ancestors—and that people have to pay them back with sacrifices and achievements. In this people recognize a debt which keeps steadily growing because these ancestors in their continuing existence as powerful spirits do not stop giving the tribe new advantages and lending them their power. Do they do this gratuitously? But there is no

“gratuitously” for those raw and “spiritually destitute” ages. What can people give back to them? Sacrifices (at first as nourishment understood very crudely), festivals, chapels, signs of honour, above all, obedience—for all customs, as work of one’s ancestors, are also their statutes and commands. Do people ever give them enough? This suspicion remains and grows. From time to time it forcefully requires a huge wholesale redemption, something immense as a repayment to the “creditor” (the notorious sacrifice of the first born, for example, blood, human blood in any case). The fear of ancestors and their power, the awareness of one’s debt to them, according to this kind of logic, necessarily increases directly in proportion to the increase in the power of the tribe itself, as the tribe finds itself constantly more victorious, more independent, more honoured, and more feared. It’s not the other way around! Every step towards the decline of the tribe, all conditions of misery, all indications of degeneration, of approaching dissolution, rather lead to a constant lessening of the fear of the spirit of its founder and give a constantly smaller image of his wisdom, providence, and powerful presence. If we think this crude form of logic through to its conclusion, then the ancestors of the most powerful tribes must, because of the fantasy of increasing fear, finally have grown into something immense and have been pushed back into the darkness of a divine mystery, something beyond the powers of imagination, so that finally the ancestor is necessarily transfigured into a god. Here perhaps lies even the origin of the gods, thus an origin out of fear! . . . And the man to whom it seems obligatory to add “But also out of piety” could hardly claim to be right for the longest period of the human race, for his primaeval age. Of course, he would be all the more correct for the middle period, in which the noble tribes developed—those who in fact paid back to their founders, their ancestors (heroes, gods), with interest, all the characteristics which in the meantime had become manifest in themselves, the noble qualities. Later we will have another look at the process by which the gods were ennobled and exalted (which is naturally not at all the same thing as their becoming “holy”). But now, for the moment, let’s follow the path of this whole development of the consciousness of guilt to its conclusion. 20 As history teaches us, the consciousness of being in debt to the gods did not in any way come to an end after the downfall of the organization of the “community” based on blood relationships. Just as humanity inherited the ideas of “good and bad” from the nobility of the tribe (together with its fundamental psychological tendency to set up orders of rank), in the same way people also inherited, as well as the divinities of the tribe and of the extended family, the pressure of as yet unpaid debts and the desire to be relieved of them. (The transition is made with those numerous slave and indentured populations which adapted themselves to the divine cults of their masters, whether through compulsion or through obsequiousness and mimicry; from them this inheritance then overflowed in all directions). The feeling of being indebted to the gods did not stop growing for several thousands of years, always, in fact, in direct proportion to the extent to which the idea of god and the feeling for god grew on earth and were carried to the heights. (The entire history of ethnic fighting, victory, reconciliation, mergers, everything which comes before the final rank ordering of all the elements of a people in every great racial synthesis, is mirrored in the tangled genealogies of its gods, in the sagas of their fights, victories, and reconciliations. The progress towards universal empires is always also the progress toward universal divinities. In addition, despotism, with its overthrow of the independent nobility always builds the way to some variety of monotheism). The arrival of the Christian god, as the greatest [Maximal] god which has yet been reached, thus brought about the maximum feeling of indebtedness on earth. Assuming that we have gradually set out in the reverse direction, we can infer with no small probability that, given the inexorable decline of faith in the Christian god, even now there may already be a considerable decline in the human consciousness of guilt. Indeed, we cannot dismiss the idea that the complete and final victory of atheism could release humanity from this entire feeling of being indebted to its origin, its causa prima [prime cause]. Atheism and a kind of second innocence belong together.— 21 So much for a brief and rough preface concerning the connection between the ideas “guilt” and “obligation” with religious assumptions. Up to this point I have deliberately set aside the actual moralizing of these ideas (the repression of them into the conscience, or more precisely, the complex interaction of the bad conscience with the idea of god). At the end of the previous section I even talked as if there were no such thing as this moralizing and thus as if those ideas were now necessarily coming to an end after the collapse of their presuppositions, the faith in our “creditor,” in God. But to a terrifying extent the facts indicate something different. The moralizing of the ideas of debt and duty, with their repression into the bad conscience, actually gave rise to the attempt to reverse the direction of the development I have just described, or at least to bring its motion to a halt. Now, in a fit of pessimism, the prospect of a final installment must once and for all be denied; now, our gaze must bounce and ricochet back despairingly off an iron impossibility, now those ideas of “debt” and “duty” must turn back. But against whom? There can be no doubt: first of all against the “debtor,” in whom from this point on bad conscience sets itself firmly, gnaws away, spreads out, and, like a polyp, grows wide and deep to such an extent that finally, with the impossibility of discharging the debt, people also come up with the notion that it is impossible to remove the penance, the idea that it cannot be paid off (“eternal punishment”):—finally however, those ideas of “debt” and “duty” turn back even against the “creditor.” People should, in this matter, now think about the causa prima [first cause] of humanity, about the beginning of the human race, about their ancestor who from now on is loaded down with a curse (“Adam,”

“original sin,” “no freedom of the will”) or about nature from whose womb human beings arose and into which the principle of evil is now inserted (“the demonizing of nature”) or about existence in general, which remains something inherently without value (nihilistic turning away from existence, longing for nothingness, or a desire for its “opposite,” in an alternate state of being, Buddhism and things like that)—until all of a sudden we confront the paradoxical and horrifying expedient with which a martyred humanity found temporary relief, that stroke of genius of Christianity: God sacrificing himself for the guilt of human beings, God paying himself back with himself, God as the only one who can redeem man from what for human beings has become impossible to redeem—the creditor sacrificing himself for the debtor, out of love (can people believe that?), out of love for his debtor! . . . 22 You will already have guessed what really went on with all this and under all this: that will to self-torment, that repressed cruelty of animal man pushed inward and forced back into himself, imprisoned in the “state” to make him tame, who invented bad conscience in order to lacerate himself, after the more natural discharge of this will to inflict pain had been blocked—this man of bad conscience seized upon religious assumptions to drive his self-torment to its most horrifying hardship and ferocity. Guilt towards God: this idea becomes his instrument of torture. In “God” he seizes on the ultimate contrast he is capable of discovering to his real and indissoluble animal instincts. He interprets these animal instincts themselves as a crime against God (as enmity, rebellion, revolt against the “master,” the “father,” the original ancestor and beginning of the world). He grows tense with the contradiction of “God” and “devil.” He hurls from himself every “No” which he says to himself, to nature, naturalness, the factual reality [Tatsächlichkeit] of his being as a “Yes,” as something existing, as living, as real, as God, as the blessedness of God, as God the Judge, as God the Hangman, as something beyond him, as eternity, as perpetual torment, as hell, as punishment and guilt beyond measure. In this spiritual cruelty there is a kind of insanity of the will which simply has no equal: a man’s will finding him so guilty and reprehensible that there is no atonement, his will to imagine himself punished, but in such a way that the punishment could never be adequate for his crime, his will to infect and poison the most fundamental basis of things with the problem of punishment and guilt in order to cut himself off once and for all from any exit out of this labyrinth of “fixed ideas,” his will to erect an ideal—that of the “holy God”—in order to be tangibly certain of his own absolute worthlessness when confronted with it. O this insane, sad beast man! What ideas it has, what unnaturalness, what paroxysms of nonsense, what bestiality of thought breaks from it as soon as it is prevented, if only a little, from being a beast in deed! . . . All this is excessively interesting, but there’s also a black, gloomy, unnerving sadness about it, so that man must forcefully hold himself back from gazing too long into these abysses.

Here we have illness—no doubt about that—the most terrifying illness that has raged in human beings up to now:—and anyone who can still hear (but nowadays people no longer have the ear for that!—) how in this night of torment and insanity the cry of love has resounded, the cry of the most yearning delight, of redemption through love, turns away, seized by an invincible horror. . . In human beings there is so much that is terrible! . . . The world has already been a lunatic asylum for too long! 23 These remarks should be sufficient, once and for all, concerning the origin of the “holy God.”—The fact that conceiving gods does not necessarily, in itself, have to lead to this degraded imagination, that’s something we could not excuse ourselves from recalling for a moment, the point that there are more uplifting ways to use the invention of the gods than for this human self-crucifixion and self-laceration, in which Europe in the last millennia has become an expert—fortunately that’s something we can still infer with every glance we cast at the Greek gods, these reflections of nobler men, more rulers of themselves, in whom the animal in man felt himself deified and did not tear himself apart, did not rage against himself! These Greeks for the longest time used their gods for the very purpose of keeping that “bad conscience” at a distance, in order to be permitted to continue enjoying their psychic freedom. Hence, their understanding was the opposite of how Christianity used its God. In this matter the Greeks went a very long way, these splendid and lion-hearted Greeks, with their child-like minds. And no lesser authority than that of Homer’s Zeus himself now and then lets them understand that they are making things too easy for themselves. “It’s strange,” he says at one point in relation to the case of Aegisthus, a very bad case— It’s strange how these mortal creatures complain about the gods! Evil comes only from us, they claim, but they themselves Stupidly make themselves miserable, even contrary to fate.(8) But at the same time we hear and see that even this Olympian spectator and judge is far from being irritated and from thinking them evil because of this: “How foolish they are,” he thinks in relation to the bad deeds of mortal men—and even the Greeks of the strongest and bravest times conceded that much about themselves—the “foolishness,” “stupidity,” a little “disturbance in the head” were the basis for many bad and fateful things—foolishness, not sin! Do you understand that? . . . But even this disturbance in the head was a problem, “Indeed, how is this even possible? Where could this have really come from in heads like the ones we have, we men of noble descent, happy, successful, from the best society, noble, and virtuous?”—for hundreds of years the aristocratic Greek posed this question to himself in relation to every horror or outrage incomprehensible to him which had defiled one of his peers. “Some god must have deluded him,” he finally said, shaking his head . . . This solution is typical of the Greeks . . . In this way, the gods then served to justify men to a certain extent, even in bad things. They served as the origins of evil—at that time the gods took upon themselves, not punishment, but, what is nobler, the guilt. . . 24 —I'll conclude with three question marks—that's clear enough. You may perhaps ask me, "Is an ideal actually being built up here or shattered?" . . . But have you ever really asked yourself enough how high a price has been paid on earth for the construction of every ideal? How much reality had to be constantly vilified and misunderstood for that to happen, how many lies had to be consecrated, how many consciences corrupted, how much "god" had to be sacrificed every time? In order to enable a shrine to be built, a shrine must be destroyed: that is the law—show me the case where it has not been fulfilled! We modern men, we are the inheritors of thousands of years of vivisection of the conscience and self-inflicted animal torture. That's what we have had the longest practice doing, that is perhaps our artistry; in any case, it's something we have refined, the corruption of our taste. For too long man has looked at his natural inclinations with an "evil eye," so that finally in him they have become twinned with "bad conscience." An attempt to reverse this might, in itself, be possible—but who is strong enough for it, that is, to link as siblings bad conscience and the unnatural inclinations, all those aspirations for what lies beyond, those things which go against our senses, against our instincts, against nature, against animals—in short, the earlier ideals, all the ideals which are hostile to life, ideals of those who vilify the world? To whom can we turn to today with such hopes and demands? . . . In this we would have precisely the good people against us, as well, of course, as the comfortable, the complacent, the vain, the enthusiastic, the tired. . . . But what is more deeply offensive, what cuts us off so fundamentally, as letting them take some note of the severity and loftiness with which we deal with ourselves? And, by contrast, how obliging, how friendly all the world is in relation to us, as soon as we act as all the world does and "let ourselves go" just like all the world! To attain the goal I'm talking about requires a different sort of spirit from those which are likely to exist at this particular time: spirits empowered by war and victory, for whom conquest, adventure, danger, and even pain have become a need. That would require getting acclimatized to keen, high air, winter wanderings, to ice and mountains in every sense. That would require even a kind of sublime maliciousness, an ultimate self-conscious wilfulness of knowledge, which comes with great health. Simply and seriously put, that would require just this great health! . . . Is this even possible today? . . . But at some time or other, in a more powerful time than this mouldy, self-doubting present, he must nonetheless come to us, the redeeming man of great love and contempt, the creative spirit, constantly pushed again and again away from every sideline or from the beyond by his own driving power, whose isolation is misunderstood by people as if it were a flight from reality—whereas it is only his immersion, burial, and absorption in reality, so that, once he comes out of it into the light again, he brings home the redemption of this reality, its redemption from the curse which the previous ideal has laid upon it. This man of the future, who will release us from that earlier ideal just as much as from what had to grow from it, from the great loathing, from the will to nothingness, from nihilism—that stroke of noon and of the great decision which makes the will free once again, who gives back to the earth its purpose and to the human being his hope, this anti-Christ and anti-nihilist, this conqueror of God and of nothingness—at some point he must come . . . 25 But what am I talking about here? Enough, enough! At this stage there’s only one thing appropriate for me to do: keep quiet. Otherwise, I’ll make the mistake of arrogating to myself something which only someone younger is free to do, someone “more of the future,” someone more powerful than I am—something that only Zarathustra is free to do, Zarathustra the Godless . . . (9)

ENDNOTES (1) Nietzsche quotes the Latin: “si plus minusve secuerunt, ne fraude esto.” [Back to Text] (2) Spinoza: Baruch de Spinoza (1632-1677), important Dutch rationalist philosopher. [Back to Text] (3) Pope Innocent III: (1161-1216), an important and powerful medieval Pope. [Back to Text] (4) . . . ressentiment: As mentioned above (in the First Essay), Nietzsche uses this French word, which since his writing, and largely because of it, has entered the English language as an important term in psychology: a short definition is as follows: “deep-seated resentment, frustration, and hostility, accompanied by a sense of being powerless to express these feelings directly” (Merriam-Webster). Ressentiment is thus significantly different in meaning from resentment. [Back to Text] (5) E. Dühring: (1833-1921), German philosopher and economist. [Back to Text] (6) Herbert Spencer: (1820-1903), English philosopher who advanced the idea of evolution as a progressive process in society. Huxley: Thomas Huxley (1825-1895): a major English champion of Darwin’s evolutionary ideas. [Back to Text] (7) Heraclitus: (c. 535-475 BC) an important pre-Socratic Greek philosopher. [Back to Text] (8) Zeus makes these remarks to the other Olympian gods at the start of Homer’s Odyssey. Aegisthus seduced Clytaemnestra, and the two of them murdered Agamemnon, her husband, as soon as he returned home from the Trojan War. The gods, according to Homer, had warned him against these actions. [Back to Text] (9) Zarathustra: a name for the Persian prophet Zoroaster, which Nietzsche appropriates to designate a spokesman for his own ideas. [Back to Text] Link to Genealogy of Morals, Table of Contents Nietzsche, Genealogy of Morals, Third Essay Friedrich Nietzsche On the Genealogy of Morals A Polemical Tract Translated by Ian Johnston Vancouver Island University Nanaimo, British Columbia 2014 [Students, teachers, artists, and members of the general public may download and distribute this text free of charge and without permission. They may also freely edit the text to suit their purposes. However, no commercial publication of this text or any part of it is allowed without permission of the translator. For any questions or comments please contact Ian Johnston. Note that in the following text, the words within square brackets have been added by the translator. The numbers in curved brackets indicate links to explanatory endnotes provided by the translator.] If you would like to download a Rich Text Format (Word) text of this text, please use the following link: [Genealogy 3 \[RTF\] Third Essay What do ascetic ideals mean? Carefree, mocking, violent—that what Wisdom wants us to be. She is a woman. She always loves only a man of war. Thus Spoke Zarathustra\(1\)](#) 1 What do ascetic ideals mean?—Among artists they mean nothing or too many different things; among philosophers and scholars they mean something like having a nose or an instinct for the most auspicious conditions of a higher spirituality; among women, at best one additional seductive charm, a little morbidezza [small morbidity] on beautiful flesh, the angelic quality of a nice-looking, plump animal; among physiologically impaired and peevish people (that is, among the majority of mortals) they are an attempt to imagine themselves as “too good” for this world, a holy form of orgiastic excess, their chief tool in the fight with their enduring pain and boredom; among the clergy they are the essential priestly belief, their best instrument of power, and also the “highest of all” permits for power; finally among the saints they are a pretext for hibernation, their novissima glorie cupido [most recent desire for glory], their repose in nothingness (“God”), their form of insanity. However, the fact that generally the ascetic ideal has meant so much to human beings is an expression of the basic fact of the human will, its horror vacui [horror of a vacuum]. It requires a goal—and it prefers to will nothingness than not to will.—Do you understand me? . . . Have you understood me? . . . “Not in the slightest, my dear sir!”—so, let’s start from the beginning. 2 What do ascetic ideals mean?—Or, to take a single example which I have been asked to give advice about often enough, what does it mean, for instance, when an artist like Richard Wagner in his later years pays homage to chastity? In a certain sense, of course, he always did this, but in an ascetic sense he did it for the first time at the very end. What does this change in “sense” mean, this radical change in sense?—For that’s what it was: with it Wagner leapt right over into his opposite. What does it mean when an artist leaps over into his opposite? . . . If we are willing to pause for a while at this question, we immediately encounter here the memory of perhaps the best, strongest, most cheerful, and bravest period in Wagner’s life, the time when he was inwardly and deeply preoccupied with the idea of Luther’s marriage. Who knows the circumstances which really saw to it that today, instead of this wedding music, we have Die Meistersinger?(2) And how much of the former work may perhaps still echo in the latter? But there is no doubt that this “Luther’s Wedding” would also have involved the praise of chastity. Of course, it would have contained a praise of sensuality, as well—and that, it strikes me, would have been very much in order, very “Wagnerian,” too. For between chastity and sensuality there is no necessary opposition. Every good marriage, every genuine affair of the heart transcends this opposition. In my view, Wagner would have done well if he had enabled his Germans to take this pleasant fact to heart once more, with the help of a lovely and brave comedy about Luther, for among the Germans there are and always have been a lot of people who slander sensuality, and Luther's merit is probably nowhere greater than precisely here: in having had the courage of his own sensuality (—at that time people called it, delicately enough, “evangelical freedom”). But even if it were the case that there really is that antithesis between chastity and sensuousness, fortunately there is no need for it to be a tragic antithesis. At least this should be the case for all successful and cheerful mortals, who are far from considering their unstable equilibrium between “animal and angel” an immediate argument against existence—the finest and brightest, like Goethe, like Hafiz, even saw in this one more attraction of life. It's precisely such “contradictions” that make existence enticing. . . . On the other hand, it's easy enough to understand that once pigs who have had bad luck are persuaded to worship chastity—and there are such swine!—they see in chastity only their opposite, the opposite to unlucky pigs, and will worship that—and with such zealous tragic grunting! We can imagine it—that embarrassing and unnecessary antithesis, which Richard Wagner at the end of his life unquestioningly still wanted to set to music and produce on stage. But what for? That's a fair question. For why should he be concerned about pigs? Why should we?— 3 In this matter there is, of course, another question we cannot circumvent: why was Wagner really concerned about that manly (alas, so unmanly) “simpleton from the country,” that poor devil and nature boy Parsifal, whom he finally turned into a Catholic in such an embarrassing way.(3) What? Was this Parsifal meant to be taken at all seriously? For we could be tempted to assume the reverse, even to desire it—that the Wagnerian Parsifal was intended to be cheerful, a concluding piece and satyr drama, as it were, with which the tragic writer Wagner wanted to take his farewell, in a respectful manner worthy of him, from us, also from himself, and, above all, from tragedy, that is, with an excess of the highest and most high-spirited parody of the tragic itself, of the entire dreadful earthly seriousness and earthly wailing of his earlier works, of the crudest form in the anti-nature of the ascetic ideal, conquered at last. That would have been, as mentioned, particularly worthy of a great tragedian, who, like every artist, first attains the final peak of his greatness when he knows how to see himself and his art beneath him—when he knows how to laugh at himself. Is Parsifal Wagner's secret superior laughter at himself, the triumph of his achieving the ultimate and highest artistic freedom, the artist's movement into another world [Künstler-Jenseitigkeit]? As I've said, we might wish that. For what would Parsifal be if intended seriously? Do we need to see in it (as it was put to me) “the epitome of an insane hatred for knowledge, spirit, and sensuality”? A curse on the senses and the spirit in one breath of hatred? An apostasy and going back to sickly Christian and obscurantist ideals? And finally even a denial of the self, a cancellation of the self on the part of an artist who up to that point had directed all the power of his will to attain the reverse, namely, the highest spiritualization and sensuousness in his art? And not only in his art, but also in his life. We should remember how Wagner in his day so enthusiastically followed in the footsteps of the philosopher Feuerbach. Feuerbach's phrase about "healthy sensuality"—in Wagner's thirties and forties, as with many Germans (—they called themselves the "young Germans"), that phrase rang out like a word of redemption. Did Wagner finally learn something different? It appears, at least, that he finally wanted to teach something different. And not only on the stage with the Parsifal trombones:—in the cloudy writings of his last years—as constricted as they are baffling—there are a hundred places which betray a secret wish and will, a despondent, uncertain, unacknowledged will essentially to preach nothing but going back, conversion, denial, Christianity, medievalism, and to say to his followers "It's nothing! Seek salvation somewhere else!" In one place he even calls out to the "Blood of the Redeemer" . . . 4 In a case like Wagner's, which is in many ways an embarrassing one, although the example is typical, my opinion is that it's certainly best to separate an artist far enough from his work, so that one does not take him with the same seriousness as one does his work. In the final analysis, he is only the precondition for his work, its maternal womb, the soil or, in some cases, the dung and manure, on and out of which it grows—and thus, in most cases, something that we must forget about, if we want to enjoy the work itself. Insight into the origin of a work is a matter for physiologists and vivisectionists of the spirit, never the aesthetic men, the artists—never! In a deep, fundamental, even terrifying way the poet and composer of Parsifal could not escape living inside and descending into the conflicts of the medieval soul, a hostile distance from all spiritual loftiness, rigour, and discipline, a form of intellectual perversity (if you will forgive the expression), any more than a pregnant woman can escape the repellent and strange aspects of pregnancy, something which, as I have said, one must forget if one wants to enjoy the child. We should be on our guard against that confusion which arises from psychological contiguity (to use an English word), a confusion in which even an artist can only too easily get caught up, as if he himself were what he can present, imagine, and express. In fact, the case is this: if that were what he was, he simply would not present, imagine, or express it. A Homer would not have written a poem about Achilles or a Goethe a poem about Faust if Homer had been an Achilles or if Goethe had been a Faust. A complete and entire artist is forever separated from the "real," from what actually is. On the other hand, one can understand how he can sometimes grow weary of this eternal "unreality" and falseness of his innermost existence to the point of desperation—and that he then makes an attempt for once to reach over into what is forbidden precisely to him, into reality, in an attempt truly to be. What success does he have? We can guess . . . That is the typical wishfulness of the artist: the same wishfulness which fell over Wagner once he'd grown old and for which he had to pay such a high, fatal price (—because of it he lost a valuable number of his friends). Finally, however, and quite apart from this mere wishfulness of his, who could not desire—for Wagner's own sake—that he had taken his leave of us and his art in a different manner, not with a Parsifal, but more victoriously, more self-confidently, more like Wagner—less deceptive, less ambiguous about all his intentions, less like Schopenhauer, less nihilistic? 5 —So what do ascetic ideals mean? In the case of an artist, we know the answer immediately:—absolutely nothing! . . . Or they mean so many things, that they amount to nothing at all! . . . So let's eliminate the artists right away. They do not stand independent of the world and against the world long enough for their evaluations and the changes in those evaluations to merit our interest for their own sake! They have in all ages been valets to a morality or philosophy or religion, quite apart from the fact that, often enough, they unfortunately have been the all-too-adaptable courtiers of groups of their followers and their patrons and flatterers with a fine nose for old or simply newly arriving powers. At the very least, they always need a means of protection, a support, an already established authority. The artists never stand for themselves—standing alone contravenes their deepest instincts. Hence, for example, “once the time had come” Richard Wagner took the philosopher Schopenhauer as his point man, as his protection. Who could have even imagined that he would have had the courage for an ascetic ideal without the support which Schopenhauer's philosophy offered him, without the authority of Schopenhauer, which was becoming predominant in Europe in the 1870's? (And that's not even considering whether in the new Germany it would have been generally possible to be an artist without the milk of a pious, imperially pious way of thinking).(4)—And with this we come to the more serious question: What does it mean when real philosopher pays homage to the ascetic ideal, a truly independent spirit like Schopenhauer, a man and a knight with an bronze gaze, who is courageous to himself, who knows how to stand alone and does not first wait for a front man and hints from higher up?—Here let us consider right away the remarkable and for many sorts of people even fascinating position of Schopenhauer on art, for that was apparently the reason Richard Wagner first moved over to Schopenhauer (persuaded to do that, as we know, by a poet, by Herwegh). That shift was so great that it opened up a complete theoretical contrast between his earlier and his later aesthetic beliefs— between, for example, the earlier views expressed in “Opera and Drama” and the later views in the writings which he published from 1870 on. In particular, what is perhaps most surprising is that from this point on Wagner ruthlessly altered his judgment of the value and place of music itself. Why should it concern him that up to that point he had used music as a means, a medium, a “woman,” something which simply required a purpose, a man, in order to flourish—that is, drama! Suddenly he realized that with Schopenhauer’s theory and innovation he could do more in majo rem musicae gloriam [for the greater glory of music]—that is, through the sovereignty of music, as Schopenhauer understood it: music set apart from all other arts, the inherently independent art, not, like the other arts, offering copies of phenomena, but rather the voice of the will itself speaking out directly from the “abyss” as its most authentic, most primordial, least derivative revelation. With this extraordinary increase in the value of music, as this seemed to grow out of Schopenhauer’s philosophy, the musician himself also suddenly grew in value to an unheard of extent: from now on he would be an oracle, a priest, more than a priest, in fact, a kind of mouthpiece of the “essence” of things, a telephone from the world beyond—in future he didn’t speak only of music, this ventriloquist of God—he talked metaphysics. Is it any wonder that finally one day he spoke about ascetic ideals? . . . 6

Schopenhauer used Kant’s formulation of the aesthetic problem— although he certainly did not examine it with Kantian eyes. Kant thought he had honoured art when among the predicates of the beautiful he gave priority to and set in the foreground those which constitute the honour of knowledge—impersonality and universal validity. Here is not the place to explore whether or not this is for the most part a false idea. The only thing I wish to stress is that Kant, like all philosophers, instead of taking aim at the aesthetic problem from the experiences of the artist (the creator), thought about art and the beautiful only from the point of view of the “looker on” and in the process, without anyone noticing it, brought the “spectator” himself into the concept “beautiful.” If only these philosophers of beauty had also been at least sufficiently knowledgeable about this “spectator”!— that is, as a great personal fact and experience, as a wealth of very particular, strong experiences, desires, surprises, and delights in the realm of the beautiful! But I fear the opposite has always been the case. And so from the very start we get from them definitions like that famous one which Kant gives for the beautiful, in which the lack of a finer self-experience sits in the shape of a thick worm of fundamental error. “The beautiful,” Kant said, “is what pleases in a disinterested way.” In a disinterested way! Let’s compare this definition with that other one formulated by a true “spectator” and artist—Stendhal, who once called the beautiful a promesse de bonheur [a promise of happiness]. Here, at any rate, the very thing which Kant emphasises in the aesthetic state is clearly rejected and deleted: déintéressement [disinterestedness]. Who is right, Kant or Stendhal?(5)—Naturally, if our aestheticians never get tired of weighing the issue in Kant’s favour, claiming that under the magic spell of beauty people can look even at unclothed female statues “without interest,” we are entitled to laugh a little at their expense:—in relation to this delicate matter, the experiences of artists are “more interesting,” and

Pygmalion was in any event not necessarily an “unaesthetic man.”(6) Let’s think all the better of the innocence of our aestheticians, which is reflected in such arguments. For example, let’s count it to Kant’s honour that he knew how to lecture on the characteristic properties of the sense of touch with the naïveté of a country parson.—This point brings us back to Schopenhauer, who stood measurably closer to the arts than Kant but who nonetheless did not get away from the spell of the Kantian definition. How did that happen? The circumstance is sufficiently odd. He interpreted the word “disinterested” in the most personal manner from a single experience which must have been something routine with him. There are few things Schopenhauer talks about with as much confidence as he does about the effect of aesthetic contemplation. In connection with that, he states that it counteracts sexual “interest” in particular—and thus acts like lupulin or camphor. He never got tired of extolling this emancipation from the “will” as the great advantage and use of the aesthetic state. Indeed, we could be tempted to ask whether his basic conception of “Will and Idea,” the notion that there could be a redemption from the “will” only through “representation,” might have taken its origin from a universalizing of that sexual experience. (With all questions concerning Schopenhauer’s philosophy, incidentally, we should never fail to consider that it is the conception of a twenty-six-year-old young man, so that it involves not merely the specific details of Schopenhauer but also the particular details of that time of life). If, for example, we listen to one of the most expressive passages from the countless ones he wrote to honour the aesthetic state (World as Will and Idea, I, 231), we hear its tone, the suffering, the happiness, the gratitude uttered in words like these: “That is the painless condition which Epicurus valued as the highest good and as the condition of the gods. For that moment, we are relieved of the contemptible drive of the will. We celebrate a holiday[den Sabbat] from the penal servitude to the will. The wheel of Ixion stands motionless.”(7) . . . What vehemence in the words! What a picture of torment and long weariness! What an almost pathological temporal contrast between “that moment” and the usual “wheel of Ixion,” the “penal servitude to the will,” the “contemptible drive of the will”!—But assuming that Schopenhauer were right a hundred times about himself, what would that provide by way of insight into the essence of the beautiful? Schopenhauer wrote about one effect of the beautiful—the way it calms the will—but is it a regularly occurring effect? Stendhal, as mentioned, a no less sensual person, but with a natural constitution much happier than Schopenhauer’s, emphasizes another effect of the beautiful: “the beautiful promises happiness.” To him the fact of the matter seemed to be precisely the arousal of the will (“of interest”) by the beautiful. And could we not finally object about Schopenhauer himself that he was very wrong to think of himself as a Kantian in this matter, that he had completely failed to understand Kant’s definition of the beautiful in a Kantian manner—that even he found the beautiful pleasing out of an “interest,” even out of the strongest and most personal interest of all, that of a torture victim who escapes from his torture? . . . And to come back to our first question, “What does it mean when a philosopher renders homage to the ascetic ideal?”—we get here at least our first hint: he wants to escape a torture. 7 Let’s be careful not to make gloomy faces right away at that word “torture.” In this particular case there remain enough objections to take into account, enough to subtract—there even remains something to laugh about. For let’s not underestimate the fact that Schopenhauer, who in fact treated sexuality as a personal enemy (including its instrument, woman, this “instrumentum diaboli” [tool of the devil]), needed enemies in order to maintain his good spirits, that he loved grim, caustic, black-green words, that he got angry for the sake of getting passionately angry, that he would have become ill, would have become a pessimist (—and he wasn’t a pessimist, no matter how much he wanted to be one) without his enemies, without Hegel, woman, sensuousness, and the whole will for existence, for continuing on. Had that not been the case, Schopenhauer would not have kept going—on that we can wager. He would have run off. But his enemies held him securely; his enemies seduced him back to existence again and again. Just like the ancient cynics, his anger was his refreshment, his relaxation, his payment, his remedy for disgust, his happiness. So much with respect to the most personal features in the case of Schopenhauer. On the other hand, with him there is still something typical—and here we only come up against our problem once more. As long as there have been philosophers on earth and wherever there have been philosophers (from India to England, to name two opposite poles of talent in philosophy) there unquestionably have existed a genuine philosophical irritability with and rancor against sensuousness—Schopenhauer is only the most eloquent eruption of these and, if one has an ear for it, also the most captivating and delightful. In addition, there exist a real philosophical bias and affection favouring the whole ascetic ideal. No one should fool himself about or against that. As mentioned, both belong to the philosophical type: if both are missing in a philosopher then he is always only a “so-called philosopher”—of that we may be certain. What does that mean? For we must first interpret these facts of the case: in itself stands there eternally stupid, like every “thing in itself.” Every animal, including also la bête philosophe [the philosophical animal] instinctively strives for the optimal beneficial conditions in which it can let out all its power and attain the strongest feeling of its strength. Every animal in an equally instinctual way and with a refined sense of smell that “is loftier than all reason” abhors any kind of trouble maker and barrier which lies or which could lie in its way to these optimal conditions (—I’m not speaking about its path to “happiness,” but about its way to power, to action, to its most powerful deeds, and, in most cases, really about its way to unhappiness). Thus, the philosopher abhors marriage, as well as what might persuade him into it—marriage is a barrier and a disaster along his route to the optimal. What great philosopher up to now has been married? Heraclitus, Plato, Descartes, Spinoza, Leibnitz, Kant, Schopenhauer—none of these got married. What’s more, we cannot even imagine them married. A married philosopher belongs in a comedy, that’s my principle. And Socrates, that exception, the malicious Socrates, it appears, ironically got married specifically to demonstrate this very principle. Every philosopher would speak as once Buddha spoke when someone told him of the birth of a son, “Rahula has been born to me. A shackle has been forged for me.” (Rahula here means “a little demon”). To every “free spirit” there must come a reflective hour, provided that previously he has had one without thought, of the sort that once came to this same Buddha—“Life in a house,” he thought to himself, “is narrow and confined, a polluted place. Freedom consists of abandoning the house”; “because he thought this way, he left the house.” The ascetic ideal indicates so many bridges to independence that a philosopher cannot, without an inner rejoicing and applause, listen to the history of all those decisive people who one day said “No” to all lack of freedom and went off to some desert or other, even assuming that such people were merely strong donkeys and entirely opposite to a powerful spirit. So what, then, does the ascetic ideal mean as far as a philosopher is concerned? My answer is—you will have guessed it long ago—the philosopher smiles when he sees in it an optimal set of conditions for the loftiest and boldest spirituality—in so doing, he does not deny “existence”; rather that’s how he affirms his existence and only his existence and does this perhaps to such a degree that he is not far from the wicked desire pereat mundus, fiat philosophia, fiat philosophus, fiam! [let the world perish, let philosophy exist, let the philosopher exist, let me exist!] . . . (8) 8 You see that these philosophers are not unprejudiced witnesses to and judges of the value of ascetic ideals! They think about themselves—what concern to them is “the saint”! In this matter they think about what is most immediately indispensable to them: freedom from compulsion, disturbance, fuss, from business, duties, worries: a bright light in the head, dance, the leap and flight of ideas; good air—thin, clear, free, dry—like the air at high altitudes, with which everything in animal being grows more spiritual and acquires wings; calm in all basement areas; all dogs nicely tied up in chains; no hostile barking and shaggy rancour; no gnawing worm of wounded ambition; modest and humble inner organs busy as windmills but at a distance; the heart in an alien place, beyond, in the future, posthumous—all in all, so far as the ascetic ideal is concerned, they think of the cheerful asceticism of some deified animal which has become independent, roaming above life rather than being at rest. We know what the three great catch phrases of the ascetic ideal are: poverty, humility, chastity. Now look closely at the lives of all great, prolific, inventive spirits—over and over again you’ll rediscover all three there to a certain degree.

Not at all—this is self-evident—as if it were something to do with their “virtues”—what does this kind of man have to do with virtues?—but as the truest and most natural conditions of their best existence, their most beautiful fecundity. At the same time, it is indeed entirely possible that their dominating spirituality at first had to set aside an unbridled and sensitive pride or the reins of a wanton sensuality or that they perhaps had difficulty enough maintaining their will for the “desert” against an inclination for luxury, for something very exquisite, as well as against a lavish liberality of heart and hand. But their spirituality did it, simply because it was the dominating instinct, which achieves its own demands in relation to all the other instincts—it still continues to do so. If it did not, then it would simply not dominate. Hence, this has nothing to do with “virtue.” Besides, the desert I just mentioned, into which the strong spirits with an independent nature withdraw and isolate themselves—O how different it seems from the desert educated people dream about!—for in some circumstances these educated people are themselves this desert. And certainly no actor of the spirit could simply endure it—for them it is not nearly romantic and Syrian enough, not nearly enough of a theatrical desert! It’s true there’s no lack of camels there, but that’s the only similarity between them. Perhaps a voluntary obscurity, a detour away from one’s self, a timidity about noise, admiration, newspapers, influence; a small official position, a daily routine, something which hides more than it brings to light, contact now and then with harmless, cheerful wildlife and birds whose sight is relaxing, a mountain for company, not a dead one but one with eyes (that means with lakes); in some circumstances even a room in a full, nondescript inn, where one is sure to be confused for someone else and can talk to anyone with impunity—that’s what a “desert” is here. O, it’s lonely enough, believe me! When Heraclitus withdrew into the courtyard and colonnades of the immense temple of Artemis, that was a worthier “desert,” I admit. Why do we lack such temples? (—Perhaps we do not lack them. I’ve just remembered my most beautiful room for study, the Piazza San Marco, assuming it’s in the spring, and in the morning, too, between ten and twelve o’clock).⁽⁹⁾ But what Heraclitus was getting away from is still the same thing we go out of our way to escape nowadays: the noise and the democratic chatter of the Ephesians, their politics, their news about the “empire” (you understand I mean the Persians), their market junk of “today”—for we philosophers need peace and quiet from one thing above all— from everything to do with “today.” We honour what is still, cold, noble, distant, past, in general everything at the sight of which the soul does not have to defend itself or tie itself up—something with which a person can speak without having to speak aloud. People should just listen to the sound which a spirit has when it is talking. Every spirit has its own sound, loves its own sound. The man over there, for example, must be a real agitator, I mean a hollow head, a hollow pot [Hohlkopf, Hohltopf]); no matter what goes into him, everything comes back out of him dull and thick, weighed down with the echo of a huge emptiness. That man over there rarely speaks in anything other than a hoarse voice. Has he perhaps imagined himself hoarse? That might be possible—ask the physiologists—but whoever thinks in words thinks as a speaker and not as a thinker (it reveals that fundamentally he does not think of things or think factually, but only in relation to things, that he really is thinking of himself and his listeners). A third man over there speaks with an insistent familiarity, he steps in too close to our bodies, he breathes over us—instinctively we shut our mouths, even though he is speaking to us through a book. The sound of his style tells us the reason for that—he has no time, he has little faith in himself, he'll have his say today or never again. But a spirit which is sure of itself, speaks quietly. He's looking for seclusion. He lets people wait for him. We recognize a philosopher by the following: he walks away from three glittering and garish things—fame, princes, and women. That doesn't mean that they might not come to him. He shrinks from light which is too bright. Hence, he shies away from his time and its "day." In that he's like a shadow: the lower the sun sinks, the bigger he becomes. So far as his "humility" is concerned, he endures a certain dependence and obscurity, as he endures the darkness. More than that, he fears being disturbed by lightning and recoils from the unprotected and totally isolated and abandoned tree on which all bad weather can discharge its mood, all moods discharge their bad weather. His "maternal" instinct, the secret love for what is growing in him, directs him to places where his need to think of himself is removed, in the same sense that the maternal instinct in women has up to now generally kept her in a dependent situation. Ultimately they demand little enough, these philosophers. Their motto is "Whoever owns things is owned"—not, as I must say again and again, from virtue, from an admirable desire for modest living and simplicity, but because their highest master demands that of them, demands astutely and unrelentingly. He cares for only one thing and for that gathers up and holds everything—time, power, love, interest. This sort of man doesn't like to be disturbed by hostile things and by friendships; he easily forgets or scoffs. To him martyrdom seems something in bad taste—"to suffer for the truth"—he leaves that to the ambitious and the stage heroes of the spirit and anyone else who has time enough for it (—they themselves, the philosophers, have something to (do for the truth). They use big words sparingly. It's said that they resist using even the word "truth": it sounds boastful. . . . Finally, as far as "chastity" concerns philosophers, this sort of spirit apparently keeps its fertility in something other than in children; perhaps they also keep the continuity of their names elsewhere, their small immortality (among philosophers in ancient India people spoke with even more presumption, "What's the point of offspring to the man whose soul is the world?"). There's no sense of chastity there out of some ascetic scruple and hatred of the senses, just as it has little to do with chastity when an athlete or jockey abstains from women. It's more a matter of what their dominating instinct wants, at least during its great pregnant periods. Every artist knows how damaging the effects of sexual intercourse are to states of great spiritual tension and preparation. The most powerful and most instinctual artists among them don't acquire this knowledge primarily by experience, by bad experience—no, it's simply that “maternal” instinct of theirs which here makes the decision ruthlessly to benefit the developing work among all the other stores and supplies of energy, of animal vitality. The greater power then uses up the lesser. Incidentally, apply this interpretation now to the above-mentioned case of Schopenhauer: the sight of the beautiful evidently worked in him as the stimulus for the main power in his nature (the power of reflection and the deep look), so that this then exploded and suddenly became master of his consciousness. In the process, we should in no way rule out the possibility that that characteristic sweetness and abundance typical of the aesthetic condition could originate precisely from the ingredient “sensuality” (just as from the same source is derived that “idealism” characteristic of sexually mature young girls)—so that thus, with the onset of the aesthetic condition, sensuality is not shoved out, as Schopenhauer believed, but is transformed and does not enter the consciousness any more as sexual stimulation. (I will come back to this point of view at another time, in connection with the even more delicate problems of the physiology of aesthetics, so untouched up to this point, so unanalyzed). 9 A certain asceticism, as we have seen, a hard and cheerful renunciation with the best intentions, belongs to those conditions favourable to the highest spirituality and is also among its most natural consequences. So it's no wonder from the outset that philosophers in particular never treat the ascetic ideal without some bias. A serious historical review demonstrates that the tie between the ascetic ideal and philosophy is even much closer and stronger. We could say it was in the leading reins of this ideal that philosophy in general learned to take its first steps and partial steps on earth—alas, still so awkwardly, alas, still with such a morose expression, alas, so ready to fall over and lie on its belly, this small, tentative, clumsy, loving infant with crooked legs! With philosophy things initially played themselves out as with all good things: for a long time it had no courage for itself—it always looked around to see if anyone would come to its assistance, and even more it was afraid of all those who gazed at it. Just make a list of the individual drives and virtues of the philosopher—his impulse to doubt, his impulse to deny, his impulse to wait (the “ephectic” impulse), his impulse to analyze, his impulse to research, to seek out, to take chances, his impulse to compare, to weigh evenly, his desire for neutrality and objectivity, his will to every “sine ira et studio” [without anger and partiality]—have we not already understood that for the longest time all of them went against the first demands of morality and conscience (to say nothing at all about reason in general, which even Luther liked to call Madam Clever, the Clever Whore) and that if a philosopher were to have come to an awareness of himself, he would really have had to feel that he was almost the living manifestation of “nitimur invetum” [we search for what’s forbidden]—and thus taken care not to “feel himself,” not to become conscious of himself? As I’ve said, the case is no different with all the good things of which we are nowadays so proud. Even measured by the standards of the ancient Greeks, our entire modern being, insofar as it is not weakness but power and consciousness of power, looks like sheer hubris and godlessness; for the very opposite of those things we honour today have for the longest period had conscience on their side and God to guard over them. Our entire attitude to nature today, our violation of nature, with the help of machines and the unimaginable inventiveness of our technicians and engineers, is hubris; our attitude to God is hubris—I mean our attitude to some alleged spider spinning out purposes and morality behind the fabric of the huge fishing net of causality—we could say with Charles the Bold in his struggle with Ludwig XI, “Je combats l’universelle araignée” [I am fighting the universal spider]; our attitude to ourselves is hubris—for we experiment with ourselves in a manner we would not permit with any animal and happily and inquisitively slit the souls of living bodies open. What do we still care about the “salvation” of the soul? We cure ourselves later. Being sick teaches us things—we don’t doubt that—it’s even more instructive than being healthy. The person who makes us ill appears to us nowadays to be more important even than any medical people and “saviours.” We violate ourselves now, no doubt about it, we nutcrackers of the soul, we questioning and questionable people, as if life were nothing else but cracking nuts. And in so doing, we must necessarily become every day constantly more questionable, more worthy of being questioned, and in the process perhaps also worthier—to live? All good things were once bad things; every original sin has become an original virtue. For example, marriage for a long time seemed to be a sin against the rights of the community. Once people paid a fine for being so presumptuous as to arrogate a woman to themselves (that involves, for instance, the jus primae noctis [the right of the first night], even today in Cambodia the privilege of the priest, this guardian of “good ancient customs”). The gentle, favourable, yielding, sympathetic feelings—which over time grew so valuable that they are almost “value in itself”—for the longest period were countered by self-contempt against them. People were ashamed of being mild, just as today they are ashamed of being hard (compare Beyond Good and Evil, Section 260). Subjugation under the law—O with what resistance of conscience the noble races throughout the earth had to renounce the vendetta and to concede the power of the law over themselves! For a long time the “law” was a vetum [something prohibited], a sacrilege, an innovation; it appeared with force, as force, something to which people submitted only with a feeling of shame for their conduct. Every one of the smallest steps on earth in earlier days was fought for with spiritual and physical torture. This whole historical point, “that not only moving forward—no!—but walking, moving, and changing necessarily required their countless martyrs,” nowadays sounds so strange to us. In The Dawn, Section 18, I brought out this point. “Nothing has come at a higher price,” it says there, “than the small amount of human reason and feeling of freedom, which we are now so proud of. But because of this pride it is now almost impossible for us to sense how that huge stretch of time of the ‘morality of custom,’ which comes before ‘world history,’ is the really decisive and important history which established the character of humanity, when everywhere people recognized suffering as virtue, cruelty as virtue, pretence as virtue, revenge as virtue, the denial of reason as virtue and, by contrast, well-being as danger, the desire for knowledge as danger, peace as danger, pity as danger, being pitied as disgrace, work as disgrace, insanity as divinity, change as inherently immoral and pregnant with ruin!”¹⁰ The same book, in Section 42, explains the system of values, the pressure of a system of values, under which the most ancient race of contemplative men had to live—a race that was despised exactly to the extent that it was not feared! Contemplation first appeared on earth in a disguised shape, with an ambiguous appearance, with an evil heart, and often with a worried head. There’s no doubt about that. For a long time the inactive, brooding, unwarlike elements in the instincts of contemplative people fostered a deep mistrust around them, against which the only way to cope was to arouse an emphatic fear of them. The ancient Brahmins, for example, understood that! The oldest philosophers knew how to earn meaning for their existence and their appearance, some security and background, because of which people learned to fear them. To look at the matter more closely, this happened because of an even more fundamental need, that is, the need to win fear and respect for themselves. For they discovered that inside them all judgments of value had turned against them; they had to beat down all kinds of suspicions about and resistance to “the philosopher inside them.” As men of dreadful times, they achieved this with dreadful means: cruelty against themselves, inventive self-denial—that was the major instrument of these power-hungry hermits and new thinkers, who found it necessary first to overthrow the gods and traditions inside themselves, in order to be able to believe in their innovation. I recall the famous story of King Vishvamitra, who, through a thousand years of self-torments, acquired such a feeling of power and faith in himself that he committed himself to building a new heaven, that weird symbol of the oldest and most recent history of philosophers on earth. Everyone who at some time or another has built a “new heaven,” found the power to do that first in his own hell. . . . Let’s condense all these facts into short formulas: the philosophical spirit always had to begin by disguising itself, wrapping itself in a cocoon of the previously established forms of the contemplative man, as priest, magician, prophet, generally as a religious man, in order to make any kind of life at all possible. The ascetic ideal for a long time served the philosopher as a form in which he could appear, as a condition for his existence—he had to play the role, in order to be able to be a philosopher. And he had to believe in what he was doing, in order to play that role. The characteristically detached stance of philosophers, something which denies the world, is hostile to life, has no faith in the senses, and is free of sensuality, which was maintained right up to the most recent times and thus became valued almost as the essence of the philosophical posture—that is, above all, a consequence of the critical conditions under which, in general, philosophy arose and survived. In fact, for the longest time on earth philosophy would not have been at all possible without an ascetic cover and costume, without an ascetic misunderstanding of the self. To put the matter explicitly and vividly: up to the most recent times the ascetic priest has provided the repellent and dark caterpillar form which was the only one in which philosophy could live and creep around. . . . Has that really changed? Is the colourful and dangerous winged creature, that “spirit” which this caterpillar hid within itself, at last really been released and allowed out into the light, thanks to a sunnier, warmer, brighter world? Nowadays do we have sufficient pride, daring, bravery, self-certainty, spiritual will, desire to assume responsibility, and freedom of the will so that from now on “the philosopher” is truly possible on earth? . . . 11 Only now that we have taken a look at the ascetic priest can we seriously get at our problem: What does the ascetic ideal mean—only now does it become “serious.” From this point on we confront the actual representative of seriousness. “What does all seriousness mean?”—this even more fundamental question perhaps lies already on our lips, a question for physiologists, naturally, but nonetheless one which we will still evade for the moment. In that ideal, the ascetic priest preserves, not merely his faith, but also his will, his power, his interest. His right to existence stands and falls with that ideal. No wonder that here we run into a fearful opponent, given, of course, that we were people antagonistic to that ideal?—an opponent of the sort who fights for his existence against those who deny the ideal. . . . On the other hand, it is from the outset improbable that such an interesting stance to our problem will be particularly beneficial to it. The ascetic priest will hardly in himself prove the most successful defender of his ideal, for the same reason that a woman habitually fails when it’s a matter of defending “woman as such”—to say nothing of his being able to provide the most objective assessment of and judgment about the controversy we are dealing with here. Rather than having to fear that he will refute us too well—this much is clear enough—it’s more likely we’ll still have to help him defend himself against us. . . . The idea being contested at this point is the value of our lives in the eyes of ascetic priests: this same life (along with what belongs to it, “nature,” “the world,” the whole sphere of becoming and transience) they set up in relation to an existence of a totally different kind, a relationship characterized by opposition and mutual exclusion, except where life somehow turns against itself, denies itself. In this case, the case of an ascetic life, living counts as a bridge over to that other existence. The ascetic treats life as an incorrect road, where we must finally go backwards, right to the place where it begins, or as a misconception which man refutes by his actions—or should refute. For he demands that people go with him. Where he can, he enforces his evaluation of existence. What's the meaning of that? Such a monstrous way of assessing value does not stand inscribed in human history as something exceptional and curious. It is one of the most widespread and enduring extant facts. If read from a distant star, the block capital script of our earthly existence might perhaps lead one to conclude that the earth is the inherently ascetic star, a corner for discontented, arrogant, and repellent creatures, incapable of ridding themselves of a deep dissatisfaction with themselves, with the earth, with all living, creatures who inflict as much harm on themselves as possible for the pleasure of inflicting harm—probably their single pleasure. We should consider how regularly, how commonly, how in almost all ages the ascetic priest makes an appearance. He does not belong to one single race. He flourishes everywhere. He grows from all levels of society. And it's not the case that he breeds and replants his way of assessing value somehow through biological inheritance: the opposite the case—generally speaking, a deep instinct forbids him from reproducing. There must be a high-order necessity which makes this species hostile to life always grow again and flourish—it must be in the interest of life itself not to have such a type of self-contradiction die out. For an ascetic life is a self-contradiction. Here a resentment without equal is in control, something with an insatiable instinct and will to power, which wants to become master, not over something in life but over life itself, over its deepest, strongest, most basic conditions; here an attempt is being made to use one's power to block up the sources of that power; here one directs one's green and malicious gaze against one's inherent physiological health, particularly against its means of expression—beauty, joy—while one experiences and seeks for a feeling of pleasure in mistrust, atrophy, pain, accident, ugliness, voluntary loss, self-denial, self-flagellation, self-sacrifice.⁽¹⁰⁾ All this is paradoxical to the highest degree. Here we stand in front of a dichotomy which essentially wants a dichotomy, which enjoys itself in this suffering and always gets even more self-aware and more triumphant in proportion to the decrease in its own prerequisite, the physiological capacity for life. “Triumph precisely in the ultimate agony”—under this supreme sign the ascetic ideal has fought from time immemorial. Inside this riddle of seduction, in this picture of delight and torment, it sees its highest light, its salvation, its final victory. Crux, nux, lux [cross, nut, light]—for the ascetic ideal these are all one thing. 12 Given that such a living desire for contradiction and hostility to nature is used to practise philosophy, on what will it discharge its most inner arbitrary power? It will do that on something it perceives, with the greatest certainty, as true, as real. It will seek out error precisely where the essential instinct for life has established its most unconditional truth. For example, it will demote physical life to an illusion, as the ascetics of the Vedanta philosophy did. Similarly it will treat pain, the multiplicity of things, the whole ideational opposition between “subject” and “object” as error, nothing but error! To deny faith in one’s own self, to deny one’s own “reality”—what a triumph!—and not just over the senses, over appearances, but a much loftier kind of triumph, an overpowering of and act of cruelty against reason: a process in which the highest peak of delight occurs when ascetic self-contempt and self-mockery of reason proclaims: “There is a kingdom of truth and being, but reason is expressly excluded from it” . . . (By the way, even in the Kantian idea of the “intelligible character of things” there still remains something of this lecherous ascetic dichotomy, which loves to turn reason against reason: for the “intelligible character” with Kant means a sort of composition of things about which the intellect understands just enough to know that for the intellect it is—wholly and completely unintelligible).—But precisely because we are people who seek knowledge, we should finally not be ungrateful for such determined reversals of customary perspectives and evaluations with which the spirit has for so long raged against itself with such apparent wickedness and futility. To use this for once to see differently, the will to see things differently, is no small discipline and preparation of the intellect for its coming “objectivity”—the latter meant not in the sense of “disinterested contemplation” (which is inconceivable nonsense), but as the capability of having power over one’s positive and negative arguments and of raising them and disposing of them so that one knows how to make the very variety of perspectives and interpretations of emotions useful for knowledge. From now on, my philosophical gentlemen, let us protect ourselves better from the dangerous old conceptual fantasy which posits a “pure, will-less, painless, timeless subject of cognition”; let’s guard ourselves against the tentacles of such contradictory ideas as “pure reason,” “absolute spirituality,” “knowledge in itself”—those things which demand that we think of an eye which simply cannot be imagined, an eye which is to have no direction at all, in which the active and interpretative forces are supposed to stop or be absent—the very things through which seeing first becomes seeing something. Hence, these things always demand from the eye something conceptually absurd and incomprehensible. The only seeing we have is seeing from a perspective; the only knowledge we have is knowledge from a perspective; and the more emotions we allow to be expressed in words concerning something, the more eyes, different eyes, we know how to train on the same thing, the more complete our “idea” of this thing, our “objectivity,” will be. But to eliminate the will in general, to suspend all our emotions without exception—even if we were capable of that—what would that be? Wouldn't we call that castrating the intellect? 13 But let's go back to our problem. The sort of self-contradiction which seems to be present in ascetic people, "life opposing life," is—this much is clear—physiologically (and not only physiologically) considered—simply absurd. It can only be apparent. It must be some kind of temporary expression, an interpretation, formula, make up, a psychological misunderstanding of something whose real nature could not be understood for a long time, could not for a long time be described in itself—a mere word, caught in an old gap in human understanding. So let me counter that briefly with the facts of the matter: the ascetic ideal arises out of the instinct for protection and salvation in a degenerating life, which seeks to keep itself going by any means and struggles for its existence. It indicates a partial physiological inhibition and exhaustion, against which those deepest instincts for living which still remain intact continuously fight on with new methods and innovations. The ascetic ideal is one such method. The facts are thus precisely the opposite of what those who honour this ideal claim—life is struggling in that ideal and by means of that ideal with death and against death: the ascetic ideal is a manoeuvre for the preservation of life. As history teaches us, to the extent that this ideal could prevail over men and become powerful, particularly wherever civilization and the taming of humans have been successfully implemented, it expresses an important fact: the pathological nature of the earlier form of human beings, at least of those human beings who had been tamed, the physiological struggle of men against death (more precisely, against weariness with life, against exhaustion, against desire for the "end"). The ascetic priest is the incarnation of the desire for another state of being, an existence somewhere else—indeed, the highest stage of this desire, its characteristic zeal and passion. But the very power of this desire is the chain which binds him here. That's simply what turns him into a tool which has to work to create more favourable conditions for living here and for living as a human being—with this very power he keeps the whole herd of failures, discontents, delinquents, unfortunates, all sorts of people who inherently suffer, focussed on existence, because instinctively he goes ahead of them as their herdsman. You understand already what I mean: this ascetic priest, this apparent enemy of living, this man who denies—he belongs precisely with all the great conserving and affirming forces of life. . . . To what can we ascribe this pathology? For the human being is more ill, less certain, more changeable, more insecure than any other animal—there's no doubt about that. He is the sick animal. Where does that come from? To be sure, he has also dared more, innovated more, defied more, and demanded more from fate than all the other animals combined. He is the great experimenter with himself, unhappy, dissatisfied, who struggles for ultimate mastery with animals, nature, and gods—

still unconquered, always a man of the future, who no longer gets any rest from the force of his own powers, so that his future relentlessly burrows like a thorn into the flesh of his entire present:—how should such a brave and rich animal not also be the animal in most danger, the one which, of all sick animals, suffers the most lengthy and most profound illness? Human beings, often enough, get fed up: there are entire epidemics of this process of getting fed up (—for example, around 1348, at the time of the dance of death): but even this very disgust, this exhaustion, this dissatisfaction with himself—all this comes out of him so powerfully that it immediately becomes a new chain. The No which he speaks to life brings to light, as if through a magic spell, an abundance of more tender Yeses; in fact, when he injures himself, this master of destruction, of self-destruction—it is the wound itself which later forces him to live on. . . . 14 The more normal this pathology is among human beings—and we cannot deny its normality—the higher we should esteem the rare cases of spiritual and physical power, humanity's strokes of luck, and the more strongly successful people should protect themselves from the most poisonous air, the atmosphere of illness. Do people do that? . . . Sick people are the greatest danger for healthy people. For strong people disaster does not come from the strongest, but from the weakest. Are we aware of that? . . . If we consider the big picture, we should not wish for any diminution of the fear we have of human beings, for this fear compels the strong people to be strong and, in some circumstances, terrible—that fear sustains the successful types of people. What we should fear, what has a disastrous effect unlike any other, would not be a great fear of humanity but a great loathing for humanity; similarly, a great pity for humanity. If both of these were one day to mate, then something most weird would at once inevitably appear in the world, the “ultimate will” of man, his will to nothingness, to nihilism. And, as a matter of fact, a great deal of preparation has gone on for this union. Whoever possesses, not only a nose to smell with, but also eyes and ears, senses almost everywhere, no matter where he steps nowadays, an atmosphere something like that of an insane asylum or hospital—I'm speaking, as usual, of people's cultural surroundings, of every kind of “Europe” there is right here on this earth. The invalids are the great danger to humanity: not the evil men, not the “predatory animals.” Those people who are, from the outset, failures, oppressed, broken—they are the ones, the weakest, who most undermine life among human beings, who in the most perilous way poison and question our trust in life, in humanity, in ourselves. Where can we escape it, that downcast glance with which people carry a deep sorrow, that reversed gaze of the man originally born to fail which betrays how such a man speaks to himself—that gaze which is a sigh. “I wish I could be someone else!”—that's what this glance sighs. “But there is no hope here. I am who I am. How could I detach myself from myself? And yet—I've had enough of myself!” . . . On such a ground of contempt for oneself, a truly swampy ground, grows every weed, every poisonous growth, and all of them so small, so hidden, so dishonest, so sweet. Here the worms of angry and resentful feelings swarm; here the air stinks of secrets and duplicity; here are constantly spun the nets of the most malicious conspiracies—the plotting of suffering people against the successful and victorious; here the appearance of the victor is despised. And what dishonesty not to acknowledge this hatred as hatred! What an extravagance of large words and postures, what an art of “decent” slander! These failures: what noble eloquence streams from their lips! How much sugary, slimy, humble resignation swims in their eyes! What do they really want? At least to make a show of justice, love, wisdom, superiority—that’s the ambition of these “lowest” people, these invalids! And how clever such an ambition makes people! For let’s admire the skillful counterfeiting with which people here imitate the trademarks of virtue, even its resounding tinkle, the golden sound of virtue. They have now taken a lease on virtue entirely for themselves, these weak and hopeless invalids—there’s no doubt about that: “We alone are the good men, the just men”—that’s how they speak: “We alone are the homines bonae voluntatis [men of good will].” They wander around among us like personifications of reproach, like warnings to us—as if health, success, strength, pride, and a feeling of power were already inherently depraved things, for which people must atone some day, atone bitterly. O how ready they themselves basically are to make people atone, how they thirst to be hangmen! Among them there are plenty of people disguised as judges seeking revenge. They always have the word “Justice” in their mouths, like poisonous saliva, with their mouths always pursed, always ready to spit at anything which does not look discontented and goes on its way in good spirits. Among them there is no lack of that most disgusting species of vain people, the lying monsters who aim to present themselves as “beautiful souls” and who, for example, carry off to market their ruined sensuality, wrapped up in verse and other swaddling clothes, as “purity of heart,” the species of self-gratifying moral masturbators. The desire of sick people to present some form or other of superiority, their instinct for secret paths leading to a tyranny over the healthy—where can we not find it, this very will to power of the weakest people! The sick woman, in particular: no one outdoes her in refined ways to rule others, to exert pressure, to tyrannize. For that purpose, the sick woman spares nothing living or dead. She digs up again the most deeply buried things (the Bogos say “The woman is a hyena”). Take a look into the background of every family, every corporation, every community: everywhere you see the struggle of the sick against the healthy—a quiet struggle, for the most part, with a little poison powder, with needling, with deceitful expressions of long suffering, but now and then also with that sick man’s Pharisaic tactic of loud gestures, whose favourite role is “noble indignation.” It likes to make itself heard all the way into the consecrated rooms of science, that hoarse, booming indignation of the pathologically ill hound, the biting insincerity and rage of such “noble” Pharisees (—once again I remind readers who have ears of Eugene Dühring, that apostle of revenge from Berlin, who in today’s Germany makes the most indecent and most revolting use of moralistic gibberish [Bumbum]—Dühring, the pre-eminent moral braggart we have nowadays, even among those like him, the anti-Semites). (11) They are all men of ressentiment, these physiologically impaired and worm-eaten men, a totally quivering earthly kingdom of subterranean revenge, inexhaustible, insatiable in its outbursts against the fortunate, and equally in its masquerades of revenge, its pretexts for revenge. When would they truly attain their ultimate, most refined, most sublime triumph of revenge? Undoubtedly, if they could succeed in pushing their own wretchedness, all misery in general, into the consciences of the fortunate, so that the latter one day might begin to be ashamed of their good fortune and perhaps would say to themselves, “It’s shameful to be fortunate. There’s too much misery!”. . . But there could be no greater and more fateful misunderstanding than if, through this process, the fortunate, the successful, the powerful in body and spirit should start to doubt their right to happiness. Away with this “twisted world”! Away with this disgraceful softening of feelings! That the invalids do not make the healthy sick —and that would be such a softening—that should surely be ruling point of view on earth:—but that would require above everything that the healthy remain separated from the sick, protected even from the gaze of sick people, so that they don’t confuse themselves with the ill. Or would it perhaps be their assignment to attend on the sick or be their doctors? . . . But they could not misjudge or negate their work more seriously—something higher must not demean itself by becoming the tool of something lower. The pathos of distance must keep the work of the two groups forever separate! Their right to exist, the privilege of a bell with a perfect ring in comparison to one that is cracked and off key, is indeed a thousand times greater. They alone are the guarantors of the future; they alone stand as pledge for humanity’s future. Whatever they can do, whatever they should do—the sick can never to do and should not do. But so that they are able to do what only they should do, how can they have the freedom to make themselves the doctor, the consoler, the “person who cures” for the invalids? . . . And therefore let’s have fresh air! fresh air! In any case, let’s keep away from the neighbourhood of all cultural insane asylums and hospitals! And for that let’s have good companionship, our companionship! Or loneliness, if that’s necessary! But by all means let’s stay away from the foul stink of inner rotting and of the secret muck from sick worms! In that way, my friends, we can defend ourselves, at least for a while, against the two nastiest scourges which may be lying in wait precisely for us—against a great disgust with humanity and against a great pity for humanity! 15 If you’ve grasped the full profundity of this—and precisely here I require that you grasp deeply, understand profoundly—of the extent to which it simply cannot be the task of healthy people to attend to the sick, to make invalids well, then you've understood one more necessary matter—the necessity for doctors and nurses who are themselves ill. And now we have the meaning of the ascetic priest—we're holding it in both hands. We need to look on the ascetic priest as the preordained healer, shepherd, and advocate of the sick herd; in that way we can, for the first time, understand his immense historical mission. The ruling power over suffering people is his kingdom. His instinct instructs him to do that; in that he has his very own art, his mastery, his sort of success. He must be sick himself; he must be fundamentally related to the sick and those who go astray, in order to understand them—in order to be understood among them. But he must also be strong, master over himself even more than over others, that is, undamaged in his will to power, so that he inspires the confidence and fear of the invalids, so that he can be their support, resistance, protection, compulsion, discipline, tyrant, god. He has to defend his herd, but against whom? Against the healthy people undoubtedly, also against their envy of the healthy. He has to be the natural opponent and critic of all rough, stormy, unchecked, hard, violent, predatory health and power. The priest is the first form of the more delicate animal which despises more easily than it hates. He will not be spared having to conduct war with predatory animals, a war of cunning (of the “spirit”) rather than of force, as is obvious—for that purpose, in certain circumstances it will be necessary for him to develop himself almost into a new type of beast of prey, or at least to represent himself as such a beast—with a new animal ferocity in which the polar bear, the sleek, cold, and patient tiger, and, not least, the fox seem to be combined in a unity which attracts just as much as it inspires fear. If need compels him to, he will walk even in the midst of the other sort of predatory animals with the seriousness of a bear, venerable, clever, cold, and with a duplicitous superiority, as the herald and oracle of more mysterious forces, determined to sow this ground, where he can, with suffering, conflict, self-contradiction, and only too sure of his art, to become the master over suffering people at all times. There's no doubt he brings with him ointments and balm. But in order to be a doctor, he first has to inflict wounds. Then, while he eases the pain caused by the wound, at the same time he poisons the wound—for that is, above all, what he knows how to do, this magician and animal trainer, around whom everything healthy necessarily becomes ill and everything sick necessarily becomes tame. In fact, he defends his sick herd well enough, this strange shepherd—he protects them also against themselves, against the smouldering wickedness, scheming, and maliciousness in the herd itself, against all those addictions and illnesses characteristic of their associating with each other. He fights shrewdly, hard, and secretly against the anarchy and self-dissolution which start up all the time within the herd, in which that most dangerous explosive stuff and blasting material, resentment, is constantly piling and piling up. To detonate this explosive stuff in such a way that it does not blow up the herd and its shepherd, that is his essential work of art and also his most important use. If we want to sum up the value of the priestly existence in the shortest slogan, we could at once put it like this: the priest is the person who alters the direction of resentment. For every suffering person instinctively seeks a cause for his suffering, or, more precisely, an agent, or, even more precisely, a guilty agent sensitive to suffering—in short, he seeks some living person on whom he can, on some pretext or other, unload his feelings, either in fact or in effigy: for the discharge of feelings is the most important way a suffering man seeks relief—that is, some anaesthetic—it's his involuntarily desired narcotic against any kind of torment. In my view, only here can we find the true physiological cause of resentment, revenge, and things related to them, in a longing for some anaesthetic against pain through one's emotions. People usually look for this cause, most incorrectly, in my opinion, in the defensive striking back, a merely reactive protective measure, a "reflex movement" in the event of some sudden damage and threat, of the sort a decapitated frog still makes in order to get rid of corrosive acid. But the difference is fundamental: in one case, people want to prevent suffering further damage; in the other case, people want to deaden a tormenting, secret pain which is becoming unendurable by means of a more violent emotion of some kind and, for the moment at least, to drive it from their consciousness—for that they need some emotion, as unruly an emotion as possible, and, in order to stimulate that, they need the best pretext available. "Someone or other must be guilty of the fact that I am ill"—this sort of conclusion is characteristic of all sick people, all the more so if the real cause of their sense that they are sick, the physiological cause, remains hidden (—it can lie, for example, in an illness of the nervus sympathicus [sympathetic nerve], or in an excessive secretion of gall, or in a lack of potassium sulphate and phosphate in the blood, or in some pressure in the lower abdomen, which blocks the circulation, or in a degeneration of the ovaries, and so on). Suffering people all have a horrible willingness and capacity for inventing pretexts for painful emotional feelings. They enjoy even their suspicions, their brooding over bad actions and apparent damage. They ransack the entrails of their past and present, looking for dark, dubious stories, in which they are free to feast on an agonizing suspicion and to get intoxicated on the poison of their own anger—they rip open the oldest wounds, they bleed themselves to death from long-healed scars, they turn friends, wives, children, and anyone else who is closest to them into criminals. "I am suffering. Someone or other must be to blame for that"—that's how every sick sheep thinks. But his shepherd, the ascetic priest, says to him: "That's right, my sheep! Someone must be to blame for that. But you yourself are this very person. You yourself are the only one to blame—you alone are to blame for yourself!" . . . That is bold enough, and false enough. But one thing at least is attained by that, as I have said, the direction of resentment has been—changed. 16 By now you will have guessed what, according to my ideas, the healing artistic instinct for life at least has attempted with the ascetic priest and why he had to use a temporary tyranny of such paradoxical and illogical ideas, like “guilt,” “sins,” “sinfulness,” “degeneration,” and “damnation”: to make sick people to a certain extent harmless, to enable the incurable to destroy themselves by their own actions, to redirect the resentment of the mildly ill sternly back onto themselves (“there’s one thing necessary”—), and in this manner to utilize the bad instincts of all suffering people to serve the purpose of self-discipline, self-monitoring, self-conquest. As is obvious, this kind of “medication,” a merely emotional medication, has nothing at all to do with a real cure for an illness, in a physiological sense. We are never entitled to assert that the instinct for life has any sort of chance or intention to heal itself in this way. A kind of pressure to come together and organize the invalids on one side (—the word “church” is the popular name for this), some form of temporary guarantee for the more healthy successful people, the ones more completely fulfilled, on another side, and in the process the creation of rift between the healthy and sick—for a long time that’s all there was. And that was a lot! It was a great deal! (In this essay, as you see, I proceed on an assumption which, so far as the readers I require are concerned, I do not have to prove first—that the “sinfulness” of human beings is not a matter of fact, but much rather only the interpretation of a factual condition, that is, of a bad psychological mood—with the latter seen from a moral-religious perspective, something which is no longer binding on us.—The fact that someone feels himself “guilty” or “sinful” does not in itself yet demonstrate clearly that he is justified in feeling like that, just as the mere fact that someone feels healthy does not mean that he is healthy. People should remember the famous witch trials: at that time the most perspicacious and philanthropic judges had no doubt that they were dealing with guilt; the “witches” themselves had no doubts about that point—nonetheless, there was no guilt.—To express that assumption in broader terms: I consider that “spiritual pain” itself is not, in general, a fact, but only an interpretation (a causal interpretation) of facts which up to that point have not been precisely formulated, and thus something that is still completely up in the air and not scientifically binding—essentially a fat word set in place of a very spindly question mark. To put the matter crudely, when someone cannot cope with a “spiritual pain,” that has nothing to do with his “soul”; it’s more likely something to do with his belly (speaking crudely, as I said: but in saying that I’m not expressing the slightest wish to be crudely heard or crudely understood . . .). A strong and successful man digests his experiences (his actions, including his evil actions) as he digests his meals, even when he has to swallow down some hard mouthfuls. If he is “unable to finish with” an experience, this kind of indigestion is just as much a physiological matter as that other one—and in many cases, in fact, only one of the consequences of that other one.—With such an view, a person can, just between ourselves, still be the strongest opponent of all materialism. . . .) 17 But is he really a doctor, this ascetic priest?—We already understand the extent to which one can hardly be permitted to call him a doctor, no matter how much he likes feeling that he is a “saviour” and allowing himself to be honoured as a “saviour.” But he fights only against suffering itself, the unhappiness of the suffering person, not against its cause, not against the essential sickness—this must constitute our most fundamental objection to priestly medication. But if for once we look at things from the perspective which only the priest understands and adopts, then it will not be easy for us to limit our amazement at all the things he has noticed, looked for, and found by seeing things in that manner. The alleviation of suffering, every kind of “consolation”—that manifests itself as his particular genius: he has understood his task as consoler with so much innovation and has selected the means for that so spontaneously and so fearlessly! We could call Christianity, in particular, a huge treasure house of the most elegant forms of consolation —there are so many pleasant, soothing, narcotizing things piled up in it, and for this purpose it takes so many of the most dangerous and most audacious chances. It shows such sophistication, such southern refinement, especially when it guesses what kind of emotional stimulant can overcome, at least for a while, the deep depression, leaden exhaustion, and black sorrow of the physiologically impaired. For, generally speaking, with all great religions, the main issue concerns the fight against a certain endemic exhaustion and heaviness. We can from the outset assume as probable that from time to time, in particular places on the earth, a feeling of physiological inhibition must necessarily become master over wide masses of people, but, because of a lack of knowledge about physiology, it does not enter people’s consciousness as something physiological, so they look for and attempt to find its “cause” and remedy only in psychology and morality (—this, in fact, is my most general formula for whatever is commonly called a “religion”). Such a feeling of inhibition can have a varied ancestry; for instance, it can be the result of cross-breeding between different races (or between classes —for classes also always express differences in origin and race: European “Weltschmerz” [pain at the state of the world] and nineteenth-century “pessimism” are essentially the consequence of an irrational, sudden mixing of the classes), or it can be caused by incorrect emigration—a race caught in a climate for which its powers of adaptation are not sufficient (the case of the Indians in India); or by the influence of the age and exhaustion of the race (Parisian pessimism from 1850 on); or by an incorrect diet (the alcoholism of the Middle Ages, the inanity of vegetarians, who, of course, have on their side the authority of Squire Christopher in Shakespeare); or by degeneration in the blood, malaria, syphilis and things like that (German depression after the Thirty Years’

War, which spread bad diseases in an epidemic through half of Germany and thus prepared the ground for German servility, German timidity).(12) In such a case, a war against the feeling of a lack of enthusiasm will always be attempted in the grand style. Let's briefly go over its most important practices and forms. (Here I leave quite out of account, as seems reasonable, the actual war of the philosophers against this lack of enthusiasm, which always has a habit of appearing at the same time—that war is interesting enough, but too absurd, with too little practical significance, too full of cobwebs and loafing around—as, for example, when pain is to be shown an error, on the naive assumption that the pain must disappear as soon as it is recognized as an error—but, lo and behold, it seems to it that it does not disappear . . .). First, people fight that domineering listlessness with means which, in general, set our feeling for life at their lowest point. Where possible, there is generally no more willing, no more desire; they stay away from everything which creates an emotional response, which makes “blood” (no salt in the diet, the hygiene of the fakir); they don't love; they don't hate—equanimity—they don't take revenge, they don't get wealthy, they don't work; they beg; where possible, no women, or as few women as possible; with respect to spiritual matters, Pascal's principle “Il faut s'abêtir” [it's necessary to make oneself stupid]. The result, expressed in moral-psychological terms, is “selflessness,” “sanctification”; expressed in physiological terms: hypnotizing—the attempt to attain for human beings something approaching what winter hibernation is for some kinds of animals and what summer sleep is for many plants in hot climates, the minimum consumption and processing of material stuff which can still sustain life but which does not actually enter consciousness. For this purpose an astonishing amount of human energy has been expended. Has it all gone for nothing? . . . We should not entertain the slightest doubts that such sportsmen of “holiness,” whom almost all populations have in abundance at all times, in fact found a real release from what they were fighting against with such a rigorous training—with the help of their systemic methods for hypnosis, in countless cases they really were released from that deep physiological depression. That's the reason their methodology belongs with the most universal ethnological facts. For the same reason, we have no authority for considering such an intentional starving of one's desires and of one's physical well being as, in itself, symptoms of insanity (the way a clumsy kind of roast-beef-eating “free spirit” and Squire Christopher like to do). It's much more the case that it opens or can open the way to all sorts of spiritual disruptions, to “inner light,” for example, as with Hesychasts on Mount Athos, to hallucinating sounds and shapes, to sensual outpourings and ecstasies of sensuality (the history of St. Theresa).(13) It's self-evident that the interpretation which has been given for conditions of this sort by those afflicted with them has always been as effusively false as possible. Still, people should not fail to catch the tone of totally convincing gratitude ringing out in the very will to such a form of interpretation. They always value the highest state, redemption itself, that finally attained collective hypnosis and quietness, as the inherent mystery, which cannot be adequately expressed even by the highest symbols, as a stop at and return home to the basis of things, as an emancipation from all delusions, as “knowledge,” as “truth,” as “being,” as the removal of all goals, all wishes, all acts, and thus as a place beyond good and evil. “Good and evil,” says the Buddhist, “are both fetters: the perfect one became master over both”; “what’s done and what’s not done,” says the man who believes in the Vedanta, “give him no pain; as a wise man he shakes good and evil off himself; his kingdom suffers no more from any deed; good and evil—he has transcended both”—an entirely Indian conception, whether Brahman or Buddhist. (Neither in the Indian nor in the Christian way of thinking is this “redemption” considered attainable through virtue, through moral improvement—no matter how high a value they place on virtue as a form of hypnotism. People should note this point—it corresponds, incidentally, to the plain facts. That on this point they kept to the truth might perhaps be considered the best piece of realism in the three largest religions, which, apart from this, are religions so fundamentally concerned with moralizing. “The man who knows has no duties” . . . “Redemption does not come about through an increase in virtue, for it consists of unity with Brahma, who is incapable of any increase in perfection; even less does it come through setting aside one’s faults, for the Brahma, unity with whom creates redemption, is eternally pure”—these passages from the commentary of Shankara are cited by the first genuine authority on Indian philosophy in Europe, my friend Paul Deussen).(14) So we want to honour “redemption” in the great religions; however, it will be a little difficult for us to remain serious about the way these people, who’ve grown too weary of life even to dream, value deep sleep—that is, deep sleep as already an access to the Brahma, as an achieved unio mystica [mysterious union] with God. On this subject, the oldest and most venerable “Scripture” states: “When he is soundly and completely asleep and is in a state of perfect calm, so that he is not seeing any more dream images, at that moment, O dear one, united with Being, he has gone into himself—now that he has been embraced by a form of his knowing self, he has no consciousness any more of what is outer or inner. Over this bridge comes neither night nor day, nor old age, nor death, nor suffering, nor good works, nor evil works.” Similarly, believers in this most profound of the three great religions say, “In deep sleep the soul lifts itself up out of this body, goes into the highest light, and moves out in its own form: there it is the highest spirit itself which wanders around, while it jokes and plays and enjoys itself, whether with women or with carriages or with friends; there it no longer thinks back to its bodily appendages, to which the prana (the breath of life) is harnessed like a draught animal to a cart.” Nevertheless, as in the case of “redemption,” we also need to keep in mind here that no matter how great the splendour of oriental exaggeration, what this states is basically the same evaluation which was made by that clear, cool, Greek-cool, but suffering Epicurus: the hypnotic feeling of nothingness, the silence of the deepest sleep, in short, the loss of suffering—something which suffering and fundamentally disgruntled people are already entitled to consider their highest good, their value of values, and which they must appraise as positive and experience as the positive in itself. (With the same logic of feeling, in all pessimistic religions nothingness is called God). 18 Against this condition of depression, a different and certainly easier training is tried far more often than such a hypnotic collective deadening of the sensibilities, of the ability to experience pain, for the method requires rare powers, above all, courage, contempt for opinion, and “intellectual stoicism.” This different training is mechanical activity. There’s no doubt whatsoever that this can alleviate a suffering existence to a degree which is not insignificant. Today we call this fact, somewhat dishonestly, “the blessings of work.” The relief comes about because the interest of the suffering person is basically diverted from his suffering—because some action and then another action are always entering his consciousness, thus leaving little space there for suffering. For it’s narrow, this room of human consciousness! Mechanical activity and what’s associated with it—like absolute regularity, meticulous and mindless obedience, a style of life set once and for all, filling in time, a certain allowance for, indeed, training in, “impersonality,” in forgetting oneself, in “incuria sui” [no care for oneself]—how fundamentally, how delicately the ascetic priest knew how to use them in the struggle with suffering! Especially when it involved the suffering people of the lower classes, working slaves, or prisoners (or women, most of whom are, in fact, simultaneously both working slaves and prisoners) what was needed was little more than the minor art of changing names and re-christening, so as to make those people in future see a favour, some relative good fortune, in things they hated—the slave’s discontent with his lot, in any case, was not invented by the priests. An even more valuable tool in the battle against depression is prescribing a small pleasure which is readily accessible and can be made habitual. People frequently use this medication in combination with the one just mentioned. The most common form in which pleasure is prescribed in this way as a cure is the pleasure in creating pleasure (as in showing kindness, giving presents, providing relief, helping, encouraging, trusting, praising, honouring). The ascetic priest orders “love of one’s neighbour”; in so doing, he is basically prescribing an arousal of the strongest, most life-affirming drive, even if only in the most cautious doses—the will to power. The happiness which comes from “the smallest feeling of superiority,” which all doing good, being useful, helping, and honouring bring with them, is the most plentiful way of providing consolation, which the physiologically impaired habitually use, provided that they have been well advised. In a different situation, they harm each other, doing so, of course, in obedience to the same basic instinct. If we look for the beginnings of Christianity in the Roman world, we find organizations growing up for mutual support, combinations of the poor and sick, for burial, on the lowest levels of society at the time, in which that major way of combating depression, the minor joys which habitually develop out of mutual demonstrations of kindness, were consciously employed—perhaps at the time this was something new, a real discovery? “The will to mutual assistance,” to the formation of the herd, to “a community,” to “a congregation,” summoned in this manner, must call up again, if only in the smallest way, that aroused will to power and come to a new and much greater outburst. In the fight against depression, the development of the herd is an essential step and a victory. By growing, the community also reinforces in the individual a new interest, which often enough raises him up over the most personal features of his bad disposition, his dislike of himself (Geulincx’s despectio sui [contempt for oneself]).(15) All sick pathological people, in their desire to shake off a stifling lack of enthusiasm and a feeling of weakness, instinctively strive for the organization of a herd. The ascetic priest senses this instinct and promotes it. Where there is a herd, it’s the instinct of weakness which has willed the herd and the cleverness of the priest which has organized it. For we should not overlook the following point: through natural necessity strong people strive to separate from each other, just as much as weak people strive to be with each other. When the former unite, that happens only at the prospect of an aggressive combined action and a collective satisfaction of their will to power, with considerable resistance from the individual conscience. By contrast, the latter organize themselves collectively, taking pleasure precisely in this collective—their instinct is satisfied by this in the same way that the instinct of those born “Masters” (i.e., the solitary man of the predatory species of human being) is basically irritated and upset by organization. Under every oligarchy—all history teaches us—is always concealed the craving for tyranny. Every oligarchy is constantly trembling with the tension which every individual in it necessarily has in order to remain master of this craving. (That was the case, for example, with the Greeks. Plato provides evidence of this in a hundred passages—Plato, who understood his peers—and himself . . .). 19 The ascetic priest’s methods, which we learned about earlier—the collective deadening of the feeling for life, mechanical activity, minor joys, above all, the joy in “loving one’s neighbour,” the organization of the herd, the awakening of the feeling of power in the community, as a result of which the dissatisfaction of the individual with himself is drowned out by his pleasure in the flourishing of the community— these things are, measured by modern standards, his innocent methods in the war against unhappiness. But now let’s turn our attention to more interesting methods, to his “guilty” ones. With all of them there is one thing involved: some kind of excess of feeling—employed as the most effective anaesthetic against stifling, crippling, and long-lasting pain. For that reason, the priest’s powers of innovation have been tireless in addressing this one question in particular: “Through what means do people reach emotional excess?” . . . That sounds harsh. It’s clear enough that it would sound more appealing and perhaps please our ears better if I said something like “The ascetic priest has always used the enthusiasm which lies in all strong emotions.” But why keep caressing the mollicoddled ears of our modern delicate sensibilities? Why should we, for our part, retreat even one step back from the Tartufferie [hypocrisy] of their vocabulary? Doing something like that would already make us psychologists active hypocrites—apart from the fact that for us it would be disgusting. For if a psychologist today has good taste anywhere (others might say his honesty), it’s because he detests that disgraceful moralizing way of talking, which effectively covers in slime all modern judgments about human beings and things. For we must not deceive ourselves in this business. The most characteristic feature which forms modern souls and modern books is not lying but the ingrained innocence in their moralistic lying. To have to discover this “innocence” again all over the place—that is perhaps the most repellent part of our work, of all the inherently dangerous work which nowadays a psychologist has to undertake. It is a part of our great danger—it is a path that perhaps takes us in particular to a great revulsion. I have no doubt about what single purpose will be served, or can be served, in a coming world by modern books (provided they last, which, of course, we need not fear, and provided there will one day be a later world with a stronger, harder, and healthier taste), or what general purpose all things modern will have: they will serve as emetics—and they’ll do that thanks to their moralistic sugar and falsity, their innermost femininity, which likes to call itself “idealism” and which, at all events, has faith in idealism. Today our educated people, our “good people,” don’t tell lies—that’s true. But that’s no reason to respect them! The real lie, the genuine, resolute, “honest” lie (people should listen to Plato on its value) for them would be something far too demanding, too strong. It would require what people are not allowed to demand of them, that they opened up their eyes and looked at themselves, so that they would know how to differentiate between “true” and “false” with respect to themselves. But they are fit only for ignoble lies. Everyone today who feels that he is a “good man” is completely incapable of taking a stand on any issue at all, other than with dishonest falseness—an abysmal falsity, which is, however, innocent falsity, true-hearted falsity, blue-eyed falsity, virtuous falsity. These “good people”—collectively they are now utterly and completely moralized and, so far as their honesty is concerned, they’ve been disgraced and ruined for all eternity. Who among them could endure even one truth “about human beings”? . . . Or, to ask the question more precisely, who among them could bear a true biography! Here are a couple of indications: Lord Byron recorded some very personal things about himself, but Thomas Moore was “too good” for them. He burned his friend’s papers. The executor of Schopenhauer’s will, Dr. Gwinner, is alleged to have done the same thing, for Schopenhauer had also recorded some things about himself and also perhaps against himself (“eis auton” [against himself]). The capable American Thayer, the biographer of Beethoven, all of a sudden stopped his work: at some point or other in this venerable and naive life he could no longer continue . . . Moral: What intelligent man nowadays would still write an honest word about himself?—He would already have to be a member of the Order of Holy Daredevils. We have been promised an autobiography of Richard Wagner. Who has any doubts that it will be a prudent autobiography?(16) Let’s remember the comical horror which the Catholic priest Janssen aroused in Germany with his incomprehensibly bland and harmless picture of the German Reformation movement. How would people react if one day someone explained this movement differently, if, for once, a true psychologist with spiritual strength and not a shrewd indulgence toward strength pictured a true Luther for us, no longer with the moralistic simplicity of a country parson, no longer with the sweet and considerate modesty of a protestant historian, but with something like the fearlessness of a Taine? . . . (Parenthetically, the Germans have finally produced a sufficiently beautiful classical type of such shrewd indulgence—they can classify him as one of their own and be proud of him, namely, their Leopold Ranke, this born classical advocate of every causa fortior [stronger cause], the shrewdest of all the shrewd “realists”).(17) 20 But you will already have grasped what I’m getting at. All in all, that’s surely reason enough, is it not, why we psychologists nowadays cannot rid ourselves of a certain distrust in ourselves? . . . We also are probably “too good” for the work we do. We are probably sacrificial victims and prey, as well, made sick by this contemporary taste for moralizing, no matter how much we also feel we’re its critics—it probably infects even us as well. What was that diplomat warning about, when he addressed his colleagues? “Gentlemen, let us mistrust our first impulses above all!” he declared; “they are almost always good.” That’s also how every psychologist today should speak to his peers. And so we come back to our problem, which, in fact, requires a certain rigour from us, especially some distrust of our “first impulses.” The ascetic ideal in the service of intentional emotional excess—whoever remembers the previous essay will, with the compressed content of these ten words, already have a preliminary sense of the essential content of what I now have to demonstrate. To remove the human soul for once from its entire frame, to immerse it in terror, frost, glowing embers, and joys of that kind, so that it rids itself, as if with a bolt of lightning, of all pettiness and small-mindedness of lack of interest, apathy, and irritation. What paths lead to this goal? And which of them is the most reliable? . . . All the greatest emotions basically have this capacity, provided they discharge themselves suddenly—anger, fear, lust, revenge, hope, triumph, despair, cruelty. And the ascetic priest has, in fact, without a second thought, taken the entire pack of wild hounds in the human being into his service and let loose one of them at one time, another at another time, always for the same purpose, to wake human beings up out of their long sadness, to chase away, at least for a while, their stifling pain, their tentative misery, and always covered up in a religious interpretation and “justification.” Every emotional excess of this sort demands payment later; that’s self-evident—it makes sick people sicker. And thus, this way of providing a remedy for pain, measured by modern standards, is a “guilty” method. However, to be fair, we must insist all the more that it was used in good conscience, that the ascetic priest prescribed it with the deepest faith in its utility, indeed, its indispensability—often enough almost falling apart himself in front of the misery he created; and, similarly, that the vehement physiological revenges of such excesses, perhaps even psychic disturbances, basically do not really contradict the whole meaning of this kind of medication, which, as I’ve pointed out above, was not designed to heal sick people, but to fight their enervating depression, to alleviate and anaesthetize it. With this method that goal was attained. The main instrumental fingering which the ascetic priest allowed himself in order to bring every kind of disorienting ecstatic music ringing out in the human soul was achieved, as everyone knows, by the fact that he made use of the feeling of guilt. The previous essay indicated, in brief, the origin of this feeling—as a part of animal psychology, nothing more. The feeling of guilt we encountered there in its raw state, as it were. In the hands of the priest, this true artist in guilt feelings, it first acquired a form—and what a form! “Sin”—for that’s how the priest’s new interpretation of the animal “bad conscience” ran (cruelty turned backwards)—has been the greatest event in the history of the sick soul so far. In it we have the most dangerous and the most fateful artistic work of religious interpretation. The human being, suffering from himself somehow—at any rate, psychologically—something like an animal barred up in a cage, confused about why this has happened and what purpose it serves, longing for reasons—reasons provide relief—longing also for treatments and narcotics, finally discussed the matter with one who also knew about hidden things—and lo and behold! He gets a hint. He gets the first hint about the “cause” of his suffering from his magician, the ascetic priest. He is to seek this cause in himself, in his guilt, in a piece of the past. He is to understand his own suffering as a condition of punishment . . . He heard, he understood—this unfortunate man: now things stand with him as with a hen around which a line has been drawn. He is not to come outside this circle of lines again. The “sick man” is turned into the “sinner” . . . And now for a couple of millennia people have not rid themselves of the look of this new sick man, the “sinner.”—Will people ever be rid of him?—No matter where we look, we see everywhere the hypnotic glance of the sinner, who always moves in one direction (in the direction of “guilt” as the single cause of suffering), everywhere the bad conscience, this “horrifying animal,” to use Luther’s words, everywhere the past regurgitated, the fact distorted, the “green eye” cast on all action, everywhere the desire to misunderstand suffering turned into the meaning of life, with suffering reinterpreted into feelings of guilt, fear, and punishment, everywhere the whip, the hair shirt, the starving body, remorse, everywhere the sinner’s breaking himself on the terrible torture wheel of a restless conscience, greedy for its own sickness; everywhere silent torment, extreme fear, the agony of the tortured heart, the spasms of an unknown joy, the cry for “redemption.” As a matter of fact, with this system of procedures the old depression, heaviness, and exhaustion were basically overthrown. Life became very interesting once again: lively, always lively, sleepless, glowing, charred, exhausted, and yet not tired—that’s how man looked, the “sinner,” who was initiated into these mysteries. This grand old magician in the war against the lack of excitement, the ascetic priest—he had apparently won. His kingdom had come. Now people no longer moaned against pain; they longed for pain: “More pain! More pain!”—that had been the demanding cry of his disciples and initiates for centuries. Every excess of feeling which brought grief, everything that broke apart, knocked over, smashed to bits, carried away, enraptured, the secrets of the torture chambers, the very invention of hell—from now on everything was discovered, surmised, put into practice. Everything now was available for the magician’s use. Everything in future served for the victory of his ideal, the ascetic ideal. . . . “My empire is not of this world”—he said afterwards (as he said before). Does he really have the right still to speak this way? . . . Goethe asserted that there were only thirty-six tragic situations. From that we can surmise, if we did not know it anyway, that Goethe was no ascetic priest. He—knows more . . . 21 So far as this whole sort of priestly medication is concerned, the “guilty” sort, any word of criticism is too much. That an excess of feeling of the sort the ascetic priest habitually prescribes for his sick people in this case (under the holiest of names, as is obvious, while convinced of the sanctity of his purpose) has truly been of use to some invalid: who would really want to defend the truth of this kind of claim? At least we should come to an understanding of that phrase “been of use.” If with those words people wish to assert that such a system of treatment has improved human beings, then I won’t contradict them. I would only add what “improved” indicates to me—it’s as much as saying “tamed,” “weakened,” “disheartened,” “refined,” “mollycoddled” (hence, almost equivalent to damaged . . .). But when we are mainly concerned with sick, upset, and depressed people, such a system, even supposing that it makes them “better,” always makes them sicker. You only have to ask doctors who treat the mentally ill [Irrenärzte] what a methodical application of the torments of repentance, remorse, and convulsions of redemption always brings with it. We should also consult history: wherever the ascetic priest has put in place this way of dealing with the sick, illness has always spread far and wide at terrifying speed. What has its “success” always involved? The person who was already ill gets in addition a shattered nervous system, and that occurs on the largest and smallest scale, among individuals and among masses of people. As a consequence of a training in repentance and redemption, we witness huge epidemics of epilepsy, the greatest known to history, as in the St. Vitus’ and St. John’s dances in the Middle Ages. We find its repercussions in other forms of fearful paralysis and enduring depression, with which, under certain circumstances, the temperament of an entire people or city (Geneva, Basel) is changed into its opposite once and for all—with these belong also the witch crazes, something related to sleep walking (eight major epidemics of this broke out between 1564 and 1605 alone);—among its consequences we also find that death-seeking mass hysteria whose horrific cry “eviva la morte” [long live death] was heard far across the whole of Europe, interrupted by idiosyncratic outbursts—sometimes of lust, sometimes of destructive frenzies, just as the same alternation of emotions, with the same intermissions and reversals, can also still be observed nowadays all over the place, in every case where the ascetic doctrine of sin once again enjoys a great success (religious neurosis appears as a form of an “evil nature”—that’s indisputable. What is it? Quaeritur [that’s what we need to ask]). Generally speaking, the ascetic ideal and its cult of moral sublimity, this supremely clever, most dubious, and most dangerous systematization of all the ways to promote an excess of emotion under the protection of holy purposes, has etched itself into the entire history of human beings in a dreadful and unforgettable manner, and, alas, not only into their history. . . . Apart from this ideal, there’s scarcely anything else I would know to point to which has had such a destructive effect on the health and racial power, particularly of Europeans. Without any exaggeration, we can call it the true disaster in the history of the health of European people. At most, the specifically German influence might be comparable to its effect: I refer to the alcohol poisoning of Europe, which up to now has marched strictly in step with the political and racial superiority of the Germans (—wherever they have infused their blood, they have also infused their vices).—The third in line would be syphilis—magno sed proxima intervallo [next in line, but after a large gap]. 22 Wherever he achieved mastery, the ascetic priest has ruined spiritual health. As a result, he has also ruined taste in artibus et litteris [in arts and letters]—he is still ruining that. “As a result”?—I hope you will simply concede me this “as a result.” At least, I have no desire to demonstrate it first. A single indication: it concerns the fundamental text of Christian literature, its essential model, its “book in itself.” Still in the middle of the Graeco-Roman magnificence, which was also a magnificent time for books, faced with a ancient world of writing which had not yet declined and fallen apart, an age in which people could still read some books for which one would now exchange half of all literature, the simplicity and vanity of Christian agitators—we call them the church fathers—already dared to proclaim, “We also have our classical literature. We don’t need Greek literature.”—And with that, they pointed with pride to books of legends, letters of the apostles, and little apologetic treatises, in somewhat the same way as nowadays the English “Salvation Army” with its related literature fights its war against Shakespeare and other “pagans.” I don’t like the “New Testament”—you will already have guessed as much. It almost disturbs me that I stand alone in my taste with respect to this most highly regarded and most overvalued written work (the taste of two thousand years is against me). But how can I help it! “Here I stand. I can do no other”(18)—I have the courage of my own bad taste. The Old Testament—now, that’s something totally different: all honour to the Old Testament! In that I find great men, a heroic landscape, and something of the very rarest of all elements on earth, the incomparable naïveté of the strong heart; even more—I find a people. In the New Testament, by contrast, I find nothing but small sectarian households, nothing but spiritual rococo, nothing but ornament, twisty little corners, oddities, nothing but conventional air, not to mention an occasional breeze of bucolic sweet sentimentality, which belongs to the age (and the Roman province), something not so much Jewish as Hellenistic. Humility and pomposity standing shoulder to shoulder; a chatting about feelings which are almost stupefying; vehement feelings but no passion, with awkward gestures. Here, it seems, there’s a lack of all good upbringing. How can people make such a fuss about their small vices, the way these devout little men do? No cock—and certainly not God—would crow about such things. Finally, they even want to possess “the crown of eternal life,” all these small people from the provinces. But what for? What for? It is impossible to push presumption any further. An “immortal” Peter: who could endure him? They have an ambition that makes one laugh: one of them spells out his most personal things, his stupidities, melancholy, and indolent worries, as if the essence of all things had a duty to worry about such matters. Another one never gets tired of wrapping up God himself in the smallest misery he finds himself stuck in. And the most appalling taste of this constant familiarity with God! This Jewish, and not merely Jewish, excessive importuning God with mouth and paw! . . . There are small despised “pagan people” in east Asia from whom these first Christians could have learned something important, some tact in their reverence. As Christian missionaries reveal, such people are not generally allowed to utter the name of their god. This seems to me sufficiently delicate. It was certainly too delicate not only for the “first” Christians. To sense the contrast, we should remember something about Luther, the “most eloquent” and most presumptuous peasant Germany ever had, and the tone Luther adopted as the one he most preferred in his conversations with God. Luther's resistance to the interceding saints of the church (especially to "the devil's sow, the Pope") was undoubtedly, in the last analysis, the resistance of a lout irritated by the good etiquette of the church, that etiquette of reverence of the priestly taste, which lets only the more consecrated and the more discreet into the holy of holies and shuts the door against the louts, who in this particular place are never to speak. But Luther, the peasant, simply wanted something different—this situation was not German enough for him. Above all, he wanted to speak directly, to speak for himself, to speak "openly" with his God. Well, he did it.—You can conjecture easily enough that there has never been a place anywhere in which the ascetic ideal has been a school of good taste, even less of good manners—in the best cases, it was a school for priestly manners. That comes about because it carries something in its own body which is the deadly enemy of all good manners—it lacks moderation, it resists moderation, it is itself a "non plus ultra" [an ultimate extreme].²³ The ascetic ideal has not only ruined health and taste; it has also ruined a third, fourth, fifth, and sixth something as well—I'll be careful not to mention everything (when would I come to the end!). I'm not going to reveal what this ideal has brought about. I would much rather confine myself to what it means, what it allows us to surmise, what lies hidden behind, under, and in it, what it provisionally and indistinctly expresses, overloaded with question marks and misunderstandings. And only with this purpose in mind, I cannot spare my readers a glimpse into the monstrosity of its effects, as well as its disastrous consequences, in order, that is, to prepare them for the ultimate and most terrifying aspects which the question of the meaning of this ideal has for me. Just what does the power of this ideal mean, the monstrous nature of this power? Why was it given room to grow to this extent? Why was there not a more effective resistance? The ascetic ideal is the expression of a will. Where is the opposing will, in which an opposing ideal finds its expression? The ascetic ideal has a goal—a goal which is universal enough that all other interests in human existence, measured against it, seem small and narrow. It interprets times, people, and humanity unsparingly with this goal in mind. It permits no other interpretation. No other goal counts. It rejects, denies, affirms, and confirms only through its own interpretative meaning (—and has there ever been a system of interpretation more thoroughly thought through?); it does not submit to any power; by contrast, it believes in its privileged position in relation to all power, in its absolutely higher ranking with respect to every power—it believes that there is no power on earth which does not have to derive its meaning first from it, a right to exist, a value, as a tool in its own work, as a way and a means to its own goal, to a single goal. . . . Where is the counterpart to this closed system of will, goal, and interpretation? Why is this counterpart missing? . . . Where is the other "single goal"? But people tell me that counterpart is not missing, claiming it has not only fought a long and successful war with that ideal, but has already mastered that ideal on all major points: all our modern science is a testament to that—this modern science, which, as a true philosophy of reality, evidently believes only in itself, evidently possesses courage and will in itself, and has got along up to this point well enough without God, a world beyond, and virtues which deny. However, I'm not impressed at all with such a fuss and chattering from agitators: these trumpeters of reality are bad musicians. One can hear well enough that their notes do not sound out of the depths. The abyss of scientific conscience does not speak through them—for today the scientific conscience is an abyss—the phrase “science” in such trumpeting mouths is mere fornication, an abuse, an indecency. The truth is precisely the opposite of what is claimed here: science nowadays has simply no faith in itself, to say nothing of an ideal above it—and where it consists at all of passion, love, ardour, suffering, that doesn't make it the opposite of that ascetic ideal but rather its newest and most pre-eminent form. Does that sound strange to you? . . . There are indeed a sufficient number of upright and modest working people among scholars nowadays, happy in their little corners, and because their work satisfies them, they make noises from time to time, demanding, with some presumption, that people today should in general be happy, particularly with science—there are so many useful things to do precisely there. I don't deny that. The last thing I want to do is to ruin the pleasure these honest labourers take in the tasks they perform. For I'm happy about their work. But the fact that people are working rigorously in science these days and that there are satisfied workers is simply no proof that science today, as a totality, has a goal, a will, an ideal, a passion in a great faith. As I've said, the opposite is the case: where science is not the most recently appearing form of the ascetic ideal—and then it's a matter of cases too rare, noble, and exceptional to be capable of countering the general judgment—science today is a hiding place for all kinds of unhappiness, disbelief, gnawing worms, despectio sui [self-contempt], bad conscience—it is the anxiety of the very absence of ideals, suffering from the lack of a great love, the dissatisfaction with a condition of involuntary modest content. O, what nowadays does science not conceal! How much, at least, it is meant to conceal! The efficiency of our best scholars, their mindless diligence, their heads smoking day and night, the very mastery of their handiwork—how often has all that really derived its meaning from the fact that they don't permit some things to become visible to them any more! Science as a means of putting themselves to sleep. Are you acquainted with that? . . . People wound scholars to the bone—everyone who associates with them experiences this—sometimes with a harmless word. We make our scholarly friends angry with us when we intend to honour them. We drive them wild, merely because we were too coarse to figure out the people we are truly dealing with, suffering people, who don't wish to admit to themselves what they are, narcotised and mindless people, who fear only one thing—coming to consciousness. 24 Now, let's consider, on the other hand, those rarer cases I mentioned, the last idealists remaining today among the philosophers and scholars. Perhaps in them we have the opponents of the ascetic ideal we're looking for, the counter-idealists? In fact, that's what they think they are, these "unbelievers" (for that's what they are collectively). That, in particular, seems to be their last item of belief, that they are opponents of this ideal, for they are so serious about this stance, their words and gestures are so passionate on this very point:—but is it therefore necessarily the case that what they believe is true? We "knowledgeable people" are positively suspicious of all forms of believers. Our suspicion has gradually cultivated the habit in us of concluding the reverse of what people previously concluded: that is, wherever the strength of a faith steps decisively into the foreground, we infer a certain weakness in its ability to demonstrate its truth, even the improbability of what it believes. We, too, do not deny that the belief "makes blessed," but for that very reason we deny that the belief proves something—a strong belief which confers blessedness creates doubts about what it has faith in. It does not ground "truth." It grounds a certain probability—delusion. Well, how do things stand in this case?—These people who say no today, these outsiders, these people who are determined on one point, their demand for intellectual probity, these hard, strong, abstemious, heroic spirits, who constitute the honour of our age, all these pale atheists, anti-Christians, immoralists, nihilists, these sceptics, ephectics, hectics of the spirit (collectively they are all hectic in some sense or other), the last idealists of knowledge, the only ones in whom intellectual conscience lives and takes on human form nowadays—they really do believe that they are as free as possible from the ascetic ideal, these "free, very free spirits," and yet I am revealing to them what they cannot see for themselves—for they are standing too close to themselves—this ascetic ideal is also their very own ideal. They themselves represent it today. Perhaps they are the only ones who do. They themselves are its most spiritual offspring, the furthest advanced of its troops and its crowd of scouts, its most awkward, most delicate, most incomprehensibly seductive form. If I am any kind of solver of puzzles, then I want to be that with this statement! . . . They are not free spirits—not by any stretch—for they still believe in the truth. When the Christian crusaders in the Orient came across that unconquerable Order of Assassins, that free-spirited order par excellence, whose lowest ranks lived a life of obedience of the sort no order of monks attained, then they also received by some means or other a hint about that symbol and slogan which was reserved for only the highest ranks as their secret, "Nothing is true. Everything is permitted." . . . Well now, that was freedom of the spirit. With that the very belief in truth was cancelled. . . . Has a European, a Christian free spirit ever wandered by mistake into this proposition and its labyrinthine consequences? Has he come to know the Minotaur of this cavern from experience? . . . I doubt it. More than that: I know differently:— nothing is more immediately foreign to people set on one thing, these so-called “free spirits,” than freedom and emancipation in this sense: in no respect are they more firmly bound; in their very belief in the truth they are, as no one else is, firm and unconditional. Perhaps I understand all this from far too close a distance: that admirable philosophical abstinence which such a belief requires, that intellectual stoicism, which ultimately forbids one to deny just as strongly as it forbids one to affirm, that desire to come to a standstill before the facts, the factum brutum [brute fact], that fatalism of the “petits faits” [small facts] (what I call ce petit fatalisme [this small factism]), that quality with which French science nowadays seeks a sort of moral precedence over German science, the attainment of a state where one, in general, abandons interpretation (violating, emending, abbreviating, letting go, filling in the cracks, composing, forging, and the other actions which belong to the nature of all interpretation)—generally speaking, this attitude expresses just as much virtuous asceticism as any denial of sensuality (basically it is only one mode of this denial). However, what compels a person to this unconditional will for truth is the faith in the ascetic ideal itself, even though it may be its unconscious imperative. We should not deceive ourselves on this point—it is a belief in a metaphysical value, a value of truth in itself, something guaranteed and affirmed only in that ideal (it stands or falls with that ideal). Strictly speaking, there is no science “without presuppositions.” The idea of such a science is unimaginable, paralogical: a philosophy, a “belief,” must always be there first, so that with it science can have a direction, a sense, a border, a method, a right to exist. (Whoever thinks the reverse, whoever, for example, is preparing to place philosophy “on a strictly scientific foundation,” first must place, not just philosophy, but also truth itself on its head—the worst injury to decency one could possibly give to two such venerable women!). In fact, there is no doubt about this matter—and here I’m letting my book The Gay Science have a word (see its fifth book, Section 344)—“The truthful person, in that daring and ultimate sense which the belief in science presupposes in him, thus affirms a world different from the world of life, of nature, and of history, and to the extent that he affirms this “other world,” well? Must he not in the process deny its opposite, this world, our world? . . . Our faith in science rests on something which is still a metaphysical belief—even we knowledgeable people of today, we godless and anti-metaphysical people—we, too, still take our fire from that blaze kindled by a thousand years of old belief, that faith in Christianity, which was also Plato’s belief, that God is the truth, that the truth is divine. . . . But how can we do that, if this very claim is constantly getting more and more difficult to believe, if nothing reveals itself as divine any more, unless it’s error, blindness, lies—if even God manifests himself as our longest lasting lie?” At this point it’s necessary to pause and reflect for a long while. Science itself from now on requires some justification (by that I don't yet mean to claim that there is such a justification for it). People should examine the oldest and the most recent philosophers on this question. They all lack an awareness of the problem of the extent to which the will to truth itself first needs some justification—here is a hole in every philosophy. How does that come about? It's because the ascetic ideal up to this point has been master of all philosophies, because truth has been established as being, as god, as the highest authority itself, because truth was not allowed to be problematic. Do you understand this “allowed”?—From the moment when the belief in the god of the ascetic ideal is denied, there is also a new problem: the problem of the value of truth.—The will to truth requires a critique—let us identify our own work with that requirement—for once to place in question, as an experiment, the value of truth. . . . (Anyone who thinks this has been stated too briefly is urged to read over that section of The Gay Science, pp. 160 ff, which carries the title “The Extent to Which We Also Are Still Devout,” Section 344—or better, the entire fifth book of that work, as well as the preface to (The Dawn.) 25 No! People should not come at me with science when I am looking for the natural antagonist of the ascetic ideal, when I ask, “Where is the opposing will, in which an opposing ideal expresses itself?” For that purpose, science does not stand sufficiently on its own, not nearly; for that it first requires an value ideal, a power to make value, in whose service it could have faith in itself—science is never in itself something which creates values. Its relationship to the ascetic ideal is still not inherently antagonistic at all. It's even more that case that, for the most part, it represents the forward-driving force in the inner development of this ideal. Its resistance and struggle, when we inspect more closely, are not concerned in any way with the ideal itself, but only with its external trappings, clothing, masquerade, its temporary hardening, petrification, dogma. Science makes the life in this ideal free again, since it denies what is exoteric in it. These two things, science and the ascetic ideal—they really stand on a single foundation—I've just clarified the point—namely, on the same overvaluing of the truth (or more correctly, on the same faith in the inestimable value of the truth, which is beyond criticism). In that very claim they are necessarily allies—so that, if someone is going to fight against them, he can only fight them together and place them both in question. An appraisal of the value of the ascetic ideal unavoidably also involves an appraisal of the value of science; while there's still time people should to keep their eyes open for that, their ears alert! (As for art—let me offer a preliminary remark, for I'll be coming back to it at some point or other at greater length—the very art in which the lie sanctifies itself and the will to deceive has good conscience on its side is much more fundamentally opposed to the ascetic ideal than is science: that's what Plato's instinct experienced—the greatest enemy of art which Europe has produced up to this point. Plato versus Homer: that's the entire, the true antagonism—on one side, the “beyond” of the best will, the great slanderer of life; on the other side, life's unintentional worshipper, the golden nature. An artistic bondage in the service of the ascetic ideal is thus the truest corruption of the artist there can be. Unfortunately it's one of the most common, for nothing is more corruptible than an artist.) Physiologically considered, science also rests on the same foundation as the ascetic ideal: a certain impoverishment of life is the precondition for both—emotions become cool, the tempo slows down, dialectic replaces instinct, seriousness stamped on faces and gestures (seriousness, this most unmistakable sign of a more laborious metabolism, of a life of struggle and hard work). Just look at those periods in a population when the scholars step up into the foreground: they are times of exhaustion, often of evening, of decline. The overflowing force, the certainty about life, the certainty about the future have gone. The preponderance of mandarins never indicates anything good—no more than does the arrival of democracy, the peace tribunal instead of war, equal rights for women, the religion of pity, and all the other things symptomatic of a degenerating life. (Science grasped as a problem: what does science mean?—on this point see the Preface to The Birth of Tragedy).—No! This “modern science”—keep your eyes open for this—is for the time being the best ally of the ascetic ideal, and precisely for this reason: because it is the most unconscious, the most involuntary, the most secret and most subterranean ally! They have up to now been playing a single game, the “poor in spirit” and the scientific opponents of that ideal (we should be careful, incidentally, not to think that these opponents are the opposite of that ideal, something like the rich in spirit—that they are not; I call them hectics of the spirit). The famous victories of the latter—and they have undoubtedly been victories—but over what? They in no way overcame the ascetic ideal. With those victories, the ideal instead became stronger, that is, harder to understand, more spiritual, more dangerous, as science ruthlessly and continually kept breaking off and demolishing a wall, an external structure which had built itself onto the ideal and coarsened its appearance. Do people really think that, for example, the downfall of theological astronomy indicates a downfall of that ideal? . . . Because of that, have human beings perhaps become less dependent on redemption in a world beyond as a solution for the puzzle of their existence, given that existence since then looks, in the visible order of things, even more arbitrary, indolent, and dispensable? Isn't it the case that since Copernicus the very self-diminution of human beings, their will to self-diminution, has made inexorable progress?(19) Alas, the faith in their dignity, uniqueness, irreplaceable position in the chain of being has gone—the human being has become an animal, not a metaphorical animal, but absolutely and unconditionally—the one who in his earlier faith was almost God (“child of God,” “God-man” [Gottmensch]) . . . Since Copernicus human beings seem to have reached an inclined plane—they're now rolling at an accelerating rate past the mid-point—where to? Into nothingness? Into the “penetrating sense of their own nothingness”? . . . Well, then, wouldn't this be precisely the way—into the old ideal? . . . All science (and not just astronomy, about whose humbling and destructive effects Kant made a noteworthy confession, “it destroys my importance”. . .)—all science, natural as well as unnatural—the name I give to the self-criticism of knowledge—is nowadays keen to talk human beings out of the respect they used to have for themselves, as if the latter were nothing more than a bizarre arrogance about themselves. In this matter we could even say science has its own pride, its characteristically acrid form of stoical ataraxia [indifference], in maintaining this laboriously attained self-contempt for human beings as their ultimate, most serious demand for self respect (and, in fact, that's justified, for the one who despises is still one person who “has not forgotten respect” . . .). Does doing this really work against the ascetic ideal? Do people really think in all seriousness (as the theologians imagined for quite a while) that, say, Kant's victory over dogmatic theological concepts (“God,” “Soul,” “Freedom,” “Immortality”) succeeded in breaking up that ideal?—in asking that question, it should not concern us at the moment whether Kant himself had anything at all like that in mind. What is certain is that all sorts of transcendentalists since Kant have once more won the game—they've been emancipated from the theologians. What a stroke of luck!—Kant showed them that secret path by which from now on they could, on their own initiative and with the finest scientific decency, follow their “hearts' desires.” Similarly who could now hold anything against the agnostics, if they, as admirers of what is inherently unknown and secret, worship the question mark itself as their God? (Xaver Doudan once spoke of the ravages brought on by “l'habitude d'admirer l'inintelligible au lieu de rester tout simplement dans l'inconnu” [the habit of admiring the unintelligible instead of simply staying in the unknown]; he claimed that the ancients had not done this).(20) If everything human beings “know” does not satisfy their wishes and, instead, contradicts them and makes them shudder, what a divine excuse to be allowed to seek the blame for this not in “wishes” but in “knowledge”! . . . “There is no knowledge. Consequently—there is a God”—what a new elegantia syllogismi [syllogistic excellence]! What a triumph of the ascetic ideal! 26 Or does modern historical writing collectively perhaps display an attitude more confident about life, more confident about ideals? Its noblest claim nowadays asserts that it is a mirror. It eschews all teleology. It doesn't want to “prove” anything any more. It spurns playing the role of judge and derives its good taste from that—it affirms as little as it denies. It establishes the facts. It “describes” . . . All this is ascetic to a high degree. However, it is also, to an even higher degree, nihilistic. We must not deceive ourselves on this point. We see a sad, hard, but determined gaze—an eye which looks into the distance, the way a solitary traveller at the North Pole gazes out (perhaps so as not to look inside? not to look behind? . . .) Here is snow; here life is quite silent. The final crows that make noise here are called “what for?” “in vain,” “nada” [nothing]—here nothing thrives and grows any more, at most Petersburg metapolitics and Tolstoian “pity.” But so far as that other style of historian is concerned, maybe an even “more modern” style, which is comfortable and sensual and makes eyes at life as much as at the ascetic ideal—this style uses the word “artist” as a glove and has taken an exclusive lease on the praise of contemplation. O what a thirst these sweet and witty types arouse in people even for ascetics and winter landscapes! No! Let the devil take these “meditative” people! I would much prefer to keep wandering with those historical nihilists through the gloomiest cold gray fog!—In fact, if I had to choose, I might find it better to lend a ear to a completely and essentially unhistorical or anti-historical man (like that Dühring, whose tones intoxicate a species of “beautiful souls” in Germany today, people who up to now have been a still timid, still unassuming species, the species anarchistica [the anarchists] within the educated proletariat). The “contemplative ones” are a hundred times worse—: I know nothing that creates so much disgust as such an objective armchair, such a sweet-smelling man luxuriating in history, half cleric, half satyr, with perfume by Renan, who reveals at once in the high falsetto of his approval what he lacks, where is he deficient, where in his case the Fates have wielded their dreadful shears with, alas, so much surgical precision! (21) That affronts my taste as well as my patience: confronted with such sights, let those be patient who have nothing to lose by them—such a picture infuriates me, such “lookers on” make me angry with the “spectacle,” even more than the spectacle itself (history itself, you understand). Seeing that, I fall unexpectedly into an Anacreontic mood. This nature, which gave the bull his horns, the lion his chasmodonton [chasm of teeth], why did nature give me a foot? . . . To kick with—by holy Anacreon!(22)—and not merely to run off, but to kick apart these decrepit armchairs, this cowardly contemplation, this lascivious acting like eunuchs in front of history, the flirting with ascetic ideals, the Tartufferie [hypocrisy] in the justice of impotence! I grant all honour to the ascetic ideal, insofar as it is honest! So long as it believes in itself and does not play games with us! But I can’t stand all these coquettish insects, with their insatiable ambition to sniff out the infinite, until finally the infinite stinks of bugs. I can’t stand these white sepulchres who treat life as play acting. I can’t stand the tired and useless people, who wrap themselves up in wisdom and gaze out “objectively.” I can’t stand the agitators who dress themselves up as heroes, who wear a magic hat of ideals on heads stuffed with straw. I can’t stand the ambitious artists, who like to present themselves as ascetics and priests, but who are basically tragic clowns. And I can’t stand these most recent speculators in idealism, the anti-Semites, who nowadays roll their eyes around in a Christian-

Aryan-Bourgeois way and seek to inflame all the horned-animal elements among the people by abusing the cheapest form of agitation, moral posturing, in a way that exhausts all my patience (—the fact that every kind of spiritual fraud succeeds in present-day Germany is the result of the absolutely undeniable and already tangible desolation of the German spirit, whose cause I look for in an excessively strict diet limited to newspapers, politics, beer, and Wagnerian music, together with the pre-condition for such a diet: first, a restricting nationalism and vanity, that strong but narrow principle “Germany, Germany, over everything,” as well as the paralysis agitans [trembling palsy] of “modern ideas”).(23) Today Europe is rich and resourceful, above all, in ways of arousing people. Nothing seems to be more important to possess than stimulants and firewater: hence, the monstrous falsification of ideals, the most powerful firewater of the spirit. Hence also the unfavourable, stinking, lying, pseudo-alcoholic air everywhere. I’d like to know how many shiploads of counterfeit idealism, of heroic costumes and rattles full of nonsensical big words, how many tons of sugary spiritual sympathy (its business name: la religion de la souffrance [the religion of suffering]), how many stilts of “noble indignation” to assist the spiritually flat-footed, and how many play actors of the Christian moral ideal would have to be exported from Europe today so that its air might smell cleaner once again. . . . Obviously, as far as this overproduction is concerned, a new commercial possibility has opened up: obviously there is new “business” to be made with small gods of ideals and their accompanying “idealists”—people should not fail to hear this hint! Who has the courage for it? We have it in our hands to “idealize” the entire earth! . . . But why am I talking about courage? Only one thing is necessary here, just the hand, an uninhibited, a very uninhibited hand.— 27 Enough! Enough! Let’s leave these curiosities and complexities of the most modern spirit, which inspire as much laughter as irritation. Our problem can do without them, the problem of the meaning of the ascetic ideal. What has that to do with yesterday and today! I am going to approach these issues more fundamentally and more forcefully in another connection (under the title On The History of European Nihilism. I refer to a work which I am preparing: The Will to Power: An Attempt To Re-evaluate all Values). What I have been dealing with here is only the following—to establish that the ascetic ideal has, for the time being, even in the most spiritual sphere, only one kind of true enemy who can inflict harm, and that enemy is those who play-act this ideal—for they awaken distrust. Everywhere else, where the spirit nowadays is strong, powerful, and working without counterfeiting, it generally dispenses with the ideal—the popular expression for this abstinence is “atheism,” except for its will to truth. But this will, this remnant of the ideal is, if people wish to believe me, that very ideal in its strongest, most spiritual formulation, thoroughly esoteric, stripped of all its outer structures, and thus not so much a remnant, as its kernel. Consequently, absolutely unconditional atheism

(—and that’s the only air we breathe, we more spiritual men of this age!) does not stand opposed to this ideal, as it appears to do. It is much rather only one of its last stages of development, one of its concluding forms and innerly logical outcomes. It demands reverence, this catastrophe of two thousand years of breeding for the truth which concludes by forbidding itself the lie of a faith in God. (The same process of development in India, which was fully independent of Europe and therefore proof of something—this same ideal forced things to a similar conclusion. The decisive point was reached five centuries before the European calendar, with Buddha, or more precisely, with the Sankhya philosophy. For this was popularized by Buddha and made into a religion.) Putting the question as forcefully as possible, what really triumphed over the Christian God? The answer stands in my Gay Science, p. 290: “Christian morality itself, the increasingly strict understanding of the idea of truthfulness, the subtlety of the father confessor of the Christian conscience, transposed and sublimated into scientific conscience, into intellectual cleanliness at any price. To look at nature as if it were a proof of the goodness and care of a god, to interpret history in such a way as to honour divine reason, as a constant testament to a moral world order and moral intentions, to interpret one’s own experiences, as devout men have interpreted them for long enough, as if everything was divine providence, everything was a sign, everything was thought out and sent for the salvation of the soul out of love—now that’s over and done with. That has conscience against it. Among more sensitive consciences that counts as something indecent, dishonest, as lying, feminism, weakness, cowardice. With this rigour, if with anything, we are good Europeans and heirs to Europe’s longest and bravest overcoming of the self. All great things destroy themselves by an act of self-cancellation. That’s what the law of life wills, that law of the necessary “self-overcoming” in the essence of life—eventually the call always goes out to the lawmaker himself, “patere legem, quam ipse tulisti” [submit to the law which you yourself have established]. That’s the way Christianity was destroyed as dogma by its own morality; that’s the way Christendom as morality must now also be destroyed. We stand on the threshold of this event. After Christian truthfulness has come to a series of conclusions, it will draw its strongest conclusion, its conclusion against itself. However, this will occur when it poses the question: “What is the meaning of all will to truth?” Here I move back again to my problem, to our problem, my unknown friends (—for I still don’t know anything about friends): what sense would our whole being have if not for the fact that in us that will to truth became aware of itself as a problem? . . . Because this will to truth from now on is growing conscious of itself, morality from now on is dying—there’s no doubt about that. That great spectacle in one hundred acts, which remains reserved for the next two centuries in Europe, that most fearful, most questionable, and perhaps also most hopeful of all spectacles . . . 28 If we leave aside the ascetic ideal, then man, the animal man, has had no meaning up to this point. His existence on earth has had no purpose. “Why man at all?” was a question without an answer. The will for man and earth was missing. Behind every great human destiny echoes as refrain an even greater “in vain” That is just what the ascetic ideal means: that something is missing, that a huge hole surrounds man—he did not know how to justify himself to himself, to explain, to affirm; he suffered from the problem of his meaning. He also suffered in other ways as well: he was for the most part a pathological animal, but the suffering itself was not his problem, rather the fact that he lacked an answer to the question he screamed out, “Why this suffering?” Man, the bravest animal, the one most accustomed to suffering, does not deny suffering in itself; he desires it; he seeks it out in person, provided that people show him a meaning for it, a purpose of suffering. The curse that earlier spread itself over men was not suffering, but the senselessness of suffering—and the ascetic ideal offered him a meaning! The ascetic ideal has been the only meaning offered up to this point. Any meaning is better than no meaning at all; however one looks at it, the ascetic ideal has so far been the “faute de mieux” [for lack of something better] par excellence. In it suffering was interpreted, the huge hole appeared filled in, the door shut against all suicidal nihilism. The interpretation undoubtedly brought new suffering with it—more profound, more inner, more poisonous, and more life-gnawing suffering; it brought all suffering under the perspective of guilt. . . . But nevertheless—with it man was saved. He had a meaning; from that point on he was no longer like a leaf in the wind, a toy ball of nonsense, of “without sense”; he could now will something—at first it didn’t matter where, why, or how he willed: the will itself was saved. We simply cannot conceal from ourselves what is really expressed by that total will which received its direction from the ascetic ideal: this hate against what is human, even more against animality, even more against material things—this abhorrence of the senses, of reason itself, this fear of happiness and beauty, this longing for the beyond away from all appearance, change, becoming, death, desire, even longing itself—all this means, let’s have the courage to understand this, a will to nothingness, an aversion to life, a revolt against the most fundamental preconditions of life—but it is and remains a will! . . . And to finish up by repeating what I said at the beginning: man will sooner will nothingness than not will

ENDNOTES (1) Thus Spoke Zarathustra: a work written by Nietzsche between 1883 and 1885. [Back to Text] (2) Luther: Martin Luther (1483-1546), German monk and university professor whose revolutionary break with the Catholic Church launched the Reformation; Die Meistersinger: The Mastersingers of Nuremburg, an opera by Richard Wagner, first performed in 1868. [Back to Text] (3) Parsifal: the hero of Wagner’s opera of the same name, first performed in 1882. [Back to Text] (4) Schopenhauer: Arthur Schopenhauer

(1788-1860), influential German philosopher, whose work emphasized the importance of the Will. [Back to Text] (5) Stendhal: pen name of Marie-Henri Beyle (1783-1842), a French novelist whom Nietzsche admired for his psychological acuity. [Back to Text] (6) Pygmalion: In classical mythology a sculptor who carved a woman so lifelike and beautiful, that he fell in love with it. [Back to Text] (7) Ixion: In Greek mythology a mortal man who tried to seduce Zeus' wife, Hera, and was punished in Hades by being bound on a fiery wheel which was always spinning. [Back to Text] (8) The Latin here is a reworking of the famous legal saying "Fiat Justitia et pereat mundus" [Let justice be done, though the world perish]. The saying is attributed to Ferdinand I (1503-1564), the Holy Roman Emperor, who adopted it as his motto. [Back to Text] (9) Piazza San Marco: the main city square in Venice. [Back to Text] (10) . . . resentment: Nietzsche introduces this important term in the First Essay of Genealogy of Morals, in Section 10: a short definition is as follows: "deep-seated resentment, frustration, and hostility, accompanied by a sense of being powerless to express these feelings directly" (Merriam-Webster). [Back to Text] (11) . . . Eugene Dühring (1833-1921), a German philosopher and socialist who attacked Marxism, Christianity, and Judaism. [Back to Text] (12) The reference to Shakespeare's Squire Christopher [Junker Christoph] may be (as Walter Kaufmann suggests) an allusion to The Taming of the Shrew, where the hero, Petruchio refers to a vegetarian diet (see Kaufmann's translation of Genealogy of Morals, 131); or it may be (as Maudemarie Clark and Alan J. Swensen propose) an allusion to Twelfth Night, where Sir Andrew Aguecheek (called Junker Christoph in one German translation of the play) comments on his eating habits. See the Clark and Swensen translation of Genealogy of Morality, 156. Nietzsche refers to Junker Christoph's meat-eating habits again later on in this section. The Thirty Years War (1618-1648) was a disastrous European conflict which began as a fight over religion. [Back to Text] (13) Hesychasts: a religious tradition in the Eastern Orthodox Church which emphasizes an inner spiritual retreat and abandonment of sense experience. St Theresa (1515-1582), a famous Spanish mystic. [Back to Text] (14) Shankara (788?-820), Indian philosopher who played a formative role in the historical development of Hinduism. Paul Deussen (1845-1919), an important German scholar of Indian religion. [Back to Text] (15) Geulincx: Arnold Geulincx (1624-1669), a Flemish philosopher. [Back to Text] (16) Thomas Moore (1779-1852), an Irish poet; Dr. Gwinner: Wilhelm von Gwinner (1825-1917), German lawyer and civil servant. Thayer: Alexander Thayer (1817-1897). [Back to Text] (17) Taine: Hippolyte Adolphe Taine (1828-1893), a French historian; Leopold Ranke: (1795 to 1886) a very famous and influential German historian. [Back to Text] (18) . . . no other: This is one of Martin Luther's most famous quotations, allegedly his reply when asked to take back his criticisms of the church, a response which launched the Reformation in 1521. [Back to Text] (19) Copernicus: Nicolaus Copernicus (1473-1543), the Polish astronomer and monk who produced a scientifically based theory of a sun-centred solar system. [Back to Text] (20) Xaver Doudan: Ximénès Doudan (1800-1872), a French writer. [Back to Text] (21) Renan: Ernest Renan (1823-1892), French writer and philosopher, particularly famous for his Life of Jesus. [Back to Text] (22) Anacreon: (born c. 570 BC), Greek lyric poet famous for his drinking songs. [Back to Text] (23) “Germany, Germany, over everything”: the opening lines of the German national anthem “Deutschland, Deutschland, über alles”; the lyrics were written in 1841 to music by Haydn. The song was adopted as the national anthem in 1922. [Back to Text] Link to Genealogy of Morals, Table of Contents

Part IX

Twilight of the Idols

1888 — Translated by R.J. Hollingdale

TWILIGHT OF THE IDOLS and THE ANTI-CHRIST FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE was born near Leipzig in 1844, the son of a Lutheran clergyman. He attended the famous Pforta School, then went to university at Bonn and at Leipzig, where he studied philology and read Schopenhauer. When he was only twenty-four he was appointed to the chair of classical philology at Basle University; he stayed there until his health forced him into retirement in 1879. While at Basle he made and broke his friendship with Wagner, participated as an ambulance orderly in the Franco-Prussian War, and published The Birth of Tragedy (1872), Untimely Meditations (1873–6) and the first part of Human, All Too Human (1878; two supplements entitled Assorted Opinions and Maxims and The Wanderer and his Shadow followed in 1879 and 1880 respectively). From 1880 until his final collapse in 1889, except for brief interludes, he divorced himself from everyday life and, supported by his university pension, he lived mainly in France, Italy and Switzerland. The Dawn appeared in 1881 followed by The Gay Science in the autumn of 1882. Thus Spoke Zarathustra was written between 1883 and 1885, and his last completed books were Ecce Homo, an autobiography, and Nietzsche contra Wagner. He became insane in 1889 and remained in a condition of mental and physical paralysis until his death in 1900. MICHAEL TANNER was educated in the RAF and at Cambridge University, where he was a Lecturer in Philosophy until 1997 and is a Fellow of Corpus Christi College. He is equally interested in philosophy, music and literature, his particular areas being Friedrich Nietzsche and Richard Wagner. He has written for many journals, contributed ‘The Total Work of Art’ to The Wagner Companion, and is the author of Nietzsche (1995) and Wagner (1996). R. J. HOLLINGDALE translated eleven of Nietzsche’s books and published two books about him; he also translated works by, among others, Schopenhauer, Goethe, E. T. A. Hoffman, Lichtenberg and Theodor Fontane, many of these for Penguin Classics. He was the honorary president of the British Nietzsche Society. R. J. Hollingdale died on 28 September 2001. In its obituary The Times described him as ‘Britain’s foremost postwar Nietzsche specialist’ and the Guardian paid tribute to his ‘inspired gift for German translation’. Richard Gott wrote that he 'brought fresh generations – through fluent and intelligent translation – to read and relish Nietzsche's inestimable thought'. FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE TWILIGHT OF THE IDOLS AND

Part IX (continued)

The Antichrist

1888 — Translated by R.J. Hollingdale

THE ANTI-CHRIST TRANSLATED BY R. J. HOLLINGDALE
INTRODUCTION BY MICHAEL TANNER PENGUIN BOOKS PENGUIN BOOKS Published by the Penguin Group Penguin Books Ltd, 80 Strand, London WCR 0RL, England Penguin Putnam Inc., 375 Hudson Street, New York, New York 10014, USA Penguin Books Australia Ltd, 250 Camberwell Road, Camberwell, Victoria 3124, Australia Penguin Books Canada Ltd, 10 Alcorn Avenue, Toronto, Ontario, Canada MV 3B Penguin Books India (P) Ltd, 11 Community Centre, Panchsheel Park, New Delhi – 110 017, India Penguin Books (NZ) Ltd, Cnr Rosedale and Airborne Roads, Albany, Auckland, New Zealand Penguin Books (South Africa) (Pty) Ltd, 24 Sturdee Avenue, Rosebank
2196, South Africa Penguin Books Ltd, Registered Offices: 80 Strand, London
WCR 0RL, England www.penguin.com Götzen-Dämmerung first published 1889 Der Antichrist first published 1895 This translation published 1968 This edition with a new Introduction published 1990 Reprinted with a new Chronology and new Further Reading 2003 30 Translation and Translator's Note copyright © R. J. Hollingdale, 1968 Introduction copyright © Michael Tanner, 1990 All rights reserved Except in the United States of America, this book is sold subject to the condition that it shall not, by way of trade or otherwise, be lent, resold, hired out, or otherwise circulated without the publisher's prior consent in any form of binding or cover other than that in which it is published and without a similar condition including this condition being imposed on the subsequent purchaser EISBN: 978-0-141-90429-0 Contents INTRODUCTION TRANSLATOR'S NOTE FURTHER READING TWILIGHT OF THE IDOLS or How to Philosophize with a Hammer Foreword Maxims and Arrows The Problem of Socrates 'Reason' in Philosophy How the 'Real World' at last Became a Myth Morality as Anti-Nature The Four Great Errors The 'Improvers' of Mankind What the Germans Lack Expeditions of an Untimely Man What I Owe to the Ancients The Hammer Speaks THE ANTI-CHRIST
Foreword The Anti-Christ GLOSSARY OF NAMES CHRONOLOGY
Introduction to TWILIGHT OF THE IDOLS and THE ANTI-CHRIST Both these two brief, marvellous books were written during the latter half of 1888, the last year of Friedrich Nietzsche's sane life. In Ecce Homo, the highly eccentric autobiography which he immediately went on to write after The Anti-Christ,

Nietzsche remarks at the end of the short chapter he devotes to Twilight, 'I have never experienced such an autumn, nor have I thought anything of the sort possible on earth – a Claude Lorraine thought on to infinity, every day of the same excessive perfection.' In the epigraph to Ecce Homo, which he wrote himself, the note he strikes is still more elegiac: On this perfect day, when everything has become ripe and not only the grapes are growing brown, a ray of sunlight has fallen on to my life... The first book of the Revaluation of all Values [by which Nietzsche means The Anti-Christ], the Songs of Zarathustra... my attempt to philosophize with a hammer [an allusion to the subtitle of Twilight] – all of them gifts of this year, of its last quarter even! How should I not be grateful to my whole life? To move from those expressions of gratitude to the two prose works they refer to comes as a shock. For the tone of both Twilight and The Anti-Christ is predominantly strident, even shrill, and many commentators, not just unsympathetic ones, have registered distress at what strikes them as a self-betraying crudity and oversimplification of the profound and somewhat more calmly expressed insights to be found in his preceding books, especially in On the Genealogy of Morals written only the previous year. Nietzsche's self-apotheosis in Ecce Homo and his collapse into insanity at the very beginning of 1889 are taken by these regretful readers as sad confirmations of the deterioration discernible in these two soi-distant autumnal products. Yet if one recognizes the irony of Ecce Homo and if one didn't know of Nietzsche's impending madness, the difference of tone between these two books and what preceded them might well not seem so great, and the incredible richness of content which both of them possess might be more apparent. It would be grotesque, of course, to deny that these books are, to put it at its gentlest, eccentric. The arch Yes-sayer seems to be on remarkably negative form, as both titles suggest. He even seems to be unclear on this matter himself. In number 6 of the section of Twilight entitled 'What the Germans Lack' he says, 'To be true to my nature, which is affirmative and has dealings with contradiction and criticism only indirectly and when compelled...', while in number 1 of the last section, 'What I Owe to the Ancients', he writes, rather more convincingly until the last clause, 'My taste, which may be called the opposite of a tolerant taste, is... far from uttering a wholesale Yes: in general it dislikes saying Yes, it would rather say No, most of all it prefers to say nothing at all', and in the Foreword he claims that 'This little book is a grand declaration of war', having just written – to confuse the issue still further – that 'This book... is above all a relaxation, a sunspot, an escapade into the idle hours of a psychologist.' It would perhaps be tactless, and giving hostages to fortune, to press Nietzsche too hard about this; but it is strange that a book which claims to demolish 'Not merely eternal idols, also the youngest of all' (his characterization of it in Ecce Homo) should saunter into the world as 'a relaxation', etc. And yet their apparent contradictoriness is also typical of both these books and does force the question of whether Nietzsche was losing his grip or, more interestingly and alarmingly, whether Twilight, which presents itself as a lightning tour of his whole philosophy, doesn't inadvertently serve the purpose of revealing 'tensions' (the charitable word used by kindly philosophical commentators) that had all along been implicit in his thought. Nietzsche is regularly rebuked by writers who strangely feel that consistency is the most important philosophical virtue, or at least the sine qua non of a philosopher's deserving to be taken seriously, for his frequent vacillations between injunctions to lightheartedness and dire prophecies of impending gloom, between enjoining us to delight in surfaces and insisting that we plumb previously uncharted depths. If he had philosophized with less of himself than he did, such charges would be justified. But one has to ask how anyone who threw himself with such completeness into his work as Nietzsche did, could possibly have neglected to register as forcefully as he was able – which in his case means utterly – both the attractions of insouciance and those of fanatical seriousness. If he had been an artist – wholly an artist, instead of an artist-philosopher – he would have been spared this criticism. No one blames Richard Wagner for moving straight on to Die Meistersinger from Tristan and Isolde, except those who blame him for writing either. The obvious retort to that, that an artist has the right to switch from a tragic to a comic mode, and a strikingly different world view, while a philosopher doesn't, begs the question in the most spectacular way, certainly where Nietzsche is concerned. But this may seem unduly permissive. Is Nietzsche a Yes-sayer, or would he rather say No? The answer is, I think, that at the deepest level even he (whom Freud described as the person who knew more about himself than anyone else ever had or ever would) didn't know, or couldn't make up his mind. Rightly he saw various fundamental attitudes to life as warring temptations, and was unexampled in his honesty in spelling out the reasons for and against adopting any of them. And as his feelings about life accelerated in their alternations and became ever more intense, he produced in the works under consideration the two greatest documents of basic ambivalence that we possess. Very early on in Twilight a striking example of Nietzsche's apparently casual contradictoriness occurs. Number 12 of the Maxims and Arrows reads, 'If we possess our why of life we can put up with almost any how. – Man does not strive after happiness; only the Englishman does that.' (This may also seem typical of Twilight in combining a profound maxim with a cheap arrow, until we realize the place that the unfortunate English have in Nietzsche's by now highly schematized demonology, which I shall be investigating later.) The last maxim of this part states, 'Formula of my happiness: a Yes, a No, a straight line, a goal...', while number 33 reads in part, 'How little is needed for happiness! The note of a bagpipe. – Without music life would be a mistake.' If Nietzsche is so scornful of searching after happiness, why should he tell us his formula for it? This kind of question, inescapable for the attentive reader, pervades both these books. The truth of the matter, I think, is that though Nietzsche appears to be making things as direct and simple as possible, he is by now inveterately wedded to his old habit of using a single term, in this case 'happiness', to denote both something of which he approves and what he regards as its malignant shadow. The latter is invariably what most people mean by the term, the former what they should mean. In the latter part of the nineteenth century, 'happiness' was a term which had virtually been taken over by utilitarians, for whom Nietzsche's contempt was limitless. The grounds of that contempt are multiple: 1. Insofar as utilitarians concerned themselves with the greatest happiness of the greatest number, they were advocating something which for Nietzsche simply was not worth having. For an equal distribution of happiness must mean a watering down of its quality for anyone who possesses it. 2. The utilitarian conception of happiness further betrays itself in its suspect relationship to Christian ideas on the subject. Nietzsche touches on both these points when he writes in number 43 of The Anti-Christ: 'Salvation of the soul' – in plain words: 'The world revolves around me'.... The poison of the doctrine 'equal rights for all' – this has been more thoroughly sowed by Christianity than by anything else; from the most secret recesses of base instincts, Christianity has waged a war to the death against every feeling of reverence and distance between man and man, against, that is, the precondition of every elevation, every increase in culture – it has forged out of the resentment of the masses its chief weapon against us, against everything noble, joyful, high-spirited on earth, against our happiness on earth.... 3. Nietzsche regards the failure to draw a distinction between happiness and contentment as especially disastrous; for him the only happiness worth having is that which is the by-product of strenuous efforts in various directions, efforts undertaken without a thought for the happiness they might produce. If Nietzsche had bothered to read the utilitarians he would have seen that, at least in respect of the third of these criticisms, Mill had explicitly, indeed notoriously, claimed that it was better to be an unhappy wise man than a contented fool. But Mill figures in Nietzsche's list of 'Impossibles', where Nietzsche labels him at the beginning of 'Expeditions of an Untimely Man': 'John Stuart Mill: or offensive clarity.' If he had been a little more patient with Mill – admittedly a difficult task, and one to which he was temperamentally unsuited – he could have made his critique more effective; or rather he could have applied to Mill the more balanced critique which he does address elsewhere. Why, if one is utilitarian, is it better to be miserable and wise than stupid and contented? No answer which sustains the coherence of this doctrine has ever been forthcoming, for utilitarianism is, in fact, in all its rich confusions, the result of attempting to combine hopelessly irreconcilable elements. Its stress on equality among all men is an inheritance of Christianity – and it is this element in Christianity that horrifies Nietzsche as much as any other – while in its emphasis on happiness in this life it negates the basic premiss of Christianity (at least as Nietzsche sees it, and it is a view generally shared). To take the latter point: the Christian Church, in opposition to its founder, has always been insistent on the worthlessness of the things of this world – this is Nietzsche’s central argument in The Anti-Christ. For a start they are transient, and that strong streak of Platonism in Christianity (‘Christianity is Platonism for “the people”,’ Nietzsche writes in the Preface to Beyond Good and Evil) had enforced the idea that anything that is not eternal is without value. Not only is it their ephemerality which eliminates their worth, but also those negative features dependent upon them: ambition, pride, ruthlessness, together with achievement and creation itself, as human beings understand it, are intelligible only in a world in which everything passes away. So also, it might be retorted, are the Christian virtues of patience, fortitude and remorse. True enough, yet they are all predicated on a future reward, just as the vices are eternally punished. In short, because utilitarianism had emerged from Christianity it attempted to apply to a world seen in a wholly secular way a set of values that makes sense only in a religious, more specifically a Christian, context. Hence, while upholding earthly happiness, it reflects its Christian legacy in its condemnation of contented zombies – a condemnation Nietzsche shares, but which he realizes that one must find radically new grounds to sustain. Other central concepts of morality discussed by Nietzsche are also meaningful only in a religious context. For instance, one of the most magnificent passages in Twilight, indeed in all of Nietzsche’s writings, occurs in number 5 of the ‘Expeditions of an Untimely Man’, where, attacking ‘G. Eliot’, a still more hapless victim of his demonological schema, he writes: They have got rid of the Christian God, and now feel obliged to cling all the more firmly to Christian morality... In England, in response to every little emancipation from theology one has to reassert one’s position in a fear-inspiring manner as a moral fanatic. That is the penance one pays there. – With us it is different. When one gives up Christian belief one thereby deprives oneself of the right to Christian morality. For the latter is absolutely not self-evident... Christianity is a system, a consistently thought out and complete view of things. If one breaks out of it a fundamental idea, the belief in God, one thereby breaks the whole thing to pieces:... Christianity presupposes that man does not know, cannot know what is good for him and what evil: he believes in God, who alone knows. Christian morality is a command: its origin is transcendental; it is beyond all criticism, all right to criticize; it possesses truth only if God is truth – it stands or falls with the belief in God. – If the English really do believe they will know, of their own accord, ‘intuitively’, what is good and evil; if they consequently think they no longer have need of Christianity as a guarantee of morality; that is merely the consequence of the ascendancy of

Christian evaluation and an expression of the strength and depth of this ascendancy: so that the origin of English morality has been forgotten, so that the highly conditional nature of its right to exist is no longer felt. For the Englishman morality is not yet a problem... Astonishingly accurate as this is about English moral philosophers of the last hundred years, it seems unfair of Nietzsche to attack only them, when it applies at least as much to post-Christians of other nations. But that hardly matters. What does matter is the conclusiveness of the point Nietzsche is making. It applies equally to Kant, whom Nietzsche does not spare in either of these two books. Indeed it applies more to him. For he too gets rid of the Christian God as a foundation of morality, only to reintroduce Him later on as a guarantee that virtue will pay, if not in this world then in the next. Even readers who find much of what Nietzsche writes unsympathetic must surely share his amazement, if not his indignation (though they should share that too), when they contemplate a world from which God has been eliminated but in which it is thought that we should behave just as people did, or ought to have done, when He was still a pervasive presence. The trouble is that our conception of human nature has failed to alter: we still derive it from seeing ourselves as creatures, obliged to obey the dictates of our Creator. This view of ourselves is so difficult to overcome – where do we look to find an alternative one? – and the very idea of ourselves as being continuous with the rest of nature is so reductive, that we mostly lazily stick with our Christian inheritance, which we persuade ourselves is the ‘natural’ view to take. But at the same time we realize that something is amiss, so we tinker around in an ad hoc sort of way, holding on to such concepts as ‘rights’ and ‘equality’, jettisoning or tacitly ignoring others that we find inconvenient. The result, in Nietzsche’s view, is a moral and spiritual vulgarity so depressing that he has to stage a one-man, non-stop demonstration of exaltation. Though Twilight ranges very widely, taking in every theme that Nietzsche ever dealt with, there can’t be any question that at each point he is preparing the ground for his final attack on Christianity. It is – the whole brief book – very much a matter of reculer pour mieux sauter. And although, reading The Anti-Christ immediately afterwards, one has a strong sense of more of the same, this book was actually intended to be the first instalment of his Revaluation of All Values, which was itself to be in four parts and to present his philosophy in its most definitive form so far – an ambitious project, even if he had not become insane. Nietzsche was touchingly addicted to plans and titles, most of which were abandoned. What is amazing is the sureness of touch with which, in both these books, he surveys the contemporary cultural scene, in addition to many other topics, and pulls all the threads together. It is in pursuance of this dynamic unity that he uses names with such dramatic unfairness. Never scrupulous, let alone ‘scholarly’, in his portrayal of individuals, he reaches new heights of recklessness in these works, with the signal exception of his treatment of Christ, as we shall see. But it would be a terrible pity if this unfairness were to blind one to the essential points that he is making. If accuracy were at issue, Nietzsche is no more accurate in his portrayal of his heroes than he is of his villains. The whole enterprise has to be seen in terms of lining up his troops to fight the enemy, and it is a central part of his project that his own forces are enormously but not hopelessly outnumbered. Both books should be read under the aspect of the last words of Ecce Homo: 'Have I been understood? – Dionysos against the Crucified...' Dionysos had, of course, always been his name for what he regarded as the element in life which was most fearful but also which vindicated it; 'The Crucified' is a comparatively late piece of nomenclature for its opposite. But in fact to put the contrast in these terms is misleading and has certainly resulted in much misunderstanding, even among those who aren't hostile to Nietzsche's general position. For Dionysos has two opponents, one worthy of him, the other contemptible. The name Nietzsche gives to his worthy opponent is Christ – hence Dionysos is the Anti-Christ. But as translators of the eponymous work have pointed out, in German 'Der Antichrist' can mean either 'The Anti-Christ' or 'The Anti-Christian'. I think that it was intended to mean both. The Christian can be seen as the unworthy opponent of Dionysos, the squalid enemy who is too ubiquitous to be ignored, but who is undeservedly dignified by being treated to such elaborate condemnation. Similarly, it is Christianity, not Christ, of which Nietzsche writes in the closing passage of The Anti-Christ that it is 'the one great curse, the one great intrinsic depravity, the one great instinct for revenge for which no expedient is sufficiently poisonous, secret, subterranean, petty – I call it the one immortal blemish of mankind...' In the central sections of the book Nietzsche goes to great pains to distinguish between Christ and everyone who has used his name for whatever purposes. So, to simplify slightly, The Anti-Christ constitutes an attack on both Christ and Christians, while Twilight makes its assault on the exceedingly complex set of motives, feelings, attitudes and longings which have ensured that 'in reality there has been only one Christian, and he died on the Cross' (The Anti-Christ, number 39). To make this point clearer, it is necessary to go back to Nietzsche's first book, The Birth of Tragedy, as indeed he does in number 6 of the section of Twilight entitled '“Reason” in Philosophy', where he enunciates four propositions, the fourth of which runs: To divide the world into a 'real' and an 'apparent' world, whether in the manner of Christianity or in the manner of Kant (which is, after all, that of a cunning Christian –) is only a suggestion of décadence – a symptom of declining life... That the artist places a higher value on appearance than on reality constitutes no objection to this proposition. For 'appearance' here signifies reality once more, only selected, strengthened, corrected... The tragic artist is not a pessimist – it is precisely he who affirms all that is questionable and terrible in existence, he is Dionysian... Certainly, this is not exactly the way he put it in The Birth of Tragedy, but the difference is not damaging, at least not for present purposes: on the contrary, it strengthens his position. For the central positive point that Nietzsche is making here, that the Dionysian artist affirms precisely what we are all most tempted to deny, is something to which he always held firm. But in The Birth of Tragedy ‘the terrible’ had denoted something glamorous, the underlying and mainly appalling substratum of existence which we are usually unable to face, but which the phenomenon of tragedy forces us to face. In the sixteen years between The Birth of Tragedy and Twilight, Nietzsche had abandoned the metaphysics which enabled him to postulate that substratum, while finding that ‘the terrible’ was more terrible than he had thought, because it wasn’t at all glamorous. It was everything that makes small what should be great, that saps life and will, that ministers to what Nietzsche, in his last works, came to sum up, in the word (he always puts it in French) décadence. And, with only an appearance of paradox, he found it more frightful than the metaphysical horrors that he had evoked in The Birth of Tragedy. So, now that Nietzsche has told us, perhaps a little more offhandedly than the importance of the subject warrants, that ‘“appearance” here signifies reality once more, only selected, strengthened, corrected’ he sets about doing the selecting and the correcting in order – and this is the absolutely crucial point – that he should be able to effect a final volte-face and return to his original conception of ‘the terrible’, only purged of its Schopenhauerian-Wagnerian overtones or undertones. In other words, he now wants to denote by ‘the terrible’ those elements in existence which are very nearly unendurable, but the enduring and the overcoming of which lead to an increase in strength or will. The version of ‘the terrible’ which is in one way worse is that which leads to debility and a sense of impoverished life. It is not the role of the Dionysian artist or philosopher to affirm that – it is their job to expose and extirpate it. The twilight of the idols, whether eternal or modern, is at hand. It is in this sense that Nietzsche is driven, against many explicit resolutions to the contrary, to be a No-sayer. For what the décadents who surround him are doing is to say No where they should be saying Yes, where they should be Dionysian; and what is leading them to this life-denying perversity, mostly of course unconsciously, is that they subscribe to a set of values that puts the central features of this world at a discount. Where they find suffering, they immediately look for someone to blame, and end up hating themselves, or generalize that into a hatred of ‘human nature’. They look for ‘peace of mind’, using it as a blanket term and failing to see the diversity of states, some of them desirable and some of them the reverse, which that term covers. They confuse cause and effect, thinking that the connection between virtue and happiness is that the former leads to the latter, whereas in fact the reverse is the case. They have, in Nietzsche’s cruelly accurate phrase, ‘the vulgar ambition to possess generous feelings’ (‘Expeditions of an Untimely Man’, number 6). They confuse breeding fine men with taming them. Throughout the major part of Twilight this devastating list of our vulgarities continues. It goes without saying that most of Nietzsche's readers will find reasons not to be devastated. At most they will claim to find it all very stimulating, or say that they would do if Nietzsche could be a little calmer and less abusive. But really Nietzsche's impudence (he called Richard Wagner 'the impolitest of geniuses' – The Case of Wagner, section 1 – when he should clearly have reserved that title for himself) gives them the excuse to ignore the substance of what he is alleging. His own obsession with moral and intellectual hygiene guaranteed that throughout his life he remained aghast at and incredulous of the degree of self-deception and willingness to believe what suits them that almost everyone routinely practises. By the time he wrote his last works he had behind him a uniquely impressive series of books, especially Human, All Too Human, Daybreak and supremely The Gay Science, in which he had employed scrupulous analysis, teasing and satire, lyrical depth psychology; and no one had given a damn. So he produced this 'grand declaration of war', but this merely served to make people feel that they had been right all along to ignore him. His only consolation was that since he was speaking to décadents they would of course disagree with whatever he said. But how does one succeed in getting under the skin of a décadent? How does one reveal to vulgar people the catastrophic effects of their vulgarity? How does one effect any truly radical conversion in people's consciousness, especially if they are not particularly unhappy? Only, it would seem, by producing in them an experience so devastating that our paramount example of it is Saint Paul's experience on the road to Damascus – something that was never far from Nietzsche's mind when he was writing these books. And although he was desperate to achieve a similar effect, he was horrified at the way in which it was produced on that world-historical occasion. But suppose that, for all our initial resistance, we try to take Twilight seriously, and not as a kind of spiritual thriller or whodunit. We might begin by agreeing that some of his milder claims are, at the very least, plausible. It does seem to be true, for example, that most people, when they find something has gone wrong, do look for someone to blame quite as soon as they look for a way of putting it right. Equally, people who lack the advantages that others have form intense resentments against the 'privileged', claiming that they (the non-privileged) are being denied their 'rights'. Such movements of the soul are, it would seem, 'natural'; Nietzsche is not in the least disposed to deny that. What he loathes is the way in which such attitudes of vengefulness and resentment are used as the linchpins of moral systems. It is inevitable that they should be, at any rate when the gulf between the haves and the have-nots is sufficiently obtrusive and when there are sufficiently skilful people around to work on the feelings of deprivation in the majority. But as a result a set of values is inaugurated in which these feelings of an essentially hostile kind are institutionalized as the sole morality for humanity. It goes without saying that there are other factors which constitute the basic elements of the kind of morality that Nietzsche is particularly opposed to a – ‘slave’ or ‘herd’ morality – but he is tirelessly insistent on the crucial role of these feelings of deprivation. Not that we are consistent on this score. Take the case of jealousy: it is widely and rightly taken to be a destructive and corrosive emotion liable to have catastrophic effects both on those who suffer from it and, as a likely consequence, on the object or objects of their jealousy. We regard it with horror and alarm both because its destructiveness is so blatant, and because the context in which it typically arises is one in which the objects of jealousy are not to blame for being its cause. Still, it seems to be as ‘natural’ as any emotion we have. And yet it is hard to see what the difference is between jealousy and those other feelings which give rise to morality as we most commonly know it. We can take the argument a painful stage further: someone (a ‘decent’ person) who recognizes the degrading effects of jealousy may decide to try to escape from them by behaving in a ‘noble’ way: he forswears the courses of action which he feels driven to follow, and indulges ‘the vulgar ambition to have generous feelings’ (‘Expeditions of an Untimely Man’, number 6). (Hegel had already expounded this dialectic of feeling and action in The Phenomenology of Spirit. Nietzsche often echoes Hegel, but almost certainly without realizing it.) How can we escape from this whole ghastly and spiritually debilitating cycle of feeling? Only by denying the process in its very beginnings, which will involve, among other things, seeing that the ‘nobility’ of the person feeling and acting within this kind of morality (which we tend to regard as morality per se) is a very different matter from the genuine nobility of the person who recognizes the true conditions of existence from the start; who recognizes that there are, as Nietzsche often puts it, no ‘moral facts’, no ‘natural rights’ to which we can lay claim, no valid concept of blame. Who would such a person be? It isn’t surprising that Nietzsche found it necessary to coin the term Übermensch (usually, if unfortunately, rendered as ‘Superman’). For, as I have already argued, our concept of what human nature is is so permeated with our moral concepts that to attempt to sort out the one from the other is by now almost certainly vain. In the course of these two books Nietzsche, although primarily on the warpath, gives fairly detailed accounts of two kinds of person that he finds it impossible to condemn as incarnations, of however ‘sublimated’ (a favourite, and very influential, term of his) a kind, of morality as it is ordinarily understood. One of these kinds of person truly deserves the title of Superman, even if there hasn’t yet been a complete example of it. The other class contains only one member, and that is Christ, at least as seen by Nietzsche in his idiosyncratic but extraordinarily powerful and moving depiction of him in the central stretch of The Anti-Christ. It is this second kind of person whom Nietzsche feels is sufficiently impressive to be his arch-opponent: Dionysos against the Crucified. It is in number 28 of The Anti-Christ that Nietzsche touches ‘for the first time... on the problem of the psychology of the redeemer’. The point of his doing so is to contrast him with the type of the priest, who figures in this book as the arch-villain though not the arch-opponent. The priest is, in Nietzsche’s violently abusive account, the embodiment of meanness seeking, all too successfully, to persuade his flock (which comes dangerously close to being coextensive with the Western world) to live their lives wholly in accordance with the concepts of fear and loathing. By contrast the redeemer, from now on referred to by Nietzsche as Jesus, lives entirely without rancour or vindictiveness. This is no news: but Nietzsche observes that, in attempting to categorize such an extraordinary, indeed unique, being, theologians, of whom he singles out Renan for special derision, have appropriated for their ‘explication of the type Jesus the two most inapplicable concepts possible in this case: the concept of the genius and the concept of the hero’. He immediately continues in number 29: But if anything is unevangelic it is the concept hero. Precisely the opposite of all contending, of all feeling oneself in struggle has here become instinct: the incapacity for resistance here becomes morality (‘resist not evil!’: the profoundest saying of the Gospel, its key in a certain sense), blessedness in peace, in gentleness, in the inability for enmity. What are the ‘glad tidings’? True life, eternal life is found – it is not promised, it is here, it is within you: as life lived in love, in love without deduction or exclusion, without distance. Everyone is a child of God – Jesus definitely claims nothing for himself alone – as a child of God everyone is equal to everyone else.... To make a hero of Jesus! – And what a worse misunderstanding is the word ‘genius’! The idiosyncrasies of Nietzsche’s interpretation of Christ’s character are obvious, but then any attempt to extract an intelligible portrayal of him from the gospels is bound to be selective. What takes one by surprise is the nature of Nietzsche’s selectivity. As his eight-page account continues – he does a good deal more than merely ‘touching on’ the psychology of the redeemer – the tone becomes ever warmer and even ecstatic. The portrayal of Nietzsche’s (or Dionysos’s) antipode becomes, bizarrely, one of the most moving passages in the whole of his writings. With the occasional omission, it could be used as a magnificent sermon addressed to a devout congregation. The omissions which would have to be made are crucial; from time to time in this piece of exalted prose Nietzsche refers to Jesus as an idiot, though his use of that term is clearly influenced by Nietzsche’s belated discovery of Dostoyevsky, to whom he refers favourably several times, but only in these two books. Jesus is also described as a décadent, and as a case of retarded puberty. These descriptions are undoubtedly sincere, yet the fact remains that Nietzsche is obviously at least as much in love with the portrayal of the redeemer that he finds himself giving as he is with that of Socrates, that other sublime opponent, with whom he had a still more protracted affair of the spirit. Both of them fascinated him, partly by virtue of possessing natures which didn't say No simply because they could not conceive of an alternative morality, which, had they been able to, would have both horrified and fatally corrupted them. If one can't have innocence – a matter about which Nietzsche never made up his mind – at least ignorance, or certain species of it, is the next best thing. In the end it won't do, of course, and certainly not for someone with such paralyzingly absolute demands on life as Nietzsche. But lacking a paradigm of genuine innocence, he reverted at several crucial places in his writings to the appeal of 'pure folly'. Not that he could use that phrase in a positive sense, since Wagner had preempted it in his characterization of Parsifal, for whom Nietzsche had nothing but scorn. So he uses instead the closely related image of the child. The most celebrated place in which he does that is the passage in the first section of 'Zarathustra's Discourses' in Thus Spoke Zarathustra, where he describes the three metamorphoses of the spirit and concludes that it is in its ideal state when, having shed the weights of the camel and the ferocities of the lion, it becomes a child. Many readers of that passage must have rubbed their eyes and wondered whether it is a planned effect, so unmistakably to echo the words of Christ. Nietzsche's point, I think, though he doesn't make it explicitly, is that we must retain the innocence of the child as we mature. But is that possible? Whatever his answer, the point about Christ is that he wants us to remain as little children, just as (according to Nietzsche) he himself did in crucial and finally damaging respects. Christ didn't suffer from passions, because he didn't have any, at any rate not the ones that usually accompany adulthood. Thus he was unacquainted with sin and guilt, and his evangel is utterly uncombative. 'If I understand anything of this great symbolist', Nietzsche writes in number 34 of The Anti-Christ, 'it is that he took for realities, for "truths", only inner realities.' The idea of cultivating pure inwardness, freed from any external demands, including that of physical culture (in both these books Nietzsche is very emphatic about the primacy of the body), is clearly one that Nietzsche found very attractive, mainly because of the central place that music played in his life, so long as music is regarded as the most intense form of inwardness that we can possess without importing large quantities of metaphysics and religion. For he insisted, finally, on regarding it as the ultimate refreshment of the hard-worked spirit, and not as a source of truth – in which latter role it would lead us straight back to Schopenhauer and Wagner. But to cultivate inwardness and nothing more, as Christ did, is to avoid life in an absolute, in its way glorious, but ultimately perverse fashion. Indeed, no one but Christ managed to do it. He was bound to be comprehensively misunderstood, and the history of Christianity is a history of misunderstanding. 'This "bringer of glad tidings" died as he lived, as he taught – not to "redeem mankind" but to demonstrate how one ought to live. What he bequeathed to mankind is his practice' (number 35, The Anti-Christ). Inevitably Christ's disciples, and especially Paul, didn't see things that way, according to Nietzsche. They turned action into doctrine, mistook symbols for facts, and produced the most repulsive set of teachings known to mankind (not, alas, that mankind was disposed or able to recognize them for what they were). After the haunting beauty of the pages dedicated to Christ, Nietzsche returns sadly to his overriding theme. The beginning of number 38 runs: 'At this point I shall not suppress a sigh. There are days when I am haunted by a feeling blacker than the blackest melancholy – contempt of man. And so as to leave no doubt as to what I despise, whom I despise: it is the man of today, the man with whom I am fatefully contemporary.' Most of the rest of the book is devoted to attacking Christianity in its institutional form, and especially the way in which it has corrupted consciousness to such an extent that it isn't even true to its own vile self. Nietzsche is embarrassed at the obviousness of the point he is making in number 38: Everyone knows this: and everyone none the less remains unchanged. Where have the last feelings of decency and self-respect gone when even our statesmen, in other ways very unprejudiced kind of men and practical anti-Christians through and through, still call themselves Christians today and go to Communion?... A young prince at the head of his regiments, splendid as the expression of his people's egoism and presumption – but without any shame professing himself a Christian!... Whom then does Christianity deny? what does it call 'world'? The charge is unanswerable: we are faced with a debasement of a debasement of something fundamentally life-denying. No wonder Nietzsche became a hermit. Dionysos against the Crucified... But who might be Dionysos? Who is adequate to command the imagination in the face of a symbol as profound as that of Christ on the Cross? Especially when our imaginations are permeated by that symbol, however comprehensively we have betrayed it. Nietzsche has either to find an exemplary anti-Christian from the past, or to postulate a kind of figure who hasn't yet existed. He had tried the latter in Zarathustra, with questionable success. In these last books he resorts to two historical figures, the first of them a notorious product of the Renaissance, the second 'a grand attempt to overcome the eighteenth century through a return to nature, through a going-up to the naturalness of the Renaissance, a kind of self-overcoming on the part of that century'. This second figure is, of course, Goethe, and number 49 of 'Expeditions of an Untimely Man' is a magnificent celebration of him. The first figure is Cesare Borgia, no doubt chosen partly for shock-value, but also because Nietzsche did – all his references to Borgia show it – have a genuine admiration for him as an embodiment of the Renaissance, which he interprets as: 'The revaluation of Christian values, the attempt, undertaken with every expedient, with every instinct, with genius of every kind, to bring about the victory of the opposing values, the noble values...' (The Anti-Christ, number 61). It becomes a bit clearer why Nietzsche should have been so determinedly provocative: ‘Cesare Borgia as Pope... Am I understood?... Very well, that would have been a victory of the only sort I desire today: Christianity would thereby have been abolished!’ (number 61). My only criticism of this is that Nietzsche seems to be far too retrospectively hopeful. When one thinks of what Christianity has survived, it seems unlikely that anyone or anything could abolish it. Nor is it clear that if an adequate Dionysos-figure appeared he wouldn’t suffer the same fate that afflicts all great men – he would acquire disciples, whether or not he wanted them – and if he were truly great, he wouldn’t want them. And once again there would be a new ‘-ism’, most of whose members would be mean and degrading, because most people are. Nietzsche wanted to envisage a figure so prodigiously magnificent that he could not be traduced. Even the furious pages of these two books show that he still hoped for such a person, and for the transformation of consciousness that he might achieve. If the word ‘pathetic’ can ever be applied to Nietzsche – it is certainly the last term he would have found tolerable – it would be for his optimism about man, in the face of our accumulated record of mean-spiritedness, which no one knew better than he did.

MICHAEL TANNER Translator’s Note Nietzsche was born in Röcken, a village in Prussian Saxony, in 1844. His father and both grandfathers were Lutheran pastors and as a boy he was a pious believer. He attended Pforta school, the Rugby of Prussia, from 1858 to 1864, and then went to Bonn and subsequently Leipzig University (1864–9). At Bonn he studied theology but gave it up when he lost his religious faith; he continued as a student of philology and gained so great a reputation in it that he was appointed to the chair of classical philology at Basel University at the age of twenty-four before having obtained his doctorate, which was awarded him by Leipzig without examination. He taught at Basel for ten years (1869–79), becoming a Swiss to do so, and published his earliest books: The Birth of Tragedy (1872) and the four Untimely Meditations (1873–6). He also became a ‘disciple’ of Richard Wagner and devoted much time and energy to assisting in establishing the Bayreuth Festival, which was inaugurated in 1876. But by that time Nietzsche had come to think he had been mistaken in seeing in Wagner the new saviour of German art, and this disillusionment, combined with his sense that the newly established Reich was a victory for philistinism, turned him against all things German and he became year by year more critical of the ‘new Germany’ (see ‘What the Germans Lack’ in Twilight). In 1876 he began writing Human, All Too Human, and when it appeared in 1878 his breach with his past was complete. A year later he suffered an almost total collapse of health and was compelled to abandon his university career: for the next ten years he lived in a state of recurring ill-health which culminated in final collapse and insanity. During these years he wrote all his important books, living in lodgings and hotel rooms mainly in Switzerland and Italy. He was for that decade certainly one of the loneliest of men, though fundamentally he liked and needed solitude. He never married. The Birth of Tragedy and the first of the Untimely Meditations won him a certain small notoriety, but his subsequent books fell dead from the press – only 170 copies of Human, All Too Human were sold during its first year – and from the fourth part of Zarathustra onwards he had to pay for their publication himself (which he could ill afford to do). Until the end of 1887, in spite of having produced a series of books without equal in the German literature of their time and now world-famous, he was virtually unknown. In 1888 he began to acquire a name: a few, mainly hostile articles were written about him in journals, and the Danish critic Georg Brandes lectured in Copenhagen on his works. But it was not until the 1890s that the public in Germany and abroad became aware of him, and then his reputation suddenly soared, so that by 1900 he was famous, not to say notorious. Of this he knew nothing, having become mentally a child again. Alone, ill and unsuccessful, Nietzsche in the 1880s is however not a figure to pity: in one book after another, couched in a style it must have been a perpetual delight to realize, he celebrated as no one else has ever done the splendour, power and joy of life. Note on the Text Götzen-Dämmerung, oder: Wie man mit dem Hammer philosophiert was published by C. G. Naumann of Leipzig in January 1889, a few weeks after Nietzsche's collapse. It was the last book Nietzsche himself saw printed. It was written between the end of June and the beginning of September 1888, with the foreword, the chapter 'What the Germans Lack' and some of the 'Expeditions of an Untimely Man' added at the end of September, and it was printed by the end of October. The book originally bore the title Müssiggang eines Psychologen (A Psychologist's Leisure, or The Idle Hours of a Psychologist): this modest title was objected to by Nietzsche's enthusiastic admirer Peter Gast, who urged him to find something more 'splendid'; Nietzsche acceded to this request with a parody of Wagner's Götterdämmerung (Twilight of the Gods). The change seems to have been made while the book was already being set up in type (the title page of the manuscript from which it was set is missing, indicating perhaps that Nietzsche had taken it back to make the alteration and that it was subsequently mislaid), and this explains a few otherwise puzzling references to the superseded title in the text. Der Antichrist was written between 3 and 30 September 1888, immediately after the completion of Twilight. It was first intended as the first part of The Revaluation of all Values: a plan for that book which has been preserved reads: 'Revaluation of all Values. Book 1: The Anti-Christ. Attempt at a Critique of Christianity. Book 2: The Free Spirit. Critique of Philosophy as a Nihilistic Movement. Book 3: The Immoralist. Critique of the Most Fatal Kind of Ignorance, Morality. Book 4: Dionysos. Philosophy of Eternal Recurrence.' There are two surviving manuscript title pages of The Anti-Christ: the earlier follows the above plan: The Anti-Christ. Attempt at a Critique of Christianity.

Book One of the Revaluation of all Values, and was presumably written on 3 September. The later one reads: The Anti-Christ. Revaluation of all Values, but the subtitle has been crossed out and A Curse on Christianity substituted. The book was first published in 1895, in volume VIII of the Gesamtausgabe in Grossoktav (Naumann, Leipzig); a small number of omissions from the text were subsequently published and are restored in Karl Schlechta's edition (Werke in drei Bänden, vol. II, 1955). R. J. HOLLINGDALE FURTHER READING David B. Allison, Reading the New Nietzsche (2001) MaudeMarie Clark, Nietzsche on Truth and Morality (1990) R. J. Hollingdale, Nietzsche: The Man and His Philosophy (1965; 1999) Brian Leiter, Nietzsche on Morality (2002) Bernd Magnus and Kathleen Higgins (eds.), The Cambridge Companion to Nietzsche (1996) Alexander Nehemas, Nietzsche: Life as Literature (1985) F. Nietzsche, Daybreak: Thoughts on the Prejudices of Morality, trans. R. J. Hollingdale, introduction by M. Tanner (1982) _ _ _ , Dithyrambs of Dionysus, trans, with introduction and notes R. J. Hollingdale (1984; 2001) _ _ _ , Untimely Meditations, trans. R. J. Hollingdale, introduction by J. P. Stern (1983) John Richardson and Brian Leiter (eds.), Nietzsche (2001) Rudiger Safranski, Nietzsche: A Philosophical Biography, trans. Shelley Frisch (2002) Henry Staten, Nietzsche's Voice (1990) Tracy Strong, Friedrich Nietzsche and the Politics of Transfiguration (1988) TWILIGHT OF THE IDOLS or How to Philosophize with a Hammer Foreword To stay cheerful when involved in a gloomy and exceedingly responsible business is no inconsiderable art: yet what could be more necessary than cheerfulness? Nothing succeeds in which high spirits play no part. Only excess of strength is proof of strength. – A revaluation of all values, this question-mark so black, so huge it casts a shadow over him who sets it up – such a destiny of a task compels one every instant to run out into the sunshine so as to shake off a seriousness grown all too oppressive. Every expedient for doing so is justified, every 'occasion' a joyful occasion.* Above all, war. War has always been the grand sagacity of every spirit which has grown too inward and too profound; its curative power lies even in the wounds one receives. A maxim whose origin I withhold from learned curiosity has long been my motto: increscunt animi, virescit volnere virtus.† Another form of recovery, in certain cases even more suited to me, is to sound out idols.... There are more idols in the world than there are realities: that is my 'evil eye' for this world, that is also my 'evil ear'.... For once to pose questions here with a hammer and perhaps to receive for answer that famous hollow sound which speaks of inflated bowels – what a delight for one who has ears behind his ears – for an old psychologist and pied piper like me, in presence of whom precisely that which would like to stay silent has to become audible... This book too* – the title betrays it† – is above all a relaxation, a sunspot, an escapade into the idle hours of a psychologist. Perhaps also a new war? And are new idols sounded out?... This little book is a grand declaration of war; and as regards the sounding-out of idols, this time they are not idols of the age but eternal idols which are here touched with the hammer as with a tuning fork – there are no more ancient idols in existence.... Also none more hollow.... That does not prevent their being the most believed in; and they are not, especially in the most eminent case, called idols... FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE Turin, 30 September 1888, on the day the first book of the Revaluation of all Values was completed. Maxims and Arrows 1. Idleness is the beginning of psychology. What? could psychology be – a vice? 2. Even the bravest of us rarely has the courage for what he really knows... 3. To live alone one must be an animal or a god – says Aristotle. There is yet a third case: one must be both – a philosopher. 4. ‘All truth is simple’ – Is that not a compound lie? – 5. Once and for all, there is a great deal I do not want to know. – Wisdom sets bounds even to knowledge. 6. It is by being ‘natural’ that one best recovers from one’s unnaturalness, from one’s spirituality... 7. Which is it? Is man only God’s mistake or God only man’s mistake? – 8. From the military school of life. – What does not kill me makes me stronger. 9. Help thyself: then everyone will help thee too. Principle of Christian charity. 10. Let us not be cowardly in face of our actions! Let us not afterwards leave them in the lurch! – Remorse of conscience is indecent. 11. Can an ass be tragic? – To be crushed by a burden one can neither bear nor throw off?... The case of the philosopher. 12. If we possess our why of life we can put up with almost any how. – Man does not strive after happiness; only the Englishman does that. 13. Man created woman – but what out of? Out of a rib of his God, of his ‘ideal’... 14. What? you are seeking? you want to multiply yourself by ten, by a hundred? you are seeking followers? – Seek noughts! –* 15. Posthumous men – like me, for instance – are not so well understood as timely† men, but they are listened to better. More precisely: we are never understood – and hence our authority... 16. Among women. – ‘Truth? Oh, you don’t know the truth, do you! Is it not an outrage on all out pudeurs?’ – 17. This is an artist as an artist should be, modest in his requirements: there are only two things he really wants, his bread and his art – panem et Circen...‡ into them: that is, he believes there is a will in them already (principle of ‘belief’). 19. What? you have chosen virtue and the heaving bosom, yet at the same time look with envy on the advantages enjoyed by those who live for the day? – But with virtue one renounces ‘advantage’... (laid at the door of an anti-Semite). 20. The complete woman perpetrates literature in the same way as she perpetrates a little sin: as an experiment, in passing, looking around to see if someone notices and so that someone may notice... 21. To get into only those situations in which illusory virtues are of no use, but in which, like the tightrope-walker on his rope, one either falls or stands – or gets off... 22. ‘Bad men have no songs’.* – How is it the Russians have songs? 23. ‘German spirit’:† for eighteen years‡ a contradictio in adjecto.§ 24. In order to look for beginners one becomes a crab.

The historian looks backwards; at last he also believes backwards. 25. Contentment protects one even from catching a cold. Has a woman who knew she was well dressed ever caught a cold? – I am assuming she was hardly dressed at all. 26. I mistrust all systematizers and avoid them. The will to a system is a lack of integrity. 27. Women are considered deep – why? because one can never discover any bottom to them. Women are not even shallow. 28. If a woman possesses manly virtues one should run away from her; and if she does not possess them she runs away herself. 29. ‘How much the conscience formerly had to bite on! || what good teeth it had! – And today? what’s the trouble?’ – A dentist’s question. 30. One seldom commits only one rash act. In the first rash act one always does too much. For just that reason one usually commits a second – and then one does too little... 31. When it is trodden on a worm will curl up.* That is prudent. It thereby reduces the chance of being trodden on again. In the language of morals: humility. – 32. Hatred of lies and dissembling may arise out of a sensitive notion of honour; the same hatred may arise out of cowardice, in as much as lying is forbidden by divine command. Too cowardly to tell lies... life would be a mistake. The German even thinks of God as singing songs.† 34. On ne peut penser et écrire qu’assis ‡ (G. Flaubert). – Now I have you, nihilist! Assiduity§ is the sin against the holy spirit. Only ideas won by walking have any value. 35. There are times when we are like horses, we psychologists, and grow restive: we see our own shadow moving up and down before us. The psychologist has to look away from himself in order to see at all. 36. Whether we immoralists do virtue any harm? – As little as anarchists do princes. Only since they have been shot at do they again sit firmly on their thrones. Moral: one must shoot at morals. 37. You run on ahead? – Do you do so as a herdsman? or as an exception? A third possibility would be as a deserter.... First question of conscience. 38. Are you genuine? or only an actor? A representative? or that itself which is represented? – Finally you are no more than an imitation of an actor.... Second question of conscience. 39. The disappointed man speaks. – I sought great human beings, I never found anything but the apes of their ideal. 40. Are you one who looks on? or who sets to work? – or who looks away, turns aside.... Third question of conscience. 41. Do you want to accompany? or go on ahead? or go off alone?... One must know what one wants and that one wants. – Fourth question of conscience. 42. For me they were steps, I have climbed up upon them – therefore I had to pass over them. But they thought I wanted to settle down on them... 43. What does it matter that I am proved right! I am too much in the right. – And he who laughs best today will also laugh last. The Problem of Socrates 1 In every age the wisest have passed the identical judgement on life: it is worthless. ... Everywhere and always their mouths have uttered the same sound – a sound full of doubt, full of melancholy, full of weariness with life, full of opposition to life. Even Socrates said as he died: ‘To live – that means to be a long time sick: I owe a cock to the saviour Asclepius’.* Even Socrates had had enough of it. – What does that prove? What does it point to? – Formerly one would have said (– oh, and did say, and loudly enough, and our pessimists† most of all!): ‘Here at any rate there must be something true! The consensus sapientium ‡ is proof of truth.’ – Shall we still speak thus today? are we allowed to do so? ‘Here at any rate there must be something sick’ – this is our retort: one ought to take a closer look at them, these wisest of every age! Were they all of them perhaps no longer steady on their legs? belated? tottery? décadents? Does wisdom perhaps appear on earth as a raven which is inspired by the smell of carrion?... 2 This irreverent notion that the great sages are declining types first dawned on me in regard to just the case in which learned and unlearned prejudice is most strongly opposed to it: I recognized Socrates and Plato as symptoms of decay, as agents of the dissolution of Greece, as pseudo-Greek, as anti-Greek (Birth of Tragedy, 1872).*. That consensus sapientium – I saw more and more clearly – proves least of all that they were right about what they were in accord over: it proves rather that they themselves, these wisest men, were in some way in physiological accord since they stood – had to stand – in the same negative relation to life. Judgements, value judgements concerning life, for or against, can in the last resort never be true: they possess value only as symptoms, they come into consideration only as symptoms – in themselves such judgements are stupidities. One must reach out and try to grasp this astonishing finesse, that the value of life cannot be estimated. Not by a living man, because he is a party to the dispute, indeed its object, and not the judge of it; not by a dead one, for another reason. – For a philosopher to see a problem in the value of life thus even constitutes an objection to him, a question-mark as to his wisdom, a piece of unwisdom. – What? and all these great wise men – they have not only been décadents, they have not even been wise? – But I shall get back to the problem of Socrates. 3 Socrates belonged, in his origins, to the lowest orders: Socrates was rabble. One knows, one sees for oneself, how ugly he was. But ugliness, an objection in itself, is among Greeks almost a refutation. Was Socrates a Greek at all? Ugliness is frequently enough the sign of a thwarted development, a development retarded by interbreeding. Otherwise it appears as a development in decline. Anthropologists among criminologists tell us the typical criminal is ugly: monstrum in fronte, monstrum in animo.† But the criminal is a décadent. Was Socrates a typical criminal? – At least that famous physiognomist’s opinion which Socrates’ friends found so objectionable would not contradict this idea. A foreigner passing through Athens who knew how to read faces told Socrates to his face that he was a monstrum – that he contained within him every kind of foul vice and lust. And Socrates answered merely: ‘You know me, sir!’ – 4 It is not only the admitted dissoluteness and anarchy of his instincts which indicate décadence in Socrates: the superfetation of the logical and that barbed malice which distinguishes him also point in that direction. And let us not forget those auditory hallucinations which, as 'Socrates' demon', have been interpreted in a religious sense. Everything about him is exaggerated, buffo, caricature, everything is at the same time hidden, reserved, subterranean. – I seek to understand out of what idiosyncrasy that Socratic equation reason = virtue = happiness derives: that bizarrest of equations and one which has in particular all the instincts of the older Hellenes against it. 5 With Socrates Greek taste undergoes a change in favour of dialectics: what is really happening when that happens? It is above all the defeat of a nobler taste; with dialectics the rabble gets on top. Before Socrates, the dialectical manner was repudiated in good society: it was regarded as a form of bad manners, one was compromised by it. Young people were warned against it. And all such presentation of one's reasons was regarded with mistrust. Honest things, like honest men, do not carry their reasons exposed in this fashion. It is indecent to display all one's goods. What has first to have itself proved is of little value. Wherever authority is still part of accepted usage and one does not 'give reasons' but commands, the dialectician is a kind of buffoon: he is laughed at, he is not taken seriously. – Socrates was the buffoon who got himself taken seriously: what was really happening when that happened? 6 One chooses dialectics only when one has no other expedient. One knows that dialectics inspire mistrust, that they are not very convincing. Nothing is easier to expunge than the effect of a dialectician, as is proved by the experience of every speech-making assembly. Dialectics can be only a last-ditch weapon in the hands of those who have no other weapon left. One must have to enforce one's rights: otherwise one makes no use of it. That is why the Jews were dialecticians; Reynard the Fox was a dialectician: what? and Socrates was a dialectician too? – 7 – Is Socrates' irony an expression of revolt? of the resentment of the rabble? does he, as one of the oppressed, enjoy his own form of ferocity in the knife-thrust of the syllogism? does he revenge himself on the aristocrats he fascinates? – As a dialectician one is in possession of a pitiless instrument; with its aid one can play the tyrant; one compromises by conquering. The dialectician leaves it to his opponent to demonstrate he is not an idiot: he enrages, he at the same time makes helpless. The dialectician devitalizes his opponent's intellect. – What? is dialectics only a form of revenge in the case of Socrates? 8 I have intimated the way in which Socrates could repel: it is therefore all the more necessary to explain the fact that he exercised fascination. – That he discovered a new kind of agon, that he was the first fencing-master in it for the aristocratic circles of Athens, is one reason. He fascinated because he touched on the agonal instinct of the Hellenes – he introduced a variation into the wrestling-matches among the youths and young men. Socrates was also a great erotic. 9 But Socrates divined even more. He saw behind his aristocratic Athenians; he grasped that his case, the idiosyncrasy of his case, was already no longer exceptional. The same kind of degeneration was everywhere silently preparing itself: the old Athens was coming to an end. – And Socrates understood that all the world had need of him – his expedient, his cure, his personal art of selfpreservation.... Everywhere the instincts were in anarchy; everywhere people were but five steps from excess: the monstrum in animo was the universal danger. ‘The instincts want to play the tyrant; we must devise a counter-tyrant who is stronger’. ... When that physiognomist had revealed to Socrates what he was, a cave of every evil lust, the great ironist uttered a phrase that provides the key to him. ‘That is true,’ he said, ‘but I have become master of them all.’ How did Socrates become master of himself? – His case was after all only the extreme case, only the most obvious instance of what had at that time begun to be the universal exigency: that no one was any longer master of himself, that the instincts were becoming mutually antagonistic. He exercised fascination as this extreme case – his fear-inspiring ugliness expressed it for every eye to see: he fascinated even more, it goes without saying, as the answer, as the solution, as the apparent cure for this case. – 10 If one needs to make a tyrant of reason, as Socrates did, then there must exist no little danger of something else playing the tyrant. Rationality was at that time divined as a saviour; neither Socrates nor his ‘invalids’ were free to be rational or not, as they wished – it was de rigueur, it was their last expedient. The fanaticism with which the whole of Greek thought throws itself at rationality betrays a state of emergency: one was in peril, one had only one choice: either to perish or – be absurdly rational.... The moralism of the Greek philosophers from Plato downwards is pathologically conditioned: likewise their estimation of dialectics. Reason = virtue = happiness means merely: one must imitate Socrates and counter the dark desires by producing a permanent daylight – the daylight of reason. One must be prudent, clear, bright at any cost: every yielding to the instincts, to the unconscious, leads downwards... 11 I have intimated the way in which Socrates exercised fascination: he seemed to be a physician, a saviour. Is it necessary to go on to point out the error which lay in his faith in ‘rationality at any cost’? – It is self-deception on the part of philosophers and moralists to imagine that by making war on décadence they therewith elude décadence themselves. This is beyond their powers: what they select as an expedient, as a deliverance, is itself only another expression of décadence – they alter its expression, they do not abolish the thing itself. Socrates was a misunderstanding: the entire morality of improvement, the Christian included, has been a misunderstanding.... The harshest daylight, rationality at any cost, life bright, cold, circumspect, conscious, without instinct, in opposition to the instincts, has itself been no more than a form of sickness, another form of sickness – and by no means a way back to ‘virtue’, to ‘health’, to happiness.... To have to combat one’s instincts – that is the formula for décadence: as long as life is ascending, happiness and instinct are one. – 12 – Did he himself grasp that, this shrewdest of all self-deceivers? Did he at last say that to himself in the wisdom of his courage for death?... Socrates wanted to die – it was not Athens, it was he who handed himself the poison cup, who compelled Athens to hand him the poison cup.... ‘Socrates is no physician,’ he said softly to himself: ‘death alone is a physician here.... Socrates himself has only been a long time sick...’ ‘Reason’ in Philosophy 1 You ask me about the idiosyncrasies of philosophers?... There is their lack of historical sense, their hatred of even the idea of becoming, their Egyptianism. They think they are doing a thing honour when they dehistoricize it, sub specie aeterni* – when they make a mummy of it. All that philosophers have handled for millennia has been conceptual mummies; nothing actual has escaped from their hands alive. They kill, they stuff, when they worship, these conceptual idolaters – they become a mortal danger to everything when they worship. Death, change, age, as well as procreation and growth, are for them objections – refutations even. What is, does not become; what becomes, is not.... Now they all believe, even to the point of despair, in that which is. But since they cannot get hold of it, they look for reasons why it is being withheld from them. ‘It must be an illusion, a deception which prevents us from perceiving that which is: where is the deceiver to be found?’ – ‘We’ve got it,’ they cry in delight, ‘it is the senses! These senses, which are so immoral as well, it is they which deceive us about the real world. Moral: escape from sense-deception, from becoming, from history, from falsehood – history is nothing but belief in the senses, belief in falsehood. Moral: denial of all that believes in the senses, of all the rest of mankind: all of that is mere “people”. Be a philosopher, be a mummy, represent monotonism by a gravedigger-mimicry! – And away, above all, with the body, that pitiable idée fixe of the senses! infected with every error of logic there is, refuted, impossible even, notwithstanding it is impudent enough to behave as if it actually existed!’... 2 I set apart with high reverence the name of Heraclitus. When the rest of the philosopher crowd rejected the evidence of the senses because these showed plurality and change, he rejected their evidence because they showed things as if they possessed duration and unity. Heraclitus too was unjust to the senses, which lie neither in the way the Eleatics* believe nor as he believed – they do not lie at all. It is what we make of their evidence that first introduces a lie into it, for example the lie of unity, the lie of materiality, of substance, of duration.... ‘Reason’ is the cause of our falsification of the evidence of the senses. In so far as the senses show becoming, passing away, change, they do not lie.... But Heraclitus will always be right in this, that being is an empty fiction. The ‘apparent’ world is the only one: the ‘real’ world has only been lyingly added... 3 – And what subtle instruments for observation we possess in our senses! This nose, for example, of which no philosopher has hitherto spoken with respect and gratitude, is none the less the most delicate tool we have at our command: it can detect minimal differences in movement which even the spectroscope cannot detect. We possess scientific knowledge today to precisely the extent that we have decided to accept the evidence of the senses – to the extent that we have learned to sharpen and arm them and to think them through to their conclusions. The rest is abortion and not-yet-science: which is to say metaphysics, theology, psychology, epistemology. Or science of formulae, sign-systems: such as logic and that applied logic, mathematics. In these reality does not appear at all, not even as a problem; just as little as does the question what value a system of conventional signs such as constitutes logic can possibly possess. 4 The other idiosyncrasy of philosophers is no less perilous: it consists in mistaking the last for the first. They put that which comes at the end – unfortunately! for it ought not to come at all! – the ‘highest concepts’, that is to say the most general, the emptiest concepts, the last fumes of evaporating reality, at the beginning as the beginning. It is again only the expression of their way of doing reverence: the higher must not be allowed to grow out of the lower, must not be allowed to have grown at all.... Moral: everything of the first rank must be causa sui. * Origin in something else counts as an objection, as casting a doubt on value. All supreme values are of the first rank, all the supreme concepts – that which is, the unconditioned, the good, the true, the perfect – all that cannot have become, must therefore be causa sui. But neither can these supreme concepts be incommensurate with one another, be incompatible with one another.... Thus they acquired their stupendous concept ‘God’.... The last, thinnest, emptiest is placed as the first, as cause in itself, as ens realissimum.†... That mankind should have taken seriously the brain-sick fancies of morbid cobweb-spinners! – And it has paid dearly for doing so!... 5 – Let us, in conclusion, set against this the very different way in which we (– I say ‘we’ out of politeness...) view the problem of error and appearance. Change, mutation, becoming in general were formerly taken as proof of appearance, as a sign of the presence of something which led us astray. Today, on the contrary, we see ourselves as it were entangled in error, necessitated to error, to precisely the extent that our prejudice in favour of reason compels us to posit unity, identity, duration, substance, cause, materiality, being; however sure we may be, on the basis of a strict reckoning, that error is to be found here. The situation is the same as with the motions of the sun: in that case error has our eyes, in the present case our language as a perpetual advocate. Language belongs in its origin to the age of the most rudimentary form of psychology: we find ourselves in the midst of a rude fetishism when we call to mind the basic presuppositions of the metaphysics of language – which is to say, of reason. It is this which sees everywhere deed and doer; this which believes in will as cause in general; this which believes in the ‘ego’, in the ego as being, in the ego as substance, and which projects its belief in the ego-substance on to all things – only thus does it create the concept ‘thing’.... Being is everywhere thought in, foisted on, as cause; it is only from the conception 'ego' that there follows, derivatively, the concept 'being'.... At the beginning stands the great fateful error that the will is something which produces an effect – that will is a faculty.... Today we know it is merely a word.... Very much later, in a world a thousand times more enlightened, the security, the subjective certainty with which the categories of reason* could be employed came all of a sudden into philosophers' heads: they concluded that these could not have originated in the empirical world – indeed, the entire empirical world was incompatible with them. Where then do they originate? – And in India as in Greece they committed the same blunder: 'We must once have dwelt in a higher world' – instead of in a very much lower one, which would have been the truth! – 'we must have been divine, for we possess reason!'... Nothing, in fact, has hitherto had a more direct power of persuasion than the error of being as it was formulated by, for example, the Eleatics: for every word, every sentence we utter speaks in its favour! – Even the opponents of the Eleatics were still subject to the seductive influence of their concept of being: Democritus, among others, when he invented his atom.... 'Reason' in language: oh what a deceitful old woman! I fear we are not getting rid of God because we still believe in grammar... 6 It will be a matter for gratitude if I now compress so fundamental and new an insight into four theses: I shall thereby make it easier to understand, I shall thereby challenge contradiction. First proposition. The grounds upon which 'this' world has been designated as apparent establish rather its reality – another kind of reality is absolutely undemonstrable. Second proposition. The characteristics which have been assigned to the 'real being' of things are the characteristics of non-being, of nothingness – the 'real world' has been constructed out of the contradiction to the actual world: an apparent world indeed, in so far as it is no more than a moral-optical illusion. Third proposition. To talk about 'another' world than this is quite pointless, provided that an instinct for slandering, disparaging and accusing life is not strong within us: in the latter case we revenge ourselves on life by means of the phantasmagoria of 'another', a 'better' life. Fourth proposition. To divide the world into a 'real' and an 'apparent' world, whether in the manner of Christianity or in the manner of Kant (which is, after all, that of a cunning Christian –) is only a suggestion of décadence – a symptom of declining life.... That the artist places a higher value on appearance than on reality constitutes no objection to this proposition. For 'appearance' here signifies reality once more, only selected, strengthened, corrected.... The tragic artist is not a pessimist – it is precisely he who affirms all that is questionable and terrible in existence, he is Dionysian... How the 'Real World' at last Became a Myth HISTORY OF AN ERROR 1. The real world, attainable to the wise, the pious, the virtuous man – he dwells in it, he is it. (Oldest form of the idea, relatively sensible, simple, convincing. Transcription of the proposition 'I, Plato, am the truth.')

)* 2. The real world, unattainable for the moment, but promised to the wise, the pious, the virtuous man ('to the sinner who repents'). (Progress of the idea: it grows more refined, more enticing, more incomprehensible – it becomes a woman, it becomes Christian...) 3. The real world, unattainable, undemonstrable, cannot be promised, but even when merely thought of a consolation, a duty, an imperative. (Fundamentally the same old sun, but shining through mist and scepticism; the idea grown sublime, pale, northerly, Königsbergian.)† 4. The real world – unattainable? Unattained, at any rate. And if unattained also unknown. Consequently also no consolation, no redemption, no duty: how could we have a duty towards something unknown? (The grey of dawn. First yawnings of reason. Cockcrow of positivism.)‡ 5. The 'real world' – an idea no longer of any use, not even a duty any longer – an idea grown useless, superfluous, consequently a refuted idea: let us abolish it! (Broad daylight; breakfast; return of cheerfulness and bons sens; Plato blushes for shame; all free spirits run riot.) 6. We have abolished the real world: what world is left? the apparent world perhaps?... But no! with the real world we have also abolished the apparent world! (Mid-day; moment of the shortest shadow; end of the longest error; zenith of mankind; INCIPIT ZARATHUSTRA)*

Morality as Anti-Nature

1 There is a time with all passions when they are merely fatalities, when they drag their victim down with the weight of their folly – and a later, very much later time when they are wedded with the spirit, when they are 'spiritualized'. Formerly one made war on passion itself on account of the folly inherent in it: one conspired for its extermination – all the old moral monsters are unanimous that 'il faut tuer les passions'.* The most famous formula for doing this is contained in the New Testament, in the Sermon on the Mount, where, by the way, things are not at all regarded from a lofty standpoint. There, for example, it is said, with reference to sexuality, 'if thy eye offend thee, pluck it out': fortunately no Christian follows this prescription. To exterminate the passions and desires merely in order to do away with their folly and its unpleasant consequences – this itself seems to us today merely an acute form of folly. We no longer admire dentists who pull out the teeth to stop them hurting.... On the other hand, it is only fair to admit that on the soil out of which Christianity grew the concept 'spiritualization of passion' could not possibly be conceived. For the primitive Church, as is well known, fought against the 'intelligent' in favour of the 'poor in spirit': how could one expect from it an intelligent war against passion? – The Church combats the passions with excision in every sense of the word: its practice, its 'cure' is castration. It never asks: 'How can one spiritualize, beautify, deify a desire?' – it has at all times laid the emphasis of its discipline on extirpation (of sensuality, of pride, of lust for power, of avarice, of revengefulness). – But to attack the passions at their roots means to attack life at its roots: the practice of the Church is hostile to life... 2 The same expedient – castration, extirpation – is instinctively selected in a struggle against a desire by those who are too weak-willed, too degenerate to impose moderation upon it: by those natures which need La Trappe,* to speak metaphorically (and not metaphorically –), some sort of definitive declaration of hostility, a chasm between themselves and a passion. It is only the degenerate who cannot do without radical expedients; weakness of will, more precisely the inability not to react to a stimulus, is itself merely another form of degeneration. Radical hostility, mortal hostility towards sensuality is always a thought-provoking symptom: it justifies making certain conjectures as to the general condition of one who is excessive in this respect. – That hostility, that hatred reaches its height, moreover, only when such natures are no longer sufficiently sound even for the radical cure, for the renunciation of their ‘devil’. Survey the entire history of priests and philosophers, and that of artists as well: the most virulent utterances against the senses have not come from the impotent, nor from ascetics, but from those who found it impossible to be ascetics, from those who stood in need of being ascetics... 3 The spiritualization of sensuality is called love: it is a great triumph over Christianity. A further triumph is our spiritualization of enmity. It consists in profoundly grasping the value of having enemies: in brief, in acting and thinking in the reverse of the way in which one formerly acted and thought. The Church has at all times desired the destruction of its enemies: we, we immoralists and antiChristians, see that it is to our advantage that the Church exist.... In politics, too, enmity has become much more spiritual – much more prudent, much more thoughtful, much more forbearing. Almost every party grasps that it is in the interest of its own self-preservation that the opposing party should not decay in strength; the same is true of grand politics. A new creation in particular, the new Reich for instance, has more need of enemies than friends: only in opposition does it feel itself necessary, only in opposition does it become necessary.... We adopt the same attitude towards the ‘enemy within’: there too we have spiritualized enmity, there too we have grasped its value. One is fruitful only at the cost of being rich in contradictions; one remains young only on condition the soul does not relax, does not long for peace.... Nothing has grown more alien to us than that desideratum of former times ‘peace of soul’, the Christian desideratum; nothing arouses less envy in us than the moral cow and the fat contentment of the good conscience.... One has renounced grand life when one renounces war.... In many cases, to be sure, ‘peace of soul’ is merely a misunderstanding – something else that simply does not know how to give itself a more honest name. Here, briefly and without prejudice, are a few of them. ‘Peace of soul’ can, for example, be the gentle radiation of a rich animality into the moral (or religious) domain. Or the beginning of weariness, the first of the shadows which evening, every sort of evening, casts. Or a sign that the air is damp, that south winds are on the way. Or unconscious gratitude for a good digestion (sometimes called ‘philanthropy’). Or the quiescence of the convalescent for whom all things have a new taste and who waits.... Or the condition which succeeds a vigorous gratification of our ruling passion, the pleasant feeling of a rare satiety. Or the decrepitude of our will, our desires, our vices. Or laziness persuaded by vanity to deck itself out as morality. Or the appearance of a certainty, even a dreadful certainty, after the protracted tension and torture of uncertainty. Or the expression of ripeness and mastery in the midst of action, creation, endeavour, volition, a quiet breathing, 'freedom of will' attained.... Twilight of the Idols: who knows? perhaps that too is only a kind of 'peace of soul'...

4 – I formulate a principle. All naturalism in morality, that is all healthy morality, is dominated by an instinct of life – some commandment of life is fulfilled through a certain canon of 'shall' and 'shall not', some hindrance and hostile element on life's road is thereby removed. Anti-natural morality, that is virtually every morality that has hitherto been taught, revered and preached, turns on the contrary precisely against the instincts of life – it is a now secret, now loud and impudent condemnation of these instincts. By saying 'God sees into the heart' it denies the deepest and the highest desires of life and takes God for the enemy of life.... The saint in whom God takes pleasure is the ideal castrate.... Life is at an end where the 'kingdom of God' begins...

5 If one has grasped the blasphemousness of such a rebellion against life as has, in Christian morality, become virtually sacrosanct, one has fortunately therewith grasped something else as well: the uselessness, illusoriness, absurdity, falsity of such a rebellion. For a condemnation of life by the living is after all no more than the symptom of a certain kind of life: the question whether the condemnation is just or unjust has not been raised at all. One would have to be situated outside life, and on the other hand to know it as thoroughly as any, as many, as all who have experienced it, to be permitted to touch on the problem of the value of life at all: sufficient reason for understanding that this problem is for us an inaccessible problem. When we speak of values we do so under the inspiration and from the perspective of life: life itself evaluates through us when we establish values.... From this it follows that even that anti-nature of a morality which conceives God as the contrary concept to and condemnation of life is only a value judgement on the part of life – of what life? of what kind of life? – But I have already given the answer: of declining, debilitated, weary, condemned life. Morality as it has been understood hitherto – as it was ultimately formulated by Schopenhauer as 'denial of the will to life' – is the instinct of décadence itself, which makes out of itself an imperative: it says: 'Perish!' – it is the judgement of the judged...

6 Let us consider finally what naïvety it is to say 'man ought to be thus and thus!' Reality shows us an enchanting wealth of types, the luxuriance of a prodigal play and change of forms: and does some pitiful journeyman moralist say at the sight of it: 'No! man ought to be different'?... He even knows how man ought to be, this bigoted wretch; he paints himself on the wall and says 'ecce homo'!... But even when the moralist merely turns to the individual and says to him: ‘You ought to be thus and thus’ he does not cease to make himself ridiculous. The individual is, in his future and in his past, a piece of fate, one law more, one necessity more for everything that is and everything that will be. To say to him ‘change yourself’ means to demand that everything should change, even in the past.... And there have indeed been consistent moralists who wanted man to be different, namely virtuous, who wanted him in their own likeness, namely that of a bigot: to that end they denied the world! No mean madness! No modest presumption!... In so far as morality condemns as morality and not with regard to the aims and objects of life, it is a specific error with which one should show no sympathy, an idiosyncrasy of the degenerate which has caused an unspeakable amount of harm!... We others, we immoralists, have on the contrary opened wide our hearts to every kind of understanding, comprehension, approval. We do not readily deny, we seek our honour in affirming. We have come more and more to appreciate that economy which needs and knows how to use all that which the holy lunacy of the priest, the diseased reason of the priest rejects; that economy in the law of life which derives advantage even from the repellent species of the bigot, the priest, the virtuous man – what advantage? – But we ourselves, we immoralists, are the answer to that... The Four Great Errors 1 The error of confusing cause and consequence. – There is no more dangerous error than that of mistaking the consequence for the cause: I call it reason’s intrinsic form of corruption. None the less, this error is among the most ancient and most recent habits of mankind: it is even sanctified among us, it bears the names ‘religion’ and ‘morality’. Every proposition formulated by religion and morality contains it; priests and moral legislators are the authors of this corruption of reason. – I adduce an example. Everyone knows the book of the celebrated Cornaro in which he recommends his meagre diet as a recipe for a long and happy life – a virtuous one, too. Few books have been so widely read; even now many thousands of copies are printed in England every year. I do not doubt that hardly any book (the Bible rightly excepted) has done so much harm, has shortened so many lives, as this curiosity, which was so well meant. The reason: mistaking the consequence for the cause. The worthy Italian saw in his diet the cause of his long life: while the prerequisite of long life, an extraordinarily slow metabolism, a small consumption, was the cause of his meagre diet. He was not free to eat much or little as he chose, his frugality was not an act of ‘free will’: he became ill when he ate more. But if one is not a bony fellow of this sort one does not merely do well, one positively needs to eat properly. A scholar of our day, with his rapid consumption of nervous energy, would kill himself with Cornaro’s regimen. Credo experto. – 2 The most general formula at the basis of every religion and morality is: ‘Do this and this, refrain from this and this – and you will be happy! Otherwise....’ Every morality, every religion is this imperative – I call it the great original sin of reason, immortal unreason. In my mouth this formula is converted into its reverse – first example of my ‘revaluation of all values’: a well-constituted human being, a ‘happy one’, must perform certain actions and instinctively shrinks from other actions, he transports the order of which he is the physiological representative into his relations with other human beings and with things. In a formula: his virtue is the consequence of his happiness.... Long life, a plentiful posterity is not the reward of virtue, virtue itself is rather just that slowing down of the metabolism which also has, among other things, a long life, a plentiful posterity, in short Cornarism, as its outcome. – The Church and morality say: ‘A race, a people perishes through vice and luxury’. My restored reason says: when a people is perishing, degenerating physiologically, vice and luxury (that is to say the necessity for stronger and stronger and more and more frequent stimulants, such as every exhausted nature is acquainted with) follow therefrom. A young man grows prematurely pale and faded. His friends say: this and that illness is to blame. I say: that he became ill, that he failed to resist the illness, was already the consequence of an impoverished life, an hereditary exhaustion. The newspaper reader says: this party will ruin itself if it makes errors like this. My higher politics says: a party which makes errors like this is already finished – it is no longer secure in its instincts. Every error, of whatever kind, is a consequence of degeneration of instinct, disgregation of will: one has thereby virtually defined the bad. Everything good is instinct – and consequently easy, necessary, free. Effort is an objection, the god is typically distinguished from the hero (in my language: light feet are the first attribute of divinity). 3 The error of a false causality. – We have always believed we know what a cause is: but whence did we derive our knowledge, more precisely our belief we possessed this knowledge? From the realm of the celebrated ‘inner facts’, none of which has up till now been shown to be factual. We believed ourselves to be causal agents in the act of willing; we at least thought we were there catching causality in the act. It was likewise never doubted that all the antecedentia of an action, its causes, were to be sought in the consciousness and could be discovered there if one sought them – as ‘motives’: for otherwise one would not have been free to perform it, responsible for it. Finally, who would have disputed that a thought is caused? that the ego causes the thought?... Of these three ‘inner facts’ through which causality seemed to be guaranteed the first and most convincing was that of will as cause; the conception of a consciousness (‘mind’) as cause and later still that of the ego (the ‘subject’) as cause are merely after-products after causality had, on the basis of will, been firmly established as a given fact, as empiricism.... Meanwhile, we have thought better. Today we do not believe a word of it. The ‘inner world’ is full of phantoms and false lights: the will is one of them. The will no longer moves anything, consequently no longer explains anything – it merely accompanies events, it can also be absent. The so-called 'motive': another error. Merely a surface phenomenon of consciousness, an accompaniment to an act, which conceals rather than exposes the antecedentia of the act. And as for the ego! It has become a fable, a fiction, a play on words: it has totally ceased to think, to feel and to will!... What follows from this? There are no spiritual causes at all! The whole of the alleged empiricism which affirmed them has gone to the devil! That is what follows! – And we had made a nice misuse of that 'empiricism', we had created the world on the basis of it as a world of causes, as a world of will, as a world of spirit. The oldest and longest-lived psychology was at work here – indeed it has done nothing else: every event was to it an action, every action the effect of a will, the world became for it a multiplicity of agents, an agent ('subject') foisted itself upon every event. Man projected his three 'inner facts', that in which he believed more firmly than in anything else, will, spirit, ego, outside himself – he derived the concept 'being' only from the concept 'ego', he posited 'things' as possessing being according to his own image, according to his concept of the ego as cause. No wonder he later always discovered in things only that which he had put into them! –The thing itself, to say it again, the concept 'thing' is merely a reflection of the belief in the ego as cause. ... And even your atom, messieurs mechanists and physicists, how much error, how much rudimentary psychology, still remains in your atom! – To say nothing of the 'thing in itself',* that horrendum pudendum† of the metaphysicians! The error of spirit as cause mistaken for reality! And made the measure of reality! And called God! – 4 The error of imaginary causes. – To start from the dream: on to a certain sensation, the result for example of a distant cannon-shot, a cause is subsequently foisted (often a whole little novel in which precisely the dreamer is the chief character). The sensation, meanwhile, continues to persist, as a kind of resonance: it waits, as it were, until the cause-creating drive permits it to step into the foreground – now no longer as a chance occurrence but as 'meaning'. The cannon-shot enters in a causal way, in an apparent inversion of time. That which comes later, the motivation, is experienced first, often with a hundred details which pass like lightning, the shot follows.... What has happened? The ideas engendered by a certain condition have been misunderstood as the cause of that condition. – We do just the same thing, in fact, when we are awake. Most of our general feelings – every sort of restraint, pressure, tension, explosion in the play and counter-play of our organs, likewise and especially the condition of the nervus sympathicus – excite our cause-creating drive: we want to have a reason for feeling as we do – for feeling well or for feeling ill. It never suffices us simply to establish the mere fact that we feel as we do: we acknowledge this fact – become conscious of it – only when we have furnished it with a motivation of some kind. – The memory, which in such a case becomes active without our being aware of it, calls up earlier states of a similar kind and the causal interpretations which have grown out of them – not their causality. To be sure, the belief that these ideas, the accompanying occurrences in the consciousness, were causes is also brought up by the memory. Thus there arises an habituation to a certain causal interpretation which in truth obstructs and even prohibits an investigation of the cause. 5

Psychological explanation. – To trace something unknown back to something known is alleviating, soothing, gratifying and gives moreover a feeling of power. Danger, disquiet, anxiety attend the unknown – the first instinct is to eliminate these distressing states. First principle: any explanation is better than none. Because it is at bottom only a question of wanting to get rid of oppressive ideas, one is not exactly particular about what means one uses to get rid of them: the first idea which explains that the unknown is in fact the known does so much good that one ‘holds it for true’. Proof by pleasure (‘by potency’) as criterion of truth. – The cause-creating drive is thus conditioned and excited by the feeling of fear. The question ‘why?’ should furnish, if at all possible, not so much the cause for its own sake as a certain kind of cause – a soothing, liberating, alleviating cause. That something already known, experienced, inscribed in the memory is posited as cause is the first consequence of this need. The new, the unexperienced, the strange is excluded from being cause. – Thus there is sought not only some kind of explanation as cause, but a selected and preferred kind of explanation, the kind by means of which the feeling of the strange, new, unexperienced is most speedily and most frequently abolished – the most common explanations. – Consequence: a particular kind of cause-ascription comes to preponderate more and more, becomes concentrated into a system and finally comes to dominate over the rest, that is to say simply to exclude other causes and explanations. – The banker thinks at once of ‘business’, the Christian of ‘sin’, the girl of her love. 6 The entire realm of morality and religion falls under this concept of imaginary causes. – ‘Explanation’ of unpleasant general feelings. They arise from beings hostile to us (evil spirits: most celebrated case – hysterics misunderstood as witches). They arise from actions we cannot approve of (the feeling of ‘sin’, of ‘culpability’ foisted upon a physiological discomfort – one always finds reasons for being discontented with oneself). They arise as punishments, as payment for something we should not have done, should not have been (generalized in an impudent form by Schopenhauer into a proposition in which morality appears for what it is, the actual poisoner and calumniator of life: ‘Every great pain, whether physical or mental, declares what it is we deserve; for it could not have come upon us if we had not deserved it.’ World as Will and Idea II 666). They arise as the consequences of rash actions which have turned out badly (– the emotions, the senses assigned as ‘cause’, as ‘to blame’; physiological states of distress construed, with the aid of other states of distress, as ‘deserved’). – ‘Explanation’ of pleasant general feelings. They arise from trust in God. They arise from the consciousness of good actions (the so-called ‘good conscience’, a physiological condition sometimes so like a sound digestion as to be mistaken for it). They arise from the successful outcome of undertakings (– naïve fallacy: the successful outcome of an undertaking certainly does not produce any pleasant general feelings in a hypochondriac or a Pascal). They arise from faith, hope and charity – the Christian virtues. – In reality all these supposed explanations are consequential states and as it were translations of pleasurable and unpleasurable feelings into a false dialect: one is in a state in which one can experience hope because the physiological basic feeling is once more strong and ample; one trusts in God because the feeling of plenitude and strength makes one calm. – Morality and religion fall entirely under the psychology of error: in every single case cause is mistaken for effect; or the effect of what is believed true is mistaken for the truth; or a state of consciousness is mistaken for the causation of this state. 7 The error of free will. – We no longer have any sympathy today with the concept of ‘free will’: we know only too well what it is – the most infamous of all the arts of the theologian for making mankind ‘accountable’ in his sense of the word, that is to say for making mankind dependent on him.... I give here only the psychology of making men accountable. – Everywhere accountability is sought, it is usually the instinct for punishing and judging which seeks it. One has deprived becoming of its innocence if being in this or that state is traced back to will, to intentions, to accountable acts: the doctrine of will has been invented essentially for the purpose of punishment, that is of finding guilty. The whole of the old-style psychology, the psychology of will, has as its precondition the desire of its authors, the priests at the head of the ancient communities, to create for themselves a right to ordain punishments – or their desire to create for God a right to do so.... Men were thought of as ‘free’ so that they could become guilty: consequently, every action had to be thought of as willed, the origin of every action as lying in the consciousness (– whereby the most fundamental falsification in psychology was made into the very principle of psychology).... Today, when we have started to move in the reverse direction, when we immoralists especially are trying with all our might to remove the concept of guilt and the concept of punishment from the world and to purge psychology, history, nature, the social institutions and sanctions of them, there is in our eyes no more radical opposition than that of the theologians, who continue to infect the innocence of becoming with ‘punishment’ and ‘guilt’ by means of the concept of the ‘moral world-order’. Christianity is a hangman’s metaphysics... 8 What alone can our teaching be? – That no one gives a human being his qualities: not God, not society, not his parents or ancestors, not he himself (– the nonsensical idea here last rejected was propounded, as ‘intelligible freedom’, by Kant, and perhaps also by Plato before him). No one is accountable for existing at all, or for being constituted as he is, or for living in the circumstances and surroundings in which he lives. The fatality of his nature cannot be disentangled from the fatality of all that which has been and will be. He is not the result of a special design, a will, a purpose; he is not the subject of an attempt to attain to an 'ideal of man' or an 'ideal of happiness' or an 'ideal of morality' – it is absurd to want to hand over his nature to some purpose or other. We invented the concept 'purpose': in reality purpose is lacking.... One is necessary, one is a piece of fate, one belongs to the whole, one is in the whole – there exists nothing which could judge, measure, compare, condemn our being, for that would be to judge, measure, compare, condemn the whole.... But nothing exists apart from the whole! – That no one is any longer made accountable, that the kind of being manifested cannot be traced back to a causa prima that the world is a unity neither as sensorium nor as 'spirit', this alone is the great liberation – thus alone is the innocence of becoming restored.... The concept 'God' has hitherto been the greatest objection to existence.... We deny God; in denying God, we deny accountability: only by doing that do we redeem the world. – The 'Improvers' of Mankind 1 One knows my demand of philosophers that they place themselves beyond good and evil – that they have the illusion of moral judgement beneath them. This demand follows from an insight first formulated by me: that there are no moral facts whatever. Moral judgement has this in common with religious judgement that it believes in realities which do not exist. Morality is only an interpretation of certain phenomena, more precisely a misinterpretation. Moral judgement belongs, as does religious judgement, to a level of ignorance at which even the concept of the real, the distinction between the real and the imaginary, is lacking: so that at such a level 'truth' denotes nothing but things which we today call 'imaginings'. To this extent moral judgement is never to be taken literally: as such it never contains anything but nonsense. But as semeiotics it remains of incalculable value: it reveals, to the informed man at least, the most precious realities of cultures and inner worlds which did not know enough to 'understand' themselves. Morality is merely signlanguage, merely symptomatology: one must already know what it is about to derive profit from it. 2 A first example, merely as an introduction. In all ages one has wanted to 'improve' men: this above all is what morality has meant. But one word can conceal the most divergent tendencies. Both the taming of the beast man and the breeding of a certain species of man has been called 'improvement': only these zoological termini express realities – realities, to be sure, of which the typical 'improver', the priest, knows nothing – wants to know nothing.... To call the taming of an animal its 'improvement' is in our ears almost a joke. Whoever knows what goes on in menageries is doubtful whether the beasts in them are 'improved'. They are weakened, they are made less harmful, they become sickly beasts through the depressive emotion of fear, through pain, through injuries, through hunger. – It is no different with the tamed human being whom the priest has ‘improved’. In the early Middle Ages, when the Church was in fact above all a menagerie, one everywhere hunted down the fairest specimens of the ‘blond beast’ – one ‘improved’, for example, the noble Teutons. But what did such a Teuton afterwards look like when he had been ‘improved’ and led into a monastery? Like a caricature of a human being, like an abortion: he had become a ‘sinner’, he was in a cage, one had imprisoned him behind nothing but sheer terrifying concepts.... There he lay now, sick, miserable, filled with ill-will towards himself; full of hatred for the impulses towards life, full of suspicion of all that was still strong and happy. In short, a ‘Christian’.... In physiological terms: in the struggle with the beast, making it sick can be the only means of making it weak. This the Church understood: it corrupted the human being, it weakened him – but it claimed to have ‘improved’ him... 3 Let us take the other aspect of so-called morality, the breeding of a definite race and species. The most grandiose example of this is provided by Indian morality, sanctioned, as the ‘Law of Manu’, into religion. Here the proposed task is to breed no fewer than four races simultaneously: a priestly, a warrior, and a trading and farming race, and finally a menial race, the Sudras. Here we are manifestly no longer among animal-tamers: a species of human being a hundred times more gentle and rational is presupposed even to conceive the plan of such a breeding. One draws a breath of relief when coming out of the Christian sick-house and dungeon atmosphere into this healthier, higher, wider world. How paltry the ‘New Testament’ is compared with Manu, how ill it smells! – But this organization too needed to be dreadful – this time in struggle not with the beast but with its antithesis, with the non-bred human being, the hotchpotch human being, the Chandala.* And again it had no means of making him weak and harmless other than making him sick – it was the struggle with the ‘great majority’. Perhaps there is nothing which outrages our feelings more than these protective measures of Indian morality. The third edict, for example (Avadana-Shastra I), that ‘concerning unclean vegetables’, ordains that the only nourishment permitted the Chandala shall be garlic and onions, in view of the fact that holy scripture forbids one to give them corn or seed-bearing fruits or water or fire. The same edict lays it down that the water they need must not be taken from rivers or springs or pools, but only from the entrances to swamps and holes made by the feet of animals. They are likewise forbidden to wash their clothes or to wash themselves, since the water allowed them as an act of charity must be used only for quenching the thirst. Finally, the Sudra women are forbidden to assist the Chandala women in childbirth, and the latter are likewise forbidden to assist one another.... – The harvest of such hygienic regulations did not fail to appear: murderous epidemics, hideous venereal diseases and, as a consequence, ‘the law of the knife’ once more, ordaining circumcision for the male and removal of the labia minora for the female children. – Manu himself says: ‘The Chandala are the fruit of adultery, incest and crime’ (– this being the necessary consequence of the concept ‘breeding’). ‘They shall have for clothing only rags from corpses, for utensils broken pots, for ornaments old iron, for worship only evil spirits; they shall wander from place to place without rest. They are forbidden to write from left to right and to use the right hand for writing: the employment of the right hand and of the left-to-right motion is reserved for the virtuous, for people of race.’ – 4 These regulations are instructive enough: in them we find for once Aryan humanity, quite pure, quite primordial – we learn that the concept ‘pure blood’ is the opposite of a harmless concept. It becomes clear, on the other hand, in which people the hatred, the Chandala hatred for this ‘humanity’ has been immortalized, where it has become religion, where it has become genius.... From this point of view, the Gospels are documents of the first rank; the Book of Enoch even more so. – Christianity, growing from Jewish roots and comprehensible only as a product of this soil,* represents the reaction against that morality of breeding, of race, of privilege – it is the anti-Aryan religion par excellence: Christianity the revaluation of all Aryan values, the victory of Chandala values, the evangel preached to the poor and lowly, the collective rebellion of everything downtrodden, wretched, illconstituted, under-privileged against the ‘race’ – undying Chandala revenge as the religion of love... 5 The morality of breeding and the morality of taming are, in the means they employ to attain their ends, entirely worthy of one another: we may set down as our chief proposition that to make morality one must have the unconditional will to the contrary. This is the great, the uncanny problem which I have pursued furthest: the psychology of the ‘improvers’ of mankind. A small and really rather modest fact, that of so-called pia fraus,† gave me my first access to this problem: pia fraus, the heritage of all philosophers and priests who have ‘improved’ mankind. Neither Manu nor Plato, neither Confucius nor the Jewish and Christian teachers, ever doubted their right to tell lies. Nor did they doubt their possession of other rights.... Expressed in a formula one might say: every means hitherto employed with the intention of making mankind moral has been thoroughly immoral. – What the Germans Lack 1 Among Germans today it is not enough to possess spirit: one must also possess the presumption to possess it... Perhaps I know the Germans, perhaps I might even venture to address a few words to them. The new Germany represents a great quantity of inherited and inculcated ability, so that it may for a time be allowed even a lavish expenditure of its accumulated store of energy. It is not a high culture that has here gained ascendancy, even less a fastidious taste, a noble ‘beauty’ of the instincts, but more manly virtues than any other country of Europe can exhibit. A good deal of courage and respect for oneself, a good deal of self-confidence in social dealings and in the performance of reciprocal duties, a good deal of industriousness, a good deal of endurance – and an inherited moderation which requires the goad rather than the brake. I also add that here people can still obey without being humiliated by obeying.... And no one despises his adversary... You will see I want to be just to the Germans: I would not like to be untrue to myself in this – so I must also tell them what I object to. Coming to power is a costly business: power makes stupid.... The Germans – once they were called the nation of thinkers: do they still think at all? Nowadays the Germans are bored with intellect, the Germans mistrust intellect, politics devours all seriousness for really intellectual things – Deutschland, Deutschland über alles was, I fear, the end of German philosophy.... ‘Are there any German philosophers? are there any German poets? are there any good German books?’ – people ask me abroad. I blush; but with the courage which is mine even in desperate cases I answer: ‘Yes, Bismarck!’ – Dare I go so far as to confess which books are read nowadays?... Confounded instinct of mediocrity! – 2 – Who has not pondered sadly over what the German spirit could be! But this nation has deliberately made itself stupid, for practically a thousand years: nowhere else are the two great European narcotics, alcohol and Christianity, so viciously abused. Lately even a third has been added, one which is capable by itself of completely obstructing all delicate and audacious flexibility of spirit: music, our constipated, constipating German music. – How much dreary heaviness, lameness, dampness, sloppiness, how much beer there is in the German intellect! How can it possibly happen that young men who dedicate their existence to the most spiritual goals lack all sense of the first instinct of spirituality, the spirit’s instinct for self-preservation – and drink beer?... The alcoholism of scholarly youth perhaps does not constitute a question mark in regard to their erudition – one can be even a great scholar without possessing any spirit at all – but from any other point of view it remains a problem. – Where does one not find that bland degeneration which beer produces in the spirit! Once, in a case that has become almost famous, I laid my finger on such an instance of degeneration – the degeneration of our first German freethinker, the shrewd David Strauss, into the author of an alehouse gospel and a ‘new faith’.... It was no vain vow he made in verse to the ‘gracious brunette’* – fidelity unto death... 3 – I have said of the German spirit that it is growing coarser, that it is growing shallow. Is that sufficient? – Fundamentally, it is something quite different which appals me: how German seriousness, German profundity, German passion in spiritual things is more and more on the decline. It is the pathos and not merely the intellectual aspect which has altered. – I come in contact now and then with German universities: what an atmosphere prevails among its scholars, what a barren spirituality, grown how contented and lukewarm! It would be a profound misunderstanding to adduce German science as an objection here, as well as being proof one had not read a word I have written. For seventeen years I have not wearied of exposing the despiritualizing influence of our contemporary scientific pursuits. The harsh Helot condition to which the tremendous extent of science has condemned every single person today is one of the main reasons why education and educators appropriate to fuller, richer, deeper natures are no longer forthcoming. Our culture suffers from nothing more than it suffers from the superabundance of presumptuous journeymen and fragments of humanity; our universities are, against their will, the actual forcing-houses for this kind of spiritual instinct-atrophy. And all Europe already has an idea of this – grand politics deceives no one.... Germany counts more and more as Europe's flatland. – I am still looking for a German with whom I could be serious after my fashion – how much more for one with whom I might be cheerful! – Twilight of the Idols: ah, who today could grasp from how profound a seriousness a hermit is here relaxing! – The most incomprehensible thing about us is our cheerfulness... 4 If one makes a reckoning, it is obvious not only that German culture is declining, the sufficient reason* for it is obvious too. After all, no one can spend more than he has – that is true of individuals, it is also true of nations. If one spends oneself on power, grand politics, economic affairs, world commerce, parliamentary institutions, military interests – if one expends in this direction the quantum of reason, seriousness, will, self-overcoming that one is, then there will be a shortage in the other direction. Culture and the state – one should not deceive oneself over this – are antagonists: the 'cultural state' is merely a modern idea. The one lives off the other, the one thrives at the expense of the other. All great cultural epochs are epochs of political decline: that which is great in the cultural sense has been unpolitical, even anti-political.... Goethe's heart opened up at the phenomenon Napoleon – it closed up to the 'Wars of Liberation'.... The moment Germany rises as a great power, France gains a new importance as a cultural power. A great deal of current spiritual seriousness and passion has already emigrated to Paris; the question of pessimism, for instance, the Wagner question, virtually every psychological and artistic question, is speculated on with incomparably more subtlety and thoroughness there than in Germany – the Germans are even incapable of this kind of seriousness. – In the history of European culture the rise of the 'Reich' signifies one thing above all: a displacement of the centre of gravity. The fact is known everywhere: in the main thing – and that is still culture – the Germans no longer come into consideration. The question is asked: haven't you so much as one spirit who means something to Europe? in the way your Goethe, your Hegel, your Heinrich Heine, your Schopenhauer meant something? That there is no longer a single German philosopher – there is no end of astonishment at that. – 5 The essential thing has gone out of the entire system of higher education in Germany: the end, as well as the means to the end. That education, culture, itself is the end – and not 'the Reich' – that educators are required for the attainment of this end – and not grammar-school teachers and university scholars – that too has been forgotten.... There is a need for educators who are themselves educated; superior, noble spirits, who prove themselves every moment by what they say and by what they do not say: cultures grown ripe and sweet – and not the learned boors which grammar school and university offer youth today as ‘higher nurses’. Educators, the first prerequisite of education, are lacking (except for the exceptions of exceptions): hence the decline of German culture. – One of those rarest of exceptions is my honoured friend Jacob Burckhardt of Basel: it is to him above all that Basel owes its pre-eminence in the humanities. – What the ‘higher schools’ of Germany in fact achieve is a brutal breaking-in with the aim of making, in the least possible time, numberless young men fit to be utilized, utilized to the full and used up, in the state service. ‘Higher education’ and numberless – that is a contradiction to start with. All higher education belongs to the exceptions alone: one must be privileged to have a right to so high a privilege. Great and fine things can never be common property: pulchrum est paucorum hominum.^{*} – What is the cause of the decline of German culture? That ‘higher education’ is no longer a privilege – the democratism of ‘culture’ made ‘universal’ and common.... Not to overlook the fact that military privileges absolutely compel too great attendance at higher schools, which means their ruin. – No one is any longer free in present-day Germany to give his children a noble education: our ‘higher’ schools are one and all adjusted – as regards their teachers, their curricula and their instructional aims – to the most dubious mediocrity. And there reigns everywhere an indecent haste, as if something has been neglected if the young man of twenty-three is not yet ‘finished and ready’, does not yet know the answer to the ‘chief question’: which calling? – A higher kind of human being, excuse me for saying, doesn’t think much of ‘callings’, the reason being he knows himself called.... He takes his time, he has plenty of time, he gives no thought whatsoever to being ‘finished and ready’ – at the age of thirty one is, as regards high culture, a beginner, a child. – Our overcrowded grammar schools, our overloaded, stupified grammar-school teachers, are a scandal: one may perhaps have motives for defending this state of things, as the professors of Heidelberg recently did – there are no grounds for doing so. ⁶ To be true to my nature, which is affirmative and has dealings with contradiction and criticism only indirectly and when compelled, I shall straightaway set down the three tasks for the sake of which one requires educators. One has to learn to see, one has to learn to think, one has to learn to speak and write: the end in all three is a noble culture. – Learning to see – habituating the eye to repose, to patience, to letting things come to it; learning to defer judgement, to investigate and comprehend the individual case in all its aspects. This is the first preliminary schooling in spirituality: not to react immediately to a stimulus, but to have the restraining, stock-taking instincts in one’s control. Learning to see, as I understand it, is almost what is called in unphilo-sophical language ‘strong will-power’: the essence of it is precisely not to ‘will’, the ability to defer decision. All unspirituality, all vulgarity, is due to the incapacity to resist a stimulus – one has to react, one obeys every impulse. In many instances, such a compulsion is already morbidity, decline, a symptom of exhaustion – almost everything which unphilosophical crudity designates by the name ‘vice’ is merely this physiological incapacity not to react – A practical application of having learned to see: one will have become slow, mistrustful, resistant as a learner in general. In an attitude of hostile calm one will allow the strange, the novel of every kind to approach one first – one will draw one’s hand back from it. To stand with all doors open, to prostrate oneself submissively before every petty fact, to be ever itching to mingle with, plunge into other people and other things, in short our celebrated modern ‘objectivity’, is bad taste, is ignoble par excellence. – 7 Learning to think: our schools no longer have any idea what this means. Even in our universities, even among students of philosophy themselves, the theory, the practice, the vocation of logic is beginning to die out. Read German books: no longer the remotest recollection that a technique, a plan of instruction, a will to mastery is required for thinking – that thinking has to be learned in the way dancing has to be learned, as a form of dancing.... Who among Germans still knows from experience that subtle thrill which the possession of intellectual light feet communicates to all the muscles! – A stiffly awkward air in intellectual matters, a clumsy hand in grasping – this is in so great a degree German that foreigners take it for the German nature in general. The German has no fingers for nuances.... That the Germans have so much as endured their philosophers, above all that most deformed conceptual cripple there has ever been, the great Kant, offers a good idea of German amenableness. For dancing in any form cannot be divorced from a noble education, being able to dance with the feet, with concepts, with words: do I still have to say that one has to be able to dance with the pen – that writing has to be learned? – But at this point I should become a complete enigma to German readers... Expeditions of an Untimely Man 1 My impossibles. – Seneca: or the toreador of virtue. – Rousseau: or the return to nature in *impuris naturalibus – Schiller: or the Moral-Trumpeter of Säckingen.† – Dante: or the hyena which poetises on graves. – Kant: or cant as intelligible character. – Victor Hugo: or the Pharos in the Sea of Absurdity. – Liszt: or the virtuoso – with women.‡ – George Sand: or lactea ubertas,§ in English: the milch cow with the ‘fine style’. – Michelet: or enthusiasm which strips off the jacket. – Carlyle: or pessimism as indigestion. – John Stuart Mill: or offensive clarity. – Les frères de Goncourt: or the two Ajaxes struggling with Homer. Music by Offenbach. Zola: or ‘delight in stinking’. – 2 Renan. – Theology, or the corruption of reason by ‘original sin’ (Christianity). Witness: Renan, who, whenever he risks a more general Yes or No, misses the point with painful regularity. He would like, for instance, to couple together la science and la noblesse; but la science belongs to democracy, that is patently obvious. He desires, with no little ambitiousness, to represent an aristocratism of the intellect: but at the same time he falls on his knees, and not only his knees, before its opposite, the évangile des humbles.... What avails all free thinking, modernity, mockery and wry-necked flexibility, if one is still Christian, Catholic and even priest in one's bowels! Renan possesses his mode of inventiveness, just like a Jesuit or a father confessor, in devising means of seduction; his intellectuality does not lack the broad priestly smirk – like all priests, he becomes dangerous only when he loves. Nobody can equal him in deadly adoration.... This spirit of Renan, an enervating spirit, is one fatality more for poor, sick, feeble-willed France. – 3 Sainte-Beuve. – Nothing masculine in him; full of petty sullen wrath against all masculine spirit. Roams about, delicate, inquisitive, bored, eavesdropping – fundamentally a woman, with a woman's revengefulness and a woman's sensuousness. As psychologist a genius of, médiance;* inexhaustibly rich in means for creating it; no one knows better how to mix poison with praise. Plebeian in the lowest instincts and related to Rousseau's ressentiment: consequently a romantic – for beneath all romantisme there grunts and thirsts Rousseau's instinct for revenge. A revolutionary, but kept tolerably in check by fear. Constrained in presence of everything possessing strength (public opinion, the Academy, the Court, even PortRoyal).† Embittered against all that is great in men and things, against all that believes in itself. Enough of a poet and semi-woman to feel greatness as power; constantly cringing, like the celebrated worm, because he constantly feels himself trodden on. As a critic without standards, steadiness or backbone, possessing the palate for a large variety of things of the cosmopolitan libertin but lacking the courage even to admit his libertinage. As a historian without philosophy, without the power of philosophical vision – for that reason rejecting, in all the main issues, the task of passing judgement, holding up 'objectivity' as a mask. He comports himself differently, however, towards questions in which a delicate, experienced taste is the highest court of appeal: there he really does have the courage for himself, takes pleasure in himself – there he is a master. – In some respects a preliminary form of Baudelaire. – 4 *The Imitatio Christi is one of the books I cannot hold in my hand without experiencing a physiological resistance: it exhales a parfum of the 'eternal feminine'† for which one has to be French – or a Wagnerian.... This saint has a way of talking about love that makes even Parisiennes curious. – I am told that cunningest of Jesuits, A. Comte, who wanted to lead his Frenchmen to Rome via the détour of science, inspired himself with this book. I believe it: 'the religion of the heart'... 5 G. Eliot. – They have got rid of the Christian God, and now feel obliged to cling all the more firmly to Christian morality: that is English consistency, let us not blame it on little bluestockings à la Eliot. In England, in response to every little emancipation from theology one has to reassert one's position in a fear-inspiring manner as a moral fanatic. That is the penance one pays there. – With us it is different. When one gives up Christian belief one thereby deprives oneself of the right to Christian morality. For the latter is absolutely not self-evident: one must make this point clear again and again, in spite of English shallowpates. Christianity is a system, a consistently thought out and complete view of things. If one breaks out of it a fundamental idea, the belief in God, one thereby breaks the whole thing to pieces: one has nothing of any consequence left in one's hands. Christianity presupposes that man does not know, cannot know what is good for him and what evil: he believes in God, who alone knows. Christian morality is a command: its origin is transcendental; it is beyond all criticism, all right to criticize; it possesses truth only if God is truth – it stands or falls with the belief in God. – If the English really do believe they will know, of their own accord, 'intuitively', what is good and evil; if they consequently think they no longer have need of Christianity as a guarantee of morality; that is merely the consequence of the ascendancy of Christian evaluation and an expression of the strength and depth of this ascendancy: so that the origin of English morality has been forgotten, so that the highly conditional nature of its right to exist is no longer felt. For the Englishman morality is not yet a problem... 6 George Sand. – I have read the first Lettres d'un voyageur: like everything deriving from Rousseau false, artificial, fustian, exaggerated. I cannot endure this colouredwallpaper style; nor the vulgar ambition to possess generous feelings. The worst, to be sure, is the female coquetting with male mannerisms, with the manners of illbred boys. – How cold she must have been withal, this insupportable authoress! She wound herself up like a clock – and wrote.... Cold, like Hugo, like Balzac, like all Romantics as soon as they started writing! And how complacently she liked to lie there, this prolific writing-cow, who had something German in the bad sense about her, like Rousseau her master, and who was in any case possible only with the decline of French taste! – But Renan respects her... 7 Moral code for psychologists. – No colportage psychology! Never observe for the sake of observing! That produces a false perspective, a squint, something forced and exaggerated. To experience from a desire to experience – that's no good. In experiencing, one must not look back towards oneself, or every glance becomes an 'evil eye'. A born psychologist instinctively guards against seeing for the sake of seeing; the same applies to the born painter. He never works 'from nature' – he leaves it to his instinct, his camera obscura, to sift and strain 'nature', the 'case', the 'experience'.... He is conscious only of the universal, the conclusion, the outcome: he knows nothing of that arbitrary abstraction from the individual case. – What will be the result if one does otherwise? Carries on colportage psychology in, for example, the manner of Parisian romanciers great and small? It is that sort of thing which as it were lies in wait for reality, which brings a handful of curiosities home each evening.... But just see what finally emerges – a pile of daubs, a mosaic at best, in any event something put together, restless, flashy. The worst in this kind is achieved by the Goncourts: they never put three sentences together which are not simply painful to the eye, the psychologist's eye. – Nature, artistically considered, is no model. It exaggerates, it distorts, it leaves gaps. Nature is chance. To study 'from nature' seems to me a bad sign: it betrays subjection, weakness, fatalism – this lying in the dust before petits faits is unworthy of a complete artist. Seeing what is – that pertains to a different species of spirit, the anti-artistic, the prosaic. One has to know who one is... 8 Towards a psychology of the artist. – For art to exist, for any sort of aesthetic activity or perception to exist, a certain physiological precondition is indispensable: intoxication. Intoxication must first have heightened the excitability of the entire machine: no art results before that happens. All kinds of intoxication, however different their origin, have the power to do this: above all, the intoxication of sexual excitement, the oldest and most primitive form of intoxication. Likewise the intoxication which comes in the train of all great desires, all strong emotions; the intoxication of feasting, of contest, of the brave deed, of victory, of all extreme agitation; the intoxication of cruelty; intoxication in destruction; intoxication under certain meteorological influences, for example the intoxication of spring; or under the influence of narcotics; finally the intoxication of the will, the intoxication of an overloaded and distended will. – The essence of intoxication is the feeling of plenitude and increased energy. From out of this feeling one gives to things, one compels them to take, one rapes them – one calls this procedure idealizing. Let us get rid of a prejudice here: idealization does not consist, as is commonly believed, in a subtracting or deducting of the petty and secondary. A tremendous expulsion of the principal features rather is the decisive thing, so that thereupon the others too disappear. 9 In this condition one enriches everything out of one's own abundance: what one sees, what one desires, one sees swollen, pressing, strong, overladen with energy. The man in this condition transforms things until they mirror his power – until they are reflections of his perfection. This compulsion to transform into the perfect is – art. Even all that which he is not becomes for him none the less part of his joy in himself; in art, man takes delight in himself as perfection. – It would be permissible to imagine an antithetical condition, a specific anti-artisticity of instinct – a mode of being which impoverishes and attenuates things and makes them consumptive. And history is in fact rich in such anti-artists, in such starvelings of life, who necessarily have to take things to themselves, impoverish them, make them leaner. This is, for example, the case with the genuine Christian, with Pascal for example: a Christian who is at the same time an artist does not exist.... Let no one be childish and cite Raphael as an objection, or some homoeopathic Christian of the nineteenth century: Raphael said Yes, Raphael did Yes, consequently Raphael was not a Christian... 10 What is the meaning of the antithetical concepts Apollinian and Dionysian, both conceived as forms of intoxication, which I introduced into aesthetics? – Apollinian intoxication alerts above all the eye, so that it acquires power of vision. The painter, the sculptor, the epic poet are visionaries par excellence. In the Dionysian state, on the other hand, the entire emotional system is alerted and intensified: so that it discharges all its powers of representation, imitation, transfiguration, transmutation, every kind of mimicry and playacting, conjointly. The essential thing remains the facility of the metamorphosis, the incapacity not to react (– in a similar way to certain types of hysteric, who also assume any role at the slightest instigation). It is impossible for the Dionysian man not to understand any suggestion of whatever kind, he ignores no signal from the emotions, he possesses to the highest degree the instinct for understanding and divining, just as he possesses the art of communication to the highest degree. He enters into every skin, into every emotion; he is continually transforming himself. – Music, as we understand it today, is likewise a collective arousal and discharging of the emotions, but for all that only a vestige of a much fuller emotional world of expression, a mere residuum of Dionysian histrionicism. To make music possible as a separate art one had to immobilize a number of senses, above all the muscular sense (at least relatively: for all rhythm still speaks to our muscles to a certain extent): so that man no longer straightway imitates and represents bodily everything he feels. None the less, that is the true Dionysian normal condition, at least its original condition: music is the gradually-achieved specialization of this at the expense of the most closely related faculties. 11 The actor, the mime, the dancer, the musician, the lyric poet are fundamentally related in their instincts and essentially one, only gradually specialized and separated from one another – even to the point of opposition. The lyric poet stayed united longest with the musician, the actor with the dancer. – The architect represents neither a Dionysian nor an Apollinian condition: here it is the mighty act of will, the will which moves mountains, the intoxication of the strong will, which demands artistic expression. The most powerful men have always inspired the architects; the architect has always been influenced by power. Pride, victory over weight and gravity, the will to power, seek to render themselves visible in a building; architecture is a kind of rhetoric of power, now persuasive, even cajoling in form, now bluntly imperious. The highest feeling of power and security finds expression in that which possesses grand style. Power which no longer requires proving; which disdains to please; which is slow to answer; which is conscious of no witness around it; which lives oblivious of the existence of any opposition; which reposes in itself, fatalistic, a law among laws: that is what speaks of itself in the form of grand style. – 12 I have read the life of Thomas Carlyle, that unwitting and involuntary farce, that heroical-moralistical interpretation of dyspepsia. – Carlyle, a man of strong words and attitudes, a rhetorician from necessity, continually agitated by the desire for a strong faith and the feeling of incapacity for it (– in this a typical Romantic!) The desire for a strong faith is not the proof of a strong faith, rather the opposite. If one has it one may permit oneself the beautiful luxury of scepticism: one is secure enough, firm enough, fixed enough for it. Carlyle deafens something within him by the fortissimo of his reverence for men of strong faith and by his rage against the less single-minded: he requires noise. A continual passionate dishonesty towards himself – that is his proprium, because of that he is and will remain interesting. – To be sure, in England he is admired precisely on account of his honesty.... Well, that is English; and, considering the English are the nation of consummate cant, even appropriate and not merely understandable. Fundamentally, Carlyle is an English atheist who wants to be honoured for not being one. 13 Emerson. – Much more enlightened, adventurous, multifarious, refined than Carlyle; above all, happier.... Such a man as instinctively feeds on pure ambrosia and leaves alone the indigestible in things. Compared with Carlyle a man of taste. – Carlyle, who had a great affection for him, nevertheless said of him: ‘He does not give us enough to bite on’: which may be truly said, but not to the detriment of Emerson. – Emerson possesses that good-natured and quickwitted cheerfulness that discourages all earnestness; he has absolutely no idea how old he is or how young he will be – he could say of himself, in the words of Lope de Vega: ‘yo me sucedo a mi mismo’.* His spirit is always finding reasons for being contented and even grateful; and now and then he verges on the cheerful transcendence of that worthy gentleman who, returning from an amorous rendezvous tamquam re bene gesta, said gratefully: ‘Ut desint vires, tamen est laudanda voluptas. ‘† 14 Anti-Darwin. – As regards the celebrated ‘struggle for life’, it seems to me for the present to have been rather asserted than proved. It does occur, but as the exception; the general aspect of life is not hunger and distress, but rather wealth, luxury, even absurd prodigality – where there is a struggle it is a struggle for power.... One should not mistake Malthus for nature. – Supposing, however, that this struggle exists – and it does indeed occur – its outcome is the reverse of that desired by the school of Darwin, of that which one ought perhaps to desire with them: namely, the defeat of the stronger, the more privileged, the fortunate exceptions. Species do not grow more perfect: the weaker dominate the strong again and again – the reason being they are the great majority, and they are also cleverer.... Darwin forgot the mind (– that is English!): the weak possess more mind.... To acquire mind one must need mind – one loses it when one no longer needs it. He who possesses strength divests himself of mind (– ‘let it depart!’ they think today in Germany, ‘– the Reich will still be ours.’...)* One will see that under mind I include foresight, patience, dissimulation, great self-control, and all that is mimicry (this last includes a great part of what is called virtue). 15

Psychologist's casuistry. This man is a human psychologist: what does he really study men for? He wants to gain little advantages over them, or big ones too – he is a politician!... This other man is also a human psychologist: and you say he wants nothing for himself, that he is 'impersonal'. Take a closer look! Perhaps he wants an even worse advantage: to feel himself superior to men, to have the right to look down on them, no longer to confuse himself with them. This 'impersonal' man is a despiser of men: and the former is a more humane species, which may even be clear from his appearance. At least he thinks himself equal to others, he involves himself with others... 16 The psychological taste of the Germans seems to me to be called in question by a whole series of instances which modesty forbids me to enumerate. There is one instance, however, which offers me a grand opportunity for establishing my thesis: I bear the Germans a grudge for their having blundered over Kant and his 'backdoor philosophy', as I call it – this was not the pattern of intellectual integrity. – Another thing I loathe to hear is an infamous 'and': the Germans say 'Goethe and Schiller' – I am afraid they say 'Schiller and Goethe'.... Don't people know this Schiller yet? – There are even worse 'ands'; I have heard 'Schopenhauer and Hartmann' with my own ears, though only among university professors, admittedly... 17 The most spiritual human beings, assuming they are the most courageous, also by experience by far the most painful tragedies: but it is precisely for this reason that they honour life, because it brings against them its most formidable weapons. 18 On the subject of 'intellectual conscience'. – Nothing seems to me to be rarer today than genuine hypocrisy. I greatly suspect that this plant finds the mild atmosphere of our culture unendurable. Hypocrisy has its place in the ages of strong belief: in which even when one is compelled to exhibit a different belief one does not abandon the belief one already has. Today one does abandon it; or, which is even more common, one acquires a second belief – one remains honest in any event. Beyond doubt, a very much larger number of convictions are possible today, than formerly: possible, that means permitted, that means harmless. That is the origin of self-tolerance. – Self-tolerance permits one to possess several convictions; these conciliate one another – they take care, as all the world does today, not to compromise themselves. How does one compromise oneself today? By being consistent. By going in a straight line. By being less than ambiguous. By being genuine.... I greatly fear that modern man is simply too indolent for certain vices: so that they are actually dying out. All evil which is dependent on strong will – and perhaps there is nothing evil without strength of will – is degenerating, in our tepid atmosphere, into virtue.... The few hypocrites I have known impersonated hypocrisy: they were, like virtually every tenth man nowadays, actors. – 19 Beautiful and ugly.* – Nothing is so conditional, let us say circumscribed, as our feeling for the beautiful. Anyone who tried to divorce it from man's pleasure in man would at once find the ground give way beneath him. The 'beautiful in itself' is not even a concept, merely a phrase. In the beautiful, man sets himself up as the standard of perfection; in select cases he worships himself in it. A species cannot do otherwise than affirm itself alone in this manner. Its deepest instinct, that of selfpreservation and self-aggrandizement, is still visible in such sublimated forms. Man believes that the world itself is filled with beauty – he forgets that it is he who has created it. He alone has bestowed beauty upon the world – alas! only a very human, all too human beauty.... Man really mirrors himself in things, that which give him back his own reflection he considers beautiful: the judgement 'beautiful' is his conceit of his species.... For a tiny suspicion whispers into the sceptic's ear: is the world actually made beautiful because man finds it so? Man has humanized the world: that is all. But there is nothing, absolutely nothing, to guarantee to us that man constitutes the model for the beautiful. Who knows what figure he would cut in the eyes of a higher arbiter of taste? Perhaps a presumptuous one? perhaps even risible? perhaps a little arbitrary?... 'O Dionysos, divine one, why do you pull my ears?' Ariadne once asked her philosophical lover during one of those celebrated dialogues on Naxos.† 'I find a kind of humour in your ears, Ariadne: why are they not longer?' 20 Nothing is beautiful, only man: on this piece of naïvety rests all aesthetics, it is the first truth of aesthetics. Let us immediately add its second: nothing is ugly but degenerate man – the domain of aesthetic judgement is therewith defined. – Reckoned physiologically, everything ugly weakens and afflicts man. It recalls decay, danger, impotence; he actually suffers a loss of energy in its presence. The effect of the ugly can be measured with a dynamometer. Whenever man feels in any way depressed, he senses the proximity of something 'ugly'. His feeling of power, his will to power, his courage, his pride – they decline with the ugly, they increase with the beautiful.... In the one case as in the other we draw a conclusion: its premises have been accumulated in the instincts in tremendous abundance. The ugly is understood as a sign and symptom of degeneration: that which recalls degeneration, however remotely, produces in us the judgement 'ugly'. Every token of exhaustion, of heaviness, of age, of weariness, every kind of unfreedom, whether convulsive or paralytic, above all the smell, colour and shape of dissolution, of decomposition, though it be attenuated to the point of being no more than a symbol – all this calls forth the same reaction, the value judgement 'ugly'. A feeling of hatred then springs up; what is man then hating? But the answer admits of no doubt: the decline of his type. He hates then from out of the profoundest instinct of his species; there is horror, foresight, profundity, far-seeing vision in this hatred – it is the profoundest hatred there is. It is for its sake that art is profound... 21 Schopenhauer. – Schopenhauer, the last German of any consequence (– who is a European even like Goethe, like Hegel, like Heinrich Heine, and not merely a parochial, a 'national' one), is for a psychologist a case of the first order: namely, as a mendacious attempt of genius to marshal, in aid of a nihilistic total devaluation of life, the very counter-instances, the great self-affirmations of the 'will to live', the exuberant forms of life. He interpreted in turn art, heroism, genius, beauty, grand sympathy, knowledge, the will to truth, tragedy, as phenomena consequent upon the 'denial' of or the thirst to deny the 'will' – the greatest piece of psychological falsecoinage in history, Christianity alone excepted. Looked at more closely he is in this merely the heir of the Christian interpretation: but with this difference, that he knew how to make what Christianity had rejected, the great cultural facts of mankind, and approve of them from a Christian, that is to say nihilistic, point of view (– namely as roads to 'redemption', as preliminary forms of 'redemption', as stimulants of the thirst for 'redemption' ...). 22 To take a particular instance: Schopenhauer speaks of beauty with a melancholy ardour – why, in the last resort? Because he sees it in a bridge upon which one may pass over, or acquire a thirst to pass over.... It is to him redemption from the 'will' for minutes at a time – it lures on to redemption for ever.... He values it especially as redeemer from the 'focus of the will', from sexuality – in beauty he sees the procreative impulse denied.... Singular saint! Someone contradicts you, and I fear it is nature. To what end is there beauty at all in the sounds, colours, odours, rhythmic movements of nature? what makes beauty appear? – Fortunately a philosopher also contradicts him. No less an authority than the divine Plato (– so Schopenhauer himself calls him) maintains a different thesis: that all beauty incites to procreation – that precisely this is the proprium of its effect, from the most sensual regions up into the most spiritual... 23 Plato goes further. He says, with an innocence for which one must be Greek and not 'Christian', that there would be no Platonic philosophy at all if Athens had not possessed such beautiful youths: it was the sight of them which first plunged the philosopher's soul into an erotic whirl and allowed it no rest until it had implanted the seed of all high things into so beautiful a soil. Another singular saint! – one doesn't believe one's ears, even supposing one believed Plato. One sees, at least, that philosophizing was different in Athens, above all public. Nothing is less Greek than the conceptual cobweb-spinning of a hermit, amor intellectualis dei* in the manner of Spinoza. Philosophy in the manner of Plato should rather be defined as an erotic contest, as a further development and inward intensification of the old agonal gymnastics and their presuppositions.... What finally emerged from this philosophical eroticism of Plato? A new artistic form of the Greek agon, dialectics. – I further recall, opposing Schopenhauer and to the honour of Plato, that the entire higher culture and literature of classical France also grew up on the soil of sexual interest. One may seek everywhere in it for gallantry, sensuality, sexual contest, 'woman' – one will never seek in vain... 24 L'art pour l'art.† – The struggle against purpose in art is always a struggle against the moralizing tendency in art, against the subordination of art to morality. L'art pour l'art means: 'the devil take morality!' – But this very hostility betrays that moral prejudice is still dominant. When one has excluded from art the purpose of moral preaching and human improvement it by no means follows that art is completely purposeless, goalless, meaningless, in short l'art pour l'art – a snake biting its own tail. 'Rather no purpose at all than a moral purpose!' – thus speaks mere passion. A psychologist asks on the other hand: what does all art do? does it not praise? does it not glorify? does it not select? does it not highlight? By doing all this it strengthens or weakens certain valuations.... Is this no more than an incidental? an accident? Something in which the instinct of the artist has no part whatever? Or is it not rather the prerequisite for the artist's being an artist at all.... Is his basic instinct directed towards art, or is it not rather directed towards the meaning of art, which is life? towards a desideratum of life? – Art is the great stimulus to life: how could it be thought purposeless, aimless, l'art pour l'art? One question remains: art also brings to light much that is ugly, hard, questionable in life – does it not thereby seem to suffer from life? – And there have indeed been philosophers who lent it this meaning: Schopenhauer taught that the whole object of art was to 'liberate from the will', and he revered tragedy because its greatest function was to 'dispose one to resignation'. – But this – as I have already intimated – is a pessimist's perspective and 'evil eye' – : one must appeal to the artists themselves. What does the tragic artist communicate of himself? Does he not display precisely the condition of fearlessness in the face of the fearsome and questionable? – This condition itself is a high desideratum: he who knows it bestows on it the highest honours. He communicates it, he has to communicate it if he is an artist, a genius of communication. Bravery and composure in the face of a powerful enemy, great hardship, a problem that arouses aversion – it is this victorious condition which the tragic artist singles out, which he glorifies. In the face of tragedy the warlike in our soul celebrates its Saturnalias; whoever is accustomed to suffering, whoever seeks out suffering, the heroic man extols his existence by means of tragedy – for him alone does the tragic poet pour this draught of sweetest cruelty. – 25 To put up with men, to keep open house in one's heart – this is liberal, but no more than liberal. One knows hearts which are capable of noble hospitality, which have curtained windows and closed shutters: they keep their best rooms empty. Why do they so? – Because they await guests with whom one does not have to 'put up'... 26 We no longer have a sufficiently high estimate of ourselves when we communicate. Our true experiences are not garrulous. They could not communicate themselves if they wanted to: they lack words. We have already grown beyond whatever we have words for. In all talking there lies a grain of contempt. Speech, it seems, was devised only for the average, medium, communicable. The speaker has already vulgarized himself by speaking. – From a moral code for deaf-mutes and other philosophers. 27 'This picture is enchanting fair!’... The literary woman, unsatisfied, agitated, desolate in heart and entrails, listening every minute with painful curiosity to the imperative which whispers from the depths of her organism ‘aut liberi aut libri’:† the literary woman, cultured enough to understand the voice of nature even when it speaks Latin, and on the other hand vain enough and enough of a goose to say secretly to herself in French ‘je me verrai, je me lirai, je m’extasierai et je dirai: Possible, que j’aie eu tant d’esprit?’...‡ 28 The ‘impersonal’ take the floor. – ‘We find nothing easier than being wise, patient, superior. We drip with the oil of forbearance and sympathy, we are absurdly just, we forgive everything. For that very reason we ought to discipline ourselves a little; for that very reason we ought to cultivate a little emotion, a little emotional vice, from time to time. It may be hard for us; and among ourselves we may perhaps laugh at the appearance we thus present. But what of that! We no longer have any other mode of self-overcoming available to us: this is our asceticism, our penance’. ... Becoming personal – the virtue of the ‘impersonal’ ... 29 From a doctorate exam. – ‘What is the task of all higher education?’ – To turn a man into a machine. – ‘By what means?’ – He has to learn how to feel bored. – ‘How is that achieved?’ – Through the concept of duty. – ‘Who is his model?’ – The philologist: he teaches how to grind. – ‘Who is the perfect man?’ – The civil servant. – ‘Which philosophy provides the best formula for the civil servant?’ – Kant’s: the civil servant as thing in itself set as judge over the civil servant as appearance. – 30 The right to stupidity. – The wearied and slow-breathing worker, good-natured, letting things take their course: this typical figure, who is now, in the Age of Work (and of the ‘Reich!’), encountered in all classes of society, is today laying claim even to art, including the book and above all the journal – how much more to the beauties of nature, to Italy.... The man of the evening, with the ‘wild instincts lulled to sleep’ of which Faust speaks.† requires the health resort, the seaside, the glaciers, Bayreuth.‡... In ages like this, art has a right to pure folly§ – as a kind of holiday for the spirit, the wits and the heart. Wagner understood that. Pure folly is a restorative... 31 Another problem of diet. – The means by which Julius Caesar defended himself against sickness and headache: tremendous marches, the simplest form of living, uninterrupted sojourn in the open air, continuous toil – these, broadly speaking, are the universal preservative and protective measures against the extreme vulnerability of that subtle machine working at the highest pressure which is called genius. – 32 The immoralist speaks. – Nothing offends a philosopher’s taste more than man when he expresses desires.... When the philosopher sees man only in his activity, when he sees this bravest, cunningest, toughest of animals straying even into labyrinthine calamities, how admirable man seems to him! He encourages him.... But the philosopher despises desiring man, and the ‘desirable’ man too – he despises all the desiderata, all the ideals of man. If a philosopher could be a nihilist, he would be one because he finds nothingness behind all the ideals of men. Or not even nothingness merely – but only the worthless, the absurd, the sick, the cowardly, the weary, dregs of all kinds from the cup of his life after he has drained it.... How does it come about that man, so admirable as a reality, deserves no respect when he expresses desires? Does he have to atone for being so able as a reality? Does he have to compensate for his activity, for the exertion of will and hand involved in all activity, with a relaxation in the imaginary and absurd? – The history of his desiderata has hitherto been the *partie honteuse of man: one should take care not to read too long in it. What justifies man is his reality – it will justify him eternally. How much more valuable an actual man is compared with any sort of merely desired, dreamed of, odious lie of a man? with any sort of ideal man?... And it is only the ideal man who offends the philosopher's taste.

33 The natural value of egoism. – The value of egoism depends on the physiological value of him who possesses it: it can be very valuable, it can be worthless and contemptible. Every individual may be regarded as representing the ascending or descending line of life. When one has decided which, one has thereby established a canon for the value of his egoism. If he represents the ascending line his value is in fact extraordinary – and for the sake of the life-collective, which with him takes a step forward, the care expended on his preservation, on the creation of optimum conditions for him, may even be extreme. For the individual, the 'single man', as people and philosophers have hitherto understood him, is an error: he does not constitute a separate entity, an atom, a 'link in the chain', something merely inherited from the past – he constitutes the entire single line 'man' up to and including himself.... If he represents the descending development, decay, chronic degeneration, sickening (– sickness is, broadly speaking, already a phenomenon consequent upon decay, not the cause of it), then he can be accorded little value, and elementary fairness demands that he takes away as little as possible from the well-constituted. He is not better than a parasite on them...

34 Christian and anarchist. – When the anarchist, as the mouthpiece of declining strata of society, demands with righteous indignation 'his rights', 'justice', 'equal rights', he is only acting under the influence of his want of culture, which prevents his understanding why he is really suffering – in what respect he is impoverished, in life.... A cause-creating drive is powerful within him: someone must be to blame for his feeling vile.... His 'righteous indignation' itself already does him good; every poor devil finds pleasure in scolding – it gives him a little of the intoxication of power. Even complaining and wailing can give life a charm for the sake of which one endures it: there is a small dose of revenge in every complaint, one reproaches those who are different for one's feeling vile, sometimes even with one's being vile, as if they had perpetrated an injustice or possessed an impermissible privilege. 'If I am canaille, you ought to be so too': on the basis of this logic one makes revolutions. – Complaining is never of any use: it comes from weakness. Whether one attributes one's feeling vile to others or to oneself – the Socialist does the former, the Christian for example the latter – makes no essential difference. What is common to both, and unworthy in both, is that someone has to be to blame for the fact that one suffers – in short, that the sufferer prescribes for himself the honey of revenge as a medicine for his suffering. The objectives of this thirst for revenge as a thirst for pleasure vary according to circumstances: the sufferer finds occasions everywhere for cooling his petty revengefulness – if he is a Christian, to say it again, he finds them in himself.... The Christian and the anarchist – both are décadents. – And when the Christian condemns, calumniates and befouls the 'world', he does so from the same instinct from which the Socialist worker condemns, calumniates and befouls society: even the 'Last Judgement' is still the sweet consolation of revenge – the revolution, such as the Socialist worker too anticipates, only conceived of as somewhat more distant.... Even the 'Beyond' – why a Beyond if not as a means of befouling the Here-and-Now?... 35 A criticism of décadence morality. – An 'altruistic' morality, a morality under which egoism languishes – is under all circumstances a bad sign. This applies to individuals, it applies especially to peoples. The best are lacking when egoism begins to be lacking. To choose what is harmful to oneself, to be attracted by 'disinterested' motives, almost constitutes the formula for décadence. 'Not to seek one's own advantage' – that is merely a moral figleaf for a quite different, namely physiological fact: 'I no longer know how to find my advantage'.... Disgregation of the instincts! – Man is finished when he becomes altruistic. – Instead of saying simply 'I am no longer worth anything', the moral lie in the mouth of the décadent says: 'Nothing is worth anything – life is not worth anything'.... Such a judgement represents, after all, a grave danger, it is contagious – on the utterly morbid soil of society it soon grows up luxuriously, now in the form of religion (Christianity), now in that of philosophy (Schopenhauerism). In some circumstances the vapours of such a poison-tree jungle sprung up out of putrefaction can poison life for years ahead, for thousands of years ahead... 36 A moral code for physicians. – The invalid is a parasite on society. In a certain state it is indecent to go on living. To vegetate on in cowardly dependence on physicians and medicaments after the meaning of life, the right to life, has been lost ought to entail the profound contempt of society. Physicians, in their turn, ought to be the communicators of this contempt – not prescriptions, but every day a fresh dose of disgust with their patients.... To create a new responsibility, that of the physician, in all cases in which the highest interest of life, of ascending life, demands the most ruthless suppression and sequestration of degenerating life – for example in determining the right to reproduce, the right to be born, the right to live.... To die proudly when it is no longer possible to live proudly. Death of one's own free choice, death at the proper time, with a clear head and with joyfulness, consummated in the midst of children and witnesses: so that an actual leave-taking is possible while he who is leaving is still there, likewise an actual evaluation of what has been desired and what achieved in life, an adding-up of life – all of this in contrast to the pitiable and horrible comedy Christianity has made of the hour of death. One should never forget of Christianity that it has abused the weakness of the dying to commit conscience-rape and even the mode of death to formulate value judgements on men and the past! – Here, every cowardice of prejudice notwithstanding, it is above all a question of establishing the correct, that is physiological evaluation of so-called natural death: which is, after all, also only an ‘unnatural’ death, an act of suicide. One perishes by no one but oneself. Only ‘natural’ death is death for the most contemptible reasons, an unfree death, a death at the wrong time, a coward’s death. From love of life one ought to desire to die differently from this: freely, consciously, not accidentally, not suddenly overtaken. ... Finally, a piece of advice for messieurs the pessimists and other décadents. We have no power to prevent ourselves being born: but we can rectify this error – for it is sometimes an error. When one does away with oneself one does the most estimable thing possible: one thereby almost deserves to live.... Society – what am I saying! life itself derives more advantage from that than from any sort of ‘life’ spent in renunciation, green-sickness and other virtues – one has freed others from having to endure one’s sight, one has removed an objection from life.... Pessimism, *pur, vert proves itself only by the self-negation of messieurs the pessimists: one must take their logic a step further, and not deny life merely in ‘will and idea’, as Schopenhauer did – one must first of all deny Schopenhauer.... Pessimism, by the by, however contagious it may be, nevertheless does not add to the morbidity of an age or a race in general: it is the expression of this morbidity. One succumbs to it as one succumbs to cholera: one’s constitution must already be sufficiently morbid. Pessimism does not of itself make a single additional décadent, I recall that statistics show that the years in which cholera rages do not differ from other years in the total number of deaths. 37 Whether we have grown more moral. – As was only to be expected, the whole ferocity of the moral stupidity which, as is well known, is considered morality as such in Germany, has launched itself against my concept ‘beyond good and evil’: I could tell some pretty stories about it. Above all, I was invited to reflect on the ‘undeniable superiority’ of our age in moral judgement, our real advance in this respect: compared with us, a Cesare Borgia was certainly not to be set up as a ‘higher man’, as a kind of superman, in the way I set him up.... A Swiss editor, that of the ‘Bund’, went so far – not without expressing his admiration of the courage for so hazardous an enterprise – as to ‘understand’ that the meaning of my work lay in a proposal to abolish all decent feeling. Much obliged!* – by way of reply I permit myself to raise the question whether we have really grown more moral. That all the world believes so is already an objection to it.... We modern men, very delicate, very vulnerable and paying and receiving consideration in a hundred ways, imagine in fact that this sensitive humanity which we represent, this achieved unanimity in forbearance, in readiness to help, in mutual trust, is a positive advance, that with this we have gone far beyond the men of the Renaissance. But every age thinks in this way, has to think in this way. What is certain is that we would not dare to place ourselves in Renaissance circumstances, or even imagine ourselves in them: our nerves could not endure that reality, not to speak of our muscles. This incapacity, however, demonstrates, not an advance, but only a different, a more belated constitution, a weaker, more delicate, more vulnerable one, out of which is necessarily engendered a morality which is full of consideration. If we think away our delicacy and belatedness, our physiological ageing, then our morality of 'humanization' too loses its value at once – no morality has any value in itself – : we would even despise it. On the other hand, let us be in no doubt that we modern men, with our thick padding of humanity which dislikes to give the slightest offence, would provide the contemporaries of Cesare Borgia with a side-splitting comedy. We are, in fact, involuntarily funny beyond all measure, we with our modern 'virtues'.... The decay of our hostile and mistrust-arousing instincts – and that is what constitutes our 'advance' – represents only one of the effects attending our general decay of vitality: it costs a hundred times more effort, more foresight, to preserve so dependent, so late an existence as we are. Here everyone helps everyone else, here everyone is to a certain degree an invalid and everyone a nurse. This is then called 'virtue' – : among men who knew a different kind of life, a fuller, more prodigal, more overflowing life, it would be called something else: 'cowardice', perhaps, 'pitiableness', 'old woman's morality'.... Our softening of customs – this is my thesis, my innovation if you like – is a consequence of decline; stern and frightful customs can, conversely, be a consequence of a superabundance of life. For in the latter case much may be risked, much demanded and much squandered. What was formerly a spice of life would be poison to us.... We are likewise too old, too belated, to be capable of indifference –also a form of strength: our morality of pity, against which I was the first to warn, that which one might call l'impressionisme morale, is one more expression of the physiological overexcitability pertaining to everything décadent. That movement which with Schopenhauer's morality of pity attempted to present itself as scientific – a very unsuccessful attempt! – is the actual décadence movement in morality; as such it is profoundly related to Christian morality. Strong ages, noble cultures, see in pity, in 'love of one's neighbour', in a lack of self and self-reliance, something contemptible. – Ages are to be assessed according to their positive forces – and by this assessment the age of the Renaissance, so prodigal and so fateful, appears as the last great age, and we, we moderns with our anxious care for ourselves and love of our neighbour, with our virtues of work, of unpretentiousness, of fair play, of scientificity – acquisitive, economical, machine-minded – appear as a weak age.... Our virtues are conditioned, are demanded by our weakness.... ‘Equality’, a certain actual rendering similar of which the theory of ‘equal rights’ is only the expression, belongs essentially to decline: the chasm between man and man, class and class, the multiplicity of types, the will to be oneself, to stand out – that which I call pathos of distance – characterizes every strong age. The tension, the range between the extremes is today growing less and less – the extremes themselves are finally obliterated to the point of similarity.... All our political theories and state constitutions, the ‘German Reich’ certainly not excluded, are consequences, necessary effects of decline; the unconscious influence of décadence has gained ascendancy even over the ideals of certain of the sciences. My objection to the whole of sociology in England and France is that it knows from experience only the decaying forms of society and takes its own decaying instincts with perfect innocence as the norm of sociological value judgement. Declining life, the diminution of all organizing power, that is to say the power of separating, of opening up chasms, of ranking above and below, formulates itself in the sociology of today as the ideal.... Our Socialists are décadents, but Mr Herbert Spencer is also a décadent – he sees in the victory of altruism something desirable!... 38 My conception of freedom. – The value of a thing sometimes lies not in what one attains with it, but in what one pays for it – what it costs us. I give an example. Liberal institutions immediately cease to be liberal as soon as they are attained: subsequently there is nothing more thoroughly harmful to freedom than liberal institutions. One knows, indeed, what they bring about: they undermine the will to power, they are the levelling of mountain and valley exalted to a moral principle, they make small, cowardly and smug – it is the herd animal which triumphs with them every time. Liberalism: in plain words, reduction to the herd animal.... As long as they are still being fought for, these same institutions produce quite different effects; they then in fact promote freedom mightily. Viewed more closely, it is war which produces these effects, war for liberal institutions which as war permits the illiberal instincts to endure. And war is a training in freedom. For what is freedom? That one has the will to self-responsibility. That one preserves the distance which divides us. That one has become more indifferent to hardship, toil, privation, even to life. That one is ready to sacrifice men to one’s cause, oneself not excepted. Freedom means that the manly instincts that delight in war and victory have gained mastery over the other instincts – for example, over the instinct for ‘happiness’. The man who has become free – and how much more the mind that has become free – spurns the contemptible sort of well-being dreamed of by shopkeepers, Christians, cows, women, Englishmen and other democrats. The free man is a warrior. – How is freedom measured, in individuals as in nations? By the resistance which has to be overcome, by the effort it costs to stay aloft. One would have to seek the highest type of free man where the greatest resistance is constantly being overcome: five steps from tyranny, near the threshold of the danger of servitude. This is true psychologically when one understands by ‘tyrants’ pitiless and dreadful instincts, to combat which demands the maximum of authority and discipline towards oneself – finest type Julius Caesar –; it is also true politically: one has only to look at history. The nations which were worth something, which became worth something, never became so under liberal institutions: it was great danger which made of them something deserving reverence, danger which first teaches us to know our resources, our virtues, our shield and spear, our spirit – which compels us to be strong.... First principle: one must need strength, otherwise one will never have it. – Those great forcing-houses for strong human beings, for the strongest kind there has ever been, the aristocratic communities of the pattern of Rome and Venice, understood freedom in precisely the sense which I understand the word ‘freedom’: as something one has and does not have, something one wants, something one conquers... 39 Criticism of modernity. – Our institutions are no longer fit for anything: everyone is unanimous about that. But the fault lies not in them but in us. Having lost all the instincts out of which institutions grow, we are losing the institutions themselves, because we are no longer fit for them. Democracy has always been the declining form of the power to organize: I have already, in Human, All Too Human, characterized modern democracy, together with its imperfect manifestations such as the ‘German Reich’, as the decaying form of the state. For institutions to exist there must exist the kind of will, instinct, imperative which is anti-liberal to the point of malice: the will to tradition, to authority, to centuries-long responsibility, to solidarity between succeeding generations backwards and forwards in infinitum. If this will is present, there is established something such as the Imperium Romanum: or such as Russia, the only power today which has durability in it, which can wait, which can still promise something – Russia, the antithesis of that pitiable European petty-state politics and nervousness which with the foundation of the German Reich has entered a critical phase.... The entire West has lost those instincts out of which institutions grow, out of which the future grows: perhaps nothing goes so much against the grain of its ‘modern spirit’ as this. One lives for today, one lives very fast – one lives very irresponsibly: it is precisely this which one calls ‘freedom’. That which makes institutions institutions is despised, hated, rejected: whenever the word ‘authority’ is so much as heard one believes oneself in danger of a new slavery. The décadence in the valuating instinct of our politicians, our political parties, goes so deep that they instinctively prefer that which leads to dissolution, that which hastens the end.... Witness modern marriage. It is obvious that all sense has gone out of modern marriage: which is, however, no objection to marriage but to modernity. The rationale of marriage lay in the legal sole responsibility of the man: marriage thereby had a centre of gravity, whereas now it limps with both legs. The rationale of marriage lay in its indissolubility in principle: it thereby acquired an accent which could make itself heard against the accidents of feeling, passion and the moment. It lay likewise in the responsibility of the families for the selection of mates. With the increasing indulgence of love matches one has simply eliminated the foundation of marriage, that alone which makes it an institution. One never establishes an institution on the basis of an idiosyncrasy, one does not, as aforesaid, establish marriage on the basis of 'love' – one establishes it on the basis of the sexual drive, the drive to own property (wife and child considered as property), the drive to dominate which continually organizes the smallest type of domain, the family, which needs children and heirs so as to retain, in a physiological sense as well, an achieved measure of power, influence, wealth, so as to prepare for protracted tasks, for a solidarity of instinct between the centuries. Marriage as an institution already includes in itself the affirmation of the largest, the most enduring form of organization: if society as a whole cannot stand security for itself to the most distant generations, then marriage has really no meaning. – Modern marriage has lost its meaning – consequently it is being abolished. 40 The labour question. – The stupidity, fundamentally the instinct degeneration which is the cause of every stupidity today, lies in the existence of a labour question at all. About certain things one does not ask questions: first imperative of instinct. – I simply cannot see what one wishes to do with the European worker now one has made a question of him. He finds himself far too well placed not to go on asking for more, or to ask more and more impudently. After all, he has the great majority on his side. There is absolutely no hope left that a modest and self-sufficient kind of human being, a type of Chinaman, should here form itself into a class: and this would have been sensible, this was actually a necessity. What has one done? – Everything designed to nip in the bud even the prerequisites for it – through the most irresponsible thoughtlessness one has totally destroyed the instincts by virtue of which the worker becomes possible as a class, possible for himself. The worker has been made liable for military service, he has been allowed to form unions and to vote: no wonder the worker already feels his existence to be a state of distress (expressed in moral terms as a state of injustice). But what does one want? – to ask it again. If one wills an end, one must also will the means to it: if one wants slaves, one is a fool if one educates them to be masters. – 41 'Freedom as I do not mean it.*...' – In times like these, to have to rely on one's instincts is one fatality more. These instincts contradict, disturb and destroy one another; I have already defined the modern as physiological self-contradiction. The rationale of education would seem to require that at least one of these instinctsystems should be paralysed beneath an iron pressure, so as to permit another to come into force, become strong, become master. Today the only way of making the individual possible would be by pruning him: possible, that is to say complete.... The reverse is what actually happens: the claim to independence, to free development, to laissez aller, is advanced most heatedly by precisely those for whom no curb could be too strong – this applies in politics, it applies in art. But this is a symptom of décadence: our modern concept ‘freedom’ is one more proof of degeneration of instinct. – 42 Where faith is needed. – Nothing is rarer among moralists and saints than integrity; perhaps they say the opposite, perhaps they even believe it. For when faith is more useful, effective, convincing than conscious hypocrisy, hypocrisy instinctively and forthwith becomes innocent: first principle for the understanding of great saints. In the case of philosophers too, a different kind of saint, their entire trade demands that they concede only certain truths: namely those through which their trade receives public sanction – in Kantian terms, truths of practical reason. They know what they have to prove, they are practical in that – they recognize one another by their agreement over ‘truths’. – ‘Thou shalt not lie’ – in plain words: take care, philosopher, not to tell the truth... 43 In the ear of the Conservatives. – What was formerly not known, what is known today or could be known – a reversion, a turning back in any sense and to any degree, is quite impossible. We physiologists at least know that. But all priests and moralists have believed it was possible – they have wanted to take mankind back, force it back, to an earlier standard of virtue. Morality has always been a bed of Procrustes. Even politicians have in this matter imitated the preachers of virtue: even today there are parties whose goal is a dream of the crabwise retrogression of all things. But no one is free to be a crab. There is nothing for it: one has to go forward, which is to say step by step further into décadence (– this is my definition of modern ‘progress’...). One can retard this development and, through retardation, dam and gather up degeneration itself and make it more vehement and sudden: more one cannot do. – 44 My conception of the genius. – Great men, like great epochs, are explosive material in whom tremendous energy has been accumulated; their prerequisite has always been, historically and physiologically, that a protracted assembling, accumulating, economizing and preserving has preceded them – that there has been no explosion for a long time. If the tension in the mass has grown too great the merest accidental stimulus suffices to call the ‘genius’, the ‘deed’, the great destiny, into the world. Of what account then are circumstances, the epoch, the Zeitgeist, public opinion! – Take the case of Napoleon. The France of the Revolution, and even more preRevolution France, would have brought forth the type antithetical to Napoleon: it did bring it forth, moreover. And because Napoleon was different, the heir of a stronger, longer, older civilization than that which was going up in dust and smoke in France, he became master here, he alone was master here. Great human beings are necessary, the epoch in which they appear is accidental; that they almost always become master of their epoch is only because they are stronger, because they are older, because a longer assembling of force has preceded them. The relationship between a genius and his epoch is the same as that between strong and weak, and as that between old and young: the epoch is always relatively much younger, less substantial, more immature, less sure of itself, more childish. – That they have very different ideas on this subject in France today (in Germany too, but that is of no consequence), that there the theory of milieu, a real neurotic's theory, has become sacrosanct and almost scientific and finds credence even among physiologists – that fact has an 'ill odour' and gives one sadly to think. – The same ideas are believed in England too, but no one will lose any sleep over that. The Englishman has only two possible ways of coming to terms with the genius and 'great man': either the democratic way in the manner of Buckle or the religious way in the manner of Carlyle. – The danger which lies in great human beings and great epochs is extraordinary; sterility, exhaustion of every kind follow in their footsteps. The great human being is a terminus; the great epoch, the Renaissance for example, is a terminus. The genius – in his works, in his deeds – is necessarily a prodigal: his greatness lies in the fact that he expends himself.... The instinct of self-preservation is as it were suspended; the overwhelming pressure of the energies which emanate from him forbids him any such care and prudence. One calls this 'sacrifice'; one praises his 'heroism' therein, his indifference to his own interests, his devotion to an idea, a great cause, a fatherland: all misunderstandings.... He flows out, he overflows, he uses himself up, he does not spare himself – with inevitability, fatefully, involuntarily, as a river's bursting its banks is involuntary. But because one owes a great deal to such explosive beings one has bestowed a great deal upon them in return, for example a species of higher morality.... For that is the nature of human gratitude: it misunderstands its benefactors. – 45 The criminal and what is related to him. – The criminal type is the type of the strong human being under unfavourable conditions, a strong human being made sick. What he lacks is the wilderness, a certain freer and more perilous nature and form of existence in which all that is attack and defence in the instinct of the strong human being comes into its own. His virtues have been excommunicated by society; the liveliest drives within him forthwith blend with the depressive emotions, with suspicion, fear, dishonour. But this is almost the recipe for physiological degeneration. He who has to do in secret what he does best and most likes to do, with protracted tension, caution, slyness, becomes anaemic; and because he has never harvested anything from his instincts but danger, persecution, disaster, his feelings too turn against these instincts – he feels them to be a fatality. It is society, our tame, mediocre, gelded society, in which a human being raised in nature, who comes from the mountains or from adventures of the sea, necessarily degenerates into a criminal. Or almost necessarily: for there are cases in which such a human being proves stronger than society: the Corsican Napoleon is the most famous case. In regard to the problem before us the testimony of Dostoyevsky is of importance – Dostoyevsky, the only psychologist, by the way, from whom I had anything to learn: he is one of the happiest accidents of my life, even more so than my discovery of Stendhal. This profound human being, who was ten times justified in despising the superficial Germans, found the Siberian convicts in whose midst he lived for a long time, nothing but the worst criminals for whom no return to society was possible, very different from what he himself had expected – he found them to be carved out of about the best, hardest and most valuable timber growing anywhere on Russian soil. Let us generalize the case of the criminal: let us think of natures which, for whatever reason, lack public approval, which know they are not considered beneficial or useful, that Chandala feeling that one is considered not an equal but as thrust out, as unworthy, as a source of pollution. The colour of the subterranean is on the thoughts and actions of such natures; everything in them becomes paler than in those upon whose existence the light of day reposes. But virtually every form of existence which we treat with distinction today formerly lived in this semi-gravelike atmosphere: the scientific nature, the artist, the genius, the free spirit, the actor, the merchant, the great discoverer.... As long as the priest was considered the highest type every valuable kind of human being was disvalued. ... The time is coming – I promise it – when he will be considered the lowest, as our Chandala, as the most mendacious, as the most indecent kind of human being. ... I draw attention to the fact that even now, under the mildest rule of custom which has ever obtained on earth or at any rate in Europe, every kind of apartness, every protracted, all too protracted keeping under, every uncommon, untransparent form of existence, brings men close to that type of which the criminal is the perfection. All innovators of the spirit bear for a time the pallid, fatalistic sign of the Chandala on their brow: not because they are felt to be so, but because they themselves feel the terrible chasm which divides them from all that is traditional and held in honour. Almost every genius knows as one of the phases of his development the ‘Catilinarian existence’, a feeling of hatred, revengefulness and revolt against everything which already is, which is no longer becoming.... Catiline – the antecedent form of every Caesar. – 46 Here is the prospect free.* – When a philosopher keeps silent, it can be loftiness of soul; when he contradicts himself, it can be love; a politeness which tells lies is possible in men of knowledge. Not without subtlety was it said: il est indigne des grands coeurs de répandre le trouble qu’ils ressentent:† only one has to add that not to fear the unworthiest things can likewise be greatness of soul. A woman who loves sacrifices her honour; a man of knowledge who ‘loves’ sacrifices perhaps his humanity; a god who loved became a Jew... 47 Beauty no accident. – Even the beauty of a race or a family, the charm and benevolence of their whole demeanour, is earned by labour: like genius, it is the final result of the accumulatory labour of generations. One must have made great sacrifices to good taste, one must for its sake have done many things, left many things undone – the French seventeenth century is admirable in both – one must have possessed in it a selective principle in respect of one's society, residence, dress, sexual gratification, one must have preferred beauty to advantage, habit, opinion, indolence. Supreme rule of conduct: even when alone one must not 'let oneself go'. – Good things are costly beyond measure: and the law still holds that he who has them is different from him who obtains them. Everything good is inheritance: what is not inherited is imperfect, is a beginning.... In Athens at the time of Cicero, who expressed his surprise at it, the men and youths were of far superior beauty to the women: but what labour and exertion in the service of beauty the male sex of that place had for centuries demanded of themselves! – For one must not mistake the method involved here: a mere disciplining of thoughts and feelings is virtually nothing (– here lies the great mistake of German culture, which is totally illusory): one first has to convince the body. The strict maintenance of a significant and select demeanour, an obligation to live only among men who do not 'let themselves go', completely suffices for becoming significant and select: in two or three generations everything is already internalized. It is decisive for the fortune of nations and of mankind that one should inaugurate culture in the right place – not in the 'soul' (as has been the fateful superstition of priests and quasi-priests): the right place is the body, demeanour, diet, physiology: the rest follows.... This is why the Greeks remain the supreme cultural event of history – they knew, they did what needed to be done; Christianity, which despised the body, has up till now been mankind's greatest misfortune. – 48 Progress in my sense. – I too speak of a 'return to nature', although it is not really a going-back but a going-up – up into a high, free, even frightful nature and naturalness, such as plays with great tasks, is permitted to play with them.... To speak in a parable: Napoleon was a piece of 'return to nature' as I understand it (for example in rebus tacticis* even more, as military men know, in strategy). – But Rousseau – where did he really want to return to? Rousseau, this first modern man, idealist, and canaille in one person; who needed moral 'dignity' in order to endure his own aspect; sick with unbridled vanity and unbridled self-contempt. Even this abortion recumbent on the threshold of the new age wanted a 'return to nature' – where, to ask it again, did Rousseau want to return to? – I hate Rousseau even in the Revolution: it is the world-historical expression of this duplicity of idealist and canaille. The bloody farce enacted by this Revolution, its 'immorality', does not concern me much: what I hate is its Rousseauesque morality – the so-called 'truths' of the Revolution through which it is still an active force and persuades everything shallow and mediocre over to its side. The doctrine of equality!... But there exists no more poisonous poison: for it seems to be preached by justice itself, while it is the termination of justice.... 'Equality for equals, inequality for unequals' – that would be the true voice of justice: and, what follows from it, 'Never make equal what is unequal'. – That such dreadful and bloody happenings have surrounded this doctrine of equality has given this 'modern idea' par excellence a kind of glory and lurid glow, so that the Revolution as a spectacle has seduced even the noblest spirits. That is, however, no reason for esteeming it any more highly. – I see only one who experienced it as it has to be experienced – with disgust – Goethe... 49 Goethe – not a German event but a European one: a grand attempt to overcome the eighteenth century through a return to nature, through a going-up to the naturalness of the Renaissance, a kind of self-overcoming on the part of that century. – He bore within him its strongest instincts: sentimentality, nature-idolatry, the anti-historical, the idealistic, the unreal and revolutionary (– the last is only a form of the unreal). He called to his aid history, the natural sciences, antiquity, likewise Spinoza, above all practical activity; he surrounded himself with nothing but closed horizons; he did not sever himself from life, he placed himself within it; nothing could discourage him and he took as much as possible upon himself, above himself, within himself. What he aspired to was totality; he strove against the separation of reason, sensuality, feeling, will (– preached in the most horrible scholasticism by Kant, the antipodes of Goethe); he disciplined himself to a whole, he created himself.... Goethe was, in an epoch disposed to the unreal, a convinced realist: he affirmed everything which was related to him in this respect – he had no greater experience than that ens realissimum called Napoleon. Goethe conceived of a strong, highly cultured human being, skilled in all physical accomplishments, who, keeping himself in check and having reverence for himself, dares to allow himself the whole compass and wealth of naturalness, who is strong enough for this freedom; a man of tolerance, not out of weakness, but out of strength, because he knows how to employ to his advantage what would destroy an average nature; a man to whom nothing is forbidden, except it be weakness, whether that weakness be called vice or virtue.... A spirit thus emancipated stands in the midst of the universe with a joyful and trusting fatalism, in the faith that only what is separate and individual may be rejected, that in the totality everything is redeemed and affirmed – he no longer denies.... But such a faith is the highest of all possible faiths: I have baptized it with the name Dionysos. – 50 One could say that in a certain sense the nineteenth century has also striven for what Goethe as a person strove for: universality in the understanding and affirmation, amenability to experience of whatever kind, reckless realism, reverence for everything factual. How does it happen that the total result is not a Goethe but a chaos, a nihilistic sigh, a not knowing which way to turn, an instinct of weariness which in praxi continually tries to reach back to the eighteenth century? (– for example as romanticism of feeling, as altruism and hyper-sentimentality, as feminism in taste, as Socialism in politics). Is the nineteenth century, especially in its closing decades, not merely a strengthened, brutalized eighteenth century, that is to say a century of décadence? So that Goethe would have been, not merely for Germany but for all Europe, merely an episode, a beautiful ‘in vain’? – But one misunderstands great human beings if one views them from the paltry perspective of public utility. That one does not know how to make any use of it perhaps even pertains to greatness... 51 Goethe is the last German before whom I feel reverence: he would have felt three things which I feel – we are also in agreement over the ‘Cross’.* I am often asked why it is I write in German: nowhere am I worse read than in the Fatherland. But who knows, after all, whether I even wish to be read today? – To create things upon which time tries its teeth in vain; in form and in substance to strive after a little immortality – I have never been modest enough to demand less of myself. The aphorism, the apophthegm, in which I am the first master among Germans, are the forms of ‘eternity’; my ambition is to say in ten sentences what everyone else says in a book – what everyone else does not say in a book.... I have given mankind the profoundest book it possesses, my Zarathustra: I shall shortly give it the most independent.† – What I Owe to the Ancients 1 In conclusion, a word on that world into which I have sought to find a way, into which I have perhaps found a new way – the ancient world. My taste, which may be called the opposite of a tolerant taste, is even here far from uttering a wholesale Yes: in general it dislikes saying Yes, it would rather say No, most of all it prefers to say nothing at all.... This applies to entire cultures, it applies to books – it also applies to towns and countrysides. It is really only quite a small number of books of antiquity which count for anything in my life; the most famous are not among them. My sense of style, of the epigram as style, was awoken almost instantaneously on coming into contact with Sallust. I have not forgotten the astonishment of my honoured teacher Corssen when he had to give top marks to his worst Latin scholar – I had done all in a single blow. Compact, severe, with as much substance as possible, a cold malice towards ‘fine words’, also towards ‘fine feelings’ – in that I knew myself. One will recognize in my writings, even in my Zarathustra, a very serious ambition for Roman style, for the ‘aera perennius’* in style. – I had the same experience on first coming into contact with Horace. From that day to this no poet has given me the same artistic delight as I derived from the very first from an Horatian ode. In certain languages what is achieved here is not even desirable. This mosaic of words in which every word, as sound, as locus, as concept, pours forth its power to left and right and over the whole, this minimum in the range and number of signs which achieves a maximum of energy of these signs – all this is Roman and, if one will believe me, noble par excellence. All other poetry becomes by comparison somewhat too popular – a mere emotional garrulousness... 2 I received absolutely no such strong impressions from the Greeks; and, not to mince words, they cannot be to us what the Romans are. One does not learn from the Greeks – their manner is too strange, it is also too fluid to produce an imperative, a ‘classical’ effect. Who would ever have learned to write from a Greek! Who would ever have learned it without the Romans!... Let no one offer me Plato as an objection. In respect to Plato I am a thorough sceptic and have always been unable to join in the admiration of Plato the artist which is traditional among scholars. After all, I have here the most refined judges of taste of antiquity themselves on my side. It seems to me that Plato mixes together all forms of style; he is therewith in the matter of style a first décadent: he has on his conscience something similar to the Cynics who devised the Satura Menippea.* For the Platonic dialogue, that frightfully self-satisfied and childish kind of dialectics, to operate as a stimulus one must never have read any good French writers – Fontenelle, for example. Plato is boring. – Ultimately my mistrust of Plato extends to the very bottom of him: I find him deviated so far from all the fundamental instincts of the Hellenes, so morally infected, so much an antecedent Christian – he already has the concept ‘good’ as the supreme concept – that I should prefer to describe the entire phenomenon ‘Plato’ by the harsh term ‘higher swindle’ or, if you prefer, ‘idealism’, than by any other. It has cost us dear that this Athenian went to school with the Egyptians (– or with the Jews in Egypt?...). In the great fatality of Christianity, Plato is that ambiguity and fascination called the ‘ideal’ which made it possible for the nobler natures of antiquity to misunderstand themselves and to step on to the bridge which led to the ‘Cross’.... And how much there still is of Plato in the concept ‘Church’, in the structure, system, practice of the Church! – My recreation, my preference, my cure from all Platonism has always been Thucydides. Thucydides, and perhaps the Principe of Machiavelli, are related to me closely by their unconditional will not to deceive themselves and not to see reason in reality – not in ‘reason’, still less in ‘morality’.... For the deplorable embellishment of the Greeks with the colours of the ideal which the ‘classically educated’ youth carries away with him into life as the reward of his grammar-school drilling there is no more radical cure than Thucydides. One must turn him over line by line and read his hidden thoughts as clearly as his words: there are few thinkers so rich in hidden thoughts. Sophist culture, by which I mean realist culture, attains in him its perfect expression – this invaluable movement in the midst of the morality-and-ideal swindle of the Socratic schools which was then breaking out everywhere. Greek philosophy as the décadence of the Greek instinct; Thucydides as the grand summation, the last manifestation of that strong, stern, hard matter-of-factness instinctive to the older Hellenes. Courage in face of reality ultimately distinguishes such natures as Thucydides and Plato:

Plato is a coward in face of reality – consequently he flees into the ideal; Thucydides has himself under control – consequently he retains control over things... 3 From scenting out ‘beautiful souls’,* ‘golden means’ and other perfections in the Greeks, from admiring in them such things as their repose in grandeur, their ideal disposition, their sublime simplicity – from this ‘sublime simplicity’, a niaiserie allemande† when all is said and done, I was preserved by the psychologist in me. I saw their strongest instinct, the will to power, I saw them trembling at the intractable force of this drive – I saw all their institutions evolve out of protective measures designed for mutual security against the explosive material within them. The tremendous internal tension then discharged itself in fearful and ruthless external hostility: the city states tore one another to pieces so that the citizens of each of them might find peace within himself. One needed to be strong: danger was close at hand – it lurked everywhere. The splendid supple physique, the reckless realism and immoralism which pertains to the Hellene was a necessity, not a ‘natural quality’. It was produced, it was not there from the beginning. And one employed festivals and arts for no other purpose than to feel oneself dominant, to show oneself dominant: they are means for making oneself feared.... To judge the Greeks by their philosophers, in the German manner, perchance to employ the philistinism of the Socratic schools as a clue to what is fundamentally Hellenic!... But the philosophers are the décadents of Hellenism, the counter-movement against the old, the noble taste (– against the agonal instinct, against the polis, against the value of the race, against the authority of tradition). The Socratic virtues were preached because the Greeks had lost them: excitable, timid, fickle, comedians every one, they had more than enough reason to let morality be preached to them. Not that it would have done any good: but big words and fine attitudes are so suited to décadents... 4 I was the first to take seriously that wonderful phenomenon which bears the name Dionysos as a means to understanding the older Hellenic instinct, an instinct still exuberant and even overflowing: it is explicable only as an excess of energy. Whoever has investigated the Greeks, such as that profoundest student of their culture now living, Jacob Burckhardt of Basel, realizes at once the value of this line of approach: Burckhardt inserted a special section on the said phenomenon into his Culture of the Greeks. For the opposite of this, one should take a look at the almost laughable poverty of instinct displayed by German philologists whenever they approach the Dionysian. The celebrated Lobeck especially, who crept into this world of mysterious states with the honest self-confidence of a dried-up bookworm and by being nauseously frivolous and childish persuaded himself he was being scientific – Lobeck intimated, with a great display of erudition, that these curiosities were of no consequence. To be sure, the priests might have communicated a number of valuable pieces of information to the participants in such orgies – that wine arouses desire, for example, that man can live on fruit if need be, that plants bloom in spring and wither in autumn. As regards that strange wealth of rites, symbols and myths of orgiastic origin with which the antique world was quite literally overrun, Lobeck finds in them an occasion for becoming a trifle more ingenious. 'When the Greeks had nothing else to do,' he says (Aglao-phamus I, 672), 'they used to laugh, jump, race about, or, since man sometimes feels a desire for this, they used to sit down and weep and wail. Others later came along and sought some reason for this striking behaviour; and thus those countless myths and legends arose to explain these practices. On the other hand, one believed that the droll activities which now took place on festival days necessarily pertained to festival celebration and retained them as an indispensable part of divine worship.' – This is contemptible chatter and no one is likely to take a Lobeck seriously for a moment. We are affected quite differently when we probe the concept 'Greek' which Winckelmann and Goethe constructed for themselves and find it incompatible with that element out of which Dionysian art evolved – the orgy. I have, in fact, no doubt that Goethe would have utterly excluded anything of this kind from the possibilities of the Greek soul. Consequently Goethe did not understand the Greeks. For it is only in the Dionysian mysteries, in the psychology of the Dionysian condition, that the fundamental fact of the Hellenic instinct expresses itself – its 'will to life'. What did the Hellene guarantee to himself with these mysteries? Eternal life, the eternal recurrence of life; the future promised and consecrated in the past; the triumphant Yes to life beyond death and change; true life as collective continuation of life through procreation, through the mysteries of sexuality. It was for this reason that the sexual symbol was to the Greeks the symbol venerable as such, the intrinsic profound meaning of all antique piety. Every individual detail in the act of procreation, pregnancy, birth, awoke the most exalted and solemn feelings. In the teachings of the mysteries, pain is sanctified: the 'pains of childbirth' sanctify pain in general – all becoming and growing, all that guarantees the future, postulates pain.... For the eternal joy in creating to exist, for the will to life eternally to affirm itself, the 'torment of childbirth' must also exist eternally.... All this is contained in the word Dionysos: I know of no more exalted symbolism than this Greek symbolism, the symbolism of the Dionysian. The profoundest instinct of life, the instinct for the future of life, for the eternity of life, is in this word experienced religiously – the actual road to life, procreation, as the sacred road.... It was only Christianity, with resentment against life in its foundations, which made of sexuality something impure: it threw filth on the beginning, on the prerequisite of our life... 5 The psychology of the orgy as an overflowing feeling of life and energy within which even pain acts as a stimulus provided me with the key to the concept of the tragic feeling, which was misunderstood as much by Aristotle as it especially was by our pessimists. Tragedy is so far from providing evidence for pessimism among the Hellenes in Schopenhauer's sense that it has to be considered the decisive repudiation of that idea and the counter-verdict to it. Affirmation of life even in its strangest and sternest problems, the will to life rejoicing in its own inexhaustibility through the sacrifice of its highest types – that is what I called Dionysian, that is what I recognized as the bridge to the psychology of the tragic poet. Not so as to get rid of pity and terror, not so as to purify oneself of a dangerous emotion through its vehement discharge – it was thus Aristotle understood it – : but, beyond pity and terror, to realize in oneself the eternal joy of becoming – that joy which also encompasses joy in destruction.... And with that I again return to the place from which I set out – Birth of Tragedy was my first revaluation of all values: with that I again plant myself in the soil out of which I draw all that I will and can – I, the last disciple of the philosopher Dionysos – I, the teacher of the eternal recurrence...*

The Hammer Speaks 'Why so hard?' the charcoal once said to the diamond; 'for are we not close relations?' Why so soft? O my brothers, thus I ask you: for are you not – my brothers? Why so soft, unresisting and yielding? Why is there so much denial and abnegation in your hearts? So little fate in your glances? And if you will not be fates, if you will not be inexorable: how can you – conquer with me? And if your hardness will not flash and cut and cut to pieces: how can you one day – create with me? For all creators are hard. And it must seem bliss to you to press your hand upon millennia as upon wax, bliss to write upon the will of millennia as upon metal – harder than metal, nobler than metal. Only the noblest is perfectly hard. This new law-table do I put over you, O my brothers: Become hard!*

THE ANTI-CHRIST Foreword This book belongs to the very few. Perhaps none of them is even living yet. Possibly they are the readers who understand my Zarathustra: how could I confound myself with those for whom there are ears listening today? – Only the day after tomorrow belongs to me. Some are born posthumously. The conditions under which one understands me and then necessarily understands – I know them all too well. One must be honest in intellectual matters to the point of harshness to so much as endure my seriousness, my passion. One must be accustomed to living on mountains – to seeing the wretched ephemeral chatter of politics and national egoism beneath one. One must have become indifferent, one must never ask whether truth is useful or a fatality.... Strength which prefers questions for which no one today is sufficiently daring; courage for the forbidden; predestination for the labyrinth. An experience out of seven solitudes. New ears for new music. New eyes for the most distant things. A new conscience for truths which have hitherto remained dumb. And the will to economy in the grand style: to keeping one's energy, one's enthusiasm in bounds.... Reverence for oneself; love for oneself; unconditional freedom with respect to oneself... Very well! These alone are my readers, my rightful readers, my predestined readers: what do the rest matter? – The rest are merely mankind. – One must be superior to mankind in force, in loftiness of soul – in contempt... FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE 1 – Let us look one another in the face. We are Hyperboreans* – we know well enough how much out of the way we live. ‘Neither by land nor by sea shalt thou find the road to the Hyperboreans’: Pindar already knew that of us. Beyond the North, beyond the ice, beyond death – our life, our happiness.... We have discovered happiness, we know the road, we have found the exit out of whole millennia of labyrinth. Who else has found it? – Modern man perhaps? – ‘I know not which way to turn; I am everything that knows not which way to turn’ – sighs modern man.... It was from this modernity that we were ill – from lazy peace, from cowardly compromise, from the whole virtuous uncleanliness of modern Yes and No. This tolerance and largeness of heart which ‘forgives’ everything because it ‘Understands’ everything is sirocco to us. Better to live among ice than among modern virtues and other south winds!... We were brave enough, we spared neither ourselves nor others: but for long we did not know where to apply our courage. We became gloomy, we were called fatalists. Our fatality – was the plenitude, the tension, the blocking-up of our forces. We thirsted for lightning and action, of all things we kept ourselves furthest from the happiness of the weaklings, from ‘resignation’ There was a thunderstorm in our air, the nature which we are grew dark – for we had no road. Formula of our happiness: a Yes, a No, a straight line, a goal... 2 What is good? – All that heightens the feeling of power, the will to power, power itself in man. What is bad? – All that proceeds from weakness. What is happiness? – The feeling that power increases – that a resistance is overcome. Not contentment, but more power; not peace at all, but war; not virtue, but proficiency (virtue in the Renaissance style, virtù, virtue free of moral acid). The weak and ill-constituted shall perish: first principle of our philanthropy. And one shall help them to do so. What is more harmful than any vice? – Active sympathy for the ill-constituted and weak – Christianity... 3 The problem I raise here is not what ought to succeed mankind in the sequence of species (– the human being is a conclusion –): but what type of human being one ought to breed, ought to will, as more valuable, more worthy of life, more certain of the future. This more valuable type has existed often enough already: but as a lucky accident, as an exception, never as willed. He has rather been the most feared, he has hitherto been virtually the thing to be feared – and out of fear the reverse type has been willed, bred, achieved: the domestic animal, the herd animal, the sick animal man – the Christian... 4 Mankind does not represent a development of the better or the stronger or the higher in the way that is believed today. ‘Progress’ is merely a modern idea, that is to say a false idea. The European of today is of far less value than the European of the Renaissance; onward development is not by any means, by any necessity the same thing as elevation, advance, strengthening. In another sense there are cases of individual success constantly appearing in the most various parts of the earth and from the most various cultures in which a higher type does manifest itself: something which in relation to collective mankind is a sort of superman. Such chance occurrences of great success have always been possible and perhaps always will be possible. And even entire races, tribes, nations can under certain circumstances represent such a lucky hit. 5 One should not embellish or dress up Christianity: it has waged a war to the death against this higher type of man, it has excommunicated all the fundamental instincts of this type, it has distilled evil, the Evil One, out of these instincts – the strong human being as the type of reprehensibility, as the ‘outcast’. Christianity has taken the side of everything weak, base, ill-constituted, it has made an ideal out of opposition to the preservative instincts of strong life; it has depraved the reason even of the intellectually strongest natures by teaching men to feel the supreme values of intellectuality as sinful, as misleading, as temptations. The most deplorable example: the depraving of Pascal, who believed his reason had been depraved by original sin while it had only been depraved by his Christianity! – 6 It is a painful, a dreadful spectacle which has opened up before me: I have drawn back the curtain on the depravity of man. In my mouth this word is protected against at any rate one suspicion: that it contains a moral accusation of man. It is – I should like to underline the fact again – free of any moralic acid: and this to the extent that I find that depravity precisely where hitherto one most consciously aspired to ‘virtue’, to ‘divinity’. I understand depravity, as will already have been guessed, in the sense of décadence: my assertion is that all the values in which mankind at present summarizes its highest desideratum are décadence values. I call an animal, a species, an individual depraved when it loses its instincts, when it chooses, when it prefers what is harmful to it. A history of the ‘higher feelings’, of the ‘ideals of mankind’ – and it is possible I shall have to narrate it – would almost also constitute an explanation of why man is so depraved. I consider life itself instinct for growth, for continuance, for accumulation of forces, for power: where the will to power is lacking there is decline. My assertion is that this will is lacking in all the supreme values of mankind – that values of decline, nihilistic values hold sway under the holiest names. 7 Christianity is called the religion of pity. – Pity stands in antithesis to the tonic emotions which enhance the energy of the feeling of life: it has a depressive effect. One loses force when one pities. The loss of force which life has already sustained through suffering is increased and multiplied even further by pity. Suffering itself becomes contagious through pity; sometimes it can bring about a collective loss of life and life-energy which stands in an absurd relation to the quantum of its cause (– the case of the death of the Nazarene). This is the first aspect; but there is an even more important one. If one judges pity by the value of the reactions which it usually brings about, its mortally dangerous character appears in a much clearer light. Pity on the whole thwarts the law of evolution, which is the law of selection. It preserves what is ripe for destruction; it defends life's disinherited and condemned; through the abundance of the ill-constituted of all kinds which it retains in life it gives life itself a gloomy and questionable aspect. One has ventured to call pity a virtue (– in every noble morality it counts as weakness –); one has gone further, one has made of it the virtue, the ground and origin of all virtue – only, to be sure, from the viewpoint of a nihilistic philosophy which inscribed Denial of Life on its escutcheon – a fact always to be kept in view. Schopenhauer was within his rights in this: life is denied, made more worthy of denial by pity – pity is practical nihilism. To say it again, this depressive and contagious instinct thwarts those instincts bent on preserving and enhancing the value of life: both as a multiplier of misery and as a conservator of everything miserable it is one of the chief instruments for the advancement of décadence – pity persuades to nothingness!... One does not say 'nothingness': one says 'the Beyond'; or 'God'; or 'true life'; or Nirvana, redemption, blessedness.... This innocent rhetoric from the domain of religio-moral idiosyncrasy at once appears much less innocent when one grasps which tendency is here draping the mantle of sublime words about itself: the tendency hostile to life. Schopenhauer was hostile to life: therefore pity became for him a virtue.... Aristotle, as is well known, saw in pity a morbid and dangerous condition which one did well to get at from time to time with a purgative: he understood tragedy as a purgative. From the instinct for life one would indeed have to seek some means of puncturing so morbid and dangerous an accumulation of pity as that represented by the case of Schopenhauer (and unfortunately also by our entire literary and artistic décadence from St Petersburg to Paris, from Tolstoy to Wagner), so that it might burst.... Nothing in our unhealthy modernity is more unhealthy than Christian pity. To be physician here, to be inexorable here, to wield the knife here – that pertains to us, that is our kind of philanthropy, with that are we philosophers, we Hyperboreans! – 8 It is necessary to say whom we feel to be our antithesis – the theologians and all that has theologian blood in its veins – our entire philosophy.... One must have seen the fatality from close up, better still one must have experienced it in oneself, one must have almost perished by it, no longer to find anything funny here (the free-thinking of our naturalists and physiologists is to my mind funny – they lack passion in these things, they do not suffer from them –). That poison extends much further than one thinks: I have discovered the arrogant theologian-instinct wherever anyone today feels himself to be an 'idealist' – wherever anyone assumes, by virtue of a higher origin, a right to cast strange and superior looks at actuality.... Just like the priest, the idealist has all the great concepts in his hand (– and not only in his hand!), he plays them out with a benevolent contempt against the 'understanding', the 'senses', 'honours', 'luxury', 'science', he sees these things as beneath him, as harmful and seductive forces above which ‘the spirit’ soars in pure self-sufficiency – as though humility, chastity, poverty, in a word holiness, had not hitherto done life unutterably more harm than any sort of frightfulness or vice whatever.... Pure spirit is pure lie.... So long as the priest, that denier, calumniator and poisoner of life by profession, still counts as a higher kind of human being, there can be no answer to the question: what is truth? One has already stood truth on its head when the conscious advocate of denial and nothingness counts as the representative of ‘truth’... 9 I make war on this theologian instinct: I have found traces of it everywhere. Whoever has theologian blood in his veins has a wrong and dishonest attitude towards all things from the very first. The pathos that develops out of this is called faith: closing one’s eyes with respect to oneself for good and all so as not to suffer from the sight of incurable falsity. Out of this erroneous perspective on all things one makes a morality, a virtue, a holiness for oneself, one unites the good conscience with seeing falsely – one demands that no other kind of perspective shall be accorded any value after one has rendered one’s own sacrosanct with the names ‘God’, ‘redemption’, ‘eternity’. I have dug out the theologian instinct everywhere: it is the most widespread, peculiarly subterranean form of falsity that exists on earth. What a theologian feels to be true must be false: this provides almost a criterion of truth. It is his deepest instinct of self-preservation which forbids any part of reality whatever to be held in esteem or even spoken of. Wherever the influence of the theologian extends value judgement is stood on its head, the concepts ‘true’ and ‘false’ are necessarily reversed: that which is most harmful to life is here called ‘true’, that which enhances, intensifies, affirms, justifies it and causes it to triumph is called ‘false’.... If it happens that, by way of the ‘conscience’ of princes (or of nations –), theologians stretch out their hands after power, let us be in no doubt what at bottom is taking place every time: the will to the end, the nihilistic will wants power... 10 Among Germans one will understand immediately when I say that philosophy has been corrupted by theologian blood. The Protestant pastor is the grandfather of German philosophy, Protestantism itself is its peccatum originale.* Definition of Protestantism: the half-sided paralysis of Christianity – and of reason.... One has only to say the words ‘College of Tübingen’† to grasp what German philosophy is at bottom – a cunning theology.... The Swabians are the best liars in Germany, they lie innocently.... Why the rejoicing heard throughout the German academic world – three-quarters composed of the sons of pastors and teachers – at the appearance of Kant? Why the Germans’ conviction, which still finds an echo even today, that with Kant things were taking a turn for the better? The theologian instinct in the German scholar divined what was henceforth possible once again.... A secret path to the old ideal stood revealed, the concept ‘real world’, the concept of morality as the essence of the world (– these two most vicious errors in existence!) were once more, thanks to a crafty-sly scepticism, if not demonstrable yet no longer refutable.... Reason, the right of reason does not extend so far.... One had made of reality an ‘appearance’; one had made a completely fabricated world, that of being, into reality.... Kant’s success is merely a theologian’s success: German integrity was far from firm and Kant, like Luther, like Leibniz, was one more constraint upon it... 11 A word against Kant as moralist. A virtue has to be our invention, our most personal defence and necessity: in any other sense it is merely a danger. What does not condition our life harms it: a virtue merely from a feeling of respect for the concept ‘virtue’, as Kant desired it, is harmful. ‘Virtue’, ‘duty’, ‘good in itself’, impersonal and universal – phantoms, expressions of decline, of the final exhaustion of life, of Kônigsbergian Chinadom. The profoundest laws of preservation and growth demand the reverse of this: that each one of us should devise his own virtue, his own categorical imperative. A people perishes if it mistakes its own duty for the concept of duty in general. Nothing works more profound ruin than any ‘impersonal’ duty, any sacrifice to the Moloch of abstraction. – Kant’s categorical imperative* should have been felt as mortally dangerous!... The theologian instinct alone took it under its protection! – An action compelled by the instinct of life has in the joy of performing it the proof it is a right action: and that nihilist with Christian-dogmatic bowels understands joy as an objection.... What destroys more quickly than to work, to think, to feel without inner necessity, without a deep personal choice, without joy? as an automaton of ‘duty’? It is virtually a recipe for décadence, even for idiocy.... Kant became an idiot. – And that was the contemporary of Goethe! This fatal spider counted as the German philosopher – still does! I take care not to say what I think of the Germans.... Did Kant not see in the French Revolution the transition from the inorganic form of the state to the organic? Did he not ask himself whether there was an event which could be explained in no other way than by a moral predisposition on the part of mankind, so that with it the ‘tendency of man to seek the good’ would be proved once and for all? Kant’s answer: ‘The Revolution is that.’ The erring instinct in all and everything, antinaturalness as instinct, German décadence as philosophy – that is Kant! – 12 I exclude a few sceptics, the decent type in the history of philosophy: but the rest are ignorant of the first requirements of intellectual integrity. These great visionaries and prodigies behave one and all like little women – they consider ‘fine feelings’ arguments, the ‘heaving bosom’ the bellows of divinity, conviction the criterion of truth. Finally Kant, in his ‘German’ innocence, tried to give this form of corruption, this lack of intellectual conscience, a scientific colouring with the concept ‘practical reason’: he designed a reason specifically for the case in which one was supposed not to have to bother about reason, namely when morality, when the sublime demand ‘thou shalt’ makes itself heard. If one considers that the philosopher is, in virtually all nations, only the further development of the priestly type, one is no longer surprised to discover this heirloom of the priest, self-deceptive fraudulence. If one has sacred tasks, for example that of improving, saving, redeeming mankind – if one carries the divinity in one's bosom, is the mouthpiece of an other-world imperative, such a mission already places one outside all merely reasonable valuations – one is already sanctified by such a task, one is already the type of a higher order!... What does a priest care about science! He is above it! – And the priest has hitherto ruled! – He has determined the concept 'true' and 'untrue'!... 13 Let us not undervalue this: we ourselves, we free spirits, are already a 'revaluation of all values', an incarnate declaration of war and victory over all ancient conceptions of 'true' and 'untrue'. The most valuable insights are the last to be discovered; but the most valuable insights are methods. All the methods, all the prerequisites of our present-day scientificity have for millennia been the objects of the profoundest contempt: on their account one was excluded from associating with 'honest' men – one was considered an 'enemy of God', a despiser of truth, a man 'possessed'. As a practitioner of science one was Chandala.... We have had the whole pathos of mankind against us – its conception of what truth ought to be; every 'thou shalt' has hitherto been directed against us.... Our objectives, our practices, our quiet, cautious, mistrustful manner – all this appeared utterly unworthy and contemptible to mankind. – In the end one might reasonably ask oneself whether it was not really an aesthetic taste which blinded mankind for so long: it desired a picturesque effect from truth, it desired especially that the man of knowledge should produce a powerful impression on the senses. It was our modesty which offended their taste the longest.... Oh, how well they divined that fact, those turkey-cocks of God – 14 We have learned better. We have become more modest in every respect. We no longer trace the origin of man in the 'spirit', in the 'divinity', we have placed him back among the animals. We consider him the strongest animal because he is the most cunning: his spirituality is a consequence of this. On the other hand, we guard ourselves against a vanity which would like to find expression even here: the vanity that man is the great secret objective of animal evolution. Man is absolutely not the crown of creation: every creature stands beside him at the same stage of perfection. ... And even in asserting that we assert too much: man is, relatively speaking, the most unsuccessful animal, the sickliest, the one most dangerously strayed from its instincts – with all that, to be sure, the most interesting! – As regards the animals, Descartes was the first who, with a boldness worthy of reverence, ventured to think of the animal as a machine: our whole science of physiology is devoted to proving this proposition. Nor, logically, do we exclude man, as even Descartes did: our knowledge of man today is real knowledge precisely to the extent that it is knowledge of him as a machine. Formerly man was presented with 'free will' as a dowry from a higher order: today we have taken even will away from him, in the sense that will may no longer be understood as a faculty. The old word 'will' only serves to designate a resultant, a kind of individual reaction which necessarily follows a host of partly contradictory, partly congruous stimuli – the will no longer 'effects' anything, no longer 'moves' anything.... Formerly one saw in man's consciousness, in his 'spirit', the proof of his higher origin, his divinity; to make himself perfect man was advised to draw his senses back into himself in the manner of the tortoise, to cease to have any traffic with the earthly, to lay aside his mortal frame: then the chief part of him would remain behind, 'pure spirit'. We have thought better of this too: becoming-conscious, 'spirit', is to us precisely a symptom of a relative imperfection of the organism, as an attempting, fumbling, blundering, as a toiling in which an unnecessarily large amount of nervous energy is expended – we deny that anything can be made perfect so long as it is still made conscious. 'Pure spirit' is pure stupidity: if we deduct the nervous system and the senses, the 'mortal frame', we miscalculate – that's all!... 15 In Christianity neither morality nor religion come into contact with reality at any point. Nothing but imaginary causes ('God', 'soul', 'ego', 'spirit', 'free will' – or 'unfree will'): nothing but imaginary effects ('sin', 'redemption', 'grace', 'punishment', 'forgiveness of sins'). A traffic between imaginary beings ('God', 'spirits', 'souls'); an imaginary natural science (anthropocentric; complete lack of the concept of natural causes); an imaginary psychology (nothing but selfmisunderstandings, interpretations of pleasant or unpleasant general feelings, for example the condition of the nervus sympathicus, with the aid of the sign-language of religio-moral idiosyncrasy – 'repentance', 'sting of conscience', 'temptation by the Devil', 'the proximity of God'); an imaginary teleology ('the kingdom of God', 'the Last Judgement', 'eternal life'). – This purely fictitious world is distinguished from the world of dreams, very much to its disadvantage, by the fact that the latter mirrors actuality, while the former falsifies, disvalues and denies actuality. Once the concept 'nature' had been devised as the concept antithetical to 'God', 'natural' had to be the word for 'reprehensible' – this entire fictional world has its roots in hatred of the natural (– actuality! –), it is the expression of a profound discontent with the actual.... But that explains everything. Who alone has reason to lie himself out of actuality? He who suffers from it. But to suffer from actuality means to be an abortive actuality.... The preponderance of feelings of displeasure over feelings of pleasure is the cause of a fictitious morality and religion: such a preponderance, however, provides the formula for décadence... 16 A critical examination of the Christian concept of God invites a similar conclusion. – A people which still believes in itself still also has its own God. In him it venerates the conditions through which it has prospered, its virtues – it projects its joy in itself, its feeling of power on to a being whom one can thank for them. He who is rich wants to bestow; a proud people needs a God in order to sacrifice.... With in the bounds of such presuppositions religion is a form of gratitude. One is grateful for oneself: for that one needs a God. – Such a God must be able to be both useful and harmful, both friend and foe – he is admired in good and bad alike. The anti-natural castration of a God into a God of the merely good would be totally undesirable here. One has as much need of the evil God as of the good God: for one does not owe one's existence to philanthropy or tolerance precisely.... Of what consequence would a God be who knew nothing of anger, revengefulness, envy, mockery, cunning, acts of violence? To whom even the rapturous ardeurs of victory and destruction were unknown? One would not understand such a God: why should one have him? – To be sure: when a people is perishing; when it feels its faith in the future, its hope of freedom vanish completely; when it becomes conscious that the most profitable thing of all is submissiveness and that the virtues of submissiveness are a condition of its survival, then its God has to alter too. He now becomes a dissembler, timid, modest, counsels 'peace of soul', no more hatred, forbearance, 'love' even towards friend and foe. He is continually moralizing, he creeps into the cave of every private virtue, becomes a God for everybody, becomes a private man, becomes a cosmopolitan.... Formerly he represented a people, the strength of a people, everything aggressive and thirsting for power in the soul of a people: now he is merely the good God.... There is in fact no other alternative for Gods: either they are the will to power – and so long as they are that they will be national Gods – or else the impotence for power – and then they necessarily become good... 17 Wherever the will to power declines in any form there is every time also a physiological regression, a décadence. The divinity of décadence, pruned of all its manliest drives and virtues, from now on necessarily becomes the God of the physiologically retarded, the weak. They do not call themselves the weak, they call themselves 'the good'.... One will understand without further indication at what moment of history the dual fiction of a good and an evil God first becomes possible. The same instinct which makes the subjugated people reduce its God to the 'good in itself makes them expunge the good qualities from the God of their conqueror; they revenge themselves on their masters by changing their masters' God into a devil. – The good God and the Devil: both products of décadence. – How can one today still defer so far to the simplicity of Christian theologians as to join them in proclaiming that the evolution of the concept of God from the 'God of Israel', the national God, to the Christian God, the epitome of everything good, is an advance? – But even Renan does so. As if Renan had a right to simplicity! For it is the opposite which leaps to the eye. When the prerequisites of ascending life, when everything strong, brave, masterful, proud is eliminated from the concept of God; when he declines step by step to the symbol of a staff for the weary, a sheet-anchor for all who are drowning; when he becomes the poor people's God, the sinner's God, the God of the sick par excellence, and the predicate 'saviour', 'redeemer' as it were remains over as the predicate of divinity as such: of what does such a transformation speak? such a reduction of the divine? – To be sure: 'the kingdom of God' has thereby grown larger. Formerly he had only his people, his 'chosen' people. In the meantime, just like his people itself, he has gone abroad, gone wandering about; since then he has sat still nowhere: until at last he is at home everywhere, the great cosmopolitan – until he has got 'the great majority' and half the earth on his side. But the God of the 'great majority', the democrat among Gods, has none the less not become a proud pagan God: he has remained a Jew, he has remained the God of the nook, the God of all the dark corners and places, of all unhealthy quarters throughout the world!... His world-empire is as before an underworld-empire, a hospital, a souterrain-empire, a ghetto-empire.... And he himself so pale, so weak, so décadent.... Even the palest of the pale have still been able to master him, messieurs the metaphysicians, the conceptual albinos. These have spun their web around him so long that, hypnotized by their movements, he himself became a spider, a metaphysician. Thence forward he span the world again out of himself – sub specie Spinozæ – thenceforward he transformed himself into something ever paler and less substantial, became an 'ideal', became 'pure spirit', became 'absolutum', became 'thing in itself.... Decay of a God: God became 'thing in itself'... 18 The Christian conception of God – God as God of the sick, God as spider, God as spirit – is one of the most corrupt conceptions of God arrived at on earth: perhaps it even represents the low-water mark in the descending development of the God type. God degenerated to the contradiction of life, instead of being its transfiguration and eternal Yes! In God a declaration of hostility towards life, nature, the will to life! God the formula for every calumny of 'this world', for every lie about 'the next world'! In God nothingness deified, the will to nothingness sanctified!... 19 That the strong races of northern Europe have not repudiated the Christian God certainly reflects no credit on their talent for religion – not to speak of their taste. They ought to have felt compelled to have done with such a sickly and decrepit product of décadence. But there lies a curse on them for not having had done with it: they have taken up sickness, old age, contradiction into all their instincts – since then they have failed to create a God! Almost two millennia and not a single new God! But still, and as if existing by right, like an ultimate and maximum of the God-creating force, of the creator spiritus in man, this pitiable God of Christian monotono-theism! This hybrid of the void, conceptualism and contradiction, this picture of decay, in which all décadence instincts, all cowardliness and weariness of soul have their sanction! – 20 With my condemnation of Christianity, I should not like to have wronged a kindred religion which even preponderates in the number of its believers: Buddhism. They belong together as nihilistic religions – they are décadence religions – but they are distinguished from one another in the most remarkable way. The critic of Christianity is profoundly grateful to Indian scholars that one is now able to compare these two religions. – Buddhism is a hundred times more realistic than Christianity – it has the heritage of a cool and objective posing of problems in its composition, it arrives after a philosophical movement lasting hundreds of years; the concept ‘God’ is already abolished by the time it arrives. Buddhism is the only really positivistic religion history has to show us, even in its epistemology (a strict phenomenalism –), it no longer speaks of ‘the struggle against sin’ but, quite in accordance with actuality, ‘the struggle against suffering’. It already has – and this distinguishes it profoundly from Christianity – the self-deception of moral concepts behind it – it stands, in my language, beyond good and evil. – The two physiological facts upon which it rests and on which it fixes its eyes are: firstly an excessive excitability of sensibility which expresses itself as a refined capacity for pain, then an over-intellectuality, a too great preoccupation with concepts and logical procedures under which the personal instinct has sustained harm to the advantage of the ‘impersonal’ (– both of them conditions which at any rate some of my readers, the objective ones, will know from experience, as I do). On the basis of these physiological conditions a state of depression has arisen: against this depression Buddha takes hygienic measures. He opposes it with life in the open air, the wandering life; with moderation and fastidiousness as regards food; with caution towards all emotions which produce gall, which heat the blood; no anxiety, either for oneself or for others. He demands ideas which produce repose or cheerfulness – he devises means for disaccustoming oneself to others. He understands benevolence, being kind, as health-promoting. Prayer is excluded, as is asceticism; no categorical imperative, no compulsion at all, not even with in the monastic community (– one can leave it –). All these would have the effect of increasing that excessive excitability. For this reason too he demands no struggle against those who think differently; his teaching resists nothing more than it resists the feeling of revengefulness, of antipathy, of resentment (– ‘enmity is not ended by enmity’: the moving refrain of the whole of Buddhism...). And quite rightly: it is precisely these emotions which would be thoroughly unhealthy with regard to the main dietetic objective. The spiritual weariness he discovered and which expressed itself as an excessive ‘objectivity’ (that is to say weakening of individual interest, loss of centre of gravity, of ‘egoism’), he combated by directing even the spiritual interests back to the individual person. In the teaching of Buddha egoism becomes a duty: the ‘one thing needful’, the ‘how can you get rid of suffering’ regulates and circumscribes the entire spiritual diet (– one may perhaps call to mind that Athenian who likewise made war on pure ‘scientificality’, Socrates, who elevated personal egoism to morality even in the domain of problems). 21 The precondition for Buddhism is a very mild climate, very gentle and liberal customs, no militarism; and that it is the higher and even learned classes in which the movement has its home. The supreme goal is cheerfulness, stillness, absence of desire, and this goal is achieved. Buddhism is not a religion in which one merely aspires after perfection: perfection is the normal case. – In Christianity the instincts of the subjugated and oppressed come into the foreground: it is the lowest classes which seek their salvation in it. Here the casuistic business of sin, self-criticism, conscience-inquisition is practised as a specific against boredom; here an emotional attitude towards a power, called ‘God’, is kept constantly alive (through prayer); here the highest things are considered unachievable, gifts, ‘grace’. Here public openness is also lacking; the hole-and-corner, the dark chamber is Christian. Here the body is despised, hygiene repudiated as sensuality; the Church even resists cleanliness (– the first measure taken by the Christians after the expulsion of the Moors was the closure of the public baths, of which Cordova alone possessed 270). A certain sense of cruelty towards oneself and others is Christian; hatred of those who think differently; the will to persecute. Gloomy and exciting ideas stand in the foreground; the states most highly desired and designated by the highest names are epileptoid states; diet is selected so as to encourage morbid phenomena and to over-excite the nerves. Mortal hostility against the masters of the earth, against the ‘noble’ – and at the same time a covert secret competition (– one allows them the ‘body’, one wants only the ‘soul’): that is also Christian. Hatred of mind, of pride, courage, freedom, libertinage of mind is Christian; hatred of the senses, of the joy of the senses, of joy in general is Christian... 22 When it left its original home, the lowest orders, the underworld of the ancient world, when it went in search of power among barbarian peoples, Christianity had no longer to presuppose weary human beings but inwardly savage and self-lacerating ones – strong but ill-constituted human beings. Here discontentedness with oneself, suffering from oneself is not, as it is with the Buddhists, an immoderate excitability and capacity for pain, but on the contrary an overwhelming desire to do harm, to discharge an inner tension in hostile actions and ideas. To dominate barbarians Christianity had need of barbarous concepts and values: sacrifice of the first-born, blood-drinking at communion, contempt for intellect and culture; torture in all its forms, physical and non-physical; great pomp brought to public worship. Buddhism is a religion for late human beings, for races grown kindly, gentle, over-intellectual who feel pain too easily (– Europe is not nearly ripe for it –): it leads them back to peace and cheerfulness, to an ordered diet in intellectual things, to a certain physical hardening. Christianity desires to dominate beasts of prey; its means for doing so is to make them sick – weakening is the Christian recipe for taming, for ‘civilization’. Buddhism is a religion for the end and fatigue of a civilization, Christianity does not even find civilization in existence – it establishes civilization if need be. 23 Buddhism, to say it again, is a hundred times colder, more veracious, more objective. It no longer needs to make its suffering and capacity for pain decent to itself by interpreting it as sin – it merely says what it feels: ‘I suffer’. To the barbarian, on the contrary, suffering in itself is not decent: he first requires it to be interpreted before he will admit to himself that he suffers (his instinct directs him rather to deny he is suffering, to a silent endurance). Here the word ‘Devil’ was a blessing: one had an overwhelming and fearful enemy – one did not need to be ashamed of suffering at the hands of such an enemy. – Christianity has a number of subtleties in its foundations which belong to the Orient. Above all, it knows that it is in itself a matter of absolute indifference whether a thing be true, but a matter of the highest importance to what extent it is believed to be true. Truth and the belief that something is true: two completely diverse worlds of interest, almost antithetical worlds – one gets to them by fundamentally different roads. To be knowledgeable in this – in the Orient that is almost enough to constitute a sage: thus the Brahmins* understood it, thus Plato understands it, thus does every student of esoteric wisdom understand it. If, for example, there is happiness to be found in believing oneself redeemed from sin, it is not necessary for a man first to be sinful, but for him to feel himself sinful. If, however, it is belief as such which is necessary above all else, then one has to bring reason, knowledge, inquiry into disrepute: the road to truth becomes the forbidden road. – Intense hope is a much stronger stimulant to life than any single instance of happiness which actually occurs. Sufferers have to be sustained by a hope which cannot be refuted by any actuality – which is not done away with by any fulfilment: a hope in the Beyond. (It was precisely on account of this capacity for keeping the unhappy in suspense that the Greeks considered hope the evil of evils, the actual malignant evil: it remained behind in the box of evil.) – So that love shall be possible, God has to be a person; so that the lowest instincts shall have a voice, God has to be young. To satisfy the ardour of the women a handsome saint is moved into the foreground, to satisfy that of the men a Mary. This on the presupposition that Christianity desires to become master on a soil where the worship of Adonis or Aphrodite has already determined the concept of what religious worship is. The requirement of chastity increases the vehemence and inward intensity of the religious instinct – it renders the cult warmer, more enthusiastic, more soulful. – Love is the state in which man sees things most of all as they are not. The illusioncreating force is there at its height, likewise the sweetening and transforming force. One endures more when in love than one otherwise would, one tolerates everything. The point was to devise a religion in which love is possible: with that one is beyond the worst that life can offer – one no longer even sees it. – So much for the three Christian virtues faith, hope and charity:† I call them the three Christian shrewdnesses. – Buddhism is too late, too positivistic still to be shrewd in this fashion. – 24 I only touch on the problem of the origin of Christianity here. The first proposition towards its solution is: Christianity can be understood only by referring to the soil out of which it grew – it is not a counter-movement against the Jewish instinct, it is actually its logical consequence, one further conclusion of its fear-inspiring logic. In the Redeemer's formula: 'Salvation is of the Jews'. – The second proposition is: the psychological type of the Galilean is still recognizable – but only in a completely degenerate form (which is at once a mutilation and an overloading with foreign traits) could it serve the end to which it was put, that of being the type of a redeemer of mankind. – The Jews are the most remarkable nation of world history because, faced with the question of being or not being, they preferred, with a perfectly uncanny conviction, being at any price: the price they had to pay was the radical falsification of all nature, all naturalness, all reality, the entire inner world as well as the outer. They defined themselves counter to all those conditions under which a nation was previously able to live, was permitted to live; they made of themselves an antithesis to natural conditions – they inverted religion, religious worship, morality, history, psychology one after the other in an irreparable way into the contradiction of their natural values. We encounter the same phenomenon again and in unutterably vaster proportions, although only as a copy – the Christian Church, in contrast to the 'nation of saints', renounces all claim to originality. For precisely this reason the Jews are the most fateful nation in world history; their after-effect has falsified mankind to such an extent that today the Christian is able to feel anti-Jewish without realizing he is the ultimate consequence of the Jews. In my Genealogy of Morals I introduced for the first time the psychology of the antithetical concepts of a noble morality and a resentment morality, the latter deriving from a denial of the former: but this latter corresponds totally to JudeoChristian morality. To be able to reject all that represents the ascending movement of life, well-constitutedness, power, beauty, self-affirmation on earth, the instinct of resentment here become genius had to invent another world from which that lifeaffirmation would appear evil, reprehensible as such. Considered psychologically, the Jewish nation is a nation of the toughest vital energy which, placed in impossible circumstances, voluntarily, from the profoundest shrewdness in selfpreservation, took the side of all decadence instincts – not as being dominated by them but because it divined in them a power by means of which one can prevail against 'the world'. The Jews are the counterparts of décadents: they have been compelled to act as décadents to the point of illusion, they have known, with a non plus ultra of histrionic genius, how to place themselves at the head of all decadence movements (– as the Christianity of Paul –) so as to make of them something stronger than any party affirmative of life. For the kind of man who desires to attain power through Judaism and Christianity, the priestly kind, decadence is only a means: this kind of man has a life-interest in making mankind sick and in inverting the concepts 'good' and 'evil', 'true' and 'false' in a mortally dangerous and worldcalumniating sense. – 25 The history of Israel is invaluable as a typical history of the denaturalizing of natural values: I shall indicate five stages in the process. Originally, above all in the period of the Kingdom, Israel too stood in a correct, that is to say natural relationship to all things. Their Yaweh was the expression of their consciousness of power, of their delight in themselves, their hopes of themselves: in him they anticipated victory and salvation, with him they trusted that nature would provide what the people needed – above all rain. Yaweh is the God of Israel and consequently the God of justice: the logic of every nation that is in power and has a good conscience about it. These two aspects of a nation's self-affirmation find expression in festival worship: it is grateful for the great destiny which has raised it on high, it is grateful towards the year's seasons and all its good fortune with livestock and husbandry. – This state of things long remained the ideal, even after it had been tragically done away with: anarchy with in, the Assyrian from without. But the people retained as its supreme desideratum that vision of a king who is a good soldier and an upright judge: as did above all the typical prophet (that is to say critic and satirist of the hour) Isaiah. – But every hope remained unfulfilled. The old God could no longer do what he formerly could. One should have let him go. What happened? One altered the conception of him: at this price one retained him. Yaweh the God of 'justice' – no longer at one with Israel, an expression of national selfconfidence: now only a God bound by conditions. The new conception of him becomes an instrument in the hands of priestly agitators who henceforth interpret all good fortune as a reward, all misfortune as punishment for disobedience of God, for 'sin': that most mendacious mode of interpretation of a supposed 'moral worldorder' through which the natural concept 'cause' and 'effect' is once and for all stood on its head. When one has banished natural causality from the world by means of reward and punishment, one then requires an anti-natural causality: all the remaining unnaturalness follows forthwith. A God who demands – in place of a God who helps, who devises means, who is fundamentally a word for every happy inspiration of courage and self-reliance.... Morality no longer the expression of the conditions under which a nation lives and grows, no longer a nation's deepest instinct of life, but become abstract, become the antithesis of life – morality as a fundamental degradation of the imagination, as an 'evil eye' for all things. What is Jewish, what is Christian morality? Chance robbed of its innocence; misfortune dirtied by the concept 'sin'; well-being as a danger, as 'temptation'; physiological indisposition poisoned by the worm of conscience... 26 The concept of God falsified; the concept of morality falsified – the Jewish priesthood did not stop there. The entire history of Israel was useless: away with it! – These priests perpetrated that miracle of falsification the documentation of which lies before us in a good part of the Bible: with unparalleled disdain of every tradition, every historical reality, they translated their own national past into religious terms, that is to say they made of it a stupid salvation-mechanism of guilt towards Yaweh and punishment, piety towards Yaweh and reward. We would feel this most shameful act of historical falsification much more painfully if millennia of ecclesiastical interpretation of history had not made us almost oblivious to the demands of integrity in historicis. And the philosophers have seconded the Church: the lie of a 'moral world-order' permeates the whole evolution even of the most recent philosophy. What does 'moral world-order' mean? That there exists once and for all a will of God as to what man is to do and what he is not to do; that the value of a nation, of an individual is to be measured by how much or how little obedience is accorded the will of God; that the ruling power of the will of God, expressed as punishment and reward according to the degree of obedience, is demonstrated in the destiny of a nation, of an individual. – The reality displaced by this pitiable lie is: a parasitic kind of human being which prospers only at the expense of every healthy form of life, the priest, abuses the name of God: he calls a state of society in which the priest determines the value of things 'the kingdom of God'; he calls the means by which such a state is achieved or perpetuated 'the will of God'; with coldblooded cynicism he assesses nations, epochs, individuals according to whether they were conducive to the rule of priests or whether they resisted it. Observe them at work: in the hands of the Jewish priests the great epoch in the history of Israel became an epoch of decay, the Exile, the long years of misfortune, was transformed into an eternal punishment for the great epoch – an epoch in which the priest was as yet nothing. According to their requirements they made the mighty, very freely constituted figures of Israel's history into either pathetic cringing bigots or 'godless men', they simplified the psychology of every great event into the idiotic formula 'obedience to or disobedience of God'. – A further step: the 'will of God' (that is to say the conditions for preserving the power of the priest) has to be known – to this end a 'revelation' is required. In plain words: a great literary forgery becomes necessary, a 'sacred book' is discovered – it is made public with all hieratic pomp, with days of repentance and with lamentation over the long years of 'sinfulness'. The 'will of God' had been established years before: the whole evil lay in the nation's having become estranged from the 'sacred book'.... The 'will of God' had been revealed already to Moses.... What had happened? The priest had, with precision and pedantry, right down to the imposts large and small which had to be paid to him (– not forgetting the tastiest pieces of meat: for the priest is a befeater), formulated once and for all what he intends to have, 'what the will of God is'.... From now on all things of life are so ordered that the priest is everywhere indispensable; at all the natural events of life, at birth, marriage, sickness, death, not to speak of 'sacrifice' (meal-times), there appears the holy parasite to denaturalize them – in his language to

‘sanctify’ them.... For one must grasp this: every natural custom, every natural institution (state, administration of justice, marriage, tending of the sick and poor), every requirement presented by the instinct for life, in short everything valuable in itself, becomes utterly valueless, inimical to value through the parasitism of the priest (or the ‘moral world-order’): a sanction is subsequently required – a value-bestowing power is needed which denies the natural quality in these things and only by doing so is able to create a value.... The priest disvalues, dissanctifies nature: it is only at the price of this that he exists at all. – Disobedience of God, that is to say of the priest, of ‘the Law’, now acquires the name ‘sin’; the means of ‘becoming reconciled again with God’ are, as is only to be expected, means by which subjection to the priest is only more thoroughly guaranteed: the priest alone ‘redeems’.... From a psychological point of view, ‘sins’ are indispensable in any society organized by priests: they are the actual levers of power, the priest lives on sins, he needs ‘the commission of sins’.... Supreme law: ‘God forgives him who repents’ – in plain language: who subjects himself to the priest. – 27 On a soil falsified in this way, where all nature, all natural value, all reality had the profoundest instincts of the ruling class against it, there arose Christianity, a form of mortal hostility to reality as yet unsurpassed. The ‘holy people’, which had retained only priestly values, priestly words, for all things, and with a consistency capable of inspiring fear had separated itself from everything else powerful on earth, calling it ‘unholy’, ‘world’, ‘sin’ – this people produced for its instinct a formula which was logical to the point of self-negation: as Christianity it negated the last remaining form of reality, the ‘holy people’, the ‘chosen people’, the Jewish reality itself. The case is of the first rank: the little rebellious movement which is baptized with the name of Jesus of Nazareth is the Jewish instinct once more – in other words the priestly instinct which can no longer endure the priest as a reality, the invention of an even more abstract form of existence, an even more unreal vision of the world than one conditioned by an organized Church. Christianity negates the Church... I fail to see against what the revolt was directed whose originator Jesus is understood or misunderstood to be if it was not a revolt against the Jewish Church – ‘Church’ taken in precisely the sense in which we take the word today. It was a revolt against ‘the good and the just’, against ‘the saints of Israel’, against the social hierarchy – not against a corruption of these but against caste, privilege, the order, the social form; it was disbelief in ‘higher men’, a No uttered towards everything that was priest and theologian. But the hierarchy which was thus called in question, even if only momentarily, was the pile-work upon which the Jewish nation continued to exist at all in the midst of the ‘waters’ – the laboriously-achieved last possibility of remaining in being, the residuum of its separate political existence: an attack on this was an attack on the profoundest national instinct, on the toughest national will to life which has ever existed on earth. This holy anarchist who roused up the lowly, the outcasts and ‘sinners’, the Chandala within Judaism to oppose the ruling order – in language which, if the Gospels are to be trusted, would even today lead to Siberia – was a political criminal, in so far as political criminals were possible in an absurdly unpolitical society. This is what brought him to the Cross: the proof is the inscription on the Cross. He died for his guilt – all ground is lacking for the assertion, however often it is made, that he died for the guilt of others. – 28 It is quite another question whether he was conscious of any such antithesis – whether he was not merely felt to be this antithesis. And here for the first time I touch on the problem of the psychology of the redeemer. – I confess there are few books which present me with so many difficulties as the Gospels do. These difficulties are quite other than those which the learned curiosity of the German mind celebrated one of its most unforgettable triumphs in pointing out. The time is far distant when I too, like every young scholar and with the clever dullness of a refined philologist, savoured the work of the incomparable Strauss. I was then twenty years old: now I am too serious for that. What do I care for the contradictions of ‘tradition’? How can legends of saints be called ‘tradition’ at all! The stories of saints are the most ambiguous literature in existence: to apply to them scientific procedures when no other records are extant seems to me wrong in principle – mere learned idling... 29 What I am concerned with is the psychological type of the redeemer. For it could be contained in the Gospels in spite of the Gospels, however much mutilated and overloaded with foreign traits: as that of Francis of Assisi is contained in the legends about him in spite of the legends. Not the truth about what he did, what he said, how he really died: but the question whether his type is still conceivable at all, whether it has been ‘handed down’ by tradition. – The attempts I know of to extract even the history of a ‘soul’ from the Gospels seem to me proofs of an execrable psychological frivolity. Monsieur Renan, that buffoon in psychologicis, has appropriated for his explication of the type Jesus the two most inapplicable concepts possible in this case: the concept of the genius and the concept of the hero. But if anything is unevangelic it is the concept hero. Precisely the opposite of all contending, of all feeling oneself in struggle has here become instinct: the incapacity for resistance here becomes morality (‘resist not evil!’: the profoundest saying of the Gospel, its key in a certain sense), blessedness in peace, in gentleness, in the inability for enmity. What are the ‘glad tidings’? True life, eternal life is found – it is not promised, it is here, it is within you: as life lived in love, in love without deduction or exclusion, without distance. Everyone is a child of God – Jesus definitely claims nothing for himself alone – as a child of God everyone is equal to everyone else.... To make a hero of Jesus! – And what a worse misunderstanding is the word ‘genius’! Our whole concept, our cultural concept ‘spirit’ had no meaning whatever in the world Jesus lived in. To speak with the precision of the physiologist a quite different word would rather be in place here: the word idiot. We recognize a condition of morbid susceptibility of the sense of touch which makes it shrink back in horror from every contact, every grasping of a firm object. Translate such a physiological habitus* into its ultimate logic – as instinctive hatred of every reality, as flight into the ‘ungraspable’, into the ‘inconceivable’, as antipathy towards every form, every spacial and temporal concept, towards everything firm, all that is custom, institution, Church, as being at home in a world undisturbed by reality of any kind, a merely ‘inner’ world, a ‘real’ world, an ‘eternal’ world.... ‘The kingdom of God is within you’... 30

Instinctive hatred of reality: consequence of an extreme capacity for suffering and irritation which no longer wants to be ‘touched’ at all because it feels every contact too deeply. Instinctive exclusion of all aversion, all enmity, all feeling for limitation and distancing: consequence of an extreme capacity for suffering and irritation which already feels all resisting, all need for resistance, as an unbearable displeasure (that is to say as harmful, as deprecated by the instinct of self-preservation) and knows blessedness (pleasure) only in no longer resisting anyone or anything, neither the evil nor the evil-doer – love as the sole, as the last possibility of life... These are the two physiological realities upon which, out of which the doctrine of redemption has grown. I call it a sublime further evolution of hedonism on a thoroughly morbid basis. Closest related to it, even if with a considerable addition of Greek vitality and nervous energy, is Epicureanism, the redemption doctrine of the pagan world. Epicurus a typical décadent: first recognized as such by me. – The fear of pain, even of the infinitely small in pain – cannot end otherwise than in a religion of love... 31

I have anticipated my answer to the problem. Its presupposition is that the type of the redeemer has been preserved to us only in a very distorted form. That this distortion should have occurred is in itself very probable: there are several reasons why such a type could not remain pure, whole, free of accretions. The milieu in which this strange figure moved must have left its mark upon him, as must even more the history, the fate of the first Christian community: from this the type was retrospectively enriched with traits which become comprehensible only with reference to warfare and the aims of propaganda. That strange and sick world to which the Gospels introduce us – a world like that of a Russian novel, in which refuse of society, neurosis and ‘childlike’ idiocy seem to make a rendezvous – must in any case have coarsened the type: the first disciples in particular had to translate a being immersed entirely in symbols and incomprehensibilities into their own crudity in order to understand anything of it at all – for them such a type could not exist until it had been reduced to more familiar forms.... The prophet, the Messiah, the judge who is to come, the moral preacher, the miracle-worker, John the Baptist – so many opportunities for misunderstanding the type.... Finally, let us not underestimate the proprium* of all extreme, and in particular sectarian veneration: it extinguishes the original often painfully unfamiliar traits and idiosyncrasies in the revered being – it even fails to see them. One has to regret that no Dostoyevsky lived in the neighbourhood of this most interesting décadent; I mean someone who could feel the thrilling fascination of such a combination of the sublime, the sick and the childish. One final viewpoint: the type, as a décadence type, could in fact have been of a peculiar multiplicity and contradictoriness: such a possibility cannot be entirely excluded. But everything speaks against it: for if it were so the tradition would have to have been remarkably faithful and objective: and we have reasons for assuming the opposite. In the meantime, there yawns a contradiction between the mountain, lake and field preacher, whose appearance strikes one as that of a Buddha on a soil very little like that of India, and the aggressive fanatic, the mortal enemy of theologian and priest, which Renan has wickedly glorified as ‘le grand maitre en ironie’. I myself have no doubt that this plentiful measure of gall (and even of esprit) has only overflowed on to the type of the Master out of the excited condition of Christian propaganda: for one knows very well how resolutely all sectarians adjust their Master into an apologia of themselves. When the first community had need of a censuring theologian to oppose the theologians they created their ‘God’ according to their requirements: just as they unhesitatingly put into his mouth those totally unevangelic concepts which they could not now do without, ‘Second Coming’, ‘Last Judgement’, every kind of temporal promise and expectation. – 32 I resist, to repeat it, the incorporation of the fanatic into the type of the redeemer: the word impérieux alone which Renan employs already annuls the type. The ‘glad tidings’ are precisely that there are no more opposites; the kingdom of Heaven belongs to children; the faith which here finds utterance is not a faith which has been won by struggle – it is there, from the beginning, it is as it were a return to childishness in the spiritual domain. The occurrence of retarded puberty undeveloped in the organism as a consequence of degeneration is familiar at any rate to physiologists. – Such a faith is not angry, does not censure, does not defend itself: it does not bring ‘the sword’ – it has no idea to what extent it could one day cause dissention. It does not prove itself, either by miracles or by rewards and promises, and certainly not ‘by the Scriptures’: it is every moment its own miracle, its own reward, its own proof, its own ‘kingdom of God’. Neither does this faith formulate itself – it lives, it resists formulas. Chance, to be sure, determines the environment, the language, the preparatory schooling of a particular configuration of concepts: primitive Christianity employs only Judeo-Semitic concepts (– eating and drinking at communion belong here, concepts so sadly abused, like everything Jewish, by the Church). But one must be careful not to see in this anything but a sign-language, a semeiotic, an occasion for metaphors. It is precisely on condition that nothing he says is taken literally that this anti-realist can speak at all. Among

Indians he would have made use of Sankhyam concepts, among Chinese those of Lao-tse – and would not have felt the difference. – One could, with some freedom of expression, call Jesus a ‘free spirit’ – he cares nothing for what is fixed: the word killeth, everything fixed killeth. The concept, the experience ‘life’ in the only form he knows it is opposed to any kind of word, formula, law, faith, dogma. He speaks only of the inmost thing: ‘life’ or ‘truth’ or ‘light’ is his expression for the inmost thing – everything else, the whole of reality, the whole of nature, language itself, possesses for him merely the value of a sign, a metaphor. – On this point one must make absolutely no mistake, however much Christian, that is to say ecclesiastical prejudice, may tempt one to do so: such a symbolist par excellence stands outside of all religion, all conceptions of divine worship, all history, all natural science, all experience of the world, all acquirements, all politics, all psychology, all books, all art – his ‘knowledge’ is precisely the pure folly of the fact that anything of this kind exists. He has not so much as heard of culture, he does not need to fight against it – he does not deny it.... The same applies to the state, to society and the entire civic order, to work, to war – he never had reason to deny ‘the world’, he had no notion of the ecclesiastical concept ‘world’.... Denial is precisely what is totally impossible for him. – Dialectics are likewise lacking, the idea is lacking that a faith, a ‘truth’ could be proved by reasons (– his proofs are inner ‘lights’, inner feelings of pleasure and self-affirmations, nothing but ‘proofs by potency’ –). Neither can such a doctrine argue: it simply does not understand that other doctrines exist, can exist, it simply does not know how to imagine an opinion contrary to its own.... Where it encounters one it will, with the most heartfelt sympathy, lament the ‘blindness’ – for it sees the ‘light’ – but it will make no objection... 33 In the entire psychology of the ‘Gospel’ the concept guilt and punishment is lacking; likewise the concept reward. ‘Sin’, every kind of distancing relationship between God and man, is abolished – precisely this is the ‘glad tidings’. Blessedness is not promised, it is not tied to any conditions: it is the only reality – the rest is signs for speaking of it... The consequence of such a condition projects itself into a new practice, the true evangelic practice. It is not a ‘belief’ which distinguishes the Christian: the Christian acts, he is distinguished by a different mode of acting. Neither by words nor in his heart does he resist the man who does him evil. He makes no distinction between foreigner and native, between Jew and non-Jew (‘one’s neighbour’ is properly one’s co-religionist, the Jew). He is not angry with anyone, does not disdain anyone. He neither appears in courts of law nor claims their protection (‘not swearing’). Under no circumstances, not even in the case of proved unfaithfulness, does he divorce his wife. – All fundamentally one law, all consequences of one instinct. – The life of the redeemer was nothing else than this practice – his death too was nothing else.... He no longer required any formulas, any rites for communicating with God – not even prayer. He has settled his accounts with the whole Jewish penance-and-reconciliation doctrine; he knows that it is through the practice of one's life that one feels 'divine', 'blessed', 'evangelic', at all times a 'child of God'. It is not 'penance', not 'prayer for forgiveness' which leads to God: evangelic practice alone leads to God, it is God! – What was abolished with the Evangel was the Judaism of the concepts 'sin', 'forgiveness of sin', 'faith', 'redemption by faith' – the whole of Jewish ecclesiastical teaching was denied in the 'glad tidings'. The profound instinct for how one would have to live in order to feel oneself 'in Heaven', to feel oneself 'eternal', while in every other condition one by no means feels oneself 'in Heaven': this alone is the psychological reality of 'redemption'. – A new way of living, not a new belief... 34 If I understand anything of this great symbolist it is that he took for realities, for 'truths', only inner realities – that he understood the rest, everything pertaining to nature, time, space, history, only as signs, as occasion for metaphor. The concept 'the Son of Man' is not a concrete person belonging to history, anything at all individual or unique, but an 'eternal' fact, a psychological symbol freed from the time concept. The same applies supremely to the God of this typical symbolist, to the 'kingdom of God', to the 'kingdom of Heaven', to 'God's children'. Nothing is more un-Christian than the ecclesiastical crudities of a God as a person, of a 'kingdom of God' which comes, of a 'kingdom of Heaven' in the Beyond, of a 'Son of God', the second person of the Trinity. All this – forgive the expression – a fist in the eye* – oh in what an eye! – of the Gospel: world-historical cynicism in the mockery of symbolism.... But it is patently obvious what is alluded to in the symbols 'Father' and 'Son' – not patently obvious to everyone, I grant: in the word 'Son' is expressed the entry into the collective feeling of the transfiguration of all things (blessedness), in the word 'Father' this feeling itself, the feeling of perfection and eternity. – I am ashamed to recall what the Church has made of this symbolism: has it not set an Amphytrion† story at the threshold of Christian 'faith'? And a dogma of 'immaculate conception' into the bargain?... But it has thereby maculated conception– The 'Kingdom of Heaven' is a condition of the heart – not something that comes 'upon the earth' or 'after death'. The entire concept of natural death is lacking in the Gospel: death is not a bridge, not a transition, it is lacking because it belongs to quite another world, a merely apparent world useful only for the purpose of symbolism. The 'hour of death' is not a Christian concept – the 'hour', time, physical life and its crises, simply do not exist for the teacher of the 'glad tidings'. ... The 'kingdom of God' is not something one waits for; it has no yesterday or tomorrow, it does not come 'in a thousand years' – it is an experience within a heart; it is everywhere, it is nowhere... 35 This 'bringer of glad tidings' died as he lived, as he taught – not to 'redeem mankind' but to demonstrate how one ought to live. What he bequeathed to mankind is his practice: his bearing before the judges, before the guards, before the accusers and every kind of calumny and mockery – his bearing on the Cross. He does not resist, he does not defend his rights, he takes no steps to avert the worst that can happen to him – more, he provokes it.... And he entreats, he suffers, he loves with those, in those who are doing evil to him. His words to the thief on the Cross contain the whole Evangel. ‘That was verily a divine man, a child of God!’ – says the thief. ‘If thou feelest this’ – answers the redeemer – ‘thou art in Paradise, thou art a child of God.’ Not to defend oneself, not to grow angry, not to make responsible.... But not to resist even the evil man – to love him... 36 – Only we, we emancipated spirits, possess the prerequisite for understanding something nineteen centuries have misunderstood – that integrity become instinct and passion which makes war on the ‘holy lie’ even more than on any other lie.... One has been unspeakably far from our benevolent and cautious neutrality, from that discipline of the spirit through which alone the divining of such strange, such delicate things is made possible: at all times one has, with shameless self-seeking, desired only one’s own advantage in these things, one constructed the Church out of the antithesis to the Gospel. If anyone were looking for a sign that an ironical divinity was at work behind the great universal drama he would find no small support in the tremendous questionmark called Christianity. That mankind should fall on its knees before the opposite of what was the origin, the meaning, the right of the Gospel, that it should have sanctified in the concept ‘Church’ precisely what the ‘bringer of glad tidings’ regarded as beneath him, behind him – one seeks in vain a grander form of worldhistorical irony – 37 – Our age is proud of its historical sense: how was it able to make itself believe in the nonsensical notion that the crude miracle-worker and redeemer fable comes at the commencement of Christianity – and that everything spiritual and symbolic is only a subsequent development? On the contrary: the history of Christianity – and that from the very death on the Cross – is the history of progressively cruder misunderstanding of an original symbolism. With every extension of Christianity over even broader, even ruder masses in whom the preconditions out of which it was born were more and more lacking, it became increasingly necessary to vulgarize, to barbarize Christianity – it absorbed the doctrines and rites of every subterranean cult of the Imperium Romanum, it absorbed the absurdities of every sort of morbid reason. The fate of Christianity lies in the necessity for its faith itself to grow as morbid, low and vulgar as the requirements it was intended to satisfy were morbid, low and vulgar. As the Church, this morbid barbarism itself finally assumes power – the Church, that form of mortal hostility to all integrity, to all loftiness of soul, to discipline of spirit, to all open-hearted and benevolent humanity. – Christian values – noble values: it is only we, we emancipated spirits, who have restored this greatest of all value-antitheses! – 38 – At this point I shall not suppress a sigh. There are days when I am haunted by a feeling blacker than the blackest melancholy – contempt of man. And so as to leave no doubt as to what I despise, whom I despise: it is the man of today, the man with whom I am fatefully contemporary. The man of today – I suffocate of his impure breath.... With regard to the past I am, like all men of knowledge, of a large tolerance, that is to say a magnanimous self-control: I traverse the madhouse-world of entire millennia, be it called ‘Christianity’, ‘Christian faith’, ‘Christian Church’, with a gloomy circumspection – I take care not to make mankind responsible for its insanities. But my feelings suddenly alter, burst forth, immediately I enter the modern age, our age. Our age knows.... What was formerly merely morbid has today become indecent – it is indecent to be a Christian today. And here is where my disgust commences. – I look around me: there is no longer a word left of what was formerly called ‘truth’, we no longer endure it when a priest so much as utters the word ‘truth’. Even with the most modest claim to integrity one must know today that a theologian, a priest, a pope does not merely err in every sentence he speaks, he lies – that he is no longer free to lie ‘innocently’, out of ‘ignorance’. The priest knows as well as anyone that there is no longer any ‘God’, any ‘sinner’, any ‘redeemer’ – that ‘free will’, ‘moral world-order’ are lies – intellectual seriousness, the profound self-overcoming of the intellect, no longer permits anyone not to know about these things.... All the concepts of the Church are recognized for what they are: the most malicious false-coinage there is for the purpose of devaluing nature and natural values; the priest himself is recognized for what he is: the most dangerous kind of parasite, the actual poison-spider of life.... We know, our conscience knows today – what those sinister inventions of priest and Church are worth, what end they serve, with which that state of human self-violation has brought about which is capable of exciting disgust at the sight of mankind – the concepts ‘Beyond’, ‘Last Judgement’, ‘immortality of the soul’, the ‘soul’ itself: they are instruments of torture, they are forms of systematic cruelty by virtue of which the priest has become master, stays master.... Everyone knows this: and everyone none the less remains unchanged. Where have the last feelings of decency and self-respect gone when even our statesmen, in other ways very unprejudiced kind of men and practical anti-Christians through and through, still call themselves Christians today and go to Communion?... A young prince at the head of his regiments, splendid as the expression of his people’s egoism and presumption – but without any shame professing himself a Christian!... Whom then does Christianity deny? what does it call ‘world’? Being a soldier, being a judge, being a patriot; defending oneself; preserving one’s honour; desiring to seek one’s advantage; being proud.... The practice of every hour, every instinct, every valuation which leads to action is today anti-Christian: what a monster of falsity modern man must be that he is none the less not ashamed to be called a Christian! 39 – To resume, I shall now relate the real history of Christianity. – The word ‘Christianity’ is already a misunderstanding – in reality there has been only one Christian, and he died on the Cross. The ‘Evangel’ died on the Cross. What was called ‘Evangel’ from this moment onwards was already the opposite of what he had lived: ‘bad tidings’, a dysangel. It is false to the point of absurdity to see in a ‘belief, perchance the belief in redemption through Christ, the distinguishing characteristic of the Christian: only Christian practice, a life such as he who died on the Cross lived, is Christian.... Even today, such a life is possible, for certain men even necessary: genuine, primitive Christianity will be possible at all times.... Not a belief but a doing, above all a not-doing of many things, a different being.... States of consciousness, beliefs of any kind, holding something to be true for example – every psychologist knows, this – are a matter of complete indifference and of the fifth rank compared with the value of the instincts: to speak more strictly, the whole concept of spiritual causality is false. To reduce being a Christian, Christianness, to a holding something to be true, to a mere phenomenality of consciousness, means to negate Christianness. In fact there have been no Christians at all. The ‘Christian’, that which has been called Christian for two millennia, is merely a psychological self-misunderstanding. Regarded more closely, that which has ruled in him, in spite of all his ‘faith’, has been merely the instincts – and what instincts! ‘Faith’ has been at all times, with Luther for instance, only a cloak, a pretext, a screen, behind which the instincts played their game – a shrewd blindness to the dominance of certain instincts.... ‘Faith’ – I have already called it the true Christian shrewdness – one has always spoken of faith, one has always acted from instinct.... The Christian’s world of ideas contains nothing which so much as touches upon actuality: on the other hand, we have recognized in instinctive hatred for actuality the driving element, the only driving element in the roots of Christianity. What follows therefrom? That here, in psychologism also, error is radical, that is to say determinant of the essence, that is to say substance. One concept removed, a single reality substituted in its place – and the whole of Christianity crumbles to nothing! – From a lofty standpoint, this strangest of all facts, a religion not only determined by errors but inventive and even possessing genius only in harmful, only in life-poisoning and heart-poisoning errors, remains a spectacle for the gods – for those divinities which are at the same time philosophers and which I encountered, for example, during those celebrated dialogues on Naxos. In the hour when their disgust leaves them (– and leaves us!) they become grateful for the spectacle of the Christian: perhaps it is only for the sake of this curious case that the pathetic little star called Earth deserves a divine glance and divine participation.... For let us not undervalue the Christian: the Christian, false to the point of innocence, far surpasses the ape – with respect to Christians a well-known theory of descent becomes a mere compliment... 40 – The fate of the Evangel was determined by the death – it hung on the Cross.... It was only the death, this unexpected shameful death, only the Cross, which was in general reserved for the canaille alone – it was only this terrible paradox which brought the disciples face to face with the real enigma: ‘Who was that? What was that?’ – The feeling of being shaken and disappointed to their depths, the suspicion that such a death might be the refutation of their cause, the frightful question-mark ‘why has this happened?’ – this condition is only too understandable. Here everything had to be necessary, meaningful, reasonable, reasonable in the highest degree; a disciple’s love knows nothing of chance. Only now did the chasm open up: ‘Who killed him? who was his natural enemy?’ – this question came like a flash of lightning. Answer: ruling Judaism, its upper class. From this moment one felt oneself in mutiny against the social order, one subsequently understood Jesus as having been in mutiny against the social order. Up till then this warlike trait, this negative trait in word and deed, was lacking in his image; more, he was the contradiction of it. Clearly the little community had failed to understand precisely the main thing, the exemplary element in his manner of dying, the freedom from, the superiority over every feeling of resentment: – a sign of how little they understood of him at all! Jesus himself could have desired nothing by his death but publicly to offer the sternest test, the proof of his teaching.... But his disciples were far from forgiving his death – which would have been evangelic in the highest sense; not to speak of offering themselves up to a similar death in sweet and gentle peace of heart.... Precisely the most unevangelic of feelings, revengefulness, again came uppermost. The affair could not possibly be at an end with this death: one required ‘retribution’, ‘judgement’ (– and yet what can be more unevangelic than ‘retribution’, ‘punishment’, ‘sitting in judgement’!). The popular expectation of a Messiah came once more into the foreground; an historic moment appeared in view: the ‘kingdom of God’ is coming to sit in judgement on its enemies.... But with this everything is misunderstood: the ‘kingdom of God’ as a last act, as a promise! For the Evangel had been precisely the existence, the fulfilment, the actuality of this ‘kingdom’. Such a death was precisely this ‘kingdom of God’. Only now was all that contempt for and bitterness against Pharisee and theologian worked into the type of the Master – one thereby made of him a Pharisee and theologian! On the other hand, the enraged reverence of these utterly unhinged souls could no longer endure that evangelic equal right of everyone to be a child of God which Jesus had taught, and their revenge consisted in exalting Jesus in an extravagant fashion, in severing him from themselves: just as the Jews, in revenge on their enemies, had previously separated their God from themselves and raised him on high. The one God and the one Son of God: both products of resentment... 41 – And now an absurd problem came up: ‘How could God have permitted that?’ For this question the deranged reason of the little community found a downright terrifyingly absurd answer: God gave his Son for the forgiveness of sins, as a sacrifice. All at once it was all over with the Gospel! The guilt sacrifice, and that in its most repulsive, barbaric form, the sacrifice of the innocent man for the sins of the guilty! What atrocious paganism! – For Jesus had done away with the concept ‘guilt’ itself – he had denied any chasm between God and man, he lived this unity of God and man as his ‘glad tidings’.... And not as a special prerogative! – From now on there is introduced into the type of the redeemer step by step: the doctrine of a Judgement and a Second Coming, the doctrine of his death as a sacrificial death, the doctrine of the Resurrection with which the entire concept ‘blessedness’, the whole and sole reality of the Evangel, is juggled away – for the benefit of a state after death!... Paul, with that rabbinical insolence which characterizes him in every respect, rationalized this interpretation, this indecency of an interpretation, thus: ‘If Christ is not resurrected from the dead our faith is vain’. – All at once the Evangel became the most contemptible of all unfulfillable promises, the impudent doctrine of personal immortality.... Paul himself even taught it as a reward!... 42 One sees what came to an end with the death on the Cross: a new, an absolutely primary beginning to a Buddhistic peace movement, to an actual and not merely promised happiness on earth. For this remains – I have already emphasized it – the basic distinction between the two décadence religions: Buddhism makes no promises but keeps them, Christianity makes a thousand promises but keeps none. – On the heels of the ‘glad tidings’ came the worst of all: those of Paul. In Paul was embodied the antithetical type to the ‘bringer of glad tidings’, the genius of hatred, of the vision of hatred, of the inexorable logic of hatred. What did this dysangelist not sacrifice to his hatred! The redeemer above all: he nailed him to his Cross. The life, the example, the teaching, the death, the meaning and the right of the entire Gospel – nothing was left once this hate-obsessed false-coiner had grasped what alone he could make use of. Not the reality, not the historical truth!... And once more the priestly instinct of the Jew perpetrated the same great crime against history – it simply erased the yesterday and the day before yesterday of Christianity, it devised for itself a history of primitive Christianity. More: it falsified the history of Israel over again so as to make this history seem the pre-history of its act: all the prophets had spoken of its ‘redeemer’.... The Church subsequently falsified even the history of mankind into the pre-history of Christianity.... The type of the redeemer, the doctrine, the practice, the death, the meaning of the death, even the sequel to the death – nothing was left untouched, nothing was left bearing even the remotest resemblance to reality. Paul simply shifted the centre of gravity of that entire existence beyond this existence – in the lie of the ‘resurrected’ Jesus. In fact he could make no use at all of the redeemer’s life – he needed the death on the Cross and something in addition.... To regard as honest a Paul whose home was the principle centre of Stoic enlightenment when he makes of a hallucination the proof that the redeemer is still living, or even to believe his story that he had this hallucination, would be a real niaiserie on the part of a psychologist: Paul willed the end, consequently he willed the means.... What he himself did not believe was believed by the idiots among whom he cast his teaching. – His requirement was power; with Paul the priest again sought power – he could employ only those concepts, teachings, symbols with which one tyrannizes over masses, forms herds. What was the only thing Mohammed later borrowed from Christianity? The invention of Paul, his means for establishing a priestly tyranny, for forming herds: the belief in immortality – that is to say the doctrine of ‘judgement’... 43 If one shifts the centre of gravity of life out of life into the ‘Beyond’ – into nothingness – one has deprived life as such of its centre of gravity. The great lie of personal immortality destroys all rationality, all naturalness of instinct – all that is salutary, all that is life-furthering, all that holds a guarantee of the future in the instincts henceforth excites mistrust. So to live that there is no longer any meaning in living; that now becomes the ‘meaning’ of life.... What is the point of public spirit, what is the point of gratitude for one’s descent and one’s forefathers, what is the point of co-operation, trust, of furthering and keeping in view the general welfare?... So many ‘temptations’, so many diversions from the ‘right road’ – ‘one thing is needful’.... That, as an ‘immortal soul’, everybody is equal to everybody else, that in the totality of beings the ‘salvation’ of every single one is permitted to claim to be of everlasting moment, that little bigots and three-quarters madmen are permitted to imagine that for their sakes the laws of nature are continually being broken – such a raising of every sort of egoism to infinity, to impudence, cannot be branded with sufficient contempt. And yet it is to this pitiable flattery of personal vanity that Christianity owes its victory – it is with this that it has persuaded over to its side everything ill-constituted, rebellious-minded, under-privileged, all the dross and refuse of mankind. ‘Salvation of the soul’ – in plain words: ‘The world revolves around me’... The poison of the doctrine ‘equal rights for all’ – this has been more thoroughly sowed by Christianity than by anything else; from the most secret recesses of base instincts, Christianity has waged a war to the death against every feeling of reverence and distance between man and man, against, that is, the precondition of every elevation, every increase in culture – it has forged out of the resentment of the masses its chief weapon against us, against everything noble, joyful, high-spirited on earth, against our happiness on earth.... ‘Immortality’ granted to every Peter and Paul has been the greatest and most malicious outrage on noble mankind ever committed. – And let us not underestimate the fatality that has crept out of Christianity even into politics! No one any longer possesses today the courage to claim special privileges or the right to rule, the courage to feel a sense of reverence towards himself and towards his equals – the courage for a pathos of distance.... Our politics is morbid from this lack of courage! – The aristocratic outlook has been undermined most deeply by the lie of equality of souls; and if the belief in the 'prerogative of the majority' makes revolutions and will continue to make them – it is Christianity, let there be no doubt about it, Christian value judgement which translates every revolution into mere blood and crime! Christianity is a revolt of everything that crawls along the ground directed against that which is elevated: the Gospel of the 'lowly' makes low... 44 – The Gospels are invaluable as evidence of the already irresistible corruption within the first community. What Paul later carried to its conclusion with the cynical logic of a rabbi was none the less merely the process of decay which commenced with the death of the redeemer. – One cannot read these Gospels too warily; there are difficulties behind every word. I hope I shall be pardoned for confessing that they are for that very reason a pleasure of the first rank to a psychologist – as the opposite of all kinds of naïve depravity, as refinement par excellence, as artistry in psychological depravity. The Gospels are in a class by themselves. The Bible in general admits of no comparison. One is among Jews: first consideration if one is not to lose the thread completely. This self-pretence of 'holiness', which here becomes downright genius and which has not since been even approximately equalled among books and men, this false-coinage of word and attitude as an art, is not the chance product of some individual talent, some exceptional nature. Race is required for it. In Christianity, as the art of holy lying, the whole of Judaism, a schooling and technique pursued with the utmost seriousness for hundreds of years, attains its ultimate perfection. The Christian, that ultima ratio of the lie, is the Jew once more – even thrice more.... The will to employ as a matter of principle only concepts, symbols, attitudes manifested in the practice of the priest, the instinctive rejection of every other practice, every other kind of perspective in the realm of values and practical application – that is not tradition, it is inheritance: only as inheritance does it have the effect of a natural quality. The whole of mankind, even the finest heads of the finest epochs (with one exception, who is perhaps merely a monster –) have allowed themselves to be deceived. The Gospel has been read as the Book of Innocence.... no small pointer to the degree of histrionic mastery displayed in it. – If we got to see them, to be sure, even if only in passing, all these singular bigots and artificial saints, it would be the end of them – and it is precisely because I never read a word without seeing an attitude that I make an end of them.... They have a way of raising their eyes to Heaven which I cannot endure. – Fortunately books are for most people merely literature. – One must not let oneself be misled: they say 'Judge not!' but they send to Hell everything that stands in their way. By allowing God to judge they themselves judge; by glorifying God they glorify themselves; by demanding precisely those virtues of which they themselves are capable – more, which they are in need of to stay on top at all – they present a great appearance of contending for virtue, of struggling for the triumph of virtue.

‘We live, we die, we sacrifice ourselves for the good’ (– ‘truth’, ‘the light’, the ‘kingdom of God’): in reality they do what they cannot help doing. By making their way in a sneaking fashion, sitting in corners, living out shadowy lives in the shadows, they make a duty of it: their life of humility appears to be a duty, as humility it is one more proof of piety.... Ah this humble, chaste, compassionate mode of mendaciousness! ‘For us virtue itself shall bear witness’.... Read the Gospels as books of seduction by means of morality: these petty people have placed a restraint on morality – they know what use it can be put to! Mankind can best be led by the nose with morality! – The reality is that here the most conscious arrogance of the elect is posing as modesty: one has placed oneself, the ‘community’, the ‘good and just’, once and for all on one side, on the side of ‘truth’ – and the rest, ‘the world’, on the other.... That has been the most fateful kind of megalomania that has ever existed on earth: little abortions of bigots and liars began to lay claim to the concepts ‘God’, ‘truth’, ‘light’, ‘spirit’, ‘love’, ‘wisdom’, ‘life’, as if these were synonyms of themselves so as to divide themselves off from the ‘world’; little superlatives of Jews, ripe for every kind of madhouse, twisted values in general to suit themselves, as if only the ‘Christian’ were the meaning, the salt, the measure and also the ultimate tribunal of all the rest. ... The whole fatality was possible only because there was already in the world a related, racially-related megalomania, the Jewish: once the chasm between Jews and Jewish Christians opened up, the latter were left with no alternative but to employ against the Jews the very self-preservative procedures counselled by the Jewish instinct, while the Jews had previously employed them only against everything nonJewish. The Christian is only a Jew of a ‘freer’ confession. – 45 – I give a few examples of what these petty people have taken into their heads, what they have put into the mouth of their Master: confessions of ‘beautiful souls’ one and all. – ‘And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear you, when ye depart thence, shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrha in the day of judgement, than for that city.’ (Mark vi, 11) – How evangelic!... ‘And whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in me, it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea.’ (Mark ix, 42) – How evangelic!... ‘And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out; it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire: Where their worm death not, and the fire is not quenched.’ (Mark ix, 47–8) – It is not precisely the eye that is meant... ‘Verily I say unto you, That there be some of them that stand here, which shall not taste of death, till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power.’ (Mark ix, 1) – Well lied, lion... ‘Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. For...’ (Observation of a psychologist: Christian morality is refuted by its fors: its ‘reasons’ refute – thus is it Christian.) (Mark viii, 34–5). ‘Judge not, that ye be not judged. For with what judgement ye judge, ye shall be judged.’ (Matthew vii, 1–2) – What a conception of justice, of a ‘just’ judge!... ‘For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans do the same? And if ye salute your brethren only what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so?’ (Matthew v, 46–7) – Principle of ‘Christian love’: it wants to be well paid... ‘But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses.’ (Matthew vi, 15) – Very compromising for the said ‘Father’... ‘But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.’ (Matthew vi, 33) – All these things: namely food, clothing, all the essentials of life. An error, to put it mildly.... A little earlier God appears as a tailor, at least under certain circumstances*... ‘Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy: for behold, your reward is great in heaven: for in the like manner did their fathers unto the prophets.’ (Luke vi, 23) – Impudent rabble! It already compares itself with the prophets.... ‘Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.’ (1 Corinthians iii, 16–17) – Such things as this cannot be sufficiently despised... ‘Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters?’ (1 Corinthians vi, 2) – Unfortunately not merely the ravings of a lunatic.... This frightful impostor goes on to say: ‘Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life?’... ‘Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe...; not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called: But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; And base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to naught things that are: That no flesh should glory in his presence.’ (1 Corinthians i, 20 ff.) – To understand this passage, a document of the very first rank for the psychology of every Chandala morality, one should read the first essay of my Genealogy of Morals, where the antithesis between a noble morality and a Chandala morality born of resentment and impotent revengefulness is first brought to light. Paul was the greatest of all apostles of revenge... 46 – What follows from all this? That one does well to put gloves on when reading the New Testament. The proximity of so much uncleanness almost forces one to do so. One would no more choose to associate with ‘first Christians’ than one would with Polish Jews: not that one would need to prove so much as a single point against them.... Neither of them smell very pleasant. – I have looked in vain for so much as one sympathetic trait in the New Testament; there is nothing free, benevolent, open-hearted, honest in it. Humanity has not taken its first step here – the instincts of cleanliness are lacking.... There are only bad instincts in the New Testament, there is not even the courage for these bad instincts. Everything in it is cowardice, everything is self-deception and closing one's eyes to oneself. Every book becomes clean if one has just read the New Testament: to give an example, immediately after reading Paul I read with delight that sweetest and most highspirited of all mockers, Petronius, of whom one could say what Domenico Boccaccio wrote to the Duke of Parma of Cesare Borgia: 'è tutto festo' – immortally healthy, immortally cheerful and well-constituted.... For these little bigots miscalculate in the main thing. They attack, but everything attacked by them is thereby signalized. Whomever a 'first Christian' attacks is not besmirched by it.... Conversely: it is an honour to have 'first Christians' against one. It is impossible to read the New Testament without feeling a partiality for that which is ill-treated in it – to say nothing of the 'wisdom of this world' which an impudent humbug tried in vain to confound.... But even the Scribes and Pharisees gain advantage from having such an opponent: they must have been worth something to be hated in such an indecent fashion. Hypocrisy – that's rich coming from 'first Christians'! – The Scribes and Pharisees were the privileged: this sufficed, Chandala hatred requires no further reasons. The 'first Christian' – and, I fear, also the 'last Christian', whom I shall perhaps live to see – is a rebel in his lowest instincts against everything privileged – he always lives and struggles for 'equal rights'.... More closely considered, he has no choice. If one wants to be, in one's own person, 'chosen of God' – or a 'temple of God', or a 'judge of angels' – then every other principle of selection, for example on the basis of integrity, intellect, manliness and pride, beauty and liberality of heart, is simply 'world' – evil as such.... Moral: every word in the mouth of a 'first Christian' is a lie, every act he performs an instinctive falsehood – all his values, all his aims are harmful, but whomever he hates, whatever he hates, has value.... The Christian, the priestly Christian especially, is a criterion of values. – Do I still have to add that in the entire New Testament there is only one solitary figure one is obliged to respect? Pilate, the Roman governor. To take a Jewish affair seriously – he cannot persuade himself to do that. One Jew more or less – what does it matter?... The noble scorn of a Roman before whom an impudent misuse of the word 'truth' was carried on has enriched the New Testament with the only expression which possesses value – which is its criticism, its annihilation even: 'What is truth?'... 47 – What sets us apart is not that we recognize no God, either in history or in nature or behind nature – but that we find that which has been revered as God not 'godlike' but pitiable, absurd, harmful, not merely an error but a crime against life.... We deny God as God.... If this God of the Christians were proved to us to exist, we should know even less how to believe in him. – In a formula:

Deus, qualem Paulus creavit, dei negation.* – A religion like Christianity, which is at no point in contact with actuality, which crumbles away as soon as actuality comes into its own at any point whatever, must naturally be a mortal enemy of the ‘wisdom of the world’, that is to say of science – it will approve of all expedients by which disciplining of the intellect, clarity and severity in matters of intellectual conscience, noble coolness and freedom of intellect, can be poisoned and calumniated and brought into ill repute. ‘Faith’ as an imperative is a veto against science – in praxi the lie at any cost.... Paul understood the need for the lie, for ‘faith’; the Church subsequently understood Paul. – That God which Paul invented for himself, a God who ‘confounds the wisdom of the world’ (in a narrower sense the two great opponents of all superstition, philology and medicine), is in reality only the resolute determination of Paul himself to do so: to call one’s own will ‘God’ Torah† – that is quintessentially Jewish. Paul wants to confound the ‘wisdom of the world’: his enemies are the good philologists and physicians of the Alexandrian school – upon them he makes war. In fact, one is not philologist and physician without also being at the same time anti-Christian. For as philologist one sees behind the ‘sacred books’, as physician behind the physiological depravity of the typical Christian. The physician says ‘incurable’, the philologist ‘fraud’... 48 – Has the famous story which stands at the beginning of the Bible really been understood – the story of God’s mortal terror of science;?... It has not been understood. This priest’s-book begins, as is only proper, with the priest’s great inner difficulty: he has only one great danger, consequently ‘God’ has only one great danger. – The old God, all ‘spirit’, all high priest, all perfection, promenades in his garden: but he is bored. Against boredom the gods themselves fight in vain.* What does he do? He invents man – man is entertaining.... But behold, man too is bored. God’s sympathy with the only kind of distress found in every Paradise knows no bounds: he forthwith creates other animals. God’s first blunder: man did not find the animals entertaining – he dominated them, he did not even want to be an ‘animal’. – Consequently God created woman. And then indeed there was an end to boredom – but also to something else! Woman was God’s second blunder. – ‘Woman is in her essence serpent, Heva’ – every priest knows that; ‘every evil comes into the world through woman’ – every priest knows that likewise. ‘Consequently, science too comes into the world through her’.... Only through woman did man learn to taste the tree of knowledge. – What had happened? A mortal terror seized on the old God. Man himself had become God’s greatest blunder; God had created for himself a rival, science makes equal to God – it is all over with priests and gods if man becomes scientific! – Moral: science is the forbidden in itself – it alone is forbidden. Science is the first sin, the germ of all sins, original sin. This alone constitutes morality. – ‘Thou shalt not know’ – the rest follows. – God’s mortal terror did not stop him from being shrewd. How can one defend oneself against science? – that was for long his chief problem. Answer: away with man out of Paradise! Happiness, leisure gives room for thought – all thoughts are bad thoughts.... Man shall not think. – And the ‘priest in himself invents distress, death, the danger to life in pregnancy, every kind of misery, age, toil, above all sickness – nothing but expedients in the struggle against science! Distress does not allow man to think.... And none the less! oh horror! the structure of knowledge towers up, heaven-storming, reaching for the divine – what to do! – The old God invents war, he divides the peoples, he makes men destroy one another (– priests have always had need of war...). War – among other things a great mischief-maker in science! – Incredible! knowledge, emancipation from the priest, increases in spite of wars. – And the old God comes to a final decision: ‘Man has become scientific – there is nothing for it, he will have to be drowned!’ ... 49 – Have I been understood? The beginning of the Bible contains the entire psychology of the priest. – The priest knows only one great danger: that is science – the sound conception of cause and effect. But science flourishes in general only under happy circumstances – one must have a superfluity of time and intellect in order to ‘know’.... ‘Consequently man must be made unhappy’ – this has at all times been the logic of the priest. – One will already have guessed what only came into the world therewith, in accordance with this logic – ‘sin’.... The concept of guilt and punishment, the entire ‘moral world-order’, was invented in opposition to science – in opposition to the detaching of man from the priest.... Man shall not look around him, he shall look down into himself; he shall not look prudently and cautiously into things in order to learn, he shall not look at all: he shall suffer.... And he shall suffer in such a way that he has need of the priest at all times. – Away with physicians! One has need of a Saviour. – The concept of guilt and punishment, including the doctrine of ‘grace’, of ‘redemption’, of ‘forgiveness’ – lies through and through and without any psychological reality – were invented to destroy the causal sense of man: they are an outrage on the concept cause and effect! – And not an outrage with the fist, with the knife, with honest hatred and love! But one from the most cowardly, cunning, lowest instincts! An outrage of the priest! An outrage of the parasite! A vampirism of pale subterranean bloodsuckers!... When the natural consequences of an act are no longer ‘natural’ but thought of as effected by the conceptual ghosts of superstition, by ‘God’, by ‘spirits’, by ‘souls’, as merely ‘moral’ consequences, as reward, punishment, sign, chastisement, then the precondition for knowledge has been destroyed – then one has committed the greatest crime against humanity. – Sin, to say it again, that form par excellence of the self-violation of man, was invented to make science, culture, every kind of elevation and nobility of man impossible; the priest rules through the invention of sin. – 50 – At this point I cannot absolve myself from giving an account of the psychology of ‘belief, of ‘believers’, for the use, as is only reasonable, of precisely the ‘believers’ them selves. If there is today still no lack of those who do not know how indecent it is to ‘believe’ – or a sign of décadence, of a broken will to live – well, they will know it tomorrow. My voice reaches even the hard-of-hearing. – It appears, if I have not misheard, that there exists among Christians a kind of criterion of truth called ‘proof by potency’. ‘Belief makes blessed: therefore it is true.’ – One might here object straight away that this making-blessed itself is not proved but only promised: blessedness conditional upon ‘believing’ – one shall become blessed because one believes.... But that what the priest promises the believer for a ‘Beyond’ inaccessible to any control actually occurs, how could that be proved? – The alleged ‘proof by potency’ is therefore at bottom only a further belief that the effect which one promises oneself from the belief will not fail to appear. In a formula: ‘I believe that belief makes blessed – consequently it is true’. – But with that we have already reached the end of the argument. This ‘consequently’ would be the absurdum itself as a criterion of truth. – But if, with no little indulgence, we suppose that the fact that belief makes blessed be regarded as proved (– not merely desired, not merely promised by the somewhat suspect mouth of a priest): would blessedness – more technically, pleasure – ever be a proof of truth? So little that it provides almost the counterproof, at any rate the strongest suspicion against ‘truth’, when feelings of pleasure enter into the answer to the question ‘what is true?’ The proof by ‘pleasure’ is a proof of pleasure – that is all; when on earth was it established that true judgements give more enjoyment than false ones and, in accordance with a predetermined harmony, necessarily bring pleasant feelings in their train? – The experience of all severe, all profound intellects teaches the reverse. Truth has had to be fought for every step of the way, almost everything else dear to our hearts, on which our love and our trust in life depend, has had to be sacrificed to it. Greatness of soul is needed for it: the service of truth is the hardest service. – For what does it mean to be honest in intellectual things? That one is stern towards one’s heart, that one despises ‘fine feelings’, that one makes every Yes and No a question of conscience! – Belief makes blessed: consequently it lies... 51 That under certain conditions belief makes blessed, that blessedness does not turn an idée fixe into a true idea, that faith moves no mountains but surely places mountains where there are none: a fleeting visit to a madhouse will provide ample enlightenment on these things. Not, I admit, to a priest: for he denies by instinct that sickness is sickness, that a madhouse is a madhouse. Christianity needs sickness almost as much as Hellenism needs a superfluity of health – making sick is the true hidden objective of the Church’s whole system of salvation procedures. And the Church itself – is it not the Catholic madhouse as an ultimate ideal? – The whole earth as a madhouse? – The religious man as the Church desires him to be is a typical décadent; the moment when a religious crisis has gained the upper hand of a people is always characterized by epidemics of neurosis; the ‘inner world’ of the religious man is so like the ‘inner world’ of the over-excited and exhausted as to be mistaken for it; the ‘highest’ states which Christianity has hung up over mankind as the most valuable of all values are forms of epilepsy – the Church has canonized only lunatics or great imposters in majorem deum honorem.*... I once permitted myself to describe the entire Christian penance-and-redemption training (which can be studied best today in England) as a methodically induced folie circulaire, naturally on a soil already prepared for it, that is to say a thoroughly morbid soil. No one is free to become a Christian or not to do so; one is not ‘converted’ to Christianity – one must be sufficiently sick for it.... We others, who have the courage for health and also for contempt, what contempt we have for a religion which teaches misunderstanding of the body! which does not wish to get rid of the soul-superstition! which makes a ‘merit’ of eating too little! which combats health as a kind of enemy, devil, temptation! which has persuaded itself that a ‘perfect soul’ could be carried about in a cadaver of a body and to do so needed to concoct a new conception of ‘perfection’, a pale, sickly, idiot-fanatic condition, so-called ‘holiness’ – holiness itself merely a symptom-syndrome of the impoverished, enervated, incurably corrupted body!... As a European movement, the Christian movement has been from the very first a collective movement of outcast and refuse elements of every kind (– these want to come to power through Christianity). It is not the expression of the decline of a race, it is an aggregate formation of décadence types from everywhere crowding together and seeking one another out. It is not, as is generally believed, the corruption of antiquity itself, of noble antiquity, which made Christianity possible: the learned idiocy which even today maintains such a thing cannot be contradicted too severely. The period in which the morbid, corrupt Chandala classes of the entire Imperium were becoming Christian was precisely that in which the opposing type, the nobility, existed in its fairest and maturest form. The majority became master; the democratism of the Christian instincts conquered.... Christianity was not ‘national’, not racially conditioned – it turned to the disinherited of life of every kind, it had its allies everywhere. Christianity has at its basis the rancune of the sick, the instinct directed against the healthy, against health. Everything well-constituted, proud, high-spirited, beauty above all, is hurtful to its ears and eyes. I recall again the invaluable saying of Paul: ‘God hath chosen the weak things of the world, the foolish things of the world, base things of the world and things which are despised’: that was the formula, in hoc signo décadence conquered. – God on the Cross – is the fearful hidden meaning behind this symbol still understood? – Everything that suffers, everything that hangs on the Cross, is divine.... We all hang on the Cross, consequently we are divine.... We alone are divine.... Christianity was a victory, a nobler disposition perished by it – Christianity has been up till now mankind’s greatest misfortune. – 52 Christianity also stands in opposition to all intellectual well-constitutedness – it can use only the morbid mind as the Christian mind, it takes the side of everything idiotic, it proclaims a curse against the ‘spirit’, against the superbia of the healthy spirit. Because sickness belongs to the essence of Christianity, the typical Christian condition, ‘faith’, has to be a form of sickness, every straightforward, honest, scientific road to knowledge has to be repudiated by the Church as a forbidden road. Even to doubt is a sin.... The complete lack of psychological cleanliness in the priest – it betrays itself in his glance – is a consequent phenomenon of décadence – one can observe in hysterical women and rickety children how regularly instinctive falsity, lying for the sake of lying, inability to look straight and act straight, are expressions of décadence. ‘Faith’ means not wanting to know what is true. The pietist, the priest of both sexes, is false because he is sick: his instinct demands that truth shall not come into its own at any point. ‘What makes sick is good; what proceeds from abundance, from superfluity, from power, is evil’: that is what the believer feels. Compulsion to lie – in that I detect every predestined theologian. – Another mark of the theologian is his incapacity for philology. Philology is to be understood here in a very wide sense as the art of reading well – of being able to read off a fact without falsifying it by interpretation, without losing caution, patience, subtlety in the desire for understanding. Philology as ephexis in interpretation: whether it be a question of books, newspaper reports, fate or the weather – to say nothing of the ‘salvation of the soul’.... The way in which a theologian, no matter whether in Berlin or in Rome, interprets a ‘word of the Scriptures’, or an experience, a victory of his country’s army for example, under the higher illumination of the psalms of David, is always so audacious as to make a philologist run up every wall in sight. And what on earth is he to do when pietists and other cows out of Swabia dress up the pathetic commonplace and stuffiness of their existence with the ‘finger of God’ into a miracle of ‘grace’, of ‘divine providence’, of ‘experience of salvation’! Yet the most modest expenditure of intelligence, not to say decency, would convince these interpreters of the complete childishness and unworthiness of such an abuse of divine dexterity. Even the slightest trace of piety in us ought to make us feel that a God who cures a headcold at the right moment or tells us to get into a coach just as a downpour is about to start is so absurd a God he would have to be abolished even if he existed. A God as a domestic servant, as a postman, as an almanac-maker – at bottom a word for the stupidest kind of accidental occurrence.... ‘Divine providence’, as it is still believed in today by almost every third person in ‘cultured Germany’, would be a stronger objection to God than any other that could possibly be thought of. And in any case it is an objection to the Germans!... 53 – That martyrs prove anything about the truth of a cause is so little true I would be disposed to deny that a martyr has ever had anything whatever to do with truth. In the tone with which a martyr throws his opinion at the world's head there is already expressed so low a degree of intellectual integrity, such obtuseness to the question of 'truth', that one never needs to refute a martyr. Truth is not something one person might possess and another not possess: peasants at the most, or peasant apostles like Luther, could think of truth in this fashion. One may be certain that modesty, moderation in intellectual matters, increases with the degree of conscientiousness in them. To know five things and gently decline to know anything else.... 'Truth' as every prophet, every sectarian, every latitudinarian, every Socialist, every Churchman understands the word, is conclusive proof that not so much as a start has been made on that disciplining of the intellect and selfovercoming necessary for the discovery of any truth, even the very smallest. – Martyrdoms, by the way, have been a great misfortune in history: they have seduced.... The inference of all idiots, women and nations included, that a cause for which someone is willing to die (not to speak of those which, like primitive Christianity, produce epidemics of death-seeking) must have something in it – this inference has become an unspeakable drag on verification, on the spirit of verification and caution. Martyrs have harmed truth.... And even today a crude sort of persecution is all that is required to create an honourable name for any sect, no matter how indifferent in itself. – What? does the fact that someone gives up his life for it change anything in the value of a cause? – An error which becomes honourable is an error which possesses one seductive charm more: do you believe, messieurs the theologians, that we would give you an opportunity of becoming martyrs for your lies? – one refutes a thing by laying it respectfully on ice – just so does one refute theologians too.... The world-historical stupidity of all persecutors has lain precisely in giving their opponents the appearance of honourableness – in bestowing on them the fascination of martyrdom.... Woman is today on her knees before an error because she has been told someone died on the Cross for it. Is the Cross then an argument? – But on all these things one man alone has said the word that has been wanting for millennia – Zarathustra. They wrote letters of blood on the path they followed and their folly taught that truth is proved by blood. But blood is the worst witness of truth; blood poisons and transforms the purest teaching to delusion and hatred of the heart. And if someone goes through fire for his teaching – what does that prove? Truly, it is more when one's own teaching comes out of one's own burning!* 54 One should not let oneself be misled: great intellects are sceptics. Zarathustra is a sceptic. The vigour of a mind, its freedom through strength and superior strength, is proved by scepticism. Men of conviction simply do not come into consideration where the fundamentals of value and disvalue are concerned. Convictions are prisons. They do not see far enough, they do not see things beneath them: but to be permitted to speak about value and disvalue one must see five hundred convictions beneath one – behind one.... A spirit which wants to do great things, which also wills the means for it, is necessarily a sceptic. Freedom from convictions of any kind, the capacity for an unconstrained view, pertains to strength.... Grand passion, the ground and force of his being, even more enlightened, more despotic than he himself is, takes his whole intellect into its service; it makes him intrepid; it even gives him the courage for unholy means; if need be it permits him convictions. Conviction as a means: there is much one can achieve only by means of a conviction. Grand passion uses and uses up convictions, it does not submit to them – it knows itself sovereign. – Conversely: the need for belief, for some unconditional Yes and No, Carlylism if I may be excused the expression, is a requirement of weakness. The man of faith, the ‘believer’ of every sort is necessarily a dependent man – such as cannot out of himself posit ends at all. The ‘believer’ does not belong to himself, he can be only a means, he has to be used, he needs someone who will use him. His instinct accords the highest honour to a morality of selflessness: everything persuades him to it, his intelligence, his experience, his vanity. Belief of any kind is itself an expression of selflessness, of self-alienation.... If one considers what need people have of an external regulation to constrain and steady them, how compulsion, slavery in a higher sense, is the sole and final condition under which the person of weaker will, woman especially, can prosper; then one also understands the nature of conviction, ‘faith’. Conviction is the backbone of the man of conviction. Not to see many things, not to be impartial in anything, to be party through and through, to view all values from a strict and necessary perspective – this alone is the condition under which such a man exists at all. But he is thereby the antithesis, the antagonist of the truthful man – of truth.... The believer is not free to have a conscience at all over the question ‘true’ and ‘false’: to be honest on this point would mean his immediate destruction. The pathological conditionality of his perspective makes of the convinced man a fanatic – Savonarola, Luther, Rousseau, Robespierre, Saint-Simon – the antithetical type of the strong, emancipated spirit. But the larger-than-life attitudes of these sick spirits, these conceptual epileptics, impresses the great masses – fanatics are picturesque, mankind would rather see gestures than listen to reasons... 55 – A further step in the psychology of conviction, of ‘belief. I suggested long ago that convictions might be more dangerous enemies of truth than lies. This time I should like to pose the decisive question: is there any difference whatever between a lie and a conviction? – All the world believes there is, but what does all the world not believe! – Every conviction has its history, its preliminary forms, its tentative shapes, its blunders: it becomes a conviction after not being one for a long time, after hardly being one for an even longer time. What? could the lie not be among these embryonic forms of conviction? – Sometimes it requires merely a change in persons: in the son that becomes conviction which in the father was still a lie. – I call a lie: wanting not to see something one does see, wanting not to see something as one sees it: whether the lie takes place before witnesses or without witnesses is of no consequence. The most common lie is the lie one tells to oneself; lying to others is relatively the exception. – Now this desiring not to see what one sees, this desiring not to see as one sees, is virtually the primary condition for all who are in any sense party: the party man necessarily becomes a liar. German historiography, for example, is convinced that Rome was despotism, that the Teutons brought the spirit of freedom into the world: what difference is there between this conviction and a lie? Is there any further need to be surprised if all parties, German historians included, instinctively have the big moral words in their mouths – that morality continues to exist virtually because the party man of every sort has need of it every moment? – ‘This is our conviction: we confess it before all the world, we live and die for it – respect everything that has convictions!’ – I have heard this kind of thing even from the lips of anti-Semites. On the contrary, gentlemen! An anti-Semite is certainly not made more decent by the fact that he lies on principle.... The priests, who are subtler in such things and understand very well the objection that can be raised to the concept of a conviction, that is to say mendaciousness on principle because serving a purpose, have taken over from the Jews the prudence of inserting the concept ‘God’, ‘the will of God’, ‘the revelation of God’ in its place. Kant too, with his categorical imperative, was on the same road: his reason became practical in this matter. – There are questions whose truth or untruth cannot be decided by man; all the supreme questions, all the supreme problems of value are beyond human reason.... To grasp the limits of reason – only this is truly philosophy.... To what end did God give mankind revelation? Would God have done anything superfluous? Mankind cannot of itself know what is good and what evil, therefore God taught mankind his will.... Moral: the priest does not lie – the question ‘true’ or ‘untrue’ does not arise in such things as priests speak of; these things do not permit of lying at all. For in order to lie one would have to be able to decide what is true here. But this is precisely what mankind cannot do; the priest is thus only God’s mouthpiece. – This kind of priestly syllogism is by no means only Jewish and Christian; the right to lie and the shrewdness of a ‘revelation’ pertains to the type priest, to priests of décadence as much as to priests of paganism (– pagans are all who say Yes to life, to whom ‘God’ is the word for the great Yes to all things). – The ‘Law’, the ‘will of God’, the ‘sacred book’, ‘inspiration’ – all merely words for the conditions under which the priest comes to power, by which he maintains his power, these concepts are to be found at the basis of all priestly organizations, all priestly or priestly-philosophical power-structures. The ‘holy lie’ – common to Confucius, the Law-Book of Manu, Mohammed, the Christian Church – : it is not lacking in Plato. ‘The truth exists’: this means, wherever it is heard, the priest is lying... 56 – Ultimately the point is to what end a lie is told. That ‘holy’ ends are lacking in Christianity is my objection to its means. Only bad ends: the poisoning, slandering, denying of life, contempt for the body, the denigration and self-violation of man through the concept sin – consequently its means too are bad. – It is with an opposite feeling that I read the Law – Book of Manu, an incomparably spiritual and superior work, so much as to name which in the same breath as the Bible would be a sin against the spirit. One sees immediately that it has a real philosophy behind it, in it, not merely an ill – smelling Jewish acidity compounded of rabbinism and superstition – it gives even the most fastidious psychologist something to bite on. Not forgetting the main thing, the basic difference from any sort of Bible: it is the means by which the noble orders, the philosophers and the warriors, keep the mob under control; noble values everywhere, a feeling of perfection, an affirmation of life, a triumphant feeling of well-being in oneself and of goodwill towards life – the sun shines on the entire book. – All the things upon which Christianity vents its abysmal vulgarity, procreation for example, woman, marriage, are here treated seriously, with reverence, with love and trust. How can one actually put into the hands of women and children a book containing the low-minded saying: ‘To avoid fornication let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband... for it is better to marry than burn’?*

And is it allowable to be a Christian as long as the origin of man is Christianized, that is to say dirtied, with the concept of the immaculata conceptio?... I know of no book in which so many tender and kind remarks are addressed to woman as in the Law-Book of Manu; these old greybeards and saints have a way of being polite to women which has perhaps never been surpassed. ‘A woman’s mouth’ – it says in one place – ‘a girl’s breast, a child’s prayer, the smoke of a sacrifice are always pure’. Another passage: ‘There is nothing purer than the light of the sun, the shadow of a cow, air, water, fire and a girl’s breath.’ A final passage – perhaps also a holy lie – : ‘All the openings of the body above the navel are pure, all below impure. Only in the case of a girl is the whole body pure.’ 57 One catches the unholiness of the Christian means in flagranti when one compares the Christian purpose with the purpose of the Manu Law-Book – when one throws a bright light on this greatest of antitheses of purpose. The critic of Christianity cannot be spared the task of making Christianity contemptible. – Such a law-book as that of Manu originates as does every good law-book: it summarizes the experience, policy and experimental morality of long centuries, it settles accounts, it creates nothing new. The precondition for a codification of this sort is the insight that the means of endowing with authority a truth slowly and expensively acquired are fundamentally different from those by which one would demonstrate it. A lawbook never tells of the utility of a law, of the reason for it, of the casuistry which preceded it: for in that way it would lose the imperative tone, the ‘thou shalt’, the precondition of being obeyed. The problem lies precisely in this. – At a certain point in the evolution of a people its most enlightened, that is to say most reflective and far-sighted, class declares the experience in accordance with which the people is to live – that is, can live – to be fixed and settled. Their objective is to bring home the richest and completest harvest from the ages of experimentation and bad experience. What, consequently, is to be prevented above all is the continuation of experimenting, the perpetuation in infinitum of the fluid condition of values, tests, choices, criticizing of values. A two-fold wall is erected against this: firstly revelation, that is the assertion that the reason for these laws is not of human origin, was not sought and found slowly and with many blunders, but, being of divine origin, is whole, perfect, without history, a gift, a miracle, merely communicated.... Then tradition, that is, the assertion that the law has already existed from time immemorial, that it is impious, a crime against the ancestors, to call it in question. The authority of the law is established by the thesis: God gave it, the ancestors lived it. – The higher rationale of such a procedure lies in the intention of gradually making the way of life recognized as correct (that is demonstrated by a tremendous amount of finely-sifted experience) unconscious: so that a complete automatism of instinct is achieved – the precondition for any kind of mastery, any kind of perfection in the art of living. To set up a law-book of the kind of Manu means to concede to a people the right henceforth to become masterly, to become perfect – to be ambitious for the highest art of living. To that end the law must be made unconscious: this is the purpose of every holy lie. – The order of castes, the supreme, the dominating law, is only the sanctioning of a natural order, a natural law of the first rank over which no arbitrary caprice, no ‘modern idea’ has any power. In every healthy society, there can be distinguished three types of man of divergent physiological tendency which mutually condition one another and each of which possesses its own hygiene, its own realm of work, its own sort of mastery and feeling of perfection. Nature, not Manu, separates from one another the predominantly spiritual type, the predominantly muscular and temperamental type, and the third type distinguished neither in the one nor the other, the mediocre type – the last as the great majority, the first as the élite. The highest caste – I call it the very few – possesses, as the perfect caste, also the privileges of the very few: among them is that of representing happiness, beauty, benevolence on earth. Only the most spiritual human beings are permitted beauty, beautiful things: only in their case is benevolence not weakness. Pulchrum est paucorum hominum: the good is a privilege. On the other hand, nothing is more strictly forbidden them than ugly manners or a pessimistic outlook, an eye that makes ugly – to say nothing of indignation at the collective aspect of things. Indignation is the privilege of the Chandala; pessimism likewise. ‘The world is perfect’ – thus speaks the instinct of the most spiritual, the affirmative instinct – : ‘imperfection, everything beneath us, distance between man and man, the pathos of this distance, the Chandala themselves pertain to this perfection'. The most spiritual human beings, as the strongest, find their happiness where others would find their destruction: in the labyrinth, in severity towards themselves and others, in attempting; their joy lies in self-constraint: with them asceticism becomes nature, need, instinct. They consider the hard task a privilege, to play with vices which overwhelm others a recreation.... Knowledge – a form of asceticism. – They are the most venerable kind of human being: this does not exclude their being the most cheerful, the most amiable. They rule not because they want to but because they are; they are not free to be second in rank. – The second in rank: these are the guardians of the law, the keepers of order and security; the noble warriors; above all the king as the highest formula of warrior, judge and upholder of the law. The second in rank are the executives of the most spiritual order, the closest to them who relieve them of everything coarse in the work of ruling – their following, their right hand, their best pupils. – In all this, to say it again, there is nothing capricious, nothing 'artificial'; whatever is different from this is artificial – nature is then confounded.... The order of castes, order of rank, only formulates the supreme law of life itself; the separation of the three types is necessary for the preservation of society, for making possible higher and higher types – inequality of rights is the condition for the existence of rights at all. – A right is a privilege. The privilege of each is determined by the nature of his being. Let us not underestimate the privileges of the mediocre. Life becomes harder and harder as it approaches the heights – the coldness increases, the responsibility increases. A high culture is a pyramid: it can stand only on a broad base, its very first prerequisite is a strongly and soundly consolidated mediocrity. The crafts, trade, agriculture, science, the greater part of art, in a word the entire compass of professional activity, are in no way compatible with anything other than mediocrity in ability and desires; these things would be out of place among the élite, the instinct pertaining to them is as much opposed to aristocracy as it is to anarchy. To be a public utility, a cog, a function, is a natural vocation, it is not society, it is the kind of happiness of which the great majority are alone capable, which makes intelligent machines of them. For the mediocre it is happiness to be mediocre; mastery in one thing, specialization, is for them a natural instinct. It would be quite unworthy of a more profound mind to see an objection in mediocrity as such. It is even the prime requirement for the existence of exceptions; a high culture is conditional upon it. When an exceptional human being handles the mediocre more gently than he does himself or his equals, this is not mere politeness of the heart* – it is simply his duty.... Whom among today's rabble do I hate the most? The Socialist rabble, the Chandala apostles who undermine the worker's instinct, his pleasure, his feeling of contentment with his little state of being – who make him envious, who teach him revengefulness.... Injustice never lies in unequal rights, it lies in the claim to ‘equal’ rights.... What is bad? But I have already answered that question: everything that proceeds from weakness, from envy, from revengefulness. – The anarchist and the Christian have a common origin... 58 It does indeed make a difference for what purpose one lies: whether one preserves with a lie or destroys with it. One may assert an absolute equivalence between Christian and anarchist: their purpose, their instinct is set only on destruction. For the proof of this proposition one has only to read history, which displays it with frightful clarity. If we have just now examined a religious legislation the purpose of which was to ‘eternalize’ a grand organization of society, the supreme condition for the prosperity of life – Christianity discovered its mission in making an end of just such an organization because life prospered within it. There the revenue of reason from long ages of experimentation and uncertainty was to be employed for the benefit of the most distant future and the biggest, richest, most complete harvest possible brought home: here, on the contrary, the harvest was poisoned overnight.... That which stood aere perennius, the Imperium Romanum, the most grandiose form of organization under difficult conditions which has hitherto been achieved, in comparison with which everything before and everything since is patchwork, bungling, dilettantism – these holy anarchists made it an ‘act of piety’ to destroy ‘the world’, that is to say the Imperium Romanum, until not one stone was left standing on another – until even Teutons and other such ruffians could become master of it.... The Christian and the anarchist: both décadents, both incapable of producing anything but dissolution, poisoning, degeneration, both bloodsuckers, both with the instinct of deadly hatred towards everything that stands erect, that towers grandly up, that possesses duration, that promises life a future.... Christianity was the vampire of the Imperium Romanum – the tremendous deed of the Romans in clearing the ground for a great culture which could take its time was undone overnight by Christianity. – Is this still not understood? The Imperium Romanum which we know, which the history of the Roman province teaches us to know better and better, this most admirable of all works of art in the grand style, was a beginning, its structure was calculated to prove itself by millennia – to this day there has never been such building, to build in such a manner sub specie aeterni has never been so much as dreamed of! – This organization was firm enough to endure bad emperors: the accident of persons must have no effect on such things – first principle of all grand architecture. But it was not firm enough to endure the corruptest form of corruption, to endure the Christian.... These stealthy vermin which, shrouded in night, fog and ambiguity crept up to every individual and sucked seriousness for real things, the instinct for realities of any kind, out of him, this cowardly, womanish and honeyed crew gradually alienated the ‘souls’ of this tremendous structure – those precious, those manly-noble natures who found their own cause, their own seriousness, their own pride in the cause of Rome. This underhanded bigotry, conventicle secrecy, gloomy concepts such as Hell, such as the sacrifice of the innocent, such as the unio mystica in blood-drinking, above all the slowly stirred-up fire of revengefulness, of Chandala revengefulness – that is what became master of Rome, the same species of religion on whose antecedent form Epicurus had already made war. One must read Lucretius to understand what it was Epicurus opposed: not paganism but ‘Christianity’, which is to say the corruption of souls through the concept of guilt, punishment and immortality. – He opposed the subterranean cults, the whole of latent Christianity – to deny immortality was already in those days a real redemption. – And Epicurus would have won, every mind of any account in the Roman Empire was an Epicurean: then Paul appeared.... Paul, Chandala hatred against Rome, against ‘the world’, become flesh and genius, the Jew, the eternal Jew* par excellence.... What he divined was that with the aid of the little sectarian movement on the edge of Judaism one could ignite a ‘world conflagration’, that with the symbol ‘God on the Cross’ one could sum up everything down-trodden, everything in secret revolt, the entire heritage of anarchist agitation in the Empire into a tremendous power. ‘Salvation is of the Jews.’ – Christianity as the formula for outbidding all the subterranean cults, those of Osiris, of the Great Mother, of Mithras for example – and for summing them up: it is in this insight that the genius of Paul consists. His instinct in this matter was so sure that, doing ruthless violence to the truth, he took the ideas by which those Chandala religions exercised their fascination and placed them in the mouth of the ‘Saviour’ he had invented, and not only in his mouth – so as to make of him something even a priest of Mithras could understand.... This was his vision on the road to Damascus: he grasped that to disvalue ‘the world’ he needed the belief in immortality, that the concept ‘Hell’ will master even Rome – that with the ‘Beyond’ one kills life.... Nihilist and Christian: they rhyme,* and do not merely rhyme... 59 The whole labour of the ancient world in vain: I have no words to express my feelings at something so dreadful. – And considering its labour was a preparation, that only the substructure for a labour of millennia had, with granite selfconfidence, been laid, the whole meaning of the ancient world in vain!... Why did the Greeks exist? Why the Romans? – Every prerequisite for an erudite culture, all the scientific methods were already there, the great, the incomparable art of reading well had already been established – the prerequisite for a cultural tradition, for a uniform science; natural science, in concert with mathematics and mechanics, was on the best possible road – the sense for facts, the last-developed and most valuable of all the senses, had its schools and its tradition already centuries old! Is this understood? Everything essential for setting to work had been devised – methods, one must repeat ten times, are the essential, as well as being the most difficult, as well as being that which has habit and laziness against it longest. What we have won back for ourselves today with an unspeakable amount of self-constraint – for we all still have bad instincts, the Christian instincts, somewhere within us – the free view of reality, the cautious hand, patience and seriousness in the smallest things, the whole integrity of knowledge – was already there! already more than two millennia ago! And good and delicate taste and tact! Not as brain training! Not as ‘German’ culture with the manners of ruffians! But as body, as gesture, as instinct – in a word, as reality.... All in vain! Overnight merely a memory! – Greeks! Romans! nobility of instinct, of taste, methodical investigation, genius for organization and government, the faith in, the will to a future for mankind, the great Yes to all things, visibly present to all the senses as the Imperium Romanum, grand style no longer merely art but become reality, truth, life.... And not overwhelmed overnight by a natural event! Not trampled down by Teutons and other such clodhoppers! But ruined by cunning, secret, invisible, anaemic vampires! Not conquered – only sucked dry!... Covert revengefulness, petty envy become master ! Everything pitiful, everything suffering from itself, everything tormented by base feelings, the whole ghetto-world of the soul suddenly on top! – One has only to read any of the Christian agitators, Saint Augustine for example, to realize, to smell, what dirty fellows had therewith come out on top. One would be deceiving oneself utterly if one presupposed a lack of intelligence of any sort on the part of the leaders of the Christian movement – oh they are shrewd, shrewd to the point of holiness, these Church Fathers! What they lack is something quite different. Nature was neglectful when she made them – she forgot to endow them with even a modest number of respectable, decent, cleanly instincts.... Between ourselves, they are not even men.... If Islam despises Christianity, it is a thousand times right to do so: Islam presupposes men... 60 Christianity robbed us of the harvest of the culture of the ancient world, it later went on to rob us of the harvest of the culture of Islam. The wonderful Moorish cultural world of Spain, more closely related to us at bottom, speaking more directly to our senses and taste, than Greece and Rome, was trampled down (– I do not say by what kind of feet –): why? because it was noble, because it owed its origin to manly instincts, because it said Yes to life even in the rare and exquisite treasures of Moorish life!... Later on, the Crusaders fought against something they would have done better to lie down in the dust before – a culture compared with which even our nineteenth century may well think itself very impoverished and very ‘late’. – They wanted booty, to be sure: the Orient was rich.... But let us not be prejudiced! The Crusades – higher piracy, that is all! German knighthood, Viking knighthood at bottom, was there in its element: the Church knew only too well what German knighthood can be had for.... The German knights, always the ‘Switzers’ of the Church, always in the service of all the bad instincts of the Church – but well paid.... That it is precisely with the aid of German swords, German blood and courage, that the Church has carried on its deadly war against everything noble on earth! A host of painful questions arises at this point. The German aristocracy is virtually missing in the history of higher culture: one can guess the reason.... Christianity, alcohol – the two great means of corruption.... For in itself there should be no choice in the matter when faced with Islam and Christianity, as little as there should when faced with an Arab and a Jew. The decision is given in advance; no one is free to choose here. One either is Chandala or one is not.... ‘War to the knife with Rome! Peace, friendship with Islam’: this is what that great free spirit, the genius among German emperors, Friedrich the Second, felt, this is what he did. What? does a German have to be a genius, a free spirit, before he can have decent feelings? How a German could ever have felt Christian escapes me... 61 Here it is necessary to touch on a memory a hundred times more painful for Germans. The Germans have robbed Europe of the last great cultural harvest Europe had to bring home – of the harvest of Renaissance. Is it at last understood, is there a desire to understand, what the Renaissance was? The revaluation of Christian values, the attempt, undertaken with every expedient, with every instinct, with genius of every kind, to bring about the victory of the opposing values, the noble values.... Up till now this has been the only great war, there has been no more decisive interrogation than that conducted by the Renaissance – the question it asks is the question I ask – : neither has there been a form of attack more fundamental, more direct, and more strenuously delivered on the entire front and at the enemy’s centre! To attack at the decisive point, in the very seat of Christianity, to set the noble values on the throne, which is to say to set them into the instincts, the deepest needs and desires of him who sits thereon.... I see in my mind’s eye a possibility of a quite unearthly fascination and splendour – it seems to glitter with a trembling of every refinement of beauty, there seems to be at work in it an art so divine, so diabolically divine, that one might scour the millennia in vain for a second such possibility; I behold a spectacle at once so meaningful and so strangely paradoxical it would have given all the gods of Olympus an opportunity for an immortal roar of laughter – Cesare Borgia as Pope.... Am I understood?... Very well, that would have been a victory of the only sort I desire today – : Christianity would thereby have been abolished! – What happened? A German monk, Luther, went to Rome. This monk, all the vindictive instincts of a failed priest in him, fulminated in Rome against the Renaissance.... Instead of grasping with profound gratitude the tremendous event which had taken place, the overcoming of Christianity in its very seat – his hatred grasped only how to nourish itself on this spectacle. The religious man thinks only of himself. – What Luther saw was the corruption of the Papacy, while precisely the opposite was palpably obvious: the old corruption, the peccatum originale, Christianity no longer sat on the Papal throne! Life sat there instead! the triumph of life! the great Yes to all lofty, beautiful, daring things!... And Luther restored the Church: he attacked it.... The Renaissance – an event without meaning, a great in vain! – Oh these Germans, what they have already cost us! In vain – that has always been the work of the Germans. – The Reformation; Leibniz; Kant and so-called German philosophy; the Wars of ‘Liberation’; the Reich – each time an in vain for something already in existence, for something irretrievable.... They are my enemies, I confess it, these Germans: I despise in them every kind of uncleanness of concept and value, of cowardice in the face of every honest Yes and No. For almost a millennium they have twisted and tangled everything they have laid their hands on, they have on their conscience all the half-heartedness – three-eighths-heartedness! – from which Europe is sick – they also have on their conscience the uncleanest kind of Christianity there is, the most incurable kind, the kind hardest to refute, Protestantism.... If we never get rid of Christianity, the Germans will be to blame... 62 – With that I have done and pronounce my judgement. I condemn Christianity, I bring against the Christian Church the most terrible charge any prosecutor has ever uttered. To me it is the extremest thinkable form of corruption, it has had the will to the ultimate corruption conceivably possible. The Christian Church has left nothing untouched by its depravity, it has made of every value a disvalue, of every truth a lie, of every kind of integrity a vileness of soul. People still dare to talk to me of its ‘humanitarian’ blessings! To abolish any state of distress whatever has been profoundly inexpedient to it: it has lived on states of distress, it has created states of distress in order to eternalize itself.... The worm of sin, for example: it was only the Church which enriched mankind with this state of distress! – ‘Equality of souls before God’, this falsehood, this pretext for the rancune of all the base-minded, this explosive concept which finally became revolution, modern idea and the principle of the decline of the entire social order – is Christian dynamite.... ‘Humanitarian’ blessings of Christianity! To cultivate out of humanitas a self-contradiction, an art of self-violation, a will to falsehood at any price, an antipathy, a contempt for every good and honest instinct! These are the blessings of Christianity! – Parasitism as the sole practice of the Church; with its ideal of green-sickness, of ‘holiness’ draining away all blood, all love, all hope for life; the Beyond as the will to deny reality of every kind; the Cross as the badge of recognition for the most subterranean conspiracy there has ever been – a conspiracy against health, beauty, wellconstitutedness, bravery, intellect, benevolence of soul, against life itself... Wherever there are walls I shall inscribe this eternal accusation against Christianity upon them – I can write in letters which make even the blind see.... I call Christianity the one great curse, the one great intrinsic depravity, the one great instinct for revenge for which no expedient is sufficiently poisonous, secret, subterranean, petty – I call it the one immortal blemish of mankind... And one calculates time from the dies nefastus* on which this fatality arose – from the first day of Christianity! – Why not rather from its last? – From today? –

Revaluation of all values! Glossary of Names ARISTOTLE (384–322 BC) Nietzsche has only a slight interest in Aristotle, and his main concern with him is to refute his conception of tragedy as catharsis; the ‘magnanimous’ man of the Nicomachean Ethics, however, is very like Nietzsche’s Übermensch. AUGUSTINE (354–430) ‘These have mastered Christianity:... Platonism (Augustine)...’ (Will to Power 214); utterly unable to live in the manner of Jesus, Augustine employed Christianity as a vehicle for his own ideology in the manner of Paul. BAUDELAIRE, Charles (1821–67) ‘Who was the first intelligent supporter of Wagner? Charles Baudelaire....’ (Ecce Homo II 5): Nietzsche’s interest in Baudelaire, such as it is, is part of his interest in proving that Wagner was at bottom a French décadent. BORGIA, Cesare (d. 1507) ‘Borgia’ is an ideogram for the man of strong but unsublimated will to power, the ‘blond beast’, who is not ‘improved’ when he is tamed. BUCKLE, Henry Thomas (1821–62) Historian, author of the unfinished History of Civilization in which he expounds his ideas on the general laws which govern the evolution of human societies. His reputation formerly stood much higher than it does now: in the Genealogy of Morals (1, 4) Nietzsche attacks the ‘plebeianism of the modern spirit’ as manifested in the ‘notorious case of Buckle’. BURCKHARDT, Jacob (1818–97) Historian, best known for his Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy. He was an elder colleague of Nietzsche’s at Basel university and Nietzsche retained a great admiration for him. CAESAR, Julius (101–44 BC) In Nietzsche’s works, Caesar is dehistoricized into an ideogram for the man of sublimated will to power (compare Borgia). Nietzsche does admire Caesar, but not specifically as a general and certainly not because he was a general (compare Napoleon). CARLYLE, Thomas (1795–1881) In an aphorism in Dawn called ‘The cult of hero- worship and its fanatics’ (298), Nietzsche says of one who idealizes another that he ‘sets this person at so great a distance from himself that he can no longer see him clearly – and then he reinterprets what he still sees into the “beautiful”, which is to say the symmetrical, soft-lined, indefinite.’ The two men he accuses of doing this, Byron and Carlyle, are both as it happens Scotsmen, and it was another Scotsman, Thomas Campbell, who provided the formula for this kind of perspective in the lines, ‘’Tis distance lends enchantment to the view, And robes the mountain in its azure hue’ and thereby defined a good part of ‘Romanticism’. To Nietzsche, Carlyle was a ‘typical Romantic’. CATILINE, Lucius Sergius (c. 109–62 BC) Unsuccessful conspiracy against the Senate 63–2 BC: his feelings towards that body are likened to Caesar’s, his handling of that body contrasted with Caesar’s. COMTE, Auguste (1798–1857) French philosopher, author of the Cours de philosophie positive (1830–42). Comte was for Nietzsche the great ‘embracer and conqueror of the pure sciences’ who at the end of his life allowed his scientific strictness to evaporate into ‘poetical mist and mystic lights’ (Dawn 542). CORNARO, Luigi (1467–1566)

After surviving a nearly fatal illness at forty, he advocated a sparing diet as a recipe for health and long life. 'In later life he found one egg a day sufficient solid food.' (Encyclopedia Britannica). His book, Discorsi sulla vita sobria (1558), was a best-seller in many languages. DANTE ALIGHIERI (1265–1321) The scattered references to Dante in Nietzsche's works are highly contradictory. DARWIN, Charles (1809–82) Confrontation with Darwin is a major motif of Nietzsche's philosophy passim. There are four main points at issue: (i) in so far as 'Darwinism' means the theory of evolution it is 'true but deadly' because it proves that mankind is a continuation of the animals and that human life is therefore deprived of any special significance; Nietzsche's hypothesis of sublimated will to power is designed to restore a distinction between man and animal; (ii) in so far as Darwinism is the theory of evolution by natural selection brought about by a 'struggle for survival' it is, Nietzsche maintains, untrue, because it presupposes a niggardliness and state of chronic distress in nature which does not exist, the state of nature being on the contrary 'one of superfluity and prodigality, even to the point of absurdity' (The Gay Science 349: the unconscious influence on Darwin's theory of the condition of nineteenth-century England and of Victorian middle-class thriftiness and money-mindedness in general is now, I think, generally recognized); (iii) in as much as the effects accounted for by the hypothesis of a will to aggrandizement include those accounted for by the hypothesis of a 'will to survive' this latter hypothesis is superfluous; (iv) when a 'struggle for survival' does take place its outcome is not that implied by the theory of natural selection, that is to say it is not a higher type which emerges victorious. DEMOCRITUS (flourished c. 420 BC) Greek philosopher, the founder, with Leucippus, of atomism. Nietzsche's attitude towards Democritus' atomism is instructive: he approves of its materialism and of the fact that it can get along without any teleology, but he sees that it is very far from being the complete victory over Parmenides its advocates took it to be: the projection of the notion of a 'subject' from the individual on to the outside world, where it assumes the shape of a 'thing', is certainly not done away with in atomism, for the 'atom' is a 'thing'. The mechanistic idea of atoms as solid objects like billiard balls was instinctively rejected by Nietzsche: and in Human, All Too Human (19) he wrote: 'the whole procedure of science has been pursuing the task of resolving everything thing-like (material) into motions.' DESCARTES, René (1596–1650) In his relatively few references to Descartes, Nietzsche is chiefly concerned to question the validity of Descartes' dictum cogito, ergo sum, mainly by way of analysing the proposition 'I think'. This has less to do with Descartes himself than with Nietzsche's general polemic against 'the foisting on of a "subject"'. DOSTOYEVSKY, Fyodor (1821–81) 'A few weeks ago I did not even know the name of Dostoyevsky.... A chance reach in a bookshop brought to my notice a work just translated into French, L'esprit souterrain [Notes from Underground] ... The instinct of kinship (or what shall I call it?) spoke immediately, my joy was extraordinary: I have to go back to my becoming acquainted with Stendhal's Rouge et Noir to recall another such joy.' (Letter of 23 February 1887.) By 7 March he had also read The House of the Dead and The Insulted and Injured, both likewise in French translation. Whether he read all or any of the four great novels is unknown: in view of his continued enthusiasm for Dostoyevsky his failure to mention any of them in his considerable correspondence of 1887 and 1888 suggests he did not, although one is almost compelled to conclude that the employment of the word 'idiot' to describe Jesus, as well as its rather frequent employment in the works in 1888 in general, derives from a knowledge of Dostoyevsky's The Idiot: certainly an awareness of what Dostoyevsky means by that term helps us to understand why Nietzsche should have used it. Since he was twenty-three years younger than Dostoyevsky and produced many of his books after Dostoyevsky was dead, it is important to note how late it was before he came to read him: what suggests Dostoyevsky in Nietzsche's writings before 1887 is not the product of influence or borrowing but of a similarity in psychological acumen. ELIOT, George (Mary Ann Evans, 1819–80) Nietzsche's friend Helene Druscowicz was a great admirer of George Eliot, wrote about her and talked to Nietzsche about her. Fräulein Druscowicz could read English (she translated Swinburne into German), Nietzsche could not, or only very haltingly, and it seems likely he knew of George Eliot mainly from her: he clearly thought of Eliot mainly as an English free-thinker. The reference to her in Twilight is the only one in Nietzsche's works. EMERSON, Ralph Waldo (1803–82) Aphorism 92 of The Gay Science, on the relation between poetry and prose, names the only four 'masters of prose' of the nineteenth century (Goethe being considered a product of the eighteenth): Leopardi, Mérimée, Emerson and Landor. Whatever one may think of this judgement, and of its somewhat narrow conception of what constitutes good prose, it provides evidence of Nietzsche's extreme admiration for Emerson. The original edition of The Gay Science (1882) is prefaced by a quotation from Emerson, and he admired Emerson longer and with greater consistency than he did any other contemporary writer: his holiday programme for 1862 included making extracts from all Emerson's essays (no record of whether he actually did so) and his enthusiasm is just as great in 1888. EPICURUS (341–270 BC) Greek philosopher, adopted the physics and the ethical teaching of Democritus and made of the latter the influential moral doctrine named after him. For Nietzsche, 'the garden god' Epicurus is a mood rather than a man: aphorism 295 of The Wanderer and his Shadow, in which Epicurus is called 'one of the greatest human beings, the inventor of an heroic-idyllic mode of philosophizing', is a description of this mood. FONTENELLE, Bernard Le Bovier de (1657–1757) French writer. He appears here as a representative of the group of six – the others are

Montaigne, La Rochefoucauld, La Bruyère, Vauve-nargues and Chamfort – of whom Nietzsche says (The Wanderer and his Shadow 214) that one is closer to antiquity when reading them than with any similar group of any other nation: ‘Their books... contain more actual ideas than all the books of German philosophers put together.’ FRIEDRICH THE SECOND (1194–1250) King of Sicily from 1198, king of Germany from 1212, ‘emperor of the West’ from 1220; continually in conflict with the Papacy; although excommunicated he took part in the sixth crusade, when he negotiated with the Mohammedans instead of fighting them and gained the city of Jerusalem without bloodshed. His court in Sicily was possibly the most cultured spot in Europe, and Friedrich himself, although the ‘German Christian emperor’, was more of a Mohammedan than a Christian and more of an Italian than a German. The need to be continually on the defensive against the forces of the Pope produced a deterioration in his character in later years which ended in a species of persecution mania. Nietzsche’s admiration for him is unqualified and it is interesting to see why: ‘the first European according to my taste’ (Beyond Good and Evil 200) he calls him at the end of a discussion of the possibility that higher types of men are produced as a consequence of racial mixture: it is Friedrich’s cosmopolitan culture which Nietzsche admires, the ‘good European’. (In expressing his admiration for Friedrich the Second Nietzsche is probably also expressing his lack of admiration for the traditionally admired Friedrich the First, called Barbarossa.) GOETHE, Johann Wolfgang (1749–1832) The modern man Nietzsche admired most and the one who provided him with a yardstick against which he measured the achievements of other men; a type of the Übermensch or ‘Dionysian man’. The description of Goethe in ‘Expeditions of an Untimely Man’ 49 defines the Übermensch more succinctly than any other single passage in Nietzsche’s works. GONCOURT, Edmond (1822–96) and Jules (1830–70) French writers of the naturalist school. ‘The second volume of the journal des Goncourts has appeared... in it are described in the most vivid way the celebrated dinners chez Magny, those dinners which brought together every fortnight the wittiest and most sceptical company of Parisian spirits of the time (Sainte-Beuve, Flaubert, Théophile Gautier, Taine, Renan, the Goncourts, Schérer, Gavarni, occasionally Turgenev, etc.). Exasperated pessimism, cynicism, nihilism, alternating with much boisterousness and good humour; I myself wouldn’t be at all out of place there – I know these gentlemen inside out, so well that I have really had enough of them already. One has to be more radical: fundamentally they all lack the main thing – “la force”.’ (Letter of 10 November 1887). HARTMANN, Eduard von (1842–1906) German philosopher, author of Philosophy of the Unconscious. Often referred to by Nietzsche, always with contempt. HEGEL, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770–1831) Nietzsche’s relation to Hegel is complex and cannot be satisfactorily described in a note. Two things can be noted, however: (i) Nietzsche’s basic attitude towards Hegel was that his philosophy was the conceptual basis of modern 'evolutionism' and thus encouraged a habit of mind which ought to be deprecated; (ii) Nietzsche clearly did not study Hegel very profoundly and was in many ways closer to him than he suspected, although he acknowledged that 'we Germans would be Hegelians even if Hegel had never existed, in as much as we instinctively accord a profounder significance and a greater value to becoming and evolution than we do to that which "is"....' (The Gay Science 357.) HEINE, Heinrich (1797–1856) German-Jewish poet and writer. 'The highest conception of the lyric poet was given me by Heinrich Heine. I seek in vain in all the realms of the millennia for an equally sweet arid passionate music. He possessed that divine malice without which I cannot conceive the perfect. – I estimate the value of human beings, of races, according to how necessarily they do not know how to understand the god apart from the satyr. – And how he handles German! It will one day be said that Heine and I have been by far the greatest artists of the German language...' (Ecce Homo II 4.) HERACLITUS (c. 500 BC) Greek philosopher. Because of his dynamic view of nature much admired by Nietzsche. In his pride and isolation, and the sibylline character of his utterances, he is the ultimate model for Zarathustra. HORACE (Quintus Horatius Flaccus, 65–8 BC) Often quoted by Nietzsche, although sometimes the quotations are only familiar tags, e.g. aereperennius. HUGO, Victor (1802–85) 'Victor Hugo and Richard Wagner – they signify one and the same thing: that in declining cultures, that wherever the decision comes to rest with the masses, genuineness becomes superfluous, disadvantageous, an encumbrance. Only the actor still arouses great enthusiasm.' (The Wagner Case II.) KANT, Emmanuel (1724–1804) There are scores of references to Kant in Nietzsche's works, and the greater part of them are hostile. What Nietzsche held against Kant can, however, be stated in a single sentence: that Kant believed in and sought to demonstrate the existence of a 'moral world-order'. LEIBNIZ, Gottfried Wilhelm (1646–1716) Nietzsche credits Leibniz with and praises him for the discovery that 'what we call consciousness constitutes only a condition of our spiritual and psychical world (perhaps a morbid condition) and is very far from constituting this world itself' (The Gay Science 357): the connexion with Nietzsche's speculations will be clear. Otherwise he has little interest in Leibniz. LISZT, Franz (1811–86), 'who excels all other musicians in the nobility of his orchestral tone' (Ecce Homo II 7) – but because he was Wagner's father-in-law Nietzsche cannot resist making jokes about him. Liszt was, of course, very much an 'actor' in Nietzsche's sense of the word. LOBECK, Christian August (1781–1860) German philologist and antiquary; a specialist in the history of the Greek language. He wrote many scholarly works. LUTHER, Martin (1483–1546) The long polemic in The Anti-Christ against 'faith' as the distinguishing characteristic of the Christian expresses what lies behind Nietzsche's long-standing enmity towards

Luther: emphasis on 'faith' is merely a confession of incapacity for 'works'. Nietzsche also continually emphasizes Luther's coarseness and his enmity towards reason. MACHIAVELLI, Niccolò (1469–1527) Admired by Nietzsche for his 'realism'; but Nietzsche refers to him very infrequently and there seems no good reason for linking their names as is sometimes done. MALTHUS, Thomas Robert (1766–1834) 'Population, when unchecked, increases in a geometrical ratio. Subsistence only increases in an arithmetical ratio... the power of population is indefinitely greater than the power in the earth to produce subsistence for man.' (Essay on the Principle of Population [1798].) MICHELET, Jules (1798–1874) Historian of France and of the Revolution. Nietzsche links him with Schiller and Carlyle as an idealizing historian. (Will to Power 343.) MILL, John Stuart (1806–74) Very few references to Mill in Nietzsche's works, but many hostile ones to 'utilitarianism', which was especially Mill's ethical theory. NAPOLEON BONAPARTE (1769–1821) Not, despite occasional suggestions to the contrary, a type of the Übermensch, but a 'synthesis of Unmensch [monster] and Übermensch' (Genealogy of Morals I 16) – that is to say, a 'problem'. Nietzsche worries this problem of Napoleon from the beginning of his life till the end, but arrives at no definite conclusion. Many of his statements about Napoleon are neutral as regards 'admiration' or 'dislike': they seek to describe. He shows no interest in his military campaigns and his assessment of him does not involve consideration of his generalship. PASCAL, Blaise (1623–62) French mathematician and philosopher. At the age of sixteen he wrote a treatise on conic sections and at eighteen invented a computer; later he invented, among other things, the calculus of probability and the hydraulic press. On the night of 23 November 1654 he suffered a mystical 'conversion' to religious belief and from then on frequented Port-Royal and devoted himself largely to religious controversy and to introspective philosophizing and meditation (his celebrated Pensées). Nietzsche mentions Pascal dozens of times, and always with reference to this religious conversion and its consequences: he is 'the most instructive of all sacrifices to Christianity'. (Ecce Homo II 3.) PETRONIUS, Caius (suicide AD 65) Author of the Satyricon, a satire in prose and verse on the social life of first century Rome. PLATO (428–347 BC) 'Plato against Homer: that is the whole, the genuine antagonism' (Genealogy of Morals III 25): the former as a slanderer of life, the latter as its glorifier. Nietzsche's attitude becomes comprehensible in the light of his own 'materialism', for in that light Plato becomes a falsifier of reality. Nietzsche considered Plato's theory of suprasensible forms, his ethical preoccupation and his other-worldly tendency in general as harmful to a healthy appreciation of the present world and as specific errors springing from a false relationship with the actual world: Plato is one of those who need to 'lie themselves out of reality'. RENAN, Ernest (1823–92) French rationalist writer: the type of free-thinker who has not really freed himself from religion. ROUSSEAU, Jean-Jacques (1712–78) In his essay Schopenhauer as an Educator (the third of the Untimely Meditations, 1874), Nietzsche offers a comparison between Rousseau and Goethe, the former representing the revolutionary man and the latter the contemplative, and in ‘Expeditions of an Untimely Man’ 48 and 49 he contrasts them again. Goethe is now, of course, much more than the contemplative man: he is, in fact, the superman, the embodiment of sublimated will to power; and Rousseau too has undergone a change, this time for the worse: from the revolutionary he has declined to the rabble, and is in fact the representative of unsublimated will to power. Nietzsche’s long polemic against Rousseau – there are dozens of references to him – can best be understood in the light of this symbolism: Rousseau’s ‘back to nature’ means back to the animals, back to passion uncontrolled. SAINT-SIMON, Claude-Henri, Comte de (1760–1825) Inventor of an economic theory involving common ownership of property and distribution of goods: the Saint-Simonians acquired rather quickly some of the characteristics of religious fanaticism. SAINTE-BEUVE, Charles-Augustin (1804–69) Very influential literary critic and historian. Nietzsche criticizes, here and elsewhere, his celebrated ‘objectivity’. SALLUST (86–c.35 BC) Latin historian; chronicled the Catiline conspiracy. He modelled his style on that of Thucydides. SAND, George (Aurore Dupin, Baroness Dudevant, 1804–76) Novelist and writer. ‘It betrays corruption of the instincts – quite apart from the fact that it betrays bad taste – when a woman appeals precisely to Madame Roland or Madame de Staël or Monsieur George Sand as if something in favour of “woman as such” were thereby demonstrated. Among men the above-named are the three comic women as such – nothing more! – and precisely the best involuntary counter-arguments against emancipation and female autocracy.’ (Beyond Good and Evil 233.) SCHILLER, Friedrich (1759–1805) As a youth Nietzsche was a Schiller enthusiast; he lost his enthusiasm as he grew older. From that he concluded that Schiller was essentially something for young people (this opinion is expressed several times in his works). Ultimately he considered Schiller superficial and Romantic. SCHOPENHAUER, Arthur (1788–1860) His World as Will and Idea (1818) was a major influence on the young Nietzsche, who for many years considered himself a ‘Schopenhauerian’: but Schopenhauer’s pessimism, his duality of will and intellect, his metaphysical preoccupation and his hostility towards the emotions, particularly sexuality, were none of them finally acceptable and Nietzsche’s mature philosophy is not indebted to Schopenhauer in any way. His youthful discipleship is, however, the reason for the frequency with which the older Nietzsche makes polemical points against Schopenhauer. SOCRATES (470–399 BC) ‘Socrates... stands so close to me that I am almost always fighting with him’, Nietzsche confessed in the notes for an uncompleted essay of 1875 (Wissenschaft und Weisheit in Kampf) and the fight went on until the end. Socrates is the type of 'the philosopher' and in investigating the mind and heart of Socrates Nietzsche is investigating his own: with none of the figures he discusses is the tremendous inner dialectic of Nietzsche's lifelong monologue so clearly displayed as it is in the passages dealing with Socrates (of which there are hundreds). The 'problem' of Socrates is the problem of reason, of the status of reason in the life of man: and Nietzsche finds that problem inexhaustible.

SPENCER, Herbert (1820–1903) Philosopher of evolution. Nietzsche never refers to him without disdain. SPINOZA, Baruch (1632–77) On five main points, Nietzsche says in a letter of 30 July 1881, he finds that he and Spinoza are in agreement: on denying free will, purpose, the moral world-order, the unegoistic and the existence of evil. But he deprecates 'that hocus-pocus of mathematical form with which Spinoza encased his philosophy as if in brass'. (Beyond Good and Evil 5.)

STENDHAL (Henri Beyle, 1783–1842) Greatly admired by Nietzsche for his psychological insight and as an 'honest atheist... Perhaps I am even envious of Stendhal? He has robbed me of the best atheist joke, which precisely I could have made: "God's only excuse is that he does not exist."' (Ecce Homo II 3.)

STRAUSS, David (1808–74) His Life of Jesus and The Old Faith and the New were very popular expositions of the rationalist approach to religion. The first of Nietzsche's Untimely Meditations – David Strauss, the Confessor and the Writer (1873) – was a violent attack on him.

THUCYDIDES (c. 460–c. 395 BC) Greek historian, author of the History of the Peloponnesian War.

TOLSTOY, Leo (1828–1910) Décadent because of his emphasis on 'pity'. (Genealogy of Morals III 26, Will to Power 1020.) That 'resist not evil' is the key to the Gospel may have been suggested to Nietzsche by Tolstoy (see Tolstoy's My Religion, chapter I), but the conclusions he draws from this have nothing to do with Tolstoy.

WAGNER, Richard (1813–83) As a youth Nietzsche was deeply under Wagner's influence; around 1876 he broke away, but the figure of Wagner continued to haunt him and there is an unceasing dialogue between the two in Nietzsche's works almost passim. In the mature Nietzsche, Wagner is the type of 'the artist'. He plays a relatively minor role in Twilight because an entire book The Wagner Case, had just been devoted to him; but later in the year 1888 he comes to the forefront again in Nietzsche contra Wagner.

WINCKELMANN, Johann Joachim (1717–68) Archaeologist and historian of art whose conception of ancient Greece became the accepted one for the German world throughout the eighteenth century. Goethe's view of the ancient world derived from Winckelmann, whose writings he studied and whom he celebrated in Winckelmann and his Century (1805).

ZOLA, Emile (1840–1902) 'There is no such thing as pessimistic art.... Art affirms, Job affirms. – But Zola? But the Goncourts? – The things they exhibit are ugly: but that they exhibit them comes from pleasure in this ugliness....' (Will to Power 821.)

CHRONOLOGY 15 October. Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche born in the parsonage

at Röcken, near Lützen, Germany, the first of three children of Karl 1844 Ludwig, the village pastor, and Fraziska Nietzsche, daughter of the pastor of a nearby village. 1849 27 July. Nietzsche's father dies. 1850 The Nietzsche family moves to Naumberg, in Thuringia, in April. Arthur Schopenhauer publishes Essays, Aphorisms and Maxims. 1856 Birth of Freud. 1858 The family moves to No. 18 Weingarten. Nietzsche wins a place at the prestigious Pforta grammar school. Forms a literary society, 'Germania', with two Naumberg friends. 1860 Jacob Burckhardt publishes The Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy. 1864 Enters Bonn University as a student of theology and philology. At Easter, Nietzsche abandons the study of theology having lost his 1865 Christian belief. Leaves Bonn for Leipzig, following his former tutor of philology, Friedrich Ritschl. Begins to read Schopenhauer. First publication, 'Zur Geschichte der Theognideischen 1867 Spruchsammlung' (The History of the Theognidia Collection) in the Rheinische Museum für Philologie. Begins military service. 1868 Discharged from the army. Meets Richard Wagner. Appointed to the chair of classical philology at Basle University 1869 having been recommended by Ritschl. Awarded a doctorate by Leipzig. Regular visitor at Wagners' home in Tribschen. Delivers public lectures on 'The Greek Music Drama' and 'Socrates 1870 and Tragedy'. Serves as a medical orderly with the Prussian army where he is taken ill with diphtheria. Applies unsuccessfully for the chair of philology at Basle. His health 1871 deteriorates. Takes leave to recover and works on The Birth of Tragedy. 1872 The Birth of Tragedy published (January). Public lectures 'On the Future of our Educational Institutions'. 1873 Untimely Meditations I: David Strauss published. 1874 Untimely Meditations II: On the Use and Disadvantage of History for Life and III: Schopenhauer as Educator published. 1875 Meets Peter Gast, who is to become his earliest 'disciple'. Suffers from ill-health leading to a general collapse at Christmas. Granted a long absence from Basle due to continuing ill-health. Proposes marriage to Mathilde Trampedach but is rejected. Untimely Meditations IV: Richard Wagner in Bayreuth published. Travels to Italy. 1878 Human, All Too Human published. His friendship with the Wagners comes to an end. 1879 Assorted Opinions and Maxims published. Retires on a pension from Basle due to sickness. 1880 The Wanderer and his Shadow and Human, All Too Human II published. 1881 Dawn published. 1882 The Gay Science published. Proposes to Lou Andreas Salomé and is rejected. 1883 13 February. Wagner dies in Venice. Thus Spoke Zarathustra I and II published. 1884 Thus Spoke Zarathustra III published. 1885 Zarathustra IV privately printed. 1886 Beyond Good and Evil published. 1887 On the Genealogy of Morals published. The Wagner Case published. First review of his work as a whole 1888 published in the Bern Bund. Experiences some improvement in health but this is short-lived. Suffers mental collapse in Turin and is admitted to a psychiatric 1889 clinic at the University of Jena. Twilight of the Idols published and Nietzsche contra Wagner privately printed. 1890 Nietzsche returns to his mother's home. 1891 Dithyramps of Dionysus published. 1894 The Anti-Christ published. The 'Nietzsche Archive' founded by his sister, Elisabeth. 1895 Nietzsche contra Wagner published. 1897 20 April. Nietzsche's mother dies; and Elisabeth moves Nietzsche to Weimar. 1900 25 August. Nietzsche dies. Freud publishes Interpretation of Dreams. 1901 Publication of The Will to Power, papers selected by Elisabeth and Peter Gast. 1908 Ecce Homo published. * jeder 'Fall' ein GlÜcksfall. 'Fall' means case, 'Glücksfall' a piece of good luck. As well as being a play on words there seems to be a reference intended to Der Fall Wagner (The Wagner Case), Nietzsche's witty attack on Wagner completed immediately before Twilight was begun and which was also announced, ironically of course, as a 'relief' from a sterner task. † The spirit grows, strength is restored by wounding. * Like The Wagner Case, presumably. † See the Translator's Note, page 26. * Suche Nullen! 'Nullen' means nobodies, ciphers, as well as noughts – 'Seek nobodies!' The aphorism is a pun: 'if you want to multiply yourself by 100 [have followers] get noughts [nobodies] behind you!' † Zeitgemässe. Nietzsche's conception of himself as Unzeitgemäss (untimely, inopportune, independent of the age) is reflected in the chapter title 'Expeditions of an Untimely Man' (Streifzüge eines Unzeitgemässen), which itself refers back to Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen (Untimely Meditations), the collective title of four essays published 1873 – 6 and intended for others left incomplete. ‡ bread and Circe, in place of panem et circenses = bread and circuses. * Refers to a popular adage deriving from Johann Gottfried Seume's poem Die Gesänge. † Geist. All the meanings contained in this word cannot be conveyed in a single English word: what is meant is spirit, mind, intellect, intelligence. I have translated it as 'spirit', 'spiritual' when the most inclusive sense seems indicated, as 'intellect', 'intellectual' when this seems more appropriate. ‡ i.e. since the establishment of the Reich. § contradiction in terms. || Gewissensbisse (conscience-bites) is the ordinary term for pangs of conscience. * Der getretene Wurm krümmt sich plays upon the German equivalent of 'Even a worm will turn'. † Refers to the traditional misreading of a line in Ernst Moritz Arndt's patriotic song Des deutschen Vaterland: 'So with die deutsche Zunge klingt, Und Gott in Himmel Lieder singt'. 'Gott' is dative: Wherever the German tongue resounds And sings songs to God in Heaven - but is humorously understood as nominative: And God in Heaven sings songs. ‡ One can think and write only when sitting down. § das Sitzfleisch: etymologically 'the posterior' (sitting-flesh). 'Assiduity', from sedere = to sit, is cognate. Hence the contrast with 'walking' ideas. * According to Plato (Phaedo), Socrates' last words were: 'Crito, I owe a cock to Asclepius; will you remember to pay the debt?' One gave a cock to Asclepius on recovering from an illness: Socrates seems to be saying that life is, or his life has been an illness. † Specifically the followers of Schopenhauer, among whom Nietzsche himself was numbered in his young days. ‡ Unanimity of the wise. * Nietzsche's first published book. † a monster in face, a monster in soul. * from the viewpoint of eternity. * The school of Parmenides of Elea (fifth century BC), who denied the logical possibility of change and motion and argued that the only logical possibility was unchanging being. * the cause of itself. † the most real being. * The context makes it clear that this Kantian-sounding term is not being employed in the sense of Kant's twelve a priori 'categories', but simply to mean the faculty of reasoning. * the truth = Wahrheit, corresponding to wahre Welt = real world. † i.e. Kantian, from the northerly German city in which Kant was born and in which he lived and died. ‡ Here meaning empiricism, philosophy founded on observation and experiment. * Zarathustra begins. * The passions must be killed. * The abbey at Soligny from which the Trappist order – characterized by the severity of its discipline – takes its name. * Behold the man! * In Kant's philosophy the causes of sensations are called 'things in themselves'. The thing in itself is unknowable: the sensations we actually experience are produced by the operation of our subjective mental apparatus. † ugly shameful part. * first cause. * Nietzsche introduced this term in Towards a Genealogy of Morals I 11: it means man considered as an animal, and the first use of the term is immediately followed by a reference to 'the Roman, Arab, Teutonic, Japanese nobility, the Homeric heroes, the Scandinavian Vikings' and to the Athenians of the age of Pericles as examples of men 'the animal' in whom 'has to get out again, has to go back to the wilderness.' * The 'untouchables' excluded from the caste system. * This is one of the major themes of The Anti-Christ. † pious fraud. * beer. * A philosophical term meaning an explanation of something adequate to explaining it fully. Schopenhauer's doctoral thesis was On the Fourfold Root of the Principle of Sufficient Reason, and Nietzsche sometimes (as here) uses the term in a humorously inappropriate context. * beauty is for the few. * in natural dirtiness. † Der Trompeter von Säckingen (1853) by Joseph Viktor von Scheffel once enjoyed huge popularity in Germany; Viktor Nessler's opera based on it (1844) was also a popular success. ‡ oder die Schule der Geläufigkeit – nach Weibern. The joke is untranslatable: or the school of Geläufigkeit – after women. 'Geläufigkeit' means facility, skill (referring to Liszt's virtuosity as a pianist), but its root is 'laufen' = to run; and 'läufisch' means, among other things, lecherous. § milk in abundance. * scandal. † The headquarters in Paris of Jansenism, the doctrine that the human will is constitutionally incapable of goodness, and that salvation is therefore by free and undeserved grace. Sainte-Beuve wrote a celebrated history (1840–59) of the intellectual movement which grew up around PortRoyal. * The Imitation of Christ, a famous work attributed to the German mystic Thomas à Kempis (1379–1471). † das Ewig-Weibliche, Goethe's coinage in the last lines of Faust ('The eternal-feminine draws us aloft'), is often the object of Nietzsche's mockery, apparently because he cannot see any meaning in it. * petty facts. * In The Birth of Tragedy. * I am my own successor. †... that worthy gentleman who, returning from an amorous rendezvous as if things had gone well, said gratefully: 'Though the power be lacking, the lust is praiseworthy.' 'Voluptas' replaces the usual 'voluntas' = will. * Refers to the last lines of Luther's hymn 'Ein feste Burg' – where, however, what is to be let depart is the things of this world and the Reich means the kingdom of Heaven. * Schön and hässlich is the German translation of Macbeth's witches' 'fair and foul'. † Fragmentary sketches by Nietzsche published after his death, i.e. long after this reference to them. * intellectual love of God. † Art for art's sake. * The opening line of Tamino's aria in Mozart's The Magic Flute. † children or books. ‡ I shall look at myself, I shall read myself, I shall delight myself and I shall say: Can I really have had so much wit? * oxen: to work hard, slave – also to cram, study hard. † In Goethe's Faust, Part I, Scene 3. ‡ The seat of the Wagner Festival. § Parsifal, eponymous hero of Wagner's last opera, is described as a pure, i.e. chaste, fool (reine Tor) whose naïvety is proof against temptation of every kind. Nietzsche considered the plot of Parsifal preposterous and persistently uses the phrase 'reine Torheit' (pure folly) in the sense of complete folly. * shameful part. * pure, raw. * Sehr verbunden! – a play on the name of the 'Bund'. * Alludes to Max von Schenkendorf's poem 'Freiheit, die ich meine' (Freedom as I mean it). * Quotation from the closing scene of Faust, Part Two. † It is unworthy of great spirits to spread abroad the agitation they feel. * in respect of tactics. * Refers to Goethe's Venetian Epigrams, in which the Cross is one of four things Goethe says he cannot endure. † i.e. the Revaluation of all Values. * more enduring than brass. * Menippus (third century BC), of the Cynic school of philosophy, produced a number of satires no longer extant. * From the title of Book VII of Goethe's novel Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship: 'Confessions of a Beautiful Soul'. † German foolishness. * For Nietzsche's theory that all events recur eternally and its emotional significance in providing the most extreme formula of life-affirmation, see Thus Spoke Zarathustra, Part III ('Of the Vision and the Riddle', 'The Convalescent' and 'The Seven Seals') and Part IV ('The Intoxicated Song'). * From Thus Spoke Zarathustra, Part III, 'Of Old and New Law-Tables', with minor variants. * In Greek mythology a race dwelling beyond the north wind (Boreas) in a country of warmth and plenty. * original sin. † A famous theological college in Swabia. * 'Act as if the maxim of your action were to become through your will a general natural law' is one of the definitions of the 'categorical imperative' in Kant's Metaphysic of Morals. * The highest or priestly caste in the Hindu system, † 'Charity' is in the Lutheran Bible rendered by the word 'love' ('Liebe'). * condition. * characteristic. * 'That is as fitting as a fist in the eye' is a German idiom meaning a complete unlikeness between two things – 'alike as chalk and cheese'. † Amphitryon's wife Alcmene refused to sleep with him until he had revenged the death of her brothers; while Amphitryon was away engaged on this task his still virgin bride was seduced by Zeus and subsequently gave birth to Heracles. * Matthew vi, 28–30. * God, as Paul created him, is a denial of God. † ‘The Law’ in Paul’s usage of the word. *

 From a famous line in Schiller’s Maid of Orleans: ‘Against stupidity the gods themselves fight in vain.’ * To the greater honour of God. * undecisiveness. *
 ‘Fingerfertigkeit’ plays upon ‘finger of God’. * Thus Spoke Zarathustra, Part III,
 ‘Of the Priests’. * I Corinthians vii, 2 and 9. * A phrase from Goethe’s Elective Affinities. * ‘The eternal Jew’ is also the German form of the Wandering Jew. *
 In German, Nihilist und Christ do rhyme. * unlucky day.

Part X

Ecce Homo

1888 — Translated by R.J. Hollingdale

ECCE HOMO HOW ONE BECOMES WHAT ONE IS TRANSLATED
WITH NOTES BY R. J. Hollingdale INTRODUCTION BY Michael Tanner
PENGUIN BOOKS PENGUIN BOOKS Published by the Penguin Group
Penguin Books Ltd, 27 Wrights Lane, London W 5TZ, England Penguin Books
USA Inc., 375 Hudson Street, New York, New York 10014, USA Penguin Books
Australia Ltd, Ringwood, Victoria, Australia Penguin Books Canada Ltd, 10
Alcorn Avenue, Toronto, Ontario, Canada M5V 5B Penguin Books (NZ) Ltd, 182-190 Wairau Road, Auckland 10, New Zealand Penguin Books Ltd, Registered Offices: Harmondsworth, Middlesex, England This translation first published 1979 Reprinted with a new introduction 1992 5 7 9 10 8 6 4 Translation copyright © R. J. Hollingdale, 1979 New introduction copyright ©
Michael Tanner, 1992 All rights reserved Typeset by Datix International Ltd, Bungay, Suffolk Set in Monotype Garamond Printed in England by Clays Ltd, St Ives pic Except in the United States of America, this book is sold subject to the condition that it shall not, by way of trade or otherwise, be lent, re-sold, hired out, or otherwise circulated without the publisher's prior consent in any form of binding or cover other than that in which it is published and without a similar condition including this condition being imposed on the subsequent purchaser
CONTENTS INTRODUCTION VII NOTE ON THE TEXT xviii CHRONOLOGY OF NIETZSCHE'S LIFE XX ECCE HOMO i HOW ONE BECOMES WHAT ONE IS Foreword * On this perfect day... 7 Why I am So Wise 8 Why I am So Clever 21 Why I Write Such Good Books 39 * -3Qae Birth of Tragedy 48 3 The Untimely Essays 54 ^ Human, All Too Human 59 cf Daybreak 65 5 The Gay Science 68 (/Thus Spoke Zarathustra 69 7 Beyond Good and Evil 82 h Genealogy of Morals 84 4 Twilight of the Idols 86 / oThe Wagner Case 89 Why I am a Destiny 96 NOTES IO INTRODUCTION Ecce Homo is the title of Friedrich Nietzsche's autobiography. Almost certainly it is the most bizarre example of that genre ever penned. Its oddness begins with the title, which is a clear reference to St John's Gospel, where it is narrated that Pilate brought Jesus out with his crown of thorns for the Jews to see, and said to them:
'Behold the man!' So Nietzsche is evidently comparing himself to Christ, and whether seriously or in jest, the comparison remains equally blasphemous. But the subtitle is bewildering, and in a peculiarly Nietzschean way: one needs to read the whole book to see what it means and then to read Nietzsche's other books to see what it really means. 'How one becomes what one is.' Immediately several questions spring to the reader's mind. For instance: how could one fail to be what one is in the first place? So how can it make sense to say that one becomes what one is? And supposing that is what happens, can Nietzsche really tell us how it comes about, as his subtitle promises? And why 'what one is'? Is it significant, as one uneasily feels it must be, that Nietzsche says 'what' rather than the more expectable 'who'? Thus in a state possibly of outrage and certainly of puzzlement, one moves on to the contents page where more surprises are waiting: the first three chapters are called 'Why I am So Wise', 'Why I am So Clever' and 'Why I Write Such Good Books'; the remainder are the titles of almost all of Nietzsche's books, except for the last chapter, 'Why I am a Destiny'. Either, one suspects, this is a joke of a rather heavy-handed 'Teutonic' variety, or Nietzsche's madness, which is usually thought to have begun pretty abruptly early in January 1889, INTRODUCTION was actually under way while he was writing this book during the autumn of 1888. Neither of these suspicions is without foundation, but there is more to it than that. Though Nietzsche had no idea that this was to be his last book, indeed was full of plans for further ones, he seems to have felt that a point had been reached in his life and his work where a retrospective celebration was in place. By this time in his writing he was more fascinated than he had ever been by the possibilities of parody, and the traditional form of autobiography must have been enormously attractive. For what are autobiographies, in general, but prolonged celebrations of the achievements of their authors? The very idea of writing one's autobiography could be said to be megalomaniac; one is assuming that one's life is either sufficiently exemplary or sufficiently idiosyncratic to be worth retailing for general consumption. The lack of explicit self-congratulation that is one of the conventions of the form is merely a device for getting readers to note how modesty, too, is a quality the author has, besides all the others that emerge from his accounts of his actions and sufferings. It isn't in the least surprising, then, that once Nietzsche had realized that the genre could so readily be adapted with mischievous intent, he should embark on it. And his mood during that whole year tended to be euphoric. It is a mistake to claim, as commentators often do, that it was an exceptionally prolific year; by Nietzsche's standards it wasn't. If one counts the titles of the books he wrote, or in two cases self-cannibalized, during 1888, the tally is indeed startling: The Case of Wagner, Twilight of the Idols, The Antichrist, Dithyrambs of Dionysos, Nietzsche contra Wagner and Ecce Homo itself. But none of them is very long, three in fact are of moderate pamphlet-length and all of them together are shorter than, say, The Gay Science or Thus Spoke Zarathustra. But they are all characterized by an intensity remarkable even for him, and usually, too {The Antichrist is the exception}, by almost unrestrained ebullience. Extravagant in mode as they are, their extravagance is frequently of a parodic variety. The brevity with which Nietzsche performs only adds to the effect of laughing seriousness something that Nietzsche had very often preached, but never before succeeded in practicing so continuously and with so little sense of strain. In one of his most famous passages, 'How the "Real World" at last Became a Myth' in Twilight of the Idols, he manages to produce a history of Western philosophy which is both hilarious and unnervingly accurate. Nietzsche divides up the history of the concept of the 'real world' into six stages, characterizes each of them in a couple of lines and then adds a parenthesized ironic commentary on the progress of the idea. Not only that, but the whole section is integrated into his own philosophy, so that as the 'real world' disappears Zarathustra makes his debut. But marvellous as that section is, the whole ninety pages of Twilight of the Idols is on the highest level, an amazing condensation of his mature views, and one of the most exhilarating intellectual and literary achievements I know of. The state of inspiration which he claims, in Ecce Homo, to have been in whilst writing Thus Spoke Zarathustra is far more plausibly attributable to him, in my view, during this last year of his sane life. And by the time he began to write Ecce Homo, he seems to have realized that some peak had been reached. For along with the high spirits, the manic self-celebrations, the parodistic orgies, there is a tone of elegy which consorts extraordinarily well with those other tones, producing an effect of a kind that is uniquely moving, especially when one knows that total and permanent breakdown was imminent. The Foreword strikes a sombre, portentous note, of a kind familiar from many of Nietzsche's writings when he is concerned with the complete neglect that he suffered from his contemporaries, especially in his own country. The idea is given out here, and recurs as a leitmotif throughout the book, that the world is owed a reckoning by Nietzsche, since the effect he is about to have on it will be so cataclysmic that we must know what, and/or who, has hit us. While there can be no doubt that this claim of Nietzsche's is partly pathological - that in his INTRODUCTION he truly thought that he was about to achieve something earth-shattering - it also makes perfectly good sense insofar as the challenge that he presents us with, if we take it seriously, must radically alter our lives. And because, at this stage in his work, he identifies himself with the books he has written - or at least does that for some of the time - he feels that it is imperative that we understand him, if only so that we shall not confuse him with other life-changers who want us to know what they are like so that we can be like that too. Hence the cardinal significance of the closing words of the Foreword, quoted from Thus Spoke Zarathustra: 'You had not yet sought yourselves when you found me. Thus do all believers; therefore all belief is of so little account. Now I bid you love me and find yourselves; and only when you have all denied me will I return to you.' This is perhaps Nietzsche's most succinct statement of his revulsion »i the idea of living one's life by modelling it on what someone else said or did. One becomes what one is by not being anyone else - something that is in any case impossible, but that has not deterred most people, including all admirers of Thomas a Kempis's Imitation of Christ, a book for which Nietzsche felt especial distaste, from making the attempt. If we take this as the major theme of Ecce Homo, a lot that seems absurd, exaggerated or merely false becomes, at the very least, highly interesting. For the book becomes an attempt to demonstrate, in a variety of more or less shocking ways, how Nietzsche contrived to achieve an independence of spirit in the face of a series of strong temptation * to capitulate to powerful influences. Above all it tries to show how he practised a kind of systematic ingratitude towards those great figures who meant most to him, and how this is the only way of taking them completely seriously - whereas the usual view is that to take someone seriously is to allow them to dominate one to a degree that involves abandoning oneself, if only for a time. What commands admiration even in the shrillest passages of Ecce Homo, as in the other late works, is the candour with which Nietzsche exposes his own failings in this respect, while still INTRODUCTION turning them to positive account. How, in other words, does one turn discipleship into apostasy, while not betraying what one has been? As he puts it in the profound words of section 6 of the chapter on Thus Spoke Zarathustra, 'The psychological problem in the type of Zarathustra is how he, who to an unheard-of degree says No, does No to everything to which one has hitherto said Yes, can none the less be the opposite of a spirit of denial.' It isn't surprising that he doesn't give a straightforward answer to that question, but proceeds by considering the major figures in his development, figures who are, as always, personifications of attitudes to life which Nietzsche-Zarathustra (the predominance of Zarathustra in the book is partly the result of a degree of identification which Nietzsche had not previously allowed himself) has to take with all the seriousness due to his most dangerous opponents. Schopenhauer, Richard Wagner, Socrates, Christ make their final appearances - though the manner in which they do so shows that, if Nietzsche had continued to write, he would still have been preoccupied with them, since at least in the case of the last three, their seductiveness is something that one can never safely say one has conclusively overcome. It is Richard Wagner to whom Nietzsche most obsessively returns in Ecce Homo, no doubt because he is the only major figure in Nietzsche's demonology with whom he had had a personal relationship, and one which Nietzsche was never inclined to devalue. The most lyrical passages of the book are expressions of what the relationship had meant, and therefore are all the more poignant because it had been essential to his spiritual well-being to terminate it. Section 5 of 'Why I am So Clever' is the most compressed statement in Nietzsche's work of the complexity of his feelings about Wagner: I offer all my other human relationships cheap; but at no price would I relinquish from my life the Tribschen days, those days of mutual confidences, of cheerfulness, of sublime xi INTRODUCTION incidents - of profound moments... I do not know what others may have experienced with Wagner: over our sky no cloud ever passed. An idealization, no doubt, but it would be a steely soul who queried it. It makes all the more dramatic, of course, the rest of the section, where Wagner is shown to have become what he was not, and therefore to be the antipode of Nietzsche - though that is not how he puts it here; but that '[Wagner] became reichsdeutsch' is what Nietzsche says he couldn't forgive him. In other words, in this account, Wagner capitulated to the cultural pressures of the newly unified Germany, in all its loutish vulgarity, and allowed himself to be cast as its arch- representative in the arts. But the dialectic of Wagner's inverted progress, and thus of Nietzsche's relationship to him, is more complicated than that. For the delicatessen which he is supposed to have renounced was a Parisian affair and thus already a matter of decadence, so that even before he became corrupted by the Reich, Wagner was of the tribe of Berlioz and Delacroix, who had 'a fond of sickness, of incurability in their nature, sheer fanatics for expression, virtuosi through and through.. .' Decadence is, of course, one of the key terms in Nietzsche's later vocabulary, but the complexity of his feelings towards it is apparent both here, where he accuses Wagner of treachery towards it, and in the next section of the chapter, where he produces his most abandoned eulogy of Wagner the artist, in his ecstatic celebration of Tristan und Isolde: I still today seek a work of a dangerous fascination, of a sweet and shuddery infinity equal to that of Tristan - I seek in all the arts in vain. All the strangenesses of Leonardo da Vinci lose their magic at the first note of Tristan.. . The world is poor for him who has never been sick enough for this 'voluptuousness of hell'. XII INTRODUCTION And more to the same effect. Now, in a spectacular and altogether characteristic move, Nietzsche claims that it is the very dangerousness of Tristan, and the fact that he is able to incorporate it without being corrupted by it, that makes Wagner 'the great benefactor of my life'. Having one's cake and eating it could go no further. What is still more remarkable is that, in this context, the feat is justified. Nietzsche is here demonstrating how he was able to take something with a seriousness which is simply beyond the grasp of most people, and yet still not take it ultimately seriously, and so giving us a purchase on his much self- celebrated 'lightness', which elsewhere in his work can seem a sadly laboured affair. It is the high point in his work of that capacity for simultaneous celebration and critique which should exhilarate us as much as it obviously did him. And it is also the place where we can hope to grasp how the man who was so constant an exhorter to 'self-overcoming' should also have been the man who incited us to 'become ourselves'. At Nietzsche's greatest moments he achieves an ecstasy which one would not have thought possible outside the context of a transcendental ideal in process of realization: the self, which we normally take as a given with which we have to live, making adjustments and modifications within fairly depressing limits, is revealed as something - or rather, less than something - capable of enormous expansion and transformation through the absorption of experiences which mostly we attempt to suppress or deny. And even worse than suppression and denial is regret. At this final stage of his life as a writer Nietzsche is so intent on regretting nothing that he moves to the opposite pole - but as he has so frequently reminded us in his later works, the 'faith in opposite values' is largely chimerical, so that we find, to our initial puzzlement, that there is a strong if not a pervasive tone of nostalgia, or something very like it, in these very last works. If it were nostalgia as we ordinarily think of it, Nietzsche would be performing a sleight of hand; for that kind of nostalgia is regret that the past is past. People are usually xiii INTRODUCTION obsessed with the past, and in particular with their past, either because they wish it had been different or because they can't believe that things will ever again be so good. Nietzsche's concern with the past is a matter of delighting in its having been as it was, whatever that may have been, because it enables him to make the present so much better. Critical as he always was of the concept of redemption, he still writes in section 8 of the chapter on Thus Spoke Zarathustra: 'On one occasion Zarathustra strictly defines his task - it is also mine - the meaning of which cannot be misunderstood: he is affirmative to the point of justifying, of redeeming even the entire past.' And he goes on to quote one of the most celebrated but bewildering passages from that book, which concludes 'To redeem the past and to transform every "It was" into an "I wanted it thus!" - that alone would I call redemption.' For a long time I felt that that last exhortation of Zarathustra was only inspiring so long as one didn't enquire too carefully what it meant. For clearly the past cannot be changed and redemption would seem to require that. But what can be changed is our way of looking at it, of evaluating it. Even then, a great deal of anyone's life might seem irredeemable, in that it was time wasted, or put to futile or bad purposes. In other words, to eliminate the concept of regret from our outlook, to purge ourselves of nostalgia and remorse, demands a transformation of consciousness which we can hardly give sense to. But that is precisely Nietzsche-Zarathustra's point. The change he demands is one which, in depriving us of our humanity, would enable us to become superhuman. And 'there has never yet been a superman', Nietzsche tells us. Could there be, if this is the condition for its fulfilment? He is not concerned, in Ecce Homo, to answer that question. But what he does make vividly clear is the hopeless rut that we are all in if it can't be answered affirmatively. It would be giving a grievously false impression of Ecce Homo to suggest that it is all on this solemn and imposing level. All xiv INTRODUCTION told, it is Nietzsche's most mischievous hook, in which along with self-celebrations which have led many readers to assume that he was already mad, there is an enormous amount of mockery, not least of the author. Often it isn't possible to say where mockery takes over; it is part of Nietzsche's 'most manifold art of style' that one is unsure which style he is practising. But at the same time another of the pairs of 'opposite values' that he routs in this book is that of seriousness and joking. For instance, there is no doubt that he means what he says in his stress on 'the little things' as being of an importance that philosophers have never granted them - climate, diet, digestion, when to read and so on. 'The whole casuistry of selfishness -... beyond all conception of greater importance than anything that has been considered of importance hitherto. It is precisely here that one has to begin to learn anew.' And he stresses that the organ he uses to come to his most important conclusions is his nose. 'I was the first to discover the truth, in that I was the first to sense - smell - the lie as lie. My genius is in my nostrils' ('Why I am a Destiny', i). This passage follows almost immediately on his writing: I have a terrible fear I shall one day be pronounced holy: one will guess why I bring out this book beforehand; it is intended to prevent people from making mischief with me I do not want to be a saint, rather even a buffoon. Perhaps I am a buffoon... and none the less, or rather not none the less - for there has hitherto been nothing more mendacious than saints - the truth speaks out of me. Yet in the next section he writes: I am by far the most terrible human being there has ever been; this does not mean I shall not be the most beneficent. His terrible fear that he would one day be pronounced holy came to pass at his funeral, when his friend, the composer Peter xv INTRODUCTION Gast, said: 'May your name be holy to future generations' - a friend whom he praises extravagantly in the pages of Ecce Homo. The desperate jocularity of the book is justified; yet if it had been composed in uniformly serious tones it would have been no less misunderstood; no one knew better than Nietzsche that there is no insurance against stupidity. Therefore, it might be felt, he courted misunderstanding; the book has autobiographical passages which are easy to check up on and determine that they are false. It presents his life as if there had been a plan in it, which there evidently wasn't, and it alternates between the world-historical and the mundane in a way that was bound to offend its readers' taste, as it still does. But, Nietzsche would say, and almost does, so much the worse for their taste. And it is in fact the very notion of taste, allied to that of smelling, which Nietzsche makes greatest and most inspired play with. In celebrating his capacity for locating decadence, for castigating the Germans for their deep-seated vulgarity, for revelling in destruction as a prerequisite of creation, for knowing what has to be created, Nietzsche is relying throughout on his extraordinarily developed sensitivity to phenomena which none of his contemporaries was able to notice, partly because they knew too much and esteemed the wrong kind of knowing. That is why he advertises his ignorance, his long-time refusal to read, which had earned him ostracism from the cultural community - the community of the 'philistines of culture', bogged down in their specializations, 'sick with this inhuman clockwork and mechanism, with the loss of personality of the worker, with the false economy of "division of labour". The goal gets lost, culture - the means, the modern way of carrying on science, barbarized' A great deal of Ecce Homo makes fun of the ghastliness of contemporary life, though time and again Nietzsche's almost boundless capacity for humour is overtaken by impatience at his fate in being ignored, and he is driven back to quoting Thus Spoke Zarathustra at its most portentous, even though 'to have understood, that is to say experienced, six sentences of that book would raise one to a higher level of mortals that "modern" man xvi [INTRODUCTION could attain to' ('Why I Write Such Good Books', i). It is passages like that, and not the exuberantly auto-eulogistic ones, which are the most painful in the book. The tragedy of his life was that there were no means available to change people's taste, and without that he was bound to fail in his heroic endeavour, which lasted as long as he remained sane, and even for a few days after that, to make his contemporaries realize their plight. 'My time has not yet come, some are born posthumously,' he writes in the same paragraph as the previous quotation. And it is immediately followed by 'how could I, with this feeling of distance, even want the "modern men" I know - to read me!' but of course, that is what he did want, for their sake rather than his. If he could return now, he would find that 'modern men' are still what they were. They have still not understood that 'I have the right to understand myself as the first tragic philosopher - that is to say the extremest antithesis and antipodes of a pessimistic philosopher' ('The Birth of Tragedy', 3). And in answer to the final words of the book: '- Have I been understood? - Dionysos against the Crucified.' the answer must be a resounding 'No'. Cambridge, April 1991 Michael Tanner

NOTE ON THE TEXT This edition is annotated only lightly: its intention is to offer the reader a clean, unobstructed text. Nietzsche wrote Ecce Homo between 15 October and 4 November 1888 - that is to say, in just under three weeks - but continued to make alterations and additions. In a letter to Overbeck dated 13 November 1888 he says that 'the manuscript of Ecce Homo. How One Becomes What One Is is already with the printer'; subsequently he asked the printer (Naumann, Leipzig) for the return of the 'second part of the manuscript' and then of the whole manuscript: it was sent back to him, but he kept it only two or three days and returned it to Naumann on 6 December. Naumann must have started setting the book at once, since by the date of his breakdown Nietzsche had corrected the proofs of the title-page, the list of contents, the Foreword, 'On this perfect day..', the first chapter and the second chapter up to the words 'Caution, even hostility towards new books is rather part of my instinct than "tolerance", "largeur du coeur" and other forms of "neighbour love"..' in section 3. Up to this point no question as to the validity of the text published in 1908 can arise, since the author passed it for publication: it is over the remainder of the text that controversy has arisen. It was started by Erich Podach - a very experienced Nietzsche-scholar to whom a Nietzsche-biographer is in debt - with the publication in 1961 of his Friedrich Nietts(sches Werke des Zusammenbruchs, a printing of manuscript versions of Nietzsche's last works with extensive editorial comment. The item in which Podach's edition departs most widely from the accepted version is Ecce Homo, which Podach claims never achieved a final, completed form in xvni NOTE on THE TEXT Nietzsche's hands, the accepted version being a redaction by Peter Gast: he then prints a version of Ecce Homo which includes variant passages, superseded drafts and repetitions. The violence of the criticism Erich Podach brought down upon himself for this edition was due, not to the publication of these variants in itself, but to the unpleasing acerbity of his own criticism of other editors and scholars and to his claim to have produced the only valid editions of the final works, a claim which was at once contested. The details of the controversy which ensued are too voluminous to be included here: its outcome, however, was in my judgement the vindication of the validity of Ecce Homo in its accepted form, with the proviso that some passages may have been suppressed (i.e. destroyed) and some repetitions eliminated when the original edition of 1908 was prepared. The strongest evidence that a final form was achieved by Nietzsche seems to me to be the fact that C. G. Naumann began setting the book in type - a thing he would hardly have done if he had not had a completed and legible MS before him. (The interested reader is referred for details of the controversy over Podach's edition firstly, of course, to the Werke des Zusammenbruchs itself, then to Walter Kaufmann's essay 'Nietzsche in the Light of his Suppressed Manuscripts', reprinted in the third edition of his Nietzsche; to Kaufmann's summary in the 'Note on the Publication of Ecce Homo' prefaced to his edition of Ecce Homo, in which he also translates and comments on variants from Nietzsche's drafts for the book; and to the 'Philologische Nachbericht' to Karl Schlechta's edition of Nietzsche's Werke and the 'Erganzung' in the index volume to that edition.)

R. J. H. CHRONOLOGY OF NIETZSCHE'S LIFE 1844 Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche born (15 October) in the parsonage at Rocken, near Liitzen, Prussian Saxony. His father, Karl Ludwig Nietzsche (b. 1813, the same year as Wagner), is the village pastor and the son of a pastor; his mother, Franziska Nietzsche (b. Oehler in 1826, and thus only eighteen years old), is the daughter of the pastor of the nearby village of Pobles. Friedrich Wilhelm - named after the reigning king of Prussia - is the first child of their marriage. They have two further children: Elizabeth (b. 10 July 1846) and Josef (b. February 1848, d. January 1850). 1849 Pastor Nietzsche dies (27 July): cause of death is given as 'softening of the brain' (encephalomalacia) following a fall. 1850 The family - now consisting of Nietzsche, his paternal grandmother, his mother, his sister and two maiden aunts - has to leave the parsonage and removes (April) to Naumburg, in Thuringia, where Nietzsche enters the town boys' school. In 1851 he transfers to a private preparatory school. 1854 He attends the high school (Domgymnasium), where he comes to be considered a gifted pupil. His surviving juvenilia confirm this judgement, although there is nothing to indicate precocious originality. During the summer of 1856 he is released from school because of persistent headaches and eye-trouble. 1858 The family moves to No. 18 Weingarten, subsequently the first 'Nietzsche Archive'. Nietzsche wins a free place (CHRONOLOGY 01 m i r/sc.n I S i i I E at Schulpforta, the Prussian Rugby, and starts there on 5 October. At first he finds the discipline hard and suffers from homesickness: later, when he has discovered he has no difficulty in mastering the classical studies upon which the emphasis of the curriculum is laid and as a consequence comes to be regarded as an outstanding scholar, he enjoys being at Schulpforta. His attainments in other studies are, however, not remarkable. (The examining board are supposed on this account to have been on the point of refusing him the equivalent of a school-leaving certificate when one of them, presumably a classicist, exclaimed: 'But, meine Herren, are we really going to fail the best pupil Pforta has ever had?!') 1860 With two Naumburg friends, Wilhelm Pinder and Gustav Krug, he forms (25 July) a literary society, 'Germania', and for the following three years tries out essays, poems and compositions on the society. In March 1861 Krug lectures on Tristan und Isolde, and Nietzsche first hears Wagner. But his favourite composer throughout the Pforta years continues to be Schumann (d. 1856, but none the less a contemporary, 'modern' composer: the as yet unperformed Tristan is still the music of the future). 1864 He leaves Pforta (4 September) and enters Bonn University (16 October) as a student of theology and philology; in the latter subject he is a pupil of Friedrich Ritschl, whom he subsequently follows to Leipzig. 1865 Paul Deussen tells us (Erinnerungen an Friedrich Nietzsche) that Nietzsche tells him he has visited Cologne (February), where he has been taken to a brothel against his will, though he left again at once. As Nietzsche subsequently suffered from and eventually succumbed to syphilis, it seems probable that he does not leave at once or that he later returns. During 1867 he is treated by two Leipzig doctors for a syphilitic infection. (On Nietzsche's 'illness', and whether it was or was not syphilis: 1. As Nietzsche was a university student in the Germany of the 1860s to CHRONOLOGY OF NIETZSCHE'S LIFE 1870s it would have been rather remarkable if he had not visited a brothel at least once. H. W. Brann, in his scholarly and entertaining study of Nietzsche's erotic life, Nietzsche und die Frauen, interprets the long poem which forms the staple of the chapter 'Among the Daughters of the Desert' in the fourth part of Zarathustra as a barely disguised recollection of a visit to a brothel - an interpretation which does not seem at all farfetched and originated in Brann's noticing similarities between its phraseology and that of Deussen's account mentioned above. [The poem, 'Die Wiiste wachst', was also included by

Nietzsche in the collection Dionysos-Dithyramben: that it is one of his worst does not affect its evidential value.] 2. The course of his illness from the first incapacitations in 1871 to total collapse at the beginning of 1889 is entirely typical of the disease in question - the only atypical aspect being the length of time between collapse and death [eleven years]. 3. As many passages in his writings, and especially some in the uninhibited Ecce Homo, disclose, Nietzsche was highly sexed, yet there is no record, or even hint, that he ever went to bed with a woman of his own class and, the documentation of his life being as ample as it is, we may conclude that he never did so. He had many women friends but not one wife or mistress. The reason may, as has very generally been assumed, be that he suffered from paralysing inhibition: but might this inhibition, if it really existed, not have originated in his knowledge that he suffered from something else too? something that, seeing he was a man of honour, must for ever keep him 'celibate' in relation to women of his own class? There are only two known occasions, recorded below, on which pressure of feeling overbore this restraint. [Richard Wagner believed he had discovered the cause of the young Nietzsche's frequent headaches and prostrations to lie in 'excessive masturbation', which diagnosis he communicated by letter to Nietzsche's doctor, Otto Eiser, of xxii

CHRONOLOGY OF NIETZSCHE'S LIFE Frankfurt: when he learned what Wagner had done, Nietzsche flew into a rage and declared he would never forgive what he termed 'this interference'.)] At Easter 1865 he abandons the study of theology (as a consequence of a loss of Christian belief) and on 17 August he leaves Bonn for Leipzig. At the end of October or beginning of November he buys a copy of Schopenhauer's The World as Will and Idea from a second-hand bookshop on an impulse, the book being then unknown to him: soon afterwards he announces to his friends that he has become a 'Schopenhauerian'. 1 866 Nietzsche's work on Theognis convinces Ritschl Nietzsche is the most advanced pupil for his age he has ever taught and, on 24 February, he tells him so: thereafter Nietzsche is Ritschl's protege, In the summer he reads F. A. Lange's History of Materialism. Beginning of his friendship with Erwin Rohde. 1 867 Nietzsche's first publication: 'Zur Geschichte der Theognideischen Spruchsammlung' in the Rheinische Museum für Philologie. He is conscripted for a year's military service in the mounted section of a field artillery regiment (9 October-15 October 1868). 1 868 'De Laertii Diogenis fontibus' and other philological studies published in the Rheinische Museum und Litterarisches Centralblatt (also 1869). He is 'converted' to Wagner after a performance of the Tristan and Meistersinger preludes (28 October), and meets him for the first time eleven days later at the house of Wagner's brother-in-law Hermann Brockhaus: he learns that Wagner is also an admirer of Schopenhauer, and Wagner and Schopenhauer now combine to become what is emotionally Nietzsche's new religion. 1869 Nietzsche is appointed to the chair of classical philology at Basel and as teacher of Greek at the associated grammar school (13 February) at the age of twenty-four: he owes the appointment to Ritschl's recommendation. He is awarded his doctorate by Leipzig (23 March) without examination. At the request of Basel he applies to be relieved of his military obligations (i.e. to cease to be a citizen of Prussia) and for Swiss citizenship: the former application is granted; the latter is not, as he lacks the necessary residential qualification. (Nietzsche fails to renew this application and is consequently for the rest of his life stateless.) He arrives in Basel on 19 April. He visits Wagner at Tribschen, near Lucerne, on 15 May, is unable to see him and returns on 17 May; he is invited to attend Wagner's birthday celebrations on 22 May, but his teaching duties make this impossible. He pays his next visit for the weekend 5 to 7 June, and is thereafter a regular visitor: he stays with the Wagner family twenty-three times in the three years to April 1872, when Wagner leaves Tribschen for Bayreuth. Inaugural lecture on 'Homer and Classical Philology' delivered 28 May. He meets Jakob Burckhardt (b. 1818), the historian, and Franz Overbeck (b. 1837), the theologian. He spends Christmas with Wagner. 1870 Public lectures on 'The Greek Music-Drama' (18 January) and 'Socrates and Tragedy' (1 February). He obtains leave to serve as a medical orderly with the Prussian army (11 August): he collapses with dysentery and diphtheria (7 September) after tending casualties at Erlangen for three days and nights continuously. He returns to Basel at the end of October, and spends Christmas with Wagner, when he is present at the first performance of the Siegfried Idyll in the front hall at Tribschen. 1871 Nietzsche applies unsuccessfully for the chair of philosophy at Basel (January). He now begins to suffer from regularly recurring periods of exhaustion, and henceforward is never really well. On 15 February he is granted leave of absence 'for the purpose of restoring his health': he visits Lugano, the Bernese Oberland, Naumburg and Leipzig, and works on The Birth of Tragedy. He returns to Basel at the end of the year. 1872 The Birth of Tragedy published January. Public lectures 'On the Future of our Educational Institutions' (16 January, 6 and 27 February, 5 and 23 March). He attends the laying of the foundation stone of the Festival Theatre at Bayreuth (22 May). Meeting with Paul Ree. 1873 Untimely Meditations I: David Strauss published. 1874 Untimely Meditations II: On the Use and Disadvantage of History, and III: Schopenhauer as Educator published. During this year Nietzsche first becomes fully conscious of a previously unconscious dissatisfaction with and rebellion against Wagner-Schopenhauer, and thus begins consciously to resist and deny this dissatisfaction: the outcome is a state of internal tension which leads to such incidents as the violent scene between him and Wagner on the occasion of what was to prove his last private visit (August). After this visit he does not see Wagner again for nearly two years. 1875 Meeting with Peter Gast, afterwards his earliest 'disciple'. Violent headaches and vomiting attacks in June mean he cannot visit Bayreuth as intended: he goes for a 'cure' to Steinabad, in the Black Forest, and at once begins to feel much better. Elizabeth moves to Basel and sets up home for herself and her brother. Nietzsche suffers a general collapse at Christmas. 1876 He is granted a long period of absence from Basel because of his persistent ill-health. At Geneva he proposes marriage to one Mathilde Trampedach, and is rejected. In mid-April he returns to Basel. Untimely Meditations IV: Richard Wagner in Bayreuth published July. On 24 July he arrives in Bayreuth for the first festival, attends rehearsals, but is forced by the state of his head and eyes to leave before the festival proper begins: he goes to Klingenbrunn, in the Bavarian Forest, where he spends much of his time writing psychological reflections which will later be incorporated into Human, All Too Human. After ten days Elizabeth writes asking him to return to Bayreuth, CHRONOLOGY OF NIETZSCHE'S LIFE which he does on 12 August and attends the first public cycle of The Nibelung's Ring (13, 14, 16 and 17 August). He avoids Wagner, fails to attend the second cycle, and on 27 August returns to Basel. The university grants him sick leave for a year (15 October): he has already left for Bex, Canton Waadt, and on 20 October he goes with Ree and the novelist Albert Brenner to Sorrento, where they stay with Malwida von Meysenburg at a villa she has rented on the coast with a view across the sea to Naples and Vesuvius. All three work on books, Ree on The Origin of the Moral Sensations, Nietzsche on Human, All Too Human. Wagner is also in Sorrento, and he and Nietzsche meet for the last time. 1877 He leaves Sorrento in May, travels alone in Italy and Switzerland, arrives back in Basel in the autumn: he sets up house again with Elizabeth, Gast making a third (1 September), and resumes teaching. 1878 Human, All Too Human published May. In June Elizabeth goes back to Naumburg. Wagner lets it be known he regards Human as evidence its author has suffered a mental breakdown: 'I have done him the kindness ... of not reading his book, and my greatest wish and hope is that one day he will thank me for this.' Other acquaintances were also estranged by the new book. 1879 Assorted Opinions and Maxims ('first supplement' to Human, All Too Human) published in February. In April Nietzsche suffers the worst and most protracted attack of migraine and sickness he has yet experienced: Overbeck wires Elizabeth, who comes to Basel and finds Nietzsche apparently on the point of death. On 2 May he petitions the university for release from all duties: on 14 June he is retired on a pension. He travels with Elizabeth to Schloss Bremgarten, near Bern, then to Zurich, then alone to St Moritz: there he completes The Wanderer and his Shadow ('second supplement' to Human, All Too Human) in September. In October he goes to Naumburg. He suffers severe attacks on 118 days of this year. xxvi CHRONOLOGY OF NIETZSCHE'S LIFE! 1880 Tbi Wanderer and his Shadow published, Daybreak written. Nietzsche to Riva (February), where he is joined by (i to Gast's home in Venice (March); to Marienbad (June); back to Naumburg (September); then south again to Basel, Stresa, Genoa, where he spends the winter. His attitude towards his invalid condition is 'philosophical': 'The daily battle against headache and the laughable diversity of my ailments demands such an amount of attention that I am running into the danger of becoming petty - but this is a counterweight to those very . high- flying tendencies that have such power over me that without some counterweight to them I would become a fool.' 1 88 1 Daybreak published in June, The Gay Science begun. Nietz- sche to Recoaro and Riva with Gast (April), and alone to St Moritz (June). Later in June to Sils-Maria - 'I know of nothing more suited to my nature than this piece of high land' - and takes up lodgings in a room attached to the house of the Biirgermeister. Back to Genoa in October. In November he sees Carmen for the first time and adopts it as the model antithesis to Wagner. 1882 The Gay Science completed in July and published in the autumn. Paul Ree with Nietzsche in Genoa (February), leaves for Rome in March, where at Malwida's house he meets Lou Salome and proposes marriage to her. Nietz- sche goes to Messina (end of March), then to Rome (end of April), where Ree introduces him to Lou. Two days afterwards Ree tells Lou Nietzsche has asked him to propose to her on his behalf. Lou declines to marry either man, and counterproposes a platonic menage-a- trois: both, faute de mieux, agree. They all spend much time together, and are photographed in a photographer's mock-up of a cart, with Nietzsche and Ree between the shafts and Fraulein Salome driving: Frl. Salome is jocularly flourish- ing a whip. Lou Salome, twenty-one, is the least strait- laced and most entertaining woman Nietzsche has yet xxvii CHRONOLOGY OF NIETZSCHE S LIFE met; also the most intelligent; and he falls in love with her. At Lucerne in May he proposes to her in person and is again rejected: Lou is a new-style liberated woman dedicated to independence. But the menage-a-trois is still on, Vienna being the proposed venue. All this is kept secret from his mother and sister, as they would have considered it extremely immoral. Nietzsche, Lou and Elizabeth at Tautenburg (Thuringia) during August: Eliza- beth becomes acquainted with the immoral plan and on the day Lou leaves (26 August) there is a scene between brother and sister. Nietzsche to Naumburg: Elizabeth writes to their mother telling her what is going on, and there is a scene between mother and son. Nietzsche to Leipzig: three weeks with Lou and Ree, who leave with- out arranging to meet him again; during the following month (November) it is borne in upon him that he has been abandoned. Nietzsche to Basel, to Genoa, to Ra- pallo: he is frantic with disappointment and self-con- tempt, and emotionally and physically almost exhausted. 1883 Thus Spoke Zarathustra, Part One, written in January- February: Nietzsche recovers his equilibrium by means of it. Wagner dies in Venice 1 3 February. Reconciliation with Elizabeth. Nietzsche to Genoa and Rome (May-

June), to Sils-Maria (June), where he writes Zarathustra, Part Two. Both parts published. In September he returns to Naumburg, and learns Elizabeth is engaged to marry Bernhard Forster, a prominent anti-Semite. In October to Genoa, in November to Nice. 1884 Zarathustra, Part Three, written during January and published later in the year. Preparation of The Will to Power begun. Nietzsche to Venice (April) and Sils-Maria (July); in October to Zurich (meeting with Gottfried Keller), then back to Nice. 1885 Zarathustra, Part Four, written and privately printed. Nietzsche to Venice (April) and Sils-Maria (June). Elizabeth and Forster marry (22 May, the late Wagner's birthday), xxviii CHRONOLOGY OF NIETZSCHE'S LIFE and leave for the colony of New Germania, in Paraguay. Nietzsche to Naumburg (September), then back to Nice (November). 1886 Beyond Good and Evil written and published. Nietzsche to Naumburg (May): last meeting with Rohde, in Leipzig. Back to Sils-Maria (July), then to Genoa (September) and Nice (October). Prefaces for new editions of his earlier works (and 1887). 1887 On the Genealogy of Morals written and published. Nietzsche to Sils-Maria (June), Venice (September), back to Nice (October). 1888 The Wagner Case written and published; The Will to Power abandoned, the Revaluation of All Values substituted, Twilight of the Idols written and prepared for publication; The Anti-Christ and Ecce Homo written; Nietzsche contra Wagner and the Dithyrambs of Dionysos assembled. Nietzsche to Turin (April), Sils-Maria (June), back to Turin (September). On 1 January the Bern Bund carries the first published review of his work as a whole (by Karl Spitteler); in April Georg Brandes lectures on his philosophy at Copenhagen. He experiences a delusive improvement in his health, and in the last quarter of the year is the victim of a morbid euphoria which is the immediate prelude to complete collapse. 1889 The Revaluation of All Values abandoned. Nietzsche collapses in the piazza Carlo Alberto, Turin (3 January): when he recovers consciousness he is no longer sane. He sends brief letters to friends, acquaintances and public figures announcing his arrival as 'Dionysos' or 'the Crucified'. Overbeck comes to Turin and takes Nietzsche to the university clinic at Basel (10 January). Diagnosis: 'paralysis progressiva'. On 17 January he is transferred to the university clinic at Jena. Twilight of the Idols published end of January, Nietzsche contra Wagner privately printed. Forster commits suicide in Paraguay (June) from fear of prosecution for frauds in connection with his colonial enterprise. xxix CHRONOLOGY OF NIETZSCHE'S LIFE 1890 Nietzsche's mother takes him back with her to No. 18 Weingarten, Naumburg, where he enters into her sole care. 1892 A collected edition of Nietzsche's published works and a selection from his notebooks is planned, with Gast as editor. 1893 Elizabeth returns from Paraguay, and Gast's edition is (1894) abandoned at her insistence ('who appointed you editor, then?'); she inaugurates a second collected edition, which is also subsequently abandoned because of disagreements over editorial methods. In February (1894) she founds the 'Nietzsche Archive' at No. 18 Weingarten. 1895 The Anti-Christ and Nietzsche contra Wagner published. Elizabeth becomes the owner of Nietzsche's copyright. Nietzsche, mentally a child, begins to become paralysed. 1896 Elizabeth moves the 'Archive' to Weimar. 1897 Nietzsche's mother dies (20 April): Elizabeth transfers him to Weimar and lodges him and the Archive in the Villa Silberblick. 1899 A third collected edition begun. 1900 Nietzsche dies in Weimar (25 August).

ECCEHOMO HOW ONE BECOMES WHAT ONE IS FOREWORD Seeing that I must shortly approach mankind with the heaviest demand that has ever been made on it, it seems to me indispensable to say who I am. This ought really to be known already: for I have not neglected to 'bear witness' about myself. But the disparity between the greatness of my task and the smallness of my contemporaries has found expression in the fact that I have been neither heard nor even so much as seen. I live on my own credit, it is perhaps merely a prejudice that I am alive at all?... I need only to talk with any of the 'cultured people' who come to the Ober-Engadin in the summer to convince myself that I am not alive.. . Under these circumstances there exists a duty against which my habit, even more the pride of my instincts revolts, namely to say: Listen to me! for I am thus and thus. Do not, above all, confound me with what I am not! I am, for example, absolutely not a bogey-man, not a moral-monster - I am even an antithetical nature to the species of man hitherto honoured as virtuous. Between ourselves, it seems to me that precisely this constitutes part of my pride. I am a disciple of the philosopher Dionysos, I prefer to be even a satyr rather than a saint. But you have only to read this writing. Perhaps I have succeeded in giving expression to this antithesis in a cheerful and affable way - perhaps this writing had no point at all other than to do this. The last thing I would promise would be to 'improve' mankind. I erect no new idols; 3 ECCE HOMO let the old idols learn what it means to have legs of clay. To overthrow idols (my word for 'ideals') - that rather is my business. Reality has been deprived of its value, its meaning, its veracity to the same degree as an ideal world has been fabricated . The 'real world' and the 'apparent world' - in plain terms: the fabricated world and reality.. . The lie of the ideal has hitherto been the curse on reality, through it mankind itself has become mendacious and false down to its deepest instincts - to the point of worshipping the inverse values to those which alone could guarantee it prosperity, future, the exalted right to a future. 3 - He who knows how to breathe the air of my writings knows that it is an air of the heights, a robust air. One has to be made for it, otherwise there is no small danger one will catch cold. The ice is near, the solitude is terrible - but how peacefully all things lie in the light! how freely one breathes! how much one feels beneath one! - Philosophy, as I have hitherto understood and lived it, is a voluntary living in ice and high mountains - a seeking after everything strange and questionable in existence, all that has hitherto been excommunicated by morality. From the lengthy experience afforded by such a wandering in the forbidden I learned to view the origin of moralizing and idealizing very differently from what might be desirable: the hidden history of the philosophers, the psychology of their great names came to light for me. - How much truth can a spirit bear, how much truth can a spirit dare} that became for me more and more the real measure of value. Error (- belief in the ideal -) is not blindness, error is cowardice.. . Every acquisition, every step forward in knowledge is the result of courage, of severity towards oneself, of cleanliness with respect to oneself ... I do not refute ideals, I merely draw on gloves in their presence.. . Nitimur in vetitum: in this sign my philosophy will one day conquer, for what has hitherto been forbidden on principle has never been anything but the truth. - J OKI. WOK I) - Within my writings my Zarathustra stands by itself. I have with this book given mankind the greatest gift that has ever been given it. With a voice that speaks across millennia, it is not only the most exalted book that exists, the actual book of the air of the heights - the entire fact man lies at a tremendous distance beneath it - it is also the profoundest, born out of the innermost abundance of truth, an inexhaustible well into which no bucket descends without coming up filled with gold and goodness. Here there speaks no 'prophet', none of those gruesome hybrids of sickness and will to power called founders of religions. One has above all to hear correctly the tone that proceeds from this mouth, this halcyon tone, if one is not to do pitiable injustice to the meaning of its wisdom. 'It is the stillest words which bring the storm, thoughts that come on doves' feet guide the world -' The figs are falling from the trees, they are fine and sweet: and as they fall their red skins split. I am a north wind to ripe figs. Thus, like figs, do these teachings fall to you, my friends: now drink their juice and eat their sweet flesh! It is autumn all around and clear sky and afternoon - Here there speaks no fanatic, here there is no 'preaching', here faith is not demanded: out of an infinite abundance of light and depth of happiness there falls drop after drop, word after word - a tender slowness of pace is the tempo of these discourses. Such things as this reach only the most select; it is an incomparable privilege to be a listener here; no one is free to have ears for Zarathustra.. . With all this, is Zarathustra not a seducer}... . But what does he himself say when for the first time he again goes back into his solitude? Precisely the opposite of that which any sort of 'sage', 'saint', 'world-redeemer' and other decadent would say in such a case . He does not only speak differently, he is different... 5 ECCE HOMO I now go away alone, my disciples! You too now go away and be alone! So I will have it. Go away from me and guard yourselves against Zarathustra! And better still: be ashamed of him! Perhaps he has deceived you. The man of knowledge must be able not only to love his enemies but also to hate his friends. One repays a teacher badly if one remains only a pupil. And why, then, should you not pluck at my laurels? You respect me; but how if one day your respect should tumble? Take care that a falling statue does not strike you dead! You say you believe in Zarathustra? But of what importance is Zarathustra? You are my believers: but of what importance are all believers? You had not yet sought yourselves when you found me. Thus do all believers; therefore all belief is of so little account. Now I bid you lose me and find yourselves; and only when you have all denied me will I return to you Friedrich Nietzsche On this perfect day, when everything has become ripe and not only the grapes are growing brown, a ray of sunlight has fallen on to my life: I looked behind me, I looked before me, never have I seen so many and such good things together. Not in vain have I buried my forty-fourth year today, I was entitled to bury it - what there was of life in it is rescued, is immortal. The first book of the devaluation of all values~ the Songs of Zarathustra^ the-.JTWUighL-Qf .the Idols, my attempt to philosophize with a hammer - all of them gifts of this year T of its last quarter even! Now should I not be grateful to my whole ///gi-.AnH WHY I AM SO WISE The fortunateness or my existence, its uniqueness perhaps, lies in its fatality: to express it in the form of a riddle, as my father I have already died, as my mother I still live and grow old. This twofold origin, as it were from the highest and the lowest rung of the ladder of life, at once decadent and beginning - this if anything explains that neutrality, that freedom from party in relation to the total problem of life which perhaps distinguishes me. I have a subtler sense for signs of ascent and decline than any man has ever had, I am the teacher par excellence in this matter - I know both, I am both. - My father died at the age of thirty-six: he was delicate, lovable and morbid, like a being destined to pay this world only a passing visit - a gracious reminder of life rather than life itself. In the same year in which his life declined mine too declined: in the thirty-sixth year of my life I arrived at the lowest point of my vitality - I still lived, but without being able to see three paces in front of me. At that time - it was 1879 - I relinquished my Basel professorship, lived through the summer like a shadow in St Moritz and the following winter, the most sunless of my life, as a shadow in Naumburg. This was my minimum: 'The Wanderer and his Shadow' came into existence during the course of it. I undoubtedly knew all about shadows in those days ... In the following winter, the first winter I spent in Genoa, that sweetening and spiritualization which is virtually inseparable from an extreme poverty of blood and muscle produced 'Daybreak'. The perfect brightness and cheerfulness, even exuberance of spirit reflected in the said work is in my case compatible not only with the WHY I AM SO WISE!. profoundest physiological weakness, but even with an extremity of pain. In the midst of the torments which attended an uninterrupted three-day headache accompanied by the laborious vomiting of phlegm - I possessed a dialectical clarity par excellence and thought my way very cold-bloodedly through things for which when I am in better health I am not enough of a climber, not refined, not cold enough. My readers perhaps know the extent to which I regard dialectics as a symptom of decadence, for example in the most famous case of all: in the case of Socrates. - All morbid disturbances of the intellect, even that semi-stupefaction consequent on fever, have remained to this day totally unfamiliar things to me, on their nature and frequency I had first to instruct myself by scholarly methods. My blood flows slowly. No one has ever been able to diagnose fever in me. A doctor who treated me for some time as a nervous case said at last: 'No! there is nothing wrong with your nerves, it is only I who am nervous.' Any kind of local degeneration absolutely undemonstrable; no organically originating stomach ailment, though there does exist, as a consequence of general exhaustion, a profound weakness of the gastric system. Condition of the eyes, sometimes approaching dangerously close to blindness, also only consequence, not causal: so that with every increase in vitality eyesight has also again improved. - Convalescence means with me a long, all too long succession of years - it also unfortunately means relapse, deterioration, periods of a kind of decadence. After all this do I need to say that in questions of decadence I am experienced? I have spelled it out forwards and backwards. Even that filigree art of grasping and comprehending in general, that finger for nuances, that psychology of 'looking around the corner' and whatever else characterizes me was learned only then, is the actual gift of that time in which everything in me became more subtle, observation itself together with all the organs of observation. To look from a morbid perspective towards healthier concepts and values, and again conversely to look down from the abundance and certainty of rich life into the secret labour of the instinct of ECCE HOMO decadence - that is what I have practised most, it has been my own particular field of experience, in this if in anything I am a master. I now have the skill and knowledge to invert perspectives: first reason why a 'revaluation of values' is perhaps possible at all to me alone. - Setting aside the fact that I am a decadent, I am also its antithesis. My proof of this is, among other things, that in combating my sick conditions I always instinctively chose the right means: while the decadent as such always chooses which one would do better to call hygiene so as not to mix it up with such pitiable things as Christianity, makes its effect dependent on victory over resentment: to free the soul of that - first step to recovery. 'Not by enmity is enmity ended, by friendship is enmity ended': this stands at the beginning of Buddha's teaching - it is not morality that speaks thus, it is physiology that speaks thus. - Resentment, born of weakness, to no one more harmful than to the weak man himself - in the opposite case, where a rich nature is the presupposition, a superfluous feeling to stay master of which is almost the proof of richness. He who knows the seriousness with which my philosophy has taken up the struggle against the feelings of vengefulness and vindictiveness even into the theory of 'free will' - my struggle against Christianity is only a special instance of it - will understand why it is precisely here that I throw the light on my personal bearing, my sureness of instinct in practice. In periods of decadence I forbade them to myself as harmful; as soon as life was again sufficiently rich and proud for them I forbade them to myself as beneath me. That 'Russian fatalism' of which I spoke came forward in my case in the form of clinging tenaciously for years on end to almost intolerable situations, places, residences, company, once chance had placed me in them - it was better than changing them, than feeling them as capable of being changed - than rebelling against them ... In those days I took it deadly amiss if I was disturbed in this fatalism, if I was forcibly awakened from it - and to do this was in fact every time a deadly dangerous thing. - To accept oneself as a fate, not to desire oneself 'different' - in such conditions this is great rationality itself. War is another thing. I am by nature warlike. To attack is among my instincts. To be able to be an enemy, to be an enemy WHY I AM SO WISE - that perhaps presupposes a strong nature, it is in any event a condition of every strong nature. It needs resistances, consequently it seeks resistances: the aggressive pathos belongs as necessarily to strength as the feeling of vengefulness and vindictiveness does to weakness. Woman, for example, is vengeful: that is conditioned by her weakness, just as is her susceptibility to others' distress. - The strength of one who attacks has in the opposition he needs a kind of gauge; every growth reveals itself in the seeking out of a powerful opponent - or problem: for a philosopher who is warlike also challenges problems to a duel. The undertaking is to master, not any resistances that happen to present themselves, but those against which one has to bring all one's strength, suppleness and mastery of weapons - to master equal opponents... Equality in face of the enemy - first presupposition of an honest duel. Where one despises one cannot wage war; where one commands, where one sees something as beneath one, one has not to wage war. - My practice in warfare can be reduced to four propositions. Firstly: I attack only causes that are victorious - under certain circumstances I wait until they are victorious. Secondly: I attack only causes against which I would find no allies, where I stand alone - where I compromise only myself ... I have never taken a step in public which was not compromising: that is my criterion of right action. Thirdly: I never attack persons - I only employ the person as a strong magnifying glass with which one can make visible a general but furtive state of distress which is hard to get hold of. That was how I attacked David Strauss, more precisely the success with German 'culture' of a senile book - I thus caught that culture red-handed... That was how I attacked Wagner, more precisely the falseness, the hybrid instincts of our 'culture' which confuses the artful with the rich, the late with the great. Fourthly: I attack only things where any kind of personal difference is excluded, where there is no background of bad experience. On the contrary, to attack is with me a proof of good will, under certain circumstances of gratitude. I do honour, I confer distinction when I associate my 17 ECCE HOMO name with a cause, a person: for or against - that is in this regard a matter of indifference to me. If I wage war on Christianity I have a right to do so, because I have never experienced anything disagreeable or frustrating from that direction - the most serious Christians have always been well disposed towards me. I myself, an opponent of Christianity de rigueur, am far from bearing a grudge against the individual for what is the fatality of millennia. - 8 May I venture to indicate one last trait of my nature which creates for me no little difficulty in my relations with others? I possess a perfectly uncanny sensitivity of the instinct for cleanliness, so that I perceive physiologically - smell - the proximity or - what am I saying? - the innermost parts, the 'entrails', of every soul ... I have in this sensitivity psychological antennae with which I touch and take hold of every secret: all the concealed dirt at the bottom of many a nature, perhaps conditioned by bad blood but whitewashed by education, is known to me almost on first contact. If I have observed correctly, such natures unendurable to my sense of cleanliness for their part also sense the caution of my disgust: they do not thereby become any sweeter-smelling ... As has always been customary with me - an extreme cleanliness in relation to me is a presupposition of my existence, I perish under unclean conditions I swim and bathe and splash continually as it were in water, in any kind of perfectly transparent and glittering element. This makes traffic with people no small test of my patience; my humanity consists, not in feeling for and with man, but in enduring that I do feel for and with him. My humanity is a continual self-overcoming. - But I have need of solitude, that is to say recovery, return to myself, the breath of a free light playful air.. . My entire Zarathustra is a dithyramb on solitude or, if I have been understood, on cleanliness. Fortunately not on pure folly. - He who has eyes for colours will call it diamond. 18 WHY ! AM SO \V Is! Disgust at mankind! at the 'rabble', has always been my greatest danger ... Do you want to hear the words in which Zarathustra speaks of redemption from disgust? Yet what happened to me? How did I free myself from disgust? Who rejuvenated my eyes? How did I fly to the height where the rabble no longer sit at the well? Did my disgust itself create wings and water-diving powers for me? Truly, I had to fly to the extremest height to find again the fountain of delight! Oh, I have found it, my brothers! Here, in the extremest height, the fountain of delight gushes up for me! And here there is a life at which no rabble drinks with me! You gush up almost too impetuously, fountain of delight! And in wanting to fill the cup, you often empty it again. And I still have to learn to approach you more discreetly: my heart still flows towards you all too impetuously: - my heart, upon which my summer burns, a short, hot, melancholy, over-joyful summer: how my summer-heart longs for your coolness! Gone is the lingering affliction of my spring! Gone the snowflakes of my malice in June! Summer have I become entirely, and summer-noonday - - a summer at the extremest height with cold fountains and blissful stillness: oh come, my friends, that the stillness may become more blissful yet! For this is our height and our home: we live too nobly and boldly here for all unclean men and their thirsts. Only cast your pure eyes into the well of my delight, friends! You will not dim its sparkle! It shall laugh back at you with its purity. We build our nest in the tree Future: eagles shall bring food to us solitaries in their beaks! Truly, food in which no unclean men could join us! They would think they were eating fire and burn their mouths. Truly, we do not prepare a home here for unclean men! *9 ECCE HOMO Their bodies and their spirits would call our happiness a cave of ice! So let us live above them like strong winds, neighbours of the eagles, neighbours of the snow, neighbours of the sun: that is how strong winds live. And like a wind will I one day blow among them and with my spirit take away the breath of their spirit: thus my future will have it. Truly, Zarathustra is a strong wind to all flatlands; and he offers this advice to his enemies and to all that spews and spits: take care not to spit against the wind! WHY I AM SO CLEVER - Why do I know a few more things? Why am I so clever altogether? I have never reflected on questions that are none - I have not squandered myself. - I have, for example, no experience of actual religious difficulties. I am entirely at a loss to know to what extent I ought to have felt 'sinful'. I likewise lack a reliable criterion of a pang of conscience: from what one hears of it, a pang of conscience does not seem to me anything respectable... I should not like to leave an act in the lurch afterwards, I would as a matter of principle prefer to leave the evil outcome, the consequences, out of the question of values. When the outcome is evil one can easily lose the true eye for what one has done: a pang of conscience seems to me a kind of 'evil eye'. To honour to oneself something that went wrong all the more because it went wrong - that rather would accord with my morality. - 'God', 'immortality of the soul', 'redemption 'the Beyond', all those concepts to which I have given no attention and no time, not even as a child — perhaps I was never childish enough for it? - I have absolutely no knowledge of atheism as an outcome of reasoning, still less as an event: with me it is obvious by instinct. I am too inquisitive, too questionable, ^ too high spirited to rest content with a crude answer. God is a crude answer, a piece of indelicacy against us thinkers - fundamentally even a crude prohibition. You shall not think.... I am interested in quite a different way in a question upon which the 'salvation of mankind' depends far more than it does upon any kind of quaint curiosity of the theologians: the question of nutriment. One can for convenience' sake formulate 21 ECCE HOMO it thus: 'how to nourish yourself so as to attain your maximum of strength, of virtue in the Renaissance style, of moraline-free virtue?' - My experiences here are as bad as they possibly could be; I am astonished that I heard this question so late, that I learned 'reason' from these experiences so late. Only the perfect worthlessness of our German education - its 'idealism' - can to some extent explain to me why on precisely this point I was backward to the point of holiness. This 'education' which from the first led me to a sight of realities so as to hunt after altogether problematic, so-called 'ideal' objectives, 'classical education' for example - as if it were not from the first an utterly fruitless undertaking to try to unite 'classical' and 'German' in one concept! It is, moreover, mirth-provoking - just think of a 'classically educated' Leipziger! - Until my very maturest years I did in fact eat badly - in the language of morals 'impersonally', 'selflessly', 'altruistically', for the salvation of cooks and other fellow Christians. With the aid of Leipzig cookery, for example, which accompanied my earliest study of Schopenhauer (1865), I very earnestly denied my 'will to live'. To ruin one's stomach so as to receive inadequate nutriment - the aforesaid cookery seems to me to solve this problem wonderfully well. (It is said that 1866 produced a change in this domain -.) But German cookery in general - what does it not have on its conscience! Soup before the meal (in Venetian cookery books of the sixteenth century still called alia tedesca); meat cooked to shreds, greasy and floury vegetables; the degeneration of puddings to paperweights! If one adds to this the downright bestial dinner-drinking habits of the ancient and by no means only the ancient Germans one will also understand the origin of the German spirit - disturbed intestines... The German spirit is an indigestion, it can have done with nothing. - But to the English diet too, which compared with the Germans, even with the French, is a kind of 'return to nature', that is to say to cannibalism, my own instinct is profoundly opposed; it seems to me to give the spirit heavy feet - the feet of Englishwomen.. . The best cookery is that of Piedmont. Alas - why I am so CLEVER holic drinks are no good for me; a glass of wine or beer a day is quite enough to make life for me a 'Vale of Tears' Munich is where my antipodes live. Granted I was a little late to grasp this - I experienced it really from childhood onwards. As a boy I believed wine-drinking to be, like tobacco-smoking, at first only a vanity of young men, later a habit. Perhaps the wine of Naumburg is in part to blame for this austere judgement. To believe that wine makes cheerful I would have to be a Christian, that is to say believe what is for precisely me an absurdity. Oddly enough, while I am put extremely out of sorts by small, much diluted doses of alcohol, I am almost turned into a sailor when it comes to strong doses. Even as a boy I showed how brave I was in this respect. To write a long Latin essay in a single night's sitting and then go on to make a fair copy of it, with the ambition in my pen to imitate in severity and concision my model Sallust, and to pour a quantity of grog of the heaviest calibre over my Latin, was even when I was a pupil of venerable Schulpforta in no way opposed to my physiology, nor perhaps to that of Sallust - however much it might have been to venerable Schulpforta.. . Later, towards the middle of life, I decided, to be sure, more and more strictly against any sort of 'spirituous' drink: an opponent of vegetarianism from experience, just like Richard Wagner, who converted me, I cannot advise all more spiritual natures too seriously to abstain from alcohol absolutely. Water suffices... I prefer places in which there is everywhere opportunity to drink from flowing fountains (Nice, Turin, Sils); a small glass runs after me like a dog. In vino Veritas: it seems that here too I am again at odds with all the world over the concept 'truth' - with me the spirit moves over the water ... A couple more signposts from my morality. A big meal is easier to digest than one too small. That the stomach comes into action as a whole, first precondition of a good digestion. One has to know the size of one's stomach. For the same reason those tedious meals should be avoided which I call interrupted sacrificial feasts, those at the table d'hote. - No eating between meals, no coffee: coffee makes gloomy. 23 ECCE HOMO Tea beneficial only in the morning. Little, but strong: tea very detrimental and sicklying o'er the whole day if it is the slightest bit too weak. Each has here his own degree, often between the narrowest and most delicate limits. In a very agacant climate it is inadvisable to start with tea: one should start an hour earlier with a cup of thick oil-free cocoa. - Sit as little as possible; credit no thought not born in the open air and while moving freely about - in which the muscles too do not hold a festival. All prejudices come from the intestines. - Assiduity - I have said it once before - the actual sin against the holy spirit. - Most closely related to the question of nutriment is the question of place and climate. No one is free to live everywhere; and he who has great tasks to fulfil which challenge his entire strength has indeed in this matter a very narrow range of choice. The influence of climate on the metabolism, its slowing down, its speeding up, extends so far that a blunder in regard to place and climate can not only estrange anyone from his task but withhold it from him altogether: he never catches sight of it. His animalic vigor never grows sufficiently great for him to attain to that freedom overflowing into the most spiritual domain where he knows: that I alone can do ... A never so infinitesimal sluggishness of the intestines grown into a bad habit completely suffices to transform a genius into something mediocre, something 'German'; the German climate alone is enough to discourage strong and even heroic intestines. The tempo of the metabolism stands in an exact relationship to the mobility or lameness of the feet of the spirit; the 'spirit' itself is indeed only a species of this metabolism. Make a list of the places where there are and have been gifted men, where wit, refinement, malice are a part of happiness, where genius has almost necessarily made its home: they all possess an excellent dry air. Paris, Provence, Florence, Jerusalem, Athens - these names prove something: that genius is conditioned by dry air, 24 WHY I AM SO CLEVER clear sky that is to sav In rapid metabolism, In the possibility of again and again supplying oneself with great, even tremen- dous quantities of energy. I have in minci a ease in which a spirit which might have become significant and free became instead narrow, withdrawn, a grumpy specialist, merely through a lack of instinctive subtlety in choice of climate. And I myself could in the end have become this case if sickness had not compelled me to reason, to reflect on reason in reality. Now, when from long practice I read climatic and meteorological effects off from myself as from a very delicate and reliable instrument and even on a short journey, from Turin to Milan for instance, verify on myself physiologically the change in degrees of humidity, I recall with horror the uncanny fact that my life up to the last ten years, the years when my life was in danger, was spent nowhere but in wrong places downright forbidden to me. Naumburg, Schulpforta, Thuringia in general, Leipzig, Basel, Venice - so many ill-fated places for my physiology. If I have no welcome memories at all of my whole childhood and youth, it would be folly to attribute this to so-called 'moral' causes - the undeniable lack of adequate company, for instance: for this lack exists today as it has always existed without preventing me from being brave and cheerful. Ignorance in physiology - accursed 'idealism' - is the real fatality in my life, the superfluous and stupid in it, something out of which nothing good grows, for which there is no compensation, no counter-reckoning. It is as a consequence of this 'idealism' that I elucidate to myself all the blunders, all the great deviations of instinct and 'modesties' which led me away from the task of my life, that I became a philologist for example - why not at least a physician or something else that opens the eyes? In my time at Basel my entire spiritual diet, the division of the day included, was a perfectly senseless abuse of extraordinary powers without any kind of provision for covering this consumption, without even reflection on consumption and replacement. Any more subtle selfishness, any protection by a commanding instinct was lacking, it was an equating of oneself 25 ECCE HOMO with everyone else, a piece of 'selflessness', a forgetting of one's distance - something I shall never forgive myself. When I was almost done for, because I was almost done for, I began to reflect on this fundamental irrationality of my life - 'idealism'. It was only sickness that brought me to reason. - 3 Selectivity in nutriment; selectivity in climate and place; - the third thing in which one may at no cost commit a blunder is selectivity in one's kind of recreation. Here too the degree to which a spirit is sui generis makes ever narrower the bounds of what is permitted, that is to say useful to him. In my case all reading is among my recreations: consequently among those things which free me from myself, which allow me to saunter among strange sciences and souls - which I no longer take seriously. It is precisely reading which helps me to recover from my seriousness. At times when I am deeply sunk in work you will see no books around me: I would guard against letting anyone speak or even think in my vicinity. And that is what reading would mean... Has it really been noticed that in that state of profound tension to which pregnancy condemns the spirit and fundamentally the entire organism, any chance event, any kind of stimulus from without has too vehement an effect, 'cuts' too deeply? One has to avoid the chance event, the stimulus from without, as much as possible; a kind of self- walling-up is among the instinctual sagacities of spiritual pregnancy. Shall I allow a strange thought to climb secretly over the wall? - And that is what reading would mean. The times of work and fruitfulness are followed by the time of recreation: come hither, you pleasant, you witty, you clever books! Will they be German books? ... I have to reckon back half a year to catch myself with a book in my hand. But what was it? - An excellent study by Victor Brochard, les sceptiques Grecs, in which my Laertiana are also well employed. The Sceptics, the only honourable type among the two- and five-fold ambiguous philosophy - 26 WHY I AM so CLEVER SOPHICAL crowd! ... Otherwise I take flight almost always to the same hooks, really a small number, those hooks which have proved themselves precisely to me. It does not perhaps lie in my nature to read much or many kinds of things: a reading room makes me ill. Neither does it lie in my nature to love much or many kinds of things. Caution, even hostility towards new books is rather part of my instinct than 'tolerance', *Uargeur du coeur and other forms of 'neighbour love' ... It is really only a small number of older Frenchmen to whom I return again and again: I believe only in French culture and consider everything in Europe that calls itself 'culture' a misunderstanding, not to speak of German culture.. . The few instances of high culture I have encountered in Germany have all been of French origin, above all Frau Cosima Wagner, by far the first voice I have heard in questions of taste. - That I do not read Pascal but love him, as the most instructive of all sacrifices to Christianity, slowly murdered first physically then psychologically, the whole logic of this most horrible form of inhuman cruelty; that I have something of Montaigne's wantonness in my spirit, who knows? perhaps also in my body; that my artist's taste defends the names Moliere, Corneille and Racine, not without wrath, against a disorderly genius such as Shakespeare: this does not ultimately exclude my finding the most recent Frenchmen also charming company. I cannot at all conceive in which century of history one could haul together such inquisitive and at the same time such delicate psychologists as one can in contemporary Paris: I name as a sample — for their number is by no means small, Messrs Paul Bourget, Pierre Loti, Gyp, Meilhac, Anatole France, Jules Lemaitre, or to pick out one of the stronger race, a genuine Latin to whom I am especially attached, Guy de Maupassant. Between ourselves, I prefer this generation even to their great teachers, who have all been ruined by German philosophy (M. Taine for example by Hegel, whom he has to thank for this misunderstanding of great human beings and ages). As far as Germany extends it ruins culture. It was only the war that 'redeemed' the spirit in France.. . Stendhal, one ECCE HOMO of the fairest accidents of my life - for whatever marks an epoch in my life has been brought to me by accident, never by a recommendation - is utterly invaluable with his anticipating psychologist's eye, with his grasp of facts which reminds one of the proximity of the greatest man of the factual (ex ungue Napoleonem -); finally not least as an honest atheist, a rare, almost undiscoverable species in France - with all deference to Prosper Merimee.. . Perhaps I am even envious of Stendhal? He robbed me of the best atheist joke which precisely I could have made: 'God's only excuse is that he does not exist' I myself have said somewhere: what has hitherto been the greatest objection to existence? God... "~~~—— The highest conception of the lyric poet was given me by Heinrich Heine. I seek in vain in all the realms of millennia for an equally sweet and passionate music. He possesses that divine malice without which I cannot imagine perfection - I assess the value of people, of races according to how necessarily they are unable to separate the god from the satyr. - And how he employs German! It will one day be said that Heine and I have been by far the first artists of the German language - at an incalculable distance from everything which mere Germans have done with it. - I must be profoundly related to Byron's Manfred: I discovered all these abysses in myself - I was ripe for this work at thirteen. I have no words, only a look for those who dare to say the word Faust in the presence of Manfred. The Germans are incapable of any conception of greatness: proof Schumann. Expressly from wrath against this sugary Saxon, I composed a counter-overture to Manfred, of which Hans von Biilow said he had never seen the like on manuscript paper: it constituted a rape on Euterpe. - When I seek my highest formula for Shakespeare I find it always in that he conceived the type of Caesar. One cannot guess at things like this - one is it or one is not. The great poet creates only out 28 why I am so CLEVER of his own reality to the point at which he is afterwards unable to endure his own work . When I have taken a glance at my Zarathustra I walk up and down my room for half an hour unable to master an unendurable spasm of sobbing. - I know of no more heartrending reading than Shakespeare: what must a man have suffered to need to be a buffoon to this extent! - Is Hamlet understood? It is not doubt, it is certainty which makes mad... But to feel in this way one must be profound, abyss, philosopher.. . We fear truth.. . And, to confess it: I am instinctively certain that Lord Bacon is the originator, the self-tormentor of this uncanniest species of literature: what do I care about the pitiable chatter of American shallow-pates and muddle-heads? But the power for the mightiest reality of vision is not only compatible with the mightiest power for action, for the monstrous in action, for crime - // even presupposes it ... We do not know nearly enough about Lord Bacon, the first realist in every great sense of the word, to know what he did, what he wanted, what he experienced within himself.. . And the devil take it, my dear critics! Supposing I had baptized my Zarathustra with another name, for example with the name of Richard Wagner, the perspicuity of two millennia would not have sufficed to divine that the author of 'Human, All Too Human' is the visionary of Zarathustra 5 Here where I am speaking of the recreations of my life, I need to say a word to express my gratitude for that which of all things in it has refreshed me by far the most profoundly and cordially. This was without any doubt my intimate association with Richard Wagner. I offer all my other human relationships cheap; but at no price would I relinquish from my life the Tribschen days, those days of mutual confidences, of cheerfulness, of sublime incidents - of profound moments I do not know what others may have experienced with Wagner: over our sky no cloud ever passed. - And with that I return again to 29 ECCE HOMO France - I cannot spare reasons, I can spare a mere curl of the lip for Wagnerians et hoc genus omne who believe they are doing honour to Wagner when they find him similar to themselves Constituted as I am, a stranger in my deepest instincts to everything German, so that the mere presence of a German hinders my digestion, my first contact with Wagner was also the first time in my life I ever drew a deep breath: I felt, I revered him as a being from outside, as the opposite, the incarnate protest against all 'German virtues'. - We who were children in the swamp-air of the fifties are necessarily pessimists regarding the concept 'German'; we cannot be anything but revolutionaries - we shall acquiesce in no state of things in which the bigot is on top. It is a matter of complete indifference to me if today he plays in different colours, if he dresses in scarlet and dons the uniform of a hussar.. . Very well! Wagner was a revolutionary - he fled from the Germans ... As an artist one has no home in Europe except in Paris: the delicatessen in all five senses of art which Wagner's art presupposes, the fingers for nuances, the psychological morbidity, is to be found only in Paris. Nowhere else does there exist such a passion in questions of form, this seriousness in mise en scene - it is the Parisian seriousness par excellence. There is in Germany absolutely no conception of the tremendous ambition which dwells in the soul of a Parisian artist. The German is good-natured - Wagner was by no means good-natured . But I have already said sufficient (in 'Beyond Good and Evil' §256) as to where Wagner belongs, in whom he has his closest relatives: the French late romantics, that high-flying and yet exhilarating kind of artists such as Delacroix, such as Berlioz, with a fondness for sickness, of incurability in their nature, sheer fanatics for expression, virtuosi through and through.. . Who was the first intelligent adherent of Wagner? Charles Baudelaire, the same as was the first to understand Delacroix, that typical decadent in whom an entire race of artists recognized themselves - he was perhaps also the last.. . What I have never forgiven Wagner? That he condescended to the Germans - that he became reichsdeutsch ... As far as Germany extends it ruins culture. - 30 why I AM SO < LEVER All in all I could not have endured my youth without Wagnerian music. For I was condemned to Germans. If one wants to get free from an unendurable pressure one needs hashish. Very well, I needed Wagner. Wagner is the counterpoison to everything German par excellence - still poison, I do not dispute it... From the moment there was a piano score of Tristan - my compliments, Herr von

Bulow! - I was a Wagnerian. The earliest works of Wagner I saw as beneath me - still too common, too 'German'.. . But I still today seek a work of a dangerous fascination, of a sweet and shuddery infinity equal to that of Tristan - I seek in all the arts in vain. All the strange- nesses of Leonardo da Vinci lose their magic at the first note of Tristan. This work is altogether Wagner's non plus ultra; he recuperated from it with the Meistersinger and the Ring. To become healthier — that is retrogression in the case of a nature such as Wagner ... I take it for a piece of good fortune of the first rank to have lived at the right time, and to have lived precisely among Germans, so as to be ripe for this work: my psychologist's inquisitiveness goes that far. The world is poor for him who has never been sick enough for this 'voluptuous- ness of hell': to employ a mystic's formula is permissible, almost obligatory, here. I think I know better than anyone what tremendous things Wagner was capable of, the fifty worlds of strange delights to which no one but he had wings; and as I am strong enough to turn even the most questionable and most perilous things to my own advantage and thus to become stronger, I call Wagner the great benefactor of my life. That in which we are related, that we have suffered more profoundly, from one another also, than men of this century are capable of suffering, will eternally join our names together again and again; and as surely as Wagner is among Germans merely a misunderstanding, just as surely am I and always will be. - Two centuries of psychological and artistic discipline first, my Herr Germans!.. . But one cannot catch up that amount. - ECCE HOMO - I shall say another word for the most select ears: what I really want from music. That it is cheerful and profound, like an afternoon in October. That it is individual, wanton, tender, a little sweet woman of lowness and charm I shall never admit that a German could know what music is. What one calls German musicians, the greatest above all, are foreigners, Slavs, Croats, Italians, Netherlands - or Jews: otherwise Germans of the strong race, extinct Germans, like Heinrich Schiitz, Bach and Handel. I myself am still sufficient of a Pole to exchange the rest of music for Chopin; for three reasons I exclude Wagner's Siegfried Idyll, perhaps also a few things by Liszt, who excels all other musicians in the nobility of his orchestral tone; finally all that has grown up beyond the Alps - this side... I would not know how to get on without Rossini, even less without my south in music, the music of my Venetian maestro Pietro Gasti. And when I say beyond the Alps I am really saying only Venice. When I seek another word for music I never find any other word than Venice. I do not know how to distinguish between tears and music - I do not know how to think of happiness, of the south, without a shudder of faintheartedness. Lately I stood at the bridge in the brown night. From afar there came a song: a golden drop, it swelled across the trembling surface. Gondolas, lights, music - drunken it swam out into the gloom My soul, a stringed instrument, touched by invisible hands sang to itself in reply a gondola song, and trembled with gaudy happiness. - Was anyone listening? M WHY I AM SO (I.I \ IK 8 In all this in selection of nutriment, of place and climate, of recreation - there commands an instinct of self-preservation which manifests itself most unambiguously as an instinct for self-defence. Not to see many things, not to hear them, not to let them approach one - first piece of ingenuity, first proof that one is no accident but a necessity. The customary word for this self-defensive instinct is taste. Its imperative commands, not only to say No when Yes would be a piece of 'selflessness', but also to say No as little as possible. To separate oneself, to depart from that to which No would be required again and again. The rationale is that defensive expenditures, be they never so small, become a rule, a habit, lead to an extraordinary and perfectly superfluous impoverishment. Our largest expenditures are our most frequent small ones. Warding off, not letting come close, is an expenditure — one should not deceive oneself over this — a strength squandered on negative objectives. One can merely through the constant need to ward off become too weak any longer to defend oneself. - Suppose I were to step out of my house and discover, instead of calm and aristocratic Turin, the German provincial town: my instinct would have to blockade itself so as to push back all that pressed upon it from this flat and cowardly world. Or suppose I discovered the German metropolis, that builded vice where nothing grows, where every kind of thing, good and bad, is dragged in. Would I not in face of it have to become a hedgehog! - But to have spikes is an extravagance, a double luxury even if one is free to have no spikes but open hands... ^^m Another form of sagacity and self-defence consists in reacting as seldom as possible and withdrawing from situations and relation- ships in which one would be condemned as it were to suspend one's 'freedom', one's initiative, and become a mere reagent. I take as a parable traffic with books. The scholar, who really does nothing but 'trundle' books - the philologist at a modest assessment about 200 a day — finally loses altogether the ability 33 ECCE HOMO to think for himself. If he does not trundle he does not think. He replies to a stimulus (- a thought he has read) when he thinks - finally he does nothing but react. The scholar expends his entire strength in affirmation and denial, in criticizing what has already been thought - he himself no longer thinks . The instinct for self-defence has in his case become soft; otherwise he would defend himself against books. The scholar - a decadent. - This I have seen with my own eyes: natures gifted, rich and free already in their thirties 'read to ruins', mere matches that have to be struck if they are to ignite - emit 'thoughts'. - Early in the morning at the break of day, in all the freshness and dawn of one's strength, to read a book - I call that vicious! - 9 At this point I can no longer avoid actually answering the question how one becomes what one is. And with that I touch on the masterpiece in the art of self-preservation - of selfishness For assuming that the task, the vocation, the destiny of the task exceeds the average measure by a significant degree, there would be no greater danger than to catch sight of oneself with this task. That one becomes what one is presupposes that one does not have the remotest idea what one is. From this point of view even the blunders of life - the temporary sidepaths and wrong turnings, the delays, the 'modesties', the seriousness squandered on tasks which lie outside the task - have their own meaning and value. They are an expression of a great sagacity, even the supreme sagacity: where nosce te ipsum would be the recipe for destruction, self-forgetfulness, ^{-misunderstanding, self-diminution, -narrowing, -mediocrating becomes reason itself. Expressed morally: love of one's neighbour, living for others and other things can be the defensive measure for the preservation of the sternest selfishness. This is the exceptional case in which I, contrary to my rule and conviction, take the side of the 'selfless' drives: here they work in the service of selfishness, self-cultivation.

- The entire surface of consciousness - 34 WHY I AM so CLBVBI consciousness is a surface has to be kept clear of any of the great imperatives. Even the grand words, the grand attitudes must be guarded against! All of them represent a danger that the instinct will 'understand itself too early'. In the meantime the organizing 'idea' destined to rule grows and grows in the depths - it begins to command, it slowly leads back from sidepaths and wrong turnings, it prepares individual qualities and abilities which will one day prove themselves indispensable as means to achieving the whole - it constructs the ancillary capacities one after the other before it gives any hint of the dominating task, of the 'goal', 'objective', 'meaning'. - Re- garded from this side my life is simply wonderful. For the task of a revaluation of values more capacities perhaps were required than have dwelt together in one individual, above all antithetical capacities which however are not allowed to disturb or destroy one another. Order of rank among capacities; distance; the art of dividing without making inimical; mixing up nothing, 'recon- ciling' nothing; a tremendous multiplicity which is none the less the opposite of chaos - this has been the precondition, the protracted secret labour and artistic working of my instinct. The magnitude of its higher protection was shown in the fact I have at no time had the remotest idea what was growing within me - that all my abilities one day leapt forth suddenly ripe, in their final perfection. I cannot remember ever having taken any trouble - no trace of struggle can be discovered in my life, I am the opposite of an heroic nature. To 'want' something, to 'strive' after something, to have a 'goal', a 'wish' in view - I know none of this from experience. Even at this moment I look out upon my future - a distant future! - as upon a smooth sea: it is ruffled by no desire. I do not want in the slightest that anything should become other than it is; I do not want myself to become other than I am.. . But that is how I have always lived. I have harboured no desire. Someone who after his forty- fourth year can say he has never striven after honours, after women, after money\ - Not that I could not have had them Thus, for example, I one day became a university professor - I 35

ECCE HOMO had never had the remotest thought of such a thing, for I was barely twenty-four years old. Thus two years earlier I was one day a philologist: in the sense that my first philological work, my beginning in any sense, was requested by my teacher Ritschl for his 'Rheinisches Museum' {Ritschl - I say it with respect - the only scholar gifted with genius whom I have encountered up to the present day. He was characterized by that pleasant depravity which distinguishes us Thuringians and which can render even a German sympathetic - to get to the truth we even prefer to go by secret paths. I should not with these words like to have in any way undervalued my close compatriot, the sagacious Leopold von Ranke .) IO - I shall be asked why I have really narrated all these little things which according to the traditional judgement are matters of indifference: it will be said that in doing so I harm myself all the more if I am destined to fulfil great tasks. Answer: these little things - nutriment, place, climate, recreation, the whole casuistry of selfishness - are beyond all conception of greater importance than anything that has been considered of importance hitherto. It is precisely here that one has to begin to learn anew. Those things which mankind has hitherto pondered seriously are not even realities, merely imaginings, more strictly speaking lies from the bad instincts of sick, in the profoundest sense injurious natures - all the concepts 'God', 'soul', 'virtue', 'sin', 'the Beyond', 'truth', 'eternal life' . But the greatness of human nature, its 'divinity', has been sought in them All questions of politics, the ordering of society, education have been falsified down to their foundations because the most injurious men have been taken for great men - because contempt has been taught for the 'little' things, which is to say for the fundamental affairs of life.. . Now, when I compare myself with the men who have hitherto been honoured as pre-eminent men the distinction is palpable. I do not count these supposed 56 WHY I AM so CLEVER 'pre-eminent men' as belonging to mankind at all - to me they are the refuse of mankind, abortive offspring of sickness and vengeful instincts: they are nothing but pernicious, fundamentally incurable monsters who take revenge on life ... I want to be the antithesis of this: it is my privilege to possess the highest subtlety for all the signs of healthy instincts. Every morbid trait is lacking in me; even in periods of severe illness I did not become morbid; a trait of fanaticism will be sought in vain in my nature. At no moment of my life can I be shown to have adopted any kind of arrogant or pathetic posture. The pathos of attitudes does not belong to greatness; whoever needs attitudes at all is false.. . Beware of all picturesque men! - Life has been easy for me, easiest when it demanded of me the most difficult things. Anyone who saw me during the seventy days of this autumn when I was uninterruptedly creating nothing but things of the first rank which no man will be able to do again or has done before, bearing a responsibility for all the coming millennia, will have noticed no trace of tension in me, but rather an overflowing freshness and cheerfulness. I never ate with greater relish, I never slept better. - I know of no other way of dealing with great tasks than that of play: this is, as a sign of greatness, an essential precondition. The slightest constraint, the gloomy mien, any kind of harsh note in the throat are all objections to a man, how much more to his work! . One must have no nerves . To suffer from solitude is likewise an objection - I have always suffered only from the 'multitude' ... At an absurdly early age, at the age of seven, I already knew that no human word would ever reach me: has anyone ever seen me sad on that account? - Still today I treat everyone with the same geniality, I am even full of consideration for the basest people: in all this there is not a grain of arrogance, of secret contempt. He whom I despise divines that I despise him: through my mere existence I enrage everything that has bad blood in its veins.. . My formula for greatness in a human being is amor fati\ that one wants nothing to be other than it is, not in the future, not in the past, not in all eternity. Not merely 37 ECCE HOMO to endure that which happens of necessity, still less to dissemble it - all idealism is untruthfulness in the face of necessity - but to love it... WHY I WRITE SUCH GOOD BOOKS I am one thing, my writings are another. - Here, before I speak of these writings themselves, I shall touch on the question of their being understood or not understood. I shall do so as perfunctorily as is fitting: for the time for this question has certainly not yet come. My time has not yet come, some are born posthumously. - One day or other institutions will be needed in which people live and teach as I understand living and teaching: perhaps even chairs for the interpretation of Zarathustra will be established. But it would be a complete contradiction of myself if I expected ears and hands for my truths already today: that I am not heard today, that no one today knows how to take from me, is not only comprehensible; it even seems to me right. I do not want to be taken for what I am not - and that requires that I do not take myself for what I am not. To say it again, little of 'ill will' can be shown in my life; neither would I be able to speak of barely a single case of 'literary ill will'. On the other hand all too much of pure folly\ ... It seems to me that to take a book of mine into his hands is one of the rarest distinctions anyone can confer upon himself - I even assume he removes his shoes when he does so - not to speak of boots.. . When Doctor Heinrich von Stein once honestly complained that he understood not one word of my Zarathustra, I told him that was quite in order: to have understood, that is to say experienced^ six sentences of that book would raise one to a higher level of mortals than 'modern' man could attain to. How could I, with this feeling of distance, even want the 'modern men' I know - to read me! - My triumph is 39 ECCE HOMO precisely the opposite of Schopenhauer's - I say 'non legor, non legar'\ - Not that I should like to underestimate the pleasure which the innocence in the rejection of my writings has given me. This very summer just gone, at a time when, with my own weighty, too heavily weighty literature, I was perhaps throwing all the rest of literature off its balance, a professor of Berlin University kindly gave me to understand that I ought really to avail myself of a different form: no one read stuff like mine. - In the end it was not Germany but Switzerland which offered me the two extreme cases. An essay of Dr V. Widmann in the Bund on 'Beyond Good and Evil' under the title 'Nietzsche's Dangerous Book', and a general report on my books as a whole on the part of Herr Karl Spitteler, also in the Bund, constitute a maximum in my life - of what I take care not to say. The latter, for example, dealt with my Zarathustra as an advanced exercise in style, with the request that I might later try to provide some content; Dr Widmann expressed his respect for the courage with which I strive to abolish all decent feelings. - Through a little trick of chance every sentence here was, with a consistency I had to admire, a truth stood on its head: remarkably enough, all one had to do was to 'revalue all values' in order to hit the nail on the head with regard to me - instead of hitting my head with a nail.. . All the more reason for me to attempt an explanation. - Ultimately, no one can extract from things, books included, more than he already knows. What one has no access to through experience one has no ear for. Now let us imagine an extreme case: that a book speaks of nothing but events which lie outside the possibility of general or even of rare experience - that it is the first language for a new range of experiences. In this case simply nothing will be heard, with the acoustical illusion that where nothing is heard there is nothing.. . This is in fact my average experience and, if you like, the originality of my experience. Whoever believed he had understood something of me had dressed up something out of me after his own image - not uncommonly an antithesis of me, for instance an 'idealist'; whoever had understood nothing of me 40 WHY I WRITE!-. SUCH GOOD HOOKS denied that I came into consideration at all. - The word 'superman' to designate a type that has turned out supremely well, in antithesis to 'modern' men, to 'good' men, to Christians and other nihilists - a word which, in the mouth of a Zarathustra, the destroyer of morality, becomes a very thoughtful word - has almost everywhere been understood with perfect innocence in the sense of those values whose antithesis makes its appearance in the figure of Zarathustra: that is to say as an 'idealistic' type of higher species of man, half 'saint', half 'genius'... Other learned cattle caused me on its account to be suspected of Darwinism; even the 'hero cult' of that great unconscious and involuntary counterfeiter Carlyle which I rejected so maliciously has been recognized in it. He into whose ear I whispered he ought to look around rather for a Cesare Borgia than for a Parsifal did not believe his ears. - That I am utterly incurious about discussions of my books, especially by newspapers, will have to be forgiven me. My friends, my publishers know this and do not speak to me about such things. In a particular instance I once had a sight of all the sins that had been committed against a single book - it was 'Beyond Good and Evil'; I could tell a pretty story about that.

Would you believe it that the 'Nationalzeitung' - a Prussian newspaper, for my foreign readers - I myself read, if I may say so, only the Journal des Debats - could in all seriousness understand the book as a 'sign of the times', as the real genuine junker philosophy for which the 'Kreuzzeitung' merely lacked the courage?... This was said for Germans: for I have readers everywhere else - nothing but choice intelligences of proved character brought up in high positions and duties; I have even real geniuses among my readers. In Vienna, in St Petersburg, in Stockholm, in Copenhagen, in Paris and New York - I have been discovered everywhere: I have not been in Europe's flatland Germany 4i ECCE HOMO And to confess it, I rejoice even more over my non-readers, such as have never heard either my name or the word philoso- phy; but wherever I go, here in Turin for example, every face grows more cheerful and benevolent at the sight of me. What has flattered me the most is that old market-women take great pains to select together for me the sweetest of their grapes. That is how far one must be a philosopher ... It is not in vain that the Poles are called the French among the Slavs. A charming Russian lady would not mistake for a moment where I belong. I cannot succeed in becoming solemn, the most I can achieve is embarrassment ... To think German, to feel German - I can do everything, but that is beyond my powers.. . My old teacher Ritschl went so far as to maintain that I conceived even my philological essays like a Parisian romancier - absurdly exciting. In Paris itself there is astonishment over 'toutes mes audaces et finesses' - the expression is Monsieur Taine's -; I fear that with me there is up to the highest forms of the dithyramb an admixture of that salt which never gets soggy - 'German' - esprit ... I cannot do otherwise, so help me God! Amen. - We all know, some even know from experience, what a longears is. Very well, I dare to assert that I possess the smallest ears. This is of no little interest to women - it seems to me they feel themselves better understood by me? ... I am the anti-ass par excellence and therewith a world-historical monster - I am, in Greek and not only in Greek, the Anti-Christ 3 I know my privileges as a writer to some extent; in individual cases it has been put to me how greatly habituation to my writings 'ruins' taste. One can simply no longer endure other books, philosophical ones least of all. To enter this noble and delicate world is an incomparable distinction - to do so one absolutely must not be a German; it is in the end a distinction one has to have earned. But he who is related to me through loftiness of will experiences when he reads me real ecstasies of 42 why i win ii SUCH GOOD hooks learning: tor I conic from heights DO birel has ever soared to, I know abysses into which no toot has ever yet strayed. I have becil told it is impossible to put I book of mine down I even disturb the night's rest.. . There is altogether no prouder and at the same time more exquisite kind of book than my books they attain here and there the highest thing that can be attained on earth, cynicism; one needs the most delicate fingers as well as the bravest fists if one is to master them. Any infirmity of soul excludes one from them once and for all, any dyspepsia, even, does so: one must have no nerves, one must have a joyful belly. Not only does the poverty, the hole-and-corner air of a soul exclude it from them - cowardice, uncleanness, secret revengefulness in the entrails does so far more: a word from me drives all bad instincts into the face. I have among my acquaintances several experimental animals on whom I bring home to myself the various, very instructively various reactions to my writings. Those who want to have nothing to do with their contents, my so-called friends for example, become 'impersonal': they congratulate me on having 'done it' again - progress is apparent, too, in a greater cheerfulness of tone. . . The completely vicious 'spirits', the 'beautiful souls', the thoroughly and utterly mendacious have no idea at all what to do with these books - consequently they see the same as beneath them, the beautiful consistency of all 'beautiful souls'. The horned cattle among my acquaintances, mere Germans if I may say so, give me to understand they are not always of my opinion, though they are sometimes ... I have heard this said even of Zarathustra. . . Any 'feminism' in a person, or in a man, likewise closes the gates on me: one will never be able to enter this labyrinth of daring knowledge. One must never have spared oneself, harshness must be among one's habits, if one is to be happy and cheerful among nothing but hard truths. When I picture a perfect reader, I always picture a monster of courage and curiosity, also something supple, cunning, cautious, a born adventurer and discoverer. Finally: I would not know how to say better to whom at bottom alone I speak than Zarathustra has said it: to whom alone does he want to narrate his riddle? 43

ECCE HOMO To you, the bold venturers and adventurers, and whoever has embarked with cunning sails upon dreadful seas, to you who are intoxicated with riddles, who take pleasure in twilight, whose soul is lured with flutes to every treacherous abyss - for you do not desire to feel for a rope with cowardly hand; and where you can guess you hate to calculate I shall at the same time also say a general word on my style. To communicate a state, an inner tension of pathos through signs, including the tempo of these signs - that is the meaning of every style; and considering that the multiplicity of inner states is in my case extraordinary, there exists in my case the possibility of many styles - altogether the most manifold art of style any man has ever had at his disposal. Every style is good which actually communicates an inner state, which makes no mistake as to the signs, the tempo of the signs, the gestures - all rules of phrasing are art of gesture. My instinct is here infallible. - Good style in itself - a piece of pure folly, mere 'idealism', on a par with the 'beautiful in itself', the 'good in itself, the 'thing in itself. . . Always presupposing there are ears - that there are those capable and worthy of a similar pathos, that those are not lacking to whom one ought to communicate oneself. - My Zarathustra for example is at present still looking for them - alas! he will have to look for a long time yet! One has to be worthy of assaying him... And until then there will be no one who comprehends the art which has here been squandered: no one has ever had more of the new, the unheard-of, the really new-created in artistic means to squander. That such a thing was possible in the German language remained to be proved: I myself would previously have most hotly disputed it. Before me one did not know what can be done with the German language - what can be done with language as such. The art of grand rhythm, the grand style of phrasing, as the expression of a WHY I WRITE SI (M GOOD HOOKS tremendous rise and tall of sublime, of superhuman passion, was first discovered by me; with a dithyramb such as the last of the third Xarathustra, entitled 'The Seven Seals', I Hew a thousand miles beyond that which has hitherto been called poesy. 5 - That out of my writings there speaks a psychologist who has not his equal, that is perhaps the first thing a good reader will notice - a reader such as I deserve, who reads me as good old philologists read their Horace. The propositions over which everybody is in fundamental agreement - not to speak of everybody's philosophers, the moralists and other hollow-heads and cabbage-heads - appear with me as naive blunders: for example that belief that 'unegoistic' and 'egoistic' are antitheses, while the ego itself is merely a 'higher swindle', an 'ideal'. There are neither egoistic nor unegoistic actions: both concepts are psychologically nonsense. Or the proposition 'man strives after happiness'... Or the proposition 'happiness is the reward of virtue' ... Or the proposition 'pleasure and displeasure are opposites'... The Circe of mankind, morality, has falsified all psychologica to its very foundations - has moralised it - to the point of the frightful absurdity that love is supposed to be something 'unegoistic'... One has to be set firmly upon oneself one has to stand bravely upon one's own two legs, otherwise one cannot love at all. In the long run the little women know that all too well: they play the deuce with selfless, with merely objective men... Dare I venture in addition to suggest that I know these little women? It is part of my Dionysian endowment. Who knows? perhaps I am the first psychologist of the eternal- womanly. They all love me - an old story: excepting the abortive women, the 'emancipated' who lack the stuff for chil- dren. - Happily I am not prepared to be torn to pieces: the complete woman tears to pieces when she loves... I know these amiable maenads.. Ah, what a dangerous, creeping, #-«Ay ?&^ ECCE HOMO subterranean little beast of prey it is! And so pleasant with it! ... A little woman chasing after her revenge would over-run fate itself. - The woman is unspeakably more wicked than the man, also cleverer; goodness in a woman is already a form of degeneration ... At the bottom of all so-called 'beautiful souls' there lies a physiological disadvantage - I shall not say all I could or I should become medicynical. The struggle for equal rights is even a symptom of sickness: every physician knows that. - The more a woman is a woman the more she defends herself tooth and nail against rights in general: for the state of nature, the eternal war between the sexes puts her in a superior position by far. - Have there been ears for my definition of love? it is the only one worthy of a philosopher. Love - in its methods war, in its foundation the mortal hatred of the sexes. Has my answer been heard to the question how one cures - 'redeems' - a woman? One makes a child for her. The woman has need of children, the man is always only the means: thus spoke Zarathustra. - 'Emancipation of woman' - is the instinctive hatred of the woman who has turned out ill, that is to say is incapable of bearing, for her who has turned out well - the struggle against 'man' is always only means, subterfuge, tactic. When they elevate themselves as 'woman in herself, as 'higher woman', as 'idealist' woman, they want to lower the general level of rank of woman; no surer means for achieving that than grammar school education, trousers and the political rights of voting cattle. At bottom the emancipated are the anarchists in the world of the 'eternal-womanly', the under-privileged whose deepest instinct is revenge.. . An entire species of the most malevolent 'idealism' - which, by the way, also occurs in men, for example in the case of Henrik Ibsen, that typical old maid - has the objective of poisoning the good conscience, the naturalness in sexual love.. . And so as to leave no doubt as to my opinion in this matter, which is as honest as it is strict, I would like to impart one more clause of my moral code against vice: with the word vice I combat every sort of anti-nature or, if one likes beautiful words, idealism. The clause reads: 'The preaching 46 WHY I \\\ Kill SUCH (.<><> I) HOOKS of chastity is a public incitement to anti-nature. Every expression of contempt for the sexual life, every befouling of it through the concept "impure", is the crime against life is the intrinsic sin against the holy spirit of life.' To give an idea of me as a psychologist I take a curious piece of psychology which occurs in 'Beyond Good and Evil' - I forbid, by the way, any conjecture as to whom I am describing in this passage: 'The genius of the heart as it is possessed by that great hidden one, the tempter god and born piper of consciences whose voice knows how to descend into the underworld of every soul, who says no word and gives no glance in which there lies no touch of enticement, to whose mastery belongs knowing how to seem - not what he is but what to those who follow him is one constraint more to press ever closer to him, to follow him ever more inwardly and thoroughly The genius of the heart who makes everything loud and self-satisfied fall silent and teaches it to listen, who smooths rough souls and gives them a new desire to savour - the desire to lie still as a mirror, that the deep sky may mirror itself in them The genius of the heart who teaches the stupid and hasty hand to hesitate and grasp more delicately; who divines the hidden and forgotten treasure, the drop of goodness and sweet spirituality under thick and opaque ice, and is a divining-rod for every grain of gold which has lain long in the prison of much mud and sand... The genius of the heart from whose touch everyone goes away richer, not favoured and surprised, not as if blessed and oppressed with the goods of others, but richer in himself, newer to himself than before, broken open, blown upon and sounded out by a thawing wind, more uncertain perhaps, more delicate, more fragile, more broken, but full of hopes that as yet have no names, full of new will and current, full of new ill will and counter current.. ' THE BIRTH OF TRAGEDY In order to be just to 'The Birth of Tragedy' (1872) one will have to forget a few things. It made its effect and even exercised fascination through what was wrong with it - through its application to Wagnerism, as if this were a symptom of a beginning. That is what made this book an event in Wagner's life: it was only from then on that great hopes surrounded the name Wagner. Even today people remind me, sometimes in the middle of Parsifal, that it is really / who have it on my conscience that so high an opinion of the cultural value of this movement has come to predominate. - I have often found the book cited as 'the Rebirth of Tragedy out of the Spirit of Music': people have had ears only for a new formula for the art, the intention, the task of Wagner - what of value was concealed in the book was thereby not listened to. 'Hellenism and Pessimism': that would have been a less ambiguous title: that is to say as a first instruction in how the Greeks got rid of pessimism - with what they overcame it.. . Precisely tragedy is the proof that the Greeks were no pessimists: Schopenhauer blundered in this as he blundered in everything. - Taken up and viewed impartially, 'The Birth of Tragedy' looks very untimely: one would not dream it was begun amid the thunders of the battle of Worth. I thought these problems through before the walls of Metz, in cold September nights while serving in the medical corps; one would rather believe the book to be fifty years older. It is politically indifferent - 'un-German' one would say today - it smells offensively Hegelian, it is in only a few formulas infected with the cadaverous perfume of 48 lilt Ml i< ill 01 i RAGEDY Schopenhauer. An 'idea* the antithesis Dionysian and Apollo man translated into the metaphysical; history itself as the evolution of this 'idea'; in tragedy this antithesis elevated to a unity; from this perspective things which had never before caught sight of one another suddenly confronted with one another, illuminated by one another and comprehended... for example opera and revolution.. . The book's two decisive novelties are, firstly the understanding of the dionysian phenom- enon in the case of the Greeks - it offers the first psychology of this phenomenon, it sees in it the sole root of the whole of Hellenic art -. The other novelty is the understanding of Socratism: Socrates for the first time recognized as an agent of Hellenic disintegration, as a typical decadent. 'Rationality' against instinct. 'Rationality' at any price as dangerous, as a force undermining life! - A profound hostile silence with regard to Christianity throughout the book. Christianity is neither Apollo- nian nor Dionysian, it negates all aesthetic values - the only values 'The Birth of Tragedy' recognizes: it is in the profoundest sense nihilistic, while in the Dionysian symbol there is attained the extreme limit of affirmation. In one place the Christian priests are alluded to as a 'malicious species of dwarfs', as 'sub-terraneans'... This beginning is remarkable beyond all measure. I had discovered the only likeness and parallel to my own innermost experience which history possesses - I had therewith become the first to comprehend the wonderful phenomenon of the dionysian. By recognizing Socrates as a decadent I likewise offered a quite unambiguous proof of how little the certainty of my psychological grasp stood in danger of influence from any kind of moral idiosyncrasy - morality itself as a symptom of decadence is a novelty, a unique event of the first order in the history of knowledge. How high above and far beyond the pitiable shallow-pated chatter about optimism contra pessimism I had 49 ECCE HOMO leapt with these conceptions! - I was the first to see the real antithesis - the degenerated instinct which turns against life with subterranean vengefulness (- Christianity, the philosophy of Schopenhauer, in a certain sense already the philosophy of Plato, the whole of idealism as typical forms) and a formula of supreme affirmation born out of fullness, of superfluity, an affirmation without reservation even of suffering, even of guilt, even of all that is strange and questionable in existence. This ultimate, joyfullest, boundlessly exuberant Yes to life is not only the highest insight, it is also the profoundest, the insight most strictly confirmed and maintained by truth and knowledge. Nothing that is can be subtracted, nothing is dispensable - the sides of existence rejected by Christians and other nihilists are even of endlessly higher rank in the order of rank of values than that which the decadence instinct may approve of and call good. To grasp this requires courage and, as a condition of this, a superfluity of strength: for precisely as far as courage may dare to go forward, precisely by this measure of strength does one approach truth. Recognition, affirmation of reality is for the strong man as great a necessity as is for the weak man, under the inspiration of weakness, cowardice and flight in the face of reality - the 'ideal'.. They are not at liberty to know: decadents need the lie - it is one of the conditions of their existence. - He who not only understands the word 'dionysian' but understands himself in the word 'dionysian' needs no refutation of Plato or of Christianity or of Schopenhauer - he smells the decomposition... 3 The extent to which I therewith discovered the concept 'tragic', the knowledge at last attained of what the psychology of tragedy is, I most recently expressed in the Twilight of the Idols. 'Affirmation of life even in its strangest and sternest problems; the will to life rejoicing in its own inexhaustibility through the sacrifice of its highest types - that is what I called dionysian, that 50 THE BIRTH OF TRAGEDY is what I recognized as the bridge to the psychology of the tragic poet. Not so as to get rid of pity and terror, not so as to purify oneself of a dangerous emotion through its vehement discharge - it was thus Aristotle misunderstood it -: but, beyond pity and terror, to realise in oneself the eternal joy of becoming - the joy which also encompasses joy in destruction In this sense I have the right to understand myself as the first tragic philosopher - that is to say the extremest antithesis and antipodes of a pessimistic philosopher. Before me this transposition of the dionysian into a philosophical pathos did not exist: tragic wisdom was lacking - I have sought in vain for signs of it even among the great Greeks of philosophy, those of the two centuries before Socrates. I retained a doubt in the case of Heraclitus, in whose vicinity in general I feel warmer and more well than anywhere else. Affirmation of transitoriness and destruction, the decisive element in a dionysian philosophy, affirmation of antithesis and war, becoming with a radical rejection even of the concept 'being' - in this I must in any event recognize what is most closely related to me of anything that has been thought hitherto. The doctrine of 'eternal recurrence', that is to say of the unconditional and endlessly repeated circular course of all things - this doctrine of Zarathustra could possibly already have been taught by Heraclitus. At least the Stoa, which inherited almost all its fundamental ideas from Heraclitus, shows traces of it. - A tremendous hope speaks out of this writing. I have in the end no reason whatever to renounce the hope for a dionysian future of music. Let us look a century ahead, let us suppose that my attentat on two millennia of anti-nature and the violation of man succeeds. That party of life which takes in hand the greatest of all tasks, the higher breeding of humanity, together with the remorseless destruction of all degenerate and parasitic elements, will again make possible on earth that superfluity of life 5i ECCE HOMO out of which the dionysian condition must again proceed. I promise a tragic age: the supreme art in the affirmation of life, tragedy, will be reborn when mankind has behind it the consciousness of the harshest but most necessary wars without suffering from it ... A psychologist might add that what I in my youthful years heard in Wagnerian music had nothing at all to do with Wagner; that when I described dionysian music I described that which I had heard - that I had instinctively to translate and transfigure into the latest idiom all I bore within me. The proof of this, as strong a proof as can be, is my essay 'Wagner in Bayreuth': in all the psychologically decisive passages I am the only person referred to - one may ruthlessly insert my name or the word 'Zarathustra' wherever the text gives the word Wagner. The entire picture of the dithyrambic artist is a picture of the pre-existent poet of Zarathustra, sketched out with abysmal profundity and without so much as touching on the Wagnerian reality for a moment. Wagner himself had an idea of this: he failed to recognize himself in the essay. - The 'Bayreuth idea' had likewise transformed itself into something that those who know my Zarathustra will find no riddle: into that great noontide when the most select dedicate themselves to the greatest of all tasks - who knows? the vision of a festival I shall yet live to see.. . The pathos of the first pages is world-historic; the glance which is spoken of is the actual glance of Zarathustra; Wagner, Bayreuth, the whole petty German wretchedness, is a cloud in which an endless fata morgana of the future is reflected. Even psychologically all the decisive traits of my own nature are worked into that of Wagner - the proximity to one another of the brightest and most fateful forces, the will to power as it has never been possessed by any man, the ruthless bravery in the things of the spirit, the boundless strength to learn without the will to action being thereby stifled. Every- thing in this essay is prophetic: the proximity of the return of the Greek spirit, the necessity for counter Alexanders to retie the Gordian knot of Greek culture after it had been untied... Listen to the world-historic accent with which the concept 52 THE BIRTH OF tragic disposition is introduced: there are in this essay nothing but world-historic accents. This is the strangest 'objectivity' there can be: the absolute certainty of what I am projected itself Oil to any reality that chanced to appear - the truth about myself spoke out of a dreadful depth. The style of Zarathustra is described and anticipated with incisive certainty; and one will find nowhere a more magnificent expression for the Zarathustra event, the act of a tremendous purification and dedication of mankind. THE UNTIMELY ESSAYS The four untimely essays are altogether warlike. They demonstrate that I was no 'Jack o' Dreams', that I derive pleasure from drawing the sword - also, perhaps, that I have a dangerously supple wrist. The first attack (1873) was on German culture, which even at that time I already looked down on with remorseless contempt. Without meaning, without substance, without aim: a mere 'public opinion'. There is no more vicious misunderstanding than to believe that the Germans' great success in arms could demonstrate anything in favour of this culture - not to speak of its victory over France. The second untimely essay (1874) brings to light what is dangerous, what gnaws at and poisons life, in our way of carrying on science -: life sick with this inhuman clockwork and mechanism, with the 'personality' of the worker, with the false economy of 'division of labour'. The goal gets lost, culture - the means, the modern way of carrying on science, barbarized ... In this essay the 'historical sense' of which this century is so proud is recognized for the first time as a sickness, as a typical sign of decay. - In the third and fourth untimely essays two pictures of the sternest selfishness, self-discipline are erected against this, as signposts to a higher concept of culture, to the restoration of the concept 'culture': untimely types par excellence, full of sovereign contempt for all that around them which was called 'Reich', 'culture', 'Christianity', 'Bismarck', 'success' - Schopenhauer and Wagner or, in one word, Nietzsche 54 I. V ESSAYS Of these four attentats, the first enjoyed an extraordinary The noise it called forth was in every sense magnificent. I had touched a victorious nation on its sore spot that its victory was not a cultural event, but perhaps, perhaps something quite different... The reply came from all sides and by no means merely from old friends of David Strauss, whom I had rendered ludicrous as the type of a German culture-philistine and satisfied, in short as the author of an ale-house gospel of 'old faith and new' (- the word culture-philistine [Bildungsphilister] has remained in the language from its employment in my essay). These old friends, whom as Wurtembergers and Swabians I had cut to the quick when I found their prodigy, their Strauss comical, replied as staunchly and uncouthly as I could possibly have wished; the Prussian retorts were cleverer - they had more 'Berlin blue' in them. The most indecent came from a Leipzig paper, the infamous 'Grenzboten'; I had trouble restraining the enraged Basellers from taking steps against it. The only people unconditionally on my side were a number of elderly gentlemen and their motives were mixed and in part undiscoverable. Among them Ewald of Gottingen, who gave it out that my attentat had proved fatal to Strauss. Likewise the old Hegelian Bruno Bauer, in whom I have from then on had one of my most attentive readers. In his last years he liked to refer for example Heinrich von Treitschke, the Prussian historian, to me for a hint as to where he might find information about the concept 'culture' which he had lost hold of. The most thoughtful, also the longest commentary on the essay and its author was uttered by a former pupil of the philosopher von Baader, a Professor Hoffmann of Wiirzburg. He foresaw from this essay a great vocation for me - to bring about a kind of crisis and supreme decision in the problem of atheism, the most instinctive and ruthless advocate of which he divined me to be. It was atheism which led me to Schopenhauer. - By far the best heard and most bitterly felt reaction was an extraordinarily strong and courageous defence by the usually so moderate Karl Hillebrand, that last humane German who knew how to wield the pen. His essay appeared in the 'Augsburger Zeitung'; it is included in a somewhat more cautious form in his collected writings. Here my essay was represented as an event, a turning-point, a first calling of oneself to order, as the best of all signs, as a real return of German seriousness and German passion in spiritual things. Hillebrand was full of high regard for the form of the essay, for its mature taste, for its perfect tact in distinguishing between the person and the matter at issue: he designated it the finest polemical writing to be written in German - in the art of polemics so dangerous and inadvisable for Germans. Unconditionally affirmative, even more severe than I had ventured to be on the ruination of language going on in Germany (- today they play the purist and can no longer construct a sentence -), equally contemptuous of the 'leading writers' of this nation, he ended by expressing his admiration for my courage - that 'supreme courage which calls the favourites of a nation to account'.. . The after-effect of this essay has been downright inestimable in my life. Up to now no one has sought to quarrel with me. One keeps silent, one treats me in Germany with a gloomy caution: I have for years employed an unconditional freedom of speech for which no one today, least of all in Germany, has his hand sufficiently free. My paradise is 'beneath the shadow of my sword'.. . What I really did was to put into practice a maxim of Stendhal's: he advised one to make one's entry into society with a duel. And how well I had chosen my opponent! the foremost German freethinker! ... In fact it was a quite new kind of freethinking which therewith first found expression: to the present day there is nothing more foreign or unrelated to me than the entire European and American species of Uibres penseurs\ I even feel myself more deeply divided from these incorrigible shallow-pates and buffoons of 'modern ideas' than I do from any of their opponents. They too want in their own way to 'improve' mankind, after their image, they would wage an implacable war against what I am, what I want, if they 56 fHE UNTIMELY ESSAYS understood it they one and all still believe in the 'ideal' ... I am the first im moralist 3 That the untimely essays designated with the names Schopen- hauer and Wagner could contribute very greatly to an understanding of these two cases, or even to the posing of psychological questions about them, I would not like to assert - a few things in them of course excepted. Thus, for example, what is elemental in Wagner's nature is even here with profound cer- tainty of instinct designated as an actor's talent the methods and objectives of which are only consequences of it. What I really wanted to do in these essays was something quite other than to pursue psychology - a problem of education without its like, a new concept of self-discipline, self-defence to the point of harshness, a way to greatness and to world-historical tasks demanded its first expression. What I did by and large was to take two famous and still altogether undetermined types by the forelock, as one takes an opportunity by the forelock, in order to say something, in order to have a couple more formulas, signs, means of expression in my hands. This is, with perfectly uncanny sagacity, even indicated in the third untimely essay. It was in this way that Plato employed Socrates, as a semiotic for Plato. - Now, when I look back from a distance at the circumstances of which these essays are a witness, I would not wish to deny that fundamentally they speak only of me. The essay 'Wagner in Bayreuth' is a vision of my future; on the other hand, in 'Schopenhauer as Educator' it is my innermost history, my evolution that is inscribed. Above all my solemn vow\.. . What I am today, where I am today - at a height at which I no longer speak with words but with lightning-bolts - oh how far away I was from it in those days! - But I saw the land - I did not deceive myself for a moment as to the way, sea, danger - and success! Great repose in promising, this happy looking outward into a future which shall not always remain a promise! 57 ECCE HOMO - Here every word is experienced, profound, inward; the most painful things are not lacking, there are words in it which are downright bloodsoaked. But a wind of the great freedom blows across everything; the wound itself does not act as an objection. - How I understand the philosopher, as a fearful explosive material from which everything is in danger, how I remove my concept 'philosopher' miles away from a concept which includes in it even a Kant, not to speak of the academic 'ruminants' and other professors of philosophy: as to this the essay offers an invaluable instruction, even admitting that what is being spoken of is fundamentally not 'Schopenhauer as Educator' but his opposite, 'Nietzsche as Educator'. — Considering that my trade was at this time that of a scholar, and perhaps too that I understood my trade, an astringent piece of psychology of the scholar which suddenly appears in this essay is not without significance: it expresses feeling of distance, my profound certainty as to what can be my task and what merely means, interlude and extra. It is my sagacity to have been many things and in many places so as to be able to become one person - so as to be able to attain one thing. For a time I had also to be a scholar. - HUMAN, ALL TOO HUMAN With Two Supplements 'Human, All Too Human' is the memorial of a crisis. It calls itself a book for free spirits: almost every sentence in it is the expression of a victory - with this book I liberated myself from that in my nature which did not belong to me. Idealism does not belong to me: the title says: where you see ideal things, I see - human, alas all too human things!' ... I know humanity better.. . The expression 'free spirit' should here be understood in no other sense: a spirit that has become free, that has again seized possession of itself. The tone, the sound of the voice has completely changed: one will find the book sagacious, cool, sometimes harsh and mocking. A certain spirituality of noble taste seems to be in constant struggle to keep itself aloft above a more passionate current running underneath. In this connection there is significance in the fact that it is actually the hundredth anniversary of the death of Voltaire with which the book as it were apologizes for being published in Voltaire is, in contrast to all who have written after him, above all a grandseigneur of the spirit: precisely what I am too. - The name of Voltaire on a writing by me - that really was progress - towards myself ... If one looks more closely, one discovers a merciless spirit who knows every hiding-place in which the ideal is at home - where it has its castle-keep and as it were its last place of security. With a torch in hand which gives no trembling light I illuminate with piercing brightness this underworld of the ideal. It is a war, but a war without powder and smoke, without warlike attitudes, without pathos and contorted limbs - all this would still have been 'idealism'. One error after 59 ECCE HOMO another is calmly laid on ice, the ideal is not refuted - it freezes.. . Here for example 'the genius' freezes; on the next corner 'the saint' freezes; 'the hero' freezes into a thick icicle; at last 'faith', so-called 'conviction', freezes; 'pity' also grows considerably cooler - almost everywhere 'the thing in itself' freezes The beginnings of this book belong within the weeks of the first Bayreuth Festival; a profound estrangement from all that surrounded me there is one of its preconditions. Anyone who has any idea what visions had been flitting across my path even at that time can guess how I felt when I one day came to myself in Bayreuth. It was as if I had been dreaming . Where was I? I recognized nothing, I hardly recognized Wagner. In vain I scanned my memories. Tribschen - a distant isle of the blessed: not the shadow of a resemblance. The incomparable days of the foundation-stone laying, the little band of initiates who celebrated them and who did not lack fingers for delicate things: not the shadow of a resemblance. What had happened} - Wagner had been translated into German! The Wagnerian had become master of Wagner! - German art! The German master! German beer!... We others, who know only too well to how refined a species of artists, to how cosmopolitan a taste Wagner's art alone speaks, were beside ourselves to rediscover Wagner bedecked with German 'virtue'. - I think I know the Wagnerian, I have 'experienced' three generations of them, from the late Brendel, who confused Wagner with Hegel, to the 'idealists' of the Bayreuther Blätter, who confuse Wagner with themselves - I have heard every kind of confession about Wagner from 'beautiful souls'. A kingdom for one sensible word! - Truly, a hair-raising crowd! Nohl, Pohl, Kohl charmingly in infinitum! Not an abortion was missing, not even the anti-Semite. - Poor Wagner! To what a pass had he come! - Better for him to have gone among swine! But among Germans! . For the instruction of posterity a genuine Bayreuther ought in the end to be 60 Ill MAN, ALL TOO HI'MAN Stuffed, better still preserved in spirit, for spirit is what is lacking with the inscription: this is what the 'spirit' was like upon which the 'Reich' was founded . Enough, I left in the midst of this for a couple of weeks, very suddenly, even though a charming Parisienne tried to console me; I excused myself to Wagner merely with a fatalistic telegram. At a place deeply buried in the Bohemian Forest, Klingenbrunn, I bore my melancholy and contempt for Germans about with me like an illness - and wrote a sentence in my pocket-book from time to time under the general title 'The Ploughshare', nothing but hard psychologica which can perhaps still be rediscovered in 'Human, All Too Human'. 3 What then resolved itself within me was not merely a breach with Wagner - I sensed a total aberration of my instinct of which the individual blunder, call it Wagner or my professorship at Basel, was merely a sign. I was overcome with impatience at myself; I realized it was high time for me to think back to myself. It became of a sudden terribly clear to me how much time I had already squandered - how useless, how capricious my whole philologist's existence appeared when compared with my task. I was ashamed of this false modesty . Ten years behind me during which the nourishment of my spirit had quite literally been at a stop, during which I had learned nothing useful, during which I had forgotten inordinately much over a trash of dusty scholarship. Creeping meticulously and with bad eyesight through antique metrists - that is what I had come to! - I was moved to compassion when I saw myself quite thin, quite wasted away: realities were altogether lacking in my knowledge, and the 'idealities' were worth damn all! - A downright burning thirst seized hold of me: thenceforward I pursued in fact nothing other than physiology, medicine and natural science - I returned to actual historical studies only when the task imperiously compelled me to. It was then too that I first 61 ECCE HOMO divined the connection between an activity chosen contrary to one's instincts, a so-called 'calling' to which one is called least of all - and that need for a stupefaction of the feeling of emptiness and hunger through a narcotic art - for example through Wagnerian art. A more careful survey has revealed to me that a large number of young men are in a like predicament: one piece of anti-nature downright compels a second. In Germany, in the 'Reich', to speak without ambiguity, all too many are condemned to decide too soon and then to sicken away beneath a burden they find they cannot throw off. Such people desire Wagner as an opiate - they forget themselves, they are free of themselves for a moment.. What am I saying? for five or six hours! - At that time my instinct decided inexorably against any further giving way, going along, confounding of myself with what I was not. Any kind of life, the most unfavourable conditions, sickness, poverty - all seemed preferable to that unworthy 'selflessness' into which I had first got out of ignorance, out of youth, in which I had subsequently remained out of lethargy, out of so-called 'sense of duty'. - Here there came to my aid, in a way I cannot sufficiently admire and at precisely the right time, that bad inheritance from my father's side - fundamentally a predestination to an early death. Sickness liberated me slowly, it spared me any kind of breach, any violent or offensive step. I forfeited no goodwill at that time and gained much. Sickness likewise gave me a right to a complete reversal of my habits; it permitted, it commanded forgetting; it bestowed on me the compulsion to lie still, to be idle, to wait and be patient. But to do that means to think! My eyes alone put an end to all bookwormishness, in plain terms philology: I was redeemed from the 'book', for years at a time I read nothing - the greatest favour I have ever done myself! - That deepest self, as it were buried and grown silent under a constant compulsion to listen to 62 ILL MAN, ALL TOO IN MAN other selves (and that is what reading means!) awoke slowly, timidly, doubtfully but at length it spoke again. I have never been so happy with myself as in the sickest and most painful periods of my life: one has only to look at 'Daybreak' or perhaps the 'Wanderer and his Shadow' to grasp what this 'return to myself was: a highest kind of recovery itself!.. The other kind merely followed from this. - 5 Human, All Too Human, this memorial of a rigorous self-discipline with which I made a sudden end of every sort of 'higher swindle', 'idealism', 'beautiful feelings' and other womanishnesses that I had been infected with, was written chiefly in Sorrento; it received its conclusion, its final form during a Basel winter under far less favourable conditions than those in Sorrento. It is really Herr Peter Gasty then studying in Basel and very attached to me, who has the book on his conscience. I dictated, my head bandaged and painful, he wrote, he also corrected - he was really the actual writer, while I was merely the author. When the book finally arrived finished into my hands - to the profound astonishment of a serious invalid - I sent among others two copies to Bayreuth. Through a miracle of meaningful chance I received at the same time a beautiful copy of the Parsifal text, with Wagner's dedication to me, 'his dear friend Friedrich Nietzsche, Richard Wagner, Ecclesiastical Counsellor'. - This crossing of the two books - it seemed to me to make an ominous sound. Was it not as though two swords had crossed? ... At least we both felt it to be so: for we both kept silent. - About this time the first Bayreuther Blatter appeared: I grasped for what it had been high time. - Incredible! Wagner had become pious What I thought about myself at that time (1876), with what tremendous certainty I held in my hands my task and what was 65 ECCE HOMO world-historic in it, the whole book, but especially a very explicit passage, bears witness: except that, with my instinctive cunning, I here too avoided the little word T, and this time it was not Schopenhauer or Wagner but one of my friends, the excellent Dr Paul Ree, whom I bathed in world-historic glory - who was happily far too refined a creature to . Others were less refined: I have always recognized the hopeless cases among my readers, the typical German professor for example, in that they have on the basis of this passage believed themselves compelled to understand the whole book as higher realism In fact it contains a contradiction of five or six propositions of my friend: a point discussed in the preface to the 'Genealogy of Morals'. - The passage reads: But what is the main proposition arrived at by one of the boldest and coldest of thinkers, the author of the book 'On the Origin of the Moral Sensations' (Nietzsche, the first immoralist), by virtue of his incisive and penetrating analysis of human behaviour? 'Moral man is no closer to the intelligible world than physical man -for there is no intelligible world.. .' This proposition, hardened and sharpened beneath the hammer-blow of historical knowledge (Nietzsche's Revaluation of All Values), may perhaps at some future time - 1890! - serve as the axe which is laid at the root of the 'metaphysical need' of man - whether more of a blessing or a curse to mankind who could say? But in any event as a proposition with the weightiest consequences, at once fruitful and fearful and looking out at the world with the Janus-face possessed by all great perceptions... DAYBREAK Thoughts about Morality as a Prejudice With this book begins my campaign against morality. Not that it smells in the slightest of gunpowder - quite other and more pleasant odours will be perceived in it, provided one has some subtlety in one's nostrils. Neither big nor even small guns: if the effect of the book is negative, its means are all the less so, means from which the effect follows like a conclusion not like a cannon-shot. That one takes leave of the book with a cautious reserve in regard to everything that has hitherto been honoured and even worshipped under the name morality does not contradict the fact that in the entire book there is no negative word, no attack, no malice - that it rather lies in the sun, round, happy, like a sea-beast sunning itself among rocks. In the end it was I myself who was this sea-beast: almost every sentence in the book was thought, tracked down among that confusion of rocks near to Genoa where I was alone and still shared secrets with the sea. Even now, when I chance to light on this book every sentence becomes for me a spike with which I again draw something incomparable out of the depths: its entire skin trembles with tender shudders of recollection. The art in which it is preeminent is no small one in making things which easily slip by without a sound, moments which I call divine lizards, stay still for a little - not with the cruelty of that young Greek god who simply impaled the poor little lizard, but none the less still with something sharp, with the pen . 'There are so many daybreaks that have not yet dawned' - this Indian inscription stands on the gateway to this book. Where does its author seek that new dawn, that hitherto still undetected tender roseate sky 65 ECCE HOMO with which another day ah, a whole series, a whole world of new days! - breaks? In a revaluation of all values, in an escape from all moral values, in an affirmation of and trust in all that has hitherto been forbidden, despised, accursed. This affirmative book pours its light, its love, its tenderness upon nothing but evil things, it restores to them their 'soul', the good conscience, the exalted right and privilege to exist. Morality is not attacked, it only no longer comes into consideration . This book ends with an 'Or?' - it is the only book which ends with an 'Or?' My task, to prepare a moment of supreme coming-to-oneself on the part of mankind, a great noontide when it looks back and looks forward, when it steps out from the dominion of chance and the priesthood and poses the question why? to what end? for the first time as a whole - this task follows of necessity from the insight that mankind is not of itself on the right path, that it is absolutely not divinely directed, that under precisely its holiest value-concepts rather the instinct of denial, of decay, the decadence instinct has seductively ruled. The question of the origin of moral values is therefore for me a question of the, first rank because it conditions the future of mankind. The demand that one ought to believe that fundamentally everything is in the best hands, that a book, the Bible, will set one's mind finally at rest as to divine governance and wisdom in the destiny of mankind, is translated back into reality, the will to suppress the truth as to the pitiable opposite of this, namely that hitherto mankind has been in the worst hands, that it has been directed by the under-privileged, the cunningly revengeful, the so-called 'saints', those world-calumniators and desecraters of man. The decisive sign that reveals that the priest (- including the concealed priest, the philosopher) has become master not only within a certain religious community but in general is that decadence morality, the will to the end, counts as morality in itself, is the unconditional value everywhere accorded to the unegoistic and 66 DAVISK I \ K the hostility accorded the egoistic. Whoever does not Agree with me on this point I consider infected... But the whole world does not agree with me For a physiologist such a value-antithesis admits of no dubiety. When within an organism the meanest organ neglects even to the slightest degree to assert with absolute certainty its self-preservation, indemnity for its expenditure of force, its 'egoism', the whole degenerates. The physiologist demands excision of the degenerate part, he denies any solidarity with it, he is far from pitying it. But the priest wants precisely the degeneration of the whole, of mankind: that is why he conserves the degenerate part - at this price he dominates mankind.. . What is the purpose of those lying concepts, the ancillary concepts of morality 'soul', 'spirit', 'free will', 'God', if it is not the physiological ruination of mankind? . When one directs seriousness away from self-preservation, enhancement of bodily strength, when one makes of greensick- ness an ideal, of contempt for the body 'salvation of the soul', what else is it but a recipe for decadence? - Loss of centre of gravity, resistance to the natural instincts, in a word 'selfless- ness' - that has hitherto been called morality . With 'Daybreak' I first took up the struggle against the morality of unselfing. - THE GAY SCIENCE 'Daybreak' is an affirmative book, profound but bright and benevolent. The same applies once again and in the highest degree to the gaya scien^a: in practically every sentence of this book profundity and exuberance go hand in hand. A poem which expresses gratitude for the most wonderful month of January I have ever experienced - the entire book is a gift - betrays out of what a depth 'science' has here become gay: You who with your spear of fire Melt the river of my soul, So that, freed from ice, it rushes Toward the ocean of its goal: Brighter still and still more healthy, Free in most desired constraint - Thus your miracle it praises, January, lovely saint! As to what is here called 'goal' - who can be in any doubt as to what this means who sees glittering at the conclusion of the fourth book the diamond beauty of the opening words of Zarathustra? - Or who reads at the end of the third book the granite sentences with which a destiny for all ages formulates itself for the first time. - Songs of Prince Vogelfrei, composed for the most part in Sicily, call to mind quite explicitly the Provençal concept of 'gaya scien^a' that union of minstrel, knight and free-spirit by which that marvellous early culture of the Provençals is distinguished from all ambiguous cultures; the last poem of all especially, 'to the Mistral \ an exuberant dance- song in which, if I may say so! I dance right over morality, is a perfect Provençalism. - 68 THUS SPOKE ZARATHUSTRA A Book for Everyone and No One I shall now tell the story of Zarathustra. The basic conception of the work, the idea of eternal recurrence, the highest formula of affirmation that can possibly be attained - belongs to the August of the year 1881: it was jotted down on a piece of paper with the inscription: '6,000 feet beyond man and time'. I was that day walking through the woods beside the lake of Silva- plana; I stopped beside a mighty pyramidal block of stone which reared itself up not far from Surlei. Then this idea came to me. - If I reckon a couple of months back from this day I find as an omen a sudden and profoundly decisive alteration in my taste, above all in music. The whole of Zarathustra might perhaps be reckoned as music; - certainly a rebirth of the art of hearing was a precondition of it. In a little mountain resort not far from Vicenza, Recoaro, where I spent the spring of the year 1881, I discovered together with my maestro and friend Peter Gast, who was likewise 'reborn', that the phoenix music flew past us with lighter and more luminous wings than it had ever exhibited before. If on the other hand I reckon from that day forwards to the sudden delivery accomplished under the most improbable circumstances in February 1883 - the closing section, from which I have quoted a couple of sentences in the Foreword, was completed precisely at that sacred hour when Richard Wagner died in Venice - the pregnancy is seen to have lasted eighteen months. This term of precisely eighteen months might suggest, at least to Buddhists, that I am really a female elephant. - The interval is occupied by the 'gaya scienza' which bears a hundred signs of the proximity of something incomparable; & [^]* ECCE HOMO finally it gives the opening of Zarathustra itself, it gives in the penultimate piece of the fourth book the fundamental idea of Zarathustra. - Also belonging to this interval is that Hymn to Life (for mixed chorus and orchestra) the score of which was published two years ago by E. W. Fritzsche of Leipzig: a perhaps not insignificant symptom of the condition of this year, when I was possessed to the highest degree by the affirmative pathos par excellence [^] which I call the tragic pathos. It will one day be sung to my memory. - The text, I may state expressly because a misunderstanding exists about it, is not by me: it is the astonishing inspiration of a young Russian lady with whom I was then friendly, Fraulein Lou von Salome. He who knows how to extract any meaning at all from the closing words of the poem will divine why I preferred and admired it: they possess greatness. Pain does not count as an objection to life: 'Have you no more happiness to give me, well then! still do you have your pain.. .' Perhaps my music is also great at this point, [last note of the clarinet in A is C sharp not C. Printing error.] - I lived the following winter in the pleasantly quiet bay of Rapallo not far from Genoa which cuts in between Chiavari and the promontory of Porto Fino. My health was not of the best; the winter cold and exceedingly wet; a small albergo situated right against the sea, so that at night the high tide made sleep impossible, offered all in all the very opposite of what one might desire. In spite of this, and almost as a proof of my proposition that everything decisive comes about 'in spite of', it was during this winter and under these unfavourable conditions that my Zarathustra came into existence. - In the mornings I climbed in a southerly direction into the heights along the glorious route to Zoagli, past pine-trees and with a vast view of the sea; in the afternoons, whenever my health permitted I walked around the entire bay from Santa Margherita to Porto Fino. This place and this landscape is even closer to my heart through the great love Kaiser Friedrich the Third felt for it; in the autumn of 1886 I happened to be on this coast again when he visited this little forgotten world of happiness for the last time. - It was on these 70 THUS SPOKE / ARATIIIIISTRA two walks that the whole of the first Zarathustra came to me, above all Zarathustra himself, as a type: more accurately, he stole up on me... To understand this type one has first to become clear as to its physiological presupposition: it is that which I call great health. I do not know how to illustrate this conception better or more personally than I have already done in one of the last sections of the fifth book of the 'gaya scien%a\ 'We new, name- less, ill-understood' - it says there - 'we premature-born of a yet undemonstrated future, we need for a new goal also a new means, namely a new health, a stronger, shrewder, tougher, more daring, more cheerful health than any has been hitherto. He whose soul thirsts to have experienced the whole compass of values and desiderata and to have sailed around every coast of this "Middle Sea" of ideals, who wants to know from the adventures of his own most personal experience how a conqueror and discoverer of the ideal feels, likewise how an artist, a saint, a lawgiver, a sage, a scholar, a man of piety, a divine hermit of the old stamp feels: he needs one thing before all else, great health - a health such as one does not merely have but has continually to win because one has again and again to sacrifice it... And now, after having been thus under way for a long time, we Argonauts of the ideal, braver perhaps than is prudent and often enough shipwrecked and come to grief but, as said, healthier than others would like us to be, dangerously healthy, healthy again and again - it seems to us as if we have, as a reward, a yet undiscovered country before us whose boundaries none has ever seen, a land beyond all known lands and corners of the ideal, a world so overfull of the beautiful, strange, questionable, terrible and divine that our curiosity and our thirst for possession are both beside themselves so that nothing can any longer satisfy us! ... How, after such prospects and with such a ravenous hunger in conscience and knowledge, 7i ECCE HOMO could we remain content with the man of the present? It is hard enough to remain serious when we regard his worthiest hopes and objectives, and perhaps we do not even regard them any more... Another ideal runs ahead of us, a strange, seductive, dangerous ideal to which we do not want to convert anyone because we do not easily admit that anyone has a right to it: the ideal of a spirit who naively, that is to say impulsively and from overflowing plenitude and power, plays with everything hither- to called holy, good, untouchable, divine; for whom the highest things by which the people reasonably enough take their stand- ards would signify something like a danger, a corruption, a degradation, or at least a recreation, a blindness, a temporary self-forgetfulness; the ideal of a human-super-human well-being and well-wishing which will often enough seem inhuman, for example when it is set beside the whole of earthly seriousness hitherto, beside every kind of solemnity in gesture, word, tone, glance, morality and task as their most corporal involuntary parody - and with which, in spite of all that, perhaps the great seriousness first arises, the real question-mark is first set up, the destiny of the soul veers round, the clock-hand moves on, the tragedy begins.. ' 3 — Has anyone at the end of the nineteenth century a distinct conception of what poets of strong ages called inspiration? If not, I will describe it. - If one had the slightest residue of superstition left in one, one would hardly be able to set aside the idea that one is merely incarnation, merely mouthpiece, merely medium of overwhelming forces. The concept of revelation, in the sense that something suddenly, with unspeakable certainty and subtlety, becomes visible, audible, something that shakes and overturns one to the depths, simply describes the fact. One hears, one does not seek; one takes, one does not ask who gives; a thought flashes up like lightning, with necessity, unfalteringly formed - I have never had any choice. An ecstasy 72 Tills SPOK I /AH A I Ills IRA whose tremendous tension sometimes discharges it sc-It m s flood of tears, while one's steps now involuntarily rush along, now involuntarily lag; a complete being outside of oneself with the distinct consciousness of a multitude of subtle shudders and trickles down to one's toes; a depth of happiness in which the most painful and gloomy things appear, not as an antithesis, but as conditioned, demanded, as a necessary colour within such a superfluity of light; an instinct for rhythmical relationships which spans forms of wide extent - length, the need for a wide-spanned rhythm is almost the measure of the force of inspiration, a kind of compensation for its pressure and tension . Every- thing is in the highest degree involuntary but takes place as in a tempest of a feeling of freedom, of absoluteness, of power, of divinity.. . The involuntary nature of image, of metaphor is the most remarkable thing of all; one no longer has any idea what is image, what metaphor, everything presents itself as the readiest, the truest, the simplest means of expression. It really does seem, to allude to a saying of Zarathustra's, as if the things themselves approached and offered themselves as metaphors (- 'here all things come caressingly to your discourse and flatter you: for they want to ride upon your back. Upon every image you here ride to every truth. Here, the words and word- chests of all existence spring open to you; all existence here wants to become words, all becoming here wants to learn speech from you -'). This is my experience of inspiration; I do not doubt that one has to go back thousands of years to find anyone who could say to me 'it is mine also'. - I lay ill for a couple of weeks in Genoa. There followed a melancholy spring in Rome, where I merely put up with life - it was not easy. This place, the most improper in the world for the poet of Zarathustra and which I had not chosen voluntarily, vexed me beyond measure; I tried to get away - I wanted to go to Aquila, the counter-concept to Rome, founded out of enmity 73 ECCE HOMO towards Rome, as I shall one day found a place to the memory of an atheist and enemy of the church comme il faut, to one who is most closely related to me, the great Hohenstaufen emperor Friedrich the Second. But a fatality hung over it all:

I had to return. I finally acquiesced in the piasga Barberini after I had grown weary of trying to find an anti-Christian quarter. I am afraid that once, in an effort to escape the bad odours as much as possible, I asked at the palaio del Quirinale itself whether they did not have a quiet room for a philosopher. - On a loggia high above the said piaaa, from which one has a view across Rome and deep beneath the rustling of the fontana can be heard, that loneliest song was written that ever was written, the Night Song; at this time a melody of unspeakable melancholy went on continually around me whose refrain I rediscovered in the words 'dead of immortality'. In the summer, returned home to the sacred spot where the first lightning of the Zarathustra idea had flashed to me, I found the second Zarathustra. Ten days sufficed; in no case, neither with the first nor with the third and last did I require more. The following winter, beneath the halcyon sky of Nice, which then shone into my life for the first time, I found the third Zarathustra - and was done. The whole took hardly a year. Many hidden places and heights in the landscape of Nice are for me consecrated by unforgettable moments; that decisive chapter which bears the title 'Of Old and New Law-Tables' was composed during the most painful climb from the station to the marvellous Moorish hill castle Eza - my muscular agility has always been greatest when my creative power has flowed most abundantly. The body is inspired: let us leave the 'soul' out of it ... I could often have been seen dancing; at that time I could walk for seven or eight hours in the mountains without a trace of tiredness. I slept well, I laughed a lot - I was perfectly vigorous and perfectly patient. 5 Apart from these ten-day works the years during and above all after Zarathustra were a state of distress without equal. One 74 THUS SPOkh ZAK A I III S IK A pays dearly for being immortal: one has to die several times while alive. - There is something I call the rancune of what is great: everything great, a work, a deed, once it is completed forthwith turns against him who did it. Precisely because he did it he is from then on weak - he can no longer endure his deed, he can no longer look it in the face. To have something behind one that one ought never to have willed, something within which the knot of destiny of mankind is tied - and from then on to have it to wone! . . . It almost crushes. . . The rancune of what is great! - A second thing is the horrible silence one hears around one. Solitude has seven skins; nothing can get through them. One encounters people, one greets friends: new desolation, no glance offers a greeting. At best a kind of revolt. I experienced such a revolt, in very varying degrees but from almost everyone who was close to me; it seems that nothing gives greater offence than suddenly to let a distance become perceptible - noble natures who do not know how to live without venerating are rare. - A third thing is the absurd susceptibility of the skin to pinpricks, a kind of helplessness in the face of everything small. This seems to me to be conditioned by the tremendous expenditure of all defensive energies presupposed by every creative deed, every deed that comes from the most personal, innermost, deepest part of one's being. The minor defensive capabilities are thereby as it were suspended; they no longer receive any energy. - I also venture to suggest that one digests less well, prefers not to move, is all too vulnerable to feeling cold as well as mistrust - mistrust which is in many cases merely an etiological error. While in such a condition I once sensed the proximity of a herd of cows even before I saw them through the return of milder, more philanthropic thoughts: that had warmth in it This work stands altogether alone. Let us leave the poets aside: perhaps nothing at all has ever been done out of a like superflu- ity of strength. My concept 'dionysian' has here become the supreme deed\ compared with it all the rest of human activity 75 ECCE HOMO seems poor and conditional. That a Goethe, a Shakespeare would not for a moment have known how to breathe in this tremendous passion and solitude, that Dante is, compared with Zarathustra, merely a believer and not one who first creates truth, a world-ruling spirit, a destiny - that the poets of the Veda are priests and not even worthy to unloose the latchet of the shoes of a Zarathustra - all this is the least of it, and gives no idea of the distance, of the a^ure solitude, in which this work lives. Zarathustra has an eternal right to say: 'I form circles and holy boundaries around myself; fewer and fewer climb with me upon higher and higher mountains - I build a mountain range out of holier and holier mountains.' Reckon into a single sum the spirit and goodness of all great souls: all of them together would not be capable of producing one of Zarathustra's discourses. The ladder upon which he climbs up and down is tremendous; he has seen further, willed further, been able further than any other human being. He contradicts with every word, this most affirmative of all spirits; all opposites are in him bound together into a new unity. The highest and the lowest forces of human nature, the sweetest, most frivolous and most fearsome stream forth out of one fountain with immortal certainty. Until then one does not know what height, what depth is; one knows even less what truth is. There is no moment in this revelation of truth which would have been anticipated or divined by even one of the greatest. There is no wisdom, no psychology, no art of speech before Zarathustra: the nearest things, the most everyday things here speak of things unheard of. The aphorism trembling with passion; eloquence become music; lightning-bolts hurled ahead to hitherto undivined futures. The mightiest capacity for metaphor which has hitherto existed is poor and child's play compared with this return of language to the nature of imagery. - And how Zarathustra condescends and says the kindest things to everyone! How he takes even his opponents, the priests, with gentle hands and suffers from them with them! - Here man is overcome every moment, the concept 'superman' here becomes the greatest reality - all that has hitherto been called great in man lies at an infinite distance beneath it. The halcyon, light feet, the ubiquity of wickedness and 76 THUS SPOKE ZARATHUSTRA exuberance and whatever else is typical of the type Zarathustra has never been dreamed of as essential to greatness. It is in precisely this compass of space, in this access to opposites that Zarathustra feels himself to be the highest species of all existing things, and when one hears how he defines this one will refrain from seeking what is like him. - the soul which possesses the longest ladder and can descend the deepest, the most spacious soul, which can run and stray and roam the farthest into itself, the most necessary soul, which out of joy hurls itself into chance, the existing soul which plunges into becoming, the possessing soul which wants to partake in desire and longing - the soul fleeing from itself which retrieves itself in the widest sphere, the wisest soul, to which foolishness speaks sweetest, the soul that loves itself the most, in which all things have their current and counter-current and ebb and flow - But that is the concept of Dionysos himself. — Another consideration leads to the same conclusion. The psychological problem in the type of Zarathustra is how he, who to an unheard-of degree says No, does No to everything to which one has hitherto said Yes, can none the less be the opposite of a spirit of denial; how he, a spirit bearing the heaviest of destinies, a fatality of a task, can none the less be the lightest and most opposite - Zarathustra is a dancer - : how he, who has the harshest, the most fearful insight into reality, who has thought the 'most abysmal thought', none the less finds in it no objection to existence, nor even to the eternal recurrence of existence - rather one more reason to be himself the eternal Yes to all things, 'the tremendous unbounded Yes and Amen' 'Into every abyss I still bear the blessing of my affirmation'.. . But that is the concept of Dionysos once more. 11 ECCE HOMO 7 - What language will such a spirit speak when he speaks with himself alone? The language of the dithyramb. I am the inventor of the dithyramb. Hear how Zarathustra speaks with himself before sunrise: such an emerald happiness, such a divine tenderness still had no tongue before me. Even the deepest melancholy of such a Dionysos still becomes a dithyramb; I take, as an indication, the Night Song - the immortal lament that through his superabundance of light and power, through his nature as a sun, he is condemned not to love. It is night: now do all leaping fountains speak louder. And my soul too is a leaping fountain. It is night: only now do all songs of lovers awaken. And my soul too is the song of a lover. Something unquenched, unquenchable is in me, that wants to speak out. A craving for love is in me that itself speaks the language of love. Light am I: ah, that I were night! But this is my solitude, that I am girded round with light. Ah, that I were dark and obscure! How I would suck at the breasts of light! And I should bless you, you little sparkling stars and glow-worms above! - and be happy in your gifts of light. But I live in my own light, I drink back into myself the flames that break from me. I do not know the joy of the receiver; and I have often dreamed that stealing must be more blessed than receiving. It is my poverty that my hand never rests from giving; it is my envy that I see expectant eyes and illumined nights of desire. Oh wretchedness of all givers! Oh eclipse of my sun! Oh craving for desire! Oh ravenous hunger in satiety! They take from me: but do I yet touch their souls? A gulf IH is SPOKE / AK A Mills IRA stands between giving and receiving; and the smallest gulf must be bridged at last. A hunger grows from out of my beauty: I should like to rob those to whom I give - thus do I hunger after wickedness. Withdrawing my hand when another hand already reaches out to it; hesitating, like the waterfall that hesitates even in its plunge - thus do I hunger after wickedness. Such vengeance does my abundance concoct: such spite wells from my solitude. My joy in giving died in giving, my virtue grew weary of itself through its abundance! The danger for him who always gives is that he may lose his shame; the hand and heart of him who distributes grow callous through sheer distributing. My eye no longer overflows with the shame of suppliants; my hand has become too hard for the trembling of hands that have been filled. Where have the tears of my eye and the bloom of my heart gone? Oh solitude of all givers! Oh silence of all light- givers! Many suns circle in empty space: to all that is dark they speak with their light — to me they are silent. Oh, this is the enmity of light towards what gives light: unpitying it travels its way. Unjust towards the light-giver in its inmost heart, cold towards suns - thus travels every sun. Like a storm the suns fly along their courses; that is their travelling. They follow their inexorable will; that is their cold- ness. Oh, it is only you, obscure, dark ones, who extract warmth from light-givers! Oh, only you drink milk and comfort from the udders of light! Ah, ice is around me, my hand is burned with ice! Ah, thirst is in me, which yearns after your thirst! It is night: ah, that I must be light! And thirst for the things of night! And solitude! 79 ECCE HOMO It is night: now my longing breaks from me like a well- spring - I long for speech. It is night: now do all leaping fountains speak louder. And my soul too is a leaping fountain. It is night: only now do all songs of lovers awaken. And my soul too is the song of a lover. - 8 The like of this has never been written, never felt, never suffered: thus does a god suffer, a Dionysos. The reply to such a dithyramb of a sun's solitude in light would be Ariadne... Who knows except me what Ariadne is!... . Of all such riddles no one has hitherto had the solution, I doubt whether anyone even saw a riddle here. - On one occasion Zarathustra strictly defines his task - it is also mine - the meaning of which cannot be misunderstood: he is affirmative to the point of justifying, of redeeming even the entire past. I walk among men as among fragments of the future: of that future which I scan. And it is all my art and aim to compose into one and bring together what is fragment and riddle and dreadful chance. And how could I endure to be a man, if man were not also poet and reader of riddles and the redeemer of chance! To redeem the past and to transform every 'It was' into an 'I wanted it thus!' - that alone would I call redemption. In another place he defines as strictly as possible what alone 'man' can be for him - not an object of love, not to speak of pity - Zarathustra has also mastered great disgust at man: to him man is formlessness, material, an ugly stone which requires the sculptor. No more to will and no more to evaluate and no more to create\ ah, that this great lassitude may ever stay far from me! In knowing and understanding, too, I feel only my will's 80 THUS SPOKE ZARATHUSTRA delight in begetting and becoming; and if there be innocence in my knowledge it is because will to begetting is in it. This will lured me away from God and gods; for what would there be to create if gods - existed! But again and again it drives me to mankind, my ardent, creative will; thus it drives the hammer to the stone. Ah you men, I see an image sleeping in the stone, the image of my visions! Ah, that it must sleep in the hardest, ugliest stone! Now my hammer rages fiercely against its prison. Fragments fly from the stone: what is that to me? I will complete it: for a shadow came to me - the most silent, the lightest of all things came to me! The beauty of the superman came to me as a shadow: what are the gods to me now! I emphasize one final point: the italicized line provides the occasion. Among the decisive preconditions for a dionysian task is the hardness of the hammer, joy even in destruction. The imperative 'become hard', the deepest certainty that all creators are hard, is the actual mark of a dionysian nature. - BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future The task for the immediately following years was as clear as it could be. Now that the affirmative part of my task was done, it was the turn of the denying, the No-saying and No-doing part: the revaluation of existing values themselves, the great war - the evocation of a day of decision. Included here is the slow search for those related to me, for such as out of strength would offer me their hand for the work of destruction. - From now on all my writings are fish-hooks: perhaps I understand fishing as well as anyone? ... If nothing got caught I am not to blame. There were no fish... This book (1886) is in all essentials a critique of modernity, the modern sciences, the modern arts, not even excluding modern politics, together with signposts to an antithetical type who is as little modern as possible, a noble, an affirmative type. In the latter sense the book is a school for gentlemen, that concept taken more spiritually and radically than it has ever been taken. One has to have courage in one even to endure it, one must never have learned fear.. . All the things of which the age is proud are felt as contradictions of this type, almost as bad manners, for example its celebrated 'objectivity', its 'sympathy with all that suffers', its 'historical sense' with its subjection to the taste of others, with its prostration before petits Juits, its 'scientific-ly'. - If one considers that the book comes after Zarathustra one will also perhaps divine the dietetic regime to which it owes 82 BLYND (,())! AND I- VII. its existence. The eye grown through a tremendous compulsion accustomed to seeing ajar - Zarathustra is more farsighted even than the Tsar - is here constrained to focus sharply on what is close at hand, the age, what is around us. In every aspect of the book, above all in its form, one will discover the same intentional turning away from the instincts out of which a Zarathustra becomes possible. Refinement in form, in intention, in the art of keeping silent, is in the foreground, psychology is employed with an avowed harshness and cruelty - there is not a single good-natured word in the entire book. All this is recuperative: who could in the end divine what kind of recuperation is needed after such an expenditure of goodness as Zarathustra is? . Speaking theologically - pay heed, for I rarely speak as a theologian - it was God himself who at the end of his labour lay down as a serpent under the Tree of Knowledge: it was thus he recuperated from being God. He had made every- thing too beautiful.. . The Devil is merely the idleness of God on that seventh day ...

GENEALOGY OF MORALS A Polemic

The three essays of which this Genealogy consists are in regard to expression, intention and art of surprise perhaps the uncanniest things that have ever been written. Dionysos is, as one knows, also the god of darkness. - Each time a beginning which is intended to mislead, cool, scientific, even ironic, intentionally foreground, intentionally keeping in suspense. Gradually an increasing disquiet; isolated flashes of lightning; very unpleasant truths becoming audible as a dull rumbling in the distance - until at last a tempo feroce is attained in which everything surges forward with tremendous tension. At the conclusion each time amid perfectly awful detonations a new truth visible between thick clouds. - The truth of the first essay is the psychology of Christianity: the birth of Christianity out of the spirit of resentment, not, as is no doubt believed, out of the 'spirit' - essentially a counter-movement, the great revolt against the domination of noble values. The second essay gives the psychology of the conscience: it is not, as is no doubt believed, 'the voice of God in man' - it is the instinct of cruelty turned backwards after it can no longer discharge itself outwards. Cruelty here brought to light for the first time as one of the oldest substrata of culture and one that can least be thought away. The third essay gives the answer to the question where the tremendous power of the ascetic ideal, the priestly ideal, comes from, although it is the harmful ideal par excellence, a will to the end, a decadence ideal. Answer: not because God is active behind the priests, which is no doubt believed, but faute de mieux - because hitherto it has been the only ideal, because it had no competitors. 'For man will rather will nothingness than not will'.. . What was lacking above all was a counter-ideal - until the advent of Zarathustra. - I have been understood. Three decisive preliminary studies of a psychologist for a revaluation of all values. This book contains the first psychology of the priest.

84 (1) GENEALOGY OF MORALS

TWILIGHT OF THE IDOLS

How to Philosophize with a Hammer This writing of fewer than 150 pages, cheerful and fateful in tone, a demon which laughs - the work of so few days I hesitate to reveal their number, is the exception among books: there exists nothing more rich in substance, more independent, more overthrowing - more wicked. If you want to get a quick idea of how everything was upsidedown before me, make a start with this writing. That which is called idol on the title- page is quite simply that which has hitherto been called truth. Twilight of the Idols - in plain terms: the old truth is coming to an end... There is no reality, no 'ideality' which is not touched on in this writing (- touched on: what a cautious euphemism! .). Not merely eternal idols, also the youngest of all, consequently weakest with age. 'Modern ideas', for example. A great wind blows among the trees and everywhere fruits fall - truths. There is the prodigality of an all too abundant autumn in it: one trips over truths, one even treads some to death - there are too many of them.. . But those one gets one's hands on are no longer anything questionable, they are decisions. Only I have the standard for 'truths' in my hand, only I can decide. As if in me a second consciousness had grown, as if in me 'the will' had turned on a light for itself over the oblique path on which it had hitherto been descending.. . The oblique path - it was called the 'path to truth'... All 'obscure impulse' is at an end, it is 86 TWILIGHT OF THE IDOLS precisely the good man who has known least what was the right path.. . And, in all seriousness, no one before me has known the right path, the ascending path: only after me are there again hopes, tasks, prescribable paths of culture I am the bringer of the good tidings of these . Precisely therewith am I a destiny. - 3 Immediately upon completing the said work and without losing so much as a day, I attacked the tremendous task of the Revaluation in a sovereign feeling of pride beyond compare, sure of my immortality every moment and engraving sign upon sign in brass tablets with the sureness of a destiny. The foreword was written on 3 September 1888: when in the morning after this writing I stepped outside I found awaiting me the loveliest day the Ober-Engadin had ever shown me - transparent, glowing in its colours, containing in itself every antithesis, every mediant between ice and south. - Only on 20 September did I leave Sils-Maria, detained there by floods, finally by far the last guest of this wonderful place to which my gratitude would like to make the gift of an immortal name. After a journey with incidents, even being in peril of my life in the flooded Como, which I reached only deep in the night, I arrived on the afternoon of the twenty-first in Turin, my proved place, my Resident[^] from now on. I took again the same accom- modation I had occupied in the spring, via Carlo Alberto 6, HI, opposite the mighty palazzo Carignano, in which Vittorio Emanuele was born, with a view of the pia[^]a Carlo Alberto and beyond that to the hills. Without delay and without letting myself be distracted for a moment I resumed work: only the last quarter of the book remained to be done. On 30 September a great victory; seventh day; a god takes his leisure on the banks of the Po. On the same day I went on to write the foreword to the 'Twilight of the Idols', correction of the proofs of which had been my recreation during September. - I have 87 ECCE HOMO never experienced such an autumn, nor have I thought anything of the sort possible on earth - a Claude Lorrain thought on to infinity, every day of the same excessive perfection. - THE WAGNER CASE A Musicians' Problem If one is to be fair to this writing one has to suffer from the destiny of music as from an open wound. - What is it I suffer from when I suffer from the destiny of music? From this: that music has been deprived of its world-transfiguring, affirmative character, that it is decadence music and no longer the flute of Dionysos... Supposing, however, that one in this way feels the cause of music to be one's own cause, to be the history of one's own suffering, one will find this writing full of consideration and mild beyond measure. In such cases to be cheerful and good-naturedly to mock at oneself as well - ridendo dicere severum where verum dicere would justify every kind of severity - is humaneness itself. Who really doubts that I, old artilleryist that I am, have the ability to bring up my heavy guns against Wagner? — I kept to myself everything decisive in this matter - I have loved Wagner. - Ultimately this is an attack on a subtle 'unknown*' who could not easily be detected by another, in the sense and direction of my task - oh, I have still got quite other 'unknowns' to reveal than a Cagliostro of music - even more, to be sure, an attack on the German nation growing ever more sluggish and poor in instinct in spiritual matters, ever more honourable, which with an enviable appetite continues to nourish itself with opposites and knows how to gulp down 'faith' as well as scientificity, 'Christian love' as well as anti-Semitism, will to power (to the 'Reich') as well as the evangile des humbles, without having any trouble digesting them. This lack of party in choosing between opposites! This ventral neutrality and 'selflessness'! This fairness of German taste, which accords 89 ECCE HOMO everything equal rights - which finds everything tasty... Without any doubt the Germans are idealists... When I last visited Germany I found German taste occupied in trying to accord Wagner and the Trumpeter of Sackingen equal rights; I myself witnessed how in Leipzig, to the honour of one of the most genuine and German musicians in the old sense of the word German, no mere Reich German, Meister Heinrich Schütz, they founded a Liszt Society for the encouragement and propagation of cunning church music... Without any doubt the Germans are idealists... But here nothing shall stop me from becoming rude and telling the Germans a couple of hard truths: who else will do it? - I speak of their indecency in historicis. German historians have not only altogether lost the grand view for the course, for the values of culture, and are one and all buffoons of politics (or of the church -): they have even outlawed this grand view. One has first of all to be 'German', to have 'race', then one can arbitrate over all values and disvalues in historicis - one determines them. 'German' is an argument, 'Deutschland, Deutschland über alles*' a principle, the Germans represent the 'moral world-order' in history; in relation to the imperium romanum the bearers of freedom, in relation to the eighteenth century the restorers of morality, of the 'categorical imperative'... There is a reichs-deutsch historiography, there is, I am afraid, even an anti-Semitic one - there is a court historiography and Herr von Treitschke is not ashamed... Recently an idiotic judgement in historicis, a proposition of the happily late Swabian aesthete Vischer, went the rounds of the German newspapers as a 'truth' to which every German had to say Yes: 'The Renaissance and the Reformation, both together constitute a whole - the aesthetic rebirth and the moral rebirth'. - In face of such propositions my patience runs out, and I sense a desire, I feel it even to be a duty, to tell the Germans for once what they already have on 90 THE WAGNER CASE their conscience. I:rcry great cultural crime offour centuries is what they have on their conscience^... . And always from the lame cause, from their most inherent cowardice in face of reality, which is also cowardice in face of truth, from the falseness which has become instinct with them, from 'idealism'.. . The Germans deprived Europe of the seriousness, of the meaning of the last great age, the age of the Renaissance, at a moment when a higher order of values, when the noble, life-affirmative values which guarantee the future had achieved victory at the seat of the antithetical values, the values of decline - and even into the instincts of him who sat on it\ Luther, that fatality of a monk, restored the church and, what is a thousand times worse, Christianity, at the moment of its defeat... Christianity, that denial of the will to life become religion! . Luther, who found it impossible to be a monk and who because of this 'impossibility' attacked the church and - consequently! - restored it... Catholics would have reason to celebrate Luther Festivals, compose Luther plays... Luther - and 'moral rebirth'! To the devil with all psychology! - Without doubt the Germans are idealists. - Twice, at precisely the moment when with tremendous courage and self-overcoming an honest, an unambiguous, a completely scientific mode of thinking had been attained, the Germans have known how to discover secret paths to the old 'ideal', reconciliations between truth and 'ideal', at bottom formulas for a right to reject science, for a right to lie. Leibniz and Kant - those two greatest impediments to the intellectual integrity of Europe! - Finally, when on the bridge between two decadence centuries a force majeure of genius and will became visible, strong enough to forge Europe into a political and economic unity for the purpose of ruling the earth, the Germans with their 'Wars of Liberation' deprived Europe of the meaning, of the miracle of meaning of the existence of Napoleon — they thereby have on their conscience everything that followed, that exists today, this sickness and unreason the most inimical to culture there is, nationalism, that nevrose nationale with which Europe is sick, that eternalizing of the petty-state situation of 9 1 ECCE HOMO Europe, of petty politics: they have deprived Europe itself of its meaning, of its reason - they have led it into a blind alley. - Does anyone except me know a way out of this blind alley? A task great enough once again to unite the peoples? 3 - And why should I not in the end give expression to my suspicions? In my case too the Germans will again try everything to bring forth a mouse out of a tremendous destiny. Up to now they have compromised themselves with me, I doubt if they will do better in the future. - Ah, how I would like to be a false prophet in this instance!.. . The readers and auditors most natural to me are still Russians, Scandinavians and French - will they always be so? - In the history of knowledge the Germans are represented by nothing but ambiguous names, they have ever produced only 'unconscious' false-coiners (- Fichte, Schelling, Schopenhauer, Hegel, Schleiermacher deserve this description as well as Kant and Leibniz; they are all mere Schleiermacher\ mere veilmakers -); they ought never to have the honour of harbouring the first honest spirit in the history of the spirit, the spirit in whom truth comes to judgement on the false-coinage of four millennia. The 'German spirit' is my bad air: I find it hard to breathe in the proximity of this uncleanness in psychologics become instinct which every word, every gesture of a German betrays. They never went through a seventeenth century of hard self-examination as the French did - a La Rochefoucauld, a Descartes is a hundred times superior in integrity to the leading Germans - to this day they have had no psychologists. But psychology is almost the measure of the cleanliness or uncleanness of a race . And if one is not even clean how should one possess depth? With the German, almost as with the woman, one never gets to the bottom, he has none\ that is all. But in that event one is not even shallow. - That which is in Germany called 'deep' is precisely this uncleanness of instinct towards oneself of which I speak: one does not want 9 1 I ill WAGNER CASE to DC clear about oneself. Might I not suggest the word 'German' as an international counter for this psychological depravity? At this moment, for example, the German Kaiser calls it his 'Christian duty' to free the slaves in Africa: among us other Europeans let that be called simply 'German' I have the Germans produced even one book that possessed profundity? They even lack any idea of what constitutes profundity in a book. I have known scholars who considered Kant profound; at the Prussian court, I fear, they consider Herr von Treitschke profound. And when I have occasionally praised Stendhal as a profound psychologist, it has happened to me that German university professors have asked me to spell his name - And why should I not go on to the end? I like to make a clean sweep. It is even part of my ambition to count as the despiser of the German par excellence. I expressed my mistrust of the German character already at the age of twenty-six (third untimely essay) - the Germans are impossible for me. Whenever I picture to myself a type of man that goes against all my instincts it always turns into a German. The first thing in which I 'test the reins' of a person is whether he has in him a feeling for distance, whether he sees everywhere rank, degree, order between man and man, whether he distinguishes-, one is thereby a gentleman; in any other event one belongs irretrievably to the wide-hearted, alas! so good-hearted concept of the canaille. But the Germans are canaille - alas! they are so good-natured... One lowers oneself by commerce with Germans: the German posits as equal ... If I subtract my commerce with a few artists, above all with Richard Wagner, I have experienced not a single good hour with Germans.. . Supposing the profoundest spirit of all the millennia appeared among the Germans, some goose of the Capitol would opine that its very unbeautiful soul came at least equally into consideration ... I cannot endure this race, with which one is always in bad company, which has no ringer 93 ECCE HOMO for nuances - woe is me! I am a nuance - which has no esprit in its feet and cannot even walk ... In the end the Germans have no idea whatever how common they are; but that is the superlative of commonness - they are not even ashamed of being mere Germans.. . They feel free to discuss everything, they even consider themselves decisive, I fear they have even decided about me.. . My whole life is the proof de rigueur of these propositions. I seek in it in vain for a single sign of tact, of delicatessen towards me. From Jews yes, never yet from Germans. My nature directs that I am mild and benevolent towards everyone - I have a right not to make distinctions -: this does not prevent me from keeping my eyes open. I except no one, least of all my friends - I hope in the end that this has not diminished my humanity towards them! There are five or six things which have always been a point of honour with me. - It remains none the less true that almost every letter which has reached me for years past strikes me as a piece of cynicism: there is more cynicism in benevolence towards me than in any kind of hatred ... I tell each of my friends to his face that he never thinks it worth the trouble to study any of my writings: I divine from the smallest of signs that they do not even know what is in them. As for my Zarathustra, who of my friends would have seen more in it than an impermissible piece of presumption but one that was fortunately a matter of complete indifference?... . Ten years: and no one in Germany has made it a question of conscience to defend my name against the absurd silence under which it has lain buried: it was a foreigner, a Dane, who was the first to possess sufficient refinement of instinct and courage for that, who inveighed against my supposed friends ... At which German university today would lectures on my philosophy be possible such as were given last spring by Dr Georg Brandes in Copenhagen - who therewith once more proved himself a psychologist? - I myself have never suffered from any of this; I am not injured by what is necessary; amor fati is my innermost nature. This does not mean, however, that I do not enjoy the irony, even the world-historic irony. And so, 94 THE WACNFK CASE about two years before the shattering thunder-clap of the Revaluation which will set the earth into convulsions, I sent the 'Wagner Case' into the world: my notion was that the Germans should once more blunder immortally about me and so eternalize themselves! there was just about enough time left! - Was that achieved? - Charming! my Herr- Teutons! I compliment you... WHY I AM A DESTINY I know my fate. One day there will be associated with my name the recollection of something frightful - of a crisis like no other before on earth, of the profoundest collision of con- science, of a decision evoked against everything that until then had been believed in, demanded, sanctified. I am not a man, I am dynamite. - And with all that there is nothing in me of a founder of a religion - religions are affairs of the rabble, I have need of washing my hands after contact with religious people I do not want 'believers', I think I am too malicious to believe in myself, I never speak to masses ... I have a terrible fear I shall one day be pronounced holy, one will guess why I bring out this book beforehand; it is intended to prevent people from making mischief with me ... I do not want to be a saint, rather even a buffoon... Perhaps I am a buffoon.. . And none the less, or rather not none the less - for there has hitherto been nothing more mendacious than saints - the truth speaks out of me. - But my truth is dreadful: for hitherto the lie has been called truth. - Revaluation of all values: this is my formula for an act of supreme coming-to-oneself on the part of mankind which in me has become flesh and genius. It is my fate to have to be the first decent human being, to know myself in opposition to the mendaciousness of millennia ... I was the first to discover the truth, in that I was the first to sense - smell - the lie as lie.. . My genius is in my nostrils... I contradict as has never been contradicted and am none the less the opposite of a negative spirit. I am a bringer of good tidings such as there has never been, I know tasks from such a height that any conception of them 96 WHY I AM A DESTINY has hitherto been lacking; only after me is it possible to hope- again. With all that I am necessarily a man of fatality, for when truth steps into battle with the lie of millennia we shall have convulsions, an earthquake spasm, a transposition of valley and mountain such as has never been dreamed of. The concept politics has then become completely absorbed into a war of spirits, all the power-structures of the old society have been blown into the air - they one and all reposed on the lie: there will be wars such as there have never yet been on earth. Only after me will there be. grand politics on earth. Does one want a formula for a destiny that has become man? It stands in my Zarathustra. — and he who wants to be a creator in good and evil has first to be a destroyer and break values. Thus the greatest evil belongs with the greatest good: this, however, is the creative good. I am by far the most terrible human being there has ever been; this does not mean I shall not be the most beneficent. I know joy in destruction to a degree corresponding to my strength for destruction - in both I obey my dionysian nature, which does not know how to separate No-doing from Yes-saying. I am the first immoralist: I am therewith the destroyer par excellence. - 3 I have not been asked, as I should have been asked, what the name Zarathustra means in precisely my mouth, in the mouth of the first immoralist: for what constitutes the tremendous uniqueness of that Persian in history is precisely the opposite of this. Zarathustra was the first to see in the struggle between good and evil the actual wheel in the working of things: the 97

ECCE HOMO translation of morality into the realm of metaphysics, as force, cause, end-in-itself, is his work. But this question is itself at bottom its own answer. Zarathustra created this most fateful of errors, morality: consequently he must also be the first to recognise it. Not only has he had longer and greater experience here than any other thinker - the whole of history is indeed the experimental refutation of the proposition of a so-called 'moral world-order' -: what is more important is that Zarathustra is more truthful than any other thinker. His teaching, and his alone, upholds truthfulness as the supreme virtue - that is to say, the opposite of the cowardice of the 'idealist', who takes flight in face of reality; Zarathustra has more courage in him than all other thinkers put together. To tell the truth and to shoot well with arrows: that is Persian virtue. - Have I been understood? The self-overcoming of morality through truthfulness, the self-overcoming of the moralist into his opposite - into me - that is what the name Zarathustra means in my mouth. At bottom my expression immoralist involves two denials. I deny first a type of man who has hitherto counted as the highest, the good, the benevolent, beneficent; I deny secondly a kind of morality which has come to be accepted and to dominate as morality in itself - decadence morality, in more palpable terms Christian morality. The second contradiction might be seen as the decisive one, since the over-valuation of goodness and benevolence by and large already counts with me as a consequence of decadence, as a symptom of weakness, as incompatible with an ascending and affirmative life: denial and destruction is a condition of affirmation. - I deal first of all with the psychology of the good man. In order to assess what a type of man is worth one has to compute how much his preservation costs - one has to know the conditions of his existence. The condition for the existence of the good is the lie -: expressed differently, the desire not to see at any price what is the fundamental constitution of reality, that is to say not such as to call forth benevolent instincts at all times, even less such as to permit at all times an interference by short-sighted good-natured hands. To regard states of distress in general as an objection, as something that must be abolished, is the niaiserie par excellence, in a general sense a real disaster in its consequences, a fatality of stupidity - almost as stupid as would be the will to abolish bad weather - perhaps from pity to the poor... In the general economy of the whole the fearfulnesses of reality (in the affects, in the desires, in the will to power) are to an incalculable degree more necessary than any form of petty happiness, so-called 'goodness'; since the latter is conditioned by falsity of instinct one must even be cautious about granting it a place at all. I shall have a grand occasion of demonstrating the measurelessly uncanny consequences for the whole of history of optimism, that offspring of the homines optimi. Zarathustra, the first to grasp that optimism is just as decadent as pessimism and perhaps more harmful, says: good men never tell the truth. The good taught you false shores and false securities: you were born and kept in the lies of the good. Everything has been distorted and twisted down to its very bottom through the good. Fortunately the world has not been constructed for the satisfaction of instincts such as would permit merely good-natured herd animals to find their narrow happiness in it; to demand that everything should become 'good man', herd animal, blue-eyed, benevolent, 'beautiful soul' - or, as Mr Herbert Spencer wants, altruistic, would mean to deprive existence of its great character, would mean to castrate mankind and to reduce it to a paltry Chinadom. -And this has been attempted!... Precisely this has been called morality ... In this sense Zarathustra calls the good now 'the last men', now the 'beginning of the end'; above all he feels them to be the most harmful species of man, because they preserve their existence as much at the expense of truth as at the expense of the future. The good - cannot create, they are always the beginning of the end- 99 ECCE HOMO - they crucify him who writes new values on new law-tables, they sacrifice the future to themselves, they crucify the whole human future! The good - have always been the beginning of the end And whatever harm the world-calumniators may do, the harm the good do is the most harmful harm. 5 Zarathustra, the first psychologist of the good, is - consequently - a friend of the wicked. When a decadence-species of man has risen to the rank of the highest species of man, this can happen only at the expense of its antithetical species, the species of man strong and certain of life. When the herd-animal is resplendent in the glow of the highest virtue, the exceptional man must be devalued to the wicked man. When mendaciousness at any price appropriates the word 'truth' for its perspective, what is actually veracious must be discovered bearing the worst names. Zarathustra here leaves no doubt: he says that it was knowledge of precisely the good, the 'best', which made him feel horror at man in general; it was out of this repugnance that the wings grew which 'carried him to distant futures' - he does not dissemble that it is precisely in relation to the good that his type of man, a relatively superhuman type, is superhuman, that the good and just would call his superman a devil You highest men my eyes have encountered! This is my doubt of you and my secret laughter: I think you would call my superman - a devil! Your souls are so unfamiliar with what is great that the superman would be fearful to you in his goodness It is at this point and nowhere else that one must make a start if one is to understand what Zarathustra's intentions are: the species of man he delineates delineates reality as it is: he is strong enough for it - he is not estranged from or entranced by it WHY I AM A IM s I I \V it, he is reality itself, he still has all that is fearful and questionable in reality in him, only thus can man possess greatness - But there is also another sense in which I have chosen for myself the word immoralist as a mark of distinction and badge of honour; I am proud to possess this word which sets me off against the whole of humanity. No one has yet felt Christian morality as beneath him: that requires a height, a farsightedness, a hitherto altogether unheard-of psychological profundity and abysmalness. Christian morality has hitherto been the Circe of all thinkers - they stood in its service. - Who before me has entered the caverns out of which the poisonous blight of this kind of ideal - world-calumny I - wells up? Who has even ventured to suspect that these caverns exist? Who before me at all among philosophers has been a psychologist and not rather its opposite 'higher swindler', 'idealist'? Before me there was no psychology. - To be the first here can be a curse, it is in any case a destiny: for one is also the first to despise... Disgust at mankind is my danger.. Have I been understood? - What defines me, what sets me apart from all the rest of mankind, is that I have unmasked Christian morality. That is why I needed a word which would embody the sense of a challenge to everyone. Not to have opened its eyes here sooner counts to me as the greatest piece of uncleanness which humanity has on its conscience, as self- deception become instinct, as a fundamental will not to observe every event, every cause, every reality, as false-coinage in psycho- logicis to the point of crime. Blindness in the face of Christianity is the crime par excellence - the crime against life . The millennia, the peoples, the first and the last, the philosophers and the old women - except for five or six moments of history, me as the IOI ECCE HOMO seventh - on this point they are all worthy of one another. The Christian has hitherto been the 'moral being', a curiosity without equal - and, as 'moral being', more absurd, mendacious, vain, frivolous, harmful to himself than even the greatest despiser of mankind could have allowed himself to dream. Christian moral- ity - the most malicious form of the will to the lie, the actual Circe of mankind: that which has ruined it. It is not error as error which horrifies me at the sight of this, not the millennia- long lack of 'good will', of discipline, of decency, of courage in spiritual affairs which betrays itself in its victory - it is the lack of nature, it is the utterly ghastly fact that anti-nature itself has received the highest honours as morality, and has hung over mankind as law, as categorical imperative! ... To blunder to this extent, not as an individual, not as a people, but as mankind! . That contempt has been taught for the primary instincts of life; that a 'soul', a 'spirit' has been lyingly invented in order to destroy the body; that one teaches that there is something unclean in the precondition of life, sexuality; that the evil principle is sought in that which is most profoundly necessary for prosperity, in strict selfishness (- the very word is slander- ous!); that on the other hand one sees in the typical signs of decline and contradictoriness of instinct, in the 'selfless', in loss of centre of gravity, in 'depersonalization' and 'love of one's neighbour' (- lust for one's neighbour!) the higher value, what am I saying! value in itself... . What\ could mankind itself be in decadence? has it always been? - What is certain is that it has been taught only decadence values as supreme values. The morality of unselfing is the morality of decline par excellence, the fact 'I am perishing' translated into the imperative 'you all shall perish' - and not only into the imperative! . This sole morality which has hitherto been taught, the morality of unselfing, betrays a will to the end, it denies the very foundations of life. - Let us here leave the possibility open that it is not mankind which is degenerating but only that parasitic species of man the priest, who with the aid of morality has lied himself up to being the determiner of mankind's values - who divines in Christian 102 WHY I AM A DESTINY morality his means to power.. . And that is in fact my insight: the teachers, the leaders of mankind, theologians included, have also one and all been decadents: thence the revaluation of all values into the inimical to life, thence morality... Definition of morality, morality - the idiosyncrasy of decadents with the hidden intention of avenging themselves on life - and successfully. I set store by this definition. - 8 - Have I been understood? - I have not just now said a word that I could not have said five years ago through the mouth of Zarathustra. - The unmasking of Christian morality is an event without equal, a real catastrophe. He who exposes it is a force majeure, a destiny - he breaks the history of mankind into two parts. One lives before him, one lives after him... The lightning-bolt of truth struck precisely that which formerly stood highest: he who grasps what was then destroyed had better see whether he has anything at all left in his hands. Everything hitherto called 'truth' is recognized as the most harmful, malicious, most subterranean form of the lie; the holy pretext of 'improving' mankind as the cunning to suck out life itself and to make it anaemic. Morality as vampirism . He who unmasks morality has therewith unmasked the valuelessness of all values which are or have been believed in; he no longer sees in the most revered, even canonized types of man anything venerable, he sees in them the most fateful kind of abortion, fateful because they exercise fascination.. . The concept 'God' invented as the antithetical concept to life - everything harmful, noxious, slanderous, the whole mortal enmity against life brought into one terrible unity! The concept 'the Beyond', 'real world' invented so as to deprive of value the only world which exists - so as to leave over no goal, no reason, no task for our earthly reality! The concept 'soul', 'spirit', finally even 'immortal soul', invented so as to despise the body, so as to make it sick - 'holy' - so as to bring to all the things in life which deserve 103 ECCE HOMO serious attention, the questions of nutriment, residence, cleanliness, weather, a horrifying frivolity! Instead of health 'salvation of the soul' - which is to say a/o//> circulaire between spasms of atonement and redemption hysteria! The concept 'sin' invented together with the instrument of torture which goes with it, the concept of 'free will', so as to confuse the instincts, so as to make mistrust of the instincts into second nature! In the concept of the 'selfless', of the 'self-denying' the actual badge of decadence, being lured by the harmful, no longer being able to discover where one's advantage lies, self-destruction, made the sign of value in general, made 'duty', 'holiness', the 'divine' in man! Finally - it is the most fearful - in the concept of the good man common cause made with everything weak, sick, ill-constructed, suffering from itself, all that which ought to perish - the law of selection crossed, an ideal made of opposition to the proud and well-constituted, to the affirmative man, to the man certain of the future and guaranteeing the future - the latter is henceforth called the evil man.. . And all this was believed in as morality. - Ecrasez l'enfer! — 9 Have I been understood? - Dionysos against the Crucified NOTES FOREWORD i. heaviest demand. The forthcoming Revaluation of all Values - together with the effect it may be expected to produce - is presumably what is meant. 3. Nitimur in vetitum. We strive after the forbidden (Ovid). 4. 'It is the stillest... guide the world' Quoted from Thus Spoke Zarathustra, Part Two: 'The Stillest Hour'. The figs are falling.. . sky and afternoon. Quoted from Zarathustra, Part Two: 'On the Blissful Islands'. decadent. Nietzsche employs, here and elsewhere, the French word, since none with precisely this meaning was available to him in German. I now go away... will I return to you. Quoted from Zarathustra, Part One: 'Of the Bestowing Virtue'. 'On This Perfect Day.. .' first book of the Revaluation of all Values. Nietzsche was at the date of Ecce Homo still referring to the just completed Anti-Christ as the first book of the forthcoming Revaluation. Either immediately before or immediately after the mental breakdown of 3 January 1889 he withdrew this designation by erasing it from the title-page of the manuscript. Songs of Zarathustra: i.e. the Dionysos-Dithyramben, published in 1892. Why I am So Wise 2. as summa summarum: as a totality. This seems to have been a 'family legend' which Nietzsche's hatred of the Reich inspired him to 105 NOTES propagate during his last sane years; but it is refuted by the genealogical evidence. Nietzsche's ancestry has been traced back to the sixteenth century and over two hundred ancestors are known: all are German, and the name Nietzsche is, together with its cognate forms (e.g. Nitsche, Nitzke), a common one in central Germany. At the end of December 1888 Nietzsche posted to his publisher a set of corrections to the manuscript of Ecce Homo. The revised section 3 was discovered among the papers of Peter Gast in the Nietzsche collection of the Goethe-Schiller Archive in Weimar in 1969. Gast had sent the manuscript of this section to Nietzsche's mother and sister, who destroyed it; but he had copied it out. This is the first edition of Ecce Homo in English to include it. The passage reproduced below is the original section 3 published in the first edition, and all subsequent English translations. This twofold succession of experiences, this accessibility to me of apparently separate worlds, is repeated in my nature in every respect - I am a Doppelgänger, I have a 'second' face in addition to the first one. And perhaps also a third. Even by virtue of my descent I am permitted to look beyond all merely locally, merely nationally conditioned perspectives, it costs me no effort to be a 'good European'. On the other hand I am perhaps more German than present-day Germans, mere Reich Germans, are still capable of being - I the last anti-political German. And yet my ancestors were Polish noblemen: I have preserved from them much racial instinct, who knows? ultimately even the liberum veto. When I consider how often I am addressed as a Pole and by Poles themselves, how rarely I am taken for a German, it might appear that German has only been sprinkled on to me. But my mother, Franziska Oehler, is in any event something very German; likewise my paternal grandmother, Erdmutha Krause. The latter lived her entire youth in the middle of good old Weimar, not without coming into contact with Goethe's circle. Her brother, Professor of Theology Krause of Königsberg, was called to Weimar as general superintendent after Herder's death. It is not impossible that her mother, my great-grandmother, appears in the young Goethe's diary under the name 'Muthgen'. Her second marriage was with the superintendent Nietzsche of Eilenburg; it was on the day of the great war year 1813 on which Napoleon entered Eilenburg with his general staff, on 10 October, 106 NOTES that she had her confinement. As a Saxon she was a great admirer of Napoleon; it could be that I am so still. My father born 1813, died 1849. Before he took over the pastorship of the parish of Rockcn, not far from Liitzen, he lived for some years in the castle of Altenburg and instructed the four princesses there. His pupils are the Queen of Hanover, Grand-Duchess Constantin, the Grand-Duchess of Oldenburg and Princess Therese of Saxe-Altenburg. He was full of a deep reverence for King Friedrich Wilhelm the Fourth of Prussia, from whom he also received his pastorship; the events of 1848 distressed him beyond measure. I myself, born on the birthday of the said king, on 15 October, received as was appropriate the Hohenzollern names Friedrich Wilhelm. The choice of this day had at any rate one advantage: throughout my entire childhood my birthday was a holiday. - I regard it as a great privilege to have had such a father: it even seems to me that whatever else of privileges I possess is thereby explained - life, the great Yes to life, not included. Above all that it requires no intention on my part, but only a mere waiting, for me to enter involuntarily into a world of exalted and delicate things: I am at home there, my innermost passion becomes free only there. That I paid for this privilege almost with my life is certainly no unfair trade. - To understand anything at all of my Zarathustra one has perhaps to possess a qualification similar to that which I possess - to have one foot beyond life 'good European' \ a coinage of Nietzsche's, probably as an antithesis to 'good German'. liberum veto: the right to veto legislation possessed by the nobility of the Polish Diet. the events of 1848: the revolutionary outbreaks in many parts of Europe which characterized this year. 4. Heinrich von Stein. He had been tutor to Wagner's son, Siegfried, and Wagner's last published writing was an introduction to his book Heiden und Welt (1883). He died in 1887, at the age of thirty. swamp of Diihring. Eugen Diihring (1833-1901), philosopher and economist. The 'swamp' is probably anti-Semitism. 'Zarathustra's Temptation*': Part Four of Thus Spoke Zarathustra is meant. 6. resentment. French in the original, for a similar reason to the author's employment of decadent. 107 NOTES 8. pure folly. A favourite joke of Nietzsche's, here not very apposite. (1 quote the note on it from my translation of Twilight of the Idols: Parsifal, eponymous hero of Wagner's last opera, is described as a pure, i.e. chaste, fool [reine Tor] whose naivety is proof against temptation of every kind. Nietzsche considered the plot of Parsifal preposterous and persistently uses the phrase 'reine Torheit' [pure folly] in the sense of complete folly.) Yet what happened... against the wind. Quoted, with slight alteration, from Zarathustra, Part Two: 'Of the Rabble'. Why I am So Clever i. (/ is said... in this domain): due, presumably, to the occupation of Saxony by Prussia during the German War of 1866. alia tedesca: in the German fashion. Piedmont: the Italian province of which Turin, where Ecce Homo was written, is the chief city. Assiduity... holy spirit. Quoted from Twilight of the Idols. Liszt, Wagner's second wife and (by the date of Ecce Homo) widow. ex ungue Napoleonem: from the claw, Napoleon (from ex ungue leonum = from the claw [you can reconstruct or infer] the lion). 4. mere Germans: Heine was a Jew, Nietzsche supposed himself descended from Poles (see note above). American shallow-pates and muddle-heads. Alludes to the American origin of the Baconian movement, with the implication that Nietzsche does not derive his own views from it. 9. nosce te ipsum: know thyself. 10. amor fati: love of (one's) fate. Why I Write Such Good Books 1. 'non legor, non legar': I am not read, I will not be read. Dr V. Widmann (1842-1911), minor Swiss poet. Karl Spitteler (1845-1924), major Swiss writer, Nobel Prize-winner for literature in 1919. 1. Kreuzzeitung: an extreme reactionary newspaper. 3. 'beautiful souls': phrase from Goethe's Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre. Toyon... hate to calculate. Quoted from Zarathustra, Part Three: 'Of the Vision and the Riddle'. 108 NOTES 5. eternal-womanly: from the concluding chorus of Goethe's

Part XI

Dithyrambs of Dionysus

1888 — Translated by R.J. Hollingdale

[Page 2] FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE Dithyrambs of Dionysus (DIONYSOS-DITHYRAMBEN) translated with an introduction and notes by R. J. HOLLINGDALE Anvil Press Poetry [Page 3] Published in 1984 by Anvil Press Poetry Ltd 69 King George Street London SE10 8PX ISBN 0 85646 119 2 (hardback) ISBN 0 85646 120 2 (paperback) Copyright© R. J. Hollingdale 1984 This book is published with financial assistance from The Arts Council of Great Britain Set in V-1-P Imprint by Fakenham Photosetting Ltd Fakenham, Norfolk Printed and bound in England by The Camelot Press Ltd, Southampton [Page 4] Contents INTRODUCTION Only a Fool! Only a Poet! Nur Narr! Nur Dichter! The Desert Grows: Woe to Him Who Harbours Deserts ... Die Wüste wächst: weh dem, der Wüsten birgt ... Last Will Letzter Wille Amid Birds of Prey Zwischen Raubvögeln The Fire-Signal Das Feuerzeichen The Sun Sinks Die Sonne sinkt Ariadne's Complaint Klage der Ariadne Fame and Eternity Ruhm und Ewigkeit Of the Poverty of the Richest Man Von der Armut des Reichsten NOTES 23 47 53 77 [Page 6] Introduction I FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE was born in 1844 and produced the philosophical writings on which his claim to attention mainly rests during the 1870s and 1880s; in 1889 he suffered a mental breakdown which terminated his productivity, and he died in 1900. His reputation, which now stands higher than it has ever done before, is that of a thinker whose insights and influence mark a new stage in the progress of Western thought, and it is now normal to rank him with Marx and Freud as one of the creators of the twentieth century; his earliest reputation, however, which he acquired during the 1890s, was that of a German philosopher who, very surprisingly, wrote poetry. He began writing poetry, in fact, when he was still a boy, well before he had any interest in matters that could be called, even in a juvenile sense, philosophical. His attempts at verse were paralleled by attempts at musical composition, and until about 1860 his whole development seemed to be that of a potential "artist" of some sort. Composition was, in the end, never more than a hobby (at bottom no more than an extension of improvising at the piano); but to the writing of poetry he gave from the first the kind of attention that could be called professional: he appears to have realized that, while the content of what he wrote at the age of fifteen could be only derivative and juvenile, this would later on take care of itself if only he was able to master the technique of writing in verse. He applied himself to this with genuine dedication and produced a body of "juvenilia" whose subject-matter is conventional and uninteresting but which shows a steady advance in technical ability that is clearly the consequence of deliberate application and practice. He then continued to write poetry, in a large range of styles, for the remainder of his active life. [Page 7] Most of the verse he wished to preserve he published within the framework of his philosophical works, the only exceptions being the collection Idyllen aus Messina (1882), which appeared in a magazine, and the Dionysos Dithyramben. The earliest large selection of his poems, published and hitherto unpublished, appeared in 1898 under the title Gedichte und Sprüche. Nietzsche's mature poetry is of four distinct kinds. Firstly, there are the brief, rhymed epigrammatic pieces: they make a single point in the fewest possible words, and are in essence a manifestation of the pleasure he always took in expressing himself aphoristically. "My ambition", he wrote in Twilight of the Idols, "is to say in ten sentences what everyone else says in a book- what everyone else does not say in a book"; and an "un-German" conciseness and presto is a general characteristic of his style even when he is not writing aphoristically. Here are some examples.

FUR TANZER Glattes Eis Ein Paradeis Für den, der gut zu tanzen weiß. (For Dancers Smooth ice [is] a paradise for him who knows how to dance well.)

MEINE HARTE Ich muß weg über hundert Stufen, Ich muß empor und hör euch rufen: "Hart bist du! Sind wir denn von Stein?" - Ich muß weg über hundert Stufen, Und niemand möchte Stufe sein. (My Kind of Hardness I have to pass over a hundred steps, I have to go up and I hear you cry: "How hard you are! Do you think we're made of stone?" I have to pass over a hundred steps, and no one wants to be a step.) [Page 8]

DERNACHSTE Nah hab den Nächsten ich nicht gerne: Fort mit ihm in die Höhe und Ferne! Wie wird er sonst zu meinem Sterne? - (My Neighbour I don't like my neighbour near me. Away with him into distant heights! How otherwise could he become my star?) Wer viel einst zu verkünden hat, schweigt viel in sich hinein. Wer einst den Blitz zu zünden hat, muß lange - Wolke sein. (He who has much to proclaim one day, stays silently much immersed within himself. He who has to kindle the lightning one day, must for a long time - be a cloud.)

Then there are the poems of more conventional length and subject whose most obvious model is the briefer poems of Heinrich Heine, of whom Nietzsche was an unqualified admirer ("The highest conception of the lyric poet was given me by Heinrich Heine ... He possessed that divine malice without which I cannot imagine perfection ... It will one day be said that Heine and I have been by far the first artists of the German language." - Ecce Homo):

Dorthin - will ich ; und ich traue Mir fortan und meinem Griff. Offen liegt das Meer, ins Blaue Treibt mein Genueser Schiff. Alles glänzt mir neu und neuer, Mittag schläft auf Raum und Zeit -: Nur dein Auge - ungeheuer Blickt michs an, Unendlichkeit! (I will away - and henceforth I trust in myself and in my own hands. Open lies the sea, my Genoese ship surges onward into the blue. Everything glitters new and newer, noontide sleeps on space and time: your eye alone - dreadfully it gazes upon me, infinity!) [Page 9] Thirdly, and among the best known, are the experiments in rhythmic effects: Mistral-Wind, du Wolken-Jäger, Triibsal-Morder, Himmels-Feger, Brausender, wie lieb ich dich! Sind wir zwei nicht eines Schoes Erstlingsgabe, eines Loses Vorbestimmte ewiglich? (Mistral wind, you hunter of clouds, killer of affliction, scourer of the skies, blusterer, how I love you! Are we two not the first fruit of one womb, eternally predestined for one fate? ["An den Mistral", opening stanza]) Ja I Ich wei, woher ich stamme I Ungesattigt gleich der Flamme Gliihe und verzehr ich mich. Licht wird alles, was ich fasse, Kahle alles, was ich lasse: Flamme bin ich sicherlich. (Yes, I know whence I have sprung I Insatiable as a flame I burn and consume myself! Whatever I seize hold on becomes light, whatever I leave, ashes: certainly I am a flame. - [Ecce Homo]) Lastly, in point both of time and poetic intensity, we have the free, "dithyrambic" verse of which the collection Dithyrambs of Dionysus is the final form. The Dithyrambs of Dionysus, in the precise shape in which we have it, is among Nietzsche's last productions and for that reason is usually accounted one of the "Werke des Zusammenbruchs" -the works of the final quarter of x 888 during which his mental breakdown of the beginning of x was palpably preparing itself (the other "Werke des Zusammenbruchs" are The Anti-Christ, Ecce Homo and Nietzsche contra Wagner). The nine poems which constitute the collection were composed over the six-year period IO [Page 10] I-88; in the summer of I Nietzsche collected them together into their present form and made fair copies of them with the clear intention of having them printed, but in the event held them back from publication until the very end of the year. On I January I 889 he added the dedication which prefaces the collection: they are probably the last words he wrote before he suffered, two days later, the breakdown which rendered him incapable of further rational thought. The accepted date of his mental collapse is 3 January I 889; but Nietzsche had been in a condition of pathological euphoria for the preceding three months at least and there is no question but that by the turn of the year he was already experiencing difficulty in ordering his thoughts rationally. The brief foreword to Nietzsche contra Wagner, for instance, which is dated "Christmas I 888", ends with three sentences which, though rational in themselves, have no obvious connection with what has gone before or with the subject of the book. It is a similar apparent disconnectedness - "apparent" because, of course, a connection does exist, though it is not a rational one - that characterizes the relationship between this dedication and the collection of poems which follows it. Except for his first book, The Birth of Tragedy, which is dedicated to Wagner, and the first edition of Human, All Too Human, which is dedicated "to the memory of Vol taire", none of Nietzsche's books bears a dedication, so that the presence of a dedication here is in itself abnormal. What is harder still to understand, however, is the identity of the dedicatee: the "poet of Isoline", Catulle Mendes, is one of the last of Nietzsche's contemporaries with whom you would think he felt any affinity; remembered today, if he is remembered at all, mainly as a leading Parisian ally and advocate of Wagner, and possibly as the author of Le Roi Vierge, a novel satirizing the world of Ludwig II of Bavaria and those, including Wagner, who belonged to it, Mendes seems quite out of place in the company of the. Dithyrambs of Dionysus and Nietzsche's professed admiration for him inexplicable. (Except for the fact that both II [Page 11] Mendes and Nietzsche had been personally acquainted with Wagner, I can discover no biographical connection between the two.) Here we are already close to the region of the irrational into which Nietzsche entered wholly on 3 January, and it is a perception of this fact that has led editors of the Dionysos-Dithyramben to omit the dedication to Catulle Mendes: it is first included in the edition of Karl Schlechta (Werke in drei Bänden, vol. 2, 1955), which I follow. Having printed it, however, it is probably all the more necessary for me to emphasize that the nine poems are not products of the last quarter of 1888 but of an indeterminate though certainly much longer period, and that anyone who sought in them signs of "insanity" would be looking in the wrong place. Movement towards "free verse" was inherent in Nietzsche's prose style - or, better, in one of several prose styles which succeeded or accompanied one another during the course of his development - from the time of Human, All Too Human (published 1878) onwards, when the derivative, rather heavyweight "nineteenth-century German" in which he had hitherto written gave way principally to a manner both older (recalling the lighter hand of the eighteenth century) and more modern (especially in its simplification of syntax and livelier tempo). Here is an example of it: It is probable that the objects of the religious, moral and aesthetic sensations belong only to the surface of things, while man likes to believe that here at least he is in touch with the world's heart; the reason he deludes himself is that these things produce in him such profound happiness and unhappiness, and thus he exhibits here the same pride as in the case of astrology. For astrology believes that the starry firmament revolves around the fate of man; the moral man, however, supposes that what he has essentially at heart must also constitute the essence and heart of things. [Human, All Too Human 4] [Page 12] But at the same time as he was writing in this clean, "objective" manner, he also found satisfaction in a style of extended metaphor which brings to mind all too vividly that of the "model essay" whose defining characteristic is that it expresses a single, simple idea in as florid, far fetched, wordy and "poetic" a manner as the writer can achieve. Here is an example: In the desert of science. - To the man of science on his unassuming and laborious travels, which must often enough be journeys through the desert, there appear those glittering mirages called "philosophical systems": with bewitching deceptive power they show the solution of all enigmas and the freshest draught of the true water of life to be near at hand; his heart rejoices, and it seems to the weary traveller that his lips already touch the goal of all the perseverance and sorrows of the scientific life, so that he involuntarily presses forward. There are other natures, to be sure, which stand still, as if bewildered by the fair illusion: the desert swallows them up and they are dead to science. Other natures again, which have often before experienced this subjective solace, may well grow exceedingly ill-humoured and curse the salty taste which these apparitions leave behind in the mouth and from which arises a raging thirst - without one having been brought so much as a single step nearer to any kind of spring. [Assorted Opinions and Maxims 31] In his case, however, the style of this passage and others like it is no more than a first, relatively primitive stage in the development of the style of compressed metaphor in which much of Thus Spoke Zarathustra (1883-85) is written: Life is a fountain of delight; but where the rabble also drinks all wells are poisoned . . . Many a one who went into the desert and suffered thirst with beasts of prey merely did not wish to sit around the cistern with dirty camel-drivers . . . Here, in the extremest height, the fountain of delight gushes up for me! And here there is a life at which no rabble drinks with me! . . . Gone is the lingering affliction of my spring! Gone the malice of my snowflakes in June! Summer have I become entirely, and summer-noonday! [Page 13] Rewritten in the style of "In the desert of science", this passage from Zarathustra would be extended to several pages; and the latter is in turn only a stage towards a style even more compressed in which almost every statement is metaphorical, and thus has in a sense to be interpreted before it can be understood, yet acts with the directness of impact normally attainable only by plain prose (i.e. prose whose implications are all on the surface): Let us look one another in the face. We are Hyperboreans - we know well enough how much out of the way we live. "Neither by land nor by sea shalt thou find the road to the Hyperboreans": Pindar already knew that of us. Beyond the North, beyond the ice, beyond death - our life, our happiness . . . We have discovered happiness, we know the road, we have found the exit out of whole millennia of labyrinth. Who else has found it? - Modern man perhaps? - "I know not which way to turn; I am everything that knows not which way to turn" - sighs modern man . . . It was from this modernity that we were ill - from lazy . peace, from cowardly compromise, from the whole virtuous uncleanness of modern Yes and No. This tolerance and largeness of heart which "forgives" everything because it "understands" everything is sirocco to us. Better to live among ice than among modern virtues and other south winds! . . . We were brave enough, we spared neither ourselves nor others: but for long we did not know where to apply our courage. We became gloomy, we were called fatalists. Our fatality - was the

plenitude, the tension, the blocking-up of our forces. We thirsted for lightning and action, of all things we kept ourselves furthest from the happiness of the weaklings, from "resignation" There was a thunderstorm in our air, the nature which we are grew dark- for we had no road. Formula 'of our happiness: a Yes, a No, a straight line, a goal [The Anti-Christ 1] In a passage such as this the distinction between "prose" and "poetry" has been narrowed to a merely technical one; and if a kind of poetry is envisaged - a kind usually called "free verse" - of which the only regulator is cadence, then there are many passages in Nietzsche's writings (principally though not only in Zarathustra) where all distinction between prose and poetry has disappeared: [Page 14] Allein bin ich wieder und will es sein, allein mit reinem Himmel und freiem Meere; und wieder. ist Nachmittag um mich. Allein bin ich wieder und will es sein, allein mit reinem Himmel und freiem Meere; und wieder ist Nachmittag um mich. (I am again alone and willingly so, alone with the pure sky and the open sea; and again it is afternoon around me. [Zarathustra III, von der Seligkeit wieder Willen]) Strongly cadenced prose and the style of compressed metaphor combined together define the "free verse" style of the Dithyrambs of Dionysus. Nietzsche's posthumously published notebooks contain many book-titles for which there are no corresponding books; and several of his published books received their final titles only after several provisional titles had been rejected. It is therefore not in itself surprising to find that the Dithyrambs of Dionysus too bore many other names before this name was settled upon. We can perhaps congratulate ourselves that "Songs of the Heights. Dedicated to all Men of the Future. By a Prophet" fell out of favour; and that the same fate befell "Dionysian Songs of a Prophet", "The Mirror of Prophecy" and "The Grave of God". Other rejected titles include "To the Higher Men. Proclamations" and "Midday and Eternity". The name of Zarathustra, Nietzsche's alter ego, appears in "The Eternal Recurrence. Zarathustra's Dances and Festivities", "The Songs of Zarathustra. Part One: The Path to Greatness" and "Zarathustra's Songs. Out of Seven Solitudes"; and it is probably a misunderstanding which has led some students of Nietzsche to suppose that the fourth part of Thus Spoke Zarathustra was at one time intended to bear the title "The Temptation of Zarathustra", since it seems [Page 15] more likely that this title too was in fact intended for the present book. Most of these titles exhibit an excessive, sometimes comic grandiloquence: yet the title Nietzsche finally affixed is, when correctly understood, more grandiloquent than any of them. A dithyramb is, in its primary meaning, a Greek choric hymn to Dionysus; by extension it comes to mean any Dionysian, or "Bacchanalian", hymn or poem. For Nietzsche, however, the word had acquired a larger meaning. In The Birth of Tragedy of 1872 he had tried to show that Greek tragedy, and thus the art of drama as such, originated in the ritual worship of Dionysus - in the dithyramb, in fact, in its original signification: the "chorus" of Greek tragedy as we have it is, he says, the "womb of the entire so-called dialogue, i.e. the entire world of the stage, of the actual drama". He proposes that drama was born out of the dithyramb in a manner analogous to the birth of lyric out of epic poetry: in the latter case the poet, invisible in the epic, emerges from it and makes himself the centre and subject of the poem; in the former the god materializes out of the throng of his worshippers. "It is an unimpeachable tradition that Greek tragedy in its oldest form depicted only the sufferings of Dionysus", he says, but goes on to assert that "Dionysus never ceased to be the tragic hero all the famous figures of the Greek stage ... are only masks of that original hero Dionysus." It is for this reason that he alludes to the Greek tragedian as the "Dionysian dramatist", a figure whom, in Richard Wagner in Bayreuth (published in 1876), he feels entitled to call the happiest of men and the one most beneficial to other men. Later, and possibly better known formulations of what he means by a "dithyramb" are in their essence no more than a repetition of this original assertion that the dithyramb is the language in which Dionysus speaks for and of himself. To the question who "Dionysus" is there are two answers. One is that he is a Greek god, and we shall take a look at this idea of him when discussing the one poem in [Page 16] this collection in which he appears (see Notes, p. 83). The other is that he is the force of life itself and that which evolving out of it, controls it. In The Birth of Tragedy, Dionysus is visualized both historically; as the object of a religious cult, and as an ideogram for the "uncivilized" energies for which the Dionysian rites were a release. At this stage, the force which civilizes these energies and bestows form upon them is called Apollo, and Greek tragedy is described as Apollo's harnessing of Dionysus. But it was a description with which Nietzsche was not satisfied for very long, since, while "Dionysus" was plainly "given" as a phenomenon whose existence was unquestionable, the origin, even the possibility of "Apollo" was unexplained. Whence comes the force which constrains and employs - "civilizes" - man's animal nature? To ask the question in that way exposes the presupposition behind it that there exists a dualism in nature; and Nietzsche's dissatisfaction with The Birth of Tragedy was rooted finally in a realization that he had assumed this without reflecting at all deeply upon its implications. Ultimately, "nature" must mean everything that exists or it must be one element of a dualism whose other element has to be something outside and beyond nature, and that something can be thought of only as God; but if, as Nietzsche did, one comes to find the idea of God untenable, then all the effects observed in nature must be produced by nature itself: in the language of The Birth of Tragedy, the force which harnesses Dionysus must also be Dionysus. The concept of "sublimation" thus became a necessary and key concept in Nietzsche's monistic philosophy of "will to power": his attempt to show that all the phenomena of human life are expressions of one basic drive at various levels of its sublimation. Within this system of thinking, "Dionysus" becomes an ideogram for sublimated will to power, and the "Dionysian man" is now a synonym for Obermensch, the man in whom will to power has been sublimated into self-mastery and self-creativity. [Page 17] The text of the Dionysos-Dithyramben printed here is that contained in the second volume of Nietzsche's Werke in drei Bänden edited by Karl Schlechta (1955). The collection was first published in 1891 together with the first public printing of Part Four of Thus Spoke Zarathustra; Schlechta's edition follows the texts reprinted in volume eight of the Gesamtausgabe in Grossoktav (1919). R. J. HOLLING DALE [Page 19] Dionysos-Dithyramben Indem ich der Menschheit eine unbegrenzte Wohltat erweisen will, gebe ich ihr meine Dithyramben. Ich Lege sie in die Hände des Dichters der Isoline, des grb}ten und ersten Satyr, der heute lebt - und nicht nur heute . . . DIONYSOS [Page 20] Dithyrambs of Dionysus In as much as I want to do mankind a boundless favour, I give them my dithyrambs. I place them in the hands of the poet of Isoline; the first and greatest satyr alive today - and not only today . . . DIONYSUS [Page 21] Nur Narr! Nur Dichter! Bei abgehellter Luft, wenn schon des Taus Trostung zur Erde niederquillt, unsichtbar, auch ungehört - denn zartes Schuhwerk trägt der Traster Tau gleich allen Trostmilden - gedenkst du da, gedenkst du, heißes Herz, wie einst du durstetest, nach himmlischen Tränen und Taugetraufel versengt und müde durstetest, dieweil auf gelben Graspfaden boshaft abendliche Sonnenblicke durch schwarze Bäume um dich liefen, blendende Sonnen-Glutblicke, schadenfrohe. "Der Wahrheit Freier - du?" so hohnten sie - "Nein! nur ein Dichter! ein Tier, ein listiges, raubendes, schleichendes, das lügen muß, das wissentlich, willentlich lügen muß, nach Beute lüestern, bunt verlarvt, such selbst zur Larve, sich selbst zur Beute, das - der Wahrheit Freier? . . . Nur Narr! nur Dichter! Nur Buntes redend, aus Narrenlarven bunt herausredend, herumsteigend auf lüernerischen Wortbrücken, auf Lügen-Regenbogen zwischen falschen Himmeln herumschweifend, herumschleichend - nur Narr! nur Dichter! . . . [Page 22] Only a Fool! Only a Poet! When the air grows clear, when the dew's comfort already rains down upon the earth, invisible and unheard - for dew the comforter wears tender shoes like all that gently comforts - do you then remember, do you, hot heart, how once you thirsted for heavenly tears and dew showers, thirsted, scorched and weary, while on yellow grassy paths wicked evening eyes of sunlight ran about you through dark trees, blinding, glowing sunlight-glances, malicious? "The wooer of truth? - you?" so they jeered "No! only a poet! an animal, cunning, preying, creeping, that has to lie, that knowingly, wilfully has to lie, lusting for prey, gaudily masked, a mask to itself, a prey to itself - that - the wooer of truth? . . . Only a fool! Only a poet! Talking only gaudy nonsense, gaudy nonsense from a fool's mask, climbing around on deceitful word-bridges, on mirage rainbows, between false skies, hovering, creeping - only a fool! only a poet! . . . [Page 23] Das - der

Wahrheit Freier? ... Nicht still, starr, glatt, kalt, zum Bilde worden, zur Gottes-Saule, nicht aufgestellt vor Tempeln, eines Gottes Tiirwart: nein! feindselig solchen Tugend-Standbildern, in jeder Wildnis heimischer als in Tempeln, voll Katzen-Mutwillens durch jedes Fenster springend husch! in jeden Zufall, jedem Urwalde zuschniiffelnd, daB du in U rwaldern unter buntzottigen Raubtieren siindlich gesund und schon und bunt lief est, mit liisternen Lefzen, selig-hohnisch, selig-hollisch, selig-blutigierig, raubend, schleichend, litgend lief est ... Oder dem Adler gleich, der lange, lange starr in Abgriinde blickt, in seine Abgriinde ... - o wie sie sich hier hinab, hinunter, hinein, · in immer tief ere Tief en ringeln ! - Dann, plotzlich, geraden Flugs, geziickten Zugs au£ Liimmer stoBen, jach hinab, heiBhungrig, nach Lammern liistern, gram allen Lamms-Seelen, grimmig gram allem, was blickt tugendhaft, schaf massig, krauswollig, dumm, mit Lammsmilch-Wohlwollen ... [Page 24] That - the wooer of truth? ... Not still, stiff, smooth, cold, become an image, become a god's statue, not set up before temples, a god's watchman: no! enemy to such statues of truth, more at home in any wilderness than in temples, full of cat's wantonness, leaping through every window, swiftly! into every chance, sniffing out every jungle, that you may run, sinfully healthy and gaudy and fair, in jungles among gaudy-speckled beasts of prey, run with lustful lips, happily jeering, happily hellish, happily blood-thirsty, preying, creeping, lying . . . Or like the eagle staring long, long into abysses, into its own abysses ... - oh how they circle down, under and in, into ever deeper depths! - Then, suddenly, with straight aim, quivering flight, they pounce on lambs, headlong down, ravenous, lusting for lambs, angry at aU lamb-souls, fiercely angry at all that looks virtuous, sheepish, curly-woolled, stupid with lamb's milk kindness ... [Page 25] Also adlerhaft, pantherhaft sind des Dichters Sehnsiichte, sind deine Sehnsiichte unter tausend Larven, du Narr! du Dichter ! . . . Der du den Menschen schautest so Gott als Schaf-, den Gott zerreißen im Menschen wie das Schaf im Menschen und zerreiBend l, o, chen - das, das ist deine Seligkeit, eines Panthers und Adlers Seligkeit, eines Dichters und Narren Seligkeit!" ... Bei abgehellter Luft, wenn schon des Monds Sichel griin zwischen Purpurroten und neidisch hinschleicht, - dem Tage feind, mit jedem Schritte heimlich an Rosen-Hiingematten hinsichelnd, bis sie sinken, nachtabwirts blaB hinabsinken: so sank ich selber einstmals aus meinem Wahrheits-Wahnsinne, aus meinen Tages-Sehnsiichten, des Tages miide, krank vom Lichte, - sank abwirts, abendwirts, schattenwirts, von einer Wahrheit verbrannt und durstig -gedenkst du noch, gedenkst du, heiBes Herz, wie da du durstetest? - daJJ ich verbannt sei von aller Wahrheit! Nur Narr! Nur Dichter! . . . [Page 26] Thus, eaglelike, pantherlike, are the poet's desires, are your de;ires under a thousand masks, you fool! you poet! . . . You who saw man as god and sheep - to rend the god in man as the sheep in man, and rending to laugh - that, that is your blessedness, a panther's and eagle's blessedness, a poet's and a fool's blessedness!" . . . When the air grows clear, when the moon's sickle already creeps along, green, envious, in the purple twilight, - enemy to day, with every step secretly sickling down the hanging rose-gardens, until they sink, sink down, pale, down to night: so I myself sank once from my delusion of truth, from my daytime longings, weary of day, sick with light - sank downwards, down to evening, down to shadows, scorched and thirsty with one truth - do you remember, do you, hot heart, how you thirsted then? - that I am banished from all truth! Only a fool! Only a poet! . . . [Page 27] Die Wüste wiichst: weh dem, der Wusten birgt Ha! Feierlich! ein wiirdiger Anfang ! afrikanisch f eierlich ! eines Lowen wiirdig oder eines moralischen Briillaffen . . . - aber nichts fiir euch, ihr allerliebsten Freundinnen, zu deren FiiBen mir, einem Europaer unter Palmen, zu sitzen vergonnt ist. Sela. Wunderbar wahrlich! Da sitze ich nun, der Wiiste nahe und bereits so ferne wieder der Wiiste, auch in nichts noch verwiistet: namlich hinabgeschluckt von dieser kleinen Oasis - sie sperrte gerade gahnend ihr liebliches Maul auf, das wohlriechendste aller Maulchen: da fiel ich hinein, hinab, hindurch- unter euch, ihr allerliebsten Freundinnen ! Sela. Heil, Heil jenem Walfische, wenn er also es seinem Gaste wohlsein lieb ! - ihr versteht meine gelehrte Anspielung? . . . Heil seinem Bauche, wenn es also ein so lieblicher Oasis-Bauch war, [Page 28] The Desert Grows/; Woe to Him Who Harbours Deserts . . . Ha! Solemnly! a worthy beginning! solemn in an African way! worthy of a lion or of a moral screech-ape . . . - but it is not for you, you dearest maidens, at whose feet I, a European among palm-trees, am permitted to sit. Selah. Wonderful, truly! Here I now sit, beside the desert, and yet so far from the desert, and not at all devastated: for I am swallowed down by this little oasis - it simply opened, yawning, its sweetest mouth, the sweetest-smelling of all little mouths: then ffell in, down, straight through- among you, you dearest maidens! Selah. All hail to that whale if it made things so pleasant for its guest! - you understand my learned allusion? . . . All hail to its belly if it was as sweet an oasis-belly [Page 29] gleich diesem: was ich aber in Zweifel ziehe. Dafiir komme ich aus Europa, das zweifelsiichtiger ist als alle Eheweibchen. Moge Gott es bessem ! Amen. Da sitze ich nun, in dieser kleinsten Oasis, einer Dattel gleich, braun, durchsiiBt, goldschwiirig, liistem nach einem runden Madchen-Maule, mehr aber noch nach madchenhaften eiskalten schneeweiBen schneidigen BeiBzahn: nach denen niimlich lechzt das Herz allen heiBen Datteln. Sela. Den genannten Siidfriichten iihnlich, allzuihnlich liege ich hier, von kleinen Fliigelkaf em umtiinzt und umspielt, insgleichen von noch kleineren torichterem boshafteren Wiinschen und Einfuillen, - umlagert von euch, ihr stummen, ihr ahnungsvollen Miidchen-Katzen Dudu und Suleika - umsphinxst, daB ich in ein Wort viel Gefiihle stop£ e (- vergebe mir Gott diese Sprachsiinde ! . . .) - sitze hier, die beste Luft schniiffelnd, Paradiieiles-Luft wahrlich, lichte leichte Luft, goldgestreifte, so gute Luft nur je vom Monde herabfiel, sei es aus Zufall [Page

30] as this is: which, however, I call in question. Since I come from Europe, which is more sceptical than any little wife. May God improve it! Amen. Here I sit now in this smallest oasis like a date, brown, sweet, oozing golden, thirsting for a girl's rounded mouth, but thirsting more for girlish, ice-cold, snow-white, cutting teeth: for these do the hearts of all hot dates lust. Selah. Like, all too like that aforesaid southern fruit do I lie here, by little flying insects danced and played around, and by even smaller, more foolish and more wicked desires and notions - besieged by you, you silent girl-kittens full of misgivings, Dudu and Suleika - sphinxed round, that I may cram much feeling into two words: (- may God forgive me this sin of speech! . . .) - I sit here sniffing the finest air, air of Paradise, truly, bright, buoyant air, gold-streaked, as good air as ever fell from the moon - came it by chance, 3 1 [Page 31] oder geschah es aus Obermute? wie die alten Dichter erzählen. Ich Zweifler aber ziehe es in Zweifel, dafür komme ich aus Europa, das zweifelsüchtiger ist als alle Eheweibchen. Moge Gott es bessern ! Amen. Diese schönste Luft atmend, mit Niistern geschwellt gleich Bechern, ohne Zukunft, ohne Erinnerungen, so sitze ich hier, ihr allerliebsten Freundinnen, und sehe der Palme zu, wie sie, einer Tänzerin gleich, sich biegt, und schmiegt und in der Hüfte wiegt - man tut es mit, sieht man lange zu . . . einer Tänzerin gleich, die, wie mir scheinen will, zu lange schon, gefährlich lange immer, immer nur auf einem Beinchen stand? - da vergaß sie darob, wie mir scheinen will, das andre Beinchen? Vergebens wenigstens suchte ich das vermißte Zwilling-Kleinod - nämlich das andre Beinchen - in der heiligen Nähe ihres allerliebsten, allerzierlichsten Fächer- und Flatter- und Flitter-Rockchens. Ja, wenn ihr mir, ihr schönen Freundinnen, ganz glauben wollt: sie hat es verloren . . . Hu! Hu! Hu! Hu! Huh! . . . Es ist dahin, auf ewig dahin, das andre Beinchen ! O schade um dies liebliche andre Beinchen ! [Page 32] or did it happen by wantonness, as the old poets tell? I, however, call it in question, since I come from Europe, which is more sceptical than any little wife. May God improve it! Amen. Drinking in this finest air, with nostrils Swollen like goblets, without future, without memories, thus do I sit here, you dearest maidens, and regard the palm-tree, and watch how, like a dancer, it bends and bows and sways at the hips - if you watch long you follow suit . . . like a dancer who, it would seem, has stood long, dangerously long, always on one little leg? - so that she has forgotten, it would seem, the other leg? At least, in vain I sought the missing twin-jewel - that is, the other leg in the sacred vicinity of her dearest, daintiest fluttering, flickering, fan-swirling little skirt. Yes, if you would quite believe me, you sweet maids: she has lost it . . . Oh dear! oh dear! oh dear! oh dear! oh dear! It has gone, gone for ever, the other leg ! Oh, what a shame about that other dear leg! [Page 33] Wo - mag es wohl weilen und verlassen trauern, dieses einsame Beinchen? In Furcht vielleicht vor einem grimmigen gelben blondgelockten Lowen-Untiere? oder gar schon abgenagt, abgeknapperterbarmlich! wehe! wehe! abgeknabbert! Sela. O weint mir nicht, weiche Herzen !

 Weint mir nicht, ihr Dattel-Herzen ! Milch-Busen ! Ihr SiiBholz-Herz Beutelchen ! Sei ein Mann, Suleika! Mut! Mut! W eine nicht mehr, bleiche Dudu ! - Oder sollte vielleicht etwas Starkeres, Herz-Starkendes hier am Platze sein? ein gesalbter Spruch? ein feierlicher Zuspruch? . . . Ha! Herauf, Wiirde!
 Blase, blase wieder, Blasebalg der Tugend ! Ha! N och einmal briillen, moralisch briillen, als moralischer Lowe vor den Tochten der Wiiste briillen! - Denn Tugend-Geheul, ihr allerliebsten Madchen, ist mehr als alles Europaer-Inbrunst, Europaer-HeiBhunger ! [Page 34] Where - can it be now, sorrowing and forsaken, that lonely leg? Perhaps in fear before an angry, blond-maned lion-monster? or perhaps even gnawed off, broken in pieces - pitiable, alas! alas!
 shattered in pieces! Selah. Oh do not weep, gentle hearts! Do not weep, you date-hearts! milk-bosoms! You heart-caskets of sweetwood ! Be a man, Suleika!
 Courage! Courage! Weep no more, pale Dudu! - Or would perhaps something more bracing, heart-bracing, be in place here? an anointed proverb? a solemn exhortation? . . . Ha! Up, dignity! Blow, blow again, bellows of virtue ! Ha! Roar once again, roar morally, roar like a moral lion before the daughters of the desert!
 - For virtuous howling, you dearest maidens, is loved best of all by European ardour, European appetite! [Page 35] Und da stehe ich schon, als Europaer, ich kann nicht anders, Gott helfe mir ! Amen! Die Wiiste wachst: web dem, der Wiisten birgt! Stein knirscht an Stein, die Wiiste schlingt und wiirgt. Der ungeheure Tod blickt gliihend braun und kaut - , sein Leben ist sein Kaun . . .
 VergijJ nicht, Mensch, den Wollust ausgelobt: du - hist der Stein, die Wiiste, hist der Tod . . . [Page 36] And here I stand already, as European I cannot do otherwise, so help me God! Amen! The desert grows: woe to him who harbours deserts! Stone grates on stone, the desert swallows down. And death that chews, whose life is chewing, gazes upon it, monstrous, glowing brown . . . Consumed by lust, O Man, do not forget: you - are the stone, the desert, you are death . . .
 [Page 37] Letzter Wille So sterben, wie ich ihn einst sterben sah - , den Freund, der Blitze und Blicke gottlich in meine dunkle J ugend war£: - mutwillig und tie£, in der Schlacht ein Tanzer - , unter Kriegern der Heiterste, unter Siegern der Schwerste, auf seinem Schicksal ein Schicksal stehend, hart, nachdenklich, vordenklich- : erzitternd darob, daB er siegte, jauchzend dariiber, daB er sterbend siegte - : befehlend, indem er starb, - und er befahl, daB man vernichte . . . So sterben, wie ich ihn einst sterben sah: siegend, vernichtend . . . [Page 38] Last Will . So to die as once I saw him die - the friend who like a god cast glances of lightning into my dark youth: - wanton, profound, in the slaughter a dancer - of fighters the cheerfulest, of victors the most difficult, a destiny standing upon his destiny, firm, reflecting, prelecting - : trembling with joy of victory, rejoicing that he died in victory: by dying, commanding - and he commanded destruction . . . So to die as once I saw him die: victorious, destroying . . . [Page

39] Zwischen Raubvögeln Wer hier hinab will, wie schnell schluckt den die Tiefe ! - Aber du, Zarathustra, liebst den Abgrund noch, tust der Tanne es gleich? - Die schlägt Wurzeln, wo der Fels selbst schauernd zur Tiefe blickt -, die zögert an Abgründen, wo alles rings hinunter will: zwischen der Ungeduld wilden Gerölls, stürzenden Bachs geduldig duldend, hart, schweigsam, einsam . . . Einsam! Wer wagte es auch, hier zu Gast zu sein, dir Gast zu sein? . . . Ein Raubvogel vielleicht, der hängt sich wohl dem standhaften Dulder schadenfroh ins Haar, mit irrem Geliichter, einem Raubvogel-Geliichter . . . Wozu so standhaft? - höhnt er grausam: man muß Flügel haben, wenn man den Abgrund liebt . man muß nicht hängen bleiben, wie, du, Gehängter! - [Page 40] Amid Birds of Prey He who descends here how soon the depths devour him! - But you, Zarathustra, you love the abyss, as the fir-tree does? - It strikes roots where the cliff itself shudders when it looks below - it lingers at abysses where everything wants to plunge down: amid the impatience of savage rocks and precipitate streams calmly forbearing, hard, silent, solitary . . . Solitary! But who would dare to visit here, to visit you? . . . A bird of prey perhaps, he might hang, with crazy laughter, a bird of prey's laughter, malicious, in the patient stoic's hair . . . Why so steadfast? - he cruelly mocks: if you love abysses you must have wings . . . and not just hang there, as you do, hanged man! - [Page 41] O Zarathustra, grausamster Nimrod! Jüngst Jäger noch Gottes, das Fangnetz aller Tugend, der Pfeil des Bösen! - Jetzt- von dir selber erjagt, deine eigene Beute, in dich selber eingebohrt . . . Jetzt- einsam mit dir, zwiesam im eignen Wissen, zwischen hundert Spiegeln vor dir selbstdalsch, zwischen hundert Erinnerungen ungewiß, an jeder Wunde mild, an jedem Froste kalt, in eignen Stricken gewürgt, Selbstkenner I Selbstkenner I Was bandest du dich mit dem Strick deiner Weisheit? Was locktest du dich ins Paradies der alten Schlange? Was schlichst du dich ein in dich - in dich? . . . Ein Kranker nun, der an Schlangengift krank ist; ein Gefanger nun, der das harteste Los zog: im eignen Schachte gebückt arbeitend, in dich selber eingehohlt, dich selber angrabend, [Page 42] O Zarathustra, cruellest Nimrod! Lately God's huntsman, net to net all virtue, arrow of the wicked! - Now- hunted down by yourself, your own booty, burrowed into yourself . . . Now- alone with yourself, twofold in self-knowledge, amid a hundred mirrors false before yourself, amid a hundred memories uncertain, wearied by every wound, frozen by every frost, choked in your own net, self-knower I self-hangman! Why did you trap yourself in your wisdom? Why did you lure yourself into the old serpent's garden? why did you creep into yourself? . . . Sick now of the serpent's poison; a prisoner now with the hardest fate: labouring bowed.. In your own mine, self-excavated, digging into yourself, [Page 43] unbehilflich, steif, ein Leichnam -, von hundert Lasten überlastet, von dir überlastet, ein Wissender! ein Selbstkenner ! der weise Zarathustra ! . . . Du suchtest die schwerste Last: da fandest du dich - du wirfst dich nicht ab von dir . . . Lauernd, kauernnd, einer, der schon nicht mehr aufrecht steht ! Du verwachst mir noch mit deinem Grabe, verwachsener Geist! . . . Und jingst noch so stolz, auf allen Stelzen deines Stolzes ! Jjingst noch der Einsiedler ohne Gott, der Zweisiedler mit dem Teufel, der scharlachne Prinz jedes Übermuts ! . . .

 Jetzt- zwischen zwei Nichtse eingekriimmt, ein Fragezeichen, ein miides Ratsel - ein Ratsel für Raubvogel . . . - sie werden dich schon "losen", sie hungern schon nach deiner "Losung", sie flattern schon um dich, ihr Ratsel, um dich, Gehenkter! . . . 0 Zarathustra! . . . Selbstkenner! . . . Selbsthenker! . . . [Page 44] awkward, stiff, a corpse- overtowered by a hundred burdens, overburdened with yourself, a man of knowledge who knows himself! the wise Zarathustra ! . . . You sought the heaviest burdens and you found yourself- it is a burden you cannot throw off . . . Lying in wait, crouching, one who is no longer upright! In form like your own grave, deformed spirit! . . . And lately still so proud, still on the stilts of your pride! Lately still the godless hermit, the dweller with the devil, the high haughty scarlet prince! . . . Now- contorted between two nothings, a question-mark, a weary riddle - a riddle for birds of prey . . . - they will soon "resolve" you, already they thirst for your "resolution", already they flutter about you, their riddle, about you, hanged man! . . . 0 Zarathustra! . . . Self-knower! . . .
 Self-hangman! . . . [Page 45] Das Feuerzeichen Hier, wo zwischen Meeren die
 Insel wuchs, ein Opferstein jiih hinaufgetiirmt, hier ziindet sich unter schwarzem Himmel Zarathustra seine Hohenfeuer an, - Feuerzeichen für verschlagene Schiffe er, Fragezeichen für solche, die Antwort haben ... Diese Flamme mit weißgrauem Bauche - in kalte Feuerne ziingelt ihre Gier, nach immer reineren Rohen biegt sie den Hals - eine Schlange gerade aufgerichtet vor Ungeduld:
 dieses Zeichen stellte ich vor mich hin. Meine Seele selber ist diese Flamme: unersättlich nach neuen Feuerne lodert aufwärts, aufwärts ihre stille Glut. Was floh Zarathustra vor Tier und Menschen? Was entlief er jiih allem festen Lande?
 Sechs Einsamkeiten kennt er schon - , aber das Meer selbst war nicht genug ihm einsam, die Insel lieb ihn steigen, auf dem Berg wurde er zur Flamme, nach einer siebenten Einsamkeit wirft er suchend jetzt die Angel über sein Haupt. Ver-erschlagene Schiffe er! Triimmer alter Sterne ! Ihr Meere der Zukunft!
 Unausgeforschte Himmel! nach allem Einsamen werfe ich jetzt die Angel: gebt Antwort auf die Ungeduld der Flamme, fangt mir, dem Fischer auf hohen Bergen, meine. siebente, letzte Einsamkeit!-- [Page 46] The Fire-Signal Here, where amid seas the island rose, a steeply towering sacrificial stone, here beneath a black sky Zarathustra lit for himself his mountain fire - a fire-signal for seamen blown off course, a question-mark for those who possess answers ... This flame with light-grey belly - its eager tongue flicking the chill horizon, its neck arched out to ever purer heights - a snake raised upright with impatience: this signal I set up before me. My soul, my soul itself, is this flame: insatiable for new horizons its silent glowing passion blazes upward. Why did Zarathustra flee from beasts and men? Why did he flee from all firm land? Six solitudes he knew already - but the sea itself had too little solitude for him, the island welcomed him, and on the 11}.OU!).tain he became a flame, and when now he whirls his fishing-line it is a seventh solitude he seeks to catch .. Seamen blown off course! Rubble of old stars! You seas of the future! Unexplored sky ! to all that knows solitude do I now throw this line: give answer to the flame's impatience, catch me, the fisherman on high mountains, my seventh, final solitude! - - [Page 47] Die Sonne sinkt I Nicht lange durstest du noch, verbranntes Herz! Verheißung ist in der Luft, aus unbekannten Mündern bläst mich's an, - die große Kühle kommt . . . Meine Sonne stand heiß über mir im Mittage: seid mir gegrißt, daß ihr kommt, ihr plotzlichen Winde, ihr kühlen Geister des Nachmittags ! Die Luft geht fremd und rein. Schielt nicht mit schiefem Verführerblick die Nacht mich an? . . . Bleib stark, mein tapfres Herz! Frag nicht: warum? Tag meines Lebens! die Sonne sinkt. Schon steht die glatte Flut vergilbet. Warm atmet der Fels: schlief wohl zu Mittag das Glück auf ihm seinen Mittagsschlaf? In grünen Lichtern spielt Glück noch der braune Abgrund herauf. [Page 48] The Sun Sinks I You shall not thirst much longer, scorched heart! A promise is in the air, from mouths unknown it wafts to me - great coolness comes . . . My sun stood hot above me at midday: welcome, sudden winds, now you have come, cool spirits of the afternoon! The air grows strange and clean. Does night not look at me with sidelong seductive eyes? . . . Stay strong, brave heart! Do not ask why. - Day of my life! the sun sinks. Already the smooth flood stands gilded. The cliffs breathe warmth: did happiness at midday sleep there its midday sleep? From the brown abyss light and green it still dazzles up. [Page 49] Tag meines Lebens! gen Abend geht! Schon gliht dein Auge halbgebrochen, schon quillt deines Taues Tranengetraufel, schon läuft still über weiße Meere deiner Liebe Purpur, deine letzte zögernde Seligkeit. Heiterkeit, gildene, komm! du des Todes heimlichster, süßester Vergnügen ! - Lief ich zu rasch meines Wegs? Jetzt erst, wo der Fuß müde ward, holt dein Blick mich noch ein, holt dein Glück mich noch ein. Rings nur Welle und Spiel. Was je schwer war, sank in blaue Vergessenheit - müde steht nun mein Kahn, Sturm und Fahrt - wie verlernt er das ! Wunsch und Hoffen ertrank, glatt liegt Seele und Meer. Siebente Einsamkeit ! Nie empfand ich näher mir süße Sicherheit, warmer der Sonne Blick. - Gliht nicht das Eis meiner Gipfel noch? Silbern, leicht, ein Fisch schwimmt nun mein Nachen hinaus . . . [Page 50] Day of my life! it is almost evening! Already the glow of your eye is half-dimmed, already the tears of your dew are falling, already there runs softly on the white sea your love's purple, your final hesitating bliss. Gilded cheerfulness, come! sweetest, secretest foretaste of death! - Did I run my course too quickly? Only now, when my foot has grown weary, does your glance overtake me, does your happiness overtake me. Only playing of waves all around. Whatever was hard has sunk into blue oblivion - my boat now lies idle. Storm and voyaging -all forgotten now! Desire and hope have drowned, smooth lie soul and sea. Seventh solitude! Never such sweet security, never such sunlight warmth. - Does the ice of my summit still glow? Silver, light, a fish my little craft now swims out ...

 [Page 51] Klage der Ariadne Wer warmt mich, wer liebt mich noch? Gebt heiBe Hande ! gebt Herzens-Kohlenbecken ! Hingestreckt, schauernd, Halbtotem gleich, dem man die FiBe warmt, geschiittelt ach ! von unbekannten Fiebern, zitternd vor spitzen eisigen Frostpfeilen, von dir gejagt, Gedanke ! U nnennbal" h ! V erhiillter, Entsetzlicher ! Du Jager hinter Wolken!
 Darniedergeblitzt von dir, du hohnisch Auge, das mich aus Dunklem anblickt !
 So liege ich, biege mich, winde mich, gequalt von allen ewigen Martern, getroffen von dir, grausamster Jager, du unbekannter - Gott . . . Triff tie£ er! Triff einmal noch ! Zerstich, zerstich dies Herz! Was soll dies Martern mit zahnestumpf en Pf eilen? Was blickst du wieder, der Menschen-Qual nicht miide, mit schadenfrohen Gotter-Blitz-Augen? Nicht toten willst du, nur martern, martern? Wozu - mich martern, du schadenfroher unbekannter Gott? Haha! du schleichst heran bei solcher Mitternacht? . . . [Page 52] Ariadne's C omplint Who still warms me, who still loves me? Off er me hot hands! offer me coalwarmers for the heart! Spread-eagled, shuddering, like one half-dead whose feet are warmed - shaken, alas ! by unknown fevers, trembling with sharp icy frost-arrows, pursued by you, my thought! Unutterable, veiled, terrible one !
 Huntsman behind the clouds! Struck down by your lightning-bolt, you mocking eye that stares at me from the darkness ! Thus I lie, bend myself, twist myself, tortured by every eternal torment, smitten by you, cruel huntsman, you unknown
 -god .. Strike deeper! Strike once again ! Sting and sting, shatter this heart t What means this torment with blunt arrows? Why do you look down, unwearied of human pain, with malicious divine flashing eyes? Will you not kill, only torment, torment? Why - torment me, you malicious, unknown god? Ha ha! Are you stealing near at such a midnight hour? ... [Page 53] Was willst du? Sprich!
 Du drangst mich, driickst mich, Ha! schon viel zu nahe ! Du horst mich atmen, du behorchst mein Herz, du Eifersiichtiger ! - worauf doch eifersiichtig? Weg!
 Weg! wozu die Leiter? willst du hinein, ins Herz, einsteigen, in meine heimlichsten Gedanken einsteigen? Schamloser ! U nbekannter ! Dieb ! Was willst du dir erstehlen? Was willst du dir erhochen? Was willst du dir erfoltern, du Folterer du - Renker-Gott! Oder soll ich, dem Hunde gleich, vor dir mich walzen? Hingebend, begeistert auBer mir dir Liebe - zuwedeln? Umsonst ! Stich weiter ! Grausamster Stachel ! Kein Hund- dein Wild nur bin ich, grausamster Jager! deine stolzeste Gefagne; du Rauber hinter Wolken . . . Sprich endlich ! Du Blitz-Verhiillter ! U nbekannter ! sprich ! Was willst du, Wegelagerer, von - mir? . . . Wie? Losegeld? [Page 54] What do you want? Speak! You oppress me, press me, Ha! far too closely! You hear me breathing, you overhear my heart, you jealous god! - yet jealous of what? Away! Away! Why the ladder? Would you climb into my heart, climb into my most secret thoughts? Shameless, unknown thief! What would you get by stealing? What would you get by listening? What would you get by torturing, you torturer? you - hangman-god! Or shall I, like a dog, roll before you? Surrendering, raving with rapture, wag - love to you? In vain! Strike again, cruellest goad ! Not dog- I am only your game, cruellest huntsman! your proudest prisoner, you robber behind the clouds . . . For the last time, speak! Veiled in lightning! Unknown! speak! What do you want, way layer, from - .ne? What? Ransom? [Page 55] Was willst du Losegelds? Verlange viel - das rat mein Stolz! und rede kurz - das rat mein andrer Stolz! . Haha! Mich-willst du? mich? mich- ganz? ... Haha! Und marterst mich, Narr, der du hist, zermarterst meinen Stolz? Gib Liebe mir - wer warmt mich noch? wer liebt mich noch? gib heie Hande, gib Herzens-Kohlenbecken, gib mir, der Einsamsten, die Eis, ach ! siebenfaches Eis nach Feinden selber, nach Feinden schmachten lehrt, gib, ja ergib, grausamster Feind, mir- dich! ... Davon! Da floh er selber, mein einziger Geno, mein groer Feind, mein U nbekannter, mein Henker-Gott! ... Nein! komm zuriick! Mit allen deinen Martern ! All meine Tranen laufen zu dir den Lauf und meine letzte Herzensflamme dir gliiht sie auf. O komm zuriick, mein unbekannter Gott! mein Schmerz! mein letztes Gliick! ... [Page 56] How much ransom? Demand much - thus speaks my pride! and be brief - thus speaks my other pride! Ha! ha! Me - you want me? me - all of me? . . . Ha ha! And you torment me, fool that you are, you rack my pride? Offer me love - who still warms me? who still loves me? offer me hot hands, offer me coal-warmers for the heart, offer me, the most solitary, whom ice, alas! sevenfold ice has taught to long for enemies, even for enemies, offer, yes yield to me, cruellest enemy - yourself! . . . He is gone ! He has fled, my sole companion, my great enemy, my unknown, my hangman-god! . . . No! come back! with all your torments! All the streams of my tears run their course to you! and the last flame of my heart, it burns up to you. Oh come back, my unknown god! my pain! my last happiness! . . . [Page 57] Ein Blitz. Dionysos wird in smaragdener Schonheit sichtbar. DIONYSOS : Sei klug, Ariadne! . . . Du hast kleine Ohren, du hast meine Ohren: steck ein kluges Wort hinein ! - MuB man sich nicht erst hassen, wenn man sich lieben soll? . . . !eh bin dein Labyrinth . . . [Page 58] A flash of lightning. Dionysus becomes, visible in emerald beauty. · DIONYSUS : Be wise, Ariadne! . . . You have little ears; you have ears like mine: let some wisdom into them! - Must we not first hate ourself if we are to love ourself? . . . I am thy labyrinth . . . [Page 59] Ruhm und Ewigkeit I Wie lange sitztest du schon auf deinem MiBgeschick? Gib acht! du brütest mir noch ein Ei, ein Basilisken-Ei aus deinem langen Jammer aus. Was schleicht Zarathustra entlang dem Berge? - MiBtrauisch, geschwiirig, duster, ein langer Lauerer - , aber plotzlich, ein Blitz, hell, furchtbar, ein Schlag gen Himmel aus dem Abgrund: - dem Berge selber schiittelt sich das Eingeweide . . . Wo HaB und Blitzstrahl Eins ward, ein Fluch

- , auf den Bergen haust jetzt Zarathustras Zorn, eine Wetterwolke schleicht er seines Wegs. Verkrieche sich, wer eine letzte Decke hat! Ins Bett mit euch, ihr Zartlinge ! Nun rollen Donner iiber die Gewolbe, nun zittert, was Gebalk und Mauer ist, nun zucken Blitze und schwefelgelbe Wahrheiten - Zarathustraflucht . . . [Page 60] Fame and Eternity I How long have you already brooded upon your misfortune? Take care! you will yet hatch an egg, a basilisk egg, out of your protracted misery. Why does Zarathustra slink along beside the mountain? Mistrustful, ulcerous, gloomy, long lying in wait - then suddenly, a lightning-flash, bright, fearful, a blow towards the sky from the abyss: - the mountain itself feels its intestines shake . . . Where hate and lightning became one, a curse - on the mountains Zarathustra's wrath now makes its home, slinks along its path a thundercloud. Whoever has a shelter, let him seek it! Away with you to bed, you weak,lings! Now thunders roll over the vaulted roofs, now trembles what is wall and timber-work, now lightnings flash and brimstone-coloured truths - Zarathustra curses . . . [Page 61] Diese Miinze, mit der alle Welt bezahlt, Ruhm - , mit Handschuhen fasse ich diese Miinze an, mit Ekel trete ich sie unter mich. Wer will bezahlt sein? Die Kauflichen . . . Wer feil steht, greift mit fetten Handen nach diesem Allerwelts-Blechklingklang Ruhm! - Willst du sie kaufen? Sie sind alle kauflich. Aber biete viel ! klinge mit vollem Beutel! - du starkst sie sonst, du starkst sonst ihre Tugend . . . Sie sind alle tugendhaft. Ruhm und Tugend- das reimt sich. So lange die Welt lebt, zahlt sie Tugend-Geplapper mit Ruhm-Geklapper - , die Welt lebt von diesem Larm . . . Vor allen Tugendhaften will ich schuldig sein, schuldig heiBen mit jeder groBen Schuld! Vor allen Ruhms-Schalltrichtern wird mein Ehrgeiz zum Wurm - , unter solchen geliistets mich, der Niedrigste zu sein . . . [Page 62] This coin with which all the world makes payment, Jame- I grasp this coin with gloves, with loathing I trample it beneath me. Who wants to be paid? The buyable . . . He who is for sale reaches with greasy hands for this everybodys-jingling-tinpot fame! - Do you want to buy them? They are all buyable. But off er much! jingle a full purse! - or you will fortijy them, you will fortify their virtue . . . They are all virtuous. Fame and virtue - they go together. For as long as the world lives it pays chatter of virtue with clatter of fame - the world lives by this racket . . . To all the virtuous I want to be in debt, of every great offence called guilty! Before all bell-mouths of fame my ambition becomes a worm - of such I desire to be the lowest . . . [Page 63] Diese Miinze, mit der alle Welt bezahlt, Ruhm - , mit Handschuhen fasse ich diese Miinze an, mit Ekel trete ich sie unter mich. Still! - Von groBen Dingen - ich sehe GroBes ! - soll man schweigen oder groB reden: rede groB, meine entziickte Weisheit! Ich sehe hinauf - dort rollen Lichtmeere : o Nacht, o Schweigen, o totenstiller Liirm! . . . Ich sehe ein Zeichen - , aus fernsten Fernen sinkt langsam funkelnd ein Sternbild gegen mich . . . Hochstes Gestirn des Seins ! Ewiger Bildwerke Tafel ! Du kommst zu mir? - Was keiner erschaut hat, deine stumme Schonheit - wie? sie flieht vor meinen Blicken nicht? - Schild der Notwendigkeit ! Ewiger Bildwerke Tafel ! - aber du weißt es ja ! was alle hassen, was allein ich liebe: 6.4 [Page 64] This coin with which all the world makes payment, I grasp this coin with gloves, with loathing I trample it beneath me. Soft!- Of great things - I see something great! - one should keep silent or speak greatly: speak greatly, my enraptured wisdom! I look above me - there seas of light are rolling: oh night, oh silence, oh deathly silent uproar! . . . I see a sign- from the farthest distance · slowly glittering a constellation sinks towards me . . . Highest star of being! Eternal tablet of forms! You come to me? - What none has beheld, your speechless beauty- what? it flees not from my gaze?- Image of what must be! Eternal tablet of forms! - but you know it: what everyone else hates, what I alone love: [Page 65] - daß du ewig bist ! daß du notwendig bist ! - meine Liebe entzündet sich ewig nur an der Notwendigkeit. Schild der Notwendigkeit! Höchstes Gestirn des Seins ! - das kein Wunsch erreicht, - das kein Nein befleckt, ewiges Ja des Seins, ewig bin ich dein Ja: denn ich liebe dich, o Ewigkeit! - - [Page 66] - that you are eternal! that you must be I - my love is ignited only by that which must be. Image of what must be! Highest star of being! - what no longing attains - no denial defiles, eternal Yes of being, eternally am I thy Yes: for I love thee, O eternity! - - [Page 67] Von der Armut des Reichsten Zehn Jahre dahin - , kein Tropfen erreichte mich, kein feuchter Wind, kein Tau der Liebe - ein regenloses Land . . . Nun bitte ich meine Weisheit, nicht geizig zu werden in dieser Durre: strome selber über, traufle selber Tau, sei selber Regen der vergilbten Wildnis ! Einst hieß ich die Wolken fortgehen von meinen Bergen, - einst sprach ich "mehr Licht, ihr Dunklen!" Heut locke ich sie, daß sie kommen: macht Dunkel um mich mit euren Eutern! - ich will euch melken, ihr Kuhe der Höhe! Milchwarme Weisheit, süßen Tau der Liebe strome ich über das Land. Fort, fort, ihr Wahrheiten, die ihr duster blickt! Nicht will ich auf meinen Bergen herbe ungeduldige Wahrheiten sehn. Vom Lächeln vergiildet nahe mir heut die Wahrheit, von der Sonne gesüßt, von der Liebe gebräunt, - eine reife Wahrheit breche ich allein vom Baum. Heut strecke ich die Hand aus nach den Locken des Zufalls, klug genug, den Zufall einem Kinde gleich zu führen, zu überlisten. Heut will ich gastfreundlich sein gegen Unwillkommnes, [Page 68] Of the Poverty of the Richest Man Ten years have passed - no drop of water has reached me, no moist wind, no dew of love - a rainless land . . . Now I ask of my wisdom that it grow not mean in this aridity: yourself overflow, yourself drop dew, yourself be rain to this yellowed wilderness! Once I bade the clouds depart my mountains - once I said "more light, dark clouds!" Today I lure them to come back: make darkness round me with your udders! - I want to milk you, cows of the heights! Milkwarm wisdom, secret dew of love I pour down over the land. Be gone, be gone, truths of gloomy aspect! I want on my mountain no acid fretful truths. Golden with smiles let truth approach me today, made sweet by the sun, made brown by love, ripe truths alone do I pluck from the vine. Today I stretched out my hand to the hairy head of chance, cunning enough to outwit chance and lead it along like a child. Today I will be hospitable to things unwelcome, [Page 69] gegen das Schicksal selbst will ich nicht stachlicht sein, - Zarathustra ist kein Igel. Meine Seele, unersättlich mit ihrer Zunge, . an alle guten und schlimmen Dinge hat sie schon geleck, in jede Tiefe tauchte sie hinab. Aber immer gleich dem Korke, immer schwimmt sie wieder obenauf, sie gaukelt wie 61 iiber braune Meere: dieser Seele halber heiBt man mich den Glicklichen. Wer sind mir Vater und Mutter? Ist nicht mir Vater Prmz Überfluß und Mutter das stille Lachen? Erzeugte nicht dieser beiden Ehebund mich Ratseltier, mich Lichtunhold, mich Verschwender aller Weisheit, Zarathustra? Krank heute vor Zartlichkeit, ein Tauwind, sitzt Zarathustra wartend, wartend auf seinen Bergen, - im eignen Saft siiiB geworden und gekocht, unterhalb seines Gipfels, unterhalb seines Eises, miid und selig, ein Schaff ender an seinem siebenten Tag. - Still! Eine Wahrheit wandelt iiber mir einer Wolke gleich, - mit unsichtbaren Blitzen trifft sie mich. Auf breiten langsamen Treppen steigt ihr Gluck zu mir: komm, komm, geliebte Wahrheit! [Page 70] towards fate itself I will not be prickly - Zarathustra is no hedgehog. My soul, its tongue insatiable, has licked at every good and evil thing, dived down into every depth. But always, like a cork, always it comes bobbing up again, it juggles like oil on the brown surf ace of the sea: on account of this my soul they call me: the happy man. Who are my father and mother? Is my father not Prince Abundance and my mother a silent laughter? Did the marriage of this couple not engender this enigmatic beast, this demon of light, this squanderer of wisdom, Zarathustra? Sick today with tenderness, a thawing wind, Zarathustra sits waiting, waiting in his mountains - in his own juice cooked and grown sweet, below his summit, below his ice, tired and happy, a creator on his seventh day. - Soft! A truth passes over me like a cloud - strikes me with invisible lightnings. On broad slow stairways its happiness climbs up to me: come, come, beloved truth! [Page 71] - Still! Meine Wahrheit ist! - Aus zogernden Augen, aus samtenen Schauern trifft mich ihr Blick, lieblich, hos, ein Madchenblick . . . Sie erriet meinen Glickes Grund, sie erriet mich - ha! was sinnt sie aus? - Purpurn lauert ein Drache im Abgrunde ihres Madchenblicks. - Still! Meine Wahreit redet! Wehe dir, Zarathustra! Du siehst aus, wie einer, der Gold verschluckt hat: man wird dir noch den Bauch aufschlitzen ! . . . Zu reich hist du, du Verderber vieler ! Zu viele machst du neidisch, zu viele m:achst du arm . . . Mir selber wirft dein Licht Schatten - , es frostelt mich: geh weg, du Reicher, geh, Zarathustra, weg aus deiner Sonne! . . . Du mochtest schenken, wegschenken deinen Überfluß, aber du selber hist der Überfliissigste ! Sei klug, du Reicher! Verschenke dich selber erst, o Zarathustra! Zehn Jahre dahin - , und kein Tropfen erreichte dich? kein feuchter Wind? kein Tau der Liebe? Aber wer sollte dich auch lieben, du Überreicher? [Page 72] - Soft! It is my truth! - From hesitant eyes, from velvet tremblings its glance strikes at me, lovely, wicked, the glance of a girl . . . She divines the ground of my happiness, she divines me - ha! what is she thinking of? Purple there lurks a dragon in the abyss of her glance. - Soft! My truth speaks! - Woe to thee, ... Zarathustra! You resemble one who has swallowed gold: you will yet have your belly cut open! . . . You are too rich, corrupter of many! You make too many envious, you make too many poor . . . Even I am cast in shadow by your light - I grow cold: away, man gifted with riches, away, Zarathustra, out of your sunlight! . . . You would like to bestow, to give away your superfluity, but you yourself are the most superfluous! Be sensible, man gifted with riches! First give yourself, O Zarathustra ! Ten years have passed - and no drop of water has reached you? no moist wind? no dew of love? But who could love you, man superabundant in riches? [Page 73] Dein Glück macht rings trocken, macht arm an Liebe - ein regenloses Land ... Niemand dankt dir mehr. Du aber dankst jedem, der von dir nimmt: daran erkenne ich dich, du Überreicher, du Armster aller Reichen ! Du opferst dich, dich quillt dein Reichtum - , du gibst dich ah, du schonst dich nicht, du liebst dich nicht: die große Qual zwingt dich allezeit, die Qual übervoller Scheuern, übervollen Herzens - aber niemand dankt dir mehr ... Du mußt armer werden, weiser Unweiser ! willst du geliebt sein. Man liebt nur die Leidenden, man gibt Liebe nur dem Hungernden: verschenke dich selbst erst, o Zarathustra! - Ich bin deine Wahrheit ... [Page 74] Your happiness makes all around you arid, makes it poor in love - a rainless land . . . No one thanks you now. But you thank everyone who takes from you: that is how I know you, superabundant in riches, poorest of all the rich! You offer yourself, your riches torment you ,... you deliver yourself up, you do not spare yourself, do not love yourself: the great torment constrains you always, the torment of barns overfull, of a heart overfull - but no one thanks you now . . . You must grow poorer, unwise man of wisdom! if you want to be loved. Only the suffering are loved, love is given only to the hungry man: first give yourself, O Zarathustra ! - I am thy truth . . . 7S [Page 76] Notes The following notes are mainly biographical and seek to place the poems in the context of Nietzsche's life and works. Only a Fool! Only a Poet! (page 23) This opening poem was first printed, in a slightly different version, in the fourth part of Thus Spoke Zarathustra (1885), where it is included in the chapter called "The Song of Melancholy" and put into the mouth of "the old sorcerer". The action of Zarathustra Part Four involves the appearance in Zarathustra's remote mountainous territory of a number of "higher men" whose specific errors and shortcomings are revealed to them during their brief sojourn there. Among them is "the old sorcerer", and it is universally agreed that he is Richard Wagner and thus, by an extension very amply documented in Nietzsche's other writings, the epitome of "the artist". Now, for reasons which should become clear when we come to discuss the following poem, I would contend that the three Dithyrambs of Dionysus included in the fourth part of Zarathustra were inserted there capriciously and by force - that is, that they were originally composed independently of Zarathustra and do not truly belong in that book. In this present instance, however, little argumentation is called for: if, as seems to be obviously the case, "Zarathustra" is Nietzsche's ideal self, the "higher men" are, as well as being other identifiable individuals or types, also facets of Nietzsche's own character of which he at least in part disapproves, repudiates and, in the visionary conclusion of TBus Spoke Zarathustra, overcomes; the one rep resented by the sorcerer, Wagner, is Nietzsche as artist, and in this poem specifically as poet, and the poem thus rightly belongs at the head of the present collection of poems. In the chapter of Zarathustra called "Of Poets", Zarathustra is asked why he once said that the poets lie too [Page 77] much: he replies: "What did Zarathustra once say to you? That the poets lie too much? - But Zarathustra too is a poet. Do you now believe that he spoke the truth? Why do you believe it?" Granted, however, he goes on, that "someone has said in all seriousness that the poets lie too much: he is right - we do lie too much. We know too little and are bad learners: so we have to lie." The Desert Grows: Woe to Him Who Harbours Deserts . . . (page 29) This poem too was inserted, in a form only slightly different from that in which it appears here, in Part Four of Thus Spoke Zarathustra. There it is placed in the mouth of "the wanderer who called himself Zarathustra's shadow". and who is usually regarded as representing the "freethinker". It constitutes the greater part of the chapter called " Among the Daughters of the Desert". The "higher men" have just been treated by Zarathustra to a banquet and the sorcerer has, by way of postprandial entertain ment, spoiled the prevailing spirit of gaiety with a recital of "Only a fool! Only a poet!" It is in response to this, and with the intention of restoring his fell ow guests' good humour, that the shadow sings them his poem "The desert grows". - "I have seen many lands", he says in preamble, "my nose has learned to test and appraise many kinds of air: but with you my nostrils taste their greatest delight! Except, except -oh forgive an old memory! Forgive me an old after-dinner song that I once composed among the daughters of the desert - for with them there was the same good, clear oriental air; there I was furthest away from cloudy, damp, melancholy Old Europe! In those days I loved such oriental girls and other blue kingdoms of heaven, over which no clouds and no thoughts hung. You would not believe how prettily they sat there when they were not dancing, deep but without thoughts, like little secrets, like ribboned riddles, like after-dinner nuts - motley and strange indeed! but without clouds: riddles that one can read: to please such girls I then devised an after-dinner psalm." [Page 78] Whereupon he sings his song "wi th a kind of roaring". Now even in the context of the fourth part of Zarathustra, whose action is so structured that almost anything could take place, this poem seems an irrelevance and a capricious insert: even more obviously than "Only a Fool! Only a Poet!" it originates outside the Zarathustra-world and is a piece of pure autobiography. H. W. Brann was, so far as I know, the first to assert in print that it is a lightly disguised recollection of a visit to a brothel (in Nietzsche und die Frauen, I 93 1). The evidence for this assertion seems to me compelling and the interpretation plainly correct. The poem itself, with its setting and near doubles entendres, can easily be interpreted in this sense without strain and regardless of who wrote it: so nearly unequivocal is it, indeed, that one would almost have to prove that this interpretation was not correct. Knowing it is by Nietzsche, however, we can also draw on evidence extraneous to it. In the most general sense it can be said that, since he was a student at two German universities in the 1860s and 1870s, it would not be in any way unusual if he had visited a brothel, at any rate once: it was a normal student practice. And it happens that we have an account, almost certainly in his own words, of an occasion when he was taken to one. It is contained in the recollections of a fellow student, the philologist Paul Deussen, published in 1901. In February 1865 both were students at Bonn, and Nietzsche told him, Deussen says, that he had paid a visit to Cologne, where a cab driver had driven him around and when he finally asked to be taken to a good restaurant the driver had transported him to a brothel instead. "I suddenly saw myself surrounded by half-a-dozen apparitions in tinsel and gauze, who looked at me expectantly", Nietzsche told him. "I stood for a moment speechless. Then I made for a piano in the room as to the only living thing in that company and struck several chords. They broke the spell and I hurried away." This brief passage in Deussen's Erinnerungen an Friedrich Nietzsche has created a small literature of its own, culminating in Thomas [Page 79] Mann's Doctor Faustus, since it is the only concrete piece of evidence we have which links Nietzsche's mental and physical breakdown with what must almost certainly have been its cause. There can be very little doubt by now, when every aspect and almost every week of Nietzsche's life have been scrutinized from every possible angle, that the illness he suffered from was syphilis (which in his day was incurable) or that, in the total absence of any evidence to the contrary, he contracted it from a prostitute. It has been shown that he was treated for a syphilitic infection by two doctors in Leipzig during 1867; and there is much in his singular and tragic existence that is explicable only by supposing he knew, or strongly suspected, what his "illness" actually was (though almost certainly he failed to realize what the full extent of its consequences would be). That "The Desert Grows . . ." should be included in this ultimate production of Nietzsche's literary genius is thus in the most hideous sense appropriate. Last Will (page 39) This is probably the earliest of the Dithyrambs of Dionysus: it appears in a notebook of 1883 which also contains notes for Part Three of Zarathustra. I am unable to say who the dying man is, or even to suggest a candidate: notwithstanding that 1883 is the year of Wagner's death, it is certainly not him. Possibly the figure is imaginary; for there seem to be clear links between "Last Will" and one of the best-known chapters of Zarathustra, "Of Voluntary Death", the burden of which is that one should "die at the right time" so that one's death will be "a spur and a promise to the living". Amid Birds of Prey (page 41) At first entitled "Am Abgrunde" ("At the Abyss"), "Zwis chen Raubvogeln" is the harshest of Nietzsche's many hymns to solitude. One of the soundest reasons for iden- [Page 80] tifying Nietzsche with Zarathustra - a procedure which might otherwise seem simplistic - is the extremity of the solitude into which Zarathustra is driven: patently a heroic projection of Nietzsche's own lonely status. It is hard to think of anyone who in the middle of modern Europe succeeded in segregating himself from almost every kind of attachment so completely as Nietzsche did. That at bottom he chose and preferred isolation is, of course, obvious; and that he should have made a heroic virtue of this choice was, given his love of self dramatization, almost inevitable: but that does not mean that he did not suffer as a result of it. So it is that we find, throughout his works, together with celebrations of self sufficiency, reflections on the perils attending it: the chief of these appears to be that the opportunity afforded for self-absorption will lead to an increase in self-knowledge and -awareness so great as to be self-destructive. This is the "abyss" over which Zarathustra "hangs" in his moun tain redoubt. This poem too is, like the preceding poems, autobiography; it is the final stage of a quasi-dramatic development. The last chapter of Human, All Too Human is called "Man Alone with Himself" ; in Zarathustra Nietzsche drew a full-length portrait of a man alone with himself; now, at the end of his course, the man alone with himself discovers that, through his self-imposed solitude, he has become his own executioner. The Fire-Signal (page 47) These twenty-seven measured, solemn and impressive lines employ the vocabulary and setting of Thus Spoke Zarathustra but go one step beyond it. Perhaps we are permitted to recognize in the "six solitudes" which Zarathustra already knows an allusion to his condition at the conclusion of the book named after him: if so, the "seventh solitude" he seeks would represent a new and final stage in his spiritual journey. That this "seventh solitude" is intended to be taken in a fairly literal sense as a [Page 81] description of the years immediately preceding the collect ing together of the Dithyrambs of Dionysus can, I believe, be shown from the persistence in Nietzsche's mind, after the other Zarathustra-metaphors had been left behind, of the metaphor of "fishing for men" which Thus Spoke Zarathustra shares with the New Testament. Like the disciples of Jesus, Zarathustra too was a "fisher of men" who differed from the fishermen of religion chiefly in the kind of bait he used; now, however, he has commenced fishing in a place where even the most enticing bait will catch nothing, namely "on high mountains": thus he explains to himself the absence of any catch except a "seventh solitude". This state of things corresponds pre cisely to the actual state of things in Nietzsche's life at the time the poem was probably written: though convinced of the tremendous importance to mankind of what he had to tell them, he completely lacked an audience; and he acquired one only after his mental breakdown. "To all that was tragic in Nietzsche's life", George Brandes wrote in 1900 in his obituary of him, "was added this: that, after thirsting for recognition to the point of morbidity, he attained it in an altogether fantastic degree when, though still living, he was shut out from life." Nietzsche himself continued to the end to account for his isolation by employing the fishing metaphor. Writing in Ecce Homo of Beyond Good and Evil, the book which succeeded Zarathustra, he says: "The task for the immediately following years was as clear as it could be. Now that the affirmative part of my task was done, it was the turn of the denying, the No-saying and No-doing part: the revaluation of existing values themselves, the great war- the evocation of a day of decision. Included here is the slow search for those related to me, for such as out of strength would offer me their hand for the work of destruction. - From now on all my writings are fish-hooks: perhaps I understand fishing as well as anyone? . . . If nothing got caught I am not to blame. There were no fish . . . Though the connection is not absolutely direct, I believe [Page 82] this passage to be saying the same thing as a prose restatement of "The Fire-Signal". The Sun Sinks (page 49) The sense of the sixth and by far the calmest of the Dithyrambs of Dionysus is unambiguous to a degree rare in Nietzsche's visionary poems. It is a description of his own death - or, more precisely, of what he anticipates, or at least hopes, his death will be like. What is extremely striking about the poem is the degree to which its imagery is drawn from the stock of simple images and metaphors which Nietzsche has already employed time and again to express feelings of happiness and contentment: their repetition here produces, for anyone who knows Nietzsche's poetic works as a whole, a coda-like effect. Mostly their meaning is so obvious as to make any elucidation superfluous, though it might be worthwhile to draw attention to the number of colours named: gold ("gilt"), green, brown, white, purple, blue, silver. To speak of a "colour symbolism" in Nietzsche's poetry and poetic prose would be to speak too solemnly; but certain colours did have a special significance for him and mention of them is intended to constitute something more than natural description. Gold is, as in the present poem, the colour of the sea when the setting sun is level with it, and it is thus the colour of late evening and of the moods appropriate to that time of day. Brown - which from the number of times he employs it might almost be called Nietzsche's favourite colour - is the colour of wine-grapes when they are perfectly ripe and ready to be harvested, and is thus the colour of sweetness and maturity. Ariadne's Complaint (page 53) The seventh of the Dithyrambs of Dionysus has a very strange history. It first appeared, without its title and dramatized ending, in Part Four of Zarathustra, in the [Page 83] chapter called "The Sorcerer". As already remarked, the sorcerer is

Richard Wagner, and when Zarathustra first encounters him he is "throwing his arms about as if in a frenzy"; at length he hurls himself to the ground, and when Zarathustra approaches him he is revealed to be "a trembling old man with staring eyes". Failing to realize he is no longer alone, the sorcerer "continually looked around him with pathetic gestures . . . Eventually, however, after much trembling, quivering and self-contortion, he began to wail thus" - and then follows "Who still warms me, who still loves me?" But the song has so ill an effect on Zarathustra that before the sorcerer has finished "he could restrain himself no longer; he took his stick and struck the wailing man with all his force. 'Stop !' he shouted at him with furious laughter, 'Stop, you actor! You fabricator! You liar from the heart! I know you well! . . .'" The grotesque and unpleasing scene continues on for some time, with the sorcerer acquiring increasing enlighten ment as to his . true nature from the all-knowing Zarathustra. It must therefore disconcert us to hear the sorcerer's "lying" lament now proceeding from the semi divine Ariadne and addressed to the wholly divine Dionysus under circumstances which make it impossible to think that the sentiments it expresses are not intended to be taken in earnest. Some explanation is obviously called for, yet there is none that is satisfactory on the "objective", artistic level, and one might be inclined to call this re employment of the poem in a quite different context an artistic blunder. In the last resort, I believe, this judge ment must prevail: the two contexts, both dramatic, in which the poem is employed are artistically irreconcilable with one another, and the poem itself is thus irresolvably ambiguous. On the biographical level, however, the scene in Zarathustra and the scene on N axos are intimately con nected, and it is in this connection that we must seek the cause of the artistic error. In September or October 1887, while staying in Venice, the city Wagner died in, Nietzsche set down the following [Page 84] brief notes for a dramatic sketch: Satyr play at the end Insert: brief conversation between Dionysus, Theseus and Ariadne - Theseus is becoming absurd, said Ariadne, Theseus is be coming virtuous - Theseus jealous of Ariadne's dream. Ariadne's complaint. The hero admiring himself, becoming absurd. Dionysus without jealousy: "That which I love in you, how could a Theseus love that" - - - Last act. Wedding of Dionysus and Ariadne. "One is not jealous when one is a god", said Dionysus, "unless it be of gods." "Ariadne", said Dionysus, "you are a labyrinth: Theseus has gone astray in you, he has lost the thread; of what good is it to him that he is not devoured by the Minotaur? That which devours him is worse than a Minotaur." "You are flattering me", Ariadne replied: "I am weary of my pity, all heroes should perish by me: this is my ultimate love for Theseus: I destroy him." The three characters in this "satyr play" are Nietzsche (Dionysus), Wagner (Theseus) and Wagner's wife and widow, Cosima (Ariadne). If the sketch itself left any doubt as to these attributions it would be set aside by the content of the letters Nietzsche sent out to people he knew, and to prominent people he did not know, during the days following his mental collapse. Some are signed "Dionysus", and Cosima Wagner is referred to in them as "Ariadne"; one of the letters that went to Cosima herself reads: "Ariadne. I love you. Dionysus". At the clinic at Jena in which he was subsequently confined Nietzsche is recorded as having said: "My wife Cosima Wagner brought me here" - the "wedding of Dionysus and Ariadne" having by then taken place in his now uninhibited fantasy. It thus appears that the poem "Who still warms me, who still loves me?" has simply been taken away from Wagner and given to Cosima, in whose mouth it has acquired a truthfulness it could not possess in Wagner's. [Page 85] Fame and Eternity (page 61) There is some indication that "Fame and Eternity" was at first intended as a poetic epilogue to the autobiography Ecce Homo: this intention, if it in fact existed, would have been sensible, since this miniature poetic cycle is itself autobiographical. It records, in the concise way, four stages on Zarathustra's path to enlightenment. Part 1 ("How long have you already brooded") is ferociously depressive: truth, "brimstone-coloured" and sulphurous, a curse and thunderstorm that shakes the rafters, inspires anger in him who says it and fear in those who hear it. A prose equivalent is provided in Ecce Homo in the characterization of On the Genealogy of Morals: The three essays of which this Genealogy consists are in regard to expression, intention and art of surprise perhaps the uncanniest things that have ever been written. Dionysus is, as one knows, also the god of darkness. - Each time a beginning which is intended to mislead, cool, scientific, even ironic, intentionally foreground, intentionally keeping in suspense. Gradually an increasing disquiet; isolated flashes of lightning; very unpleasant truths becoming audible as a dull rumbling in the distance - until at last a tempo ferociously attained in which every thing surges forward with tremendous tension. At the conclusion each time amid perfectly awful detonations a new truth visible between thick clouds. Part 2 ("This coin") appears to repudiate "fame", actually repudiates the purchase of fame by the substitution of virtue for truth - the trimming of truth to the world's moral demands. The third and fourth poems transport us to the end of Part Three of Zarathustra, the ecstatic conclusion of Zarathustra's spiritual odyssey and his attainment of full enlightenment. The euphoric imagery is here so closely compacted as sometimes to constitute almost a series of catchwords and -phrases whose meaning, though well and unequivocally established in Nietzsche's earlier writings and familiar to readers of them, is by no means conveyed by the text of the poem itself. I think I shall have [Page 86] done my duty by the reader if I offer, not a full "explication" of this text - which would in any case probably exhaust his/her patience - but the following key which may by itself prove adequate to unlocking it. The passage again comes from Ecce Homo: My formula for greatness in a human being is amor fati: that one wants nothing to be other than it is, not in the future, not in the past, not in all eternity. Not merely to endure that which happens of necessity, still less to dissemble it - all idealism· is untruthfulness in the face of necessity - but to love it Of the Poverty of the Richest Man (page 69) The last of the Dithyrambs of Dionysus relaxes tempo and tension. It is the happiest poem in the collection. The opening line answers the question asked by the opening lines of "Fame and Eternity" and in doing so recalls the opening of Thus Spoke Zarathustra: When Zarathustra was thirty years old, he left his home and the lake of his home and went into the mountains. Here he had the enjoyment of his spirit and his solitude and he did not weary of it for ten years. But at last his heart turned - and one morning he rose with the dawn, stepped before the sun, and spoke to it thus . . . In the light of these correspondences, it is probably not far-fetched to conclude that the "Zarathustras" of the Dithyrambs of Dionysus are not so much repetitions of the grand central figure of Thus Spoke Zarathustra as alternatives to him.

The following sections contain Nietzsche's unpublished notebook fragments, presented in chronological order as they appear in the Stanford Complete Works critical edition. These are not finished works but working notes, drafts, and abandoned projects — they show Nietzsche thinking on the page. The reader should treat them as a workshop, not a gallery.

Appendix A

Nachlass Volume 14: Unpublished Fragments from the Period of Thus Spoke Zarathustra (Summer 1882 – Winter 1883/84)

Translated by Paul S. Loeb & David F. Tinsley

Skip to main content

Ask the publishers to restore access to 500,000+ books.

Way- back Ma- chine

BLOG EVENTS PROJECTS
LP DONATE CONTACT
JOBS VOLUNTEER

Friedrich Nietzsche Unpublished Fragments and Writings" See other formats

Texts

Fragments
Period of Ihus Spoke Zarathustra (Summer 1882– /84)
with an Afterword,
Loeb and David F. Tinsley
teen e edition by Giorgio Colli & Mazzino Montinari ized in English by Ernst Behler

Video

Fragments
Period of Thus Spoke Zarathustra
2-Winter 1883/84)
ietzsche

Audio

Fragments
Period of Thus Spoke Zarathustra
2– Winter 1883 / 84)
with an Afterword,
Loeb and David F. Tinsley
IVERSITY PRESS
ALIFORNIA
iversity Press Stanford, California from Friedrich Nietzsche, Sämtliche Werke: Krit-

Soft- ware

abe, ed. Giorgio Colli and Mazzino Montinari, in orresponds to Vol. 10, pp. 7-664.
ition of Friedrich Nietzsche's Sämtliche Werke shed
sed on the original manuscripts.
Gruyter & Co., Berlin and New York, for the Ger-dizioni, Milan, for the Italian Edition Gallimard, Paris, for the French Edition

© Hakusuisha Publishing Comp., Tokyo, for the Japanese Edition

© 2019 by the Board of Trustees of the Leland Stanford Junior University for the English Edition and associated apparatus. All rights reserved.

No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system without the prior written permission of Stanford University Press.

Printed in the United States of America on acid-free, archival-quality paper

CIP data appears at the end of the book.

Contents

A NOTE ON THIS EDITION IX

Unpublished Fragments

from the Period of Thus Spoke Zarathustra

(Summer 1882–Winter 1883/84)

Preliminary Note to Volume 14 I

Notebook 1 = N V 9a. N VI sa. Tautenburg Notes

for Lou von Salomé. July–August 1882 3

Notebook 2 = N V 9b. Summer–Autumn 1882 34

Notebook 3 = Z I 1. Summer–Autumn 1882 42

Notebook 4 = N V 9c. N VI 1b. NV 8.

November 1882–February 1883 94

Notebook 5 = Z I 2a. Mp XV 3a.

November 1882–February 1883 166

Notebook 6 = M III 3b. Winter 1882–1883 206

Notebook 7 = M III 4b. Spring–Summer 1883 210

Notebook 8 = Mp XVII 1a. Summer 1883 289

Notebook 9 = N VI 2. May–June 1883 306

Notebook 10 = N VI 3. June–July 1883 325

Notebook 11 = N VI 4. June–July 1883 338

viii CONTENTS

Notebook 12 = Z I 3. Summer 1883 342

Notebook 13 = Z I 4. Summer 1883 371

Notebook 14 = M III 2b. Summer 1883 428

Notebook 15 = N VI 5. Summer–Autumn 1883 431

Notebook 16 = Z II 1a. Autumn 1883 446

Notebook 17 = N VI 6. Autumn 1883 481

Notebook 18 = N VI 7. Autumn 1883 512

Notebook 19 = N VI 8. Autumn 1883 527

Notebook 20 = Z II 2. Autumn 1883 531

Notebook 21 = Mp XV 3b. Autumn 1883 540

Notebook 22 = Z II 3a. End 1883 546

Notebook 23 = Z II 4. End 1883 576

Notebook 24 = Mp XVII 1b. Winter 1883-1884 583

Reference Matter

NOTES 605

TRANSLATORS AFTERWORD 717

INDEX OF PERSONS 799

SUBJECT INDEX 813

A Note on This Edition

This is the first English translation of all of Nietzsche's writings, including his unpublished fragments, with annotation, afterwords concerning the individual texts, and indexes, in nineteen volumes. The aim of this collaborative work is to produce a critical edition for scholarly use. Volume 1 also includes an introduction to the entire edition, and Volume 19 will include a detailed chronology of Nietzsche's life. While the goal is to establish a readable text in contemporary English, the translation follows the original as closely as possible. All texts have been translated anew by a group of scholars, and particular attention has been given to maintaining a consistent terminology throughout the volumes. The translation is based on

Friedrich Nietzsche: Sämtliche Werke. Kritische Studienausgabe in 15

Bänden (1980), edited by Giorgio Colli and Mazzino Montinari.

The still-progressing Nietzsche Werke: Kritische Gesamtausgabe, which Colli and Montinari began in 1963, has also been consulted. The Colli-Montinari edition is of particular importance for the unpublished fragments, comprising more than half of Nietzsche's writings and published there for the first time in their entirety. Besides listing textual variants, the annotation to this English edition provides succinct information on the text

and identifies events, names (except those in the Index of Persons), titles, quotes, and biographical facts of Nietzsche's own life. The notes are numbered in the text and are keyed by phrase.

The Afterword presents the main facts about the origin of the

x A NOTE ON THIS EDITION

text, the stages of its composition, and the main events of its reception. The Index of Persons includes mythological figures and lists the dates of birth and death as well as prominent personal characteristics.

Since the first three volumes appeared, important corrections to the 1980 edition of the Kritische Studienausgabe have been noted, and these corrections have been incorporated into the translation that appears here.

ERNST BEHLER AND ALAN D. SCHRIFT

Unpublished Fragments

from the Period of Thus Spoke Zarathustra

(Summer 1882–Winter 1883/84)

Preliminary Note to Volume 14

Volumes 14 and 15 of the Complete Works of Friedrich Nietzsche (Volumes 10 and 11 of the KSA) together comprise Nietzsche's unpublished fragments from July 1882 to Autumn 1885, which correspond to Part VII of the KGW. The fragments are preserved in thirty-six manuscripts, specifically in twenty-one notebooks in larger format, twelve notebooks, and three loose-leaf binders.

The organizing principles that govern the publication of Nietzsche's unpublished fragments are set forth in the Preliminary

Note to CW 10.

In addition, the following comments concerning Volumes 14 and 15 of CW should be noted. The manuscripts from the period July 1882 to Autumn 1885 include preliminary work on the four parts of Thus Spoke Zarathustra; drafts, outlines, and fragments that have to do with parts of this work that were not included; extensive collections of sayings that in many cases relate to work on Z; and notes that – in literary terms – have no relation to Z (the latter make up approximately half of the complete material; they were published as a small part of the notebooks related to Beyond Good and Evil [and included in CW 16]). All of these notes are being published as Z-fragment literary remains, which precede the actual early drafts and final clean copies of each part of Z. Yet since Nietzsche, each time after completing a part of Z, recopied a large number of the previous notes that he hadn't used into new notebooks, often without changing anything, it was impossible to avoid the repetition of certain notes – although in differing contexts.

2 PRELIMINARY NOTE TO VOLUME 14

Volume 14 of CW corresponds to Volume VII/1 of the KGW (Berlin / New York: Walter de Gruyter, 1977) and thus contains the fragments from July 1882 to Winter 1883-84. Nietzsche's Tautenburg Notes for Lou von Salomé (July–August 1882) are published with the kind permission of Dr. (Honorary) Ernst Pfeiffer (Göttingen).

There is no Afterword by Giorgio Colli for Volume 14.

MAZZINO MONTINARI

Editorial Note to Volume 14

Unless another volume in the CW is cited, all cross-references to fragments in the notes are references to fragments in this volume. In cases where a cross-reference to a fragment is followed by a number (e.g., 5[1] 22), this indicates that the reference is to the sentence or paragraph numbered 22 in fragment si]. In cases where a cross-reference to a fragment is followed by an underline and a number (e.g., 22[1]547), this indicates that the reference is to a passage in fragment 22[1] that appears on page 547 of this volume.

In cases where the format of a fragment in this volume differs significantly from the format of the fragment as it appears in KSA, we have chosen to follow as closely as possible the format of the fragment as it appears in Nietzsche's handwritten notebooks.

ALAN D. SCHRIFT

[1 =N V 9a. N VI 1a. Tautenburg Notes
for Lou von Salomé. July-August 1882]

1 [1]

"solitudo continuata dulcescit" Madonna del Sasso. (Locarno)?

1 [2]

Refutation of Morality? –

Morality is what matters to those who cannot free themselves from it: it is for that very reason one of the "conditions of existence" for them. It is impossible to refute conditions of existence: We can only – not have them?

1 [3] Basic Principles

The final physical state of force we unlock must necessarily also be the first.

The dissolution of force into latent force must be the cause of the emergence of the most vigorous force. The state of the highest position must follow the one state of negation.

Space, like matter, is a subjective form. Time is not.

Space first emerged through the assumption of empty space.

This doesn't exist. Force is everything.

We are incapable of conceiving simultaneously what is moved and what is moving, but that is what makes matter and space. We isolate.

The development of a thing allows retrospective conclusions about its emergence.

4 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

All development is an emergence.

Matter, material is a subjective form.

We cannot conceive of anything except as being material.

Even thoughts and abstractions obtain from us a very refined materiality, which we perhaps deny: nevertheless they do have

it. We have accustomed ourselves to overlook this sophisticated materiality and to speak of "the immaterial." Just as we have distinguished dead from alive, logical from illogical, etc.

To unlearn' our oppositions – is the task.

1 [4]

Even concepts have emerged. From where? – There are transitions here.

x [5]°

People who were employed for an enterprise which has failed should be doubly compensated.

1 [6]'

If you want to stay young for a long time, become young late.

"Anyone who is too strict in his judgment of others is bad in my opinion" – I say with Demosthenes.

1 [7]

"Suaviter in re, fortiter in me"?

1 [8]?

What all the resurrected believe. – It is highly unlikely that someone who has died early once will die a second time.

I [9]!°

Life after death. – Those who have reason to believe in their "life after death" must learn to endure their "death" during their life.

1 JULY-AUGUST 1882 5

1 fo]!

Late youth. – Late youth sustains long youth.

1 [mn]?

The ideal. – The eye sees everything as outside itself: and thus we still see our ideal before us, even if we have already reached it!

1 [12]

Concept and feeling of "noble" has a different prehistory than concept and feeling of "good."

1 [13]"? Vademecum. Vadetecum!? By F. Nietzsche First Complete Edition

Contents:

Human, All Too Human. With Appendix The Wanderer and His Shadow Dawn The Joyful Science.

The Plowshare. A Tool for the Liberation of the Spirit.

First complete edition in two volumes

Contents:

Human, All Too Human. With Appendix:

Mixed Opinions and Maxims. The Wanderer and His Shadow.

Dawn. Thoughts on the Presumptions of Morality.
The Joyful Science.

6 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

1 [15]? To---

Friend!!° – spoke Columbus – do not trust
a Genoese ever again!
He's always staring into the blue,
What is most distant draws him all too much!

*

Courage! I am on the open sea,
Behind me lies Genoa.
And in league with you I will win Lands of gold and America.

*

Let us stand on our own two feet!
For us there is no more turning back.
Look outward: greeting us from far away
One death, one fame, one fortune!718

I [16]

a largely or exclusively vegetarian diet People of strong affects, ambitious invidious lascivious people may in fact wish to ask themselves whether for them a little meat is already too much, although for me the much more important question than what they should eat, is that other question: how much, which here means: how little.

1 [17]

As when a friend tears himself away from a friend's bosom.
Go ahead! You will still have your pain!!?

1 [18]

What is my book worth if it cannot at least endure the scrutiny sub specie trecentorum annorum???

1] JULY-AUGUST 1882 7

1 [19]? Free spirits. Style. Moral and organic. Selfishness and neighborliness.?? Heroism.

The effect of the thought on the future of the world.
God and devil.

1 [20]

On the Morality of the "I."

The difficulty of making oneself understood. This is impos-sible to do with many people.

Every action is misunderstood. And in order not to have continual encounters, it is necessary to have a mask. Also in order to seduce...

Better to associate with people who consciously lie, for only they can also be consciously truthful. Usually, truthfulness is a mask that is not conscious of being a mask.

The "I" subjugates and kills: it works like an organic cell: it pillages and is violent. It wants to regenerate itself – pregnancy.

It wants to give birth to its god and to see all of humanity at its feet."

°

The I's that have been liberated fight for mastery.

1 [21]

This is no book: what use are books!

What use are coffins and shrouds!

This is a will, this is a promise,

This is a last burning-of-bridges,

This is a sea breeze, a weighing of the anchor,

A roaring of the paddlewheels, a setting of the tiller,

The cannon roars, its fire a white steam

The sea laughs, the monster –*4

8 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

1 [22]

to give selfishness a beautiful name, after it is supposed to be evil

1 [23]

I believe G. I. Ascoli and E. Rénan when they say that the Semitic race was Indoeuropean.

x [24]?°

The lives of heroic humans contain the abbreviated history of multiple generations in regard to the deification of the devil. They experience in turn what it is to be heretic, witch, prophet, skeptic, weakling, believer and what it is to be overwhelmed.

1 [25]""

Those who themselves possess the will to suffer are differently disposed to cruelty; when they inflict hurt, they do not believe hurting to be in and of itself damaging and bad.

1 [26]

"Jesus saw someone working on the Sabbath and said to him: if you know what you do, then you are blessed; but if you know not what you do, then you are cursed and a violator of the law."

Luke, 6,4. ancient ms.

1 [27]

The existing world of forces leads back to a most simple state of these forces: and in the same way forward to a most simple state, – could and must both these states not be identical?

No

infinite number of states can be derived from one system of specific forces, that is, from one measurably stable force.

Only

with the false assumption of an infinite space into which force dissipates, as it were, is the final state an unproductive, dead state. The simplest state is at once – and +

1 JULY-AUGUST 1882 9

1 [28]

If we adopt the strictest standpoint of morality, e.g., sincerity-

ity, then any interaction with things, all of the articles of faith within our usual sphere of action, are already immoral (e.g., that there are bodies.

Likewise, suppose that human = human in place of the atomism of individuals.

In this way everything becomes dishonesty. And assuming we acknowledge that life is dishonesty, thus immorality – in this way life can be denied.

In the same way, unconditional justice brings the insight that life is essentially unfair.

Consequence of the most extreme morality of knowledge: demand for annihilation.

But now the critique of morals and morality makes its redemptive arrival: it does away with itself.

Therefore: life is not to be denied, for morality does not stand above it, morality is dead. The excess of morality has shown that its antithesis, evil, is necessary and useful, and is a source of what is good.

Having done that, should we give up what is good? No, absolutely not! For our honesty no longer needs to be so strict.

Good people certainly are not.

1 [29]?

Emotional needs should not be confused with the need for emotions: that a few extremely cold people possess.

1 [30]

Dogs respond to benevolence with submission. Cats enjoy themselves in its presence and have a lascivious feeling of power: they give nothing back.

x [31]?

In explanation of the so-called "spiritistic phenomena." A portion of the intellectual functions of the medium?! occurs in him unconsciously: his condition is thereby hypnotic (separation of a waking and sleeping intellect) The nervous energy is concentrated in this unconscious portion. – An electric current must then pass among the people holding hands in the direction of the medium, allowing each person's thoughts to pass over into the medium. A current of thoughts like this is no more marvelous than the message carried from the brain to the foot within a person when he stumbles. The questions are answered through the intellectual capacity of the participants:
10 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

whereby memory often contributes and offers something that usually seems to have been forgotten. Result of nervous emotion. – There is no forgetting. – Even unconscious deception is possible: I mean, a deceptive medium operates with any number of deceptive manipulations, without knowing it: his kind of morality finds instinctive expression in these actions. – Ultimately, this is always the case, with all of our actions. The most essential things occur unconsciously in us, and ninety times out of hundred and even more often the con artist is more unaware of himself as a con artist than aware.

Electrical phenomena, cold chills, sparks are all possible in such cases. Feelings of being touched may be the products of trickery, hallucinations of the senses: whereby it is possible that several people share the same hallucina(tion). (Such as with the ancient orgiastic cults)

The belief in being reunited with the dead is the presupposition of spiritism. It is a kind of freethinking. Truly pious people do not need this belief. (Buckle*? on immortality)

1 [32]

Advocatus diaboli"?

New representations of God and devil. Unconditional knowledge is a form of madness from the era of virtue; with it, life would perish. We must sanctify lies, delusions and faith, injustice. We must liberate ourselves from morality, to be able to live morally. My free choice,' the ideal I myself created

1 JULY-AUGUST 1882 II

demands this or that virtue from me, i.e., downfall as a result of virtue. This is heroism.

1 [33]

The principle of nations will free the Mohammedans the Indians from their bonds.

1 [34]

So what makes, e.g., prostitution, so destructive, sneaky, unsure of itself? Not "the evil in itself" within it, but rather the bad opinion in which it is held. This against statisticians.

In the case of good people what should be taken into account is that the more direct and more subtle aftereffect of their judgment-ments is what constitutes the inner and outer misery of humanity. And then they use this misery as evidence that they are right, as evidence of nature and force! Bad conscience poisons good health.

Marriage as the sanctioned form of satisfying lust.

War as the sanctioned form of murdering your neighbor.

School as the sanctioned form of training.

Justice as the sanctioned form of revenge.

Religion as the sanctioned form of the drive for knowledge.

Good people as Pharisees, evil people living with bad consciences and oppression. So what is debauchery of any kind other than the consequence of the dissatisfaction of so many with sanctioned forms? What is most criminality other than the inability or unwillingness to participate in the Aypocrisy of "good people"? Lack of training of the strong drives? There are only opponents and despisers of such thinking.

I UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

1 [35]

On the happiness of the Pharisees.
Their self-overcoming. Producing "ethical" actions in all circumstances and training themselves to keep only such motives in their awareness and to falsely label their real motives (namely as ethical).

This is the ancient practice within the herd: the actual dishonesty, to see in themselves only the sanctioned judgments and feelings. This practice, common to all good people, gives rise to the uniformity of common actions: it gives them their monstrous power to acknowledge so few motives in themselves and their neighbors, and only good ones.
The Pharisee is the prototype of the preserving human, always needed.

Antithesis:

the strong evil ones
and the weak evil ones, who feel this way.
From them there occasionally emerges the one-who-is-good-to-himself, the devil who has become God.

[36]

To minimize suffering and to remove oneself from suffering (i.e., from life) – this is supposed to be moral?
To create suffering – for oneself and for others – to make them fit for the highest form of life, that of the victor – would be my goal.

1 [(37)]

It is nauseating to see great humans venerated by Pharisees. Against this sentimentality.

[38]

Even reversal and decline, in the individual and in humanity, must engender their ideals: and the belief in progress will always endure. The "ape" ideal could at some time stand before humanity – as a goal.

1] JULY-AUGUST 1882 13

1 [39]

My virtuosity: to endure what is unpleasant to me, to do justice to it, yes even to oppose it playfully – humans and knowledge. In this I am the most practiced.

1 [40]°

I have a tendency to allow myself to be robbed, exploited. But as soon as I realized that everything was meant to deceive me, I moved into egoism.

[41]

Having emerged from the old, perfected morality I felt compelled toward selfishness.

1 [42]

Why do I love free-spiritedness? As the final consequence of morality up to now. Treat everything justly, rise above compulsion and repulsion, become a part of the order of things, be above oneself, overcoming and courage not only in regard to one's personal enemies, embarrassments, but also in regard to the evil in things, to honesty even as an opponent of idealism and piety, yes even of passion, even in regard to honesty itself;

loving attitude toward anything and everything and the good will to discover its value, its justification, its necessity. To refuse to act (quietism) out of the inability to say: "it should be otherwise" – to rest in God, as it were, in a God who is becoming.

I recognized selfishness as a means to this free-spiritedness, as necessary in order not to be devoured by things: as restraint and refuge. That completion of morality is only possible in an

I: insofar as it acts in a lively, constructive, demanding, creative manner, and in every moment resists being absorbed in things, it reserves its power for itself in order to force ever more things to be taken up and absorbed into itself. In relation to the self and to selfishness, free-spiritedness is therefore a becoming, a struggle between two opposites, with nothing resolved, nothing perfected, no state:"" it is the insight of morality,

14

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

which can preserve itself in its existence and in its development only by means of its opposite.

1 [43] I.

o ~N

Dissatisfaction with ourselves. Antidote for remorse.

The transformation of the temperaments (e.g., through inorganic entities). The good will toward this dissatisfaction. To let the good will's thirst grow and reach its peak in order to discover its wellspring."®

. To reshape death? as the means to victory and triumph.

. Sexual love, as the means to the ideal (longing to be submerged in its opposite.) Love for the suffering godhead.

. Illness, and response to it, freedom until death.

. Reproduction as the most holy of circumstances.

Pregnancy, the creation of the woman and the man, who want to enjoy their oneness in the child and to create a monument to this oneness?

. Compassion as danger. To create conditions, so that all could help themselves and so that it is up to them whether they should be helped.

. The education into evil, into one's own "devil."

. The inner war, as "development."

9. "Preservation of the species" and the thought of eternal IO.

1 [44]

recurrence.

To what degree every created god in turn creates a devil for himself. And this devil is not the god from whom he emerged. (This devil is the neighboring ideal, with which this god must struggle)

The state has forced the individual to incorporate its morality.

Choice*! perhaps once the most exalted name for morality

1 JULY-AUGUST 1882 I

1 [45]* Style

The first thing needed is /zfe: style should /ive.

Your style should fit you every time in regard to one person in particular, to whom you wish to communicate yourself.

We must first know precisely: "I would say and state this in such a way" – before we may begin writing. Writing should only be a kind of imitation.

xk

Because writers Jack many tools enjoyed by speakers, they must in general have as their model a very expressive kind of speech: the written reproduction of it will necessarily come across much less colorfully (and much more naturally to you).

Wealth in life reveals itself through wealth of gesture. We must learn to feel everything, length brevity of sentences, punctuation, choice of words, pauses, the order of arguments – as gestures.

*

Careful with periods! Only those people with real stamina, also in speaking, have the right to use periods. For most people the period is an affectation.

Style should demonstrate that we believe in our thoughts, that we not only think them, but also feel them.

OK

The more abstract the truth we want to teach, the more we have to seduce the senses into embracing it.

The tact of good prose writers consists in approaching the boundaries of poesy as closely as possible without ever crossing the line. It is impossible to have this tact without the finest feeling for and abilities in poetry itself.

16 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

It is not good form, nor is it smart, to anticipate the more obvious objections of our readers. It is very good form and smart, to leave the expression of our essential wisdom to the readers themselves.

1 [46]

G. Sand, Letter of 1868 to Maxime Du Camp.

"Faites un mariage d'amitié pour avoir des enfants. L'amour ne procrée guère. Quand vous verrez devant vous un être, que vous aimerez plus que vous-mêmes, vous serez heureux. Mais ce nest

pas la femme que l'on peut aimer plus que soi-même, c'est l'en-fant, c'est V'être innocent, c'est le type divin, qui disparaît plus ou moins en grandissant, mais qui, durant quelques années, nous ramène à la possession d'un idéal sur la terre."

1 [47]

Behind all the feelings a man has for a woman there still lies contempt for the female sex.

1 [48] Against moral outrage.

The same cruelty as in religious wars. "Contempt for fellow humans" as the object of Christ's indignation (he came to treat the Pharisees unjustly.)

(Evil must be preserved!)

4 1 [49]°

Anyone who has the ideal of a person perceives the real person as its caricature.

1 [so]

1. Female assessment of the affects.

– of the individual virtues and vices of men and women. women and work

1 JULY-AUGUST 1882 17

women and state women and fame.

2. Female judgment and women's faith in the accuracy of their judgment.

4. To proclaim as true the unreality to which women feel themselves obligated.

5. Seducing others into having a high opinion of us, and then bowing before this opinion as an authority.*°

7. Pregnancy as the quintessential condition, which has gradually shaped the essence of women. Relation of all modes of female thought and action to this.

8. Child raising partly educationally regressive – partly all too deinfantilizing. Female rationalism.

9. The difference between female and male imperiousness.*"

u. What is felt to be unwomanly. History.

12. Denying destroying hating taking revenge: why women are more barbaric in these things than men.48

1 [s]

On the Reemergence" of the World.

A position emerges from two negations, if the negations are forces. (Darkness emerges from light against light, cold from warmth against warmth etc.)

x [52]!

Throw your words out ahead of your deeds: obligate yourself through shame at the broken word.

1 [53]

Only people who are unrelenting may be silent concerning themselves.

18 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

1 [54]

We are fairer to others than to ourselves.

1 [55]

In regard to all truth, things work the same way for us as they do in regard to our inner organs.

1 [56]

Originally a lie was moral. The opinions of the herd were simulated.

3 1 [57]?

In order to have a good conversation, some seek a midwife for their thoughts, while others seek someone they can help.

4 1 [58]

In every three-way conversation one voice is superfluous and thereby keeps the conversation from getting deep.

1 [59]

Those who do not make us productive will surely leave us indifferent. Those we make productive still do not give us a reason for loving them.

1 [60]°°

How good people imagine great humans. Against their sentimentality.

1 [61]

To formulate ideals, i.e., to re-create our devil as our god.

And to do that, we must have created our devil in the first place.

1 [62]°°

Everything good came out of something evil.

1 JULY-AUGUST 1882 19

x [63]?

People who strive for greatness find quantitative reasons for their perfection and satisfaction. People of quality strive for something puny.

1 [64]

The state of becoming absolutely cold to all previously held values precedes the state of warming up to them.

1 [65]°°

I am the advocatus diaboli® and God's accuser.

1 [66]?

The human being is too imperfect a thing. Love for a human being would destroy me.

1 [67]

Cruelty in enjoying compassion. Compassion is strongest, the deeper we come to know and love the other. Consequently those lovers who are cruel to the ones they love will get the most enjoyment from cruelty. Assuming we love ourselves the most, then the highest enjoyment found in compassion would be cruelty to ourselves. Heroic = this is striving for an absolute downfall into one's opposite, the reshaping of the devil into

God:® this is that degree of cruelty.

1 [68]

The conditions of existence of a being, as soon as they represent themselves as an "ought," are its morality.

1 [69]°% How the devil becomes God.

20 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

1 [70]° On the Philosophy of Recurrence on heroic greatness as the only state of those who are preparing the way.

(Striving for absolute downfall as means of enduring ourselves.)

Wanting to become a function: feminine ideal of love. The masculine ideal is assimilation and overwhelming domination or compassion (veneration of the suffering God).

absolute indifference to the opinions of others (because we know them through and through'°): but compassionate in our opinion of ourselves.

We must not want a single state, but must rather want to become repeating beings" = similar to existence.

I deliberately chose to live out my days in complete opposition to the life of someone with a religious nature. I know the devil and his plans for God.°®

"Good" and "evil" as sensations of pleasure and displeasure. Indispensable. But for each is evil.

Those who do not find the way to their ideal live more frivolously and more brazenly than those who have no ideal at all.

To hurt those we love – is the real devilry. In regard to our-selves it is the state of the heroic human being – the highest abuse of power. To strive for the opposite is part of this.

1 [71]

“Idealist” as the opposite of the honest and fearless one who knows. The judgments of idealists disgust me, they are completely useless.

1 JULY-AUGUST 1882 2I

1 bee

Joy in others being hurt is something other than cruelty, the latter is delight in compassion, and reaches its height whenever compassion is at its highest (at the point that we love the one we are tormenting).

If another were to hurt the ones we love, then we would become insane with rage, compassion in that case would be wholly painful. But we love them: and we hurt them. In that way compassion acquires a monstrous allure: it is the contradiction of two strongly opposed drives, which functions here as the highest allure.

Juxtaposed, self-mutilation and sensuality are the same. Or the clearest consciousness and torpor and lethargy after opium.

1 [73]

General question: how do contradictory feelings function, in other words, a duality? How do they relate as duality? (Weakening?)

The highest love for the I, when it expresses itself as heroism, is accompanied by lust for self-destruction, that is, cruelty, self-violation.’!

Those who loved humanity have hurt it the most”?

The beloved’s unconditional surrender and delight in suffering, the desire to be mistreated. Surrender becomes defiance against one’s self.

On the other hand, the man who is loved, who torments what loves him, enjoys his feeling of power, and even more so, the more he tyrannizes himself in the process: it is a doubled exercise of power. Here will for power'? becomes defiance against one's self.⁷⁴

1 [74]

The freethinker as the most religious person that now exists.

22 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

1 [75]? God killed God.

1[761° Morals died from morality.

1 [7717

A person of faith"? is the opposite of a religious person.

1 [78]?

Precondition of procreation should be the will to want to have an image and a legacy of the beloved person: and a monument to oneness with that person, indeed a consummation of the drive for oneness, through a new being. – A matter of passion and not of sympathy.

1 [79]

The preeminent and honest form of sexual relations, that of passion, is now accompanied by evil conscience. And the basest and the most dishonest by good conscience.

1 [80]

The confusion of the means used to preserve marriage: the woman believes that she is predestined only for this one marriage.

In truth everything is mere chance, and a hundred other men would be just as good for her. She wants to obey: she works for the man and thinks and says: "what haven't I done for you!" – but this was not done for "you," but rather for someone or other, who came within range of her drives. – The spouses are separated by career and daily work, which keeps things bearable. – Because men and women?! have not experienced earlier what friendship really is, they are not disappointed by the interaction: they know neither love nor friendship. Marriage is designed for atrophied half-humans.

1 JULY-AUGUST 1882 23

1 [81] Vain – insulted cautious – take heed immoral – despise.

1 [82]

He kills when he cannot live otherwise.

He robs when he needs an object or a person (marriage).
He lies when he wants to remain concealed for the sake of his goal.

x [83] Noon and Eternity Outline of a heroic philosophy.

1 [84]°°

Humans who strive for greatness are usually evil humans: it is the only way they can live with themselves.

1 [85]*4

How long (how many centuries) it takes before greatness becomes visible to humanity as greatness and shines – is my measure of greatness. It has probably been the case up until now that all the greatest ones are exactly the ones who have remained concealed.

1 [86]%

Anyone who no longer finds greatness in God no longer finds greatness anywhere and must deny its existence or – create it – help to create it.

8 x [87]°°

The enormous expectations that women?" bring to sexual love blind their eye to all broader perspectives.

24 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

1 [88]8

Heroism – this is the mentality of human beings who believe that they count for nothing in comparison to their goals.

Heroism is the good will toward absolute self-destruction.®?

The opposite of the heroic ideal is the ideal of harmonic total development: a beautiful opposite and one very much worth wishing for! But an ideal only for good human beings!

1 [89]

All h(uman) interaction revolves solely around pregnancy.

r [90°

When five people speak together, a sixth always has to die.

x [1]?!

All girls believe that a man makes friends with a woman only because he couldn't get any further with her.

1 [92]

Anyone who does not see what is superior in p(eople) will focus too much on what is base and with all too sharp an eye.

1 [93]?

When talents fade, a p(erson's) moral qualities become more visible.

1 [94]

Men are considered cruel, but women are cruel. Women are considered kind-hearted, but men are kind-hearted.

1 [95]

Ah, I'm so fed up with tragic faces and phrases!

1 [96] Schilling, Span(ish) Grammar, Leipzig, Glockner.>*

1 JULY-AUGUST 1882 25

1 [97]" Should a bond not tear,
you must try biting into it.'

1 [98]

Occasionally I feel enormous disdain for good people – their weakness, their wanting to experience nothing, their wanting to see nothing, their capricious blindness, their banal

wallowing in what is routine and comfortable, their pleasure in their own "good qualities" etc.

1 [99]"

Hitzig Untersuchungen über das Gehirn Berlin 1874.°8

Animal Depravity (Quarterly Journal of Science"? 1875

415-430. Lilienfeld Gedanken über die Socialwissenschaft.'""

1 [100]

Cosa bella e mortal, passa e non dural!!!

1 [ror]!

Columbus novus.

That's the way I want to go, and I trust

Myself from now on and my grip!

Open is the sea: into the blue

Sails my Genoese ship.

xx

Everything becomes new and newer to me

Behind me lies Genoa.

Courage! You yourself stand at the helm,

Dearest Victorial!0%1%

(Summer 1882)

26 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

1 [r]!06

The tree speaks.

Too alone I grew and too high:

I wait: but what am I waiting for, anyway?

xx

Too near to me is the throne of clouds:

I wait for the first lightning bolt.!"

1 [103] To the Ideal.

Whom have I loved as I love you, beloved shadow!

I pulled you to me, into me – and ever since

I have almost become a shadow, you a body.

It's only that my eye is unteachable,

Accustomed to seeing things outside itself:
 For it, you will always be the eternal "Outside-of myself"
 Alas, this eye is making me feel beside myself!°8!
 1 [ro]! "Joyful Science." (Sanctus Januarius)!!!
 This is no book: what use are books!
 These shrouds and coffins!
 The past is the prey of books:
 Yet in them lives an eternal today.!!*
 1 [105] In the Mountains. (1876.)
 No way back? And no way forward?
 Not even a path for mountain goats?
 xx
 So I wait here and hold on"! tightly,
 To whatever hand and eye will let me hold!!!
 7K
 1 JULY-AUGUST 1882
 Earth five feet wide, dawn,
 And below me – world, humans and – death!!!
 1 [106] To Friendship. Hail to you, friendship! My highest hope's First dawn!
 Alas, trail and night often Seemed endless to me,
 All life
 Aimless and despised!
 I want to live twice,
 Now I gaze into your eyes'
 Morning splendor and triumph, You most beloved goddess!!!"
 1 [107]
 The Phrase.' '®
 I'm a friend of the lively phrase:
 That jumps out at us with such good faith,
 That greets us with an artful curtsy,
 Endearing even in its clumsiness,
 Has blood within, can sniff heartily,
 Creeps even into deaf ears,
 And circles and flutters even now,
 And what it does – the phrase delights.
 Yet the phrase remains a delicate creature,
 Quickly ill but just as quickly healed.
 If you wish to let it live its fleeting life,
 Then your grip must be refined and light,
 Don' crudely grab and crush it,
 It often dies under an evil eye –
 And then lies there, so shapeless,
 So soulless, so poor and cold,
 Its tiny corpse terribly transformed,
 28 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Mutilated by death and dying.
 A dead phrase – an ugly thing,
 A bone-on-bone cling, cling, cling. Shame on every ugly business,
 Through which phrases and words die!
 119,120
 [Tautenburg Notes for Lou von Salomé)!"

1 [r]!?? Ls
 Humans who strive for greatness are usually evil humans; it is the only way they can live with themselves.

2.
 Anyone who no longer finds greatness in God, no longer finds greatness anywhere and must either deny its existence or – create it (help create it)

(3.)
 [+++]

4.
 The enormous expectations that women! bring to sexual love blind their eye to all long-range perspectives.
 Heroism – this is the mentality of human beings who believe that they count for nothing in comparison to their goals.
 Heroism
 is the good will toward absolute self-destruction.

6.
 The opposite of the heroic ideal is the ideal of harmonic total development – a beautiful opposite and one very much worth wishing for! But an ideal only for basically good human beings
 (e.g., Goethe)

1 JULY-AUGUST 1882 29
 Love is completely different for men than for women.!?* For most men, love is a kind of avarice; for the rest, love is the veneration of a suffering and shrouded deity."
 If friend Rée ever read this, he would think I'm crazy.
 How is it going? – There has never been a more beautiful day in Tautenburg than today. The air clear, mild, bracing:
 just as we all should be.
 Cordially
 F.N.
 I [109]!2°
 On a Theory of Style
 L
 The first thing needed is life: style should /ive.

2.

Your style should fit you in regard to one person in particular, to whom you wish to communicate yourself. (Law of double relation.)

We must first know precisely: "I would say and state this in such a way" – before we may begin writing. Writing must be a kind of imitation.

Because the writers Jack many tools enjoyed by speakers, they must in general have as their model a very expressive kind of speech: the written reproduction of it will necessarily come across much less colorfully.

5.

Wealth in life reveals itself through wealth of gesture. We must learn to feel everything, length and brevity of sentences, punctuation, choice of words, pauses, the order of arguments – as gestures.

30 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

6.

Careful with periods! Only those people with real stamina, also in speaking, have the right to use periods. For most people the period is an affectation.

7.

Style should demonstrate that we believe in our thoughts, that we not only think them, but also feel them.

8.

The more abstract the truth we want to teach, the more we must first seduce our senses into embracing it.

9.

The tact of good prose writers in selecting their methods consists in approaching the boundaries of poetic style as closely as possible without ever crossing the line.

10.

It is not good form, nor is it smart to anticipate the more obvious objections of our readers. It is very good form and very smart to leave the expression of our essential wisdom to the readers themselves.

F.N.

A good morning to you, my dear Lou!

1 JULY-AUGUST 1882 31

[110]!77

"Yes, a weaker sex!" – this is the way men talk about women,!7® this is also the way women!77 talk about themselves: but who believes that they are thinking the same thing

when they use the same words? But let the men think whatever they like for now; what does a woman usually mean when she speaks of the weakness of her sex? –

To feel weakness – this means not only to feel a lack of power, but rather: to feel a need for power.!7© She looks for power, she looks outside of herself for it, she wants support, she is a cornucopia of everything that she could possibly lean on, she coils herself demandingly around things that are not capable of giving support and attempts to hold on to them, yes

she likes to delude herself about the power of everything different from or foreign to her – she believes just as strongly in the power outside herself as she does in the weakness within herself. The feeling of weakness, felt at its most extreme, finds strength everywhere and projects power into everything outside of itself with which it comes into contact: and whenever the eye should contradict this, then the eye is – shut!

Such in fact is the state in which the weaker sex finds itself, and not just in relation to the men of its acquaintance, but also in regard to religion and custom: the weak woman believes in her inability to stand without support and turns ev-everything that surrounds her physically and spiritually into props – she does not want to see what all this really is, she does not want to test whether the balustrade along which she crosses the river will really hold up, she believes in the balustrade, because she believes in her own weakness and fear.

Whatever a woman in her situation leans on is in all cases not the power she knows, but rather the power she expects, wishes for and projects: and the greater her feeling of weakness,

the more power she will want to feel in whatever "gives her support."
The weakest woman will make a god out of every man:
and similarly something holy, inviolable, final, worshipful out of every precept of custom and religion. It is obvious that the 32

UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

weaker sex is more important for the emergence of religions than the stronger. And given how women are, if they were left to their own devices, they would consistently create out of their weakness not only "men" but also "gods" – and both, one would presume, would resemble one another –: as monsters of power!

1 [u

I.

131

On Women.

Female judgment and women's faith in (superstition about) the accuracy of their judgment.

Fem(ale) assessment of the affects,
of the individual virtues and vices,

. Fem(ale) judgment concerning men and women, state and nature, work, leisure, etc.

. In what way they feel obligated to claim as real something they nevertheless know to be unreal.

Io.

. Child raising partly educationally regressive and retarding, partly all too deinfantilizing. (fem(ale) rationalism)

To what extent women treat men like children.

. To what extent women seduce others into holding them in high regard and nevertheless bow before this regard (as before an authority)

. The history of what is perceived by women to be unwomanly, – according to peoples and prevailing customs.

The fem(ale) faith in some supreme fem(ale) virtue, which must exist, so that a superior nature of women may be achieved – and the act(ual) change of these "supreme virtues."

1 JULY-AUGUST 1882 33

u. Feeling of perfection and completion of her being e.g., while serving, obeying

12. Pregnancy as the quintessential condition, which has gradually, in the course of time, fixed the essence of women. Relation of all modes of female thought and action to this.

13. Denying, destroying, being alone, fighting, despising, taking revenge: why women are more barbaric in all of these things than men etc. etc. etc.

[2 = N V 9b. Summer–Autumn 1882]

2 [1]! Metteyya

2 [2] Carus, vergl(eichende) Psychologie?

2 [3]? Vogt? 19185 Lindau? 18772 Wilbrandt® 18761

2 [4]

The morality of the chosen or the free morality.

We as the preservers of life.

Inevitably contempt and hatred for life are emerging.

Buddhism.

The European drive to achieve will cause mass-suicide. In that regard: my theory of recurrence as the most terrible burden.

If we do not survive, then everything is finished. Our survival by means of an organization.

The friends of life.

Nihilism as a small prelude.

Impossibility of philosophy.

Just as Buddhism makes us unproductive and good, so under its influence Europe also grows: tired!

2 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 35

Good people, this is the weariness.

Reconciliation, this is the weariness.

Morality, this is the weariness.

Proper customs (e.g., marriage) this is the weariness.

Against idealists.

2 [5] That which is to come.

True striving into nothingness.

Wars over the principle of better-not-to-be-than-to-be.

(A)

First consequence of morality: life is to be denied.

Last consequence of morality = morality itself is to be denied.

(B)

Therefore: the first consequence falls away liberation of selfishness, liberation of evil, liberation of the individual.

The new good people ("I will this") and the old good people

("I should").

Liberation of art as rejection of unconditional knowledge.

Praise of the lie.

Reclaiming religion.

(C)

Through all this liberation the allure of life continues to grow. Life's innermost denial, moral denial, is set aside. – And with this the downfall begins. The necessity of barbarism, to which, e.g., religion also belongs. Humankind must live in cycles, the only lasting form. Not the longest lasting culture, but as brief and high as possible. – We at noon: epoch.

(D)

What determines the highest of heights in the history of culture?

The moment when the allure is the greatest. Measured by the fact that the mightiest thought is borne, yes even loved.

36 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

2 [6] That which isto come.

A Prophecy.

A. Victory of morality over itself.

B. Liberation.

C. Middle and beginning of the downfall.

D. Characteristic features of noon. E. Freely-chosen death.

2 [7]

Serpent, spoke Zarathustra, you are the most clever animal under the sun – you will know what strengthens a heart – my clever heart – I do not know. And you, eagle, you are the proudest animal under the sun, take my heart and carry it wherever it demands – my proud heart – I do not know.

2 [8]8

P(eople) who do not need to lie a lot make much of the fact that they only lie a little.

2 [9]

And yet proclaim to me, you animals: Is the sun already at its noon height? Is the serpent called eternity already coiling itself? Zarathustra goes blind.!

For me everything always turns to death. Who wants to be my destiny? I love every destiny. Zarathustra grows blissful!

Zarathustra knows nothing more, Zarathustra deciphers nothing more.

2 [10]

Always give back: never accept anything as a gift, other than

as a commendation and as a sign that we recognize those who love others by such signs and compensate through our love.!!

2 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 37

2 [11]

Taking away morality from humans because they are making such poor use of it: and forcing brutal feelings into them –

“thou shalt” – like soldiers –

2 [12]

Commit yourself to something e.g., “I want to be just.”

Only one sin: cowardice.

2 [3]

Lack of love likes to disguise itself as the absence of someone worth loving.

2 [14]?

A man uses love to search for an unconditional slave, a woman for unconditional slavery – love is the longing for a vanished culture and society.

2 [ss]

When faced with independent people who hate being bell-wethers, the moral person harbors a suspicion that they could be wide-rang(ing) predators.

2 [16]'4

Iron hates the magnet when the m(agnet) can't draw it completely toward itself. 2 [17]®

What we hate the most is not what keeps us from being loved, but what keeps us from loving fully.

2 [18]!°

Those who conceal nothing about themselves provoke outrage.

38 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

2 [19]!"

“Unfortunate one, your God has burst and shattered, and serpents dwell within him. And now for his sake you love even these serpents.”

2 [20]"8

We do not want to be spared by our enemies – any more than we want to be spared by those we love deeply.

2 [21]?

Watch out for that one: he speaks only so that he may listen afterwards: – and you only listen because it will not do to keep speaking forever – i.e., you listen badly and that one listens well.

2 [22]°°

That bitch sensuality, who only wants to carve herself a bite of flesh, knows all too well how to beg for a bite of spirit.

2 [23]"

It never gives, it does not even pay back – it only replies.

2 [24]

There are natures that give, there are those that give back.

2 [25]?

It is impossible to give gifts to truly just people – they give everything back.

2 [26]?

In the communication of knowledge there is always some betrayal.

24 2 [27]

There is shamelessness in all writing.

2 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 39

2 [28]

Anyone who loves God chastises him.

2 [29]°°

Superficial people always have to lie because they have no substance.

2130]?

To educate: i.e., educating someone to lie in all circumstances.

2[31]°®

Those who are truthful end up realizing that they always lie.

2[32]"

Those who lie contradict not only what they know, but also what they don't know.

2[33]°°

It is nobler to admit wrong than to be in the right.

2134"

A lie is the philanthropy of the one who knows.

2[35]? Suicide

2[36]°°

Justice only possible with respect to things.

2137]

Our influence as a necessary" deception.

2[38] Injustice shared is justice halved.°°

40 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

2139]

p. 200 Hum(an), All T(oo Human)

p 77 Dawn 167,8 Koyful) Science

2[40]

Terrible consequence, when human beings are loved only for the sake of God.

2[41]°8

"But how could you do such a thing! said a friend to a very clever p(erson) – it was stupid." It hasn't been easy for me either, replied the latter.

2[42]"

Those who want to ascend to ultimate knowledge"? must also leave truthfulness behind. The wall of knowledge'! definately cannot be scaled from the starting point of morality.

2[43]?

"Life for the sake of knowledge," wanting-to-stand on one's head is perhaps somewhat insane – but when it is a sign of joy, this wanting may continue, it doesn't look so bad an ele(phant* that is trying to stand on its head.)

2[44]*4

The price of a good reputation is usually too high: namely ourselves.

2[45]"

The danger for the wise is that they fall in love with the irrational.

6 2[46]°

Love for a woman! If it is not compassion for a suffering god, then it is an instinct for the beast concealed in women.

2 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 4I

2[47]*"

The touchstone for a person's nature is not the way it loves, but rather how all its vulgarity or superiority comes to light when it knows that it is loved.

2[48]

I am more surprised by blame than by praise; I have more contempt for praise than for blame.

2[49]*

Mor(al) outrage is the most insidious kind of revenge.

2[50]®

I like compassion only in the faces of the victorious. When these miserable people, whose appearance is painful, even so make compassionate faces, – – –

Compassion may be something for gods, but it suits heroes better to be cheerful about the misery that surrounds them.

[3 = Z I 1. Summer–Autumn 1882]

On the High Seas. A Book of Sentences by Friedrich Nietzsche.

"That's the way I want to go! And I trust

"Myself from now on and my grip.

"Open is the sea, into the blue

"Sails my Genoese ship.

"Everything becomes new and newer to me,

"Space and time shine far into the distance –

"Hail to you, ship! Hail to your helm!

"Around you roars eternity!" –!?

Silent Speeches A Book of Sentences.

"Beyond Good and Evil."

Book of Sentences.

"il sait gotiter sa vie en paresseux sense qui pond sur ses plaisirs.'

(Duc de Nevers.)

4

3 SUMMER–AUTUMN 1882 43

1. A: What is the meaning of justice? B: My justice is love with open eyes. A: But think of what you are saying: this justice would acquit everyone except those who judge! This love bears not only all punishment but also all guilt! B: This is the way it should be!

2. Becoming youthful late keeps us young longer. We do not have to look for youth among the young.°

3. When talents fade, a person's moral qualities become more visible; and it is not always stars that become more visible with the approaching night."

for that reason alone look with eagle-eyes for their base y qualities."

5. There is also an intrusiveness in those who know: this intrusiveness is condemned to see only the foreground of all things."

6. When five people speak together, a sixth always has to die.'?

7. God choked to death on theology; and morals on morality.!?

8. Those who have loved humanity the most have always hurt humanity the most: they have asked the impossible of it, as all lovers do.!*

9. So spoke a saint: "I love God – for a human being is too imperfect a thing. Love for a human being would destroy me."

10. The time has come when the devil must be God's advocate: at least if he himself wants to continue to exist.!!®

44 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

11. "You have become cold to everything that previously had value, colder than ice – but those who touch you now claim that you are red hot: and pull their fingers quickly away in the belief that you have burned them. And soon there will be people who seek you out in order to warm themselves on you."!"

12. It is treasonous when someone strives for greatness.

People of the finest quality strive for something puny."®

13. Those who do not make us fertile will surely leave us indifferent. Yet making others fertile does not come close to giving us a reason for loving them."

14. The third person is always the cork that keeps the con-ver-sation of two from sinking into the depths: which in certain circumstances is an advantage."°

15. Throw your words out ahead of your deeds: obligate yourself through your shame for the broken word.?!

16. It is the way of women to seduce their neighbors"? into having a high opinion of them and then to believe in this opinion as if it were an authority."

17. In denying, destroying, hating, taking revenge women are more barbaric than men."4

18. The sacrifices we offer only prove how much less we come to value everything else when we love something.

19. Whatever we love to do the most, we would like this to be regarded as the thing we find most difficult to do.

20. Behind all their female ambition women still have contempt for "women as such?"

3 SUMMER--AUTUMN 1882 45

21. What we recognize in other people, is also what we kindle

in them; and anyone who recognizes only the base qualities in people also exerts an attraction on these qualities and brings them to release. The affects of those closest to you that are directed against you are the critique of your knowledge, based on superiority?® and lowliness."?

The deepest love, e.g., does not know what to call itself and probably is asking itself, "am I not hatred?"?°

23. Masculine and feminine affects differ in their tempo: for this reason men and women will never stop misunderstanding each other.*!

In getting to know other people better we do not move outside ourselves, but rather ever further into ourselves.

24. We do the same thing awake as we do in our dreams: always, we first invent and poetically imagine the people with whom we associate – and immediately forget that they are invented and poetically imagined.????

26. Emotional needs should not be confused with the need for emotions that several extremely cold people possess."

27. Those who do not need to lie make much of the fact that they do not lie.

28. Women understand children better, but men are more childlike than women.?"

29. People of faith?® find their natural adversaries not in free-thinkers, but rather in religious people.

46 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

30. Those who create are the most hated: for they are the most thorough annihilators.*?

31. Phariseeism is not a kind of degeneracy in good people, but rather a condition of their being good."

32. We love life, not because we are alive, but because we are used to life.*!

33. From time to time even our virtues should be allowed to sleep."

34. You believe in your "life after death"? Then you must learn to be dead during your life.

35. Our flaws are our best teachers: but we are always ungrateful to our best teachers.

36. "Let's not speak of it!" – "My friend, this is something we shouldn't even be quiet about." 44

37. What do people know of love who have not been forced to despise precisely what they have loved!®

38. Seeing beyond ourselves is necessary in order to see well.46

39. "People are not equal!" – So speaks – justice."

We do not believe in many things only because we do not believe in the conventional way they are explained.*®

40. Those who are passionate about justice experience even their most painful affect as a kind of relief.

41. Ponderous, melancholic people become more lighthearted and rise to the surface through the very things that make others heavy-hearted, like hate and love."

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 47

42. Soap bubbles and butterflies and their human equivalents seem to me to know best what happiness is: to see these airy foolish agile dainty little souls fluttering about – this moves me to tears and poetry."

43. "Did you see your devil?"– "Yes, ponderous serious profound thorough pathetic: he stood there just like the genius gravitationis'' by which all beings and things – fall."

44. Anyone who would have compassion for the entire human race would have to be seen by each individual as hard-hearted and tyrannical.¥

45. A thing that is brought to light" ceases to interest us. So take care that you don't become too enlightened about yourself!"

46. We must know how to be a sponge if we want to be loved by a person who is filled to overflowing."®

Here lies the most frequent form of dishonesty among those who know: they deny the facts.

47. Anyone who has seen the ideal of a person perceives the real person as its caricature."

48. Some seek a midwife for their thoughts, others someone they can help: this is how a good conversation arises. But watch out if two midwives run into each other! They don't carry forceps for nothing!'

frivolously and more brazenly than those who have no ideal at all'?

50. The devil has the best perspectives on God: that's why he stays so far away from him – he is, after all, a friend of knowledge.

48 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

51. "Should a bond not tear,
You must try biting into it."°!

Marriage, the most dishonest and hypocritical form of sexual relations, may be right for those incapable of either love or friendship and for those who would like to deceive themselves and others about this deficiency: to this end, state and religion have declared marriage to be holy, and it also may be right for those who cannot be disillusioned by marriage because they have no experience in either love or friendship."

52. The danger for the wise is that they are most easily seduced into falling in love with the irrational.

53. Love for a woman! If it is not compassion for a suffering god, then it is the instinct that seeks the beast concealed in women."

55. To remain cheerful amid universal misery defines heroes: and not out of compassion, but out of abundance, they reward others and "sacrifice themselves," – as we say.°°

56. Self-interest and passion are married to each other: this marriage is called selfishness: this unhappy marriage!

57. What? you do not want to be judged by your effect, but rather by your intentions? But your intentions are themselves derived from your effect."

58. Anything questioned for a long time becomes questionable.°®

59. Terrible experiences lead us to speculate whether those who experience them aren't also something terrible: maybe even without knowing it.

3 SUMMER–AUTUMN 1882 49

60. Marriage is the most dishonest form of sexual relations; and for that very reason has good conscience on its side.'

61. We usually sacrifice too much for our good reputation: namely ourselves."!

Those wanting to become leaders must want to be regarded by their followers, for a while at least, as their most dangerous enemy.'?

62. People will chase after anyone who knows how to deceive them into thinking they have lost their way: it flatters them so much to hear that they have a way at all.'?"

63. The great thoughts that come "from the heart," the petty ones that come from the underbelly: both are badly conceived."4

64. "Great thoughts"? My friend, those are thoughts that puff you up and make you big: a windbag is not great!'

It is not how people love that reveals either the vulgarity or the superiority of their inner nature – for love is in all respects much more of a liar than a traitor! But it pays to look more closely at how people behave when they are loved! – And for a few who had reason to remain unknown, it was a subtle aspect of their destiny never to be loved."

65. Life for the sake of knowledge is perhaps an insane thing:

but still a sign of exhilaration. Watching someone who wants it is about as amusing as watching an elephant that tries to stand on its head.'"

66. "But how could you do such a thing! – said a friend to a very clever person – it was stupid!" – It hasn't been easy for me either, replied the latter.'

50 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

67. Jesus of Nazareth loved evil people, but not good people:

the sight of their moral outrage moved even him to curses.

Wherever judgments were rendered, he sided against those judging: he wanted to be the annihilator of morality.

68. Jesus said to the people: "love God as I love him, as his son: what do we sons of God care about morality!"

69. You think you seek "the truth"! You seek a leader and what you really want is to have someone command you!

70. Why so apart? – "I found no person I could still obey and no one I would like to command."®°

72. Love brings to light the lofty and rare qualities in people; in this way love is deceptive about them (most of all to themselves). But anyone who does not want to be deceived, pay attention to what happens when people know themselves to be loved but do not love: there the soul unwillingly reveals its sediments. 8

73. No one has ever arrived at complete knowledge by means of truthfulness.°%$%

74. We have rendered lightning harmless: but that is not enough, it should also learn to work on our behalf. – This is how I think of all the “evil” in you and me.

75. The Christian god, the god of love and cruelty, is a person who has been conceived very cleverly and without moral prejudice: just the right God for Europeans who want to subjugate the earth.

3 SUMMER–AUTUMN 1882 51

76. Whatever a particular era perceives to be evil, wherever it recognizes a contradiction with its ideal, is in truth only an echo of what earlier times have held to be good and, as it were, the atavism of an older ideal. Original sin – this is in all circumstances = original virtue.3°

78. When we have raised ourselves above good and evil, we see merely unintended comedy even in tragedy.°®

79. Philosophical systems are the most mundane form through which some people can talk about themselves – an unclear and stammering form of memoir.®?

80. To see tragic natures perish and still be able to laugh, surpassing the deepest understanding, feeling and compassion for them – is divine.

81. “There is no doubt that much lying and deceiving is done by those who believe in this cause: therefore everything about this cause is deception and lies” – this is the conclusion drawn by superficial people. But anyone who knows humans more deeply will draw the reverse conclusion: “therefore there must be something true about this cause: its believers only reveal through this how secure they feel and how for them any bait will do, as long as it is effective in luring someone to their cause."

83. It is essential to have seen someone asleep: otherwise it is impossible to know how that person looks. The face of your best friend that you think you know is your face in an imperfect and roughly polished mirror.?!

52 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

84. What difference does it make whether you are flattering a god or a devil, or whether you are whining to a god or a devil?

You are merely flatterers and whiners!??

85. Anyone who is a coward through and through is usually clever enough to take on so-called lovable qualities."

86. The consequences of our actions grab us by the scruff of the neck," quite indifferent to the fact that we have "bettered" ourselves in the meantime."

87. Commanding people will also command their God, however much they believe they are serving him.

88. A supremely moral mendacity would be conceivable by which people become aware of their sexual drive merely as the obligation to produce children.

89. He calls it party loyalty: but it is only his complacency which no longer lets him climb out of this bed.

90. When a particular virtue finally becomes habitual for us, we should at least have the good taste no longer to call it virtue, but rather "taste."

92. When the compassionate become shameless and tell us compassion is virtue itself: then they arouse our compassion.?"

93. Noble human beings always stand in the way of good people: the good often marginalize them merely by saying that they are good."

94. In the presence of a hero everything turns into tragedy; in the presence of a demigod – everything turns into satyr play."?

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 53

96. Criminals are treated by moral people as an appendage!" to a single action'®!— and criminals treat themselves the same way, especially if this single action was the exception in their existence: it works like a chalk line drawn around a hen.!°?

—
In the world of morality there is a lot of hypnotism.!°

97. You call them "lofty feelings," "sublime mentality": I see nothing more than lust for the heights and the spasms of a moral ambition.

98. Your stride reveals that you are not yet walking your path, your eagerness to dance would have to be evident. Dance is the proof of truth.!®

99. "Serious," "strict," "moral" — that's what you call him. To me he seems evil and unjust to himself, always ready to punish us for that and to play our executioner — and indignant that we do not allow it.

100. "Lofty feelings!" — Upon the heights there is no feeling of elevation, but rather of depths and of finally reaching solid ground for the first time: as long as the innocence of heights has really been attained.

101. By being willing to help, by commiserating, by subjugating themselves, by forgoing personal demands, even insignificant and superficial people may become somewhat bearable to look at: indeed they should not be disabused of the notion that this willingness to help is "virtue itself."

102. Morality is now the excuse for superfluous and random people, for worms that are weak in body and spirit who should not be alive — In this respect morality is mercy: for it says to everyone "you are really something very important": which of course is a lie.

54 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

103. That "a foolish woman with a good heart stands high above any genius," this sounds very good — in the mouth of a genius. It is his way of being polite — it is also a sign of his cleverness.

104. We do not find the vanity of others distasteful until it competes with our own.!

106. The natural consequences of an act are seldom deliberated as long as such consequences include public punishment and denunciation. Here flows the great spring of all super-ficiality.

107. Women direct their love toward those who inspire fear in them: this is their kind of bravery.!!°8

108. "One person is really still too many to have around"!

– thinks the solitary person. One times one is two.!!°

109. We love utility only as the vehicle for our inclinations:

and actually find the noise of its wheels intolerable.!!!

110. "Just being yourself": this may be the distinction we reserve for our best friend – with the result that they wish we would go to the devil."!

1. People may often be equal to what they do but not to their image of what they've done.!!?

112. The most beautiful colors with which the virtues shine are the invention of those who lacked them. For example, where does the velvet sheen of goodness and compassion come from? – Certainly not from good and compassionate people.

3 SUMMER–AUTUMN 1882 55

113. Only great criminals have any significance in world history, including those many who were capable of a serious crime but through some chance did not commit it.

" . ny « » C . » « a . nD C »

114. "Religious person," "fool," "genius," "criminal," "tyrant

– these are pejorative names and details in place of something unnamable.

115. Bad conscience is the tax that the invention of good conscience levies on human beings.

116. You want to be just? Unfortunate one, how do you propose to give to each his own? – No, I don't want that. I will give to each my own: '* that will be enough for everyone except the wealthiest people.!!°

117. Solitude makes us harder on ourselves and makes us yearn more for people: it builds character through both.

118. People are strictest with their God: he is not allowed to sin!"

God devised the teleology of pregnancy: then he devised women.

119. "I do not believe in anything anymore." – This is the proper mindset for a creative person.

120. La Rochefoucauld stopped halfway: he denied the "good" qualities of human beings – he should have denied the "evil" ones as well.

When moral skeptics have reached the point of mistrusting morality, then they still have one more step to take – skepticism of their mistrust. Denial and trust – here they shake hands.

56 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

121. Belief inside the form, disbelief inside the content – here lies the allure of the maxim – therefore a moral paradox.

122. We forgive our opponents most completely their – failures.'!"

123. What? You want to know yourself? Learn rather to know what makes you happy!

124. I want wishes, nothing but wishes: and always a new wish instead of fulfillment.!!8

125. The most expensive luxury that humanity has so far bestowed upon itself is the belief in something unreal, in selflessness. For this devalued what is most real, selfishness. – Since then all happiness is yearning!"

126. Intense hatred is also an idealist: whether in hating we transform our opponents into gods or into devils, either way we give them too much credit.

127. Even in hatred there is jealousy: we want to have our enemy for ourselves alone.

128. The solution for the riddle "woman" is not love but pregnancy.!?°

129. Our faith in others reveals where we would like to have faith in ourselves.!?!

130. "The heart is one of the entrails" – Napoleon once said.

The entrails of the head lie in the heart.!??

131. Every strong expectation outlives its fulfillment when the fulfillment comes sooner than expected. This friend arrived two days too early: his presence is unbelievable to me.

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 57

132. Knowledge would have little allure if we did not have to overcome so much shame on the way to acquiring it.!??

133. "Knowledge for its own sake" – this is the last snare laid by morality: with this there is once again complete entanglement in morality.!?*

"All women!? are either birds or cats or cows" – the look in their eyes shows which one.!?°

What is the best life? To be tickled to death.

135. "Morality itself was the first fall into sin: morality itself is the original sin" – everyone who knows thinks this way.

136. He has learned to express himself – but since then he is no longer believed. Only those who stammer are believed.

139. We do not believe that cold people are capable of foolishness.!?°

I spit on the educated rabble who are ashamed to say to themselves: "Here I feel nothing!" "Here I know nothing."

The one who knows lives among human beings not as if among animals, but rather as among animals.'?!

140. The inclination toward the tragic increases or decreases along with sensuality: it is part of every adolescence and young manhood.!"

58 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

141. There is much more intrusiveness in praise than in blame.!?3

142. Abundant good will to live – but too little will to suffer

– this is what makes people complacent.!?*

143. Objections, mistrust, infidelity are signs of health: all unconditional striving is a kind of pathology.!?

144. Anyone who feels the unfreedom of the will is mentally ill; anyone who denies it is stupid.

145. What is done out of love, this is not moral, but rather religious.

146. It is not enough to have talent: we must also be allowed to have it.!?6

147. Be wary of people with moral outrage: they have a stinger-like cowardly viciousness that they conceal from themselves.

148. The Christian God who is "love" emerged at a time when love was still not divine enough.

149. Good and evil people – it's all the same to me: but I despise cowardly and loveable people.!?7

The strength of good people does not lie in their goodness, but rather in the fact that their evil is strong.

150. Those who are teachers through and through only take seriously those things that have to do with their students – even themselves.!?8

151. "At least be my enemy": thus speaks true reverence, which does not dare beg for friendship.!?9

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 59

If you do not inspire fear in the first place and in all circumstances, then no one will take you seriously enough to finally come to love you.

152. All rights of ownership cease to apply for the one who knows.

When good people moralize, they arouse disgust: when evil people moralize, they arouse fear.

153. The intoxication of victory is always followed by a feeling of great loss: our enemy, our enemy is dead! We mourn even the loss of a friend less deeply – and therefore more loudly!

154. People of knowledge must not only love their enemies but also be able to hate their friends.!?*

155. It is in poor taste when people of knowledge make themselves out to be "moral people": anyone looking at them should be able to tell that they "have no need" of morality.

156. Everything about him is ripe for the harvest: but he lacks the sickle – and so he rips off the tassels and is annoyed.!

4!

157. Some travel in order to find themselves, others because they would like to lose themselves.

159. Insanity seldom occurs in individuals – but in groups, political parties, peoples, ages, it is the rule: – and that's why historians have yet to speak of insanity. But at some point physicians will write history.!*

160. When we love we create people in the image of our God: only then do we begin to hate our devil most completely.

60 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

161. It is not easy to find a book that would teach us as much as the book we produce.

162. Those who know "readers" certainly don't write for readers any more – but rather for themselves, the writers.!*

163. In the mountains the shortest route leads from peak to peak: but for that you need long legs! – Maxims are peaks.!*

*°

164. It is not enough to make amends for something, we must also remake ourselves, be good to ourselves again, for example, by means of some small, superfluous mischief or good deed.!*

4"

165. Giving to each his own: that would mean wanting justice and achieving chaos.

166. Here both these people have basically the same bad taste:

but one of them would like to convince himself!* and us, too, that his is the best. And the other is ashamed of his taste and would like to convince himself and us, too, that he has a different and better kind of taste – ours. All intellectual philistines belong to one of these two types.

When people freely take suffering upon themselves, they also have the free will to do themselves good: and whoever denies this – – –

167. Beware of good people, the eternal Pharisees, practicing history! They paint over the great people of the past until they look just as fat and well-behaved as good people."

Morality struts around pretending to be the antagonist of evil – – –

168. Another century of newspapers – and all words will stink. 150151

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 61

169. The one who knows dislikes wading into the water of truth, not when it is dirty, but when it is shallow.!??

170. To skeptics. – Those who grow too tired eventually lie down to sleep even in the snow – take care not to go too far.”

171. Anyone who climbs high mountains laughs at all tragic gestures. !>4

172. The air thin and pure, danger nearby – and the spirit full of cheerful malice: they go well together.’

It is a good way of getting through the “evil night.”!>”

175. There are feelings that want to kill us; but if they don’t succeed, they must die themselves.’58

176. Not only our reason, but our conscience, too, submits to our strongest drive, the tyrant within us. If we possess no such tyrant among our drives, then our individual drives compete for the favor of reason just as much as for the favor of conscience – and reason and conscience become almost sovereign.!°?

177. Those who commit suicide among us are giving suicide a bad name – not the other way around!!°®

178. It is nobler to admit wrong than to insist on being in the right – especially when you are right.!°!

62 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

180. Those who are truthful end up realizing that they always lie?

181. As in the case of the hypnotized, in many women! the intellect only appears suddenly and sporadically and with unexpected force: the spirit then comes “over them” and apparently not out of them. Hence their three-eyed® cleverness in interrelated matters – hence also their faith in inspiration.

182. There is much about evil people that disgusts me, but also much about good people: and, truly, it has nothing to do with their "evil"!!66

183. "It is not enough to punish criminals, we should also reconcile with them and bless them: or did we not love them as we caused them pain? (Did we not) suffer by being forced to use them as a means of deterrence?"!°7

184. Wherever friendship just won't turn into love, isn't the reason a natural opposition like that between dogs and cats?

185. We must repay good and bad things: but why particularly to the person who has done something good or bad to us?!°®

186. A punishment should be devised in such a way that after a violation we will accept it as our right and our honor.!®

187. Lying involves contradicting what you know, but even more so contradicting what you don't know. – The second kind of lie is so common that it is no longer a stumbling block:

human interaction is shaped by it.!7°

3 SUMMER–AUTUMN 1882 63

190. It is impossible to give gifts to truly just people: they give everything back. Which is why those who love them find them horrifying.'

191. We no longer love our knowledge enough as soon as we communicate it.!7*

192. That bitch sensuality, who only wants to carve herself a piece of flesh, knows all too well how to beg for a piece of spirit.!75

193. Poets are shameless about their experiences; they exploit them!"6

194. Whether you betray yourself or me, you are a traitor. 70 writers."

195. Watch out for that one: he speaks only so he will be allowed to listen afterwards – and you listen only because it will not do to keep talking forever: i.e., you listen badly and he listens only too well.'78

196. We do not want to be spared by our true enemies: any more than we want to be spared by those whom we love deeply!"?

197. Unfortunate one, your God has burst and shattered, and the serpents dwell within him – and now for his sake you still love even these serpents!.'@°

198. Those who conceal nothing about themselves provoke outrage.'?!

199. Iron hates the magnet when the magnet can't draw it completely toward itself – and yet still attracts.'@?

64 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

200. Not what keeps us from being loved, but what keeps us from loving fully, is what we hate the most.!??

The thing we hate about our neighbors is that they cannot have our ideals.

201. When we become tired of ourselves and no longer like to love (ourselves), then loving thy neighbor is advisable as a cure: insofar as our neighbors will very soon require that we believe in our own "lovability."

202. "Our neighbor doesn't live in the neighborhood": this is how all politicians and peoples think.!*4

203. This virtue would lead to your downfall, my friend: but heaven gave you a second virtue, which sometimes makes you unfaithful to the first.

204. Through loving someone we want to get past our envy of that person.!8°

205. We all pretend to be more naive than we are – and in fact even to ourselves.!8°

206. Substantial obligations don't make us grateful but vengeful.!87

207. We like to call in witnesses when we want to talk about ourselves: this is what is called "human interaction."!88

208. We grow accustomed to scorning evil when we live only in the company of weak and petty people: evil in great people has something inspiring about it.

209. Lack of love likes to disguise itself as the absence of someone worth loving.'@?

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 65

210. A man uses love to search for an unconditional slave, a woman for unconditional slavery – love is the longing for a vanished culture and society – it harkens back to the Orient.!"°

211. Injustice should only be taken on by someone who can bear it: that's what humaneness calls for.!!?

The most poisonous arrows are shot at a friend who severs ties without even giving insult.

213. After a break-up. – “Say what you will to hurt me: you know me too little to know what will hurt me most.”

214. Monogamous love is a kind of barbarism, perpetrated at the expense of all others and damaging to knowledge. Rather, you should love many: – then love forces you to be just to each lover: and thus to know each lover. Loving many is the way to knowledge.’

215. The cruelty of those who feel nothing is the opposite of compassion; the cruelty of those full of feeling is compassion raised to a higher power.

216. What we have learned to believe without justification is the hardest thing to unsettle by means of reasons.!?®

217. Anyone who is chaste by nature does not think highly of chastity, with the exception of a few vain fools. Their idolizers are those who have reason to wish that they could be or could have been chaste – the swine of Circe.

218. Certainly, anyone who finds chastity very difficult should certainly also be advised against it.!?°

66 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

219. Needs of the heart. – Animals that go into heat do not so easily confuse what is in their hearts with their lust: in the way that people and especially females!%° do.

220. A woman doesn’t want to admit to herself how much

“ . » . .

manliness” (any manliness) she really loves in her beloved: that’s why she idolizes “the humanity” in him – to herself and to others.

The “I” subjugates robs kills and commits every act of violence: by doing all of that it wants nothing but to nurture its pregnancy: so that it may bear a god and see all of humankind at its feet.!?°

221. With these people, what is fabricated is not their outward appearance but rather their inner world: they abhor appearing to be semblance and surface, but that is what they are.!8

222. Heroic humans with knowledge deify their devil: and in the process experience what it is to be a heretic witch prophet, skeptic, sage, to be inspired and overwhelmed, and drown at last in their own ocean.!?

223. Once we have the will to suffer, then we are just one step away from having the will to cruelty – and in fact as a right as well as a duty.”

224. It takes along time to die for the second time: this is true of everyone who has come back to life after death.?”!

225. Even when a people goes backwards, it is pursuing an ideal: it always believes in a forward.”

226. The tendency to let ourselves be disparaged, robbed lied to and exploited, in short, humility can be the shame of a god among humans.”

3 SUMMER–AUTUMN 1882 67

227. Anyone who, like a god, creates a new good has always been taken for a devil by the guardians of the old good.

228. Only vice-ridden people are unhappy when their need for vice merges with their disgust with vice – and their disgust never outgrows their need.

229. We have been poor observers of life if we have failed to notice the hand that in a merciful way – wanted to kill.2°% It is not everything you have done in life but rather your accompanying opinion of what was done that determines whether you now feel satisfied or dissatisfied with yourself.

230. A little revenge is in most cases more humane than no revenge at all.

231. Those who despise themselves nevertheless still flatter themselves with the thought that at least now they are not lying to themselves.

232. Friend, everything you have loved has disappointed you: this disappointment has in the end become your habit: and your last love, which you call the “love of truth,” is perhaps just the love of disappointment.

232. The inability to lie is in no way the same as the love of truth. In fact, in every love there is the ability to lie – in the love of truth as well.

233. He shakes himself, looks around, runs his hand over the top of his head – and he is always called someone who knows. But freedom from fever is still not knowledge.”

68 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

234. “Where is there an ocean in which it is really still possible to drown? namely, a human being!” – this cry resounds through our time.°°

Possessing the truth is not awful, just tiresome, like every possession.

235. Malice is where presumptuous and weak people meet: but they misunderstand one another.”

236. Those who feel an aversion to the sublime regard not only a yes but also even a no as too overwrought: – they are not to be counted among negative people, and whenever they stray onto this path, they stop abruptly and flee – into the bushes of skepticism.

237. In battle we obviously risk our lives; but the victors are tempted to throw their lives away. In every victory there is contempt for life.

238. “I do not shun human contact: it is precisely the distance, the eternal distance between any two human beings that drives me into solitude.”

Insatiable need for something and at the same time disgust toward that thing – this is what constitutes the feeling of those who are vice-ridden.

239. Even truth, like all women, demands of her lovers that they become liars on her behalf – yet it is not her vanity that demand this, but rather her cruelty.

240. “I did that,” says my memory; “I could not have done that” says my pride and remains adamant. In the end, memory gives in – 708

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 69

241. To look at things coldly, so that they lie there naked and without plumage, – this is called “love of truth,” and is only the incapacity to lie.”

242. Those who are sick with fever see only ghosts of things,

and those without fever see only shadows of things: and both require the same words."!°

243. "I listened for an echo – and I heard only praise."?!!

244. Discovering that we are loved in return should actually have a sobering effect upon us with regard to the being that is loved: how can this being be so foolish as to believe in you?!"

245. "Why is it always necessary also to hate whatever must be loved? Is not love the greatest of all agonies?" That is why humans must be overcome.?!?

246. If you have seen the dull indifference with which the black man endures the kind of severe internal illnesses that would almost certainly bring you to despair: this should cause

you to consider just how little pain is really present in humankind, aside from the ten thousand people who have superior spirits. 214

247. "My happiness begins when I see myself beneath myself, as a being among other beings."

248. Our era is a tumultuous era, and for that reason not an era

of passion; it keeps itself constantly overheated because it senses

that it is not warm – basically, it is freezing. I do not believe in the greatness of all of these "great events" you speak of.

79 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

250. These days events do not acquire greatness until there is an echo – the echo of newspapers."

251. Poor artists! So what does the nervous rabble demand of you? It does not wish to be reeducated but rather to be amazed !?!7

252. Not the intensity but rather the duration of lofty feeling?!® makes superior human beings: they should not be confused with human beings who are having moral spasms!?!?

253. And once again. – Honest with ourselves and with anyone else who is a friend to us, courageous against the enemy,

generous to the vanquished, courteous to all.??°

254. Those who have no will of their own want at the very least to be know-it-alls.

255. Originally herds and herd-instinct; the self as exception, perceived by the herd as nonsense, madness.

256. The sage as astronomer. – As long as you feel the stars as something “above you,”??! you still lack the knowing gaze: there is no longer any above and below with respect to knowledge.???

257. It is possible to be so closely related to someone that in our dreams we see them doing and suffering everything they really do and suffer: because it would be possible to do and suffer the same thing ourselves.

258. Those who have character also have their typical experience that always recurs.???

People fall into two categories, those who are capable of terrible deeds and those who are not.

3 SUMMER–AUTUMN 1882 71

259. There are two fundamentally different kinds of people: the ones who feel ashamed about the ebb of their feelings (in friendship or love), and the ones who are ashamed of the flood.

Precisely because one lover’s passion reaches its climax and recedes, the growing passion of the other lover tends to last somewhat longer than it would have otherwise: the curve of the longer-lasting lover.”

260. Whether people count as good or evil is in no way determined by their actions, – but rather by their opinion about these actions.??

261. Only when selfishness has become greater cleverer subtler more inventive, will the world begin to look “more selfless.”

262. Anyone who can meet the eye of a thinker directly is struck by the kind of horrible impression that some creatures make when their eyes slowly extend out of their heads, as if on stalks, as they look around.

263. Even saints require the annihilation of morality: so that they can do whatever they want.

264. Those who attain their ideal are thereby already – transcending it.??°

265. People of genius are intolerable unless they possess at least two qualities: gratitude and purity.

266. That which love gives can never be given back and reciprocated: any drive to reciprocate should be drowned in the ocean of love.

267. Why would you want to treat me justly? – said the saint. I already embrace your injustice as my due.??7

72 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

268. At the sight of the sublime, sublime humans become free, firm, expansive, serene, cheerful: but the sight of the perfectly beautiful jolts them and bowls them over: in its presence they negate themselves.

269. Anyone who does not feel at home in the sublime will perceive the sublime as something uncanny and false.

270. Many a peacock hides its tail from all eyes: and calls this its “pride.”?78

271. Strange! As soon as I want to conceal a thought from myself and keep it at a distance, then you can be sure that this thought will approach me in bodily form, as a person, and now I must deal deftly with this “angel of God”!

272. To offer blessings when we are cursed is inhuman. So better to join in the cursing for a bit!?”

273. I have seen the triumph of many a truth, but never without the well-meaning support of a hundred errors.?°°

274. Whenever skepticism and yearning mate, mysticism emerges.

Those whose thought has crossed over into mysticism, even once, do not escape without a stigma on all their thoughts.

275. Degree and kind of a person’s sexuality reach up to the highest pinnacle of that person’s intellect. 231232

276. With our principles we want to tyrannize our habits, or to justify, or to venerate, or to castigate, or to conceal them.

Nevertheless, people with the same principles probably want to use them for something completely different.???

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 73

277. Will – this is an assumption which to me explains nothing. For the one who knows, there is no willing.

278. We have yet to see La Rochefoucauld inverted: someone who shows how the vanity and selfishness of good people have twisted certain human qualities and in the end have rendered them – evil and harmful.

279. Do not repay evil with good: for this would shame the recipient, but rather show that something good was done to you.²³⁴

280. All admiration involves some fearing and running away from ourselves – yes, with even some self-denial, self-disavowal mixed in.

281. Those who despise themselves may want consider that they are not only despised but also despising: they may thus admire themselves as despisers!??°

282. In so much as you know what you do, you are blessed. In so much as you do not know, you are cursed and a sinner before the law – said Jesus to someone who broke the Sabbath – advice for all breakers and lawbreakers.??°

283. A sudden outburst of revulsion toward ourselves can just as well be the result of a more refined taste – as of a corrupted taste.

284. “Will to truth!” Let us stop speaking so simplistically and bombastically! We want to make the world conceivable to ourselves, to make it observable where possible – yes, to make!

– All of physics is directed toward making-observable.

74 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

285. Will and intellect (or, as is said, heart and head) – this is man and woman; their interactions always have something to do with love, procreation, pregnancy. And mind you, the heart is in this case the man and the head the woman!

286. He is alone and has nothing but his thoughts: it is no wonder that he often caresses them and teases them and tweaks their ears! – But you rubes say that he is a skeptic.

287. “God’s love for humans is his hell” – said the devil. “But how is it possible to ever fall in love with humans in the first place!”²³⁷

288. In routinely conditioning ourselves to tolerate the presence of all kinds of fellow humans, we unconsciously condition ourselves to tolerate our own presence: which is actually humanity's most incomprehensible achievement.

289. The magnitude of human egoism is not the sword that hangs over humankind, but rather the reverse, the feebleness of its egoism, whereby humankind could too easily become fed up with itself.

290. Under peaceful conditions warlike people attack themselves – for lack of other enemies.*®

291. To create: this means to move something out of ourselves, to make ourselves emptier, poorer and more loving. Once God created the world, he became nothing more than a hollow concept – and love for what was created.

292. "Here is the island of the solitary one. And here I welcome everything that is becoming wandering seeking fleeing! Hospitality is my only remaining form of friendship! I love all that becomes!"

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 75

293. The love of life is almost the antithesis of the love of a long life. All love thinks of the moment and of eternity – but never of "the length."

294. "My love is so demanding that it instills fear! I cannot love without believing that the one whom I love is destined to do something immortal. And he guesses what I believe – what I demand!"

295. Those who know avoid self-knowledge and let their roots sink into the earth.

296. The most comprehensible part of language is not the word itself, but rather tone, force, modulation, tempo, with which a series of words is spoken – in short, the music behind the words, the passion behind this music, the person behind this passion: thus all of those things that cannot be written. So there is no point in being a scribbler.

297. Gait and kind of gait. – I learned to walk: since then I have allowed myself to run.???

298. The free spirit. – Those who can fly know that they do not have to be given a push in order to take off; as all you entrenched spirits need to do in order to “progress” at all.?4°

299. To be ashamed of our immorality: this is a step on the way that ends with being ashamed of our morality as well.?4!

300. We reserve our most profound and enduring love for our children or our works alone: and our love for ourselves is always a symptom.?*?

301. We will never discover some natures unless we first invent them.?4?

76 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

302. “Human interaction corrupts character, particularly when character is absent” – Timon said.?*?

303. “You know nothing about w(omen): how is it that sometimes you are right about them?” With w(omen) nothing is impossible.74

305. Whoever writes maxims does not want to be read, but rather to be memorized.?*°

306. Most humans?” act like cattle in a herd and not like persons especially when satisfying their lust (for food women possessions, honor power) – even when they are persons.

307. Everything turns out the best for me: who has the desire to be my destiny? I love every destiny.?“

308. The age of greatest events will in spite of everything be the age of smallest effects if people are made of rubber and all too elastic.

309. “Before every action I am tormented by the fact that I am only a dice player – I no longer know anything about freedom of the will. And after every action I am tormented by the fact that the dice fall in my favor: am I then a cheat-er?”

– Scruples of the one who knows.”

310. Unlearning revenge would also have to mean unlearning gratitude, but not love.

311. Wanting-to-love reveals weariness with the self and pure satiation, yet wanting-to-be-loved reveals demand-for-self, selfishness. Lovers give themselves away; those who want to be loved would like to receive a gift of themselves.

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 77

312. The reasons used to justify the punishment for a crime can also be used to justify the crime.

313. Maturity in a man: this means to have rediscovered the seriousness that we had as children at play.?°

"Ella guardava suso, ed io in lei"?! Dante. And I in her!??2

314. I've never been lonely before: I felt a longing for people, I looked for people – always I found only myself – and now I no longer feel a longing for myself!

Puny people are incapable of evil: consequently they are incapable of becoming either good or evil people. (But good is a kind of diminished evil?)

To want something and to make it happen: is taken to be the mark of strong character. But not to want something in the first place and still to make it happen is characteristic of the strongest, who feel themselves to be fate made flesh.

Anyone who remains a child forever also remains an innocent egoist and, as the object of envy and hatred for "guilty" egoists, is hated more.

315. I love human beings: and never more so than when I can resist this compulsion."

316. A woman attempts to love whenever she feels compelled to obey and serve: it is her work of art, created so as to bear her yoke more easily.

317. "Love me!" – a god who speaks with humans like this has gone mad – out of jealousy.?>*

78 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

318. We do not hate something when we think that it is inferior, but only when we think that it is equal or superior.?°

°

320. It is not the criminals' crime, but rather their cowardice and foolishness after the crime, that allows us to think contemptuously of criminals at all.

temptuously of criminals at all.

321. Evil acquires a bad reputation only after being confused with what is low and disgusting. Until then it is attractive and encourages imitation.

322. All women for whom sexual satisfaction has been forbidden by customs and shaming find religion to be something irreplaceable, as a more spiritual release of erotic tension.

(323.) My love for human beings ebbs and flows: and every single individual whom I love is only an occasion for this love.

To realize this is depressing.

324. We occasionally embrace an individual out of love for humanity because we cannot embrace everyone: but we should never reveal this to the individual!°°

Good is puny evil: that is why puny people so easily become good people.

325. Those to whom we feel closest are always loved at the expense of those from whom we feel more distant.

"The weaker person is the better person" – say our moralizers.

Weak people say "I have to" strong people "it has to."

3 SUMMER–AUTUMN 1882 79

Women commit ten times fewer crimes than men –

thus they are ten times more moral: according to statistics.

326. The innocence of egoism is characteristic of a child: and if you do not become like children then you will never enter this heavenly kingdom.*"

327. We should take leave of life the way Odysseus left Nausi-caa –blessing it more than loving it.°®

328. We do good deeds for our neighbors, but we don't create for them: thus speaks the honesty of all who create.?"

329. The love for those who are distant, those to come, is superior to loving thy neighbor: and the love for things is superior to all love for persons."

330. I want to say "enemy," but not "criminal": I want to say

c . » « » KS »

vermin," but not "scoundrel": I want to say "sick," but not "monster"; I want to say "fool," but not "sinner."?!°!

331. Denying procreation to all cowards: this should be the negative morality of women.

332. Solitary people love what it is to be human – but they don't love human beings: and when this love-of-what-it-is-to-be-human has accumulated and become dammed up within them, it then cascades forth like a torrent on whoever comes to mind, regardless of whether it is an enemy or a friend.

333. You say, "I love myself," "I despise myself," "I pity myself"

– my friend and denier of God, I do not want to challenge your "I," but this myself of yours is just as poetic and invented as any god – you must deny it, too.

80 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

334. Making compassion and sensitivity toward our neighbor a part of morality (or even morality itself) is a sign of vanity, assuming we are compassionate and sensitive by nature – which means lacking pride and nobility of soul.

The cult of compassion is only proper for people who did not come to know it from their own experience.

335. If we train our conscience properly, it kisses us at the same time as it bites.??

336. Morality is the posturing of humans in the face of nature."

337. "Perhaps a devil invented morality in order to torment humans with pride: and then sometime a second devil will take morality away in order to torment them with self-contempt."

338. "There are no humans, for there was no first human": this is how animals make inferences.?"4

339. The familiarity of superiors is embittering because it may not be reciprocated. Courtesy is advisable instead, i.e., the enduring impression that there might be something for superiors to honor.

340. I do not understand why we find it necessary to slander others. If we want to hurt people, we only need to say something true about them. ?°6

341. We always know a little too much about everyone."

praise, we always praise only our own taste – which also goes against all good taste.?"®

3 SUMMER –AUTUMN 1882 81

343. Only human beings resist the pull of gravity: they would like to fall constantly – up.

344. The ladder of my feelings is long, and I do not at all mind sitting on its lowermost rungs, precisely because I often have to spend too much time sitting on the highest ones: for there the wind is biting and the light is often too bright.

345. Jealousy is the most inspired passion and nevertheless still the greatest folly.?"

346. Like the scorpion, those who burn with jealousy turn the poisonous stinger against themselves – yet without the scorpion's success.?"°

347. Not that you lied to me, but rather that I no longer believed you, this is what has shaken me.??!

348. I should forgive? But I don't blame you for the same reasons you blame yourself: how could I then forgive you??'?

349. Talking a lot about ourselves is also a means of concealing ourselves.?"?

351. The hatred of evil is a ceremonial robe that Pharisees use to disguise their personal antipathies.'""°

Music is for women?"6 a form of sensuality.

Women are much more sensual than men, precisely because compared to men they become far less aware of sensuality as such.??77

82 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

352. In today's music there is an audible synthesis of religion and sensuality: and consequently more of woman than has ever existed in music before.

I and Me are always two different persons.?"®

353. Ever since I saw the storm-tossed ocean and above it a pure shining sky, I am no longer fond of all the sunless, overcast passions which know no light other than lightning.

354. All successful people understand the difficult art of knowing the right time to – go.?"

Those who give a taste of their minds are liked: but those who devour minds are feared. The moment you are liked, consider how near the moment is when you – –

355. It is not their love of humanity, but rather their impotent love of humanity, that stops today's Christians from erecting stakes for the burning of heretics.2°

356. You believe, so you claim, in the necessity of religion! Be honest! You believe only in the necessity of police and live in fear of robbers and thieves stealing your money and your tranquility!#@!

357. How moral and sublime people become every time they have a good chance of using these qualities to inflict pain!#?

358. Nobility in obedience, freedom under coercion and law, contempt for the rebellious desires of slaves: these are the marks of the first caste "human."

359. Eleven-twelfths of all great men in history were merely representatives of a great cause.

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 83

Until now humanity's perception has been too dull to recognize that the most powerful humans were great actors.

360. Only those who dramatize their virtues become famous in their lifetimes."

361. "I don't like him." – Why? – "I am no match for him." – Has any person ever answered in this way??@*

362. When hungry for people we look above all for comfort food, even if it is not especially nourishing: like potatoes.

364.285 Rebellion is the slave's noblest attitude.7*°

365. When you taste best, that is when you must stop letting yourself be eaten – this is the secret of women who are loved for a long time.

366. Dramatizers of greatness who are unaware of their play-acting have the same effect as the truly great and even surpass them – in brilliance.

We always create a distance around ourselves through what we admire and how we admire it.

368. It isn't what he does and how he schemes against me during the day that bothers me: but that I appear in his dreams at night – gives me chills.7%°

369. Through music the affects take pleasure in themselves."*

impervious to even the best rational objections once a decision has been made: in other words, a periodic madness.?"°

84 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

371. "What is freedom? – Your good conscience" – said Periander, the seventh sage.

"I could do this or that or something else, anything would be instructive, particularly if it would lead me astray and cause me distress" – this is how free spirits think and speak, the lovers of knowledge: for this reason they laugh when they are accused of weak will and irrationality.

372. Have I ever felt a pang of conscience? – My memory is completely silent in response to this inquiry.

373. Morality is a proto-scientific method of coming to terms with the explanation for our affects and states. Morality has the same resemblance to a future pathology of general feelings"?! that alchemy has to chemistry.

374. There are no moral phenomena at all; but rather only a moral interpretation of certain phenomena (– an erroneous interpretation!))???

375. Criminals are usually no match for their deeds, they recant and slander them.?"?

376. "Better to lie in bed and feel sick than to have to do something" – all self-tormenters live by this secret principle.

377. Recognizing that I agree with others makes me slightly suspicious of whatever it is we agree upon.

378. The one who knows finds the pia fraus?' even more tasteless than the impia fraus.?"°°

379. Beware the sancta sim plicitas:?" she is the one who always had the task of building a fire around the stake.??®

3 SUMMER–AUTUMN 1882 85

380. At one time the religious explanation supported the scientific one: and even now the moral explanation supports the physiological one. Those who think very little and have learned very little trace everything back to morality, their mood swings under the influence of the weather, digestive problems, anemia, their urinary needs or the equivalent, their lack of success, ennui, dissatisfaction, insecurity.

381. If you wanted to say out loud all the things that you have already done in your thoughts, then everyone would scream: "away with this disgusting vermin! It befouls the earth" – and they would have all forgotten that they had also done the very same thing in their own thoughts. – This is how candor makes us moral.?"?

To speak in physiological terms, the drive of the weak to be assimilated by the strong finds expression in morality.

382. "I love her and that is why I wish she loved – but why me in particular? I do not love myself enough for that" – this is how divine love speaks out of the mouth of a man.

So you wish to beguile him? Then pretend to be embarrassed around him.?'®

383. Demanding to be loved in return is vanity and sensuality.

384. People who mistrust themselves want more to be loved than to love, in order, if just for a moment, to be allowed to believe in themselves.

A god who loves is not worthy of letting himself be loved: he prefers to continue to be hated.

86 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

sion for humans: the latter would cause the very rapid downfall of humankind.

386. A little more compassion among humans, and despair over life would knock at the door.

387. "Love your neighbor" – that means above all: "leave your neighbor alone!" – And precisely this part of virtue is the most difficult!

388. Trivial suffering makes us small, great suffering makes us great. The will to suffer greatly should therefore be a requirement of selfishness.

ment of selfishness.

390. An enchanting work! Yet how unbearable that its creator constantly reminds us that it is his work. Doesn't he know that "the father" is always a comical figure?

391. Happiness in frequent, small doses rewards us with misery in frequent, small doses: and thereby corrupts character.

392. All creature comforts should be used as a sick person uses a bed: for convalescence.

393. We do not find the embarrassment of very clever people believable.?

394. H(umans) are the animals with red cheeks: all too often they have had to be ashamed of themselves." "I am predestined to see and not to believe, to me all people of faith are something foreign and noisy."

3 SUMMER--AUTUMN 1882 87

395. There is a kind of arrogance in goodness that manifests itself as malice. Our vanity becomes most difficult to wound precisely in those moments when our pride has just been wounded.

396. These two wenches, past and future, are making so much noise that the present is running away from them.

397. To make a "thou shalt" out of an "I feel like," to reshape habit into virtue, customs into ethics: this is a subtle old ancient form of second-rate counterfeiting – and I still see through it today.

398. "Thou shalt" sounds sweeter to most than "I will this": the herd-instinct still lingers in their ears.

399. In a certain state of illness it is impossible to be anything but miserly. Miserliness is an affect. You love my level-headedness too much: even this miserliness is illness.

400. We become mistrustful not because we find a reason to be so, but rather "we always find a reason" to be mistrustful when we become mistrustful.

401. Under certain circumstances the overall damage is less when people unleash their affects on others than when they unleash them on themselves: this is especially true of creative people, whose usefulness extends into the future.

402. We would be in big trouble if people did not have their malicious petty thoughts! How much more pleasure do they have then, how much less pain do they inflict upon us then?"

88 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

404. It is the heart that inspires: and it is the mind that heartens us and keeps us cool when we are in danger. Oh language!

405. What? A great man? I see in him only a dramatizer of his own ideals.

Selfishness in the case of thieves, robbers, usurers and speculators is fundamentally unambitious and unassuming enough: certainly there is nothing easier than merely wanting people's money.

406. Faust, the tragedy of knowledge? Really? Faust makes me laugh,

407. The supremely tragic motifs have up to now remained unused: poets know nothing from experience about the 100 tragedies of conscience.

408. People speak of the causes of affects and mean the occasions for them.

409. He has sacrificed people for the sake of his knowledge and is proudest of nothing so much as this cruelty against himself.

410. In those who know, compassion seems almost laughable, like sensitive skin on a giant.?!"

412. Being compassionate as well as cruel is necessary for being either.

413. More than a few who wanted to exorcise their demons have thereby driven themselves into the swine.?!?

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 89

414. "Those who praise" mostly portray themselves as giving something back: in truth they want to be given a gift.?'?

415. Human beings are not revealed in their affects, only their affects are revealed.!?

Our eyes hear more subtly than our ears: we have better understanding and taste when we read than when we hear – with books as with music.

417. Christianity poisoned Eros: while he did not die of it, he did degenerate into "vice."?!°

Full of passion but heartless and playful: that's how the Greeks were, even Greek philosophers, like Plato.

418. Intimacy is genuine only in heartless people and for them almost a shameful thing.'

That's how an explosion happens by striking a match.

420. If the goddess of music wanted to speak in words rather than tones, we would cover our ears.

421. Responding to praise with delight is in some people intellectual vanity, in others a sign of a courteous heart.?!®

422. We lie with our tongues, but we tell the truth with our mouths and faces?! – this is how physiognomists see it.?2°

423. Sensuality hastens the growth of love so that the root stays weak and the whole plant is easily torn out.??!

90 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

424. Some people feel a deep need for their enemies: for them alone they also feel hatred at first sight.???

425. My eyes see other people's ideals, and I am often transported by what I see: but you nearsighted people then think these are my ideals!

426. The morality of every society says that isolation is guilt.

428. When we are forced to see people in a new light, there is a tendency to blame them harshly for the inconvenience they cause.'

429. In kindness there is no trace of hate for people, but for that very reason all too much contempt for people."

431. Like a tree: the more it wishes to grow upwards into height and light, the more strongly its roots must reach in the opposite direction: its will goes inwards, downwards, into the darkness, the depths, outwards – into so-called "evil."?2°

432. You call it God decomposing himself: yet it is only him shedding his skin: – he sheds his moral skin! And you are supposed to see him again soon, beyond good and evil.

433. A people is a detour of nature, on the way to 5, 6 great men.°27

434. At patriotic festivals even the spectators are among the performers.??8

3 SUMMER-AUTUMN 1882 91

435. Even the ugly has its ugly little ceremonial robe: it is called "the sublime."???

436. What is good? – "That which is pretty and moves us at the same time" – answered a little girl.??"

If God is a God of love, then conscience's bite would have to be God's bite and consequently a bite given out of love.??!

437. Courageous, heedless, mocking and even somewhat violent: that's how wisdom wants us: she is a woman and – only ever loves the warrior.3??

438. Many soldiers and yet so few men! Many uniforms and even more uniformity.???

439. "Once again the time of harvest is past: the wind blows over the empty fields, and now even the most bountiful crop seems to me a monstrous loss" – this is the way every creative person feels.

440. A real man wants two things: danger and play. That is why he desires a woman as the most dangerous plaything.??*

441. The responsibility of a woman is to discover and preserve the child in a man.?

442. To want the emancipation of women achieves only the emasculation of men.

443. Man should be trained for war and woman to help the warrior's recovery: anything else is foolishness.?3° mind but – unfortunately – also to those who darn its socks 237338

92 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

There is no more pitiful group than scholars: with the exception of those few who have been scarred by war in body and mind.

There are too few men: and that is why women are becoming manly.???

445. What a subtlety it is that God learned Greek when he wanted to become a writer; just as subtle, that he did not learn it better!?*0

This thinker is colder than ice; for that reason he burns the fingers of those who touch him and is easily regarded as red hot.34!

3 (2) Pine and Lightning.

High above human and beast I grew;
And I speak – No one speaks with me.

xx

Too alone I grew and too high:
I wait: but what I am waiting for, anyway?

xk

Too near to me is the throne of clouds, –
I wait for the first lightning bolt.??%

xk

3 B"

Portofino

Here I sit waiting – waiting? Yet for nothing, Beyond good and evil, and lusting no more
For the light than for the darkness, Friend of noon and friend of eternity.

xk

3 SUMMER–AUTUMN 1882

3 (4)? On the High Seas.

Friend – spoke Columbus – do not trust
a Genoese ever again!
He's always staring into the blue,
What is most distant draws him all too much!

ok

Whomever he loves, he likes to lure Far beyond space and time – –
Stars beyond stars shine above us, Eternity roars all around us."

93

[4=N V 9c. N VI 1b. N V 8.

November 1882–February 1883]

4 1]

We are about to encounter the greatest excitation – and behind it, the backlash! the yearning toward nothingness! – And we do not want to perish, either in this excitation or in this yearning

– we friends of life.

4 bl

I have the most extensive soul of all Europeans now living or who ever lived: Plato Voltaire – – – it depends on conditions that do not entirely depend on me, but rather on the "essence of things" – I could become the European Buddha: which admittedly would be a counterpart of the Indian one.

4 [3]!

In all first encounters there is luck and some kind of good omen.

4 [4]?

A false saying goes as follows: "those who do not redeem themselves, how can they redeem others?" If I have the key to your shackles, why would your lock and mine have to be the same?

In war you are holy and even when you murder and burn.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 95

“Uni-form” is what they call it, the thing they wear: uni-for-

mity is what they cover with it.⁴

You should go back to sleep – and dream better.

This cruelty sits in my guts. See, I am evil.

You say: it is the cause that justifies the war? The war is what justifies the cause!®

Herds are no good, not even when they follow you.

The shepherd is a gilded tool of the herd.

4 [5]

Reason is the exception even in the wisest person: chaos and necessity and whirling of the stars – this is the rule.

We must make our death into a festival and thereby be a little malicious toward life: a woman who wants to leave us, us!

As for heroes, I do not have that high an opinion of them:
but still: it is the most acceptable form of existence, namely,

when there is no other choice.

4 [6]?

We both have something for each other: you the affects I the reasons.

I make balsam for my wounds from my own vitriol.

I milk your udder, beloved misery!

Many god-humans? have existed on earth: and all god-humans created their god.

There is no greater enmity on earth than between god-humans and their gods.

96 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

You brothers, I have exposed myself: I am not ashamed to show myself naked.

Shame is the ghoul who became a companion of humans
when they were seized with the desire to transcend animals.
People are free to believe in Zarathustra: what does Zarathustra care?

4 [7] Demigod. Hero. Man. Child.

Am I not after all a comrade of companion-animals.

4 8]

I come to help you – and you complain that I don’t want to weep with you.’®

4 [9]

I have known this for a long time: people like my m(other) and s(ister) must be my natural enemies – nothing can be done about this: the reason lies in the essence of all things.

Being with p(eople) like them poisons the air for me, and I require a lot of self-overcoming.!!

4 [10]

To men. This is the doctrine of holiness.

To women. Beyond good and evil.

To children. Noon and eternity.

Zarathustra among animals. The seven solitudes.

4 [11]

Any single one of my affects would have brought about my downfall. I have always played one off against the other.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 97

4 [12]

There should not be any people who instill disgust or hatred in me.

4 [13]!

"Like Brahma, men live alone; like gods, they live in twos; like a village, they live in threes; where there are more, there is bustle!3 and turmoil."!4

Do not speak as a human does to animals, you say, – – –

My strongest trait is self-overcoming. But I also have the greatest need for it – I am always on the edge of the abyss.!°

I am speaking and a child is playing: is it possible to be more serious than we both are right now?!

4 [14]

I am not great enough not to have these feelings: but I am great enough not to be ashamed of them.!"

4 [ss]

There is no one alive who would be worthy of praising me.

For man "I will this" for woman "I must"

I belong to the race of berserkers, of libertines, of those obsessed with revenge, of religious fanatics – I myself almost forgot it.

4 [16]

Morality has been taken to its pinnacle by freethinking and it has been overcome.

I am addressing men, spoke Zarathustra – tell the women to go away."

98 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 i)"

A fool spoke in this way: make the old sacrifices to a new spirit, transform the old soul by means of a new body.

Blood justifies nothing; blood also redeems nothing. I dislike those love me(a}ls,?? – – –

4 [18] *

The best man is evil, the best woman is bad.

It was the love of shepherd and herd that from this time on conceived benefit as good and holy:

It was the love of children and race: this love was rage against the betrayers of the love of all, and guilt was a betrayal

of the love of all.

They conceived good and evil out of love: and not out of prudence, for love is older than prudence.

What universal love demanded was once useful: and whoever felt the strongest love was made by the herd into its shepherd.

Loving thy neighbor was still insignificant, the I despised:
and the herd was above all else.

4 [19]

I honor all h(umans) I despise only the Pharisees.

4 [20]"

One morning Zarathustra climbed up a mountain: when he was alone with himself he glorified himself in this way:
you,

my book, – – –

Humankind has no goal: it can even set a goal for itself – not for the end, not for preserving the species, but rather for abolishing it.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 99

And the people should all speak: this criminal is holy.

The creator (the one who knows), the communicator (the artist), the simplifier (the lover).

Bear my virtue! (as a superpower).

State and society are not necessary for some: but they must endure them and withdraw as much as possible.

Austerity of the one who cannot love.

4 [21] An uncanny and inglorious goal.

4 [22] %

(One day Zarathustra glorified himself and spoke in this way)

They must combine three characteristics: to be authentic, to want and to be able to make themselves understood, and to be privy to knowledge (into one)

the disciples of sacred selfishness or one of the three or to be able to be merely a tool?" of the three.

he should say: I am evil, I preserve the force of evil.

All people should turn their existence into the goal of the plan.

Up to now there has been no goal: onward, so let's seize one for ourselves.

Speaking on behalf: of vain people, of cruel people, etc.

IO UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

The supreme pleasure: that which we must do, even that which we want. In this way to integrate ourselves into the grand plan.

4 [23] All creation is communication.

The one who knows the one who creates the one who loves are one.

4 [24]

1000 formulas for the recurrence (is the threat).

4 [25] The birth of the superhumans."®

4 [26]

Good people as the necessary Pharisees.

Here, too, there is a contrast like the one between religious people and people of faith.

Those who create what is good find their opposite in those who preserve what is good.

The point where people find the courage to perceive their evil as their good e.g., Christians their "cowardice."

4 [27]°*°

Good people now almost worthless.

It all depends on evil people with religious intentions! And it has always been that way!

4 [28]?

I have to be an angel if I want to live: you do not have such hard conditions.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 IOI

4 [29]?

At the same time, let your enlightenment also be a dawn.

Error in crime.

it is not pleasant feelings that are called good – but rather states of fullness of power

She was aroused by what they once revered.

you must newly redefine your need: that which already is should be a necessity for you.

4 [30]

Anyone who lives at the foot of the highest Alps does not see their peaks: excuse me – – –

4 [31]

We are also punished for our virtues.??

4 [32]

They call it a love meal when their redeemer is devoured out of love.

Churches are founded on blood and reason-shunning.

4 [33]

But what are you not saying about the faithful of the correct faith? What does your silence mean? – Zarathustra smiled and said only the words “All honor to the vanquished!”

4 [34]

If compassion does not have to break through a hard shell

– –

I presuppose compassion: to be cruel is a disease of the brain and of the nerves.

102 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

We can only be silent when we have bows and arrows: otherwise we babble and – bicker.

I would like to remove from the world its heartbreaking character

4 [35]

It is not the finger of God that is crushing your windpipe. Long ago, they say, God did approach the dying: then he became anguished and horrified.

4 [36]°°

Actors have little intellectual conscience: they believe in whatever lets them instill the strongest belief.

Only the appraisers and the inventors of new values are creative:3’ the world revolves around them alone. Anyone who instills belief in new values is known among the people as “creative” –

4 [37]°8

Anyone who sees the base qualities in a person also usually feels a certain attraction for these qualities and triggers their release.

As one who creates, you run away from yourself – you cease being your contemporary.

Disgust at filth can be so great that it prevents us from cleaning ourselves.

Fools want to have it better than good.

4 [38]?

What must I do to become blessed? Be blessed*? and do what you must do.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 103

Something becomes dear to us: and no sooner do we love it with all our hearts, than the tyrant, the higher self, speaks to us: "give me that very thing as a sacrifice!" – and we give it to him.

I urge you to battle, not to work – I urge you to victory, not to peace. May your work be a battle, your peace a victory.

I awoke you from your sleep, for a nightmare oppressed you. And now you say: "what should we do now! Night is all around us." – you ungrateful ones!#!

Everything about women is a riddle – everything about women has one solution: pregnancy.*?

If you want to have an easy life, then always stay with the herd. Lose yourself in the herd! Love the shepherd and honor the fangs of his dog!

If you know how to bark and bite, then – be the herd's dog: then you will make life easy for yourself.

I know everything that is good and everything that is evil:

I

also know what is beyond good and evil.

Good and evil are God's prejudices – said the serpent. But even the serpent was one of God's prejudices.

The Church is the stone on the grave of a God-made-human: it does not want him to be resurrected.

I love myself as I love my God: who could forgive me a sin?

I know only sins against my God: yet who knows my God? –

104 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [39]® Noon and Eternity. Thus spoke Zarathustra. 4 [40]

What keeps me alive? Pregnancy: and every time a work was born, life hung by a thin thread.

I have hidden myself away. I want to keep my disgust from them, these puny people. This has become most difficult for me: but they are blameless, like grass and weeds.

We are only ever pregnant with our own child.®

You say "this is dark." I placed a cloud in front of your sun.

But look how the edges of the cloud are shining and becoming bright!

Don't look at the sun! The moon is still too bright for your nocturnal eye!

You should love peace as a means to a new war!

In war, revenge is silent; in war, what is person(al) dies.

4 [41]*°

Lies and dissimulation – how all education works.

How should I make fun in a terrible way?

"You have overcome me" See to it that I become wings for you and not a stumbling block!

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 105

4 [42]"

There once was an ancient*® righteous god; he had substance and also a heart: and much anger and love were in his vitals.

And behold, love played a trick on him and he fell in love with humans: so that this love became hell for him.

What did this ancient righteous god do? He convinced a human woman to bear him a son: and this son of God gave humans only this advice: "love God! as I love him! What do we sons of God care about good and just people!"

And like a jealous lover the ancient righteous god persecuted humans with his love."

Do you think he succeeded? In time, he convinced precisely those among humans he did not like, good and just people. They called themselves "Church" and the chosen: and babbled a lot about their love for God – love-deprived people! Then they broke the ancient righteous god's heart: and he suffered the same fate as his son: he died on the cross of compassion. In truth these good and just people are corrupters of the zest for life and not just of the ancient righteous gods.

"Three things should always accompany us – they were always saying – truth, money and virtue: this is how we love God."

"We are chosen and the most superterrestrial ones on earth."

4 [43]!

Whatever we most love to do, we would like this to be regarded as the thing we find most difficult to do: and be regarded as such by ourselves.

Our sacrifices prove only how little every thing means to us when we love something."

Moral states and strivings are only means to knowledge, immoral ones as well.

106 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

The pleasure in knowing is an extremely intensive faith. If we do not achieve this, then there is still a wanting-to-know

in response to stimuli, e.g., as desire for security or novelty or desire for something worth desiring, yet to be discovered.
Since the ones who know spoke only of knowledge, this involves
much mendacity – they had an interest in letting knowledge appear to be the most valuable state.
Lovers of knowledge! And you have never even killed a human being in order to see how it feels!
The perfect knowledge of necessity would abolish' every "should" – but to understand even the necessity of "shoulds"
as a consequence of ignorance.

4 [44]"

As happy as an elephant when it tries to stand on its head.*°

You lack the courage to burn yourself up and to perish: and you will never become something new in this way. That which today gives us wings color fashion and force will be ashes tomorrow.

Marriage might be right for those incapable of either love or friendship – for almost everyone then – and perhaps even for those very rare people who are capable of both at the same

4 [45]

There is another kind of virtue, a mercenary one, and it wants to be paid well, either here or in a not-here-place and it calls this "justice."

Oh you friends of gift-giving virtue, let us dance in mockery of all mercenary virtue.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 107

But you have not yet learned this from me: how to dance in mockery.

4 [46]

That which is to us warmth or light or noise or array of stars

– may seem somewhat different to senses other than human ones: yet it will never be goodness or wisdom or love.
Loving thy neighbor. When utility is the driving force.'

4 [47]

all around you is a meaning that makes things degenerate, and "distress" is absent in everything"

4 [48] Community (not herd) his overcomings tablet difficult
That my animals without [-] willingly [-] escort® to me.

4 [49]°

The interpretations 1) Error of the first cause, a god conceived as opposite (— — —

Your life is wasted: you are like a sycophant.
where your poverty and sobriety cried out to heaven let a lightning bolt lick you with its tongue!
they shot an arrow of flaming love into the universe.
It is not the ignorance of people that is pitiful: what is pitiful is the people themselves!

108 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Science only as a kind of asceticism.
exploitation of the accidental — ambiguity as the condition for life in many species — consequently indifference to essence

How is it possible that you narrow souls can keep up with my thinking?

4 [50]

Don't get incensed! They are taking your money away from you! and there are more important things that poorer people also have access to. Jesus as nonmonetary sacrifice!

62 4 [s]

Asceticism of the intellect as preparation for creating. Intentional deprivation of the creative drives.

4 [52]

There are preachers: they teach suffering. They serve you, even if they hate you at the same time.

I do not address you as I would address the people. For them, the best thing is to despise and destroy themselves: the next best thing is to despise and destroy each other.

4 [53]

Every effect is followed by an effect — this belief in causality is anchored in the strongest of the instincts, the instinct for revenge.

Let's not confuse these things: the downfall of an actor is not being praised, the downfall of a genuine person is not being loved.

The antithesis of an actor is not an honest person, but rather a secretive self-deceiving person.

(most actors belong to this group)

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 109

4 [54]

"Evil has its heroes just as good has its heroes" – in the mouth of a La Rochefoucauld this is complete naivete. Seeing and still not believing is the cardinal virtue of the one who knows.

In striving not to know themselves ordinary people are very subtle and devious.

In G(ermany) aspiration is admired much more than ability: it is the right place for unaccomplished and pretentious people.

4 [55]

The sight of naive people is a delight, as long as they are evil by nature and have an intellect.

Sly people are usually simple and not complicated people.

Labyrinth.

Labyrinthine people never seek the truth, but rather always only their Ariadne – whatever they might say to us.

4 [56]°°

When we feel comfortable around p(eople), we like ascribing this comfort to their and our morality.

Skepticism regarding all moral values is a symptom of the emergence of a new moral code of values.

When we no longer feel ashamed even about our own evil, this is a step forward in intellectual taste.

To have no phrase at the ready that would corrupt his philosophy –

IIIO UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Contempt for what I do, and contempt for what I am.

The Church is nothing but a profoundly mendacious kind of st(at)e.

The masculine animal is cruel to what it loves – not out of malice, but because when it is in love it feels itself too strongly and no longer has any feelings at all left over for the feelings of others.

4 [s]"

Those who are lacking in love are stingy even with their courtesy.

In matters of honor, women are coarse and clumsy.

If we want to have friends, we must be willing to go to war for them, i.e., we must be able to be an enemy.

Today they had the good intention of being friendly: but how miserable they were at it, what little inventiveness!

I divide philosophical people into two categories: those always pondering their own defense and those pondering attacks against their enemies.

The hero is cheerful – this displeases writers of tragedies. With sarcastic people, feelings seldom spill forth, but always very loudly.

It is astounding to what foolishness even sensuality can be led when corrupted by love, how as soon as love speaks to it, sensuality loses all good taste and calls what is ugly beautiful.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 - FEBRUARY 1883 III

4 [58]

So-called lovable people know how to spend the small change of love on us.

All those who have not yet forgotten how to digest their experiences have also not yet forgotten the slothfulness of digestion: they become indignant about it, in this time of haste and stress.°®

For women there is only one single point of honor; they have to believe that they love more than they are loved. Just beyond this point lies prostitution.

Cruelty toward the man she does not love.

Will to self, selfishness is a subtle and a later evolved refinement-ment of the will to pleasure: insofar as that will to pleasure is a self.

"You" is older than "I" and yet still survives in the J.

"T? – this is a working hypothesis for the purpose of making the world conceivable – just like matter and atom.

4 [59]?

As soon as prudence says, "don't do that, it will turn out badly for you" – I have always disobeyed it.

A bad reputation

The utile is always just a means, its end in any case is the dulce"? Utilitarians are stupid.

They do not love me: is this a reason not to bless them?

Behold! The world has just now become perfect.

II UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [60]

sit tibi terra levis"? to wish people in Germany well it is necessary to wish that they might find the earth rather heavy.

4 [61]

Basic tenet

It could not be tolerated: therefore the following things that make life easier are required.

Away with good and evil!

Highest degree of self-satisfaction!

Tragic people step back!

Avoiding the strong affects!

The liberation of multifaceted people.

Do not act differently, but rather think differently of your self!

The vanity of sublime people!

against the cruelty of the heroic.

all these life improvements are useless because our value

judgments have not changed, e.g., health.

against "all-too-hasty" people.

4 [62>

Petty thieves, petty backbiters, petty cynics and detractors should be wiped out – not murderers

there should be no compassion for mosquitoes"? and fleas

Contemptible and terrible people.

The forests should be preserved, evil people should be preserved.

4 [63]

Do people who know have ownership? Truly, I forgot it – or did I unlearn it?

4 4 [64]7

Our evil affects also have a conscience and become annoyed when they have let themselves be overcome.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 113

Conscience is a ventriloquist, when it speaks, we cease to believe that its voice comes from us.

Religion wants to make people happy and to put "I must" in place of "thou shalt": it wants to free us from what is impossible for humans in morality.

Now I am just – means in many cases "now I am avenged.""°

The filthiest thing about "good people" is how they interpret their inclinations and disinclinations as their duty.

The pride of the unhappy lover tells him that his beloved does not deserve to be loved by him at all. But a superior pride says to him: "No one deserves to be loved. – You just do not love her enough!"

4 [65]

The unhappiness of the unhappy lover does not end when love is returned, but rather when love is increased."

If we want to be rid of people then we only need to diminish ourselves in their eyes – this touches their vanity immediately and they run away.

As long as you remain on hostile terms, your time together is not yet at an end – she should not be allowed to see you at all, that is how superior and distant you should be toward her.

4 [66]

The less he is accepted, the more Zarathustra keeps giving. "I was stingy – you were right to disparage me!"

Sequence of themes to be arranged according to their philanthropy. he is being exiled.

114 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [67]

Conquering our affects means in most cases temporarily inhibiting and damming them up: thus increasing the danger. Most people who rescue some unfortunate person from danger were driven not by compassion but by courage and danger.

Recklessness has done more great deeds than loving thy neighbor.

Humans are only now making the world conceivable to themselves – and we are still in the process of doing so – : and once they have understood it, and they feel that it is completely their work – alas, and now they must Zove their work, like every creator!"

Men, as long as there are men, will be trained for war and hunting: that is why they now love knowledge as the most extensive opportunity for war and hunting. What a woman could ever love about knowledge would have to be something else – – –

4 [68]

We take the bitterness that we feel toward people and use it to justify our moral outrage – and we admire ourselves in the process: and the fading of our hatred to justify our forgiveness

– and we admire ourselves once again.’®

If we have enough of the truth, we no longer need lies to interact with people: with these lies we can deceive and lead others astray any way we like.

4 [69]

The highest form of courage in those who know is not revealed when they provoke wonder and horror – but rather

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 115

when they have to be perceived by those who do not know as superficial, lowly, cowardly, irrelevant.

Those who know must also understand how to place the crown of victory on their own heads: they cannot wait because it is this that drives them to new transformations.

4 [70]

The passion of two people for one another – this is in all circumstances two passions, and with different arcs peaks speeds: their lines can cross, nothing else.

We say pleasure and think of lusts, we say sense and think of sensuality, we say body and think of underbellies – and in this way we deprive three good things of their dignity.

Bourgeois and courtly virtues do not understand each other and malign each other.

Even our ability to learn and our industriousness have to do with talent.

That everyone is permitted to learn to read and reads, this will eventually ruin not only writers but even minds in general.

4 [71]

He wronged me – this is bad. But that he wants to go so far as to beg my pardon, this drives me crazy!®!

It requires very good character not to attribute the unpleasant consequences of some trivial folly to our character.

To actually attribute the unpleasant consequences of our own folly to folly and not to our character: this requires more character than most people have.

116 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

No sooner do we progress even one step beyond average hu(man) goodness, than our actions are reprimanded.

You say, “I like this” and think you are praising me! – Oh you fools, how I like this!

Scientific people share the fate of rope-makers: they weave their strand longer, but in the process they themselves move – backwards.

82 4 [72]

Life is hard to bear: it requires defiance in the morning and surrender in the afternoon

I am absent-minded: I don't have any appetite until after a meal.*?

Truly, the refutability of a theory is not the least of its charms.*4

Constitutional monarchs were thought to be virtuous – they can no longer “commit injustice” – but in return they were stripped of their power. Since then they have wanted nothing but war – why is that?

Those fortunate enough to remain obscure should also take advantage of the freedom that darkness affords and especially “whisper well.”®°

4 [73]

I hate honorable men?” far more than sinners!

Do I love music? I don't know – too often I also find myself hating it. Yet music loves me – and as soon as someone leaves me, music jumps into my lap and wants to be loved.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 117

How long until fame arrives?®®

One moment he squares his shoulders as if the whole weight of the world were to be laid upon us – and the next moment he trembles like a rosebud that is weighed down by a mere dew drop. My brothers and sisters, do not act so gently toward me!

we are all comely sturdy male and female donkeys, and we are certainly no trembling rosebuds.

4 [74]

In order to need brakes,” it is first necessary to have wheels.

I have lived close to death for too long to have any fear of life. I call such p(eople) “totalities”

4 [75]

I call them actors (those who communicate)

Out of overflowing life, superhumans have an opium smoker's hallucinations and madness and Dionysian dance: they do not suffer from the pains that follow.

Illness now leads to much that is not in itself a symptom of illness: to a vision.

Not your sin – your sobriety cries to heaven?!

Save us from sin and give us back our arrogance!

The pale criminal in a dungeon and by contrast Prometheus!
Degeneration!

"We want to create a being" we all want to have a part in it, to love it, we all want to be pregnant – and therefore to honor

and respect ourselves.

118 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

We must have a goal that makes us all love one another! All other goals deserve to be annihilated!"?

4 [76]"

To have understood a philos(opher) and to be convinced by him.

Today I turn everything into gold, give me what you will – destiny!

Don't let yourselves be deceived! The most active peoples are now the most fatigued! They no longer have the strength to be lazy!

The only happiness lies in creating: you all should join me
in creating and in every action you will have this happiness!

You should preserve chaos within you: those who are yet to come want to form themselves from it!

Redemption from the eternal flux.

4 [77]

We often perform our actions as an opiate against the past.

To do our favorite thing without describing it in lofty phrases

– can be heroism. To be ashamed of sublime gestures.

"I follow" – not "I will this."

"I couldn't spare anything when I created superhumans. All of your evils and falsehoods, your lies and your ignorance – everything is in their semen."

(Contra strict vegetarianism) Do we really want to create lamb-souls and visionary virgins? Lions are what we want and monsters of force and love.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 - FEBRUARY 1883 II

Let humans be the impetus for something that is no longer human.

Not to become unworldly – but rather to overpower the world and ourselves within it.

I want to turn procreation and death into a festival.

4 [78]

We must be as good at being cruel as we are at being compassionate: let us guard against becoming smaller than nature!

I teach not only compassion but also cruelty: however, I also teach that intellect is part of both, and a goal.
We must prepare the earth for the superhumans and animals and plants
I inoculate you with the madness
Your excess love is there for the puny people.
You see her on stage, but you must see her in life and not in any way slight her.

Your best things amount to nothing without a performance.
Moral people feel smug about their pangs of conscience.

4 [79]

You are waging war? You fear one of your neighbors? So remove the border markers – then you will have no more neighbors.”

4 [80] To begin with funeral rites.

120 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

I foresee something terrible. Imminent chaos, everything in flux.

1. Nothing that has value in itself – nothing that commands “thou shalt.”

2. It is intolerable – we must counter the spectacle of this annihilation by creating.

3. We must counter these shifting goals with a single goal – create it.

4. As material we have everything that has been incorporated, in this we are not free. 70 grasp this material, to com-prehend it (through science).

5. To create superhumans after we have thought about all of nature in relation to ourselves, made it conceivable.”

6. We can only love something that is wholly related to us:
we have the most love for a being we have conceived. When it comes to a work and a child, love doesn’t need to be commanded. Advantage of superhumans.

4 [81]

I do not want life again. How have I endured it? Creating.
What makes me endure the sight of it? a glance at the super-humans who affirm life. I have tried to affirm it myself – Alas!

4 [82]*8

Thinking of life should be the focus of recuperation: otherwise thinking only of responsibilities.

Mémoires.

I grasped primum vivere, '® with vivere!

to know in order to live – earlier: in order to deny life.
° and everything that has to do

4 [83]

The dissolution of morality has as its practical consequence the atomistic individual and eventually the fragmentation of the individual into pluralities – absolute flux.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 121

This is why, now more than ever, one goal is needed and love, a new love.'®! 4 [84]'°?

There is a danger of turning back into animality. We create a posthumous justice for all of the dead and give their lives a meaning when we shape superhumans out of this material and give all of the past a goal.

If I did not love humans, how could I stand Zarathustra?

Honor actors for my sake and seek the best ones offstage!

Whip.

4 [85]

When Zarathustra had said this, a mom!" waved to him and spoke: "Now I gladly want to die, for my mouth has nothing more to teach Zarathustra."

Do not fear the flux of things: this flux turns back into itself: it flees itself not just twice.!°*

All "it was" becomes an "it is" again. The past bites all that is future in the tail.

Where "should" is no longer felt, –

Emergence of love – love as consequence of morality.

4 [86]

I still have all these wild dogs at (my place), but in my cellar.

I do not want to ever hear them bark.!

Then a mom waved to him and said: Now I die in peace I have experienced Zarathustra.

122 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [87]

No one comes to see me. And I myself – I went to see everyone and found no one.!"

4 [88]!07

On the penultimate day Zarathustra sent home the disciples who had accompanied him and spoke thus to them:

The location Zarathustra laughed at, must [– –]

Everything has 2 faces: one of passing away, one of becoming.

The more there is to the individual, the more the herd to which it belongs will advance. The bon gont'8 of morality.

of knowledge reaches up to the highest level
If you had any idea of the agony of responsibility that superior humans feel!

4 [89]

On the Morality of Superior Humans.
Everything that is otherwise moral has become love here.'
Yet now a new "thou shalt" begins – the knowledge of the free spirit – the inquiry into the supreme goals.

4 [go]

Just as we no longer need morality, so – we no longer need religion either. The "I love God" – the single ancient form of the religious – is converted into the love of an ideal – has become creative – nothing but God-humans.
Morality is needed: by what standards are we to act, since we still must act? And we must evaluate what we have done – by what standards?

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 123

Finding errors in its genesis is no argument against morality.
Morality is a condition of life. "Thou shalt"

On the sanctification of the passions.

He obeys as much as he can.

I have lived on the narrowest stoop of life.

Suffering such as mine is the suffering of someone who is buried.

Every superior act is a many-sided violation of ethical law.
To teach utility and reason!!!! We are not nearly reasonable enough. for that. 4 [91]?

To acknowledge the value of all passions one by one, but to sanctify them.

I wanted to know, now I am struck by my fate (vivisection) and my pain at the silent stare of the dog.

The ones who create should be treated humanely, they are lacking in loving thy neighbor.'

Someone profound.!!4 – You forgive today what was done to you. But you have not yet experienced it at all: after half a year you will never again forgive and forget it.

4 [92]!

No sooner does the intellect collide with morality than all hell breaks loose.

H(umans) began by taking morality for themselves, we, too, can give ourselves a morality!

124 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

"What is most difficult?"

I did all this, spoke Zarathustra, and today I offer it cheaply – for a girl's smile.

And have you nothing more to say to human beings?

No, said Zarathustra, the cup is empty. And when he ha(d) said this, he went on his way and alone. Yet his disciples wept.!!6

Beware of hurting a hermit. A hermit is like a deep well: it is easy to toss a stone into it, but how do you propose to retrieve it? A hermit never forgives.!!

sticking yet another arrow of contempt into his quiver. plucking

4 [93]"8

Don't reveal yourself! And if you must, then in rage but not in shame!

Do I have to tell you how to defend yourselves against burglars and cutthroats? I speak to those who are tired of their virtues and enjoy being robbed and maligned just once so that they can make a festival out of their virtue. –

4 [94]"'

Do not forget this about me! I told h(umans) to create superhumans, I taught noon and eternity and redemption from flux, and my doctrine is: the For All is older and was called good sooner than the "for me"; the "for me" must still be sanctified by you.

You should not kill your senses but rather sanctify them – make them innocent.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 125

Then all the people said: we must destroy the destroyer of morality –

If we want to become perfect as human beings, we must also become perfect as animals.

You will always have only as much morality as your strength allows.

Superhumans, solitary wanderers, timid ones – –

4 [95]

a disciple – this is neither a child nor a creative work," here

Zarathustra was silent and, transformed, stared intensely into space. His disciples approached him anyway and as(ked) him:

"do you have nothing more to share with us – that we can take home with us?"

Zarathustra went onwards until he came to his cave and mountains: there he also found his eagle and his serpent.

Yet

when (he) had greeted the cave and the animals, all at once he became very old.

At the time it was said among the people: the worst thing is not falling into Zarathustra's hands but dreaming of him at night.!?

He reflected for a long time and said no word while his animals waited before him and the morning strolled through the mountains. Suddenly his eyes took on a different look. It was around the hour of noon as he groped about and said: – – – 4 [96]!

Injustice should be taken on by someone who (is) capable of it.

Dangers of the solitary person.

Pine

I did all that and I will bear it – Smile of a child

126 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [97]

Here wafts the spirit of a hero – pass by quietly. He suffered too much; for that very reason he is still determined to inflict suffering.

4 [98]

May he himself have mercy on his soul.

4 [99]

I demand of you every act of self-sacrifice, of goodness, of sacred selfishness, and you should say in response to all that:

"think nothing of it! It suits my taste and no one else's!"

And I

demand in addition that you pursue knowledge because I know it goes against your taste, so that you say: "we probably have to be this way," but this compulsion of ours should not be a law nor become a shadow and an irritation to others.

4 [100]

My brothers, I know of no greater consolation for a woman than to tell her: "you, too, can give birth to superhumans."!??

What do you have in common with wolves and cats? who just keep taking and don't give and who prefer to steal rather than take?

You are the ones who keep giving gifts.'??

4 [or]

All of your weaknesses and vices are still following you within your knowing! A book is difficult to read: but anyone who has eyes to see – – –

4 [102]

It is your fate to be mistreated: no one fears your revenge.
At least you will not be completely eclipsed in time.!?*

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 127

4 [103]

Compassion in regard to superhumans (Disciples – Chap(ter)).
(Chap(ter)) if I could see superhumans! they do not see me, they see their vision.

(Chap(ter)) The good – no God gave it to you, and none will lead you into a better beyond; this cannot be proven;
and is idle error. Therefore only: "I will this!"

To describe the love for a contemporary (for a genius) – what torment! but when we place the genius at a distance and then see the distorted image! (Chap(ter))

4 [104]!

You say you believe in Zarathustra. But what does Zarathustra care? You are my brothers: I do not love you that much:
a

brother, this is neither a child nor a creative work.

I love freethinkers when their hearts are free as well. To me the head is like the entrails of the heart. Whatever a heart accepts,

this must be digested by the head and turned into thoughts.!?°

Still better for you to rage than to shame!

And when you are cursed, I don't like it that you then want to bless: it is better to join in the cursing for a bit. May the devil take me!!?"

I recommend that all martyrs consider whether the obsession with revenge has driven them to extremes.

4 [105]

your poets books actors are supposed to anesthetize you against your lack of visions – they impoverish you even more!

They are not my visions! And poets are supposed to lie!

128 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

I want to have nothing to do with art – except for that which brings joy! Out of pleasure and super-pleasure! The lie in art is the evil that comes from arrogance!

I don't want to hear your screaming! Yes, now you are "true"!

Overthrow!

4 [106]

This is a counterargument, and I am grateful to you. But now, friend, refute the counterargument for me!

I am delighted to see you, spoke Zarathustra, and yet you are (not) what delights me, rather for me you are a – – –

This is the hour of summer, an hour and no more. To me you are a mountain range: solid as ice, many storms and clouds. . .

4 [107]

I do not want to be hating and loving with them: I cannot bear their cries and their happiness.

4 [108]

N.B. To be accomplished with supreme passion: lovers (deceived) are foolish and they are not able to communicate their love.

Those who know are without love and uncommunicative.

Actors are without love and foolish.

4 [109]

they do not understand me – but it is eerie that they run to my favorite spot.

to turn to the courts is already a sign of contempt.

4 [110]!78

We are proud to worship when we cannot be idols.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 129

when a w(oman) goes into heat and she pictures m(en) – Look at that pale woman; I would rather fall into her hands, although she has murderous hands, than into her dreams.!"?

Whom does Zarathustra first encounter? He is happy to tolerate them again.

(Chap(ter)) I went into solitude because I wanted to love the human being, but I could only ever hate them. Finally, I came to love the superhuman being – since then I have tolerated humans. I want to bring them a new hope! And a new fear – said Zarathustra.

4 [111]

There was a time when I was overcome with disgust at myself; summer 1876. The danger of insanity, a scholar's bad conscience about the interference of metaphysics, the feeling of exaggeration, the ridiculousness of "sitting in judgment" – therefore to restore reason, and, with the greatest austerity, to try to live without metaphysical assumptions. "Freethinking"!°

– above and beyond myself!

4 [1r]'?!°

when I was young

Today I will gladly give all of this up – in return for the smile of a child. You must overcome your youth, too, if you want to be a child again.

Am I truly the one you honor? And if I am – be careful that a falling pillar does not kill you.

4 [113]

Now murderers appear to be sick: this shows how much moral judgments have been incorporated.
to collect captivating things.

130 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [114]

Hard-heartedness is a virtue in compassionate people.!?°

4 [115]

Blood is a bad witness for a truth: blood poisons a doctrine so that it becomes hatred.!*4 4 [116]!

When I was young, I was inclined to inflict pain on myself: people called it my inclination to the sublime.

To nurture ourselves with the grass and acorns of knowledge.

Humans should be the midpoint between plants and ghosts.

I love all these heavy drops, how they fall one by one from the dark cloud that conceals lightning within itself: the name for this lightning is the superhumans.

4 [u]'?°

The child within us should overpower even the lion within us – spoke Zarathustra.

I do not give alms – I am not poor enough for that – says Zarathustra.

I am a support and a balustrade along a mighty river – grab onto me whoever can! I am not a crutch to humiliate ourselves and to injure our arrogance: to confess our folly in order to mock our wisdom.

I forbid you to believe in these metaphysical things: here mistrust is appropriate and insight into where the valuation of these questions came from in earlier times. Our mode of thought must be thoroughly human!

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 131

4 [118]'?7 Moldenhauer!?8 Mainländer!??

4 [119]

but since you want to listen to me, then take from what is mine everything that belongs to you.

4 [120]

The hermit gritting his teeth – he opened his mouth reluctantly.!*°

How is it possible to communicate? How is it possible to be heard? When shall I emerge from my cave into the open? I am the most hidden of all hidden ones.

4 [121]

Look away! Lift yourselves into a higher light! No compassionate person loves superhumans!

4 [122] Here I sat waiting –

Beyond good and evil, enjoying the light

Then enjoying the shadows: nothing but play

Entirely ocean, entirely noon, entirely time without goal.!

*!

4 [123]

Alas for our goodness! – we honor our ancestors.

4 [124]

Your themes always resound with something like despair.

H(einrich) K(öselitz)

4 [125]

Chap(ter): on the rejection of martyrdom.

132 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [126]

A human a group of atoms completely dependent in all its movements on all distributions and alterations of force in the universe – and on the other hand, like every atom, unpredictable, a something in-and-for-itself.!??

We become conscious of ourselves only as a heap of affects. and even sense perceptions and thoughts belong among these revelations of the affects.

4 [127]

The most tragic of all stories with a heavenly resolution. Zarathustra growing progressively greater – his teaching progressively unfolding along with this increasing greatness.

The "return" shining above the last catastrophe like a setting sun.
} 8 P

4 [128]!

helpless, lacking the intellect to help free themselves from their sins – their condition remains "fixed"

When we suffer a lot, we become humble enough to be vain.

"I do not know of any reason against it" – but this "I do not know" is unfortunately not a reason for it! There is so much I do not know –

4 [129]

When we praise, we always praise ourselves: when we blame, we always blame others.

I am lying down below, shrouded in heavy melancholy –
my life hangs on small coincidences.

(Chap(ter)) Keep your souls fresh cool (against compassion)

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 133

Compassion, when strong, is a hellish feeling.

Murder, out of supreme love for humans.

4 [30]

How well you heal, savior.'4° These were her words. For the woman loved Zarathustra.

4 [131]

We are not writing poetry here: we are doing calculations.
But we first had to write poetry in order to be able to calculate.

I no longer experience anything: I am sublime, even beyond experience.

You cold-hearted and levelheaded people, you do not know the delights of cold-heartedness!

I remove your chains: die! – and the woman was seen smiling as she died.

When Zarathustra had heard the woman's words, he covered his head and braced himself.

Isn't this compassion a kind of hell? Isn't this fervor a kind of flame?

the judges said in unison: this man suffers from madness:
let him go wherever he wishes: and don't let him stay. Then Zarathustra decided on his own to return home to his cave and to his animals.

4 [132]

having taught "recurrence" – "I forgot misery." His compassion increases. He sees that the doctrine is unbearable.

134 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

Climax: the holy murder. He invents the doctrine of superhumans.

Return home: sojourn at the hermit's "why do you not teach hard-heartedness? And hatred of what is puny?"

Zarathustra: you teach that! I am no longer that person!

I was that way when I first arrived among humans. I have grown too poor for that, – I gave away everything, even my hard-heartedness. – Hermits think this way: I swear to you with quivering lips and with the lines that agony has chiseled on my brow, with the smiles of the dying – he weeps. (May God live in this way) God is dead: and it is time for superhumans to live.

4 [133]

To elevate to reform the concept of justice – or to prove that human actions are necessarily unjust.

it is possible to take a position outside a particular valuation, but not outside a// valuations.

to evaluate morality – by what standard?

4 [134]

It is certainly possible to tolerate ourselves: but what about our neighbors? they suffer too much.

I didn't know how poor they are – I didn't know that it is more beautiful to take than to give. –

Isn't compassion God's hell? And perhaps he died of this fervor? 4 [135]*

With blood feuds: basic feeling like all those who represent the state: respect for the profound suffering of a kin-group and concession to this feeling.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 135

if we combine what is harmful with horror or disgust, then the feeling evil, bad, emerges.

There are always people who love serving in dangerous posts: and without examining here the motives for this love or just praising them any further – the free spirit – –

4 [136]!

With morality above us, life cannot to be endured at all – if we are not Pharisees and are able to see freely – that is why I destroyed morality.

A pile of emotions, a primum mobile, but retarded in its movement and crushed by everything that moves.

in order to affirm myself, I destroyed morality: I showed that there are creators and tyrants everywhere at the same time.

But

this simultaneity is not needed, because the herd – – –

4 [137]

All goals are destroyed. Humans must give themselves one. It was an error that they had one: they have given themselves all of them. But the presuppositions for all earlier goals are destroyed.

Science shows the flux, but not the goal: yet it does provide presuppositions to which the new goal must correspond.

4 [138]!

Every human being is a creative cause of occurrences, a primum mobile with an original movement.

4 [139]

When God understood himself, he created himself and his opposite.!°°

You have indeed made the journey from worm to human!

and much within you is still worm and a memory of your journey.

136 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [140]

Icepacks. – My disgust with people had grown too great.

Likewise my counter-disgust with the moral arrogance of my idealism. I was becoming like the people I despised, I searched within myself for everything that I despised: I wanted to dampen my ardor. I took up the cause against all the accusers of humankind – I wrested from them and from myself the right to exalted words.

The drive to criticize wanted life –

Heroism of living on as little as possible: the desert.

Heroism of debasing our own intellectual drive, to think it through as affect.

I discredited the affects in order to say afterwards: I had an affect, nothing more!

Life under morality not to be endured at all. (Significance of Wagner early on)

4 [141]

W/(agner), who will endure as a h(uman being) who took tasteless arrogance to the furthest extreme.

4 [142]!

I deny moral drives, but a//affects and drives are colored by our value judgments; completely different judgments are competing within us. Result: to comprehend the multiplicity of moralities.

a constant praising and blaming.

our affects speaking morally our general feelings speaking morally our intellectual pleasures (speaking morally) our illnesses show up as moralistic phenomenon everything in people is a crime, which we like or dislike all utility landscape

bed

a kind of illness moralis

other moral affects foregrounded on bad days

152

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 137

4 [113]?

Everything we don't feel in that way makes little difference to us. We constantly forget it.

The praise and blame of our affects, in other words valuation,

is what I call "morality."

Explaining the sounds is not enough to explain music – let alone to refute it.

There are ages in which there is appalling indifference to human life. The opposite of this is the blood feud.

Unburdening ourselves: this is the only way we are able to endure ourselves – and then we go mad with compassion.

4 [144]!

With shoulders squared it stands braced against the void:
and where there is space, there is being.

4 [145]

Entirely ocean, entirely noon, entirely time without goal!*>

A child, a toy And suddenly one becomes two And Zarathustra walked past me.

4 [146]

as judge and executioner I bring about my own downfall.

4 [147]

"Good for something," "bad for something": originally all moral judgments are judgments about means to ends.°6 But gradually the ends have been forgotten, and "good" "bad" remained – as if there could be something good in itself. Praise and blame have always been given with an end in mind: but eventually the end was denied in order to be able to praise

138 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

and blame fully completely, namely when feelings like respect love or disgust were immediately perceived in these means.

And so it is affect that created "good in itself" and "evil in itself."

However things might stand now with these incorporated "moral feelings" – it is apparent from the history of moral feelings that no codes of goodness," no final end remains standing – everything is refuted. We have a monstrous force of moral feelings within us, but no end for anyone. They stand in contradiction with each other – they derive from different codes of goodness, – – –

There is a monstrous moral force, but there is no longer a goal toward which all this force could be expended.

4 [148]

What can all people do? Praise and blame. This is the madness of humans, the mad animals.

I say that the fuzz goes with the peach,' I say that lies go with life.

We commit many injustices – and not only when we inflict pain but also through our praise charity compassion – we do not retaliate when it would be necessary!

4 [149]

There is only one rationality. And is there only one sensibility-ity?! A perfectly human interpretation of the world's process must simultaneously – or: a comforting interpretation of the world's direction has been possible for each phase of human emotion.

4 [150]

It is terrible to see how unjust things are. But at least there is consolation in knowing that we are the creators of justice and that we suffer on account of ourselves.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 139

4 [151]

Morality – the epitome of all of our incorporated value judgments: what is to become of this monstrous accumulation of force? This is the only thing that interests me about the question of how these valuations emerged.

4 [152] '°!

What do you know of the love that a lunatic has for reason?

4 [153]

(Chap(ter)) speech to those who are most intellectual. '°*

(Chap(ter)) the veiled life.

4 [154]

They have never experienced a moment that said to them, "we are pitiful"

this ancient God-made-human could not laugh.

A Hebrew named Jesus was the best at loving until now.

4 [155]!

I didn't repudiate this p(erson) that I had always admired: but rather, the reasons why I had always admired this person.

4 [156]

Conclusion of the section. And I chose for myself even this suffering on the basis of truthfulness.

4 [157]

You have seen their ideals – now shatter them yourself and be hard-hearted! Compassion.

4 [158]

Form: this p(erson) landed on top of a box that has no floor and no walls.

140 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [159]

What! You want to immortalize these miserable people? To chain them together? Just let them perish! Socialists what do we care about the rich and the poor!

4 [160]!6%

When this timelessness'® gazes into the world, everything crooked becomes straight!

If you see blue, what good does it do you to convince yourself and say: it is gray!

to despise

4 [161]

It is difficult to say something false about women: with women nothing is impossible – answered Zarathustra.!"

4 [162]

The last humans – they wheeze and enjoy their happiness.

4 [163]

Humans are determined to stay put as super-apes, images of the last humans who are the eternal ones.

4 [164]'°%

There are enough of these people: they know nothing better on earth than to lie with a woman.

4 [165]

H(umans) are something that must be overcome: what have you done to make this happen? What do I care about your good evil h(umans)?

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 141

4 [166]

What use is it to free the mind if it then has no wings to fly away?

4 [167]

Last conversation with the hermit.

– I praise you for not becoming my student.

Hermit: I have too much contempt for humans, I love them too much – I cannot stand them – for both, I have to dissimulate too much.

I bring them a new love and a new contempt – superhumans and last humans.

I do not understand you – they will not accept what you bring them. Let them first beg for alms!

Zarathustra: – – –

But they need only alms, they are not rich enough to be able to need your treasures.

I write songs and sing them, I laugh and weep"? when I make my songs.

I have nothing more to teach this man.

4 [168] 171

Some want to throw dice and others want to calculate and count and still others are always wanting to see waves and dances of waves – they call it science and sweat while they do it.

But they are children who want to have their game. And truly, it is beautiful infantile nonsense, and some laughter would not hurt the game

4 [169]?

Purpose of asceticism: to become as thirsty as possible, the creative flow must be blocked.

4 [170]

There are many things to figure out about the world: but to figure out the world – this is tedious.

142 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [x]

The antithesis of superhumans is last humans: I created one!"*

at the same time as the other.

Everything superhuman appears in humans as illness and madness.

We must already be an ocean in order to absorb a filthy stream without getting filthy.

4 [172]

When I considered purpose I also considered chance.

It has to be possible to explain the world through purposes and to explain the world through chance: through thought as much as will, through movement as much as tranquility: through God as much as the Devil. For, all of this is the I. These perspectives from which we see things are not our own; they are the perspectives of a being of the same kind as us, a greater being: whose images we gaze into.

4 [173]

In order to learn this, I decided to hate those I loved, to blame what I had been praising up to now and to see what in the first place was good about evil and what was evil about good. I called this justice.

I finally discovered what was most difficult: not to love and not to hate, not to praise and not to bla(me) and to say: there is no good and there is no evil.

When I had discovered this, I went into the desert.

4 [174]!

The world stands there finished, a golden bowl!" of goodness – yet the creative mind wants to continue creating what has already been created– the mind invented time, and now, spinning, the world breaks apart and then, turning in great rings, spins back together again – as the becoming of good by means of evil.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 143

4 [175]

You are too crude for me: it is impossible for minor experiences to be your downfall. 4 [176]'

"And indeed everything speaks quite differently to me than to you."

At the point where your honesty stops looking, your eye no longer sees.!8°

4 [177]

History = evolution of purposes in time: such that ever higher forms grow out of lower ones. To be explained, why ever higher forms of life have to emerge. The teleologists and Dar-winists are in agreement that this happens. But the whole thing is a hypothesis based on value judgments – and indeed, comparatively recent value judgments. The reverse, that everything until us is decline, is equally demonstrable. The human and especially the wisest human as nature's greatest blunder and self-contradiction (the being that suffers the most): nature has been descending until now. The organic as degeneration.

4 [178]

In my eyrie and forest. Zarathustra 4.

4 [179]

Determining value, this means the same thing as determining disvalue. In order to have the happiness of value judgments, we must also bring along all evil and all the displeasure of contempt.

This person says: the whole world is thought – will – war – love – hate: my brothers! I say to you: all these taken singly are false, all these taken together are true.

144 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [180]

Humankind must set its goal beyond itself – but not in a false X-world, rather in its own continuation.

The question: how something becomes is only meaningful for me because of the question of what it should become.

4 [181]'8'

What apes are to us, objects of painful embarrassment – so shall we be to superhumans. 4 [182]!82

How would someone have to speak to you so that you would understand! It would have to make you sick!

4 [183]'°

As soon as the will takes the stage, feeling experiences a sense of liberation. This is called freedom of the will. For feeling is imprinted through suffering – and as soon as the will takes the stage, feeling is suspended and does not suffer

4 [18.4]!84

No sooner are you born than you have already begun to die.

4 [185]

Compassion and love opposite of morality. No justice involved!

No obedience, no duty! No love of truth and no honesty! In addition, abandoning our own way – the character of passion – and its irrationality.

4 [186]!85

Did I not invent a new smell and a new color? – Thus spoke Zarathustra.

The ocean carried you: – – –

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 145

Who among you has the most extensive soul putting tightrope walkers on the lowest level.!86

4 [187]

And no matter where I climb, my dog follows me everywhere, the dog called “I.”

4 [188]

No I prior to the herd. Opposite of this: within superhumans, over millennia, the You of many I’s has become one. (thus the individuals have now become one!®”

4 [189]

The J also contains a number of entities (as in the herd) no contradiction. Likewise a plurality of forces. Occasionally pausing – invisible, like an electric current.

Striving toward compaction, it is at its strongest like a diamond, at its most creative? Really? As a people even more so?

4 [190]

They go to the charcoal burners!#® and speak to them of eternal torment.

4 [ror]!

Conversation with a King (Chap(ter)).

4 [192]

The history of great moments – this includes even teaching in front of charcoal burners. 4 [193]?

And if you are not able to squash what is small, if you do not want to be a shoo-fly:!! then go into (solitude).

146 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

4 [194]

our eye sees things falsely, it contracts things and merges them together: is this a reason for rejecting sight and saying: it is worthless?

4 [195]

But do you believe that Zarathustra found what he was seeking? Do you believe that a blind man walks a straight path? – And so it came to pass that this time Zarathustra did not perish.

4 [196]!

Illness is a clumsy experiment for the sake of good health. Cut this experiment short!

4 [197]

the feeling of power, the competitive urge of all I's to find the thought that will stay fixed above humankind as its star – the I a primum mobile.

4 [198]

Goal: for a moment, to reach superhumans. For this I will suffer everything! "That triad!

The most peaceful external life because so much is happening!

4 [199]?

Is it not a matter of indifference that as many p(eople) as possible live as long as possible?

Isn't the happiness of these many a despicable thing and no justification for existence?

Let the meaning of your life be to justify existence – and for this you will not only have to become the devil's advocate but also even God's intercessor before the devil.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 – FEBRUARY 1883 147

4 [200]

He loved humans because God loves them. He wanted to redeem them in order to redeem God.

Love for humans was the cross to which he was nailed; he wanted to deliver God from his hell: which is the love of God for humans.

4 [20]

For people are hard of hearing: and anyone who is clever beats their ears to such a pulp that they begin to hear with their eyes.

they quit laughing instead they stared at Zarathustra.

and surface everywhere, – –

4 [202]!95

Speech to the cliff – I love that it does not speak. Its silence is dignified (Everything is moral)

4 [203]

The I knows nothing of itself in plants: it splits itself when procreating; in many it is one (herd) it is extinguished here

– what's the significance? The coincidence!"® of the J (in different entities) irrelevant.

4 [204] (the veiled life) a pale youth

you will never discover many of them

Pine

(the last human being: a kind of Chinese)

As often as his spirit moved him, Zarathustra went up a mountain and on the way wrote down his sayings. And once,

148 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

when he was alone with himself, he glorified himself and spoke!"

You should be like trees that hang over the ocean and bend from – – –

He walks alone; for his figures surround him, figures that he alone sees. And should he meet his equal, then their minds embrace and with 4 eyes they see the very same figures.

whatever is just lies in my attempts to create justice for everything abhorrent to me a tree: to shake loose the leaves and to give them small movements and to give the roots and branches the same etc.

The hermit looked at him for a long time – – –

Zarathustra, said the hermit, you have grown poor – and if I wanted alms from you, would you really give them to me?

4 [205]

All morality has to do with inventing or seeking higher corporeal states where it is possible to bring together previously separated abilities.

4 [206]

Pay no attention to what is good and evil – follow the path to your good and create your evil and good. There are still 1000 paths not yet taken!

4 [207]

Many minds"? are housed within humans like creatures of the sea – they battle one another for the mind "I": they love it, they want it to climb on their backs, they hate one another on account of this love.

198

– the I, the frisky kitten with a silver sense of animal joy.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 - FEBRUARY 1883 149

When has a drowning man ever suffered from thirst!

and again the kitten I squeals and again someone is happy and again all the others are envious.

A lovely consolation for those young enough for it, said a little old lady.'""

Was I born to be a preacher of repentance? Was I born to rattle on like a priest and a drum??"

4 Pos]?!

I teach you about the superhumans:

you'll have to teach yourselves.

202 the great contempt

4 [209]?°

(Chap(ter)) The Brotherhood of Justifiers. 4 [210]?°4

In good and evil they lack the shame of the spirit: and praise and blame as if and in their spirit they lack the shame of good and evil:

They overturn icons and say: there is nothing exalted and worthy of worship – because they themselves can create neither icon nor god.

Just listen to the contempt of their rage against icons – the great contempt for themselves!

I love souls that squander: they do not give back and do not want thanks because they are always giving gifts."

there they go forth on their own

4 [211]?°°

I am explaining even your virtues by what is to come.

It's not your virtues I'm rejecting, it's the virtuous among you.

150 UNPUBLISHED FRAGMENTS

The friend as the best despiser and enemy.

How few are worthy!

To be a friend's conscience. To note every humiliation. To understand conscience not only in a moral sense: also taste, also to stay within one's limitations.

Friends as demons and angels. They hold the key for each others' chains. In their presence a chain falls away. They elevate each other. And as an I composed of the two, they approach superhumans and rejoice at possessing friends, because each provides for the other a second wing, without which the first would be useless.

4 [212]297

It is cool, the meadow lies in shadow, the sun has departed. Is it not absurd to live? Wouldn't we have to have more reason in order to make something reasonable out of life?

My brothers, forgive the soul of Zarathustra for the fact that it is evening. 4 [213]?

The invention of conditions

It is high time that humans set themselves a goal. They are still rich and wild enough for the most exalted goal. I say to you: you still have the chaos and world-collisions within you that are needed to give birth to a dance of the stars.

But someday humans will become too poor, someday they will no longer have enough momentum and drive even for the fury of contempt.

4 [214]

Our contempt for h(umans) drove us beyond the stars. Religion, metaphysics, as symptom of a desire to create superhumans.

4 NOVEMBER 1882 - FEBRUARY 1883 151

4 [215]?!

Humankind is walking around pregnant, how quaint the pregnant are!

4 [216]

(Chap(ter)) Prove yourself to me! Which duty is yours?

4 [217]

1. The emphasis on states and the striving for them. Significance for the body.

2. This particular attitude of the I toward itself emerges, in

